Hon. Francis Fox (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite clear that cultural agencies receive money appropriated by the Parliament of Canada. Obviously they have to be held accountable for the use of those funds. I do not think there is any grounds for disagreement between us on those questions. The essential element of the arm's length relationship between the Government and cultural agencies is the fact that cultural agencies are the ones which decide how those funds are to be spent once they are appropriated, what type of competition will be held, and how they are to be allocated to the various groups across the country. In all of those essential respects the arm's length principle as it exists today would, of course, be maintained.

ABORTION

FREEDOM OF CONSCIENCE ISSUE

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General in his capacity as Acting Minister of Justice. He will know that on this International Women's Day one of the major concerns of Canadian women is the inequities which exist in abortion legislation, which too often results in lengthy delays and denial of access to safe therapeutic abortion. Does the Minister support freedom of conscience on this sensitive moral question, leaving the decision to be made by a woman in consultation with her doctor? Will the Government repeal those provisions of the Criminal Code on abortion, in order to achieve this important objective?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the question is really directed to my colleague, the Minister of Justice. I know he would want to answer that question himself.

PLANNED PARENTHOOD FEDERATION—GOVERNMENT FUNDING

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, whose Department has been cutting funding to the Planned Parenthood Federation of Canada despite the excellent work it does in promoting birth control and sex education, both of which effectively reduce the number of abortions. Will the Minister undertake to improve significantly the level of funding to the Planned Parenthood Federation of Canada, particularly in view of the very drastic cuts in funding which have been taking place in Provinces such as British Columbia where the Social Credit Government recently cut entirely its funding to the Federation?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I can go even further and confirm to the House that I was able to restore to its original level the funding of the Planned Parenthood Federation of Canada. I think that is excellent news for everyone, in view of the very good work they perform all over Canada, in communities and groups. Through my budget, which is limited and for a purpose, I am unable to replace the provincial Governments where they failed their tasks. I regret it, as do all Canadians, and particularly in this case, women and young girls.

GOVERNMENT DECENTRALIZATION

ANNOUNCED TRANSFER OF HEALTH AND WELFARE BRANCH FROM HALIFAX TO SYDNEY

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board and concerns a recent report in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald. According to the article the Deputy Prime Minister congratulated the Member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys because "the Federal Treasury Board has just approved a $500,000 expenditure to begin the transfer of the Income Security Branch of the Department of Health and Welfare Canada from Halifax to Sydney".

Does this mean that the Cape Breton Liberals are opposed to the Member for Halifax, or is this some kind of new job creation program whereby jobs are created by transferring employees around the Province of Nova Scotia?

Hon. Herb Gray (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as far as I can recall, this transfer was announced a long time ago. It is not a new decision. However, I will be happy to check into the details. I would be interested to know exactly where my hon. friend stands on the issue of decentralization, whether he is for or against it. As far as I can recall, this is simply confirmation of a decision which was announced some time ago. The current announcement is simply talking about its implementation.

Mr. Crosby: Mr. Speaker, I can tell the President of the Treasury Board exactly where I stand. I am totally opposed to transferring senior public servants, who have devoted many years of their lives to the Public Service of Canada, from Halifax to Sydney simply to please the Member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys and the Deputy Prime Minister.

IMPACT ON EMPLOYEES

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Does the President of the Treasury Board realize the effect on the people involved in this transfer? Will he look at the specific cases involved, and give consideration to those people who cannot retain their employment if they are required to go from the City of Halifax to the City of Sydney to maintain their job in the Public Service?

Hon. Herb Gray (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, there are quite generous provisions in these cases of decentralization to deal fairly with the public servants involved. I am sure that will be the case here. I am sure my hon. friend's point of view will be noted with interest by the responsible Minister, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who is in the House now.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have two questions I would like to raise. There is the usual request I should put forth to the Government House Leader as to the items of business planned in the upcoming week.

I understand discussions have been held with respect to the second matter, and that is that the motion referring Supplementary Estimates (C) for 1983-1984, under an Order of March 5, to several standing committees of the House should be amended by deleting the referral of Social Development Votes 2c and 3c to the Standing Committee on Transport and by adding the referral of those two votes to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. I believe there was a typographical error of some nature to begin with.

Mr. Pinard: On the second point, Mr. Speaker, it is true that we have had consultations and agree to the motion to which the Hon. Member refers. Therefore, if you seek unanimous consent for the following, the formal motion would be:

That the Order of the House of March 5, 1984 referring the Supplementary Estimates (C), 1983-1984, to the several standing committees of the House, be amended by deleting the referral of Social Development Votes 2c and 3c to the Standing Committee on Transport and by adding the referral of the said votes to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

It seems there would be unanimous consent without debate for the following motion, if you would put it now.

Mr. Speaker: Does the Hon. President of the Privy Council have unanimous consent of the House to present his motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the House to adopt said motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion (Mr. Pinard) agreed to.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, in so far as the business of the House is concerned for the coming week, we plan to call the following Bills tomorrow: Bill C-9, resuming debate; and the back-up Bill would be resuming debate on Bill C-10. Monday will be an Opposition Day. Therefore Monday is an allotted day. Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday next week could be used to resume debate on Bill C-21. If we were to send the Bill to committee earlier than next Thursday, I would be pleased to meet with my colleagues, the House Leaders on the other side, to tell them what other plans we would have under the circumstances.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question on House business. The President of the Privy Council will be aware of the fact that the legislation on the Access to Information Act and the Privacy Act provides for the designation of a committee to review the implementation of that important legislation. The Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments has asked that it be permitted to assume this important responsibility, particularly given the heavy workload of the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. The main point, Mr. Speaker, is that no committee has yet been designated to assume this very important responsibility.

I would like to ask the President of the Privy Council when the Government intends to move to ensure that this committee is in fact designated so that many of the obvious weaknesses of the legislation can be examined carefully, both with respect to the substance of the Bill and the administration and implementation of the legislation.

Mr. Pinard: The Hon. Member referred to the workload of the Justice Committee. That could be the case if he would be more co-operative. Since we have not yet sent the Security

Bill, the Divorce Act or the Criminal Code amendments to the Justice Committee, I suppose his representation is purely hypothetical.

With reference to the Access to Information Act, I had a request from the standing committee to which he referred which was denied because our plans are to make the reference to the Justice Committee. On the other hand, if we were to have more co-operation on the legislation I just mentioned, it may be that I would reconsider and we would agree to refer the Access to Information legislation to the committee to which the Hon. Member referred.

For the time being, there is no workload in the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee. Therefore, I would be in a better position to give a more precise answer to his question once some of the Bills I have indicated have been sent to the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I would also like to speak on House business. The Government House Leader and the Minister of Transport may be aware of representations about early presentation of amendments to the Aeronautics Act, particularly from the Canadian Air Line Pilots Association. Can the Government House Leader give us an indication when they intend to call that legislation? I think we can be reasonably sure of fairly quick passage. What would be the timetable for the amendments to the Aeronautics Act?

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I take note of the representations made by the Hon. Member. I will look into this matter, consult with the Minister of Transport and will hopefully be able to report to the Hon. Member before the end of this session.

MR. PARKER—TELEVISION RECEPTION IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to present the following petition. To the Honourable the House of Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled, the petition of the undersigned residents of Canada, who now exercise their right to present a grievance, humbly sheweth that whereas the residents living in the Jaffray, Tie Lake, Sand Creek and Galloway areas in British Columbia are faced with deteriorated television reception from CBC programs and CFCN broadcasting, and whereas this is a rural area that depends heavily on television viewing for a considerable portion of their daily lives, wherefore we, the undersigned petitioners, call on the Government of Canada to have these areas tested for interference, and have the power output increased to ensure that adequate service is provided. And as in duty bound your Petitioners will ever pray.

PENSION ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING APPLICATIONS FOR VETERANS' PENSIONS

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-225, an Act to amend the Pension Act (administrative delay).

He said: Mr. Speaker, this Bill would apply a six-month time limit to the veterans' entire pension process. If the Pension Commission failed to meet these time limits, the veteran would receive automatic payment of the applied for benefits. Hundreds of applicants die while waiting for a decision. This Bill would help put an end to this disgraceful situation.

I would like to point out that in the United States applications are processed within 90 days, a record worth praise and emulation.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CANADIAN COAST GUARD

Question No. 454—Mr. Howie:

Are any persons employed by the Canadian Coast Guard and, if so, how many and how many persons were employed in each of the two preceding years?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Transport): The Canadian Coast Guard employed 6,799 as of December 31, 1983, 6,619 as of December 31, 1982, 6,404 as of December 31, 1981. These figures include all tenures of employees e.g., terms less than six months, terms over six months, seasonal, full time.

MANAGEMENT EXCELLENCE IN SMALL BUSINESS PROGRAM

Question No. 634—Mr. Stewart:

Is there a Management Excellence in Small Business Program and, if so, what (a) department or agency is responsible for its administration (b) amount was budgeted for the program in the fiscal year 1983-84?

Hon. David Smith (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Yes. (a) The Department of Regional Industrial Expansion (DRIE). (b) $395,000 was budgeted for fiscal year 1983-84.

FASHION DESIGN ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Question No. 641—Mr. Stewart:

With reference to the answer to question No. 123, in the fiscal year 1983-84, what amount was budgeted for the Fashion Design Assistance Program?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): As indicated in the response provided to question No. 123, answered in the House of Commons on Thursday, January 19, 1984, the Fashion Design Assistance Program (FDAP) terminated in 1982. Therefore, no budgetary allocation was provided for the fiscal year 1983-84.

[English]

Mr. Evans: I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

In response to a question asked of me yesterday by the Whip of the Official Opposition with regard to Question No. 717, I should indicate to him that manifests are available each month from the Ministry of Transport with regard to Transport Canada aircraft and from the Ministry of National Defence with regard to DND aircraft. Since that is publicly available information to the Hon. Member, in a public place, according to Beauchesne Citation 357(ff) a Member shall not "seek information set forth in documents equally accessible to the questioner, as Statutes, published reports, et cetera". Therefore, I would suggest that the question placed by the Hon. Member is out of order.

Mr. Speaker: The questions enumerated by the Parliamentary Secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Would there be unanimous consent for the House to revert to Introduction of Bills? I believe the Hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Axworthy) has in mind the introduction of a Bill.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, he will have to be much sharper and keep much more alert than that if he expects to go anywhere in the forthcoming leadership campaign.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, if the Minister would quit talking to other Liberal Members he would not be on the bit. But yes, we will agree to that.

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacLaren that Bill C-21, an Act to provide borrowing authority, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Gimaïel: Mr. Speaker, thank you for allowing me to rise in the debate on to Bill C-21—

[English]

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. When we adjourned at one o'clock, the Hon. Member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) had just finished his remarks. No opportunity has been made available to ask him certain questions. Could we have the regular question period now that the Member is here? I am sure he would consent to answer questions according to House rules.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): If there is no objection from Members, we will have a ten-minute question period.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Kamloops-Shuswap, who is the finance critic for the New Democratic Party, indicated in his speech today that there were many Canadians who did not pay income tax. Of course, there are. Could he name one Canadian person or company who had taxable income but was not required to pay tax, was excused from paying tax or something of that nature? Or is the whole question of tax and escaping tax just rhetoric and nonsense from him as NDP finance critic?

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, that is a really difficult question. I want to remind the Hon. Member that the point I was making is that at this time of the year when everyone is busy preparing to fill out their tax return, or paying accountants to do it, one becomes very sensitive to the fact that certain corporations, firms and individuals do not pay their fair share of tax in our country for a variety of reasons. They are not doing anything illegal; they are not doing anything that is wrong in terms of the laws of the land. It is simply that the laws of the land have been written in such a way that they favour certain types of individuals or firms. Many of the laws were written with good intentions but have been abused over the years, or circumstances have changed such that those intentions have been found to be inappropriate or have changed over time.

I am referring to the approximately 200 loopholes that the present tax system makes available to corporations. As a result, we find a long list of corporations whose books show that they were very profitable in the year 1982-83. Perhaps I could bring one example to the attention of the Hon. Member. It is one that is often cited in the House. It concerns the Bank of Montreal whose profits in 1982, I believe, were in excess of $300 million. For a variety of tax reasons it paid no federal income tax that year as a result of the loopholes or tax incentives provided by the Government of Canada. And I might also say as a result of subsequent Liberal and Conservative governments. We feel that is inappropriate. When you have so many people not paying what I think is their fair share of income tax, either on a personal or corporate level, someone else has to pay extra.

That is a shameful situation when you have individuals who are working hard and paying a tax rate higher than what they ought to be paying as a result of a multitude of tax loopholes, or corporations, particularly small ones, which are paying effective tax rates now higher than they should because so many are not paying what I call their fair share.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I am rather intrigued that the Hon. Member, after a very dramatic speech, could not name one corporation or individual in Canada who was not paying tax on taxable income.

I would ask the Hon. Member for Kamloops-Shuswap this. If there are such loopholes in the Act, why did the New Democratic Party vote for the small business bond system which allowed the Bank of Montreal to absorb certain income that would otherwise be taxable as non-taxable income? Does the New Democratic Party favour, for example, imputed rent on homes and businesses if you have an investment there? Indeed, which of this huge number of loopholes which the New Democratic Party talks about would he abolish? Would the Hon. Member abolish child care credits? Would he say to people who make charitable donations to worthwhile causes that those donations are not deductible from income? Would the Hon. Member say, for example, that if you have interest to pay on a debt in connection with earning money in a business that that interest should not be deductible? Where does the New Democratic Party stand on sensibility? Or is the New Democratic Party out for rhetoric, saying that some people are not paying taxes, but when asked who is not paying taxes, the New Democratic Party cannot come up with one name?

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to learn of the Hon. Member's hearing problem. It did seem to me that I did specifically name one firm. Perhaps I will name a few others: Hudson's Bay Company of Canada, Steinberg's, Simpsons-Sears, Domtar—

Mr. Blenkarn: "Taxable" income.

Mr. Riis: The taxable income was $30 million in 1981. They paid no income tax that particular year.

Mr. Blenkarn: Taxable income.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I am saying there is quite a long list. I suppose if I am going to be specific about a tax loophole that I feel could be changed or removed to a large extent, it would be the PIP grants. I believe anybody, even those in the Progressive Conservative Party if they were to be honest about so-called tax incentives to oil companies, would have to admit that we have been excessive when you find 80-plus per cent of the exploration costs in our frontier areas being paid for by the people of Canada as a result of PIP grants and other tax concessions to oil companies, most of which are foreign-based. I do not think that is a tax concession we can afford to keep in place much longer.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I have a short supplementary question for the Hon. Member. Now that the Hon. Member for Kamloops-Shuswap has named the Hudson's Bay Company as evading taxes on $30 million, will he go to a justice of the peace this afternoon and lay a charge of tax evasion against the Hudson's Bay Company? Will he do the same with the Bank of Montreal? Or is it a fact that those companies have no taxable income? Is it not a fact that this is hokum, nonsense and drivel?

Let me ask the Hon. Member one more question. Where does the NDP stand on this Bill? Is it in favour of $29 billion in borrowing authority or will the New Democratic Party be voting against the Bill?

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, this is getting to the point of being silly. Are we in the New Democratic Party going to vote to provide authority for the Government of Canada to borrow and spend nearly $30 billion when we stand up daily in this House and outline very specifically how that money is being inappropriately spent and inappropriately collected? To suggest for a moment that we would consider supporting this Bill, I find rather amusing would be the best way to put it.

I want to clarify a point which the Hon. Member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) has made. I have not suggested that the Royal Bank of Canada, the Bank of Montreal to which I specifically referred, Domtar or Steinberg's are evading taxes. I said very specifically in my response that these firms and individuals are obeying the law. His political Party, in co-operation with the Liberal Party, has over the years devised a set of tax rules which enable Canadian individuals, mainly upper income earners, and Canadian corporations to use legitimate laws of the land to provide loopholes which enable them to pay little or no tax. These people are acting within the law, thanks to the law written by members of the Liberal and Conservative Parties.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre Gimaïel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Mines)): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to take part in the debate today on Bill C-21, aimed at giving the Canadian Government sufficient borrowing authority for the year 1984. It is, of course, not the first time a debate on the subject is being held in the House. It is, in fact, a yearly occurrence, when the Government seeks borrowing authority to be able to meet the needs of Canadians and its various departments.

What I find surprising in these yearly debates, and perhaps even more so this year, are the repetitious arguments of the Official Opposition. Every year, we hear the same old cliché about blank cheques and an incredible amount of rhetoric that would have Canadians believe that the Government is doing an incredibly bad job. In fact, their arguments are entirely at odds with what is actually happening in Canada. Mr. Speaker, Canada is a vast and beautiful country, and in this country, in nine provinces out of ten, the authority responsible for collecting taxes from all Canadians or money in any other form, to meet the needs of the provinces, is the Government of Canada. All the more incredible, when one listens to what the Opposition has to say, and surprising, Mr. Speaker, since, as we know there is not a single Liberal government in our Canadian provinces.

An Hon. Member: Your time will come!

Mr. Gimaïel: There are several Conservative governments that spend money and pass legislation to meet the needs of their people. What kind of legislation are they passing and how do they do it? I do not know whether all the provinces are doing a good job, but if we look at Quebec . . . It would take a long time to enumerate the many points on which I disagree with the Government of my unfortunate province, which is increasingly suffering the consequences of having elected an outrageously dominating Parti Québécois Government. I would not go so far as to say the same of the other provinces, but the fact remains that these are the people, and many are Conservatives like those here in the House, or Members of the New Democratic Party, these are the people who are going to spend a large part of the $29 billion the Canadian Government is seeking to borrow. Mr. Speaker, this year the Canadian government will be giving nearly $20 billion to the provinces in transfer payments to meet the needs of Canadian in areas under provincial jurisdiction, such as health care. I see the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) who is in the midst of negotiations at the present time and has introduced a Bill to ensure that Canadians receive proper care, that they can be born, live and die in this country with the assurance that Canada can provide them with health care and also post-secondary and technical institutions. Every year, the Government of Canada transfers $20 billion to the provinces. I would therefore suggest that Members of the Opposition who want to know what this money will be used for call up their provincial colleagues who might be able to tell them how that money is going to be spent. I would be surprised if they did because that party is totally inconsistent in several areas. Whether the issue is languages, oil or anything else, what the big brothers in the federal Parliament want, is unwanted by the kid brothers in the provincial Assemblies. In other words, there is no agreement, just controversy. This is more or less how we see the Progressive Conservative party at this time with their nine days' wonder, their new leader who, by the way, now has to cope with a new trend known as "Bring Back Joe", which is gaining quite a momentum in Western Canada, and who does not seem too sure of making it to the upcoming elections.

"Bring back Joe" is the new trend originating from Western Canada. It is the BBJ or "Bring Back Joe" trend, and I can easily understand why the Members opposite feel dejected because, as the Hon. Member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) said during the Progressive Conservative leadership campaign a year ago, the Leader of the Opposition is proving to be with every passing day nothing more than just an idolized fake. He even lost the power of speech recently. He found it this afternoon for two short questions and quickly left the House to ask his friend from St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) whether he had asked the right questions. I think that he will be back on his usual pedestal tomorrow. Then once again he will lose the power of speech as has been the case these last few weeks.

To come back to the issue being considered, Mr. Speaker, I have heard during the last few days Members opposite trying to make us believe that Canada was getting deep into debt. How awful! Canada is engulfed in debt. I heard the Hon. Member for Joliette yesterday giving as a perfect example the way people use credit cards. Mr. Speaker, what is wrong with using a credit card to pay for what you buy? It is simply a banking tool that was the best example the Hon. Member had to explain what is going on in Canada, but he did not do so. It is obvious that if the credit card user has no money to pay for what he buys with his card and has to borrow from someone else there is a problem. However, when the card user has the money in the bank to pay for his purchases, there is no problem at all in using a credit card.

The Canadian Government will borrow in Canada over 90 per cent of the $29 billion requested in this Bill. This means that Canada will not be borrowing money on the foreign markets. What the Government is asking is the authority to borrow, to obtain the moneys it needs by a means other than taxation to generate economic activity, to fulfill the requirements of the population, to meet its commitments under the various pieces of legislation which were passed through the years in this House by the various parties.

When the Canadian Government borrows from Canadians, is Canada's deficit increasing? No. The deficit of Canada as a nation does not increase. When the Government borrows from Canadians, it uses their money to invest in various social and economic programs, and in most cases, especially in the last few years, the Canadian Government has invested to acquire assets. For instance, in my area of Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean, the Canadian Government is investing $245 million in infrastructures which will be owned by Canadians to bring gas by way of a pipeline to the area, and this will enable businesses and individuals in the area to buy less crude oil, which often comes from abroad, especially from the Middle East. Such is the cause of the actual deficit, when we have to buy something outside Canada. What the Government is doing is taking money and converting it into an asset, and the best part of it all is that Canadians are the ones who are working to build this pipeline.

The same applies to the other infrastructures which the Government is building for harbours, airports, industries, industrial parks, and so on, in my own area and everywhere else in Canada. Over the past two or three years, the Government has shown its determination to take every advantage of the strong economic recovery and use the money of Canadian taxpayers to set up the mechanisms which, in coming years, will be needed to spur and upgrade our industry to meet the challenge of the new computer technology. It is extremely important that we take that step into the future. Needless to say, the economy has been rather sluggish in the first two years of the current decade. In 1982 and 1983, Mr. Speaker, individual Canadians and businessmen alike have put a lot of money in the bank and been rather reluctant to borrow. But they made an about turn in 1983 as a result of improved economic conditions both in Canada and in the United States, and the Canadian Government also played a major role by offering incentives such as the $3,000 home construction grants and other incentives.

The result of all this, Mr. Speaker, was that a lot of people ended up with huge bank accounts, as many of our fellow Canadians did.

Would Hon. Members of the Opposition have preferred that Canadian banks lend that money to foreigners, for instance? Do they think that when a Canadian puts money in the bank and earns interest on his deposit that the interest falls from heaven? When a deposit brings in interest, it is because the borrower has put the money to work or because the bank which took the deposit has loaned the money to somebody.

Let us say that the Government stops borrowing, as the Opposition seems to be suggesting. Who will go out tomorrow and borrow the $29 billion needed to stimulate the economy? If the Government, as leader of the country and the main lever behind economic activities, does not show that it is prepared to promote economic growth actively to fight unemployment, who among businessmen will have enough confidence to get his feet wet if the Government itself is standing still? Will we let the major Canadian banks lend money to Third World countries or even to Eastern nations whose regime is so corrupt that they cannot even repay the interest on their debts? Is that what the Opposition parties want? We do not know, Mr. Speaker. It never fails, it is always the same old tune!

It is unbelievable, but I see across the floor people who have been elected years ago and who are supposedly knowledgeable in economic affairs, yet they keep repeating the same irrelevant and misleading speeches, trying to make Canadians believe that they will end up in bread lines if the Government keeps borrowing, that it is increasing the national debt when it borrows from Canadians. That is not true. Mr. Speaker, some countries have found themselves in financial straits because they borrowed too much on foreign money markets. That has been the economic bane of a number of countries, but Canada is certainly not among them. What the Canadian Government is doing now and what it has done in recent years is that it has assumed that responsibility when Canadians were reluctant to invest as they used to, it has made the investments required to get our economy moving.

Yesterday I heard the Hon. Member for Simcoe South or Simcoe North tell the House that the Bank of Canada rate was going to increase as a result of Canada's huge $30 billion deficit—

Mr. Rossi: That is hypothetical!

Mr. Gimaïel: My colleague from Bourassa (Mr. Rossi) says that it is hypothetical. It is more than hypothetical, it is wrong. How can the Hon. Member suggest that our interest rates could be lower than those of the United States without driving the value of our dollar down into the ground? The strongest pressure on interest rates in Canada . . . This is something they kept saying everywhere when they were in office in 1979. The strongest pressure on interest rates in Canada comes from the interest rates of American banks. Whatever the level of borrowing of the Canadian Government, it changes absolutely nothing. Because tomorrow morning, even if Canada's operating deficit were nil our interest rates would have to be comparable to those in the United States to support our dollar.

And why at this point should we tell Canadians that the borrowing level of the Canadian Government has an impact on interest rates, when we know full well they reflect what goes on down South? Again, this is presumably political tactics of the kind that was used in Manitoba by their provincial colleagues, to make Manitobans believe that if Francophones were given rights everyone would lose his shirt, his bones or his job, everyone would have to be bilingual in that province. No. That kind of tactics, Mr. Speaker, tends to upset the people needlessly.

In all fairness, if those Opposition parties were serious, they would try to work out or help us work out policies that would be good for Canadians. This is what the Canadian Government has been trying to do and has been doing for years. An area such as mine, a so-called resource area, which has been a major source of electrical power for the rest of Canada and the people down South since the turn of the century an area which is an extremely important source of wood, pulp and paper, aluminum, and various resources is one where work is often seasonal. In my constituency, many people work only six months a year. This is part of our life pattern, because there are operations at the resource level that are conducted on a seasonal basis only. Should this country penalize people because they are in the Saguenay-Lake St. Jean area rather than in Montreal? Should Canada forget to support the people in areas such as mine when there are no jobs available? If the Canadian Government were to do that it means it would have to pay to set up infrastructures that would be used only six months a year to bring workers to large centres, which would create big social problems! That is not the way the Liberal Party of Canada under Pierre Elliott Trudeau and his supporters have envisioned this country over the years. His vision of this country was one where people were given the opportunity to move about, to settle down to grow, to develop, and to live all year-round, whichever they please, through economic policies established by the Canadian government such as DREE or the new DREE or the PRID Program intensive economic development policies, whether it be through job creation programs or manpower training in plants or in schools, or the various policies for direct social action, which I referred to earlier, such as medicare and support to university, technical and college training programs. All Canadians—men and women—were given the right to be born, to live, to receive health care to retire, to work, as I said earlier, to exist. One of the struggles we have just won is that pregnant women are no longer penalized by the Employment Insurance Act for giving Canada the gift of life which will produce the next generation of Canadians means today—

This is what being Canadian to be able to be born, to live, to be cared for, to be housed, to be fed, to grow up, to retire carefree and at all time, to enjoy freedom of action, freedom of speech, freedom of thought. But all this, Mr. Speaker, requires money. And what the Canadian Government is doing, whether the Official Opposition likes it or not, is to borrow from Canadians to invest in Canada and to give work and benefits to Canadians. In the final analysis, Canadians receive interests on the money they have lent to a country they trust, to their own country, to their Government, to Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): There is a ten minute period for questions or comments. The Hon. Member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis).

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of straightforward questions to put to the Hon. Member. I listened to his speech and found it very interesting. He is obviously very concerned about the ability of the Canadian economy to recover and to get back to life, in a sense. He has indicated a number of steps that the Government has taken in that direction.

My questions are restricted to a particular area. At a time when we need consumer spending as one of the factors which will kick-start our economy back to life or sustain a recovery, could the Hon. Member explain how the Government's increasing of taxes to the average Canadian family of somewhere between $200 and $300 per family would assist the recovery at a time when disposable incomes are needed to allow Canadians to purchase additional goods and services? How will personal income tax increases help a recovery?

[Translation]

Mr. Gimaïel: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member's question surprises me somewhat. If the Government is now requesting a borrowing authority of $30 billion, it is because during recent years, it has decided to give more discretionary money to all Canadians. I do not know how he can refer to a tax increase of $200 or $300. He is probably considering more than one tax.

I do not deny the fact that some taxes can fluctuate but generally, it cannot be said that Canadians are now paying more federal taxes than at the beginning of the '70's. Quite the contrary. Federal taxes have always been indexed, as we all know, and if we consider the increased revenues during the last ten or fifteen years, compared to what Canadian taxpayers are paying to their Government, it is quite the contrary. I will even go further. In the last budget, it is provided that the individuals who spend their entire income, for example those who receive the guaranteed income supplement, will get an additional $50 at the end of the year 1984 from the Canadian Government. They are the best consumers in Canada, because they spend their entire income.

The same applies to statutory increases granted under the various welfare programs of the Government for senior citizens or for the unemployed. The unemployment insurance system, which is a comprehensive insurance provided by the Canadian Government is also indexed every year. The economy will benefit from these consumers who, as I said, are our best consumers, because whether they are unemployed or not, the money they receive from the Government of Canada is almost immediately reinvested in the Canadian economy.

In a town such as my home-town of Alma, whose industrial infrastructure over the past six or seven years has been quite unstable as a result of the modernization or closing of plants which were no longer competitive, a million dollars in unemployment insurance benefits are injected every week. Otherwise, our tradesmen who are helping hundreds and even thousands of unemployed workers survive would have much difficulty supporting them in their hour of need. It will be my responsibility, as a Member of Parliament, to make sure that until such a time as the provincial government comes to our rescue by providing us with aluminium works or some other plant to restore the Alma area to the strong economic position it enjoyed previously, we have many more Canada Works projects, unemployment insurance policies and schemes for the redistribution of wealth throughout Canada, so that although our plants may not be producing it year round we can still continue to provide the South with aluminium, and survive the rest of the year.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): The Chair recognizes the Hon. Member for La Prairie (Mr. Deniger).

Mr. Deniger: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for my hon. colleague.

Could he explain to me something I just cannot understand, that is, how Hon. Members opposite will go about reducing the deficit while increasing considerably defence expenditures as well as transfer payments to the provinces for Medicare purposes, without increasing the tax burden?

Mr. Gimaïel: Mr. Speaker, this comes with the territory when you sit here as a federal MP. What I really mean is that members of the Official Opposition and of the New Democratic Party as well are displaying a total lack of consistency, so that one day they urge the government to cut its spendings, and the next they call for an increase in its defence budget. This worries me when I think that we might see, and in fact, we are seeing it already in some provinces, these people come to power, because their choice of expenditures is awful!

An Hon. Member: It is a nightmare!

Mr. Gimaïel: And when we see what their priorities are, we wonder how they view human values, which are essential to our work as politicians, since we must represent people who rely on us to make sure that Canada is a country of which each and every citizen may be proud. I am referring mostly to members of the Progressive Conservative Party. This goes for their approach to the language issue, the economy and the overall development. Fortunately, it is not the same with the New Democratic Party. What I have against the NDP is that they will never complete whatever they undertake. I find it unfortunate that they have chosen to be what I would call a non-decision party or a non-development party. It is paradoxical that though the idea is there, it is never fully developed; I find this unfortunate. We have had an example of this in Manitoba, and in fact, their people should have been more persistent, the Legislative Assembly should have continued to sit and the session should have continued, but this did not happen. As far as the Progressive Conservatives are concerned, the contradiction is awful, and I say intolerable! In economic matters, there is even greater contradiction than elsewhere because, in the same breath, the Government is asked to increase its expenditures, but told that it should not borrow, and in addition, the Government is charged with collecting taxes erringly and with harassing Canadians. It is incredible!

• (1550)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): The Hon. Member for Lethbridge-Foothills (Mr. Thacker).

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Hon. Member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Gimaïel). Is it true that the Hon. Member believes that the Liberal Party would become Communist if it became necessary?

Mr. Gimaïel: Mr. Speaker, if I may, I first want to say how glad I am to hear the Hon. Member ask me his question in French. It is great; I really appreciate it as the Lac Saint-Jean area is 100 per cent French-speaking.

As for the question, if such a thought can come to your mind, it is because you really do not know the Liberal Party. I can give you my word that the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) has never written any letter in which it was said that policies as applied in northern Russia, in Siberia, for instance, could be applied to a place like Schefferville and even that a delegation from Schefferville could be sent to Russia to see how northern communities are developed in that country. You will never hear such a thing from the Liberal Party even though the former president of Iron Ore thought that this was a good solution and truly believed, to the extent that he put it down in writing early in 1983, that this was the way to go. Personally, since I know the Liberal Party well and am a true Liberal, I can vouch that, as long as Canadians put their trust in us Liberals, they will live in a country where freedom is honoured, where the individual is important, where the rights of people to their language and their culture, whether they are French- or English-speaking—we are seeing this today in the negotiations with the native people—all these rights of Canadians will be respected as long as they put their trust in the Liberal Party, because in this party, what is of the utmost importance is the individual. As for you and the Official Opposition, the most important things are symbols such as the golden calf which they found in Schefferville and will have to return C.O.D. because no one wants him over there. He will probably end up in Toronto.

[English]

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, I was here on January 29, 1982, when the Hon. Member spoke. It is recorded in Hansard that he said that if necessary the Liberal Party would become communistic in order to retain power. Is he now denying that statement? I was here; I heard it.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): The Hon. Parliamentary Secretary has the floor for a very short reply.

Mr. Gimaïel: Mr. Speaker, I categorically deny what the Hon. Member has just said, for I have never said that Liberals would do anything to remain in power, since their concern is with the welfare of the Canadian people. As to the members of the Progressive Conservative Party . . . Look at what is happening in Newfoundland, Mr. Speaker: Today the Minister of Energy has given us an example of the insincerity of the Progressive Conservative Party in Newfoundland. It is not the welfare of Newfoundlanders which concerns Brian Peckford, but power. He wants wealth and power, just as "Joe" did before him!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[English]

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian public will know now why we are in the mess in which we are now after listening to the Hon. Member deliver that 20 minutes speech. Another Member spoke about coherence. I should like to know what is coherent about having three philosophies. There has been talk that we are going to be communistic and talk about oppression. No doubt Hon. Members opposite would have their Siberias too. We know they are going to have these concentration camps in this country, so maybe that is another start toward communistic rule. I will get around to January 29, 1982, in a minute, Mr. Speaker.

Bill C-21, an Act to provide borrowing authority, will provide authority to borrow up to an additional $29 billion in new money. Of this amount, $4 billion in authority is a continuance that may be carried over beyond March 31, 1985, while the other $25.55 billion may only be used in fiscal 1984-85. The Government does not have to borrow every dollar of this deficit and it has some non-budgetary sources of funds. Of the $29 billion deficit, only $25.55 must be borrowed after taking into account non-budgetary sources of $4.5 billion.

The Government is asking for $4 billion more than it needs in fiscal 1984-85. That is a very weird philosophy. I will go into the statistics that applied over the years under the Liberals to show how they reached this type of borrowing and uncontrolled spending.

After listening to the Liberals it is evident that they do not even know what the Auditor General's report is about. They do not read it so they do not pay any attention to it. That has been made quite evident by the Auditor General who says they simply do not have the will to implement his recommendations. We see such things as a $600,000 motel sold for $200. It is too bad that the general public cannot see the Liberals laughing at this time. They think these things are a big joke.

This was taxpayers' money, Mr. Speaker, the $315,000 that was poured into this motel, which was sold for $200. Now Hon. Members opposite tell us how brilliant they are, how astute they are at controlling expenses. Who will ever believe the word of Liberal?

After I read from Hansard of January 29, 1982, I think the Canadian people will understand why we are in this awful financial mess, heading toward complete financial ruin through completely uncontrolled spending.

On that date the Hon. Member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Gimaïel) pointed out, as reported at page 14479 of Hansard:

> To be a Liberal is first and foremost to be an elected representative, a person whose leitmotiv, whose supreme will is to provide opportunities for development and progress for all Canadians.

That certainly is not happening. They have been driving billions and billions of dollars of investment money out of the country. He continued:

> In such a situation, anything can be justified. If the development of individual Canadians is to be achieved through socialization, the Liberal Party can turn socialistic. If the development of individual Canadians is to be achieved through a turn to the right through a strengthening in the industry, the Liberal Party can move to the right.

They are like a hockey team, they are all over the map. He went on:

> If in order to promote our development the Liberal Party thinks we have to be communistic, we shall be communistic. This is what it is all about to be a Liberal. To be a Liberal is to be open to all ideas.

They have all kinds of philosophies. This is what they call being a true Liberal. It is what they call being coherent. It is some coherence, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fisher: Oh, come on!

Mr. McKenzie: The Liberals tell me to come on. I did not say this, the Liberals did. I have one philosophy. I believe in the free enterprise system. I do not believe in communism because I know what is happening in Russia. I know what type of government they have there and how the people are oppressed. I know the standard of living the people have under communist rule.

● (1600)

To date the Government has come to Parliament eight times since the 1980 election to seek more borrowing authority. The Government's projected financial requirements between 1984-1985 and 1987-1988 total $87.2 billion. This would indicate that Parliament is in for a steady stream of large borrowing Bills over the next few years. This is the seventh borrowing Bill over the last few years. So one can see this is a trend under the Liberals.

The financial requirements are only part of the picture. Many Crown corporations are able to raise debt in the financial market without seeking borrowing authority from Parliament. This has been highlighted by the Auditor General time and timea gain. There are no cost controls over the operations of the Crown corporations. And that is how it is to be a true Liberal: Do not have any cost controls.

Over the past 16 years, government spending has risen at an unprecedented rate on a national accounts basis where data is comparable over time, spending has climbed from $12.6 billion in 1968-1969 to an estimated $107.5 billion in 1984-1985, an increase of 773 per cent. On the more commonly used public accounts basis, spending has increased from $12.3 billion in 1968-1969 to $96.9 billion, an increase of 668 per cent. That is unbelievable. It is not acceptable. It is not normal to conduct business in such a way as to have borrowing and spending increase at that rate.

Relative to fiscal 1979-1980, spending has risen by 92 per cent on a public accounts basis or 97 per cent on a national accounts basis. Spending in 1984-1985 will be up by a further 9 per cent. The public accounts deficit for fiscal 1984-1985 will be equal to 31 per cent of public accounts expenditures. For every $3 the Governor spends, it must borrow $1. There are only two ways to finance a deficit, first, by printing money—and over the past 12 years the Bank of Canada has monetarized a total of $12 billion of the government's financial requirements—and, second, by borrowing money. In 1983, borrowing by the federal Government accounted for 58 per cent of all new security issued placed in Canada. Borrowing of that magnitude clearly must have an effect on the supply and demand for money and thus on the interest rates which must be borne by the private sector. In addition, it should be noted that the 1983-1984 financial requirements of $27 billion are equal to 81 per cent of the 1983 personal savings.

I do not know what the philosophies were of the Liberals at the time, whether communist, socialist or free enterprise, but the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said, "This Party will not simply stand by and let the recession come. We will fight it and overcome it. We have an economic program for the 1980s which all enhance dignity, create opportunity and provide security". What do we have now? We have a million and a half to two million unemployed in this country and record bankruptcies. Since 1980 the Liberal Party, the all-philosophy Party, has driven $14 billion investment money out of this country. The Liberals are good for the economy of the United States. The Liberal Party is the best friend the United States ever had. I have developers who live in my city in Winnipeg. They spend their time developing projects in Florida, California and Texas because they do not trust this Government and they cannot operate under its rules. So they take their money and they get out, and that is all on the record.

Mr. Evans: It is your provincial government and municipalities that set the rules.

Mr. McKenzie: Yes, the Hon. Member says it is the Manitoba provincial Government, which has a socialist philosophy—

Mr. Evans: Yes, and the one that was there before.

Mr. McKenzie: I am well aware of what the New Democratic Party has done to the economy in Manitoba. Since the return of the Liberals to power, Canada has experienced not one but two recessions. Canadian factories are operating at two-thirds of capacity. One worker in eight is officially unemployed. These are hardly circumstances which "enhance dignity, create opportunity and provide security". In 1979, following John Turner's time as Minister of Finance, the Auditor General stated that the present state of the financial management and control system of departments and agencies of the Government of Canada is significantly below acceptable standards of quality and effectiveness. Mr. Turner, who was an expert on emptying public coffers when he was Minister of Finance, is the type of person the Liberal Party is looking for to lead them now, an irresponsible person, a person with a dismal record as Minister of Finance. There is only one other Minister who has equalled him, and that is the present Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen), and no one can touch his record as Minister of Finance.

The former Finance Minister, Mr. Turner, has on occasion appeared before service clubs and civic organizations delivering addresses aimed against excessive government spending. It is a topic about which Mr. Turner knows plenty. In fact, I am tempted to say that he wrote the book on the subject. He certainly did a great job of introducing "blank cheque" government to Canada under his reign as Minister of Finance. Now even the media are praising him, along with the Liberals—with a record like this—saying he will make a great Prime Minister. He will be another walking disaster, the same as the present Prime Minister.

During the period in which Mr. Turner was Minister of Finance, spending by the federal Government jumped 99.8 per cent. Why did we have to have an increase like that? There was no need for any increase like that at all, Mr. Speaker. To put it another way, it took us 105 years to reach a federal spending level of $17.44 billion. John Turner doubled that figure in 44 months, taking the level of government spending in his brief term in office to twice that reached by the federal Government since Confederation. As I said before, Mr. Turner is an expert on emptying public coffers, and under the Budgets which he brought to Parliament, $113 billion of taxpayers' money was spent, or at least borrowed.

When Mr. Turner took over from Edgar Benson, inflation was running at 4.9 per cent. When he left, it was 10.6 per cent. Under Mr. Turner as Minister of Finance the cost of living jumped 38.5 per cent and the dollar, if one assumes it to have been worth 100 cents in January, 1972, was worth only 72 cents when he walked out. And the way we are going in this country, before long we are going to have a 50-cent dollar, Mr. Speaker.

There are other aspects of the record of Mr. Turner which the former Minister of Finance should explain to Canadians if he is going to be a candidate for the Liberal Party. At the time John Turner was given the mantle in January of 1972 there were 544,000 people out of work. When he left, 732,000 Canadians were unemployed. What kind of Minister of Finance was he? Obviously, he was just a load on the backs of business and the taxpayers of Canada. In spite of the record spending and in spite of all the measures he took to promote employment and business, only 69,000 jobs were created in the manufacturing sector from December, 1972 to December 1975. In 1972 there was a surplus of $700 million in our current account balance; the equivalent of our country's checking account in international trade. In 1975, there was a deficit of almost $5 billion. When John Turner got the job as Minister of Finance, real growth in this country amounted to 6.6 per cent. When he left, it was .3 per cent, and on a per capita basis it was absolutely negative. He was a negative Minister of Finance. In terms of real growth, we lost ground under John Turner as Minister of Finance.

As Minister of Justice, Mr. Turner was responsible for the lax criminal laws which have created the present fear that stalks the streets. His imprudent bail laws are one example. That is his record. That is the record of a man who is now busy telling Canadians what is wrong with the monetary and fiscal policies of the Government, policies which he himself promoted as Minister of Finance. That is the record of the same John Turner who presided over this country's greatest spending spree since Confederation. One needs more than blue eyes in this business to be a good Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker.

In 1976, during Donald MacDonald's term as Finance Minister, the Auditor General said, "I am deeply concerned that Parliament—and indeed the Government—has lost or is close to losing effective control on the public purse". Mr. Macdonald is doing pretty well with the public purse today. He is receiving $800 a day from the public purse. The study he is conducting now would not be necessary at all if the Liberal Government had paid attention to some of the studies which have been done in the Senate. Sound recommendations were made years ago and if the Government had implemented a lot of those recommendations you would not need Donald Macdonald at $800 a day.

The Auditor General has unearthed appalling new examples of untold millions of dollars being wasted because of Government bungling and carelessness. More disturbing is that many of the financial misdeeds continue to be repeated. The Auditor General puts more emphasis on this every year. His reports do not get better, they get worse. It took seven years and the loss of more than $900,000 in operating costs to deal with the request by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources for a new press to print maps. The Government lost an estimated $10 million by continuing to rent office space in Ottawa while three of its own buildings were vacant for up to five years. In a case which hit close to home in New Brunswick, Mr. Speaker, a motel valued at nearly $500,000 was built with a $315,000 federal Government guarantee. It was sold at a bankruptcy auction for $200. Where was the control? The communist-socialist-free enterprise Liberals just handed the money out: have fun, build hotels! Oh, it is great! We will bleed the sucker Canadians to death. If you need more, come on back. That is how the Liberals run this country, Mr. Speaker. The buyer at $200 turned around and sold it the next day for $75,200. It is taxpayers' money paying for all this entertainment. Incidentally, it is no longer a motel, and after several changes, efforts are currently under way to turn it into a senior citizens' complex.

As the unemployment insurance fund heads toward a whopping $4.2 billion deficit in 1983, substantial overpayments to claimants are still slipping through the system undetected. The federal deficit, which the Government places at $31.1 billion, is being seriously underestimated because of the way Ottawa's financial statements are arranged. The country's 300 to 400 Crown corporations remain largely unaccountable to Parliament.

You can see, Mr. Speaker, that there is no control. When we say there is uncontrolled spending, it is backed up by the Auditor General, who is the supreme authority. When the Prime Minister was asked about the last Auditor General's report with all the horror stories and what he was going to do about it, he said, "Oh, that is one man's opinion". The Auditor General is not expressing an opinion; he is the supreme authority with the documentary evidence of the fact that there is no control over spending in this country under the all-philosophy Liberal Party.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I note another gripping speech from the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Assiboine (Mr. McKenzie). I wonder if he would mind reverting to a few facts after this florid rhetoric we have just been exposed to. For example, the net public debt expressed as a percentage of the gross national product was 37.9 per cent in 1958-59, 37.1 per cent in 1959-60, and dropped from there to 36.2 per cent in 1962-63, all of which are the Diefenbaker years. Then we look through this period he describes as John Turner's wild spending period and we find that debt as a percentage of GNP in those days was 15.5 per cent, half of Diefenbaker's, and 17.2 per cent the next year. Today, after one of the worst recessions our country has experienced, it is at 33.5 per cent, which is still 3 per cent lower than it was at its lowest point in the Diefenbaker years.

I remind the Hon. Member that since the Diefenbaker years we have instituted expanded payments for Old Age Security and GIS, we have the Canada Pension Plan, expanded unemployment insurance, the Canada Assistance Act, medicare, help for post-secondary education, and we have expanded help through companies like PetroCan. All of these things have expanded, yet in 1958-59, the Diefenbaker record was that public debt was 37.9 per cent of the gross national product. The John Turner record in 1974-75 was 15.5 per cent, and today it is 33.5 per cent.

If we are terrible spenders, could the Hon. Member tell us what John Diefenbaker was?

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, during the Diefenbaker years they were paying off the World War II debt. That is the burden they carried in their six years in office.

Mr. Evans: That is 18 years after the war, what are you talking about?

Mr. McKenzie: Federal spending increased by $1 billion over the six-year period. Under Mr. Diefenbaker there was no blank cheque government. He did not hand out blank cheques to his ministries. We did not have 480 Crown corporations. We had stability in the country because we had reasonable control over spending.

The Hon. Member talks about PetroCan, Mr. Speaker. We know all about that, and there is no control there either. There is empty office space in Calgary like you would not believe. They are building their own empire and they still have all kinds of office space rented in other buildings around Calgary. That is some record, and it goes on all over this country. The Standing Committee on Public Accounts is out looking at empty offices in Government buildings and other buildings down here. There is no control over anything.

Here is another example from the Auditor General's report. The Minister of Transport, the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy), named a Winnipeg Liberal Party official to take over the books of the Canada Ports Corporation. The Auditor General pointed out that this situation illustrates his concern about the whole issue of accountability of Crown corporations, appointment of auditors and the nature of audits conducted for Parliament. The excuse was, well, we are giving employment to Winnipeg. That is very nice, but you do not make any gains if you are losing control over Canada Ports. The Liberal fund raiser who received the contract to do the auditing said in an interview that he has been the Liberal's official agent responsible for collecting funds donated to the Party and forwarding them to Ottawa.

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Evans: This is question period, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McKenzie: He is a Liberal bagman. If the Auditor General says auditing should be here, that is where it should be, Mr. Speaker. He is the supreme authority, not the Minister of Transport. He is trying to save his political behind because he is in political trouble.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order. May I remind Hon. Members that if the questions are short, then I shall make sure the responses are equally short.

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of my friend and colleague. The Government always compares debt to GNP, but of course we know that the GNP here is of quite a different structure than that in the U.S.A. The real measurement of whether you are going forward or back is the percentage of tax revenue used for servicing the national debt, which used to be 5 per cent to 10 per cent and is now over 30 per cent. I would like to hear the Member's view as to whether that is wise in Canada and what that does to Canadians.

Mr. McKenzie: Uncontrolled spending, uncontrolled debt and uncontrolled borrowing is not good for any country. The net national debt now grows by more each year than the total money borrowed to finance the Canadian participation in World War I and World War II. The Hon. Member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) was speaking this morning. He has been working on the Public Accounts Committee for the last 10 years trying to bring some sanity into the spending and accounting procedures. They drafted 10 concise reports and all kinds of recommendations to bring some control over the spending, and only one has been implemented. They will not implement the other nine.

That is what the Auditor General said. The all-philosophy Liberal Party does not have the will to do it. Liberals, please read the Auditor General's report. Take it home with you tonight and go through it. You will learn something.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Hon. Member a question. He has spoken about the deficit and the wastages. I am not going to defend the wastages. He has spoken about the very large increases in the expenditures. Surely the Member knows that the increase in expenditures in recent years has been due to the increased levels and funding of services such as medicare, hospital care and post-secondary education which we share with the provinces.

How does the Hon. Member think we can stop this increase in spending, particularly since, according to today's newspaper, his Leader made it very clear yesterday to members of the Conservative caucus that universal programs which are now in place are a fundamental principle which a Conservative Government would follow? If we cannot get rid of universal programs and cut the expenditures for the large number of programs which are cost-shared with the provinces, how does the Member think we can get back to the days when we did not have the kind of expenditures we have at the present time?

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) was not here for all of my address. The Auditor General is not pointing out that we will have to cut back on medicare or other specific areas. He is pointing out the waste of hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars. A Conservative Government will be able to attract investment into the country. It will stop flowing out of the country. That is on record in the United States. They are waiting for a change of Government here. If the $14 billion which the all-philosophy Liberal Party has driven out of the country since 1980 had stayed here for development, we would have jobs. All this money would not be spent on unemployment insurance. The Government revenues would be increasing and we would be able to increase our social benefits. We are running into real trouble finding the money to keep the social benefits up. That is the problem. We need a change of Government, Mr. Speaker.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1984-85

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacLaren that Bill C-21, an Act to provide borrowing authority, be read the second time and be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Roland de Corneille (Eglinton-Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to Bill C-21, an Act to provide borrowing authority, it seems to me that I would be remiss if I did not suggest that this whole process can be repetitious and unnecessary. It suggests that we have to look again for major overhauls and streamlining in parliamentary reform.

The process we go through, in budgets and finance at least, Mr. Speaker, reminds me of the explanation a clergyman gave as to what he did when he gave a sermon to his congregation. He said, "First I tell them what I am going to tell them, then I tell them what I am telling them, and then I tell them what I told them." It seems to me that this applies to the whole budgetary process. First, we tell them what we are going to do. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) brings in a Budget. Overall Estimates are given by Departments for what needs to be done. Huge piles of information are provided as to what will be spent. Documentation which we get when the Budget is brought down can literally be six or seven inches high. Then we explain not only what will be spent, but also what we will receive in terms of revenues in our Budget papers. Then we talk about what the shortfall, which is called the deficit, will be. Finally we discuss what must be borrowed. All that is in the budgetary process. We debate the Budget for eight days, giving quite a bit of time to all of these facts. That is telling them what we are going to do.

Then we tell them what we are doing. That process goes on at length. We submit the Estimates in detail as to how much each Department will spend. These Estimates, as they are called, comprise what the Government submits are going to be the amounts of money needed to conduct the Government's business. We take into account the fact that aside from the money the Government collects in income tax for the provinces, a very large part of the federal Budget, that section which is given for federal taxation, is also transferred to the provinces. In fact, estimates have been made, Mr. Speaker, that approximately 60 per cent is now either collected by the provinces or transferred to the provinces in what is collected through income taxes. In other words, we then say how much we will have to spend. The Government again submits huge piles of material to give a detailed accounting of what was spent last year and what the Estimates are for this year. They are debated, sent to committee, witnesses are called, there is ample opportunity to discuss and debate them some more, and then they are finally passed.

Then we continue to tell them what we are telling them. We have Budget Bills. We may have one, two, three or more Budget Bills. These are there to implement the raising of the money and to authorize the taxes. Each of these, Mr. Speaker, is debated, discussed, passed through various phases, sent to committee perhaps, and then finally they come back and are passed.

You would think that after all this debate on the Budget, the Estimates and the Bills for executing the Budget, we would then have exhausted the subject. But no, we must still have another Bill. We now have to tell them again what we told them. This one is to authorize the Government to borrow the money needed to do what Parliament has already agreed needs to be done.

That is what we are doing now, Mr. Speaker. We are debating the Bill to borrow the money which the Budget has predicted will be needed, that is, $29.550 billion, which includes a $4 billion cushion to meet possible unexpected contingencies. It seems to me that there is a little too much repetition. Think of the time which could be saved if the parliamentary system were streamlined and planned in order to eliminate at least one of these operations. However, such is the system we have. Even though we have already justified the expenses and revenues, and therefore the deficit and borrowing needs in the Budget, we now come back to hear the same repetition and litany of gloom and doom from the Opposition Members. But there are many others who are not as pessimistic as they are. Last night, when I attended a meeting of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, I was impressed by the fact that they did not bring to Ottawa a long list of grievances, pejorative attacks and a crying towel. To the contrary, they came to express a feeling of relief that a real process of consultation has been developing over the last several years between business, labour and government. They pointed out that this dialogue which the Minister of Finance has initiated led to real results and improvements in creating a positive climate for business over the last two budgets. It is a positive climate for businesses, large and small, to develop an ability to improve their productivity, profits and competitiveness. They also felt that this dialogue must continue.

They pointed out that we in the country are not yet back to where we were before the recession. They also noted last night that the recovery was real and the future, if this dialogue between government and business will continue, was more promising.

We in the Government share their concerns, lest the deficit become a chronic case, lest interest rates and inflation rise and the recovery be nipped in the bud. But what was significant was their anticipation of better results from dialogue and co-operation.

Business leaders to whom I spoke last night and to whom I have been speaking generally have expressed those thoughts in the last couple of years. They also asked me last night what I thought. I explained that we believe the deficit which we have budgeted is necessary to keep the economy growing and fuelled, to honour the commitments to social justice we have made, as well as to provide useful employment. I pointed out that our deficit is not as serious in its implications as is the American deficit, as the Americans themselves have pointed out, because ours is not the same kind of structural deficit and therefore not as dangerous as the one in the United States.

If we get the economy stoked up to a sufficient level, more people will go to work and therefore will be able to pay their taxes. In turn, we will be able to receive revenues, which again will increase the amount of employment and reduce the deficit. If the money we borrow is spent to provide jobs, those who will be earning money will no longer need the social safety nets which cost the Government money. The system will prove beneficial because when they return to work the deficit will be reduced.

I also observed that our deficit is a lower percentage of our GNP. This is something that the Hon. Member for Mississauga North (Mr. Fisher) just indicated. Our deficit today is a lower percentage of our gross national product than it was some 30 years ago in the days of the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker. My reason for pointing this out was not to minimize the seriousness of deficits but to put them in perspective. When we have a deficit, we must borrow. That is the reason for this borrowing Bill. But the reason why we are budgeting and planning a deficit is that we are investing in Canadians and in the future of Canada. If a government of Canada does not believe in Canada, then we cannot expect other Canadians to believe in Canada. In other words, we are not just borrowing to give handouts. We are borrowing to make the new Budget possible, and the new Budget will invest in making the climate better for large and small businesses, farmers and fishermen to enable them to become the engine for industry to work and the economy to roll.

Of course, making the climate for businesses better will cost the Government money. It will increase our deficit. But we are assured in our dialogue with businessmen that the gains that we make in improving the climate for businesses will be so great that they will fuel a recovery which will more than compensate for the revenue that is lost. For example, some of the deficits in our new Budget will go to creating a better tax system, a system which will stimulate and reward investment in business. The new Budget will simplify the tax reporting system and the bookkeeping for over 300,000 small businesses, which will give them the incentive to continue to increase investment in their own companies and motivate them to continue to be in business. While that will cost the Government revenue, it will provide relief for the small businessman and provide him with incentives to invest further.

The new Budget will improve the fairness of the tax system. It will give farmers the long hoped for break in transferring their farms to the next generation, and it will also ensure that they will have an opportunity to work incrementally on the side in other kinds of work in order to keep their farms operating and to survive without being penalized. They will be able to write off the losses of their farm operations.

Again, the new Budget will provide aid to the private sector to play a larger role in international development. It will aid the Canadian automobile industry by ensuring that it has a fairer opportunity to compete with foreign auto makers in the Canadian marketplace.

The budget will aid the petroleum industry and much more. All of these programs will cost money. This will increase the deficit. However, we believe, as a result of our dialogue with businessesmen, that they have convinced us that if we take certain measures which will cost us only a relatively small amount of money, the returns from the infusion of enthusiasm and elimination of much paperwork will give those companies new opportunities to grow and be encouraged. For example, this will be done through our efforts in making rather large investments in aid overseas through aid in trade. It will also provide Canadian businesses with new opportunities that otherwise would not be there. In order to help business we must bring up a deficit at this point. Of course, that deficit requires us to borrow money, and that is the purpose of our debate today.

The Opposition questions us about all the money we are wasting. If we were wasting money, I would be against it. When evidence is brought to light which indicates that this happens, I certainly am the first to call for a halt. On the other hand, it is the opinion of some Members that the money we spend on some programs is wasteful. Some in the Opposition do not favour the growth of social services and social spending, but I must ask if raising the guaranteed income supplement to bring single pensioners over the poverty line is wasting money. I do not think so, and I hope that not too many Members of the House hold that view. I believe that giving money to pensioners who built this country and are now elderly Canadians, but whose present pensions have been eroded before their eyes because of inflation, is paying an old debt. They are in a situation where they are no longer able to live in dignity, and it seems to me that we are simply paying an old debt. If we must borrow to pay that debt it should be our first priority.

Furthermore, it is not like buying oil overseas when money is being sent away, because giving pensions to elderly Canadians means that Canadians are paying Canadians. The money that those senior citizens receive is not being put away in a bank; it is money that will be spent immediately and put back into the system. People at this level of income, such as GIS recipients, will certainly be putting that money back into the Canadian economy immediately through the purchase of goods and services and professional assistance. This, in turn, will put Canadians to work who will then be able to pay taxes. Those revenues will ultimately lead to a reduction in the deficit. Therefore, the money paid in pensions will be circulated throughout the country, and some of it will come back to the federal government in the form of taxes that are paid by those who serve pensioners.

Is putting billions of dollars into employment wasting money? That is one of the many reasons we incur a deficit and borrow. We are putting billions of dollars into employment. We believe retraining Canadians for more relevant jobs is a good investment. We believe that putting money into educational programs, job retraining, career planning and job searching is an investment into our human resources. This will pay off because it will enable our people to do the kind of work and to provide the services that can be carried in goods and trade to other countries. People will be more capable and more productive if they are retrained and re-educated. They will be able to hold jobs that are more productive. This in turn will make Canadian products more competitive abroad.

Sure, it causes a deficit if you put money into that kind of retraining and education. But so does borrowing for improving plant facilities. Businessmen know that they have to renew their plants, buy new machinery and keep up with modern technology to be competitive. Therefore, they are prepared to invest in their resources and their plants. We, on the other hand, have to be prepared to invest in human resources, the engine to make plants work using modern technology. While it may seem a great expenditure of money, it is money that is worth borrowing and worth spending. We are investing in the best and most important thing we can, the people of our country. That is what our Government is doing.

I could go on to discuss all the steps we have taken to invest in Canada, Mr. Speaker. You could look at the renewal of railway lines in the West, the double-tracking and the building of tunnels. Yes, the Government is putting in billions of dollars, but then more and more billions of dollars are being put in by private enterprise, not only to match but to double and triple that investment. This will provide the kind of swift transportation needed to carry the products of the people of central Canada to the West Coast and will provide an outlet for Canadian goods to get to the ports and then on to the marketplace in the Pacific Rim.

While we invest in the railroads, this investment brings people to work. Canadians can then sell their wheat, their potash, and other products, thus earning money for Canada, which will produce taxes and reduce the deficit. That is an investment in the future. I could give examples of other investments in our infrastructure—the building of roads, communications systems, and so on—which will make us more effective and more competitive. This will bring more sales for Canadian goods and trade. Most of the spending which causes deficits puts Canadians to work. People then pay taxes which reduce the deficit.

We believe in Canada, Mr. Speaker. We want Canadians to believe in Canada. The world sees us as a shining example. Others believe in Canada more than Canadians believe in Canada. We hear carping and negative voices amplified by the purveyors of news who usually think that the only good news is bad news. They talk of gloom and doom. We borrow because we believe in Canadians, we believe in Canada, and we believe in our future.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, could the Hon. Member for Eglinton-Lawrence (Mr. de Corneille) tell us if he knew anyone who ever borrowed himself or herself rich and became rich borrowing more money all the time? Could he tell us how he felt if he believed in Canada that borrowing 31 cents out of every dollar this Government spends can somehow be treated as a progressive thing to do, particularly when that borrowing represents 91 per cent of gross domestic savings?

Mr. de Corneille: Mr. Speaker, the question is somewhat rhetorical, I suspect. In any case, I suggest that, yes, Governments borrow. If you look at the United States of America, you will see—

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): This is Canada.

Mr. de Corneille: —that is also the custom there at the present time. Countries borrow because they believe in their future. They borrow because they know that when the opportunity is there to repay, it will be done in times of prosperity and growth. Therefore, they anticipate that as an investment in their future. I think the question is rhetorical.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, being very rhetorical, then, perhaps the Hon. Member would advise me when he anticipates we might be paying back some of this debt? The Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) has indicated that we will have 5 per cent growth this year. It would mean that this year must be almost a boom time. We have not had 5 per cent growth in Canada since the very early 1970s. The Minister says we are going to have 4.4 per cent growth next year. That will be boom time too, and the following year we are to have 4.4 per cent growth. On that basis, should we not be paying back some debts? And on that basis, could the Hon. Member tell the House why the forecasts in the Budget indicate not only borrowing well over $20 billion this year, next year, the year after, and the year after, and into the dim, distant future? Why do we have a Budget with all these good times forecast where we will never pay any money back but we will just borrow more, more, and more?

Mr. de Corneille: Mr. Speaker, I think it should be remembered that we owe the national debt to ourselves. It is not as though we owe these debts to some foreign nation. If you look at it, it is a fact that makes the associated taxation, bond interest payments and the principal retirement simply redistribution within our own society. As I understand it, very little of the federal debt is held by foreign interests.

Some critics have pointed out that it is unfair to transfer tax burdens from one generation to the next. I would say to you that when we are borrowing, as I was describing, to provide a better education and to provide jobs for young people, that is not borrowing against their future but for their future. It is investing in their future now so they will have a future.

In terms of the specific question, when does this ever get paid off, I think that all nations at present have to be asked that question. It is a game they are all playing. All nations have to play that game in order to try to bring about a recovery and regain confidence. I suggest that one of the problems is not so much the statistics but rather a lack of trust and confidence in the future, and that can bring a nation to its knees. I often feel very concerned psychologically when people talk of gloom and doom. That is a self-fulfilling prophecy and a dangerous one. One has to be very careful about how we approach the subject of discussing the future of Canada. I wish there were a little less oratory and a little more careful analysis before suggestions are made. I have not heard suggestions from the Hon. Member's Party as to how to reduce the deficit other than maybe to save some money on a motel.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I am interested in what the Hon. Member says. The Hon. Member for Eglinton-Lawrence utters the usual Liberal myth. He says that there is nothing wrong with having a large national debt, that we owe the money to ourselves. He must appreciate that as far as the direct federal debt is concerned, that is 90 per cent true. But if he takes a look at the municipalities, the provinces, and the provincial Crown corporations—the hydro corporation for instance—and if he takes a look at large corporate debt, he will find that over $78 billion is owed by Canadians to foreigners. Of course, the enormous drop in the exchange value of the Canadian dollar as of today makes that debt, which is usually denominated in American dollars, very much more expensive and more dramatically costly for Canadians to repay. It will likely lead to their bankruptcy and the bankruptcy of the entire economy, very much like in Mexico or Brazil. Does he not realize that the total Canadian foreign debt approaches the foreign debt of Mexico and is in excess of the foreign debt of Brazil?

Mr. de Corneille: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that we cannot take the blame for literally everything, athough the Hon. Member may wish us to. Never mind from a political point of view, just from the point of view of fairness, I do not think it is possible for the federal Government to explain how the provinces are spending 60 per cent of the revenues which are collected either by themselves, through us or which we transfer to them. They in fact do spend, as the Hon. Member has been pointing out, a lot of the money. They spend 60 per cent of the money collected in revenues by the federal Government and the federal Government spends 40 per cent. I certainly understand that there are problems for provinces when they get themselves into deep debt.

Talking about when this will ever stop, let us look at the figures that have already been brought to the attention of the Hon. Member. I believe he was in the House when the Member for Mississauga was speaking. He should look at the figures on the fiscal plan, table C-2 on page 62 of the net public debt. If he looks at what were the percentages of the net public debt against GNP in billions of dollars, he will see that the percentages, as was pointed out, have historically been lower in the last 30 years than in the period before that.

In the 1926-27 period, 45.6 per cent was spent as a public debt of the gross national product, that is public debt over against GNP. Imagine how this Member would be railing if he had been around then and heard that. In 1946-47, it was 109.8 per cent. In the period 1958-59, the net public debt was 37.9 per cent, nearly 38 per cent of the GNP. We have seen this pattern in Canada since 1926-27. I happen to believe the same pattern existed before that.

Governments believe in the country. Governments invest in the country and provide that infrastructure which allows the country to grow in its economy and to be so successful in its business that the gross national product becomes enormous. That is how every year the various administrations, whether they have been Conservative or Liberal, have conducted themselves. In the Diefenbaker years, the amount of percentage against gross national product was slightly higher than even this past year.

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I have been here for some time listening to the discussion as it pertains to the borrowing of $29.5 billion which the Liberal Government is looking for in order to carry on the business of government. It amazes me that they are spending so much time talking about this Bill, taking unnecessary House time from more important matters. All we are asking the Government to do is to look at its history of borrowing. We ask it to look at its specific needs as laid out in its fiscal planning policies for the years 1984-85 and relate the borrowing requirements to the budgeted figures.

What we have is a request from the Liberal Government, not to borrow what it needs for the fiscal year 1984-85, but for an additional $4 billion plus in order to cover contingencies. If they were responsible Members of Parliament looking after the moneys collected from their constituents, they would first take the time to justify the need for the $4 billion extra amount of borrowing at a time when our deficits have reached an all-time high in Canadian history.

We could go back over the requests for borrowing just since the 1980 election. I am sure the Hon. Member for Eglinton-Lawrence (Mr. de Corneille) would agree that it is reasonable for a government to ask for the moneys it needs in order to fulfill the commitments that it places on the Supplementary and Main Estimates. Why is the Government all so fired up to borrow an additional $4 billion if there is no possible devious program for which it wishes to use the money? That would not require coming back to Parliament to ask for endorsement of those extra funds.

The Member for Eglinton-Lawrence clearly stated that we are just not borrowing money to "hand it out", using his exact words. Having sat in the House for the past five or six years, I question whether they are perhaps thinking about the possibility of borrowing money for other purposes than carrying on the business of government. Perhaps they are concerned about their re-election. It would be nice to have a little slush fund of $4 billion or $5 billion which they could direct wherever they wished.

Those on the Government side are not so naive that they think for one minute that we are not suspicious of that. Therefore, why would they expect us in Opposition to endorse a request for funds in excess of what they have given us statistics to substantiate?

It stands to reason that any lay persons, regardless of whether they have been in business or not, with the kinds of statements coming from the Government side that affect us, would believe it is all right to have increased deficits year after year, accumulating to the point where it takes almost our national savings, public or private to pay the national debt.

It is not logical to assume that you can run a government any different from a business. It is grossly unfair to leave the impression that we are just borrowing from ourselves, that it is totally okay for A to borrow from B because we are all in the same nation. That is like saying it is all right for Eaton's to borrow from Simpson's or The Bay to borrow from some other retail establishment. If their debts keep going up and up, sooner or later the day of reckoning will come. It will not come during your or my term of office. The day of reckoning will come when our children and grandchildren cannot borrow any more just to service the debt.

We are now looking at a debt in Canada that exceeds the total budget of the Canadian Government of not very many years ago. I am getting a little tired of listening to Members on the Government side saying that it does not matter how much we borrow, that we can borrow all we need plus. They expect the NDP and Conservative Opposition to hold up their hands and say there is nothing wrong borrowing more than you need. There is. We are not going to trust the Government with a $4 billion extra amount this time around. We are asking for a $10 billion reduction in the $29.5 billion for which it is asking. The reason we ask that is that in the short term that is the amount we can establish as a credible request to carry on the approved business of this Parliament.

The Government is irresponsible. It is not accountable to the Canadian people if it believes it is going to hoodwink everyone in Canada into believing that a $4 billion slush fund is okay. With the permission of the House, Mr. Speaker, I will call it five o'clock and ask to be recognized at a future time.

• (1700)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—PUBLIC BILLS

[Translation]

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I ask that with the unanimous consent of the House the order for the second reading of Bill C-222, to amend the Criminal Code, be discharged and the Bill withdrawn.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): The House has heard the terms of the Hon. Member's motion.

Is there unanimous consent that the order for the second reading of Bill C-222, to amend the Criminal Code, be discharged and the Bill withdrawn?

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): There is no unanimous consent.

[English]

Shall all orders and items listed under Private Members' Business preceding Order No. 14 be allowed to stand by unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT TO REINSTATE CAPITAL PUNISHMENT FOR CERTAIN CRIMES

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough) moved that Bill C-213, an Act to amend the Criminal Code (capital punishment), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in recent months, a series of events have occurred in Canada, some of them very close to home here in the Ottawa area, which would give rise to a concern for the need for a review of the issue of capital punishment. Here in Canada, we have recently witnessed an unprecedented wave of violence and unwarranted acts of brutality, and in many cases this has resulted in death. A list of most recent victims is very ample proof of the rise in violent crimes in the country.

Barbara Turnbull is a perfect example of this rise in violent crimes. She is an 18 year old girl from Mississauga, Ontario, who was a Becker's store clerk and was shot during the course of a robbery on September 23, 1983. She remains paralysed from the neck down. Nizam Ali, an 18 years old boy from Mississauga, was a promising youth with all kinds of expectations for his future. He was stabbed to death last Saturday while he worked the overnight shift. Right here in Nepean, a Nepean police constable by the name of David Utman was shot to death at the Bayshore Shopping Centre in Nepean, Ontario, on October 14, 1983. As well, there is the case of Paul Chapman. He was fatally stabbed on the night of June 22, 1983, after being strapped into a chair while the two men accused of the crime sexually molested his girlfriend.

It is clearly evident to many of us that the increase in rampant crime demands that some action be taken by Members of Parliament. Subsequently, some surveys have been taken here in Canada. Not too long ago, a 7,000-response survey was taken in the riding of Peterborough. I was surprised by the results of that survey when 87 per cent of the respondents supported capital punishment for premeditated first degree murder.

I would like to use today's time from five o'clock until six o'clock during Private Members' Hour for the purposes of looking at statistics, looking at the responsibilities of Members of Parliament to their constituents, and looking at the responsibility of Government to allow the voices of those constituents to be heard through their elected Members of Parliament. More specifically, we are faced with the frustration of being unable to respond to the concerns of our constituents.

It is not good enough to say that we must always vote on every issue according to our conscience, because in reality we must live with our conscience. Having been an abolitionist all my life, I have a great deal of difficulty living with my conscience when I do not represent my constituents. The issue is not cut and dried. It is not easy for a Member of Parliament to say: "The only way that I can satisfy my conscience is by voting the way I think I should vote and by ignoring 87 per cent of my constituents".

I challenge any Member of Parliament to show me one poll that has ever been taken in Canada which supports abolition. There has never been such a poll taken and there has never been an opportunity, during my five years as a Member of Parliament, to vote on the issue. The issue has been muffled, it has been shoved under the rug and it has been railroaded into such a position that the Government does not wish to hear through elected Members of Parliament about where their constituents stand.

Mr. Laniel: Do you want to vote on abortion?

Mr. Domm: I am saying that we are discussing the issue of premeditated first degree murder. We are talking about a perceived guilty person. In answer to the question, an unborn child is not a perceived guilty person. We are dealing with a first degree murder charge.

It is grossly unfair of members of the NDP to stand up in the House and say that if members of the Official Opposition had had their way, we would now be facing a situation where Mr. Marshall would not be around to be acquitted but would have been hanged. That is not true because, according to the Solicitor General of Canada (Mr. Kaplan), Mr. Marshall was accused of second degree murder. I have confirmation of that fact from the Minister's office. We are not discussing second degree murder here but, rather, first degree premeditated murder.

There are no members of the NDP in the House today, but the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) stood in the House on November 29, 1983 and, as reported in Hansard, asked how, had the Government followed the advice of the Conservative Party and reinstated capital punishment, we would have apologized to Marshall for the errors which would have been made, because the accused would be dead. Because of that statement which was made by the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain, I looked up every Private Member's Bills which has been brought forward for first reading by members of the Official Opposition. I have them all here and I will table them as evidence. There is not one Private Member's Bill here that advocates capital punishment for second degree murder.

We now have that out of the way and we know that we are talking about someone who carries a gun or knife and goes into a retail outlet and fatally stabs an 18 year old boy, or shoots down a girl and paralyses her for life, or shoots down police officer in Nepean in the line of duty, or stabs someone who is tied in a chair. We are not talking about second degree murder. We are talking about first degree murder and we are only asking government Members to speak on behalf of the majority of their constituents once in a while. If they do not wish to vote or if they have very strong feelings on the issue, then they should not stand up as members of to Cabinet or as Privy Councillors and unanimously support a position when they know full well that they did not take that position at a certain time with their constituents.

What happened in 1976 was shameful. When we abolished capital punishment in 1976, it was not a free vote, and no one will ever convince me that it was. We in the Official Opposition, when we form a government, have committed ourselves to having a free vote. We support a free vote even though many of us have been born and raised as abolitionists. There is something wrong with a system of Government that will not allow the people to be heard.

I think it should be noted, so that we can discuss a few statistics, that in reports prepared by the Government, it is shown that more acts of first degree murder have been committed while in the act of committing a federal criminal offence since the abolition of capital punishment. People come into the Becker's or Mac's Milk stores and the like with guns in their pockets or knives under their coats, but without fear of retaliation. We have to realize that when we give these people a 25 year sentence and a chance of parole, something is going to happen very suddenly in the next generation. Some of the people committing these acts today are in their twenties. It is safe to say that anyone who commits first degree murder today will be locked up for 25 years, and anyone who commits second degree murder will be locked up for 15 years with no chance of parole before the sentence is served.

The same things will happen in 25 year's time that happened prior to 1976 when such people got out after five or ten years. In the United States they are still getting out in five or ten years because they do not have a 25 year life sentence. Prisoners are eligible for parole for good behaviour, and they get out into the public and commit acts of atrocity. There is not a punishment that fits some of the crimes I have mentioned this afternoon.

When there is a full attendance in the House, how many Members would stand up and say that they do not think that 70 per cent or 80 per cent of their constituents should have any say in this; that they were elected to parliament because their constituents knew they would act as they saw fit on every issue? Why do we have political lobbies? An Hon. Member opposite mentioned the pro-life movement. If I happen to be a pro-life supporter and my constituents lobby me long and hard enough, they might convince me that there is a need to study the issue of abortion—not to reinstate it—and I would be prepared to study it in committee.

Who in the House would not be prepared to study the most recent statistics dealing with criminal acts of violence resulting in murder? I suggest that a lot of people on the other side of the House would not be too willing to have that reviewed in committee. I think there is a good deal of piloting on this issue by some leaders on the other side of the House. Why else would they vote against referring the matter to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs?

I brought the same issue before the House on the only day we had a vote on capital punishment, to my knowledge, since 1979. There was an all-Party vote not three years ago on a motion that I presented to the House. It did not deal with a return to capital punishment but was a simple request for the subject matter to be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. The purpose was to review the most recent statistics; to determine in our minds, as the responsible Members of Parliament we think we are, just where we are going on the issue. There is not only our own position to consider but also the position of the people who sent us here. There are only three ways you can vote, Mr. Speaker—with your Party, with your conscience, or with your constituents. There is no other way to go.

In this Private Member's Bill I am asking that consideration be given to referring the subject matter of the Bill to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. In that way we could review the most recent statistics and determine in our own minds whether someone who stabs an 18 year old boy to death in Mississauga should be eligible for parole in 25 years; whether someone who shoots a girl in a Becker's store in Mississauga and paralyses her for life—not 25 years, but life—should be eligible for parole, in 15 years, and whether a man who stabs a man fatally after raping his wife or girl friend should get more than a slap on the wrist and five years in jail.

Things change, Mr. Speaker. Circumstances change, society changes and society needs protection in some of these areas. We cannot just pass a Bill and hope that the whole thing will go away. There is a lot of unrest in the country about what is happening to law enforcement today and about whether the sentence fits the crime.

It can be asked how someone can be a pro-life supporter and, at the same time, support capital punishment. That is a difficult question to answer. It took me a long time to solve that problem in my own mind. When I am dealing with the pro-life issue versus abortion, I am dealing with an innocent person, the unborn child. For that reason I have a great deal of difficulty supporting abortion under any circumstances. But when I am talking about capital punishment and the way to treat an individual who stabbed, shot and murdered, I am dealing with a person proven to be guilty by the courts. I would be the first to admit that the courts are not always right and that you cannot bring life back once it is taken. At the same time, however, you cannot say to the people adversely affected by the act that it is fair to let the perpetrator free to go out and do it a second time.

If government does not satisfy society's need for protection with a sentence to fit the crime, then it is irresponsible. That applies to all of us.

Bills that go from second reading to committee do not always return to the House in the same form, Mr. Speaker. It is very easy for anyone to find something in the bill that he or she does not like. Perhaps they do not want to see a person hanged but would sooner see them electrocuted, injected or have any number of things happen to them. That is not what we are discussing at the moment; all we are discussing is whether the issue deserves consideration in committee.

I hope that at the conclusion of today's debate there will be an indication from Members of the Government that the issue can be reviewed in committee. We could hear witnesses and listen to some of the associations that are interested, such as the police associations and law enforcement agencies, and people who have been affected by a murder in the family. We could review the subject matter and perhaps make another decision for a free vote. I hope serious consideration will be given to the matter of how to deal satisfactorily with people who commit premeditated first degree murder.

Mr. Jack Masters (Thunder Bay-Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, the issue raised by the Private Member's Bill is a very serious one. It is one that keeps coming back to the House through the efforts of Members and, from time to time, of the public. It is a difficult question to handle, and I believe the Hon. Member would ultimately like it to go through the next stage and eventually end up as a free vote, because that is where it would end up somewhere down the line. There is an attractive thought to that, to review a process which has already been reviewed and on which in fact we had a free vote in 1976. The result at that time, Mr. Speaker, as we know, is that Parliament passed into law a Bill which officially brought capital punishment to an end. However, the death penalty was replaced by a mandatory sentence of life imprisonment with a minimum parole eligibility period of 25 years for first degree murder and a 10 year to 15 year minimum eligibility period for second degree murder.

It would appear from this motion which has been brought forward before the House today, and the many motions which have come before us over the years, that in fact the 1976 vote did not forever settle the matter. In fact, since then we have had a stream of Private Members' Bills, motions and proposals for a national referendum on the subject, another look at the whole situation and, perhaps, another free vote in the House.

I suppose we have to take opportunities like this. I do not think there is anything wrong with it. It is a very serious moral question in the country, as the Hon. Member has said. It is also a subject which each of us as an individual will have to work out in his own mind, whether we do it in the formal setting, as has been suggested, or as we contemplate the lurid crimes which take place in many of our communities across the land. I suppose we would then, Mr. Speaker, have to dwell a little bit on the effectiveness of capital punishment as a deterrent. The Hon. Member opposite is quite right to bring this matter before us again for perusal, whether it be in committee, as was suggested, or in this forum. However, the statistics which I have seen on the subject so far do not seem to indicate that there has been an increase in capital crime since the law was changed. I have not looked at these statistics within the last couple of weeks, but if memory serves me correctly, I think in fact there has been a decrease in capital crime.

It is a moral question with which we must deal, and I suppose it will continue to come up in light of the cold-blooded crimes which have been committed very recently, and they have been mentioned before. We have had in my riding comparable crimes, very sporadically, thank the Lord, but they do happen. Therefore, when one looks at those cold-blooded crimes, it seems to be a very appropriate solution to take the position of an eye for an eye. However, one must take a look at the other side of the coin, I feel, and try to maintain a cool perspective on the whole situation. The question is whether the state has the right deliberately to take a human life. The right to life is given explicit recognition, I remind each of us, in our new Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I do not believe we can simply accept the principle of an eye for an eye. There are other areas where the state, in punishing people for crimes committed, does not work on an eye-for-an-eye principle, and that is what taking another life by the state is all about. If we work on that principle, we could perhaps drift back to the extreme example of societies where if one mutilates another individual, he will be mutilated in return, and so on. I feel the suggestion of capital punishment is that it suits the crime because the person has taken someone else's life, and if we extend that theory, then that presents a pretty monstrous thought of how we might deal with a number of possible situations.

We are dealing with a very moral question and a difficult one to resolve, and I come back to the question: Does the state have the right to take someone else's life deliberately? Would a return to capital punishment be in fact an effective deterrent? Once a crime has been committed, yes, we must appropriately punish the person responsible for the crime, no matter what its nature, but more important, in another sense, we must try to deter future actions in that same area. I do not believe that capital punishment would necessarily act as a greater deterrent. Nothing has been stated so far which would prove that. In fact, I do not believe we are coddling criminals or acting immorally in handing out the kinds of sentences which are being handed out now in relation to mandatory life sentences and matters of that sort.

Once again I come back to the question of the appropriateness of capital punishment. Those who are in favour of it have the burden of proving that this form of execution by the state is justified. It seems that this ultimate penalty carries with it the seeds of severe injustice through its potentially unequal application to the poor, the ignorant, the uneducated, and through the very real possibility that it might be applied in error. This has happened, despite the elaborate safeguards which have been built into the system. No matter how shocking some of the particular examples which are described by anti-abolitionists, it is unlikely that many of those crimes would constitute first degree murder, given the emotional element of the crime and the lack of premeditation.

I believe that, as the Hon. Member has suggested, we have to also consider the feelings of the public at large. We are in this House, after all, representatives of the constituencies, the constituency of Canada and the constituency of our individual ridings. While it is attractive to take a look at capital punishment as the ultimate solution to a problem, I am not aware of any overwhelming change in public opinion which says we must return to capital punishment. I do not believe Gallup polls of which I am aware would support that idea.

While I personally have had some representations in my riding on the subject, as I suppose all Hon. Members have had from time to time, particularly when some abhorrent crime takes place within our area—and perhaps participating in this kind of a discussion will precipitate it—I am not aware, nor have I had any strong representations from my constituents at large telling me that they would like to see this matter reopened, re-explored and perhaps once more go back to the House for a free vote. There are many things within our system, Mr. Speaker, with which we are not comfortable, which we do not like, which we as Members of Parliament must deal with. We must deal with tax matters, and everyone would rather not talk about that. However, we must act as parliamentarians and do the necessary things to make sure that the country has the revenue it needs to carry on the programs deemed necessary.

The problem is, as I said earlier, a moral one. Is it right for the state deliberately to take a life? In so doing it might be justified if we had proof positive, or a stronger expression of proof, that by taking the life of a particular abhorrent criminal we have done something more than just take revenge, that we have actually done something which would add to the deterrent factor in capital crimes.

While it is argued, I believe, by the Hon. Member opposite that capital punishment would in itself deter capital crime, I cannot agree with that particular argument. I agree that we have to take a firmer stand on capital crimes. We have to become more firm in the sentences passed. But that is another way of dealing with the same problem. I would support capital punishment if it would preclude someone else's life being taken in a particularly abhorrent fashion. I too have wrestled with this issue and I would go that route. However, I am afraid that I personally am not convinced that that is the way to go at this particular time.

This debate is useful in that it reminds us of a subject that we, whether we like it or not, as Members of Parliament have to look at one way or another periodically. That is necessary. When I was given the opportunity to participate in today's debate, I did so almost reluctantly because we are opening a can of worms that we really do not want to get into if we can avoid it. However, that is a coward's way out, so I am pleased to have been given this chance to express a few thoughts on the subject.

I know I will probably hear from many people in my constituency on this issue, pro or con. I welcome that because this is a way of developing opinion and a feel for the people we are here to serve. However, I must conclude that so far I have not heard any compelling reason for reopening the debate further than we have done here today. I believe the matter has been given careful attention over time in the House and elsewhere, and I believe this debate will precipitate another careful look at a very difficult issue.

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, in dealing with this debate I am not primarily in agreement with the argument that all we want is a discussion. As I understand it, we are asked to give approval to the Bill on second reading, which would mean approval in principle. That I cannot do.

A few years ago Parliament decided to abolish the death penalty. As part of the general public I was very much in agreement and pleased with that decision. I still believe the decision was sound. I want to give my reasons for that, but first I want to consider what I find to be the main arguments in restoring the death penalty.

The most common argument I hear is that it is needed as a deterrent. This is where the extreme examples are most powerfully used. The example of a particularly recent and particularly dreadful murder is bound to move a person. There is also an argument which is a little bit more general, and which I would say really means we want in principle to satisfy our anger. Some people would use rather old fashioned imagery, perhaps even quoting selectively from the Old Testament about justice and retribution. However, I think the moving force there is anger, which I note can arise over one matter but be expressed on something entirely different. In this case people find their anger is often brought to the surface when they read a newspaper story about a dreadful murder. They say that that guy ought to be hanged, or else they express even more lurid alternatives for what ought to be done to him. They are not angry at that guy. They may not be particularly concerned with the person killed. They may be just angry, angry about something in the family, something at work, on the street, and this is an outlet for the anger.

The third argument is like the second, but there is an attempt to make it much more reasoned. Those people argue that there is a principle of justice involved in which the innocent victim should be distinguished from a guilty killer. If we do not make that distinction, quite apart from anger or deterrence, we are simply being unjust.

On the other side, Mr. Speaker, I find mainly two arguments used in opposing the death penalty. One is that the courts, with the best will and effort in the world, are still subject to error. There have been cases of the wrong person being executed for a crime. There is a case we all know of the wrong person having been imprisoned for a crime. Fortunately he was not executed, although in his case he probably would not have been executed under the previous law. But the case does raise the question.

The other argument is that focusing on the death penalty for carefully defined premeditated murder, while having some merit in the abstract, I think narrows far too much the attention of people to a very limited kind of crime. It narrows it down to the individual who may be frustrated by all kinds of injustices he or she has experienced directly from the person he or she killed or, more generally, from society, as when a person walks into some public office and kills one of the public servants there because of what he thinks is the run-around he has received over life necessities such as workmen's compensation or other public obligations. The two great dangers of using the death penalty are that we may make the ultimate mistake of killing the wrong person. Second, it seems to treat the matter, in a sense, too easily. I know it may seem ridiculous to say that killing a person is treating it easily, but killing one individual may be a way of kidding ourselves into thinking that we have solved the problem of violence in our society to an extent that we simply have not.

That is a brief statement why I think there are strong arguments against the death penalty, and I want to return now to the arguments in favour. The first one I mentioned was that of deterrence. There will be less people killed by murderers if we restore the death penalty. That is an attractive argument and, like many others, if I were convinced that the argument was true I would have a much harder time opposing or voting against the death penalty. But I am not convinced. There are studies, not just in Canada but in many other countries, which show very powerfully that whether there is a death penalty or not, it does not seem to make much difference overall. Undoubtedly there are some cases in which we are told it does. When you add it all together, it does not seem that it is a reliable method worth stacking against the risk of an innocent person being killed by the State.

Further, there is the evidence in our own country that since the death penalty was repealed, not only did the rate of murders per capita not rise, but in fact it declined slightly. I have not heard anyone argue that abolishing the death penalty caused a reduction in the rate of murders. I cannot imagine that being a likely argument. However, I cannot find any argument that the abolition of the death penalty caused an increase or was followed by a significant increase. There were ups and downs, but more downs than ups, in the rate of murders per capita. I do not think there is a sustainable argument that the death penalty is an effective deterrent.

I believe anger may be the main motivating factor among people who say "hang him" or "shoot him" or whatever else. It is sometimes justified by words taken out of an historical context from the Old Testament; "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth", anyone that kills shall be killed and so on. That is a law which very few people now take seriously in all its instances in the Old Testament, the scripture of the Jewish people. It is also a law which was specifically superseded in the teaching of the religion to which I belong. The teaching there is that law is now superseded and anyone who is angry with another person will be brought before the court of judgement. The teaching says that the distinction between the murder and the anger which may have led to the murder should not be made so hard and fast. We should not think we are free to indulge in anger and in expressing our anger in all kinds of ways, but so long as we stop short of murder we are all right. That is a misunderstanding of the teaching of the Old Testament which was specifically countered by the teaching of the New Testament.

I find from my own experience, and I see around me, that vengeance is a very common desire. I will not say it is natural to people because I am not sure what is natural to people. It certainly is habitual. If somebody hurts me, I want to hurt him. It is often done vicariously. When I hear of somebody in our city, our country, or another country doing something dreadful, I may want to hurt that person. That is not healthy. I say it is habitual. I do not think it is natural to human beings and I do not think it is healthy. I find from personal and public experience that indulging in anger does not satisfy. When I decided to hit back at somebody physically when I was younger, or verbally now that I have grown older, and I do hit back, usually I want to then hit back again and again. It is never enough. I think that is not a unique experience. Anger does not really satisfy. Rather, there is something inherent about it which dissatisfies. Of course, when you kill a person, you cannot kill him again. However, you can go on looking for more people to kill and more excuses to kill them. That is not a healthy habit for society.

There is the third argument about principle and fairness. Why should an innocent person suffer by being murdered and a guilty person suffer less, that is, by not being killed? On this point we have to look again at the remark of Jesus about anger to which I referred before, that anger is like murder. He did not say they are exactly the same but he said we will be judged for either of them. When we are angry at murders we should also remember there are people who are angry at deaths by automobile accidents on the road. There are people who are angry at death by fire when they are caused by negligence, for example, of an absentee landlord. We have had some terrible fire-trap deaths in downtown Toronto. There is bitter, deep-seated, long-running anger amongst hundreds of thousands of industrial workers in Canada over our country's negligent record of industrial safety. Construction workers, miners and other workers have been required to work under unnecessarily dangerous conditions by employers who sometimes conceal the facts of the danger. An example of this is asbestosis. Governments connived that concealment and therefore caused painful death by cancer of employees in those industries. There is a lot of anger over those deaths. However, no employer or Government inspector is ever brought to court and accused of those deaths in the criminal sense. There is anger over those people being let off scott free with what is not legally defined as murder but, in the minds of many workers in this country, is equivalent to murder. Why not put a negligent employer at least in jail when he knowingly profits by risking the lives of employees because he is too cheap to pay the cost of safety devices and procedures?

We must go a little further with this. This country likes to indulge in violence where it is profitable. The TV industry peddles violence continually. It makes violence attractive to look at, think about and contemplate because there is money in peddling violence. This country allows the TV industry to do it in the same way as this country promotes the consumption of alcohol to excess. We have ads in the streetcars saying, "Don't drink too much, but drink". The question of what is too much, of course, is uncontrollable.

We have the often unnecessary use of firearms for sport. We have the glorification of the way of life of killing, whether in the military or hunting. This country likes to promote a spirit of violence. However, when someone is carried too far by it and kills a person, we then want to use that person as a scapegoat. We want to blot out all the other violence in the country and blame that person for the whole of it as a scapegoat. We want to transfer our sense of guilt to him. It is not healthy, Mr. Speaker. It does not stop murder. All the public hangings in the 19th century did not wipe out murder. Although hangings are not made such lurid festivals any more, the statistics in the 20th century show the same thing. They do not blot out murder.

There is no serious reason for supposing that if this Bill were approved at second reading it would lead to anything that would reduce murder, the occasion of anger or satisfy any principle of justice within our country. I believe it would be far more to the point to pay stronger attention to the care of victims of murder, that is to say, those immediately connected to the murder victim. This is an area in wich there is still a great deal of room for positive and constructive action.

I believe there is also a great deal of room for intelligent action on the reduction of social activities that encourage violence, whether it is the careless use of automobiles, the careless use of alcohol, the careless use of firearms or, for that matter, the glorification of physical violence in certain sports. I have played football, rugby and soccer. I have boxed. I have engage in unarmed combat training in the army. I understand something of the enthusiasm for combat. I also understand that it can be very dangerous. I believe that the entire sports enterprise must be much more careful about how body contact sports are promoted. Whenever there is money to be made in those sports, anger and violence is peddled for the sake of earning that dollar. We are told that hockey games would not draw the same gate if there were not a little violence taking place on the ice. That is quite cynical.

As long as the country wants to live by violence, some people in this country will die by violence. We will not end those deaths from occuring just by being violent toward the killers, because we have in fact been contributing to the killing by the way we let these patterns of profiting by violence by action or inaction, as in the case of industrial accidents, grow unchecked in our country.

There is no good reason for trying to blame it all on individuals who have committed murder. Therefore, I would not be able to support second reading of this Bill.

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, on seeing this Bill before the House, I am somewhat surprised because I realize that this is partly due to the Progressive Conservatives. At present they claim they are for the death penalty, but actually they are against something, they are against abolition because, they are against anything which exists, anything that is valid in our society. This will give me an opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to quote from the official Record of Hansard of December, 1983, when the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) rose, this is on page 46 of Hansard, and asked where the Progressive Conservatives were standing. Well, here is the sponsor of the Bill who is always proud to launch crusades for or against something. Today, the only positive thing that can be noted, is that in the title of his Bill, he is in support of something because, actually, he is against it. That Hon. Member! He is against metric, as is his Party. He is against everything, against abolition. And, if I quote from Hansard on page 47, as suggested by the Right Hon. Prime Minister, when the more negative elements of reaction look for a place to go, they inevitably flock to the Progressive Conservative Party. It is the Party of those who are against. All those who say no when everybody else says yes, all those who are in favour of negativism, you can find them there, in the Opposition, Mr. Speaker. This is why we can draw an exhaustive list of them. We only have to dig in our memory, to remember those who are against bilingualism, against unemployment insurance, against the changes in the Crow rate, against helping Canadair, against Bell Helicopterestablishing a plant in Quebec, against bilingualism in Manitoba. That is the Progressive Conservative Party. Today, the Hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) supports something; but what he supports is capital punishment, Mr. Speaker. Therefore, the only positive aspect of the matter is that, for once he is "for" something, despite that positive "for", he is against abolition of the death penalty. When the Right Hon. Prime Minister, at that time, and this is again taken from December 9, was referring to those who had not yet reached the current century, he meant the Progressive Conservatives. And this is where the previous speaker said: "You killed me, I am going to kill you. You did this, I am going to strike you. You slapped me in the face, I will slap you. Well, through that Bill, you killed, I am going to kill you."

Mr. Speaker, in 1976, this House voted the death penalty out of the books, yet the Official Opposition Party has not forgotten it. I remember that as recently as 1982, when the Hon. Member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark) was leading the Official Opposition, there was an opposition day on that subject. I recall that the then leader of the Official Opposition, the Hon. Member for Yellowhead, was beyond himself, suggesting he was not supporting the reinstatement of capital punishment, but various things had to be considered and studies made. Although this is always a situation that has to be monitored, my view is that there was a vote here in this House in 1976. The penalties in the Criminal Code were changed to life emprisonment. When there is reference in the amending bill, through Clause 1 of the bill, for instance . . . Section 47 of the Criminal Code deals with high treason offences. What is the present wording of subsection 47(1) of the Criminal Code? Everyone—and besides, my colleague from Lévis (Mr. Gourde) agrees with me, and I wish to congratulate him on his recent appointment as Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General. He will surely see to it that all those questions are debated and this one in particular, but today he may not have the opportunity to tell his constituents whether he supports capital punishment or not. However, he surely has a lot to say on the matter and he will deal with it in detail at a later date. Therefore, Subsection 47(1) at present reads as follows: Everyone who commits high treason is guilty of an indictable offence and shall be sentenced to imprisonment for life. Then, Subsection 47(4) at present reads as follows: For the purposes of Part XX, the sentence of imprisonment for life prescribed by subsection (1) is a minimum punishment, Mr. Speaker. Of course, first degree murder is also mentioned, under Section 218 of the present Criminal Code. Having practised law and as a practising lawyer from time to time, Mr. Speaker, when faced with this situation at the present stage of development of our society, one must look at reality with a view to improving things instead of remaining at a standstill as the Progressive Conservative Party wants to do. We must do one thing, namely try to improve our social programs in order to help people who are in a depressive state, in financial difficulty or otherwise, and tend sometimes to be aggressive or too harsh with their fellow citizens. We must try to implement social programs but not at the expense of society by spending huge amounts of money to improve the social conditions of our fellow citizens, but in order to prevent violence. This is in contrast with the maxim I quoted at the beginning of my remarks: Thou hath killed, I will kill thee ... Will that solve in anyway our society's problems? This maxim comes to my mind and I cannot help repeating it when I read the bill before us. In fact, since capital punishment was abolished, statistics do not point to an increase in violent crimes. May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 45 deemed to have been moved.

INDUSTRY—DEVELOPMENT OF HIGH-TECH INDUSTRY—MONTREAL REGION

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): In the 1980s and the 1990s, some high technology companies will be looking for locations giving them the opportunity to control their operating costs, to improve their productivity and maintain a fast pace of technological and product development. An important consultant firm for the establishment of companies, Fantus has recently made an analysis and a detailed assessment of the Montreal area to determine to what extent it would offer special advantages as a site for various kinds of high technology centres.

That report indicates that the choice of Montreal has substantial advantages for high technology. The table on page 6 clearly shows the advantages of that area as far as costs are concerned. Some annual savings of 37 to 51 per cent can be made in the region in comparison with other large metropolitan areas in the United States such as Boston, New York, Los Angeles, San Francisco and Chicago and the savings according to the size of the plants considered could vary between $8 and $11 million.

Now, Mr. Speaker, on February 8, I informed the House of the situation and of the contents of the report in a statement under Standing Order 21 and I asked the minister during the question period whether he had contacted his Quebec counterpart about this report because of the numerous advantages mentioned about Montreal. There is an ample source of electricity, a substantial pool of technical engineers and scientific personnel, a network of 20 CEGEPs in the metropolitan area of Montreal have turned out some 12,300 graduates in 1982 and finally, the seven engineering schools actively involved in research produced 2,100 graduates in 1982-83. The aerospace centres are also mentioned.

On the basis of those advantages Montreal seemed to be the ideal place to establish high technology plants. However, during consultations with several other companies mention was made of the limited nature of these advantages. How come? Well, management in the Province of Quebec, was too heavily taxed and Bill 17 created some political uncertainty. That was another constraint that made those advantages less appealing.

Mr. Speaker, when we hear Minister Gilbert Paquette speak of separatism, of independence and of sovereignty for Quebec, can we really say that such comments contribute to the establishment of Montreal as a aeronautical centre? Do they really help create jobs for our young people looking for one or is it not rather the way of mortgaging the future of thousands of Quebecers?

Therefore, I would ask, Mr. Speaker, and this is the reason why I took part in the debate this evening ... I think that we cannot overlook the tremendous advantages the city of Montreal has to offer, and I am proud of being part of a Government which over the last ten months has invested $2 billion in high technology in the Montreal area.

Therefore, I would ask the Minister not only to send the report to his Quebec counterpart, as he mentioned in his answer to me, but also to meet with Mr. Paquette in an effort to show him the district advantages offered by Montreal where young people would have extraordinary opportunities to find jobs in the field of high technology and where they could be assured of a good future rather than signing away their future as a result of his separatist attitude.

Therefore, I ask the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Johnston), through his Parliamentary Secretary (Mr. Dion), to request a meeting with Mr. Paquette in order to discuss this report and to consider seriously the best ways to encourage high technology industries to settle in Montreal.

Mr. Rolland Dion (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased, on behalf of the Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development and Minister of State for Science and Technology, to reply to the concerns of the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Roy) who, incidentally, is working very hard for the economic development of the Montreal area.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion (Mr. Lumley) has commissioned a report called the FANTUS report on the advantages of the Montreal area with regard to the establishment of high technology facilities. This report confirms that Montreal is a very attractive location for such investments and even provides many advantages as compared with many cities in the United States. More specifically, the area has several excellent technical colleges and universities in both English and French languages, something few North American cities can boast of.

Those, Mr. Speaker, are major assets to ensure the future industrial growth of Montreal as well as the diversification of the Quebec economy in general.

Mr. Speaker, I want to point out to the Hon. Member for Laval that the federal government is fully confident in the potential of Montreal; this is reflected in the major investments in science and technology announced by this government over these last few months. The global value of those facilities exceeds $110 million to this day, and as was mentioned by the Hon. Member, the future investments in science and technology over the next few years will reach over $2.1 billion. The Office automation Centre in Laval, the Bell's Helicopter Plant, the Robotic Training Center in Sainte-Thérèse, the Food Processing Center in Saint-Hyacinthe, although only a few miles from Montreal, and the expansion of the Pulp and Paper Institute are some of the capital investment projects of the federal government. This demonstrates a genuine government concern for investments in the Montreal area.

The Hon. Member asked if the minister mentioned them to his Quebec counterpart. He told me personally, although the report is available to both levels of government, that he would certainly discuss the matter not only with the minister responsible for Science and Technology but also with all Quebec ministers who are again campaigning on the independence platform for the next provincial election. Their statements are of public record and they can only bring uncertainty once again to Quebec and to the Montreal area. And we have to dispel that uncertainty to be able to attract investments in Quebec and the rest of Canada. I will most certainly communicate the representations made by the Hon. Member for Laval to the Hon. Minister who will inform the Quebec government accordingly.

THE CONSTITUTION—REQUEST FOR INTERPRETATION OF SECTION 23(3)(B) OF CHARTER OF RIGHTS

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my contribution to the debate this evening follows a numbers of questions I put to the Minister of Justice (Mr. MacGuigan) on January 20 and January 27 of this year. Briefly, I was seeking to establish as clearly as possible the position of the federal Government on the interpretation of Section 23(b) of the Canadian Constitution of 1982, and more specifically, what this section means for Ontario, and I would refer my hon. colleagues to Hansard of January 23 of this year, when in a debate similar to the one being held this evening, I said that in my opinion, Section 23(3)(b) gave the linguistic minority of a province the right to manage and control its educational institutions.

Mr. Speaker, the House will recall that last year, the Province of Ontario asked its highest court, the Ontario Court of Appeal, to rule on four questions. These four questions may be found in Order in Council 2154—83—Ontario, and I would invite my colleagues to read them if they are interested.

Among other things, the Court of Appeal was asked to rule on the matter of control and management by minorities of their educational institutions. The Court heard testimony in the middle of January of this year.

Intervenors included the federal Government, of course, which, in a well-prepared statement, unreservedly supported the position of the minorities, that is, that Section 23(3)(b) could be interpreted as giving a minority a constitutional right to control and manage the institutions in question or, if you prefer the constitutional term, its educational institutions.

It will be recalled that in his testimony, Federal Government counsel Brad Smith had expressed some doubt about management and control. He had stated, at least according to certain press reports, and I quote one of them: "The Canadian Constitution does not give minorities the right to manage and control their educational institutions". And again, according to Mr. Smith: "Management and control if necessary, but not necessarily management and control".

The press report goes on to say that Mr. Smith had maintained that the right to education in the language of the minority as guaranteed in the Constitution does not include the management and control of educational institutions.

That is the intervention which prompted me to ask the Minister of Justice to take a stand in the House on January 20. I do not blame him, he supported his counsel by saying: "The Canadian Constitution does not guarantee to minority groups the right to control their educational institutions".

The media, newspapers, TV and radio, reported freely the remarks of the Attorney General and Minister of Justice, so much so that it has become a highly politicized issue with us, and people were wondering just what the federal Government position was on this question. Although the brief on the case tabled before the judges was clear and accurate enough, the interpretation given was not quite what was expected.

I think it might be appropriate as well to remind Hon. Members that, last January 27, I again put a question to the Minister and asked him to set the record straight and perhaps repeat or give us his interpretation. He stated, in a clear enough answer, clearer than the others, in my opinion: "Should a province decide to share its authority over education with its residents, it would then be under the obligation to ensure equal treatment of the majority and minority groups in the province".

That, Mr. Speaker, is the essence of the federal argument. In other words, when a province has exclusive jurisdiction such as it has over education, but decides to share it with its residents, it must do so equitably with all residents, be they majority or minority groups. That has been the basic argument of minority groups for many years. Mr. Speaker, there is no question of invading a provincial jurisdiction. We are saying: Indeed, the province has exclusive jurisdiction, but if it does share it with its residents, it must do so equitably. A province which established school boards, for example, must establish school boards which take Section 93 into consideration, including religious denominations, as well as Section 23 of the Constitution Act, 1982, that is to say minority language educational rights. It must do so equitably.

I asked the Minister—and again I do so in concluding, Mr. Speaker, because my time is running out—to present, because of the perceptions, additional submissions to the courts. I realize that it is seldom done, that it is unusual. Still I thought it was necessary, considering that people feel that the federal Government was in fact quite ambiguous and hardly convincing on this question.

The Minister replied vaguely in the House that it might be something which he would take under consideration. I wrote to the Prime Minister to seek his support. I saw the Ministers whom I believed were involved in this matter. I am now asking the Parliamentary Secretary to tell me whether the federal Government has decided to present additional submissions to the courts in order to clear up this issue.

Mr. Al MacBain (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) is raising a very important question concerning the federal position on minority language education rights and, more specifically, on the interpretation to be given to Section 23(3)(b) of the Charter, insofar as it may relate to the management and control of minority language educational facilities by the linguistic minority of a province. He is also asking whether the Attorney General of Canada intends to present additional submissions to the Ontario Court of Appeal on this matter.

The Hon. Member is probably already aware that, on Tuesday, March 6, counsel for the Attorney General of Canada (Mr. MacGuigan) asked the Registrar of the Ontario Court of Appeal to inquire whether the court would be prepared to entertain a motion to permit the Attorney General of Canada to add to the submissions originally made on his behalf in the Ontario language reference which was heard last January and referred to by the Hon. Member. We are waiting for an answer from the court to that inquiry.

In these circumstances, the Hon. Member will no doubt understand that it would be highly inappropriate to discuss in this House the reasons for which the Attorney General is asking the court to entertain the motion. Such reasons would have to be submitted to the court itself if it accepts to hear the motion. Morever, for the same reason, it would be totally inappropriate for me to outline here the nature of the additional submissions that would be made on behalf of the Attorney General of Canada, if it was decided by the Court of Appeal to entertain and to grant a hearing on the motion. The Hon. Member for Ottawa-Vanier will understand that such additional submissions would first have to be made to the court itself. I strongly believe that, having regard to the circumstances, with deference for the Court of Appeal, we ought to refrain from discussing this matter for the moment.

Having said that, however, I feel it is open to me to reaffirm the Government's position on Section 23. That section confers rights which are of fundamental importance to Canadians and to the nature of Canada as a bilingual country. There should therefore be no doubt about the approach of the Government to the interpretation of the section. It is our view that Section 23(3)(b) in particular should be given a broad and liberal interpretation, a generous interpretation that is most consistent with the fullest realization of the minority language education rights which it entrenches and which lie at the very root of the future of bilingual Canada.

AGRICULTURE—FARM FUEL SALES TAX. (B) THRONE SPEECH PROPOSAL TO HELP FARMERS

Mr. Laverne Lewycky (Dauphin-Swan River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pursue the question I raised on March 5 regarding the problems faced by farmers. I would like to say that I am happy to see the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ferguson) here to answer the question. He has served on the Agricultural Committee so I think it is appropriate that the Department of Finance have the benefit of his expertise in that area. I am glad he will listen to the problem I raise here, because I was not satisfied with the answer I received from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan).

The Minister said that when the farming industry in Canada is compared to that of other industries, it is probably the best in the country. That particular response did not really strike any kind of soft chord in me, Mr. Speaker. All I have to do is look at the statistics we have with regard to the farm income situation in 1983, and the outlook for 1984. I refer the figures of the agricultural statistics division of Statistics Canada. The prediction for Manitoba is that we can expect a 26 per cent decline in realized net income for 1984. That is a rather bleak outlook in contrast to the rosy picture the Minister of Agriculture was painting.

I just want to emphasize how important it is that there be some sort of triggering of the mechanism with regard to the western grain stabilization fund, that there be some payouts immediately, because many of the farmers are in dire straits. I could elaborate further in respect to the farm incomes to which the Minister of Agriculture referred. He should be aware that the projected net farm income for 1984 is actually lower than the 1973 net farm income. In terms of actual dollars, the actual net farm income for Manitoba for 1984 is projected to be some $244 million and in 1973, it was $278 million. A lot of things have taken place between 1973 and 1984 and this certainly is not a bright picture.

On the other hand, if we were to look at the projected net income in terms of 1971 constant dollars—and again these are statistics from the agricultural division of Statistics Canada—we find that projected in 1971 constant dollars net farm income for farmers in Manitoba is $83 million for 1984, and it was $296 million in 1974. So we are talking about something projected for 1984 to be roughly between a quarter and a third of the 1974 net farm income for Manitoba.

I am trying to emphasize this critical situation, Mr. Speaker, so that the Minister of Agriculture will understand. Hopefully, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ferguson) will communicate this to him; that these rising costs are really hurting the farmers. If we look historically at why this has happened we find that the number one increase in costs to farmers in Manitoba—and farmers in my riding come into my office and show me their bank books and their income tax statements—is in fuel and fertilizers. These costs are becoming the number one costs farmers are faced with. It is because of this that I have been asking the Government to consider giving an energy rebate to farmers who are using diesel fuel and, of course, gasoline.

The excise tax which is rebated now, I am told by individual farmers, is of some help, but the excise tax does not apply, of course, to diesel fuels. More and more farmers are using diesel equipment on their farms and, therefore, we need some sort of rebate of sales tax. Of course, this sales tax would apply to gasoline and diesel fuel. I believe that the Government has room to manoeuvre in this regard, if it looks at the breakdown of the sales tax and, of course, other federal taxes which are involved there. These are things which could be done immediately to assist the farmer.

As far as the western grain stabilization plan is concerned, we had promises in the Speech from the Throne of changes, but I was a bit baffled as to why there was nothing in the Budget which would show that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) is at least working on this particular problem. Hopefully today the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance will give me some good news which I can immediately pass on to the people in constituencies such as Dauphin-Swan River.

Discontent with the western grain stabilization plan is pretty well universal out west. There is a need for something to be done there and I suggest the Government consider making a pay-out retroactive to 1983 immediately so that farmers have money in their pockets to finance their seeding. It might also consider combining any sort of new grain stabilization idea with something along the model of crop insurance, making it available on an individual basis to insure against crop fluctuations. I will eagerly await the Parliamentary Secretary's comments. I hope he has some good news for the farmers in western Canada.

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Hon. Member for his comments. I have been following the situation very closely and I believe the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) said a few days ago that the Western Grain Stabilization Act is under review. However, we have to realize that wheat and grain prices reflect world market conditions.

Perhaps it sounds old hat, but for other commodities we grow, not only in western Canada but in eastern Canada, there are vehicles and legislation in place whereby farmers can organize to ensure that they have an income from the marketplace commensurate with that of the rest of society. I am speaking here of the poultry and dairy industries which have an excellent system of marketing in place, perhaps the envy of the world.

I fully realize that there is a special problem regarding grain markets which are depressed at the present time and we trust they will pick up and that this will be reflected in farm income.

The Hon. Member also raised an issue debated in this House on February 17, 1984, specifically that the federal Government provide a further subsidy for Canadian farmers by eliminating the 9 per cent federal sales tax on diesel fuel and gasoline used by farmers. At that time the Hon. Member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) proposed that the subject matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs for consideration. Subsequently, with some wording changes, the House approved referral of the issue to the committee.

During that exchange of views it was pointed out that exempting gasoline and diesel fuel from sales tax for farmers, hunters, trappers and fishermen would present problems in ensuring that only those persons benefited from the relief, and denying it to others who would like to get on the tax free bandwagon. I should point out that the federal sales tax represents only a small portion of the price of a litre of fuel, less than 3 cents, and all users of motor fuels, including individuals, transportation companies, municipalities and manufacturers, in addition to farmers, are required to pay the tax.

However, it is important to look at what has been done for farmers in the recent Budget. There are proposals to shelter up to $120,000 in capital gains by placing them in RRSPs. Incorporated farmers and fishermen will benefit from the new proposals which will simplify the law for small incorporated firms. The Budget went a long way to accommodating the concerns of farmers, and I hope the committee will seriously consider the pros and cons of a sales tax concession for farm fuels, as the Government is well aware of the needs and concerns of the agricultural community.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): I regret to interrupt the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary, but his time has expired.

Adjournment Debate

The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow morning at eleven o'clock.

INSOLVENCY ACT

CALL FOR EARLY PASSAGE

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-17, the Insolvency Act, was introduced for first reading in the House of Commons on January 31 of this year. However, the Government has not seen fit since that time to bring forth the Bill for second reading and debate. The only conclusion that I can come to, Mr. Speaker, is that the Government is not giving this Bill high enough priority for active consideration.

Many segments of our society, including the farming community, are counting on this Bill to offer some direction and some relief to individuals who may be on the verge of bankruptcy.

Procrastination by the Government on this Bill has been responsible for many producers going out of business and losing everything that took them years to accomplish. To add insult to injury, it has come to my knowledge from constituents in my riding that some government Members and some staff members of Ministers are spreading untruths and utter falsehoods, to the effect that the Opposition is preventing the passage of the Bill. This is utter nonsense, Mr. Speaker, and all they are doing is putting even greater distance between themselves and their credibility with the Canadian people. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I call upon the Government to stop this nonsense and bring forth Bill C-17 so that it can be debated and passed into law as soon as possible.

MEDICAL RESEARCH

IMMUNILOGICAL SYSTEM DISCOVERY MADE BY TORONTO RESEARCHERS

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, medical history was made in Toronto this week. A team of eight researchers, led by bio-chemist Tak Mak and post doctoral fellow Yusuke Yanagi, revealed to the world that their group has discovered the key to the human body's immunilogical system and thus have handed to the world's scientists the tools necessary to unlock the medicine chest of curatives for such haunting diseases as AIDS, arthritis, leukemia and other cancers.

I think this incredible news will go a long way to dispel the fears of many who wondered whether Terry Fox's fabulous gift could be made adequate use of here in Canada. Our country's bio-medical research community has proven to all that they are of world class calibre and deserving of world class recognition.

As well, maybe now Terry's Marathon of Hope will bear the fruit he so passionately strove for, as Canadian scientists and, indeed, those the world over, can now undertake a giant leap forward the likes of which has not been witnessed by humanity since the invention of the microscope.

Dr. Mak and his team, the Canadian Cancer Institute, the Ontario Cancer Treatment and Research Foundation, and the Medical Research Council of Canada, deserve this Chamber's heartiest congratulations.

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS

AGREEMENT ON RECOGNITION OF INDIAN RIGHTS

Mr. André Maltais (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, in connection with the Constitutional Conference on Aboriginal Rights which started yesterday, I would like to point out Hon. Members that the Provinces should put more emphasis on the need to reach an agreement with the federal Government that will confirm the rights of the first inhabitants of this country. Mr. Speaker, I think it is very important to understand the requests of the native peoples. Considering the vagueness that seems to prevail at this Conference, I think that in the next few hours, the provinces should do a great deal more to ensure that they have something to show for their work at the end of the two-day Constitutional Conference on Aboriginal Rights.

Mr. Speaker, I also wish to draw the attention of the House to the need for recognition by the Premier of Newfoundland of the hunting, trapping and fishing rights of Indians in Labrador, especially of those living on the Quebec side, because at the present time, they are being prevented from living the kind of life they lead on the Newfoundland side of Labrador. I therefore hope that the Premier of Newfoundland will listen to those requests. It is very simple . . . Newfoundland would take the same approach already being taken by Quebec, which is to let the caribou and the Indians cross provincial boundaries freely and let the Indians use their skills to make a living.

CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY

DECISION-MAKING ROLES FOR WOMEN

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, a crucial factor in Third World development is the work of women. In Africa, 80 per cent of the agricultural work is done by women. In all Third World countries over 50 per cent of the non-imported food is grown by women. In Benin, Burundi, and Liberia, significantly more women are in the labour force than there are men. In Kenya, Lesotho, and Botswana, women head one-third of the families. Actually, over one billion women in Third World countries live in rural areas with agriculture as their primary occupation. In Southeast Asia and West Africa women dominate rural market trade upon which local economies and families are sustained. Third World women have a vital influence on the quality of education, nutrition, and health care.

Cultural patterns in both the North and the South have conditioned people to regard men as the primary movers in economic and social progress. This cultural mind-set has blinded many people to the enormous latent power of women to effect change, if given a helping hand.

At this time the president of CIDA is a woman, Margaret Catley-Carlson. Women are rare in other significant areas of CIDA, however. I suggest that this policy be rescinded and that a far greater emphasis be placed on Canadian women in leadership roles in CIDA programs and projects.

I call on the Government to act on recent OECD guiding principles to aid agencies so that women are brought into decision-making for the design, development, and implementation of projects. Take affirmative action. Place more women in decision-making roles in CIDA. Canada's program could produce much more and better development.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WOMEN'S UNEMPLOYMENT LEVELS

Mr. Gerry St. Germain (Mission-Port Moody): Mr. Speaker, the labour force figures released this morning show that once again the number of people without jobs in Canada has risen.

Unemployment hits hardest at young people, and at heads of families who grow discouraged and despondent from weeks and months of looking for jobs, without success. One group which must be of particular concern are single parent families, headed by women who have lost their jobs. Their numbers have increased in the past year, and their needs have become greater.

With rising rates of divorce and rising rates of unemployment, there are now substantial numbers of women who are being told that their jobs have been terminated, while their responsibilities for the needs and support of their children increase.

The average income of families headed by men is approximately $34,000. The average income of families headed by women is just half, or $17,000. Some 45 per cent of female headed families live in poverty. That surely is tragic enough, Mr. Speaker, but to have that tragedy compounded by increasing unemployment among their ranks is totally unacceptable.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SUPPORT FOR RIFLE PURCHASE CONTRACT

Mr. Peter Lang (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Youth)): Mr. Speaker, I rise to correct some erroneous information which the Hon. Member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) has left with the House in his statements and questions on March 7 regarding the SARP Program, the production of rifles in Kitchener for the Canadian Armed Forces.

The Hon. Member claimed that rifles being made by Diemaco in Kitchener are costing the taxpayers twice what it would cost if we purchased them from the United States. Does the Hon. Member realize that his figures are quite inaccurate and based only on what was in the press? He has simply divided the number of rifles into the total price of the contract. If he had looked past the press reports, he would have been able to realize that over $30.1 million of the $107 million contract is money being used for engineering, design, tooling and gauging, spare parts, training aids, cleaning kits, and preservation packaging.

Mr. Forrestall: It is still part of the cost of the rifle.

Mr. Lang: The actual cost of the Canadian rifle is $850.

Mr. Forrestall: No, it is not.

Mr. Lang: The cost of buying the rifle in the United States was a low estimate at $820. This did not include the massive subsidization of the production of those rifles by the United States Defence Department. Is the Hon. Member for Calgary Centre a spokesman for United States protectionism against Canadian jobs? This contract is providing long-term employment for—

PROVINCIAL AFFAIRS

MANITOBA PUBLIC SERVICE LAY-OFFS

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, the lesson for today, Sir, is, "Put not thy faith in the NDP". This is the sad lesson which is currently being learned in Manitoba as the socialist Government of that Province lays off hundreds of provincial public servants. Woe betide any public employees who vote NDP because they think their job will thereby be secured. The truth of the matter is the exact opposite. NDP mismanagement and socialist stagnation results inevitably not only in the reduction of jobs in the private sector but, because public revenues decline, it means that public services must be cut back and that public servants must be thrown out of work. The New Democratic Party socialist Government means joblessness.

Mr. Waddell: I will resist replying to that. It is nice to be taken seriously, though.

IMMIGRATION

CONDEMNATION OF IMMIGRATION LAWYERS' PRACTICES IN HONG KONG

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I would like Members to see this booklet I hold in my hand. It is entitled "Your Passport to Canada". It has the Canadian Coat of Arms on it, and says "Passport" in English and "Passeport" French. It looks like an official Canadian document. Of course it is not. It is put out by the rip-off immigration lawyers in Hong Kong.

This is a matter which I raised in the House of Commons on October 31 last. I suggested to the Minister that he should do something about it for people in Hong Kong who are paying $15,000 to $30,000, in the case of a panic situation, to get some advice about coming to Canada. They have no way of verifying the information they received. They have no place to complain if they get the wrong information. It is a bad situation. The Minister is too busy running for the Liberal leadership. He has not done anything about it.

I would like to suggest to the House what the House could do and, more specifically, the Bar Associations in British Columbia and Ontario. I believe we can regulate lawyers who practise outside Canada. They have offices in Canada, and they are registered with the Bar Association in Canada. I propose we do three things: first, that Canadian lawyers be forced to register in Canada if they are practising immigration law outside Canada; second, we should apply Canadian advertising codes, the kind of things we apply to the Bar in Canada, which should apply overseas as well; third, when a client is served, the client should have a chance to complain, should be told where he or she can complain, and—

INCREASE IN UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Employment and Immigration on the day scheduled for release of the labour force data, I will direct my questions to the Minister of Finance.

The figures are very disturbing. They show that for the fourth month actual unemployment has increased. The decline in the value of the dollar means we are facing higher interest rates, which will further exacerbate the situation. Given the fact we now have almost 1.4 million unemployed, up more than 100,000 over last year, and given the fact we are now facing higher interest rates, which means the rate of economic recovery has not only slowed down but has stalled, is the Minister of Finance satisfied that his Budget can address the situation?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised the Hon. Member would want to choose only the darkest possible description of the situation. The figures this morning are encouraging in many regards. As he knows, the labour force has known a large increase of .6 per cent last month. A large number of Canadians are coming back into the work force. What he has not mentioned is that employment has grown very substantially during the month of February. We created 54,000 new jobs during that month. Youth employment went up by 1 per cent, and employment in the goods producing industries went up by 1.5 per cent. Employment in the construction industry went up by 5.4 per cent. The month of Feburary was a very positive month for job creation.

I am confident, Mr. Speaker, on the basis of those figures and those I produced in the Budget, that we will know a decline in unemployment this year and a very significant rise in the number of jobs created during 1984. The measures I announced in my Budget were predicated on the type of figures released today, the employment statistics, and I am confident that this year we will achieve a level of unemployment not higher than the one I forecast. As a matter of fact I am confident that, with co-operation from all economic sectors, we will achieve a lower unemployment figure than even the one I forecast in my Budget.

COMPARISON WITH UNITED STATES

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have not tried to present the worst case scenario; I just tried to present the facts. The Minister does not seem to be aware of the facts. He does not seem to be aware of the fact that we are still 352,000 jobs below the peak reached before the recession started.

How can the Minister explain our economic performance in Canada compared with that of the U.S.? Not only have they picked up the jobs they lost, they have increased their job creation by 2.8 per cent. If we had the same performance in Canada, we would have 450,000 more people working. In actual fact unemployment in the U.S. continued to go down, from 8 per cent in January to 7.8 per cent in February, whereas ours went from 11.2 per cent to 11.3 per cent. How can the Minister explain that?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): In a very simple way, Mr. Speaker. The participation rate in this country has increased very significantly, while in the United States it did not increase as fast. As a matter of fact the Hon. Member must know that last year, for instance, the participation rate in Canada increased by 40 per cent more than in the U.S. That obviously has an impact on the statistics to which he refers. What he should bear in mind is the number of jobs created. Again, last month 54,000 new jobs were created in all sectors. There was a significant increase in full-time jobs last month. I find this a very encouraging development.

I indicated in my Budget Speech that I expected the participation rate to increase, the growth of the labour force to be significant this year, and this would mean the unemployment figures would not come up in percentage terms, and they would not come down as fast as I would like or would prefer, but the fact is that we are creating jobs at a very rapid rate. Far from being stalled, the recovery is expected to be strong this year, in the 5 per cent range.

FUNDING OF YOUTH CAREER ACCESS PROGRAM

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): With regard to the participation rate, how can the Minister explain the fact that the actual rate of unemployment went up 21,000? How can he speak about participation when there are 1,400,000 people unemployed, which is up 100,000 over last year? We have 728,000 long term unemployed, which is up 94,000 from the previous month. We have 536,000 young people unemployed, which represents 18.5 per cent. How can the Minister speak in the House with any credibility about participation? I am trying to explain it to these people.

Can the Minister tell us specifically what he proposes to do about the $150 million in his Budget for the Youth Opportunity Program? How much of that will go into the Career Access Program? Now that the Government has been caught with its hand in the cookie jar, is it the Government's intention to take the $90 million left in the Special Initiatives Program and put it into the youth Career Access Program?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Hon. Member will understand better if I speak French. Twice I gave him a clear and concise answer but he does not seem to understand what an increase in the participation rate means. I informed him that although we created 54,000 new jobs during the past month, the labour force in Canada was growing at an even faster rate. In other words, the number of people entering the labour market exceeded the number of jobs we created. However, the employment rate rose in all sectors last month, including youth employment, employment in industry, and especially the construction industry. We had an increase of more than five per cent last month.

The Canadian economy is not slowing down and is not in a decline. On the contrary, it is making very sound progress. I pointed out that in 1984, the growth rate of our economy will be around 5 per cent, which is very high. During the month of February, the number of new jobs created rose considerably. In fact, since the recession, we have created about 424,000 new jobs in Canada. This is an impressive record. Perhaps I should point out, in answer to the specific question asked by the Hon. Member, that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration will be discussing with his colleagues, especially the Minister responsible for Youth and the Secretary of State, how these new funds are to be used. As soon as the Minister has finished his consultations, he will be able to give further details.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, a short supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member has had two supplementary questions. The Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The Chair attempts to apportion time fairly between Hon. Members, and it is difficult. The Hon. Member had a lead off question and two supplementaries. All right, I will give a supplementary to the Hon. Member for St. John's East, but that will have to be recognized in the time of other Hon. Members from his side.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I will decline.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands.

CORRELATION BETWEEN UNEMPLOYMENT AND HUMAN SUFFERING

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, there was a statement in yesterday's press which could bring the jobless situation into sharp focus, even for the Minister of Finance. It said this:

> Canadians are paying a frightful price in ill health and early death for today's heavy unemployment—

Yesterday there was a study released in the United States showing the very definite relationship between high unemployment and the increase in cardiac arrests, homicides, suicides, early deaths, and infant mortality. The author of that study said the same results as in the United States could appear in Canada.

Can the Minister of Finance tell us whether any studies have been done in Canada which show the correlation between high unemployment and the human suffering which that is inflicting on Canadians?

• (1125)

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any study made in Canada on this particular subject. I have heard a number of speeches and press reports, but I have not personally seen any scientific studies that may have been made recently on the subject.

[English]

REGIONAL UNEMPLOYMENT RATES—EFFECT ON PEOPLE

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, that is an incredible admission by the Minister of Finance and by the Government. If he would pay attention to what is going on in the rest of the world, he would find that the study in the United States indicated that the stress and shock of being without a job strongly influence psychiatric disorders and aggression, and this is reflected in the home and in crime.

There are eight regions in this country where the average rate of unemployment is over 20 per cent. That is what the figures which were released today show, over 20 per cent. Why has his Government not even taken the trouble to find out what the toll of human suffering and tragedy is in these regions across the country where unemployment is over 20 per cent?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, what is incredible is the inability of the Hon. Member to hear or understand what I answered to her question. I said that I was not aware of a scientific study being carried out in Canada on this particular subject. She asked me whether I was aware of such studies being made, and I said that there have been many speeches and statements made on this subject but I am not aware of any scientific study that has been made on it. It is for a very good reason. It is a subject on which it is extremely difficult to be scientific. These are, at best, assumptions and analyses made by individuals.

Frankly, I do not need all the sermonizing by the Hon. Member, or to be shown any great press headline, to make me realize that unemployment is indeed a tragedy and has a very serious impact on the individual lives and families of those concerned, in all social environments. I do not need any great sermon from the hon. lady in that regard.

I have a large number of constituents who are unemployed. I personally know a number of Canadians who have suffered from unemployment and who have had a very difficult time over the past many months. I share the concern of Members of the House in that regard. We have been doing everything we can on this side to help those people who are unemployed.

We have tried to stimulate growth in the economy and we have maintained the social safety net, contrary to what the Hon. Member for St. John's East would like us to do, that is, to carry on an attack on the old, on women and family allowances, while there are so many people who are unemployed. We have rejected the approach of the Tories to cut back on social security and the social safety net in this country.

POSITION OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. He has just stated that the Government is doing everything it can to assist the unemployed of Canada. Just a few weeks ago the Minister brought in a Budget and said that this was a stay-the-course Budget because there was no need for a major new initiative or no need for a major new change in government policy when the recovery was well in place and the unemployment situation was in hand.

The Minister of Finance knows full well that for the past three months, both in terms of the percentage rate and absolute numbers, the number of unemployed has increased. We see it again today. What is his line today to the 1.476 million Canadians who are unemployed? By all indications we will see that figure increase next month and see the percentage of unemployed increase as well. There is a definite trend—a very slight trend—but what is his response to that?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to respond that the Hon. Member must look at the number of measures that have been introduced in the last Budget and that will continue to have a very significant impact and effect this year.

With regard to youth unemployment, the Hon. Member will recall that the Speech from the Throne announced a $1.1 billion special youth employment fund, to which I have added $150 million, for a total of $1.3 billion allocated to the problem of youth unemployment. He also knows that we will be spending over $1 billion this year on special capital recovery projects. The Government's expenditures on capital projects will increase by 25 per cent this year at the federal level in order to help create jobs and help the construction sector.

I would submit that, as well as a recovery in the area of housing, the federal Government's expenditures on capital projects have been a factor in providing a 5.4 per cent increase in construction employment last month. I have also indicated that there would be several hundreds of millions of dollars, as a matter of fact certainly over a billion dollars worth of tax incentives that will generate activity in the private sector.

Again, I have to tell my friend that last month 54,000 new jobs were created, and around 424,000 jobs have been created since November, 1982. I am confident that in the course of 1984 we will succeed in creating jobs at this rate over the year and that we will a see a decline of unemployment across the country during the course of 1984.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has just indicated one more time that the Government has provided tax incentives, tax initiatives, to create jobs in the private sector. The repeated comment is that the public sector in not going to be creating the jobs and that we are looking to the corporate sector to do that job on our behalf. The Minister of Finance has now given the corporate sector $3 billion in the last two Budgets in tax breaks, presumably to invest in Canada and then to create economic development which would result in jobs. It is perfectly clear that what the Minister of Finance says is going to happen and what does happen are two different things.

In spite of the tax breaks to the corporations, we have seen that investment in Canada fell last year by 12.2 per cent, and that investment by Canadian corporations abroad went from $200 million in 1982 to over $2.5 billion in 1983. In other words, the profits of those tax breaks that are being accepted by the corporations are not being invested in Canada, but are being invested abroad in some foreign country.

REQUEST THAT TAX BREAKS BE TIED TO JOB CREATION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I have another question for the Minister of Finance. Is it not time for the Minister of Finance, if he is going to continue giving tax breaks, in a sense, grants from Canadian taxpayers to the corporations, to tie them in such a way as to ensure that the corporations receiving them create jobs in Canada, and not abroad?

Mr. Speaker: I am concerned about the nature of questions which involve a very prolonged debate. The questions are long, and the answers are long. It makes it difficult for other Hon. Members to have their share of participation in Question Period.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): I will try to be short, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Crosbie: That will be a job.

Mr. Lalonde: To answer the Hon. Member, I have to draw to his attention the measures that were announced in the Budget debate of last year, to which I have no doubt he refers in terms of tax incentives. The Hon. Member will know, for instance, tax incentives were provided for research and development, which were quite significant in the last Budget, and which make Canada the country which has probably the most generous regime in the world for investment in the area of research and development, so important to creating jobs here. Those incentives are available only if you invest in research and development in Canada. It is the same thing with the possibility of the tax credits given for investment. They are related to investment that is taking place in Canada, not investment abroad.

I would submit to my hon. friend that if he makes a careful reading of the measures that were announced in the April Budget he will find that these were not measures that are giving tax breaks for investment abroad, they are relating, most of them, to a specific activity having to take place in Canada, creating jobs in Canada, and making the Canadian economy more competitive. When we saw, for instance, the large surplus that we had last year vis-à-vis the rest of the world—

Mr. McCuish: Order.

Mr. Lalonde: —obviously this must come from good measures, that is, measures that have helped Canadians compete in selling abroad.

Mr. Speaker: A second supplementary for the Hon. Member. Could the Hon. Member for Kamloops-Shuswap keep in mind that a full-scale budget debate can hardly take place in Question Period?

CALL FOR MEETING OF FIRST MINISTERS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I want to call for something that is different and something we have not called for before. I believe the Minister of Finance would have to admit in spite of what he says today that on the horizon there are real storm clouds.

Mr. Evans: Question.

Mr. Riis: I am trying to ask the question in some intelligent sort of manner, so give me an opportunity.

An Hon. Member: Try hard.

Mr. Riis: The question, Mr. Speaker, is this. Considering that interest rates are obviously on the upward migration, that unemployment is rising, that investor competence is going down, and consumer confidence is going down—

Mr. Speaker: In fairness to the Hon. Member, this is hardly a question for question and answer. If we transform this into a series of mini-debates, and one can see this procedure is becoming more than mini-debates, it makes it difficult for other Hon. Members to participate. The questions are long and involved, and so are the answers. Can the Hon. Member ask his question?

Mr. Riis: Will the Minister of Finance, considering the information that has become available in the last two days, call a meeting of First Ministers to address what has to be the number one problem facing this country, that is, the problem of high and increasing unemployment?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

FINANCE

INTEREST RATES AND EXCHANGE VALUE OF DOLLAR

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. I might remind him that in November, 1982, he was quoted in the Toronto Star as suggesting that the baby bonus payments be eliminated for wealthier people who do not need them. I suggest the Minister should not be such a hypocrite when he makes comments in this House.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Old Scrooge.

Mr. Crosbie: The Liberal policy conference turned that suggestion down a few days later, and repudiated the Minister.

The Minister has made some alarming statements in the last few days that he is not worried about the level of the Canadian dollar and there is no connection between interest rates and the Canadian dollar. My question is an important one. Would the Minister tell the House whether the Government and the Bank of Canada prefer a Canadian dollar lower in value to higher interest rates, or do they prefer higher interest rates to the devaluing Canadian dollar? Which policy are they going to pursue now?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member could tell us first of all who has repudiated him. One thing is clear on the Liberal side. Our national party has taken a clear stand in that regard, and it has been a consistent stand.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: That stand is very different from the stand taken by the Conservatives. Mind you, they have not taken a formal stand on anything. But I have to remind the Hon. Member of the famous survey carried out by the Conservative Party among its delegates at one of those important conferences they had, because they do not dare have resolutions on anything. The survey was made public. In that survey of delegates it was quite clear that the Conservatives' main line of attack was against social programs.

Mr. St. Germain: Shame.

Miss MacDonald: Did you hear Donald Johnston last night?

Mr. McCuish: Answer the question.

Mr. Lalonde: And that Conservative delegates and Conservative supporters were all trying to reduce the social security—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: With all due regard to the Minister of Finance, the Chair has the same difficulty as was indicated previously.

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, the Minister is a convincing argument for retroactive birth control.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Might I remind the Minister that the Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development said yesterday that the principle of universality should be reviewed? That is a statement from a member of the same Government to which the Minister of Finance belongs.

Let me put my question again. It is an important issue. The Canadian dollar is declining in value. It is down below 79 cents compared to the American dollar. Interest rates are rising, and mortgage interest rates have gone up half a point. Is the Government's policy now that it prefers the Canadian dollar to decline in value rather than having interest rates rise? Is the Government going to adopt a policy of allowing the Canadian dollar to devalue wherever the market sends it, rather than have any increase in interest rates in Canada that might counteract the lower Canadian dollar which will stimulate inflation again? Which is your policy? Nothing could be more important.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member should first check the statements before making allegations like the one he made about social programs. He should check exactly what has been said, particularly by my colleague to whom he referred. He might learn a few things. As a matter of fact he might learn a little consistency in terms of the Conservative Party, as to where it should stand—means test one week, universality the next week.

Mr. McGrath: Answer the question.

Mr. Lalonde: It will be interesting to see where the Conservatives are going on this very important issue.

Mr. St. Germain: Answer the question.

Mr. Lalonde: I see the Conservatives are all very nervous when we touch the question of social security.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: I have a supplementary question for the same Minister.

Mr. Speaker: With all due respect, the Hon. Member has had a supplementary question.

Oral Questions

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN SPEAKER'S GALLERY OF UNITED STATES ATTORNEY GENERAL

Mr. Speaker: I should like to call the attention of the House to the presence in the gallery of Mr. William French Smith, Attorney General of the United States of America; Mr. James C. Miller, Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, and other distinguished members of the party of American visitors.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EMPLOYMENT

SPECIAL RECOVERY CAPITAL PROJECTS PROGRAM—FUNDING FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA REGIONS

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Finance. The Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development, who would be Prime Minister, released the day before yesterday a glossy brochure reporting on a $650,000 government conference called "Canada Tomorrow". In the covering foreword there is not one mention of employment creation or technological opportunity, but the Minister, beside his glossy picture, merely points out:

> The only certainty upon which a consensus was clear is that technological change is coming—

Would the Minister of Finance confirm that the Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development has not invested any money in the West Kootenay region of British Columbia under the Special Recovery Capital Projects, where unemployment is currently at 24 per cent, with over 12,000 people out of work, and that in the Kamloops region, with over 10,000 people out of work, the only capital recovery project there will produce 100 jobs? Will the Minister confirm these factors?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, first of all the Hon. Member should take the trouble and the time and make the effort to read more than the introduction to the document to which he referred. If he can muster all his courage and strength and go beyond the first page, he might find out that this very useful and important document treats extensively the subjects which he said were absent from the first page he managed to read in the last few days. I will give him another couple of weeks, and maybe he will have finished reading the document and can come back to it.

As far as his question is concerned, I want to be quite clear that the Hon. Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development has mentioned a number of important Special Recovery Capital Projects taking place in British Columbia. These are capital investment projects of a significant or large nature. It is obvious that they are not taking place in every constituency in the country, or even in every specific area of the country. What is important is that they have an impact and effect upon construction all across the country in terms of supplies, in terms of secondary effect, and in terms of job creation.

Second, the Hon. Member will remember what the Minister of Employment and Immigration stated in the House quite clearly, giving all the detailed figures, that the investment in direct job creation in British Columbia corresponds practically exactly to the percentage level of unemployment in that particular province. This is in spite of the fact that we do not have a single Member of Parliament on this side of the House from British Columbia. However, we care for the people of British Columbia, and we care for the unemployed in that province.

Mr. Siddon: In regard to the document which I have read, it spreads doom and gloom about technology in the future and offers not a single recommendation. So much for $650,000.

PERMANENT EMPLOYMENT PROSPECTS

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Mr. Speaker, does the Minister of Finance agree with the Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development, who would be Prime Minister but is not here today, when he said to the Macdonald Commission:

> The idea of a steady full-time job for everyone who wants to work perhaps is no longer a sensible and realistic goal.

Is that why, under the Special Recovery Capital Projects Program even the Library of Parliament predicts that no more than 20,000 jobs will be created by this massive expenditure of government money on pavement and concrete?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the Hon. Member looks at British Columbia, for instance, he will find that a very substantial federal investment was made in Ridley Island, and also a very significant investment in Vancouver itself, in B.C. Place. I hope he will also remember that British Columbia is the province which will have, of all the provinces in Canada, the largest investment resulting from important Crow rate changes passed by the House during the course of last year, in spite of the opposition of Conservative members from British Columbia who voted against this measure that will benefit British Columbia more than any other province in the country, to the tune of several billions of dollars.

Mr. Huntington: Nonsense; absolute nonsense.

Mr. Lalonde: This is the attitude of the Conservative Party toward British Columbia.

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Obviously we are not in question and answer; we are in debate where highly controversial statements are made and Hon. Members seem to feel they have the right to extended supplementary questions. This is a difficult position for the Chair. The Hon. Member for Selkirk-Interlake.

HUMAN RIGHTS

SEXUAL HARASSMENT CASE IN DEFENCE DEPARTMENT—APPEAL AGAINST COMMISSION'S RULING

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Mr. Speaker, my question will be short, and perhaps I will set an example. It is directed to the Minister of National Defence who is aware of a case of sexual harassment in his own Department, indeed which happened in his own riding. The case to which I refer is that of Bonnie Robichaud who complained of sexual harassment in 1979, and whose complaint was upheld by the Human Rights Commission in February, 1983.

How can the Minister justify appealing this ruling to the Federal Court? How can he morally defend proceeding with this appeal, not only in light of the ruling of the Human Rights Commission but also in light of the Government's stated policies which discourage sexual harassment in the Public Service and provide for disciplinary action when such harassment is proven to have taken place?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am very sensitive to that particular issue for the reasons the hon. gentleman has identified. As well, I am sensitive to it because indeed there has been an increase in the number of women who have joined the Canadian forces. Of course there are substantial numbers of women within the civilian complement of Canadian National Defence, so doubly I am concerned about having a very good record in that area.

However, there are a number of issues which have been raised that I felt, having reviewed the appeal which was launched prior to my assuming this responsibility, still needed to be dealt with by a court of appeal. That is why the process has been undertaken and will be proceeding.

REQUEST THAT APPEAL BE WITHDRAWN

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same Minister. He is aware that no sanctions have been taken against the man involved in this case. He is still on the job, despite the fact that Treasury Board guidelines indicate that management also has a continuing responsibility to stop any harassment that occurs in the work place whether or not there has been a complaint.

The Minister cannot have it both ways. Either the Government is committed to fighting sexual harassment, or it is not. Will he live up to the Government's stated objectives and withdraw this appeal in the Robichaud case?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am not ready to withdraw the appeal. As I indicated to the Hon. Member, I have reviewed the matter very seriously because of its sensitiveness. Indeed I take my responsibilities very, very seriously. Under the circumstances I feel there are still some issues that have to be dealt with.

Until the appeal is disposed of I am not in a position to address the question of sanctions.

REGIONS WITH HIGH UNEMPLOYMENT RATES

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Finance. There are some eight economic regions in the country which are now running at well in excess of 20 per cent unemployment. If the criterion is whether or not they are represented by Liberal or Conservative members, I would point to Cape Breton, one of the hardest pressed areas in Canada, and the fact that it is represented to a large measure by the Hon. Member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso.

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Forrestall: Can the Minister of Finance give some hope to these people that he is considering, with his colleagues, special programs which can be put into place in these particular economic areas where unemployment ranges from 22 per cent to 24 per cent, and even worse with respect to youth unemployment and women who are having enormous difficulty entering the labour force and re-entering it? Re-entry seems to be almost impossible. Is there some special initiative or some special attention being given to these specific eight economic regions?

• (1150)

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, indeed the answer is yes. I invite my hon. friend to look at the various programs that are available and are in operation at the present time, particularly those under the authority of the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion. As well, there are the agreements which were provided for by the Minister of State for Economic Development.

We are in the process of negotiating economic regional development agreements with a number of provinces, including the Province of Nova Scotia. These agreements will provide for significant amounts of money for regions which are suffering from high levels of unemployment. The programs under the authority of my colleague, the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion, also provide for special incentives which are related to the levels of unemployment in various regions of the country so as to attract industrial investment in those areas in which there is high unemployment.

As to the other measures which have been taken by the Government in order to help the economy of Nova Scotia, I must remind the Hon. Member that, particularly under the offshore agreement we have with the Province of Nova Scotia, we have been able to sustain and encourage the development of an industry related to offshore development, and we have also provided for money to be available to the Government of Nova Scotia in order to ensure the appropriate infrastructure development in that province. I leave aside all the amounts of money that have been spent by the Government, whether in regard to Devco or to other activities in Nova Scotia.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, it is quite obvious then that government Members did not sit down this morning and say:

"We have a serious problem and we should address that serious problem".

OFFSHORE DEVELOPMENT INVESTMENT

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has cited the offshore program. I wonder if I might ask him whether or not he and his colleagues have taken any steps to reduce the drain on offshore investment money from the East Coast of Canada. We lose over 94 per cent of the billions of dollars which are going into that development. What has he done to turn that investment around and make it stay in industrial Cape Breton, for example, where it might create the new jobs which are required particularly in these economic regions? The Minister laughs.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member has asked his supplementary question. Could the Minister please answer the question?

Mr. Forrestall: If the Minister laughs in the face of a Cape Bretoner once more, he will be looking for another job.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the Hon. Member wonders whether or not we sat down this morning to do something exceptional. No, we did not sit down this morning to do something exceptional because we have been at work on the problems of unemployment for a heck of a long time. We have been taking quite effective steps to deal with these problems, particularly in the Hon. Member's own province.

The Hon. Member is raising the issue of offshore development. I must remind him of the agreement with his province concerning the creation of ocean industries and the fact that we have been taking such steps. These steps have been taken in spite of the opposition of the Conservative Party concerning support for offshore development, in spite of the opposition of the Conservative Party to the measures taken under the National Energy Program to develop offshore, in spite of the opposition of the Conservative Party to the support for Canadian industrial development in those particular areas, and in spite of the attitude of members of the Conservative Party who would favour multinational corporations over Canadian corporations in that regard. We have—

Mr. Speaker: I believe that the Hon. Minister has answered the question.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ATTACK BY TURKISH NAVY ON GREEK VESSELS

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Hon. Minister of State (External Relations). There has been some very alarming news about an attack by the Turkish navy against a Greek vessel or vessels in the Aegean Sea. Could the Minister give the House some additional information that would clarify for the Canadian public the tragic situation in that part of the world and would also reassure the many Canadians of Greek origin who were very alarmed by the news this morning?

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member has asked a very general question, and I would invite the Hon. Minister to answer fairly briefly, if possible.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister for External Relations): I like that "if possible", Mr. Speaker. I am aware of the interest of the Hon. Member for Saint-Denis in matters pertaining to the Middle East in general, and to Greek issues in particular. This morning I tried to get some information from the Minister on the events to which the Hon. Member is referring. Unfortunately, the Minister did not have much first-hand information. However, he did say that the hypothesis that it may have been just an accident, without any material damage, was quite plausible. I shall continue my enquiries and I hope I will be able to give the Hon. Member some reassuring news, probably on Monday.

UNEMPLOYMENT IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question would be directed to the Minister of Finance if I could get his attention. From January to February, Prince Edward Island lost 1,000 jobs. February was the third month in a row in which the unemployment rate in Prince Edward Island jumped sharply, creating an over-all increase of 2.1 per cent in three months. Would the Minister explain to the people of Prince Edward Island how such a dire situation constitutes the recovery about which he boasts?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member refers to the specific situation of Prince Edward Island in particular. I want to remind him of the investments made by the Government in Prince Edward Island and in his own riding by the Department of Veterans Affairs, which will create hundreds of permanent, well paid jobs in his own riding.

I would also like to remind the Hon. Member that, out of all of the provinces in Canada, the province that receives the greatest support from the federal Government per capita is Prince Edward Island. The support through the regional development grants and programs represents $1,200 per capita in Prince Edward Island. This is much more than the support that has been given to any other particular area or province in the country, by hundreds and hundreds of dollars. The concern and interest that the Government of Canada has taken in the welfare of the people of Prince Edward Island should, I think, be quite evident to the Hon. Member, even in spite of his partisan approach to this particular problem.

MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance. When a province like Prince Edward Island loses hundreds of jobs in three months despite all of the ad hoc programs to which the Minister of Finance has made reference, and the Minister describes that as recovery, could the Minister stand today and describe to the House, for the sake of the people of Prince Edward Island and the people of Canada as a whole, what recession means in his mind, if that constitutes recovery?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, again I invite my hon. friend to examine the level of support for the economy of Prince Edward Island that has been undertaken by the Government. This level of support has been consistent over the years, and we intend to continue that kind of support.

If my hon. friend would bother to check the exact figures he would find, as a matter of fact, that the Prince Edward Island economy has fared relatively better than many other regional economies during the recession, and that the level of unemployment in Prince Edward Island, although high, is still lower than that which exists in some other provinces in the country. I invite my friend to consider this situation by comparing his province with other provinces which are also entitled to support from the federal Government in order to meet their difficulties.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

DISCOUNTING OF INCOME TAX REFUNDS

Hon. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Last year I urged the Minister's predecessor to table a Bill putting an end to the activities of tax discounters, those social vultures who prey upon the poor, the unemployed, and particularly poor women, by charging annual interest rates which are effectively well over 200 per cent in many cases. In view of the Minister's admission earlier this week that there is something wrong with a system which permits this kind of activity to take place, and in view of the lengthy delays taken by the tax Department when issuing refunds, what action is the Minister prepared to take now to stop this legalized theft, particularly of child tax credits and other tax refunds?

● (1200)

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I agree. I abhor the practice that is under way. I can assure the Hon. Member that I have taken steps. I am having discussions with the Minister of National Health and Welfare who is as disturbed as I am, as well as with the Minister of National Revenue.

Unfortunately, it is too late to do much this year, but I can assure the Hon. Member that a new system will be in place by the next taxation year. I congratulate those credit unions that have taken up our suggestion that they occupy that territory. They have begun to do so very well, particularly in the Hamilton area.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, the Minister should have moved on this question a long time ago.

MONEY MART—FEES CHARGED FOR CASHING GOVERNMENT CHEQUES

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question relates to the activities of another group of commercial parasites, the Money Mart franchises. In view of the extortionate fees charged by these outfits to cash government cheques—fees which banks are prohibited from charging by law—will the Minister support speedy changes to the Bank Act to, in effect, prohibit the Money Mart chain from charging fees for cashing federally issued cheques? I would point out that the primary clientele of Money Mart are low income people.

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as usual the Hon. Member has some very simplistic solutions to practices which I abhor as well. I suggest to him that if we were to take up his suggestions there is always the tendency they would drive all those people underground where they would charge even higher fees. There must be a balanced and realistic approach to the problem. I suggest that he offer some realistic solutions, not the kind of band-aid solutions he is putting forward in the House.

Mr. Speaker: One short question for the Hon. Member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington).

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

DISTRIBUTION OF FUNDS TO BRITISH COLUMBIA—ALLEGED STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, in reply to my colleague, the Hon. Member for Richmond-South Delta, the Minister of Finance said that the Government, and he in particular, cared about the people in British Columbia. In that statement is he refuting absolutely the statement made yesterday in Vancouver by his colleague, the Minister of the Environment? When he was asked if the federal Government would be prepared to co-operate with assistance for reforestation, the Minister of the Environment replied that the Government would not do so because the Province of British Columbia does not vote Liberal and does not lobby properly.

Does the Minister of Finance refute absolutely the example of the Minister of the Environment, who said that Quebec manufacturers knew how to get money out of the Liberal Government and the Province of British Columbia did not?

Mr. Nielsen: Dance around that one.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the question of the Hon. Member is so—

Mr. Nielsen: Factual.

Mr. Lalonde: —obviously wrong that it does not deserve much of an answer. The Minister of the Environment has declared that the federal Government is not spending funds for reforestation at the present time in British Columbia because—

Mr. Huntington: Because they do not vote Liberal.

Mr. Lalonde: —we have been unable to get an agreement with British Columbia on reforestation. That is his statement. That is what he actually said.

Mr. Huntington: They don't know how to lobby is what he said.

Mr. Lalonde: This has been the situation because of the attitude of the provincial Government which controls all Crown land in British Columbia and under whose authority the reforestation program would have to take place.

Mr. Huntington: They don't vote Liberal is what he says.

Mr. Lalonde: We have had agreements with Manitoba and with other provinces regarding reforestation. The Government of Canada is ready to enter into an agreement also with the Government of British Columbia.

Mr. Huntington: Only if they vote Liberal.

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Mr. Speaker, I have a short point of order arising out of the response of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) to questions relating to British Columbia. I am sure he would not want inadvertently to mislead the House but he did imply that the money arising out of the Crow benefit would be spent in Canada. I think that if he checks he will find that $600 million of that—

Mr. Speaker: This is argument, not a point of order. This is debate.

PETITION

MR. PARKER—TELEVISION RECEPTION IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the petition presented by the Hon. Member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker) on Thursday, March 8, 1984, meets the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. PAPROSKI—LACK OF OPPORTUNITY TO ASK QUESTION

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I really felt neglected today in the Question Period. I could not ask a question of the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport (Mr. Olivier) because he was not here. The former Minister of Sport was not here, and the other former Minister from Halifax who is now running for—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I call to the attention of the Hon. Member that even if the parties named had been here the length of the questions and the length of the answers would have precluded him from having the opportunity in any case.

Mr. Paproski: They are going to lose $34 million and none of the Ministers is around.

MR. COSGROVE—PENALTIES FOR DRUNK DRIVING

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition to present to the House signed by residents of the Province of Ontario, drawing the attention of the House to the serious problem of drinking and driving. They urge passage of amendments to the Criminal Code which will increase the penalties of those found guilty of drinking and driving.

This is the third such petition that I have presented, Mr. Speaker.

CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House resumed from Monday, February 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Kaplan that Bill C-9, an Act to establish the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, to enact an Act respecting enforcement in relation to certain security and related offences and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof or in relation thereto, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to review a little of what I said on February 20. Bill C-9 is an Act to establish the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, to enact an Act respecting enforcement in relation to certain security and related offences and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof or in relation thereto.

In my opening remarks I began to discuss the notion of what security means in current English. I believe there has been a change in the meaning of the word in our part of the world.

During the break we had last week I visited a number of high schools in Saskatoon and spoke to student bodies. I was surprised to find among them a great concern about this Bill. In fact, I received more questions about the security Bill than about any other area of activity in the House of Commons. This was an eye opener to me because I did not realize young people had this concern.

In my opening remarks on the Bill I spoke about the notion of security. Words indicate what is happening in society so the change in the meaning of a word indicate a change in mentality. When I was younger I believed that the word "security" referred to a state of well-being. You were secure when you were in your home; you were well looked after, you were warm, your parents were with you and there was a state of security. In today's world I believe there is an almost completely different understanding of the word, and that is why I think it is important to define what we mean by the word "security" in the Bill.

Today I think security almost means looking at someone as an enemy. To be secure you have to be sure that you can check everybody out. To be secure you have to sort of work against everybody who might be trying to damage your own security. Probably the best example of how the meaning of the word has changed is with the systems at airports. People now take it for granted that they go through security. They are actually going through a machine which is there because the airline company or society has indicated that everyone in the airport is possibly suspected of subversion. Interestingly enough, no one stands up and protests that what is taking place is an indication to every person that they are actually a security risk and cannot be trusted. I feel that change in mentality is something which is very significant in terms of this Bill which is before us.

I have had the experience of living in a part of the world in which there was a radical change in the notion of security. In Latin America in the 1960s the policy which was adopted by five of the major countries there is what is known as the "doctrine of national security". That doctrine began in Brazil in 1964 when the military overthrew the democratically elected Government of Goulart and then put into effect the military regime which has lasted down to the present time, although the severity of that particular regime has tapered off in the last number of years.

Following that takeover there were the coups which took place in Argentina, Uruguay, Chile and Bolivia. Each of them had basically the same mentality and philosophy, which was always based on the idea of national security. National security was understood in the kind of philosophy that one had to be against the enemy and the enemy was, for simplistic purposes, communism. Therefore, the military took over and took away the rights of people. There was no problem at all. There was no discrimination whatsoever. Everyone in a sense became the enemy. Just as Pogo said in the comic strip: "We looked for the enemy and the enemy was us". And that was the factual situation in those countries.

I am not talking about what used to be called "the banana republics". I am talking about countries with high levels of historical democratic process such as Argentina and Chile which had 132 years of democratic governments prior to these takeovers. The reason they were finally taken over was the idea that in those countries there were subversives, communists, people who were going to take over the government, the government having already been taken over by the military. There was this idea that one had to protect oneself against the subversive.

When I learned that the Government was going to introduce a Bill which was based on the idea of having a Security Intelligence Service, I could not believe it. I just could not believe that those kinds of words could be used in Canada. I would like the Government to look seriously at what is happening, because if there is any possibility at all of the philosophy which I have been outlining, under which I have lived and which I have seen operate, taking place right now, I say to government stop, and stop now. Once this kind of operation is in place with its secrecy, there is no way to find out what is happening; and if you happen to be one of the "subversives", there is no way of telling whether your telephone is tapped or your mail is being opened. I have lived through all that. Even today I have great difficulty feeling really secure that my phone is not being tapped or that my mail is not being opened. That is because I lived for six years where that was a reality in part of the world which not very long before had been a democratic country.

What happened in the situation where everyone became a subversive, and where those countries had to set up a security service not unlike what we have here? It had a body which was the directorship and it had under it the agents. The agents had absolute and total power to do whatever they wanted. Whom did they go after? They went after anyone who questioned what was going on in the government. Who were they? They were the university community.

In the area I lived in Brazil in the 1960s, near the place where I lived, there was a city which had a state university, the city of Maceió. During the period of January, 1969 every single university professor was arrested or detained. Why were they arrested or detained? Because they were subversives? No, because they "might" be subversives. They were questioned and put through police procedures and looked upon as being spies and enemies of the state.

I lived in another reality in which there were a great number of so-called "subversives", people one could not trust. It was the church. People who were actively involved in church responsibilities became the subversives. Many of my friends and colleagues and many of the people I worked with became the subversives. They were arrested and imprisoned and sometimes they were killed. This was all done under the notion of security of the state. Other subversives were the labour unions. Anyone at all who had any influence over the workers, the leaders of the organizations of the workers, became the subversives, the enemies of the state, so they likewise went through the same procedure.

Young people were also involved. They became the enemy because they were asking why this was going on. They asked how it was possible that a government could set up a system which treats its people as though they were all enemies of the state. But it did, and that situation still exists, Mr. Speaker. It exists in several countries yet.

I am happy to say, after having been to Brazil and talked to the human rights people, that much of the early violence against civilians which was carried out by the security services in the name of guarding security has disappeared. However, in Uruguay it still exists. In Chile it is very real. There is no break at all I can see in the position there. Thanks be to goodness, in Argentina I believe there has been a change and that a democratic election has brought back to Argentina—again, a country with a long tradition of working and democratic processes—a system in which it is going back and rechecking that period of its history, the period of violence carried out against its own citizens in the name of justice.

What this Bill is attempting to deal with is the difficult distinction between legitimate dissent and subversion. I admit there are times when that must be a very difficult thing to decide. However, I am very much afraid of the fact that if that is done through a secret system in which the citizens of the country cannot get a responsible answer, it will become very dangerous for the citizens of the country.

What would be considered legitimate dissent? Could it happen down the road that there will be a militant group which will get into government and take over this civilian service? I suspect that that is a real possibility in our country when I observe the ease with which some people, including people in this House, throw around the word "communist" or the word "subversive", and I have heard them use those words. Could it just be down the road that suddenly the same thing will happen and the same kind of people who suffered in Latin America will suffer under this super security mentality, this super necessity to get intelligence and information out of anyone no matter how, whether by using the telephone, the post, or by using prison, intimidation, torture or even death? Is it possible that the beginnings of that kind of mentality in a system is already among us? I speak with emotion about it naturally, because I have lived and suffered under that system.

I ask the Government, and I ask it seriously, to reconsider what it is doing. This notion of setting up a Security Intelligence Service which is not part of the RCMP, which is not something we can question, we can see, talk to and check on to find out what is going on, is a very dangerous precedent in Canadian life.

How did the situation happen in Latin America where there were people who knew about democracy, who had constitutions and well formed governments? I lived through it and I watched it take place. I would like to introduce into the debate today some ideas which have been presented by the Interchurch committee on Human Rights in Latin America. They are ideas which have been put forward by some of the most outstanding theologians, philosophers and historians of Latin America itself, including José Comblin, a theologian who is well known throughout all of Latin America and who has written extensively on the church and the national security state in Latin America.

It is claimed that the ideology of the national security state had two main sources. I believe it is true because I have seen it. One might be called indigenous in that it goes back to the roots of Spanish and Italian fascism and those Catholic organizations on the far right involved in all of that. The other can be traced to a much more recent event, the training provided for military and security forces in the U.S. and in the School of the Americas in Panama founded by the U.S., and in the Supreme War College of Brazil. I have spoken to graduates of both places and they have told me about what took place there.

That is where this philosophy, this mentality, was brought forward that you had to have this super security over all citizens so that there would be no subversion, which I agree with, but also that legitimate dissent did not exist. There was no way that you could question what was going on because "big brother", the government, said what is going on is good and you should accept that because "Big Brother" said it is good. There was no way to have legitimate dissent. When there was any form of dissent at all from the church, the universities or labour unions, they then became the targets.

What happened next was that, because people could see this was oppression in its worst form, throughout Latin America there was a strong movement among many people, including church people, to have people study in the light of the Gospel and other values whether this was right or wrong. What took place was "conscientization". It is a difficult word, it does not really exist in English, but it is a word—concientizacão—which basically means that people, after studying a reality, grow to a new awareness of who they are and what their rights are under the system they live in. They can have legitimate dissent and speak up and find a better way down the road.

Unfortunately my time is running out, Mr. Speaker. Thank you.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I have a comment and perhaps a question. I was glad the Hon. Member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle) mentioned the Interchurch Committee on Human Rights in Latin America because I think it is important to see this whole debate about what constitutes subversion as compared to legitimate dissent in the proper theological and historical context. I ask Members who are genuinely interested in this debate to remember that this debate is at the centre of the very beginning of our civilization, to the extent we call ourselves a civilization based on the Judaeo-Christian tradition.

The central event at the beginning of that tradition, the crucifixion of Jesus Christ, was a matter having everything to do with subversion versus dissent. The crucifixion was a Roman punishment, not a Jewish punishment, for enemies of the state. Christ was regarded as an enemy of the state because He called into question the supremacy of Roman law and Roman authority. He said that people owed their obedience more to the Kingdom of God in its justice than to any temporal or earthly authority. People should keep that in mind and perhaps the Hon. Member would want to comment on that.

Mr. Ogle: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for putting it into very clear religious terms. We are dealing with the essential value of human life and the essential rights of humans. There are different ways of handling that. There is a way of saying that without becoming a criminal. The example of Christ and the crucifixion can be looked on as my colleague demonstrated. There was no way for legitimate dissent against what was going on. You became a subversive and that meant death. His historic example is one that we see many times in modern day life, and death is the answer. I know people who have been killed because they asked questions. I hope this Government looks at the basics and that it will find a way so that our democratic processes and freedoms will be protected without turning us into a police state.

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, my question concerns the Hon. Member's reference to the School of the Americas and the War College in Brazil. He talked about the teaching carried on there but he has not made any connection between these two colleges and Canada. There is a connection with the word "security" which is no doubt very similar to the word in the Spanish language or the Portuguese language used in those countries. Does the Hon. Member have any information which connects the teaching of those two schools with Canada? Were there personnel exchanges, or any indication that the teaching has come back to Canada from those schools?

Mr. Ogle: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the question. I cannot say if there has been any information which has come back from those two schools. However, I think it is interesting to know the history of those schools. In 1969 Nelson Rockefeller was asked to make a report on the whole of Latin America before the Alliance for Progress went into effect. After he made his report it was made a condition of the Alliance for Progress program that countries would receive aid if they were against communism. They would have to prove that they were against communism.

The two schools I speak of are where people were trained to find a way to bring about the total destruction of communism. Now, of course I speak about it in simplicity, but the people who became the communists were the people who were asking questions. They may have been communists, but in my experience the majority of the people were the poor, the oppressed and those who wanted a better deal, a change. But when they started asking for a change they became the subversives. The people who brought about the attack against them, and I have spoken to many of them, have told me that they learned how to do it at either one of those two places.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, I ask the Member whether he does not feel there are enough safeguards in the Bill to protect the Canadian Security Intelligence Service from the kind of abuses he and his Party are afraid of. I draw his attention to the definition of "threats to the security of Canada":

(a) espionage or sabotage that is against Canada or is detrimental to the interests of Canada or activities directed toward or in support of such espionage or sabotage,

(b) foreign influenced activities within or relating to Canada that are detrimental to the interests of Canada and are clandestine or deceptive or involve a threat to any person,

I will not read (c) or (d), but I would like to remind the Hon. Member that the Bill clearly states:

—but does not include lawful advocacy, protest or dissent, unless carried on in conjunction with any of the activities referred to in paragraphs (a) to (d).

Would he not also agree that there is a great deal of security protection built into the Bill under Section 34, which provides for the setting up of a Security Intelligence Review Committee? Section 34 states—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order, please. I have referred to this matter before. On second reading we should not be discussing the individual clauses. We are supposed to be discussing the Bill in principle only. Maybe the Member would confine his remarks to the principle of the Bill.

Mr. Flis: Yes. I would like to ask whether the principle of building in such a Security Intelligence Review Committee provides the kind of protection he is looking for, especially when there are representatives of the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) and the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) on that Committee. Surely the Bill gives adequate protection against the kind of concerns and fears the NDP is expressing.

Mr. Ogle: Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to my colleague, I would say no. I think my response reflects the idea of all civil libertarian groups I know in Canada, as well as bar associations and other groups.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a final comment. What is being missed as we move from the RCMP to a new civilian security service is the opportunity to have a genuine change in our view of what constitutes subversion. Some of the views which the Member for Saskatoon East expressed about the future are already here. The Government has 800,000 files on Canadians. In 1969 I attended a demonstration at a Liberal fund raising banquet in Winnipeg at which the Prime Minister was speaking in which I protested, a second voyage of the oil tanker Manhattan through the Northwest Passage. I later discovered I was listed as a potential communist because I did not want the Manhattan to go through the Northwest Passage. That is the type of paranoia which has existed in the country at least since 1969—not in the future but since 1969—and which, if we do not change, will lead to the kind of future which the Member for Saskatoon East fears.

Mr. Ogle: Mr. Speaker, I would just say I agree with what the Member said.

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, there appears to be a kind of love-in with the few remaining socialists in Canada.

Mr. Waddell: He said he was President of the YPC.

Mr. McKinnon: I would like to tell the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie) and the Hon. Member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle) that the rights of free speech and dissent are not in the hearts of the NDP alone. It goes back to the axiom that I disagree with everything you say, but will defend to the death your right to say it. I am not quite prepared to go to that length, but Voltaire said that quite some time ago and I do not think he could have been accused of being a socialist. It is true that one must have the right to dissent. I believe all of us on this side of the House certainly believe in that and will sustain it.

This Bill succeeds Bill C-157. It was a feckless, gormless government which produced Bill C-157. At the time of the production of that Bill Canadians were looking for something which would enable us to have a less militant organization, possibly something like the CIA of some years but not of others. We wanted it to be somewhat milder. Instead of that, the Government produced Bill C-157 which would not have given us anything like the CIA. It would have given us something more akin to the KGB. Fortunately the place of sober second thought looked it over and successfully pointed out to the Government that it was a totally inappropriate Bill to be put in front of the Canadian people.

Bill C-9, which is in front of us at the present time, sets up the Canadian Security Intelligence Service. This Bill is somewhat better. It needs a lot of improvement yet and we hope there will be some improvement when it gets into committee. Perhaps it would be useful to the House if I were to discuss this Bill in terms of the organization we have at the present time of which not everyone is aware. It is extraordinarily difficult to get any information on the way the system works at the present time, as everyone knows. I will discuss the organization in those terms first and then review the Bill. This may help us see where we are in danger of going in the future.

The current organization for security and intelligence is amorphous, to say the least. At the present time it does have some component parts which, fortunately, are distributed among several Departments whereby the Ministers can have something to say about what their component is doing. There are three Departments which are quite seriously involved and I think the Solicitor General's Department is first since it controls the RCMP.

As a result of the difficulties in 1970 with the FLQ in Quebec, it was determined there was no crisis management capability in the Government. It was then decided to set up a security section of the RCMP as a result of what happened in those days. At the present time there are sections A, B, D, E, F, H, I, J and L which are operating sections of the security division. I believe these sections are alphabetically designated for functional purposes with certain sections looking after certain problems. One wonders what happened to C, G, and K sections which are missing from their alphabetical list. However, that is a rather specious curiosity.

At that time they decided they should have a civilian in charge of this section of the RCMP. They did not go all the way to choosing a civilian but rather chose Lieutenant General Dare, a very competent and highly qualified military man who had been of considerable assistance during the problems in Quebec at that time. His capabilities had impressed the Government and they made him the head of the security section of the RCMP. I have a great deal of admiration for his capabilities. I do not believe the direction he received was what it should have been.

I will move for the time being from the Solicitor General's Department to the Department of National Defence. There exists the famous section known as the Communications Security Establishment which is located here in Ottawa. It arouses the interest of the media about once a year when someone in the media stumbles over the Communications Security Establishment. We then see a headline such as "Electronic Spy Agency has Doubled in Nine Years". It is difficult to think of anything which has not doubled in nine years, of course. The media immediately interprets it as a great spy agency which is doing something that should not be done. I heard it best described as being there to ensure the security of our communications and the insecurity of everyone else's. That may well be the real purpose of the CSE.

It has quite a collection of information for intelligence and other purposes. It does have several sub-parts which are not all that well known. It is useful sometimes in peace-keeping. Under capabilities I would like to mention the electronic surveillance units which they have at the present time. There are very excellent units indeed and the capability of Canadians in electronic surveillance is well known everywhere.

I visited the Sinai desert at the time when Canadian troops were there in a peace-keeping role. As an example of how there can be advantages to this kind of capability, a group had been formed by the United Nations to supervise the green line at that time between the Egyptians primarily and the Israelis. This group which had been established under United Nations supervision had an electronic surveillance capability and possessed some of the most exotic sound detection systems one could imagine. This organization sat on the green line and was able to report not only to the UN or just one side, but to both of the contending sides about what the other side was doing. Everything which they reported was automatically conveyed to both sides. Consequently there was no danger of one side basing its decisions on hearsay information and attacking in a panic situation. Pre-emptive attack is very popular among small countries that get into difficulty and require peace-keeping forces. There was quite some use at that time for surveillance units.

I sometimes disagree with the appropriateness or capability of the RCMP involvement in international espionage when dealing with certain Canadians who occasionally become involved in it. I must confess that the RCMP seems to have a great predilection to turn traitorous Canadians into double agents. As best I can tell, it has a success rate of absolutely zero in this matter. To my knowledge, everyone whom the RCMP has picked off turned out to be too stupid, incapable or had already blown their cover as a double agent.

I would like to refer to a book entitled Men in the Shadows. It mentions that at a certain period of time:

> There was a whole new series of successful recruitments in Moscow during the late 1960s and early 1970s. A Canadian corporal acting as chauffeur-assistant to the Canadian Military Attaché in Moscow—

As an aside I might note that Canadian military attachés are there to report on the military of the country in which they are stationed. They are not there to open doors for visiting VIPs. They have a duty and are known in the trade usually as bright young officers with good cameras. This one had a chauffeur-assistant who spied for the KGB in the early 1970s. The book goes on to state:

> He was apparently caught black-marketing in the exchange of foreign currency and pressured into the role of an agent for which he was rewarded both financially and sexually. He did the usual things, like planting bugs within the embassy and reporting on the weaknesses of other Canadians, and continued to do so after being transferred to Peking. He was discovered by West German Intelligence—

Not ours, but by West German Intelligence.

—after being posted to the Canadian military base at Lahr and put under surveillance in August, 1974. He was escorted back to Canada and confessed but also was not prosecuted. He resigned with a pension.

This is why I sometimes have doubts as to the proper direction of our counter-espionage and espionage systems.

In Bill C-157 we found that there was no real accountability fixed anywhere. Bill C-9 would set up a review committee but neither Bill C-9 nor C-157 provides for the right of the review committee to seek Cabinet documents. I am sure the Cabinet will simply not let the review committee see Cabinet documents. It is interesting to note that the Senate committee recommended that the review committee be allowed to see Cabinet documents. With such a highly sensitive area as this, it is difficult to understand how the review committee could possibly function without that ability.

If one researches to see who is in charge of our present organization, it is the Cabinet Committee on Security and Intelligence. While it has that responsibility, it seems rather loath either to use or accept that responsibility. I recall when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stood in the House and pointed out that in many of these cases it is best that the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) not know what was going on. This is a thesis which I cannot accept at all.

I remember the first meeting of the Cabinet Committee on Security and Intelligence when we took office in 1979. We talked to the staff and they told us at that time that it was the first meeting of the committee in two years. To my recollection we had five meetings during the nine months in which we were in office. I understand that the committee has met twice in the last year but I do not believe it is really evidence of a reformation on any great scale since it has presumably spent some time studying Bill C-157 and Bill C-9. It would have a difficult time doing that without sitting once in a while.

The make-up of the committee is interesting. When the Right Hon. Member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark) was Prime Minister, he chaired the committee, as does the present Prime Minister. I was the Minister of National Defence and in that role I was the Vice-Chairman of the committee. I notice that now it is the Secretary of State for External Affairs and Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) who holds that position. This puts External Affairs in a higher position than it was in 1979 as far as this particular committee is concerned.

There are not too many differences in the committee's membership. At that time the Minister of Public Works was on the committee. The present Government has on the committee the Minister of State for Social Development, who is in the other place, as well as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Chrétien) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde). I am not quite sure why these economic Ministers are on the Committee on Security and Intelligence unless they feel that the economy is in such a terrible condition that the whole country might collapse and they will be needed there. I suppose that is for them to decide.

The present Cabinet committee is larger, as is the case with most everything in the Cabinet of the Prime Minister. There are ten men on their committee and six men on its alternate list. In our day we had seven men and one woman on the committee. I suggest that we should be concerned about the frequency of this committee's meetings.

If we look in the Bill to see who is in charge of this operation, it can be seen that it is quite clearly put into the hands of the Solicitor General. There is no longer any doubt about who is in charge. The definitions clearly put the responsibility on the Solicitor General, far more than it was under the old system when the Cabinet committee had that responsibility. The strange thing that has existed until today—one can understand, knowing that the Cabinet committee practically never met—is that there is a committee of deputy ministers which deals with security and intelligence. It is a committee that does not like to be known as a mirror committee but prefers to be called an interdepartmental committee of deputy ministers. It deals with security and intelligence and has two subcommittees, one on security and one on intelligence.

I have heard from members of that committee of deputy ministers, although General Dare was the person who chaired it, that they have been meeting once a month for four years and corresponding with the Cabinet committee but not receiving any replies. It eventually adopted a strategy of which I do not approve. When it made recommendations or passed resolutions in the committee, it would refer them to the Cabinet committee. If it did not receive a response it would consider that they had been accepted by the Cabinet. This is a very dangerous option for it to practise and I hope this will not take place in the future. When we see the lines of communication provided for in Bill C-9, the Solicitor General has a deputy minister who can report directly to that committee.

The Director of the service will be a very powerful man indeed. He can report either to the deputy minister or to the Solicitor General. But poor people like the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Blais) can only write to the Solicitor General.

Mr. Blais: And talk to him, too.

Mr. McKinnon: He will not be able to send a copy to the person who is making decisions, which would appear to be the Director.

In my last couple of minutes I want to mention a few concerns of mine having to do with personnel. First is the transfer of personnel. This Bill refers to what will happen to members of the RCMP who are transferred into the new organization. It does not mention what is going to happen to military personnel. I can say quite frankly I believe there are several hundred military personnel who are involved at the present time in electronic interception. Whether they are going to be converted into civil servants in this organization is not made clear at all. I know we should not be pointing out specific parts of the Bill at this stage of the discussion, but on page 26 of Bill C-9 the RCMP is mentioned very fully. There is no mention made, however, of what will happen to the service personnel.

I worry considerably about the make-up of the review committee, which consists of a Chairman plus two to four Privy Councillors. These Privy Councillors cannot be Members of the House of Commons or members of the Senate. This gets one into a very select little group. Everyone is casting around wondering who will be appointed. These appointments will be made by the Governor in Council; therefore, we will end up with the Prime Minister's friends on the committee. I believe this is of great concern to Canadians.

This Government does not have the confidence of the Canadian people. I do not know who will win the election, but I think it would be helpful if an election were held before something like this is put in place. When you consider that the Director has been given the authority for staffing this entire organization, one can see what could happen. All the applicants for porkbarrel treatment would be up at the top of this organization. There is one across the way. If the Hon. Member is certain of his future in the House, he might want to stay here.

Mr. Pepin: What about you?

Mr. McKinnon: There are other Privy Councillors around looking for work, I suppose, but there are not too many of them who have the qualifications. Jack Horner appears to be rattling around looking for work again.

Mr. Pepin: He has a job.

Mr. McKinnon: Senator Stollery, I understand, feels that his job is rather confining. He feels his hands are tied on occasion and he is not happy with it.

Mr. Waddell: He is a police counsellor.

Mr. McKinnon: He could be made a Privy Councillor. It takes only a day to make someone a Privy Councillor. I am not at all sure we would want to end up with somebody like that.

Personally I feel that this Bill, unless it is changed dramatically, cannot receive our support. I would like to see an election intervene because frankly the people of Canada worry very much about the track record which this Government has of Governor in Council appointments. People worry very much about having our intelligence and security operation put in the hands of somebody selected by the Privy Council.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of brief questions. I was very pleased to hear the Hon. Member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) say that Bill C-9 is much better than Bill C-157. He agrees that it needs some improvement. Could he tell the House whether, in light of the fact that the Senate committee made so many changes to the Bill, his Party is prepared to support this Bill in principle, keeping in mind there may be the odd amendment which the Government may have to accept. In light of the Hon. Member's comments, since he did seem pretty positive toward the Bill and mentioned it needed some improvement, could he indicate to the House whether this Party would be prepared to support this Bill?

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, If I might first just apologize to the House, when we rise for lunch I have a plane to catch and I cannot be here for the few minutes that will remain for questions.

In answer to the Hon. Member's question, there has been considerable improvement to the Bill and if it gets improved quite radically in committee, then we would have another look at it. At the present time I would expect we will not be voting for it on second reading. However, the Government has a majority and, as it has demonstrated so often on so many matters—I am thinking particularly of the Crow Bill—the Government finally gets its way no matter how unjust the cause is.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, again what we are seeing is a Party of being against. Surely its members must have some principles for which they stand and could tell the Canadian public in this House.

Mr. Jarvis: That is baloney.

Mr. Flis: As you can see, Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is afraid. Rather than asking further questions, I have just a comment to make.

The Hon. Member for Victoria said that he would prefer to have an election prior to the passing of the Bill. Is he concerned that his new Leader has dropped in the polls from 52 per cent to 48 per cent and this is why he is urging upon us an immediate election?

Mr. Jarvis: I thought the Hon. Member opposite was serious about this Bill.

Mr. McKinnon: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I thought we were supposed to discuss the Bill. I am worried about a Party that has only 36 per cent of the people in Canada supporting it. The Liberals are glad to have that much support. They are overjoyed to get to 36 per cent. It means just over one-third of the people will vote for them. With that level of support, I do not want personal friends of the Prime Minister being put into very important and lasting jobs, such as those created by this Bill and, as well, being given the opportunity to appoint all of their subordinates. That is of great concern to the general public.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, we are dealing today with a Bill which, if and when enacted, will set up an entirely new security service and lay down the rules and procedures under which this service would operate. Since Canada became a country and up to now, security matters have been left to the RCMP. Most Canadians seem to be satisfied with that. Most Canadian Government and Ministers of Justice or Solicitors General who were supposedly responsible for the administration of the RCMP seemed to be satisfied with that situation.

A few years ago an RCMP officer acting on his own and in his free time in the City of Montreal was injured while placing a bomb on the premises of a private citizen. Because of what happened he was charged and brought to trial. At his trial he made a number of allegations. He indicated that some RCMP officers had been involved in some highly illegal activities. Members of Parliament who were here will remember that questions were asked of the Solicitors General at that time. I remember the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East (Mr. Allmand) and the present Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) indicated by their replies that they knew very little about what the RCMP had been doing.

As a result of the questions asked in Parliament and outside, a royal commission was appointed to look into all the questions surrounding the operations of the RCMP and its security service. This Commission, headed by Mr. Justice McDonald, held hearings across the country and studied the matter from 1977 to 1980. I hope the Hon. Member across the way who has been asking questions will keep in mind when he asks further questions that it was the McDonald Commission, not members of the New Democratic Party or civil libertarians, that found that the RCMP had been involved in kidnapping, in barn burning, in the theft of dynamite, in the theft of membership lists of legitimate political organizations—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member but it being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, during the few minutes I spoke before the noon adjournment, I was listing some of the findings of the McDonald Commission. It found that members of the RCMP had been involved in a number of highly illegal acts, including kidnapping, barn burning, theft of dynamite, the filing of false income tax returns and theft of the membership lists of a legitimate political Party, the Parti Québécois. I am a federalist, Mr. Speaker. I am completely opposed to the major principle behind separatism espoused by the Parti Québécois, as I am to the principles behind the Canada West party and other groups like it. However, surely as long as individuals, groups or political Parties wish to bring about changes in which they believe in a democratic way, there is no legitimate reason for the security service to be investigating such groups or individuals or to be stealing membership lists, as was done by the RCMP.

Another finding of the McDonald Commission was that the RCMP had files on 800,000 individual Canadians. That is mind-boggling, Mr. Speaker. Some of us have always suspected that the security service of the RCMP had looked into the activities of people involved in the labour movement, some farm organizations, peace organizations, anti-nuclear campaigns and the anti-Cruise campaign, but none of us would have suspected that the RCMP had accumulated files on 800,000 Canadians. There has been one political assassination in the whole history of Canada. There has been very little in the way of political violence. I have never been able to understand why the security service should be involved in that kind of surveillance.

Some years ago, bowing to pressure of public opinion, Parliament passed an Access to Information Act. Some Canadians were interested in finding out whether the RCMP had files on them and, if so, what those files contained. A number of people, myself included, applied, in the ways which were prescribed under the provisions of that Act, for permission to see our files. This is the kind of response we got from the RCMP, and we got similar responses from the Solicitor General:

> In regards to your request concerning our Security Service Records, . . . please be advised that the Governor-in-Council has designated our Security Service Records, described in the Index of Personal Information Banks, as exempt from access under Section 18 of the Privacy Act. We cannot comply with your request nor can we confirm whether or not such information exists concerning you.

That is the kind of reply we get in Canada. I thought that was very interesting because I knew that, using the American freedom of information act in the United States, individuals and organizations had been able to gain access to and acquire copies of information from CIA and FBI files from the 1960s and 1970s.

I wrote to the Director of the FBI asking to be furnished with a copy of any file which they had on me. I received a reply in January, 1984 acknowledging receipt of my request and indicating that a search of the records would be made to determine if the information I was looking for existed. Then on February 13 I received a letter from the Chief of the Freedom of Information Privacy Acts sections of the FBI which reads as follows:

> This is in further response to your Freedom of Information/Privacy Acts . . . request. Information pertaining to your request has been set forth below in appropriate paragraphs—
> Documents have been located which may pertain to your request and they will be assigned for processing in the near future.
> For your information, as a result of the large number of . . . requests received by the FBI, some delay may be encountered in processing your request.

Just think how ridiculous this situation is, Mr. Speaker. We live in Canada, a middle-sized power with virtually no record of violence, where information about people is being kept secret. The United States is a world power, a country in which Presidents have been assassinated and bombings and shootings have occurred. In the United States, the authorities are quite willing to allow people access to the information which is contained in their files. That is an indication of how seriously the Government of Canada takes the whole question of access to information and how that secrecy impinges upon the right of Canadians to receive the kind of information to which we believe they are entitled.

What do we see in this Bill, Mr. Speaker? The McDonald Commission recommended that the security agency have extensive powers, powers which we think are too great. However, along with those powers, the commission recommended a strong set of controls. Those controls are not contained within this Bill at the present time. As a matter of fact, the first Bill which preceded this Bill met with much hostility. I say to the Hon. Member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis), who seemed to suggest this morning that only members of the NDP were concerned about this Bill, that the first such Bill met with almost unanimous condemnation from civil liberties organizations, Bar Associations and a host of other organizations. Most of the objections which these organizations raised have not really been looked into or dealt with in the present Bill.

The Government has refused to prosecute those RCMP agents who were involved in the illegal activities to which I referred earlier. Indeed, the Government has refused to discipline those agents, and in the case of one superintendent, not only was he not prosecuted or disciplined but he received a promotion. We have the idea, which may seem quaint to members of the Government, that if Canadians are expected to be law abiding, as they are, they have the right to expect that all Canadians will abide by the laws, including the members of the security service. Unless all Canadians obey the law, we cannot expect anyone to obey the law.

It is taking the Government too long to bring in legislation designed to create an up-to-date and efficient security service. As I have indicated, the first attempt, Bill C-157, was attacked by lawyers, civil libertarians, trade unions and the provincial Attorneys General. It was so deficient that it had to be withdrawn. That Bill gave the security service authority to open mail and enter premises surreptitiously and it gave the service access to confidential government information without the controls recommended by the McDonald Commission. Allan Borovoy of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association said that under the terms of that Bill as it was formulated, Canadian citizens could have their conversations bugged, their mail opened, their homes surreptitiously searched and their confidential records invaded, even though there was not the slightest suggestion that any law-breaking was involved.

This Bill provides for a Security Intelligence Review Committee comprised of Privy Councillors, former Cabinet Ministers, provincial Premiers or judges. I will not dwell on who the Government may appoint. When one looks at appointments the Government has made in all the fields where it makes appointments, one gets a pretty fair idea of the kind of support and co-operation it expects and gets.

Even this committee, however, will not have access to all documents; Cabinet documents are excluded. Nor does it provide for a review by this committee of the intelligence activities of other Departments. And most important, there is no provision for a parliamentary committee on security and intelligence.

In countries with a larger population than Canada, countries which have much more serious security problems than Canada has—I have mentioned the United States but the same is true of West Germany—parliamentary committees supervise the intelligence activities. There has never been a case where any member of the intelligence committee in the United States or West Germany has made public anything which might create difficulties for the security agencies in those countries. There should be a parliamentary committee with the authority to keep records of what the security service in Canada is doing.

The definition of who can be investigated is sadly deficient. People supporting resistance to the Soviet Union's invasion of Afghanistan could be investigated; an organization supporting some of the liberation movements in Africa could be investigated; people supporting the Government of Israel's activities in opposition to certain Arab countries or terrorism could be investigated. We know that in recent years the RCMP has kept under surveillance church groups that have been involved in the kind of activities I have mentioned.

Mr. Kaplan: That is false. Church leaders are not under surveillance.

Mr. Waddell: Then who is? Why don't you open the files?

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, the Minister says that is wrong. The Minister can interject as he has and say that church leaders are not under surveillance. I say to him that there is evidence which has never been denied that people involved in Operation Dismantle were kept under surveillance. I will wait for the Minister to deny that.

Mr. Cosgrove: God watches us all. God looks out for everyone.

Mr. Orlikow: If the Minister does not, it is obvious that he knows that people involved in Operation Dismantle have been kept under surveillance. It is not important whether we agree with the work of the people involved in Operation Dismantle or not; the point is that they are conducting an open campaign in a peaceful way and they ought not to be under the surveillance of any security service.

In the United States telephone tapping, clandestine search or the use of undercover information must have the approval of their Attorney General. That would not be the case in Canada as a result of this legislation. Under this Bill judges determine who will be investigated and how individuals or groups will be investigated. Yet the Attorney General for Ontario, Mr. McMurtry, has described some of the definitions in the Act as being "flabby".

Both in Canada and in the United States a wide variety of legal activities have been investigated. I indicated one example, PQ membership. In the United States the FBI guidelines require that there be a reasonable indication that violence will occur in the not too distant future. This Bill has no such provision. The United States law requires reapplication for permission to wire-tap every 30 days; in Canada the Bill provides for reapplication once a year.

We are not opposed to Canada having a security service. We are not opposed to the security service doing the job it ought to do.

Mr. Kaplan: Why not let the Bill go to committee then?

Mr. Orlikow: What we are opposed to is the kind of things the RCMP did in past years and which we believe a new security service will do because the Act will make legal the illegal things that were done in the past.

Mr. Blais: Read the Act.

Mr. Orlikow: That is why we oppose the Bill, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a comment. I note that there are some interjections from the Government side of the House, yet not a single Liberal Member other than the Minister and his Parliamentary Secretary has been prepared, in four days of debate, to stand and defend the Bill.

Mr. Kaplan: You know why. It is because we want the Bill to move to committee. You want it to stay here.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): They have refused to defend the Bill because they know what this Bill will do.

Mr. Kaplan: You know why we are waiting.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order, order.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I should like to ask the Hon. Member where he was this morning when I interjected and took part in the debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order, please. That is not a point of order.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I maintain that not a single Member on that side of the House has taken part in the debate by making a speech, other than the Minister and his Parliamentary Secretary. If they want to defend this Bill, I challenge them to rise and do so. The Minister for External Relations (Mr. Pepin) has sat through the debate. Let us hear his views on this Bill, or let us hear one of the other Ministers, instead of having them interject but refusing to take part in the debate.

My question to the Hon. Member is with respect to an incident which he no doubt is well aware of since he was in the House at the time it was raised. I refer to the break-in and the arson at the public interest group, Praxis Corporation. Would he comment on the implications of that particular break-in and the fact that somehow, in some mysterious way, the documents stolen from Praxis Corporation ended up in the hands of the RCMP security service. Today, some 14 or 15 years later, in a lawsuit filed by Praxis Corporation against the Solicitor General of Canada, the Solicitor General has refused to allow a whole series of documents to be brought into court.

Mr. Cosgrove: Would you repeat your question?

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): He is muzzling the full disclosure of the RCMP involvement in the Praxis Corporation break-in. I should like to ask the Member—

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. This is question time under the rules. This hon. gentleman, who has already spoken on the Bill, is attempting to introduce new debate, which he is not entitled to in accordance with the rules of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order, please. The ten-minute period is for questions, answers and comments. If the Hon. Member wants to use his time to make a comment, he can do so. The Hon. Member has been speaking for some while but I saw no interest from any other Member and I let him continue. Perhaps he could wrap up either his comments or his question.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Blais) would like to rise in his place and enlighten us on his views on this legislation at the appropriate time.

I should like to ask the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North to elaborate on his views with respect to what happened at Praxis Corporation and the dangers that incident would pose when dealing with a government which is asking for powers which significantly exceed the powers the present security service has.

Mr. Blais: The Hon. Member for Burnaby knows that that is highly improper.

• (1430)

Mr. Kaplan: Do not prejudice your friend's chances of having a fair trial.

Mr. Orlikow: I have no intention of saying anything which would jeopardize the case. However, I point out to Hon. Members on the Government side and to the Ministers who have been interjecting that in Canada documents stolen from an organization wound up in the possession of the RCMP who refused to turn those documents over.

Mr. Kaplan: Should you not let the judge decide that?

Mr. Orlikow: If the Minister wants to speak, I wish he would get up to speak on his own time and not mine.

Mr. Kaplan: I have spoken.

Mr. Orlikow: I simply want to point out, Mr. Speaker, that in Canada there were documents stolen from an organization which would up in the possession of the RCMP. I am not saying the RCMP security service stole those documents. I do not know. However, it has the documents and refuses to produce them. In very similar situations in the United States, Mr. Speaker, organizations and groups who were investigated and infiltrated by the FBI have used the American Freedom of Information/Privacy Acts and have obtained copies of all the files which that security agency has.

I say again, Mr. Speaker, as I did in my speech, that there is something very sad about a situation in which a world power like the United States can open its files and give information to its citizens, while a country like Canada with so few problems refuses to follow a similar course.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, if I may ask the Hon. Member a question, the comments made by his colleague are designed to make the people in the gallery and the people in Burnaby think that somehow or other Hon. Members on this side of the House do not want a reform of our national security arrangement. Indeed, we do.

Mr. Benjamin: Prove it.

Mr. Kaplan: Hon. Members opposite are saying they want a reform also. The vehicle for that is moving this Bill through committee. I wonder if the people in the gallery realize that the Hon. Member intends to put every member of his Party up on their feet to speak on this Bill with the sole purpose, I would suggest—and I am asking—of preventing the Government from moving this Bill to committee so that there can be a reform of the national security arrangements.

Does the Hon. Member realize that his speech, and all the other speeches which Hon. Members of his Party intend to stand up and make, are providing a good opportunity and a good possibility of preventing this important reform from moving forward? To suggest that more of us should stand up to speak, to me just proves that. Perhaps the people of Burnaby can be taken in by that, I hope not for long. I wonder if the Hon. Member really believes so.

Mr. Cosgrove: Look at them laughing.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I wish the Solicitor General would be, first of all, serious—

Mr. Blais: He is serious.

Mr. Orlikow: —and, second, honest. We are dealing with a Bill which arises out of an investigation which took four years and cost millions of dollars.

Mr. Kaplan: How many of your Members are going to speak?

Mr. Orlikow: That investigation by the royal commission led to a long series of recommendations. It is our contention, Mr. Speaker, and we are supported in this contention by the Civil Liberties Association and many of the Bar Associations and lawyers, that this Bill is somewhat better than the first Bill but it still has major deficiencies.

Mr. Kaplan: So let us take it to committee.

Mr. Orlikow: I say to the Minister, Mr. Speaker, that if the royal commission which his Government appointed could take four years to investigate and to write a report, then it will not be too bad for the people of Canada if we take another day or two to debate this Bill.

Mr. Blais: We started in 1969, do you know that?

Mr. Orlikow: To say that by keeping this Bill going past closing time today we are trying to destroy this Bill is just not true, and the Minister knows it.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I find the remarks of the Solicitor General and his colleague, the former Minister on the front bench, absolutely incredible. This is one of the most important pieces of legislation we could debate. It has never really been debated in the House of Commons.

Mr. Blais: You say that on each piece of legislation.

Mr. Waddell: It has been debated among Liberals, Senator Pitfield and in the Senate, but it has never been debated in the House of Commons where the people's representatives are.

Mr. Blais: You did the same thing on the Crow. On every piece of legislation you do exactly the same thing.

Mr. Waddell: We in the New Democratic Party make no apologies, Mr. Speaker, for not letting the Government get away with things like having 800,000 files on Canadians and opening first-class mail. We are not going to let them railroad the people and we make no apologies.

Mr. Blais: Thirteen per cent in the last poll and that's where you deserve to be.

Mr. Waddell: We are going to continue this debate until hell freezes over, if we have to, until we get the Government to bring in a decent security service which will protect ordinary Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order, please. That is the end of the ten-minute question period. Debate.

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): One would never know this is a Friday afternoon, Mr. Speaker. I believe, Mr. Speaker, it is almost a cliché when someone rises, particularly on second reading, to say how pleased they are to make their contribution and how much they welcome the opportunity to participate in the debate. I do not question for a moment the sincerity of any of us who say that rather repeatedly.

With respect to Bill C-9, the security intelligence Bill, I do not welcome the opportunity to speak. I am not particularly happy about the Bill. I am very concerned and deeply troubled, Mr. Speaker, and, worst of all, I am very uncertain about this legislation.

Mr. Benjamin: There is nothing new about that.

Mr. Jarvis: Someone says there is nothing new about that. No, there is not. There have been other Bills with which I have been troubled, concerned and uncertain and, unhappily, I do not have the perfection of my friends from the New Democratic Party and the divine revelation which comes to them with every piece of legislation.

Mr. Blais: Nor the holiness.

Mr. Jarvis: I believe part of my concern and uncertainty is that this is an extremely important piece of legislation. I would go so far as to suggest that if these times were normal times—by that I mean if they were normal in the economic and social sense, and if we were not in the midst of political events of high priority and high profile—this piece of legislation would have an extraordinary amount of publicity across this country.

Mr. Pepin: When were times ever normal?

Mr. Jarvis: The Minister for External Relations (Mr. Pepin) asks me when were times ever normal. I guess it is like the "ordinary, reasonable man"; it is a piece of fiction. But there are certainly times which approach normality closer than the times in which we now find ourselves.

I suppose that is part of the cause for my concern. My colleague, the Hon. Member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn), put it clearly on the first day of debate when he said that we have "responsibility, as Members of Parliament, to ensure the right balance between national security and the fundamental principles of a free and democratic society". That is a challenge and a serious one. The Minister himself in that same debate, when he opened second reading debate, talked about "the necessary balance between effective national security and the civil liberties which are fundamental to our society".

The seriousness of the challenge is enough for concern, trouble and uncertainty, but I believe my feelings are compounded—and I am trying to put this as kindly as I can, for lack of better words—because I feel we are dealing with tainted legislation. I believe it is tainted in three distinct aspects. One aspect I do not believe is terribly important. It happens to be a fact of political life, and that is the timing of the bill. We all know that in any election year the atmosphere of debate and the approach towards various pieces of legislation takes on an added aura, and that is the election aura. We have seen Bills recently which could be quite legitimately called political bills. They were not substantive in the sense that we regard legislation as substantive; they were political bills. I am not terribly critical. That is a fact of political life. Anyone who has been around here for any length of time will understand that.

However, the two other aspects are much more important with respect to this legislation. They are the history of the legislation and the substance of the legislation and are very much interrelated.

I am happy the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) is here because I am speaking very seriously about this. I would like to take a quotation from his speech on second reading as my starting point. He said:

● (1440)

Bill C-9 is the result of a long and difficult process which began 15 years ago.

It certainly has been long and difficult. Without wishing to nit-pick, I quarrel with his word "process". If you use that word in the broad sense, I suppose it has been a process. But I am afraid there has not been any legislative process and that is part of the problem. What we have had, unhappily—I am not pointing any fingers; I am simply stating what I believe to be an objective view of the facts—is a series of reactions or non-actions. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Blais) interjected a moment ago to the effect that it is 15 years old. Yes, it is 15 years since the Mackenzie report, but that was followed by absolutely nothing. There was no action, not even a reaction. There was absolutely nothing for almost a decade and then the roof fell in.

I remember that well because I had been Solicitor General critic for 11 days when that roof fell in. We remember some very unhappy days in the House during that time which led up to the McDonald Commission. I do not criticize the establishment of that commission; it worked very hard and diligently to produce a very large report. But that was a reaction to the atmosphere in the House after revelation after revelation of alleged wrongdoing. After that commission reported, nothing happened for almost two years. Finally, we had the disaster, unfortunately, of Bill C-157. I do not know who drafted that Bill; I doubt very much the Solicitor General fully appreciated what a mess he was getting himself and the rest of us into with that particular Bill. But again it prompted a reaction, not a process.

Then, Mr. Speaker, a select committee of the Senate was formed. It worked diligently and its report was a damning condemnation. Now we have Bill C-9, a reaction to Senator Pitfield and his colleagues' report from the select committee of the Senate. As I said, it has not been a legislative process as I understand it. A legislative process is nothing more than exercise of government power, which is the right and responsibility to provide a service to the country and its people. It may be a social service, economic or cultural service, or it may be, as in this case, in the field of security.

As I understand the four-step process, Mr. Speaker, the Government examines the need for a new or altered service. That is often triggered by an event, perhaps a dramatic event, or perhaps a cumulative pressure on the Government to do something. It may be a report such as the Mackenzie report, but something happens to trigger that first step. The second step is the Government's diligent examination of the impact or significance of the implementation of the service or change. It may be very minor; a change in a custom's regulation. It could be very major, as I believe is the case with this particular legislation.

The third step is that if there is a major significant impact, then you make sure the public understands it. Before the technical process begins, make sure the public understands it. That can be done in any number of ways, by many vehicles. It could be a discussion or position paper, speeches by the Minister, reference to committee for study; there are all kinds of vehicles to use. I suppose the cliché is: Run it up the flagpole to see if anyone salutes it, or test the waters, or whatever. But it is a very legitimate part of the four-step process. Of course, the final part is to go through the technical process that we find ourselves in now.

With respect to the third part, if I can quote the Minister, who I think was dead on when he was talking about the legal framework, he said:

> We also believe that such a framework cannot be effective unless we have the support and understanding of the public.

Dead on, Mr. Speaker. I completely concur. Unfortunately, I do not think the Minister followed his own advice.

Having put it in that four-step context, I hope the Government and the Minister understand what I mean when I say the Bill is tainted. The first step, the examination of the need for a security intelligence service, I suppose was prompted by the Mackenzie Commission, but nothing happened. Nothing really happened after the McDonald Commission for two years. The second step, the examination of significance or impact, was really skipped, unhappily. We certainly did not have the opportunity to discuss it here in the House. The only discussion up until second reading of Bill C-9, I think, was a couple of hours' debate when the Mackenzie report was tabled some 15 years ago. Absolutely nothing has been done to examine publicly the significance or impact of this legislation. Unhappily, Bill C-157 is proof that there was not a diligent and careful examination of the impact of this legislation.

Those steps were ignored, Mr. Speaker, and where does that leave us? Well, we have to deal with this Bill. I am a little concerned because I am quite sure the Minister was not pressing the House to put this Bill into committee fast. He certainly did not say so on February 10. I commend him for that because every Minister likes his Bill to go through the House and into committee. However, I am starting to detect signs of impatience this afternoon. I do not agree with everything the NDP said, far from it, but in 15 years there has not been any real, legitimate debate on the whole area of security and intelligence. Unfortunately, it is compressed into Bill C-9. I say "unfortunately" in all sincerity. It is unfortunate, but it is a fact. The 15 years of legitimate need for debate is compressed into Bill C-9.

That leads me to a very unhappy position, Mr. Speaker. I now regard some of the statements of the Solicitor General with some suspicion, if not cynicism. I am going to use two or three examples. The Minister said:

> I am convinced that the mandate described in the Bill amounts to the best possible protection of civil liberties in Canada.

I would really like to be able to say: Yes, I agree. However, I am not in that position, not because of the substantive provisions of the Bill but because of the history, the cloud, changing over this. He then goes on to say:

> The Solicitor General will be fully responsible and fully accountable for the security service, as in the present system.

Again I have grave difficulty accepting that statement because I sat here in the pre-McDonald Commission period, as the Solicitor General did although not in that position, and heard more than one Solicitor General deny responsibility. They said: "Oh, that is the day to day operation". Of course the Solicitor General is not responsible for the day to day operations of the RCMP or the security service. Of course not.

Mr. Waddell: Yes, he is.

Mr. Jarvis: But they were so cumulative that they affected the very principle of ministerial responsibility. Therefore, when the Minister makes a statement like the one he made on February 10, given the history of this legislation, how can he with any reasonableness expect me to accept that at face value? I cannot do it because the history leading up to Bill C-9 does not permit me to do that.

Finally, we have the statement:

> The Review Committee will have full access to detailed information on the activities of the service.

We are talking about accountability. I have to say to the Minister that if there is to be accountability, it has to be complete. There is no such thing as being half accountable or partially accountable or even 99 per cent accountable. Unless it is complete accountability, there is no such thing. Unless those Cabinet documents in the possession of the security service are opened to the Inspector General, and through him to the Review Committee, I say there is not accountability. Those documents in the possession of the security service, even though they are classified as a Cabinet document, are likely the most vital documents relating to accountability.

As a result of this it will be heavy going in the committee. However, we have had committees before which were heavy going. I think the Minister and his colleagues on the Treasury benches have to be very flexible about this. I do not think there is any way to avoid giving this committee permission to travel. The historic element, the separation of the proposed force from the traditional RCMP force, dictates that necessity. Given the chequered career that this legislation has had, I see no way around that at all.

I believe it was either the Minister or my colleague for Saskatoon West who spoke about the morale of the force. I am concerned about that, as I think we all should be. While the principle of upholding the morale within the RCMP security intelligence branch is important, it is not as important as the principles of civil liberties and the security of the country. Therefore, while that morale may continue to suffer because of the 15 long and difficult years, I regret it very much but there are other principles which I believe are paramount to that. Those are the principles of the protection of our rights as citizens and the protection of the integrity of our country from those who would seek to attack it. I wish I had more time to deal with the mandate and powers; I know I have not.

Before the Speaker cuts me off, I would like to say that my principal concern is accountability. The Minister has made significant changes from Bill C-157. I am speaking about changes with respect to the operation and powers of the Director. I am a little concerned because the Bill does not correspond with the Senate committee report. I am concerned about the provision that the Minister may issue written directions to the Director. What about oral directions? Should all directions not be in writing? Would this provision create an incentive for the Solicitor General not to reduce his directions to writing? If that became the case I would be concerned.

I am concerned about the establishment of the office of the Inspector General. Unless the Solicitor General follows the recommendations of the Senate committee which would allow the Inspector General access to Cabinet documents within the possession of the security service, accountability sadly suffers. Unless the accountability is 100 per cent, I do not believe it amounts to anything. The Inspector General would be deprived of the directives and documents of a Cabinet nature which he gets from his political superiors, which I believe is most important.

Finally, unless the Inspector General has access to those particular Cabinet documents, the review committee will not. My comments with respect to the Inspector General apply equally, and possibly with greater force, to the review committee.

With respect to the make-up of the review committee, I am not sure whether it is better to have Privy Councillors as compared to those who are now serving in either the House or Senate. I believe the recommended number is three to five Members. I doubt that that is large enough; it may be. The Senate committee in the United States has reasonably good sized membership composed of very senior and prestigious senators in that country. It is very prestigious in the sense that you are judged by your peers to be privy to highly confidential information.

I presume my time is just about up. I have no particular comment to make at the second reading stage with respect to the make-up of that review committee. I think that is something we could deal with in committee. I believe committee stage is absolutely crucial if the Bill is to be rescued. I believe it should be. I believe there should be a security service, either inside the RCMP or outside. The committee stage is going to be absolutely crucial to that.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Hon. Member a question. He has referred to the work of both the Inspector General and the review committee. Does the Hon. Member think it would be important or useful for either of those agencies to have the right, if it is felt necessary, to make public their questions and findings if they find the security service has acted improperly, as the McDonald Commission found the security service of the RCMP had done in earlier years?

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, I believe I read the Bill carefully. I thought there was a provision for the review committee to report to Parliament at least annually, if not more often. I support that reporting principle.

Perhaps the Hon. Member's question is a little broader than that. If a particular incident occurs, should or could the review committee make it public? I would agree to that subject to it not threatening or putting in danger the security of the state.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I do not think anyone would want any information to get out which would endanger security. However, if the Inspector General and the review committee are bound by the oath of secrecy, all they will be able to do is report to the Solicitor General. The Solicitor General can then decide whether to take action. We know from past experience that if Solicitors General knew what was going on they were, to say the least, loath to do anything about it. Surely the right of both of these groups to make public the type of situation which had occurred, although not necessarily the specific details of the act, in order for corrective action to be taken would be a necessary part of an Act which will do the job we want it to do.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, there are two report clauses, Clauses 52 and 53. Clause 54 is a special report section. I would have to read them carefully to discover whether they address the concerns of the Hon. Member. I notice one report must be laid before Parliament on any of the first 15 days on which the House is sitting after the Minister receives it. I do not know whether that will address his particular concern. There are four or five clauses dealing with reports so I really cannot be any more specific than that.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment with respect to the last point which was made by the Hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Jarvis). The Member is quite correct that there is provision in the legislation for reporting to Parliament. The difficulty with that, as was pointed out by my colleague from Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), is that before this report is tabled in Parliament the Inspector General of the civilian security servie must vet the report. It is up to the Inspector General to go through that report with a fine-toothed comb and ensure that in no way is the oath of secrecy of the members of the Security Intelligence Review Committee in any way breached. Therefore, the only document which could possibly come before the House would be a document so meaningless and devoid of any content that it would not be able to draw attention to any wrongdoing which had been identified.

Perhaps I can ask the Hon. Member a question and then he could comment. The McDonald Commission strongly recommended the establishment of a parliamentary oversight committee, made up of Members on all sides of the House, which would have full access to all of the documentation and the budget of the new civilian security service.

• (1500)

Similar committees are in existence in the Senate and the House of Representatives in the United States, in West Germany and elsewhere. The Hon. Member has considerable experience in this area and I know that he is a former spokesperson for his Party on justice and is an active member of the Justice Committee. I would be most interested to hear his views with respect to this very sensible suggestion of the McDonald Commission. It is a suggestion which unfortunately has been rejected in this Bill.

Mr. Jarvis: With respect to the comment about the fact that the report would be meaningless or have nothing in it, to use the Hon. Member's words, I am not so sure that I would be so quick to prejudge what that type of report would be. I am quite prepared to discuss and debate that in committee, which I believe is the place to do it. My opinion is quite flexible in that respect.

With respect to his second point, it is quite difficult to say who should be the watcher of watchers. The Minister proposes a committee of Privy Councillors. On the other hand, it was proposed by either McDonald or Mackenzie to have a watchdog committee composed of Members, as it is in the United States. A few years ago I would have opted for Members, without question. Now, as I approach the exalted status of being nothing more than a Privy Councillor, whenever the election occurs, my opinion of Privy Councillors is starting to go up. However, I do not want to be facetious. On balance, I believe I prefer the recommendation of the McDonald Commission. I regret that I am not on the particular committee that will be studying this, but I would be quite prepared to discuss the two alternatives at committee stage.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Jarvis) a question. He has followed this entire issue as critic and now as a member of the Loyal Opposition responsible for this legislation. He has shown a great deal of interest in this particular legislation and knows full well how controversial and sensitive it has been. The questions which he has been asked today in terms of the content of his address have been basically directed to matters that can be dealt with in committee. In view of those facts and the fact that the security service now is basically in limbo as a result of the legislation being introduced and the uncertainty in view of the NDP's attitude toward the passage of this legislation, would he not agree that it is time that we proceeded to send this Bill to committee so that the matter can be dealt with there very thoroughly, and that the committee should take as much time as it requires to deal with all the specific items that are still controversial and need to be resolved?

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, the short answer has to be no. I might comment that I am not responsible for our Party—

Mr. Blais: You should be.

Mr. Jarvis: The Minister says I should be. I should be the Minister of National Defence, but the fact is that I am not.

To deal seriously with what the Minister of National Defence puts to me, the short answer, regrettably, is no. The reason is that during 15 years—the Minister is well aware of this, having served as Solicitor General—there has not been public debate on this in the House. The only occasion was when the Mackenzie report was tabled. I believe the debate lasted either two hours or four hours.

The Government side may not like the quality of the debate. That is unfortunate. The quality of the contributions may not be of what it thinks are acceptable standards, but who are we to judge our colleagues? If there remains room for legitimate concern and for positive contributions at second reading stage, then I do not believe that we should be in a hurry to send the Bill to committee. I emphasized the committee stage because I thought there was an enormous amount of work to do there. I think the Minister of National Defence implied in his question that he agrees that there is an enormous amount of work to do.

I will not use the usual vehicle of blaming the Government for holding off the legislation this long, but now we are at this stage I do not think I would tip my hand, were I the Solicitor General or a Member of the Government, by trying to push it through second reading stage too quickly. Often that results in its going more slowly than quickly. That has been my experience.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, a number of comments have been made in the House regarding the committee stage and the fact that the committee should have the right to travel. As well, the Senate committee did hold extensive hearings but did not travel, which meant that only those who could afford to come here did so. Has the Hon. Member heard the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) indicate a willingness to have the committee travel?

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, no, I have not heard the Solicitor General's opinion on that. I alluded to it during my contribution to the debate, perhaps too quickly. I merely thought it was absolutely essential that the committee travel. For example, those of us from Ontario are not sufficiently aware of the historic roots of the RCMP in western Canada to be as sensitive as we should. Taking the security service outside of the RCMP may cause fellow Canadians in other provinces, particularly in the West, grave concern. It may be an emotional concern. An emotional concern is a legitimate concern. I do not know how the committee can possibly discharge its responsibilities without being empowered to travel.

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to be able to add a few words of wisdom to the debate this afternoon on Bill C-9, the successive Bill to Bill C-157 that was dealt with in the last session of Parliament and gone over in some detail by the Senate committee.

When we look at the question with which we are faced today, namely the establishment of an independent Canadian Security Intelligence Service, we will see that there has been a gestation period of considerable length. The idea of a separate service and the idea of a specific Act of Parliament to control activities of a Security Intelligence Service goes back to sometime before the 1969 report of the Mackenzie Commission. It has been around that long. Very good recommendations were made on this subject by the McDonald Commission. I understand that it published its findings in 1981. There has been some debate in Parliament. It certainly has been a matter that has come up from time to time in Question Period. It has been on the minds of parliamentarians both in the House and the other place for some time. It has been a subject of comment in the press for a number of years. It has also been a matter of debate within the Department of Justice, within the interior works of Government, and I have known some of the people in the Department of Justice who have been involved in bringing this legislation forth. I should like to compliment them on the work they have done in this regard.

While handing out compliments, I think some could be validly paid to our colleagues in the Senate whose committee did some excellent work on the old Bill C-157. We can thank them for the improved form that we have today.

As we debate this issue and study it, as public concerns are raised and debated, it seems that we are proceeding to some kind of general consensus on what type of Security and Intelligence Service would serve us best in Canada.

I would like to examine some of the issues, a non-exhaustive list of them but nevertheless issues which I would consider to be important ones which are addressed in this Bill, as they should be because they are certainly important when it comes to security work.

First, the security agency should operate under the rule of law. Unfortunately, this has not always been the case in the past, as the McDonald Commission has brought to light. Unfortunately, from time to time a security agency of the type that we envisage and of the type which exists presently in Canada and elsewhere in the world would have to do things that are normally outside of the law. So what we must build into the Bill, which I believe is there in large measure, although it will be examined again in committee, is some judicial control over actions which may become necessary in the best interests of Canada.

As I understand it, under this Act, if the security service would want to tap a telephone, open mail, or do any of these other things to which we have a natural repugnance but which may be necessary, it would have to seek judicial consent and get itself some kind of warrant. I hope that when such warrants are issued by some members of the judiciary they will not be blanket warrants. We do not want anything of the nature of a writ of assistance, which fortunately we are going to be rid of. Such warrants would give specific authority to do certain specific things within a certain specified time period. I hope that when judges are requested and give permission for these types of things to happen, they will be very cognizant of what they are doing and will be very careful and insist on having presented to them sufficient facts to justify the granting of such permission before they give that permission.

The second issue I would like to speak about briefly is the protection of the general public against possible abuse by the security service. In this imperfect world, even in a non-militaristic country like Canada—and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Blais) knows how non-militaristic we are—there is a need for a security service. I hope it will be of a passive nature rather than an active nature, by which I mean that we would not go to other countries ferreting out their secrets. In other words, I hope it will operate within Canada and it will be a counter-espionage sort of organization instead of one that actively promotes espionage and related activities.

We need such a service, but it must not be allowed to get out of hand. I personally do not share in a paranoia of members of the New Democratic Party, Mr. Speaker. I have a reasonable degree of confidence in officialdom in Canada. I know that often this is not a popular thing to say and that it is something that we on this side of the House very seldom say, but by and large the police in Canada, the existing security service within the RCMP, do a pretty good job, I think, and honest, law-abiding Canadians do not have much to fear from them. However, from time to time things do go wrong. There must be guidelines for the conduct of security officers laid down in the Act that is to govern them. There must be constant surveillance of the agents themselves to see they do not breach or use in excess the powers given to them. There must be a recourse for a person who feels he or she is wrongfully being investigated. Maybe they feel they have been harassed. There must be a recourse where they can go for a redress to their grievances. What we are saying here is that there must be a system of review.

I am pleased to see that a system of review is built into the Bill. It is a fairly sophisticated system of review. I hope that when this matter is studied in committee we can improve it even more, because it is of fundamental importance. One of the mechanisms for the protection of individuals in the Bill would be the establishment of the office of Inspector General. The Inspector General must have available to him or her full powers to question officers within the service. The Inspector General must have access to documents and files within the security service. He must not be impeded in any way from conducting his or her activities of supervising the security service. Maybe supervising is wrong because that is, of course, the responsibility of the director, but perhaps keeping tabs on the security service and keeping tabs on the director of the security service.

I personally like the idea of the Security Intelligence Review Committee. It is a very novel and interesting concept, having a committee of Privy Councillors who are not Members of Parliament either in this House or in the other place. It has never been tried before in this context or in other contexts as far as I know. It certainly has things to recommend it. I hope this is an idea that will be studied in detail in committee. We need to study the number, whether three or five or whatever number is sufficient. I am not adverse to trying out this idea of a committee of Privy Councillors to whom complaints can be made and who will receive the report of the Inspector General and report to Parliament on how the operation of the security service is going.

We must have built into the Bill accountability to Parliament. It must be the Minister who is accountable to Parliament. That goes without saying, Sir. I hope that parliamentarians will always have the opportunity to question the responsible Minister on the operations of the security service that reports to Parliament through him.

When we look at the review mechanisms that have been carefully incorporated into the Bill, the most important thing is that it will all depend upon the quality of the people who are appointed to these positions. We can be very, very careful on paper. It can seem like a system incapable of failure, but unless we appoint the right people to the right jobs, then of course anything can fail, and no matter how well we draft the Bill, there is always the danger that the finer points of the law will not be kept and that it could slide downhill.

It will be most important who gets the job as director of the organization, who becomes the Inspector General and who makes up the committee. They will have to be people we can trust and I mean by that Canadians as a whole. They must be people in whom Canadians can have confidence. When I see some of the appointments that have been made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and Members of his Government I have cause for concern. I get kind of scared as to who might get these jobs that are so important to Canadians. I am sure many other Canadians share that fear.

Another issue is that the NDP has made the right of dissent its sole and most important objection to this Bill. We in Canada have always enjoyed the right of dissent. As a Member of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, I am very jealous of the right of dissent and would not want it to disappear. It would accord hon. gentlemen opposite after the next election the same right of dissent which we on this side presently enjoy. The people of Canada must have and maintain the right to seek a change in government or a change in the social or economic order of Canada through peaceful and constitutional means. Of course they must not resort to subversion or go against the Constitution of Canada, but they must have the right to seek change through peaceful and constitutional means free of harassment by officialdom.

I would now like to refer to the principal issue in this Bill. It is the most important and most talked about by the man on the street. I am referring to whether or not we should have an independent security agency and not use the RCMP as we do at the present time. It was the recommendation of both Mackenzie and McDonald that there be an independent agency. In fact, most countries of the world have independent agencies. Of that there is no doubt. When talking to experts in this field, I have found that they invariably point out the basic difference between police work proper and security work. The latter, security work, is very much intelligence gathering as opposed to strictly law enforcement. I am pleased to see, however, that when it comes time for charges to be laid under the Official Secrets Act or perhaps under the Criminal Code, the RCMP will be brought in to do that, which is quite correctly police work. This is a proposal under the Bill.

Despite some bad examples, it is my opinion that the security service of the RCMP has done a pretty good job over the years. Therefore, there is no great and immediate urgency to change. It might be desirable that we do so, and I am quite prepared to discuss that. However, unlike the Minister of National Defence, I do not think it is something which has to be done today, tomorrow or a week hence. We could continue for a period of some time to debate this matter.

Then I come to the principal difficulty of getting this concept of an independent agency across to the public of Canada. We have a Bill which makes a good deal of sense, if one chooses to read it. It is something which should be discussed and has considerable merit. However, the public of Canada just does not trust the present Government; it has no confidence in the present Government. However, it has confidence in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The public of Canada is used to the force and has generally received good service from it. That is not something which could be said about the Government. Therefore, any proposed change in security matters by the present Government of Canada is rejected out of hand by the Canadian population because of the distrust which exists. If we look at the horror stories in the Department of National Revenue, we know that the Government has lost control of that Department. We hope that it will never lose control of the security agency. If we look at the attitude of people within that Department of Government, if we look at the complaints system when citizens are ajudged to be guilty unless they can prove themselves to be innocent at great expense to themselves, when we see those types of things going wrong within a Government Department under the jurisdiction of the hon. gentleman opposite, then we cannot help but think that the people of Canada are reluctant to agree with any proposed change in security matters when the people over there still exist as the Government.

My conclusion therefore is that there are some very good points in the Bill. It deserves additional debate. I would like to see at least some of its recommendations come into force, but the timing is wrong because Canadians do not trust the Government which is in office today; they do not trust the Liberal Government. Before this Bill can be made into law and put into force with the consent of the Canadian public, we must change the Government.

Mr. Kristiansen: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Hon. Member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson) a question. He went on at some length to express his confidence that any civilian Canadian security and intelligence agency would not exceed its bounds. Also he stated that some Canadians might be surprised at that statement. However, I must say that that statement was, to say the least, rather odd in view of the tremendous furor which he and his Conservative colleagues raised over what they called the recent covert activities of staff in the Office of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in spying and engaging in "dirty tricks" investigations of Opposition politicians. Is he now saying that he and his colleagues at that time were just playing the game of Trivial Pursuit in the House? If that is not what he is saying, on what does he base his current statement of faith and confidence in the Government and its agencies that they will not tamper with the right of their legitimate political opposition, which his Party suggested was the case only a few days ago?

I do not share that kind of suspicion but I would suggest to him—and I hope he bears it in mind in his answer—that it is not enough to have confidence in the Government and its agencies in these kinds of areas in normal times. We must design our laws in such a way that if we get into abnormal times such as we did at the time of the so-called FLQ crisis, we still have safeguards in the law to protect us from abuses which any government is tempted to commit in times of severe stress.

My main question to him is: Were they engaging in Trivial Pursuit just a few weeks ago? If not, on what does he base his current statement of faith in the activities of the Government and its agencies?

Mr. Nickerson: Mr. Speaker, I certainly did not say that I had any faith in the Government. If by that he meant the hon. gentlemen sitting on the Treasury benches, I have very little faith in them. What I said was that by and large I think we have a very competent and honest bureaucracy in Canada. Most people I have met during my daily rounds, both as a Member of Parliament and before coming to this House, whether they serve in the passport office or are employees of the Department of National Health and Welfare, try to do a good job for the people of Canada. It does not mean to say that there are not some exceptions. I went to considerable length in my dissertation this afternoon to point out that when it comes to police and security matters, there must be built into the legislation which governs the activities of these types of departments and agencies something more and something special so that the interests of the citizens to be able to engage in dissenting activities in order to press for change, political or otherwise, should not be hampered. I thought I dealt with that in great detail.

It would appear that my own view and that of the Hon. Member for Kootenay West (Mr. Kristiansen) on this matter are not at all widely divergent. We would seem to be of very much one and the same mind on this issue.

I turn to the shenanigans to which the Hon. Member referred which were going on a week or so ago. These were conducted not by the ordinary government employee who is non-partisan and non-political and whose job is administration. These activities were engaged in by employees of the Prime Minister's Office, an office which is right at the top of the hierarchy. Unfortunately, we can see the rot setting in, and the rot is setting in from the top. I do not like or approve of the things that went on in the Prime Minister's Office, but I do not think that it is the normal, average bureaucrat, public servant in Canada, who is responsible for that type of insidious activity.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I suppose that some of the same rot that has set in must have seeped across the way to the offices of the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Mulroney). Of course, the same kinds of files were found in his office, and in fact in much greater quantity.

I would like to ask a very straightforward question of the Hon. Member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson). Does the Hon. Member in fact support the recommendations of the McDonald Commission for a civilian security service as opposed to maintaining the security service within the structure of the RCMP?

Mr. Nickerson: Mr. Speaker, generally speaking, as I pointed out in my presentation, I approve of that move. However, as I was at great pains to point out, the timing is wrong because it is impossible to do this with the concurrence of the public when we have in office a Government that just cannot be trusted.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I think I heard the Hon. Member say that the RCMP security service has done a pretty good job over the years. I put this question to the Hon. Member as someone who was a Crown Attorney, who has had many friends who belong to the RCMP and who has respected much of the work done in the general force. In view of the barn burning, the access to files of political Parties and the whole list of illegal acts which have taken place over the years, can the Hon. Member really say that the RCMP security service has done a pretty good job over the years? I put it to the Hon. Member that it seems to me that the acts of the RCMP security service have forced the McDonald Commission almost to succeed in destroying the RCMP—

An Hon. Member: And their political masters.

Mr. Waddell: As my colleague has said, their political masters were involved in this matter as well. I wonder if the Hon. Member really does stand behind the statement that the security service has done a pretty good job over the years. It seems to me that if what went on in the last 10 years in Canada had occurred in the United States, there would have been a revolution against it. It would have been akin to a Watergate scandal, and yet nothing really happened in Canada. Does the Hon. member still stand behind that statement? If he does, it seems to me to be a pretty shallow analysis.

Mr. Nickerson: Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) that in Canada we do not have revolutions, we have royal commissions. It is a much safer way of dealing with things.

Undoubtedly, those things which took place in Quebec, including the barn burning and the surveillance of the Parti Québécois, were not things that were to be desired. This is where the existing system fell down, and I suspect that it fell down because, in this particular case, undue political direction was given to the security branch of the RCMP. However, I still maintain that by and large, over the years, the RCMP has done a reasonable job.

I am not particularly familiar with what goes on in the Province of Quebec, but in my part of the country and other parts of western Canada that I visit from time to time, I very seldom hear complaints from people who have been subjected to abuse by the RCMP security agency. We just do not hear about these things. Apparently they do not happen.

Canada has not been brought to its knees by the activities of subversive agents. That means either that there have been no subversive agents working in Canada or that the RCMP has done a pretty good job and caught them all.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): The question period has expired. I would also like to remind Hon. Members that we are entering a new phase of debate during which Hon. Members' speeches will be limited to 10 minutes and there will be no question period, as provided for in our rules.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I only have 10 minutes to make some remarks about this Bill so I will try to be brief.

Mr. Kristiansen: That's a good idea.

Mr. Waddell: I have to be brief. I would like to make one comment about the attempt on the part of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Blais) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) to stop this debate. I think that that is disgusting. We are finally having a debate on one of the most important issues in contemporary Canada, and they want to hustle it off to a committee which they can control and where they can effectively bury the Bill. Indeed, this week the Solicitor General has been running around the House like a rabbit in heat trying to have us shut up and get this Bill into committee.

It may be unpopular to speak on this Bill, but I would remind the House through you, Mr. Speaker, that some of us on this side of the House remember some very unpopular things which were said by our predecessors. J. S. Woodsworth stood in the House and defended Chinese immigration and argued, against the rest of the House, for the equal treatment of Chinese Canadians. One of my predecessors in the riding of Vancouver-Kingsway, Angus MacInnis, stood up alone in the House against a tidal wave of opinion to defend Japanese Canadians. Grace MacInnis, a previous Member for Vancouver-Kingsway, stood up and voted against the War Measures Act together with my other colleagues. That took courage and resistance, and those people were proven right in the long run. I think that some of the work the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) has been doing regarding this Bill will serve Canada well as we will get a better security service for it.

There are four things wrong with this Bill, Mr. Speaker. First, there is no parliamentary accountability. Second, the group that is supposed to look at the security service is denied access to Cabinet documents, the kind of documents that are really needed in order to examine the service. Third, the powers of the service are too broad. Fourth, the mandate is too vague. That is what is wrong with the Bill, and that is why we must debate the Bill in principle on second reading.

Let me go over those four points briefly, starting with parliamentary accountability. I do not agree with the two previous speakers who said that it is all right to have a bunch of old Privy Councillors, some of whom are perhaps in their dotage, looking at the security service. It will be accountable to some, mainly Liberal, Privy Councillors, but that does not matter. Those Privy Councillors have probably retired from politics, so let us do it in a contemporary way. Let us put accountability where the United States does. Let us put it into the legislature. Let us have a parliamentary committee. That is why we have a Parliament. Parliament does not exist so that former Privy Councillors may find jobs. Let us have a parliamentary committee that looks at the security service and really makes it accountable.

Second, we must see that that parliamentary committee has access to the same Cabinet documents to which the security service itself has access. We must deal with the type of access to information that the people who will keep the security service accountable will have.

Third, the powers are too broad. I ask Canadians who are watching these proceedings on television whether we want a security service to open up our first-class mail. Do they think that the danger of subversion in Canada is that bad? I do not think it is, and therefore I do not think a security service should have those broad powers.

Fourth, I think the mandate is too vague. My colleagues have said that this will open up the possibility of looking into legitimate groups, such as church groups, peace groups and so on, or even looking on the left and on the right. The Peter Worthingtons will be looked at just as much as the groups on the left. That is the history of what the security service has been doing in Canada. It is shown in the McDonald Commission. The evidence is there, Mr. Speaker.

The Solicitor General of Canada is a chicken. He has 800,000 files on average Canadians and he is afraid to tear up those files and get rid of them. What is he waiting for? If he had any guts, he would do that. He is a wishy-washy chicken. He has no guts to do that. Here he comes into the House now. He is gutless. He has been running around, but he should have been fired because of this Bill. He should have been fired for the way he brought in this Bill.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I have a question of privilege.

Mr. Waddell: You will get a chance to speak.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): The Hon. Minister rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I am astonished to hear the Hon. Member call me gutless on the grounds that he did. Naturally he is entitled to call me—

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There is no question of privilege. I have 10 minutes to speak.

Mr. Kaplan: —whatever he likes but the fact is—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order, please. May I remind the hon. gentlemen that we cannot entertain a point of order on top of a question of privilege. We will hear the question of privilege first.

Mr. Waddell: There is no question of privilege.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask that the Hon. Member withdraw the allegation that I am gutless. He knows perfectly that that file destruction is well under way and that hundreds of thousands of files have already been destroyed. I have reported that in the House.

Mr. Benjamin: May I see my file?

Mr. Kaplan: Can you read?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order, please. The Chair is of the opinion that the Hon. Solicitor General has made his point. Certainly the term used is not very polite, but I doubt whether it falls within the realm of unparliamentary language.

May I remind the Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) that he may well continue his speech but he might try to make it a bit less inflammatory.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, let me just say that the Minister lacks intestinal fortitude.

Where is the proof? The Minister brought in a most flawed Bill. It is amazing that he was not fired because of it. He kept his job by getting Senator Pitfield to bail him out. The Bill is still flawed, and that is what we are trying to point out.

There is no mandate in the Bill that is defined properly. We can still have the point of opening files on Canadians; we can still have the point of looking into peace groups and other groups, and that has been pointed out by my colleagues in the House. There has been no real coming to grips with the crucial difference between dissent and surveillance. Indeed, that is the whole problem.

There are four points, then, Mr. Speaker. There is no parliamentary accountability; there is denial of access to the proper files to have that accountability; the powers are too broad in the Bill; and the mandate is too vague.

I have never seen the question of whether the country really needs a security service properly debated in the House, Mr. Speaker. The world has the FBI, the NKVD and its successor the KGB, and the RCMP security service. What are these groups really doing? I should like to suggest that they do not spend their time in surveillance of criminals and subversives. We have the Criminal Code for that in this country. We have the ordinary services of the police, but we have created these crazy bureaucracies that go out to do nothing but get files on people. That is why the debate is so important today.

I do not speak for my Party now, Mr. Speaker, because the views of this Party are quite clear; the Party is on record as wanting a security service but giving it a defined mandate. I raise the question of why we have security services at all? Is Canada really so insecure? Do we really have all these secrets that we need this kind of agency?

I should like to put something on the record, Mr. Speaker, which I think applies here. I read as follows:

> It was a bright cold day in April, and the clocks were striking thirteen. Winston Smith, his chin nuzzled into his breast in an effort to escape the vile wind, slipped quickly through the glass doors of Victory Mansions, though not quickly enough to prevent a swirl of gritty dust from entering along with him.

In the next paragraph this appears:

> The flat was seven flights up, and Winston, who was thirty-nine and had a varicose ulcer above his right ankle, went slowly, resting several times on the way. On each landing, opposite the lift-shaft, the poster with the enormous face gazed from the wall. It was one of those pictures which are so contrived that the eyes follow you about when you move. BIG BROTHER IS WATCHING YOU, the caption beneath it ran.

That, of course, is from Orwell's 1984. We are in 1984—

Mr. Kaplan: Cheap shot.

Mr. Waddell: It is not a cheap shot. The whole basis of the debate is how much we want to restrict Big Brother. If we want to make sure that Big Brother is not going to watch us and that we are not going to create that kind of society where we have a "Minister of Love," and so on—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): I am sorry to interrupt the Hon. Member but his time has expired.

Mr. Waddell: Perhaps I could finish, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): The Hon. Member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick).

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to participate briefly in the debate mainly because of my concern about one aspect of the procedure we are going through. The Bill was introduced first in the Senate as Bill C-157 and it received quite a thorough analysis in Ottawa by a committee of the Senate. The witnesses who appeared were those who could afford to come here and make their presentations.

A Bill to establish a security service has been discussed for 10 or 15 years. There were two royal commissions to study it, and then the Government introduced Bill C-157 in the Senate. That Bill was roundly criticized and partially condemned, and the Government withdrew it. Now it has introduced a revised version, taking into consideration many of the recommendations made in the Senate. The Bill has been modified, changed and vastly improved, but still I think there is room for more improvement.

Since the Bill has the potential of invading Joe Citizen's life in any corner of the country, has the potential to investigate political Parties and political activities, has the potential to look into areas that we would prefer to think were not being looked into, I think it must be considered very carefully and must receive a great deal of support from all Canadians.

I believe that there is no doubt that we need a security service. Every country has a form of service which tries to protect the way of life it has established. We have had one for some years. It has erred and has had problems from time to time, but by and large it has done some good work for us. To win overwhelming support for a security service, whether it be a civilian service or one within the RCMP, I think the committee must travel to various parts of the country and listen to citizens and groups and lobbying organizations which cannot afford to come to Ottawa, to the other Chamber with the red carpet. If we really want to understand average Joe Q citizen's views, then the committee must have the right to travel. The Government has refused that request. It claims that while there is a Liberal leadership race going on, it must have its people in Ottawa because it is afraid it might be defeated in the House. I say to the Government that the committee could travel under certain conditions, such as that there would be an equal number of Members from both sides of the House on the committee. In that way the Government will be able to protect itself.

Mr. Kaplan: Do you agree not to defeat us in votes in the House while the committee is travelling?

Mr. Dick: I am suggesting that if you spoke to the House Leader and made a proposal that an equal number of Hon. Members from both sides who would be away would not vote and you would not be defeated because of that committee travelling, I believe that would be a fair thing to suggest. If Hon. Members opposite want to fold up shop and run around like everyone else, not because of that committee's work but because they do not like running the Government any more, or have found they cannot, then I believe that, yes, they deserve to be defeated. The Hon. Member who has already left the House—I hope he is not going to embark in debate from behind the curtain—believes, I feel, that this is a fair offer or suggestion. If the Government wanted to make sure it was not going to be defeated because of that committee's travelling, it could put forward a proposal to make sure the committee had the right to travel but that the Government itself was protected. I believe that is a fair suggestion. I feel we have to have this committee travel. The Government has refused, and I believe that is a mistake. This is far too important a piece of legislation.

I want to hear from more than the Attorneys General of the various provinces. I want to hear from more than the people who can afford to be in Ottawa, the spokespersons for organized groups which have sufficient funds to be able to send them here. I want to hear from the average person and from some of the groups who would not otherwise be able to make a representations in front of the committee. I do not like cutting off representations from the Canadian public. We are here to serve the public. This Bill has the possibility of intruding into the fabric of Canadian life, into the individual's life and into political life, although I am not saying it will do so. However, in looking at certain of the provisions in the Bill, some of which were accepted recommendations from the Senate, there is no doubt that the security service must walk a very narrow tightrope. It will not be comfortable because it may fall off—we hope not very often. I believe that since this is such a potentially intrusive device into the lives of Canadians individuals and legitimate organizations, we have to hear from any person who has that concern.

I feel it will serve the purposes of the Government as well, because the Government would have a chance to explain the real intent of this Bill and it would receive the support, I believe, of the majority of Canadians. If the Government wants the support of Canadians for the Bill, why does it not go out and talk to Canadians and give them an opportunity for input?

Mr. Lorne McCuish (Prince George-Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-9 is an Act to establish the Canadian Security Intelligence Service. I am a layman, Mr. Speaker, and the intricacies of this legislation, in great part, escape me, but I have listened with great interest to everything that has been said from this side of the House. I am a bit disappointed that there has not been more debate from the government side. However, I have great confidence in Hon. Members of this Party who will consider this Bill in great detail in committee. Indeed, I hope that the Government will take heed of what they have to say, because I firmly believe that this Bill is long overdue and that if it is a good Bill when it comes out of committee, it will indeed serve Canada well.

Bill C-9 is a culmination of the work of two commissions of inquiry, of the special committee of the Senate, and it follows Bill C-157. The first of the commissions of inquiry was the royal commission into security, which we know as the Mackenzie Commission. The report of this commission was tabled in 1969 and it was left to gather dust. In 1977 another royal commission was appointed. After four long years, the McDonald Commission created a response to occurrences of the 1970s and was, in great part, related to the activities of the FLQ in Quebec. The McDonald Commission reported in 1981, and following its mandate it made specific recommendations with respect to security matters.

The Government, realizing the importance of this matter, took two years to respond. In May of 1983 the Minister supported the first draft of Bill C-157. Bill C-157, as we know, Mr. Speaker, was a disaster. It was a disgrace in drafting. It certainly was not worthy of presentation. However, I do not share that view as far as Bill C-9 is concerned. The Bill deals with national security. I certainly cannot agree with one of the last speakers that national security is not something which we should worry about or that we should defend against in Canada. The Solicitor General, realizing that Bill C-157 was an impoverished attempt at creating a Security Intelligence Service, referred the matter to the chamber of sober second thought. I do believe that certain members of the Senate performed a yeoman's service in pointing out the fallacies of that piece of proposed legislation.

Specific changes recommended by the Senate committee were vast and far too numerous to go through item by item today. In general terms, Mr. Speaker, the committee attempted to rationalize the mandate of the proposed security service. The Senate committee saw the powers of the security service as being carelessly defined, that the powers were broad and they were ambiguous.

In response to the haphazard definition of the security services' powers, the committee attempted to define clearly what "threats to the security of Canada" were. Thus, there was the recommendation to have the words "strictly necessary" added. The mandate was limited from an overly expansive interpretation to a mandate which gave powers only if "strictly necessary" for the protection of Canada's security. Even in the present Bill there is much protection missing in terms of the tremendous power which any such force will have. Certainly, it is the obligation of this House to consider carefully the legislative proposals which will grant far-reaching powers to the security service; powers, if abused, which will counter all that our political system now stands for. If Canada is to have a security service, it had better define the powers which it will give members of any such force.

Another area of Bill C-157 which the Senate committee attempted to correct can be labelled as accountability. Accountability is a subject which the Government is not well versed in. Whether it be Crown corporations or the proposed security service, the Government seems to regard accountability as a hassle. In the old Bill, ministerial accountability was sadly, but not surprisingly, lacking. The Director of the service, an appointed official, would have prevailed over the Minister. Had Bill C-157 been adopted, Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) would not have been responsible to the elected representatives of the Canadian people for his actions. A lack of accountability of this nature is disturbing in any area of government, but it is reprehensible in an area of such importance.

Naturally, the Senate committee recommended a complete reversal of this lack of accountability. The committee recommended that the service be an "open book" to the Minister, who will consequently have full political responsibility for matters of which he can reasonably be expected to have knowledge.

TRANSPORT

DEVELOPMENT OF RAIL LINES IN NORTHWEST SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of establishing a committee to study the feasibility of expanding the northern transportation options to include the development of a rail line linking communities in northwest Saskatchewan with the main lines in the rest of the Province.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the reason for placing this on the Order Paper is that—

Mr. Pepin: Slush fund.

Mr. Anguish: I see the former Minster of Transport makes fun of it. He should look more closely at the communities this will affect, where there is in excess of 90 per cent unemployment, and 60 per cent of the people who live there are either of Indian or Métis ancestry.

Mr. Pepin: Your halo is slipping.

Mr. Anguish: The reason for putting this on the Order Paper is to try to come to grips with some of the problems of economic development in northwestern Saskatchewan. Since the days of the early fur trade when French and Scottish traders came through the waterways of northern Saskatchewan, the economic situation in that area has become increasingly worse. Traditionally, most of the people who live in that area relied on hunting, fishing and trapping for their livelihood. Their every day activities were an integral part of providing food and shelter for themselves. As time passed, these people found they could no longer rely on fishing, trapping and hunting to provide the every day necessities and a decent standard of living. We now find ourselves in a situation where almost every community in the area affected by this Bill has in excess of 90 per cent unemployment.

As I said to the former Minister of Transport, it also encompasses an area where 60 per cent or more of the population are Indian or Métis people who have not had the high standard of living other people have throughout Canada. I would like the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mrs. Côté) to pay particular attention to what I am proposing, which is to have a committee or group within the Department of Transport look at the socio-economic impact of building a railway in northern Saskatchewan. It would connect communities, such as La Loche, Buffalo Narrows, Beauval, Meadow Lake and south, with the main lines.

I do not know exactly how much this would cost because the Department of Transport does not know what the cost would be. I tried to look into this with the railway companies. However, it would certainly have an impact if the railway were to go ahead and connect those communities I mentioned. In the initial stages it would provide a good number of jobs for people in northern Saskatchewan during the construction phase. A second benefit is that once the line was in place there would be a cheap and economical means of transporting goods in and out of northern Saskatchewan, whether they be manufactured goods coming in or raw materials going out.

I have mentioned that many of the people have traditionally relied on fishing in that part of northern Saskatchewan. However, we find today that commercial fresh water fisheries are almost non-existent in many communities. That is because of the very high transportation costs of getting fish out of places like the Athabasca region and many other areas. By the time fish is taken to the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation plant in Strathcona, in Winnipeg, the transportation costs have not only eaten up the profit, but in some cases there would be a loss by the time the fish is taken to the plant in Winnipeg. I cannot say that I would want a system of branch lines such as is necessary to serve the agricultural communities in Saskatchewan, but at least let us have one main line, with possibly marshalling facilities at La Loche and Buffalo Narrows, so that raw materials from the north could be gathered together and shipped out by cheap and economical means, mainly rail transportation. Right now the air transport costs are prohibitively high, especially in northern Saskatchewan where they use small planes.

Some people might say that the idea is absurd, that there is no need, rationale or precedent for having a railway built in the north. However, I ask those people to examine the other provinces in western Canada. British Columbia has a railway up to the Yukon. Alberta has a railway right into the Northwest Territories. In Saskatchewan the rail line stops around the 52nd or 53rd parallel, at the community of Meadow Lake. That is the northernmost rail line in Saskatchewan. Ontario has a railway which goes right up to Moosonee and Moose Factory on James Bay. Those places are much farther north than the area I speak about in northern Saskatchewan.

The Hon. Member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) mentioned the railway facilities in Manitoba which go up to Churchill, and the grain terminal there. More of our grain from Saskatchewan should be moving through that port than goes out of there right now.

Therefore, if you look at many of the other provinces, especially the larger ones, you will see that they all have railways reaching much farther north, as far as into the Territorial areas, than we do in Saskatchewan.

I think the real need for a railway in that area, Mr. Speaker, is illustrated by the necessity for economic development of the area. As I mentioned, the standard of living has been very low in northern Saskatchewan in the past. In fact, until the early 1970s when the Department of Northern Saskatchewan was established, many of the luxuries we take for granted were non-existent in that part of the province. For example, you would find ten or twelve members of a family living in one-room houses. Water and sewer facilities in many of the communities were non-existent. There was no form of recognized municipal government in many of these communities. When the Department of Northern Saskatchewan was established, it had a responsibility as a geographic department. The one department took care of all services in northern Saskatchewan including education, health, transportation, hydroelectric power, etc. These all fell under the umbrella of the Department of Northern Saskatchewan. That department had many difficulties in its formative years. The new Government in Saskatchewan has seen fit to abolish the department. I think that is sad, even though the services of the Department of Northern Saskatchewan were only a little more expensive than delivering programs and services through the line departments located in Regina. In many of those communities today there is modern housing with water and sewer facilities. New schools were built, making it unnecessary for students to leave their home communities to continue their education in high school. There are health clinics in many of the northern communities now.

The infrastructure which people need for a decent standard of living is there, but the economic development is very much lacking. One of the reasons for this is that there is not a form of transportation available to get raw materials out and manufactured materials back in at a reasonable cost. Companies wishing to locate a mine in northern Saskatchewan, or to be involved in another kind of economic venture, cannot do so because the transportation costs are incredibly high. If the railway was there, perhaps the transportation costs would be reduced to such an extent as to give an incentive to companies to develop some of the vast resources contained in northern Saskatchewan.

I hope the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Flis) will take this proposal to the Department of Transport and that it will look at the socio-economic impact of such a project. I would ask them first to consult with the local communities. Instead of consultation with local people taking place in the remote areas of Canada, often orders seems to have been passed down from up high. Many problems can be overcome with local consultation. Local consultation on a program such as this would be very helpful so as to overcome some of the stumbling blocks.

I suspect that a railway in northern Saskatchewan linking the communities I have already mentioned, would be very advantageous. I do not know that for a fact, Mr. Speaker, because the people in northern Saskatchewan do not have the resources to do a socio-economic analysis of what would happen if a railroad were built in the north. This would cost more money and take more resources than I myself or the local people have the ability or time to put together. I believe the Department of Transport has the mandate and responsibility to consider this as a concept which would work better than what is now in place there to alleviate the economic disparities in that area of Canada. If the Department of Transport would study this proposal and then point out to me and to the people of northwestern Saskatchewan valid reasons why a project like this could not proceed, we would honour that. If it can document reasons why a railway in northwestern Saskatchewan is not possible, we would like to opportunity to refute its arguments.

I ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport to present this idea to the Department. I am not playing a political game or trying to force the Department to go ahead with something. I am asking the Department to study the socio-economic impact of building a railway in northwestern Saskatchewan. Give us the opportunity to consider this to determine whether it would be of benefit to the country and, more particularly, to the people of northwestern Saskatchewan, who in many cases are in dire straits and want something to happen. If this will bring about better social and economic conditions, I plead with the Parliamentary Secretary to help us out in this instance.

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the Hon. Member for Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish) for taking advantage of this private Member's Hour and bringing in his motion. However, upon reading the motion that, in the opinion of this House, the Government should consider the advisability of establishing a committee to study the feasibility of expanding the northern transportation options to include the development of a rail line linking communities in northwest Saskatchewan with the main lines in the rest of the province, I could not believe the motion in front of us today.

For the last two years, Mr. Speaker, that Hon. Member and that Party did everything in the book to prevent the passage of the Western Grain Transportation Act, Bill C-155. You know as well as I do, Mr. Speaker, the antics they pulled off in the House over the last year in attempting to prevent the passage of Bill C-155. Today the Hon. Member has the gall to bring in this motion asking the Government to set up a committee to improve the railway transportation system in Saskatchewan. What was Bill C-155 all about? Why all the opposition? He now presents a motion asking the Government to set up a committee to give him rail transportation in Saskatchewan. He should have been the first one supporting Bill C-155, the Western Grain Transportation Act. That Act heralded a whole new era in expanding transportation options in the West, which is what he is asking for. We have entered a new era in which the Government is committed to helping western producers, including the western producers from the region he is speaking about, to meet their objectives—

Mr. Anguish: They do not even grow grain up there. You do not know what you are talking about.

Mr. Flis: —of improving grain transportation and getting things from the market back to the farms. He is talking about bringing in tourism farther north. We heard screams about how these communities will die out one after the other. As the farmers' incomes increase, the economy of Saskatchewan will improve.

• (1620)

I was out in Humboldt-Lake Centre not long ago, opening up the airstrip there. I asked the people there how they had been affected by the recession. They asked, "What recession?". They did not even feel the recession. While that Member and his Party were pulling off their antics, trying to prevent the improvement of the rail transportation system in the West, especially in Saskatchewan, this Government made a commitment and brought in a new era marked by investment in the new railway facilities and equipment to expand freight capacity and provide better service. It is a new era providing first class service to the people in the Hon. Member's province. Did we get any co-operation from him? No, not one ounce of co-operation. It is no wonder that their position in the polls is what it is today. They are completely out of touch with the grass-roots people.

The increased revenues for the producers in Saskatchewan will have a positive effect on the communities in that province. He will discover that the farmers themselves and the people in Saskatchewan will come out with more innovative approaches—

Mr. Anguish: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There is something called relevancy of the speeches. I would like to point out that the area I am talking about does not have one kernel of grain. It has nothing to do with the political arguments that the Hon. Member is trying to make. If he will not address the topic, I ask you to call on him to be relevant or not speak at all.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): It is the opinion of the Chair that the Hon. Member may not be dealing with all details of the motion, but the motion is quite broad. It is the Chair's opinion that the Hon. Member is at least in the same ballpark.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, I asked the page to bring me a map of Saskatchewan prior to my rising to speak. He was kind enough to do so and, interestingly, the page who brought me the map happens to come from Blaine Lake, quite close to the area which the Hon. Member is talking about, near Battleford and a little south of Meadowlake. The Hon. Member's motion deals with a rail line joining the main rail lines. That is exactly what I am getting to. How much more relevant can I get?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): May I remind the Hon. Member that the use of displays in the House is not permitted.

Mr. Anguish: That map doesn't even show the area I am talking about.

Mr. Flis: While the Hon. Member is dreaming of some pie in the sky rail lines, this Government has already acted. I might remind the Hon. Member that Saskatchewan has one of the best networks of highways of any province in Canada. Perhaps the solution to the problem he is trying to solve may not be a rail line but other modes of transportation, which I think he should consider. There are busses which run cheaply. There are air services that the Government provides to outlying communities. If he were to look at a more multimodal approach to helping the constituency in his area, he might get much further than he is today.

For almost a decade the federal and Saskatchewan Governments have co-operated in measures to assist in the development of northern Saskatchewan. We have made substantial progress, particularly in the improved level of community services and transportation. However, with a major reduction in resource development and the possibility that new resources will not be identified in the foreseeable future, both Governments are concerned as to the economic development opportunities which could now be available to the northern communities. To this end, the Government has proposed the development of a memorandum of understanding in northern economic development by mid-1984. I believe this should be of interest to the Hon. Member with respect to his motion. The agreement would essentially identify ways of improving the co-ordination and existing federal and provincial programs in northern Saskatchewan.

A subsidiary agreement is also proposed to support northern economic development. Under this initiative, three priority areas have been identified for possible implementation during 1984-85. One priority area is resource development and exports. This is something the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) stressed in his latest Budget.

Another priority area is strategic economic diversification, where initiatives are intended to develop service opportunities.

The third priority area seeks to improve the participation of native peoples, including residents of northern Saskatchewan, and the opportunities and benefits of economic development.

In keeping with our historic concern and involvement with transportation in the Athabasca region of northwestern Saskatchewan, the federal Government has directed its efforts toward maintaining transportation services as is economically feasible while meeting the immediate needs of the communities. These are the very communities to which the Hon. Member is referring.

This has involved extensive consultation with residents of the region as well as with the Governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan. Two principal options emerged. The first one was the winter road. Each year the Saskatchewan Government, as I mentioned, has been providing a winter road from Cluff Lake to Uranium City, thus linking this part of northern Saskatchewan with the rest of the provinces' highway network. Again I must stress that its highway network is second to none in Canada. The federal Government will be most happy to consider any reasonable, well-defined and well-justified proposal from the Saskatchewan Government. Until then, we understand that the Saskatchewan Government will maintain, at least for the current year, a winter road from Cluff Lake to Uranium City.

The other principal option was the marine mode. One consideration for the federal Government was to restructure marine transportation services on the Athabasca system. Everyone will agree that the marine services were of much value in the past. Notwithstanding the fact that with the closing of Uranium City, traffic has reduced considerably, a marine service in some form remains most strategic in meeting the remaining communities' needs.

Based on cost analysis, the Government recommended establishing a marine terminal tug and barge service at Fitzgerald, on the Slave River in Alberta. This meant that the tug and barge service out of Fort McMurray would be discontinued, thus alleviating the need to maintain the dredging program for the Athabasca River. During the ensuring consultation with both the Province of Alberta and Saskatchewan, a general consensus was reached for the federal Government to build a new tug and barge docking facility near Fort MacKay in Alberta, north of Fort McMurray on the Athabasca River. With the choice of Fort MacKay as the new barge terminal, a six-year program of reducing dredging by Public Works Canada will go into effect between Fort MacKay and Lake Athabasca. The number of navigational aids will be reduced on the Athabasca River to conform to the decrease in marine activity.

This continuation of the federal Government's dredging and navigational aids program will significantly reduce the potential negative cost impact on most area residents. The tug and barge service out of Fort McMurray will be terminated, along with the dredging on the Athabasca River between Fort McMurray and Fort MacKay.

As announced on February 28, the federal Government believes that with the new marine transportation service out of Fort MacKay and with the provincial Government's support, the transportation cost to consignees will be minimized and regional economic development will be encouraged. Any savings to Transport Canada as a result of these changes will be available to develop other regional transportation facilities in the Athabasca system.

Traditionally, the federal Government has played a very active role in the development of rail transportation services in Canada's northern communities. However, the geographic location, sparse settlement and great distances between populated areas in northwestern Saskatchewan make this region a high cost area to service, based essentially on community needs. This precludes, at least at this time, the development of further rail links with the rest of the Saskatchewan rail system until the resource potential is clearly identified to justify such an undertaking. We do not need a committee to determine that. That has already been well established.

Of course, it would be possible to construct a railway from the end of the existing railway network to Athabasca or that vicinity. This line, approximately 600 kilometres long, would be extremely expensive to construct. At approximately $625,000 per kilometre, I think we must ask ourselves if the federal Government and the people of Saskatchewan can afford those types of costs. It should not be forgotten that it would also be necessary to upgrade the existing railway network from Meadow Lake to Prince Albert. This is a distance of 166 kilometres at a cost of $300,000 per kilometre. Such a line would be justified only if there were proven mineral deposits, such as those at Pine Point, Alberta, or in the Flin Flon region. Without proven deposits and a market for these products, it would be pointless to consider further extension to the continental railway network, which is what the motion is requesting.

We must remember, Mr. Speaker, that the provinces also play an important role in providing intra-provincial or local transportation services to their residents. Needless to say, the federal Government wishes to see the residents of these northern Saskatchewan communities receive the most efficient and convenient transportation service possible.

I would like to sum up by pointing out that a great deal of effort has been expended and much more will be required to ensure that transportation services in northern areas are sufficient to meet the demands of those requiring them. The provision of rail services, like any other mode of transport, has to be considered in the light of freight and passenger demand, or the number of industries or other facilities that would benefit.

The Hon. Member did not outline to this Chamber whether he was more interested in passenger service for those northern outlying regions, or whether he was more interested in freight service. Again I would remind the Hon. Member that next time there is an important Bill in front of this House, such as Bill C-155, he should think very carefully about the constituents he represents before he tries to pull the kind of stunt he did in trying to block Bill C-155.

Mr. Anguish: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Could I have unanimous consent of the House to put a couple of points on the record and to ask a couple of brief questions concerning the barging system? I have just received notice from the Minister of Transport, (Mr. Axworthy) about the barging system from Fort McKay. I appreciate that. I would like to ask a couple of questions of the Parliamentary Secretary, if I could.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Posing questions at this period in our proceedings is not proper. However, if the Hon. Member is asking for unanimous consent, that can be done. Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): The Hon. Member does not have unanimous consent. I recognize the Hon. Member for the Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson).

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, just listen to that applause. This will be a very popular presentation, I can see that.

It is a great pleasure to support my good friend, the Hon. Member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish) this afternoon. He did not support me on occasions when I have been trying to get transportation links established in my area, but I am magnanimous and I have no hesitation at all in supporting him in his bid to get better transportation services for the people he represents in northwestern Saskatchewan. This is certainly a change in viewpoint for the NDP. The New Democratic Party has never before seemed to have been concerned with northern transportation issues. Where was the Hon. Member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake when Tom Berger was running up and down the Mackenzie Valley trying to do his thing, doing his evil deeds?

Mr. Anguish: I was in high school.

Mr. Nickerson: —the pipeline that should have been built down the Mackenzie Valley, the part of the country I have the honour to represent, would have done the same thing for us there. It would have increased economic development. It would have provided jobs, and it would have helped the same type of population that he has in his area as would his proposed rail line in Saskatchewan. However, at the time the NDP would not give support to that proposal, excellent as it was. Tom Berger and his accomplices were going up and down the Mackenzie Valley trying to garner votes for the NDP. They were telling people they did not want economic development, they did not need transportation, they should live in the bush and in tents, they should set traps for a living and set nets and they were not going to be part of modern Canada. That is what the NDP was saying just a few years ago.

I am very pleased to see that the NDP members are now having a change of heart, at least the more advanced NDP members from Saskatchewan. Maybe the B.C. NDP is still way back in the 19th century where it always was.

I am going to support the Hon. Member, but I am also going to make an observation. I was in Saskatchewan not that long ago. Saskatchewan had an NDP Government then. It had an NDP Government for eons before that. That is what I was told. Why did the NDP Government of Saskatchewan, like British Columbia that has a provincial railway going to the north, like Alberta that developed the Alberta Resources Railway and like the Province of Ontario which has a railway going to the Hudson Bay area, not take the slightest bit of interest in transportation routes in the north of that province during the many years it was in office? That NDP Government shared in part of the Berger-NDP-B.C. mentality which did not want to do anything and did not care whether or not the people living in those areas starved to death. Anyway, as I have said I am very pleased there has been a change of heart.

I think it is an excellent idea to encourage transportation links such as proposed by the Hon. Member. In looking at the map of Saskatchewan and the adjoining part of the Province of Alberta, it would appear to me that there is a natural rail link transportation route—a natural corridor—which links the existing railway at Meadow Lake to the existing railway at Waterways, Alberta. This line could go through, as the Hon. Member suggests, La Loche and Buffalo Narrows. It would not be that long or that expensive a line. It is not like building a line to Athabasca or to some place like that. But it would undoubtedly have a greatly beneficial effect on the people who live within that natural corridor route.

Like the Hon. Member, I would like to see a permanent transportation link into Cree Lake, and hopefully at some time into Lake Athabasca—maybe connecting Cree Lake up to Lake Athabasca. I would certainly like to see that happen, although maybe that will be a few years down the road.

Perhaps the existing rail link at Fort McMurray could be extended into Lake Athabasca. That might, of course, be on the Alberta side at the border, and my good friend would obviously like to see it on the Saskatchewan side of the border. However, if that were to take place, it would benefit the Lake Athabasca communities, such as Uranium City, Stony Rapids, and Fond du Lac. It would seem to me that the secret of being able to build a railway and make it operate profitably without too much cost to the taxpayer in the form of subsidization would be to have a sufficient volume of goods to carry on that railway. One needs lots of bulk cargo, such as coal or grain, or perhaps cargo freight with a little higher value, thus allowing one to charge higher freight rates. You need to have a good customer at the end of the line in order to justify being able to build it.

There are two good examples of this that spring to mind. The first is the railway that was built in the 1950s to connect Grimshaw, Alberta, with the lead-zinc deposits at Pine Point, Northwest Territories. That line could not have been financed had we not the mine at Pine Point that was a paying customer. But because that line was built, primarily to service the mine, it has also been extremely useful to farmers in northern Alberta and has encouraged the development of agriculture in the High Level area in the northern part of that province. It has been beneficial to the people in northern Alberta and in the southern Mackenzie Valley by way of general freight.

A similar situation exists in Manitoba where the railway was built into Lynn Lake to service the mines there and the people along the route. If a government is interested in benefiting the people by the construction of a railway in places like northern Saskatchewan, it should be encouraging the development of mineral resources, because grain cannot be grown there and there is not much chance of discovering oil, as I understand it, in the pre-Cambrian areas of northern Saskatchewan. It should really be looking for mineral deposits. Once again we come up against what hitherto has been the NDP policy of not encouraging mineral development. In fact, it does everything possible to discourage mineral development. This has been particularly true in northern Saskatchewan where they are mainly looking for uranium. The NDP more than anyone else has been against the nuclear industry in Canada and the mining of uranium. It is slitting its own throat, so to speak. It goes against anything which will justify the construction of a railway. I am completely unable to undertand that.

However, with the election of an enlightened Government in the Province of Saskatchewan, that Party now appears to be pursuing a policy designed to promote resource development—oil and potash in the south and base metals in the north. What we need in northern Saskatchewan to develop rail transportation links is a finding of base metal, not one of uranium which is a high-valued commodity that can be flown out and dealt with in relatively small quantities. We would really like to have a base metal mine there. Then they would more or less have to put a railway into that area to ship out the finished concentrate.

I would like to comment upon the remarks of the former Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport. I do not know whether he is in the House now. It is difficult to see him because he sits at the back. He used to be about two rows from the front, but now they have recognized his true worth on that side and have put him at the back where we can hardly see him.

Mr. Blais: We have given him the same seat as the one you occupy.

Mr. Nickerson: He came up with some good ideas. He said that very often it is not justifiable to build a railway and that the same amount of money can be used to build many more roads. The Saskatchewan Government should be—and it is doing it to a certain extent—engaging in road construction to tie all these outlying communities into the mainstream of Saskatchewan life. He also looked at the wider interprovincial perspective, which I would like to do for a while. I was pleased with his announcement that a barge service was to be put in at Fort McKay. Originally it went from Fort McMurray, but now it will go from Fort McKay becuase the uranium mine at Uranium City has been closed down and it does not justify dredging the Athabasca River between Fort McMurray and Fort McKay. The original idea of NTCL and the Department of Transport was to haul freight going to Lake Athabasca all the way up to Hay River and all the way back down to Fort Smith, put it on a barge at Fort Fitzgerald and then take it into there. That was absolutely crazy, although it would have benefited my constituency to a certain extent. It was much more logical to go the Fort McKay route. I am pleased to see that we will have continued navigation on the Athabasca River for some time to come.

The Fort Fitzgerald alternative might not have been quite as crazy had the road about which there has been talk for many years been completed between Fort Vermilion, Alberta and Fort Smith, Northwest Territories. This would cut off many hundreds of miles into Fort Smith and hooking on to the Slave River waterway which gives access to both Lake Athabasca and Great Slave Lake. Eventually, in the years to come, I look forward to the construction of a major road network in that area. I would dearly like to see as the first step the completion of a road through Wood Buffalo National Park linking Fort Vermilion to Fort Smith. However, this should go hand in hand with the construction of a road from Fort McMurray up to Fort Chipewyan, giving access to Lake Athabasca, and on to Fort Smith in the Northwest Territories. This is a road for which people in northern Alberta and in southern Northwest Territories have been pushing for many years. Each year they have a snowmobile parade for several hundreds of miles from Fort McMurray to Fort Smith to publicize the necessity of this road. Were this to be completed, it would benefit Alberta, Northwest Territories, the Province of Saskatchewan and the people living in northern Saskatchewan around the fringes of Lake Athabasca.

This is what I wanted to bring to the attention of the House this afternoon. I congratulate the Hon. Member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake for bringing forward such an interesting subject. I assure him that he has my complete support for his proposals.

[Translation]

Mrs. Éva Côté (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time I have had the honour of rising in the House to speak in the capacity of Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport, and I wish to take this opportunity to thank the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for letting me continue my work as a Member of Parliament in an area that is of great interest to me. In fact, economic development in the riding I represent in the House is very much dependent on transportation. Before speaking to the motion before the House today—the motion moved by the Member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish)—I would like to say a few words about the exceptional work done by my predecessor, the Member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis), who has just commented on the motion. You will understand I certainly cannot share the views expressed by my colleague in the Official Opposition, the Member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson), who ought to know, even if his party did not stay in power long enough for him to find out, that—I am thinking of his comments regarding the Hon. Member for Parkdale-High Park—Parliamentary Secretaries are appointed for a specific period. This may be one or two years, but the fact that one is no longer a Parliamentary Secretary certainly does not constitute a demotion, and at this point I wish to pay tribute to the work done by my predecessor, the Member for Parkdale-High Park, to whom I offer my sincere thanks, on behalf of all my colleagues.

To get back to the motion before the House today, which concerns the establishment of a Committee to study the feasibility of present or future options for railway transportation in northern Saskatchewan, I would point out that transportation links for isolated regions in Canada certainly deserve the attention of the Government.

In fact, we are focussing special attention, not only on developing Canada's large urban centres, but also on putting an end to the isolation of rural regions and Canada's North. The Hon. Member's motion is therefore entirely appropriate. However, I feel there is a case for putting the issue of transportation in northern Saskatchewan within a broader context, in order to provide a general picture of the transportation services offered in northern regions in the Prairie Provinces, and of the options that could be considered for further improving the quality of service offered to users and, consequently, to the taxpayer.

In keeping with the terms of its mandate, Transport Canada has to make sure that every region of the country is serviced by a passenger and freight transport network that is dependable and adequate and which, above all, fills the needs of the population. But there is more to it than that. Mindful of the objectives set by the Canadian Government, Transport Canada must seek in every possible way to get closer co-operation from the other Government levels—the Government of Saskatchewan in this case.

Such co-operation is not expected only from the public sector, Mr. Speaker, because the federal Government seeks the support of the private sector which has a leading role to play in any endeavour undertaken to bolster the economy of Canada.

Now I should like to say a few words about the services of the Northern Transportation Company which were operational until last year in the Lake Athabasca region. Considering the losses reported by that Crown corporation in 1982—$800,000—no one could reasonably expect that corporation to continue to provide services when tonnage—and income—kept going down year in and year out. Still, the Government will certainly continue to provide services to that region and its residents.

Under a freight transport network restructuration program, the Canadian Government will soon begin the construction of a new wharf for tug boats and barges at Fort McKay and maintain its dredging and navigational aids maintenance services.

In the statement he made last February 28, the Minister of Transport made it quite clear that, once the new tug boat and barge service is operational, with the support of the Saskatchewan Government, the cost of transportation to the cosignatories would be reduced and the local economy would be given a strong boost.

• (1650)

In this context, Mr. Speaker, I am happy to remind the Hon. Member that Transport Canada, the Provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta and the communities concerned along the Athabaska system have decided to have consultations in this regard. These consultations are now under way, as is the restructuring program. In other words, the private sector will have a most important role to play in the near future to maintain the flow of supplies along the Athabaska road.

I was saying earlier that the transportation services in Northern Saskatchewan should extend beyond the borders of the region. From a geopolitical point of view, we see that the northern part of the Prairie Provinces is provided with a transportation network which dates back to 1929 when the Churchill line was built in Manitoba. This line was later expanded with the Lynn Lake, Flin Flon and Osborne Lake branches.

In Alberta, the construction of the railroad owned by the Northern Alberta Railways and operating between Edmonton and Waterways did put an end to the isolation of the region. While this line is located in Alberta, the Northern Transportation Company Limited has during the last forty years provided the area with a barge and tug service in summer from Waterways, that is from Fort McMurray and Fort MacKay, to the communities around Lake Athabaska.

While the federal Government readily appreciates the Hon. Member's desire to have railway branches extend further North from Northern Saskatchewan, the profitability of such costly projects must first be established.

The Hon. Member belongs to a party which favours job creation, for which I congratulate him, the extension of social services and the expansion of our social network. This Government agrees with some of these principles, but it is obvious that, when he suggests investing considerable amounts, for instance in the building of questionable profitability, the Hon. Member's suggestion flies in the face of his own principles.

On the other hand, the Saskatchewan Government has not been idle, far from it! Just like the federal Government, it has a most important role to play in the economic development of the northern part of its province. For instance, to mention just a few of the most positive aspects of its transportation policy in this area, may I indicate that it is subsidizing this year to the tune of some $300,000 transportation by air of perishable goods to communities without year round access roads.

The Saskatchewan government has also maintained for the past several years in the Uranium City area a 190-kilometer long winter road at a cost of $400,000 per year.

If the Saskatchewan government were to make other proposals to its federal counterpart for the improvement of the road system in that area of the province, I am sure that my colleague, the Canadian Minister of Transport (Mr. Axworthy) would favourably receive this kind of representations which are quite consistent with his policy of opening up the northern and rural areas towards the larger industrial and demographic centres.

As a matter of fact, both levels of government are meeting regularly to consider whatever action must be taken to develop the economic potential of Northern Saskatchewan; this spirit of co-operation, I am pleased to report, has already resulted in a number of successes, including an increased level of services and transport to the communities. In order to reduce the impact of the closing of mining operations and the reduction in services, both governments are considering the possibility of signing a memorandum of agreement concerning the economic development of Northern Saskatchewan in mid-1984. It would identify the means to increase and improve federal and provincial programs in that area.

I would like to come back for a moment to the matter of extending the railway system to the north of the province, as suggested by my colleague from The Battlefords-Meadow Lake. The Canadian Government has never hesitated, when prompted by economic considerations, to promote the construction of rail lines. The best examples are the new Western Grain Transportation Act, which will enable the two major railways to invest some 16.5 billion in the economy over the next ten years. Those funds will be used not only to improve Canadian exports more or less substantially but also to create thousands of jobs in the primary and manufacturing sectors. Another example of the Canadian Government's involvement in railway transportation is the studies by the Transport Canada's Centre for Transport Development in support of studies for the construction of the new British Columbia Railway's line from Anzac, near Prince George, to Tumbler Ridge's coal basins.

Those two examples among others show the Canadian Government's determination to support, where needed, projects for the construction and restructuring of our railway system. However, Mr. Speaker, a rail line from Meadow Lake to Lake Athabasca would cost a minimum of $625,000 per kilometre, not including the improvements needed to the line section between Prince Albert and Meadow Lake, which would involve $300,000 per kilometre.

Such investments can only be warranted where important mineral deposits are to be found in the area served by the line. Surely, the Hon. Member will admit that committing that kind of money to a line such as he is advocating would ignore basic economic principles. I would like, however, to reassure the Hon. Member, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the Parliamentary Secretary.

The hour provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. It being five o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order, this House stands adjourned until Monday, March 12, 1984, at eleven o'clock a.m.

At 5:00 p.m., the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 62—FEBRUARY, 1984 BUDGET

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West) moved:

That this House regrets the failure of the government to include measures in the February, 1984 Budget to prevent the continually sagging Canadian dollar from further decline, reverse the continuous increase in the already critically high levels of unemployment, and combat the return to steadily rising high interest rates, all of which signals an end to any possible recovery and clearly demonstrates the incompetence of the government and its callous attitude of ignoring the social and economic hardships that it is imposing upon the Canadian people.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the resolution which we have before us summarizes the situation, and I am happy that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) is here with us today, along with two aspirants to the leadership of the Liberal Party. Before getting to the structure of my main remarks, I must say that these Hon. Members, of course, are deathbed repenters, because they have both rejected the Government's economic doctrines of the last few years.

I am happy that the Minister of Justice (Mr. MacGuigan) is here today because he, presumably, is tendering his resignation before the day is out. He is part, he says, of the reforming centre, the soft centre of the Liberal Party, and he says it should bring its tradition of reform to economic matters. Well, Mr. Speaker, if your economic policy is sound and sensible, you do not need to reform it. That is a biting criticism of the Government's economic policy, that now it should need a tradition of reform.

The Minister of Justice envisages a government which uses less coercion and confrontation in national politics. What a savage attack on the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)! He says he is going to attempt to cut the federal deficit and better manage the economy through more co-operative efforts. He is even going to trim the power of the Prime Minister's Office. He is going to clip his own toenails before they have even grown, Mr. Speaker. That is the Minister of Justice.

Then, of course, we have the Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development (Mr. Johnston). Lo and behold, that Minister wants to have the principle of universality looked at in our social programs. I could not believe my ears, Mr. Speaker, until I realized that the Minister of Finance himself had made the same suggestion on November 4, 1982; he proposed that the baby bonus, better known as the family allowance payment, be eliminated for wealthier people who do not need it. The same Minister of Finance brought this up in the House the other day—a hypocrite beyond compare. He said he disagreed with some of his colleagues who say a basic principle of Liberal philosophy is universality. Not only does the Minister of Finance disagree with his colleagues, but the Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development also disagrees with his colleagues. How can they stay in the Cabinet when they disagree with the policy of the Government?

On November 7, 1982 the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro)—"bleeding heart Munro"—at a Liberal Party biennial policy convention said that he supported a motion that we eliminate universality. He said: "The Government is wasting millions of dollars by sending monthly pension cheques to wealthy senior citizens and baby bonuses to families who do not need the money. Such funds should be redirected to help the most needy". There you are, Mr. Speaker, we are smoking them out. There is a lot of disagreement within the Government ranks as to what it should be doing in the social area.

To come back to the motion, Mr. Speaker, we have a Budget which was brought in on February 15, 26 days ago, and never in the history of Canada has a Budget been so repudiated by the facts. It should not have been brought in on February 15. The Minister should have waited until he saw how the economic recovery was going. But no, for political reasons, to help the Liberal Party and get the Budget out of the way before the leadership aspirants started to announce, he brought the Budget in prematurely. This is a case of premature budgeting. Now, 26 days later, we see what is happening to the economy. The Minister claimed the Budget was going to have no effect on the economy: "Lack of response to new Budget fine with Lalonde". The Minister said his new Budget is not having any effect on the economy and that makes him happy. Now we discover the economy is starting to sputter and go into a recession again. The Minister should have had a Budget which would have the effect of helping the recovery, not continuing the tax impositions he introduced last April. However, I will come back to that.

This Minister has done this economy a lot of harm, Mr. Speaker, through the Budget he brought in. But even more harm has been done by some of his statements since. I refer to his statement on March 7 when he said: "I am not one spending my nights up worrying that the dollar is not at 81 cents, I can assure you". That is his job, Mr. Speaker. He should be up worrying about the state of the Canadian dollar, not pretending that he is not worrying. Well, the dollar is not at 81 cents any longer, partly as a result of this Minister's negligence and silly statements. The latest figure on the dollar this morning is 78.21 cents.

The Minister went on to make some other silly remarks in the same interview in The Globe and Mail on March 7. He said interest rate levels in Canada have nothing to do with the value of the dollar. Now, Mr. Speaker, since it has been the Government's policy for at least ten years, as well as that of the Bank of Canada, to keep our interest rates in Canada at least equal to, if not higher than, interest rates in the United States to protect the Canadian dollar, which would plummet if this were not done, how can the Minister make such a silly statement? Not only that, both these statements have given further credence and strength to the speculator. The speculator feels the Canadian dollar is going to decline in value and then he reads that the Minister of Finance is not worrying that the dollar is at 81 cents, so he naturally bets against the Canadian dollar and helps force it down. All the Minister has done is bring greater pressure on the Canadian dollar with these statements of his.

The Minister said he had no preferred level for the dollar. Its value floats freely at the whim of world markets. It is like shaver's soap, Mr. Speaker; it does not sink, it does not float, it just lies there. That is what the Minister of Finance wants us to believe. The Government does not intervene, he says. Why, then, did our foreign exchange reserves go down $112 million last month protecting the Canadian dollar? Why have we spent billions in the last few years protecting the dollar if the Minister is just going to allow it to float? Well, it has developed a leak and is not going to float very far unless the Minister makes some firm statements as to what the Government's position is. Is the Government concerned about the level of the Canadian dollar, as it has been saying now year after year, or is the Government not concerned? The Minister intimates they are not concerned. If that is the case, the Canadian dollar is certainly going to go lower and lower.

Does the Minister still agree with what the Governor of the Bank of Canada said in his speech to the Investment Dealers Association of Canada on November 29, 1983, or does he not agree? Is he going to give them a different directive? The Governor said any major depreciation of the Canadian dollar at this time would be much more likely to damage than to help our economic situation in that it would be strongly inflationary in an environment where confidence that inflation is under control is still so fragile. That was the policy then. Is it still the policy? Last Friday the Minister would not answer. He went off into irrelevancies about universality. Well, he has to answer. Does the Government agree with the Bank of Canada's policy or is it directing a change?

In addition to the dollar sinking so far today to 78.21, the Treasury bill rate is 10.15. It is up again which indicates that the Bank of Canada rate will likely go to 10.40 per cent this week. Is the Government going to allow interest rates to go up to protect the Canadian dollar from falling much further and to stop another bout of inflation in Canada or not? Is the policy the same or has the Minister changed the policy? He must make that clear, Mr. Speaker, or the Canadian dollar is going to continue to be under the kind of pressure it is now under.

Devaluation of the Canadian dollar has already occurred, Mr. Speaker. The decline has been near 24 per cent since December, 1976 when it was $1.02 in U.S. terms. Not only has our dollar depreciated vis-à-vis the U.S. dollar, Mr. Speaker, but it has devalued 11.4 per cent over the same period against the English pound and 37.4 per cent against the yen. The Minister is here today, Mr. Speaker. We are hoping he will give the Canadian people some answers about the Government's policy and whether it has changed.

The real number of unemployed today, Mr. Speaker, according to Statistics Canada, is 1,476,000 persons. The rate has gone up to 11.3 per cent. My colleague from Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) will deal in more detail with the unemployment situation. The Minister will still come before the House and pretend there is something positive and good about the figures. There is nothing positive or good. The number of unemployed in Canada is up for the fourth month in a row. The rate of unemployment is up for the second month in a row. It is the highest rate of unemployment since September of 1983. We are still 139,000 jobs below the pre-recession peak. The number of people working full-time is still 352,000 below the pre-recession peak. When this group came into office in 1980 the number of unemployed was only some 967,000 persons, or 7.5 per cent.

The record of the last four years and one month is miserable. These leadership candidates have acknowledged that. They want economic reform, Mr. Speaker. We are going to hear a lot of malarkey from these whirling dirvishes as they whirl and twirl and try to dissociate themselves from the Government of which they are members. They want to put a distance between themselves and the Minister of Finance who has failed so lamentably, just as his predecessor, the genius from Cape Breton, did. When this group came into office in 1968 there were approximately 375,000 unemployed. The rate was 4.5 per cent. Where is it today after they have been in office for the last 16 years? The rate is 11.3 per cent. They say it is not their fault; it is the fault of the U.s., it is the fault of Afghanistan, it is the fault of Grenada, it is the fault of everyone but them. That is the story they give us.

What is happening in the U.S.? In the U.S. the unemployment rate just fell from 8 per cent to 7.8 per cent. It fell for the sixth month in a row. If we are captives of the U.S. and can do nothing but follow what happens in the U.S., how is it their unemployment rate is now 7.8 per cent while ours is 11.3 per cent? Theirs has fallen for six straight months while ours has gone up. Of course, Mr. Speaker, we are not the captives of the U.S. or any other country. There is much that we can do for ourselves.

What about inflation? Since the Budget came down, inflation has started back up again. The inflation rate from January to January is now back up to 5.3 per cent. The underlying rate of inflation, when one takes out energy and takes out food, is up. The underlying trend rate of inflation, or the cost of living, is also on the way back up.

Inflation is still a problem. Simply because this is a lame duck government—a collection of quack quacks—it does not mean that these problems must not be tackled. We should be in an election today. If it was not for the fact that the Liberal Party puts its own interests ahead of the national interest, we should be in an election now to determine what the future of this country will be and whether the country wants to continue with this record of unmitigated disaster of the last four years, or 16 years, or whether it wants to give another party a chance. That is what should be decided today, not the leadership of the quack quack government that will be decided in June.

Just about every economic figure that has come down since the Budget 26 days ago has been one that causes gloom. For those who are interested, they can look at today's The Globe and Mail in which there is a little article by Peter Cook that compares the U.S. economy to the Canadian economy. The comparison should certainly make this country feel ashamed. He says:

> When Finance Minister Marc Lalonde brought down his budget less than a month ago, he chose to ignore the differences between the two economies and refer to a general North American recovery.
> But, as the marking down of the dollar proved last week, conditions are not the same at all.

He goes on to make the comparison. In every case, the comparison is one in which we do not stand up well to the United States.

> Real interest rates have been more or less as punitive in both countries. If anything, they have been tougher in the United States because inflation has been lower.
> But the reaction to them by Canadians who, admittedly, have lower disposable incomes has been entirely different. They have kept saving while Americans have been on a spending spree.

In the United States businesses are going ahead to invest in new productive facilities, to buy new machinery and equipment. In the United States capital spending is jogging along. In Canada there is no sign that it has yet got out of the door. He says:

> These differences are important, not least because Mr. Lalonde totally overlooked them.

He brought in a Budget that gives no stimulus to capital investment or to business investment. He punched the consumers right in the belly by bringing in a Budget that continues sales tax increases and income tax increases that will take more out of the economy, just as he promised to do last April.

Mr. Cook concludes his article:

> Meanwhile, Mr. Lalonde has simply either not seen the problem or has chosen to ignore it. His budget has legitimized high levels of government spending while offering no incentives at all for consumers to spend or businessmen to invest.

That is a considered, impartial opinion of the financial policy that is illustrated by the Budget which came down a few days ago.

In the few minutes that I have, I cannot go into the unemployment situation in more detail but my colleague from Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) will do so.

The Minister of Finance stands indicted as a prophesier beyond compare. On October 19, 1983, in The Toronto Star, the Liberal bible, he said that interest rates likely will drop by another two to three percentage points in the next six months. Five months have passed and we have not seen that drop. There is another month to go. Perhaps they will drop two to three percentage points in the next month. He said:

> Canada can respond 'very fast' to lower U.S. interest rates if inflation remains low and the value of the Canadian dollar stays steady at its current 81-82 cent range in terms of U.S. money—

That possibility has gone out the window, although the Minister says that he does not care. He does not lose sleep over the Canadian dollar, he says. It is now down to 78 cents. He said that we could respond quickly if the value of the Canadian dollar stayed steady at its current 81-82 cent range. It has not stayed steady, Mr. Minister. What will we do now? How will he respond now when the dollar is already down to 78.21 cents U.S.?

We only have to listen to the various economists. For instance, Thomas Maxwell of the Conference Board of Canada says that there is growing evidence that our recovery is stillborn. I am quoting from the Calgary Herald of March 3. The article reads in part:

> He predicted the country could be hit as early as next year by a recession even deeper than the one now considered by many to have ended . . .
> "There has been no net increase in jobs since the beginning of the recovery," he said—
> Technically Canada has been in recovery for a year, he said, but domestic economic growth has gone steadily downhill since its initial spurt in the first quarter of 1983 as export sales accounted for virtually all increases.
> "That is precisely the inverse of how economies traditionally perform in a recovery. Usually recovery begins with strong consumer buying with export growth coming in near the top."

In Canada it has been the reverse, Mr. Speaker. We have not had strong consumer buying. Mr. Maxwell quotes the figures from Statistics Canada which I do not have time enough to give now but which confirm our economic growth is slowing and that business investment is at a standstill. Mr. Maxwell explained:

> Without investment in new plant and equipment, there is nothing to drive Canada's economy into the mature stage of recovery when income and employment growth traditionally makes its strongest move.

That is the judgment of a professional and experienced economist. I could give you many more judgments, Mr. Speaker. Firm after firm has pointed out that the Minister's forecasts in his Budget are far too optimistic. For instance, final domestic demand declined in the last three months in 1983; business investment plunged 12.2 per cent in 1983; real personal income declined again in 1983; and business investment in machinery and equipment declined.

The Minister said in his Budget of February 15:

—my goal was to secure the recovery. That goal has also been met.

Did ever such a fatuous statement have its falseness shown so quickly following a Budget as that fatuous statement has, Mr. Speaker—that the goal was to secure the recovery and that goal has been met? The goal has not been met. We had a Budget brought in at the wrong time and with a lack of measures to do anything to help our recovery. We are now suffering the results. We have a Minister who is afraid to say what the Government's policy is.

Is the policy to attempt to show the Canadian people that our deficits are going to be controlled, that government spending is going to be controlled, that we are going to protect the Canadian dollar as far as we can, that we are going to continue what the government's policy has been to date? Or is the Minister going to throw up his hands and pretend that there is no policy at all? What tack is the Minister going to take while the Liberal leadership hiatus continues? Is the Government going to permit its Ministers to go about the country attacking its own policy of the last four years and the last 16? What is the Government going to do with Ministers who now seek to absolve themselves from responsibilities they have had for these many years? In the case of the Minister of Justice and the Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development, it is at least four years.

I see it is time for me to conclude, Mr. Speaker. I say to the Minister that under his stewardship the economy is faltering, the recovery is disappearing, and the jobless are without hope. People are suffering. When is he going to take some action? If he does not take action, how about persuading the Prime Minister to call an election?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the statement made by the Opposition critic. He referred to a statement to the effect that I said that I had no preferred value for the Canadian dollar.

Mr. McDermid: Or the Canadian people.

Mr. Lalonde: I do not know whether the Hon. Member can tell me what he meant when he said, as Minister of Finance on November 3, 1979, that "the dollar should have no particular value", and on November 16, 1979, also as Minister of Finance, that "I have no plans to boost the dollar. I have no plans to do anything about the dollar". Could the finance critic tell us what he meant by those two statements that he made when he was Minister of Finance? No fooling around: just address the question directly.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased the Minister of Finance has humbled himself to come here today to listen to me. It has not been the practice in the past. I believe this shows how nervous the Liberals are about the state of the economy at the moment. You will note, Mr. Speaker, that I did not say that I was not up nights worrying about the dollar. By the way, the Minister should tell us what was the value of the dollar when those statements were made. It was a considerably stronger dollar then.

• (1130)

Mr. Blenkarn: About 86 cents.

Mr. Crosbie: About 86 cents. No wonder I had no policy about what the dollar should be when it was strong and vigorous, because we had a Conservative Government which was protecting the dollar.

Mr. Evans: The Conservative Government was protecting the dollar!

Mr. Crosbie: I do not think—

Mr. Blenkarn: No, we did not have to. Money was pouring into the country for investment in oil.

Mr. Crosbie: There you are.

Mr. Blenkarn: And you threw it out. Hibernia was active, and you threw it out.

Mr. Crosbie: I am lucky, Mr. Speaker. I have a Minister of State for Finance critic who can protect me when I am asked a question.

Mr. Evans: He is a busy gentleman.

Mr. Crosbie: I would like to give the Minister some advice. I had no policy that the dollar should be at any particular point in the scale of values, but we had a policy that the dollar should not be, as far as humanly possible, allowed to depreciate in value because of the inflationary effect that would have in a country already suffering from inflation. We did not have a policy of telling the public that we did not care what value the dollar was so that all the speculators would join in attacking the Canadian dollar and forcing it down even further.

Mr. Evans: What a foolish statement.

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Mr. Speaker, we in this corner of the House would generally agree with the motion before us today. We certainly regret the failure of the Government to do anything meaningful to aid our seriously ailing economy. However, I must admit that I find it somewhat strange that this motion was moved by the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) when at another time and in another place he said that if he were Minister of Finance he would not do anything different from what the Government is doing right now. Yet here in the House he condemns the Government for doing what he has said that he would not do any differently.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not want to be misquoted in the House. Never did I say any such thing. If the Hon. Member could point to where I said that, if he could give us the exact quotation, fine; but I do not want to be misquoted.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order, please. That, of course, is not a point of order; it is a point of debate.

Mr. Crosbie: I thought it was a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): The Hon. Member will have an opportunity to question the speaker at the end of his speech.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would be happy to help the Hon. Member for St. John's West by giving him the quote wherein he said that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): That is not a point of order.

Mr. Sargeant: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Minister could send it over to me. I do not have the exact quotation with me, but I recall very well the Hon. Member having said that. I suppose one can take strange positions, as the Hon. Member and his Party have done. It is a luxury in which they can indulge while they are leading in the polls.

Nevertheless, I am pleased to have the opportunity to address this very important subject which seriously affects the entire country. Perhaps I could relate it somewhat to my part of the country. I was somewhat alarmed one morning last week when I awoke to the news on CBC radio that interest rates were once again on the move upward. For some time the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) has been telling us about the recovery which he sees happening in Canada. Many Canadians have searched far and wide to see exactly where the recovery was happening. I suppose we must admit that it is ongoing in some sectors of the economy. We have seen, as we in this corner of the House have related a number of times, considerable recovery in the profits of certain fairly major corporations, notably banks, oil companies and some others. However, we do not see any recovery for those who count—working Canadians, farmers, unemployed and senior citizens; in other words, the vast majority of Canadians, those who would spend money if they had it or could find a source of income. Those are the people who would sustain this imaginary recovery if they had jobs or the means to sustain it.

I ask the Minister what will happen to this make-believe recovery about which he is talking if the Government does not take immediate steps to keep interest rates down. I suggest it will go poof! The Minister will awake one morning to find that there is no more recovery, perhaps not even in the few sectors where we have seen it in the last few months.

We have just come through the worst recession Canada has seen since the great depression of the 1930s, a recession which was largely brought on and certainly worsened by the seriously high interest rates of the last two years or three years. We have just come through a period which saw many farmers losing their farms, which saw many businessmen, large, small and intermediate, lose their businesses because they could not sustain the cost of interest. We have seen home owners lose their homes because they could not keep up their mortgages. We have seen a period when houses were not built because people could not afford the interest on the mortgages. We have seen a period when cars were not purchased because people could not afford the interest. We have seen a period when major appliances, furniture, farm machinery, et cetera, were not bought because the buyers could not afford the cost of borrowing money. We have seen plants not expanding for the very same reasons.

Because of that we have seen resulting high unemployment. We are barely out of that period. Perhaps we are just coming out of it. Certainly many individuals have not recovered. Unemployment has not yet recovered. Will the Government allow us to go right back into that situation? Will it not take some immediate action to prevent the return of this very serious recession out of which we are just coming?

Let me talk for a few moments about two or three particular groups in my riding. I think they reflect the situations faced by similar groups across the country. My area is no different from other regions. I want to talk about how the present state of the economy has affected them and may well affect them again if interest rates, in particular, are allowed to escalate.

The first area about which I want to talk is farming. Farmers form a very large and diverse sector of my constituency. Some of them enjoy some of the best farm land in the country. They are able to be reasonably successful. Others live on some of the most marginal land in Canada. If we could ever develop a market for the rocks that pop up every spring on these farms, they would be doing well.

I think the general farm situation in Manitoba can be highlighted by referring to an incident which happened last Friday in the Town of Virden. It is not in my constituency; it is in western Manitoba. In that town on Friday there was an auction on one of the local farms. It was a fair-sized farm which was probably fairly successful at one time. However this particular farmer had gone under because of the economic situation of the last few years. He was unable to meet the demands of the local credit union. An auction was held, but in this particular case the Canadian Farm Survival Association came on the scene and stopped the auction from happening. Who knows what will happen to that particular farmer and his farm in the next few days and weeks? For the time being the story highlights a very sad situation. It is an example of the many farmers who are still reeling from the high interest rates of the last few years.

During the last few years we have heard about many farm bankruptcies. We have heard about the increase in their numbers. We have heard of high-profile sales such as the one to which I just referred, but we have not heard of the many forced and quiet sales or of the many farmers who have simply given up. They simply could not make ends meet any longer and had to get out of farming. For some of them it meant an end to their life's work.

During the winter break just a few weeks ago, I travelled around my constituency. I met with a number of farmers in every corner of my area. It was much the same story with all of them. It boiled down to rapidly escalating costs, costs escalating at a much greater rate than the rate of their return. They mentioned that the Government liked to talk quite a bit about the great benefits farmers will see from the changes to the Crow rate. The Minister of Finance has often stood in this House and said that this will be of great benefit to farmers in western Canada, if not all across the country. I suggest that he talk to some of these farmers to see what they think about one more increase in their costs.

Without doubt, the saddest story I heard during the winter break was from a group farmers in the Riverton area, a town in the east central part of my constituency. In the best of times, it is not really a bad farming area. But in seven of the last eight years, half or more of the farmers in that area have suffered from a crop failure, in most cases a total crop failure because of flooding some years and serious drought in other years, such as last year.

In two or three months these farmers should start planting this year's crop, but they do not have the capital to do that. They need cash or some form of relief from high interest rates. They have gone to the Farm Credit Corporation, the credit unions and the banks and have come back empty-handed. Those institutions are leery about loaning money to farmers who are already carrying a high debt load. They have tried to get help under the province's interest relief program. However, the operations of many are simply too big to qualify for that program. If the farmers can find the money to put in a crop this year, with another bad year half the farmers in that part of my constituency could go under.

Today's motion refers to the Budget of February, 1984. What did it do for these farmers? Zippo. What will interest rate increases do for those farmers? It is not hard to guess. It will speed up the rate which they die off. What advice did these farmers get from one local agricultural representative? They were told to sell their farms and to get out. What kind of an answer is that? We are talking about a way of life in western Canada that is being threatened, not only in my constituency but across the west. That way of life is the family farm. This Government has to decide whether it wants to preserve this way of life. Is the family farm going to stay or not?

There are not only serious social consequences coming out of that but economic ones as well, such as the survival of small towns that have built up around the farms. This will also affect food costs if family farms are replaced in great numbers by corporate farms. How about a break for the farmers? The federal Government is able to find billions of dollars in tax breaks and incentives for oil companies. How about a wee bit for the farmer?

Let us look at the cost of fuel and other petrochemical products that farmers use. In the last five years those costs have doubled at the very minimum. In the last ten years they have gone up five to ten times. At the same time, what has happened to the price of wheat? It is lower than it was two or three years ago.

Many people, myself included, until fairly recently believed that farmers got a break on the price of fuel. We hear about the purple gas that farmers use and we thought they were getting a rebate on their fuel. If you explore it a little more deeply, you find that it applies only to gasoline. Very few farmers that I have come across in the last few months use much gasoline. Their equipment is diesel-operated. Some even drive diesel trucks and cars. They are not getting that tax break. Some do not even bother to claim the gas rebate. As it only amounts to $75 or $100 a year, it is not worth spending the time filling out the forms.

In addition to all this, over the last year we have heard a lot of stories about the tax department harassing farmers, making the situation even worse. Let me give a couple of example that have been brought to my attention in the last two weeks of farmers getting the runaround and being harassed by Revenue Canada in Manitoba.

A person near my home town of Gimli operates a small farm. The farm more or less gobbles up all the money it earns. He has a part-time job which pays him approximately $5,000 a year. His wife also has a part-time job which pays her roughly $5,000 a year. This winter Revenue Canada came in and said since there was no expectation of profit on the farm, he would therefore be classed as a hobby farmer. Let us be realistic about about this. Between them this couple earns $10,000 in annual income. His small farm gobbles up most of what it earns, and Revenue Canada decides that he is a hobby farmer with $10,000 in income. This is not a doctor, lawyer or businessman doing this for fun on the weekends.

There is another case just as ridiculous and perhaps even more ludicrous of a farmer who has lived on the same farm since the day he was born. Indeed, he was born in the farmhouse 55 years ago. Like most other farmers in my constituency, he has to work off the farm to earn some other income just to stay alive. An auditor, who was never on a farm until the day he walked on to this gentleman's farm, decided that after 55 years on this farm he is not a farmer.

While Revenue Canada is harrassing farmers and small businessmen, we see a headline in Saturday's The Globe and Mail appeared about how big corporations have beat the tax man for billions. Some of these prairie farmers are trying to get away with a couple of hundred or thousand dollars of legitimate costs on their farm operation. It is easy to tell them to sell their farms if they cannot expect to make money. But, these people have chosen to be farmers just as other Canadians have chosen to be doctors, truck drivers, politicians or whatever. They want to be farmers. It is all that some have known all their lives. It is not their fault that costs for interest rates, fuel and equipment have gone up so high that they cannot make a legitimate profit.

These farmers are supporting much of this country with their cheap labour, yet Revenue Canada chooses to harass them. I repeat, the Government has to choose with regard to the continued existence of the family farm. This must be done very soon. In the next election they must tell the farmers whether they are going to back them up by doing something meaningful so that they can exist, or that they are not going to let the farmers continue. Give these farmers a chance so that they can find a different way of life.

I wish to talk for a few minutes about what the current state of the economy means for the Indian community in my constituency. There are 11 reserves, some very small with a couple of hundred people and some very large with a couple of thousand. Some are very close to Winnipeg, others are miles away in the northern part of my constituency. Something they all have in common is an incredibly high rate of unemployment. At some times of the year, particularly outside of the fishing season, unemployment on those reserves reaches as high as 90 per cent.

This situation has been made worse in the last two or three years with high unemployment in the cities, particularly in the construction industry where they have often gone to find work in the past. They have returned from the cities and those other communities to the reserves where there are no jobs. It has made the social system on the reserves even more difficult to cope with. Many of the reserves are given nothing in the way of resources. In our generosity 100 years ago, when we signed treaties with the communities, we gave them some of the worst land to live on that could be found in the Province of Manitoba. Over the years we have not given them the facilities to develop any kind of economic base.

In recent years there has even been a change in the nature of the funding that goes to reserve Indians. In the two areas that might help them out of their sad state, economic development and post-secondary education funding has been cut back. Funding for welfare, which is easier to administer, has not been cut back. I think this is a disgrace, Mr. Speaker.

We saw another scandal at the conference of First Ministers last week. In his motion, the Hon. Member for St. John's West refers to the social hardships the economy is imposing on Canadians. I think he should talk to some of the Tory Premiers in the country. If we were to take away from or otherwise deny non-native Canadians the basic right to a great deal of control over their own lives, there would be a national uprising, and rightly so. Last week, however, we saw seven provinces, six of them led by Tories and the other operating on its own agenda, do that to Canadian natives. This is the late 20th century; it is not feudal Europe. It is time we treated our natives with some kind of dignity.

I see that my time is almost up, Mr. Speaker. I wanted to talk about the sad state of older women in the country and to put on record yet again some of the recommendations my Party has made on a number of occasions in the past. However, I will leave that for other Members later in the day or in other debates in this House.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Hon. Member. A couple of amendments to the Constitution were discussed at the First Ministers' conference last Thursday and Friday. One was on equality rights and it was turned down by the Assembly of First Nations; the other was on the entrenchment of self-government within the Constitution.

Does the Hon. Member think that the manner in which the federal Government presented those amendments to the Constitution on Thursday morning, requiring a decision by the next day on a very, very important amendment, is the proper way to amend the Constitution of this country?

Mr. Sargeant: No. I can give the Hon. Member a short answer, Mr. Speaker, No, I do not think that is the proper way to proceed with constitutional reform in this country. We are talking about very important changes to the Constitution and to the way of life of our native people. There certainly should have been a better process.

Mr. Lalonde: It has been discussed for five years.

Mr. Sargeant: Mr. Speaker, I will never defend or compliment the Government for much of what it has done over the years or even in the last few months in regard to natives in this country.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I understand the Hon. Member's confusion over statements made by the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), a former Minister of Finance, who normally describes himself as a middle of the road man. Mr. Speaker, middle of the road men eventually get run over.

My question is about the basic difference between a Liberal Budget and the Budget of the Conservative Party as they relate to direct job creation. I should like the Hon. Member's opinion on whether the Conservatives are right or the Liberals are right. The Conservatives want to do away completely with direct job creation in this country. What is the stand of the Hon. Member's Party on this matter?

Mr. Sargeant: Mr. Speaker, obviously we would not agree with doing away with direct job creation completely. We condemned the Conservative Government in the few months it was in when it tried to do away with that.

Mr. Crosbie: That is why we have the Liberals—because you were so stupid. Your stupidity put them there.

Mr. Sargeant: I dispute that, Mr. Speaker. I would say that the Hon. Member for St. John's West and his late, great Government—

Mr. Crosbie: I certainly helped.

Mr. Sargeant: Yes, the Hon. Member has said it himself; his stupidity helped.

I would say to the Hon. Member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker) that while we were critical and remain critical of doing away with direct job creation, we think there is room in the economy for systems that would provide permanent jobs.

Job creation is fine, but it is a band-aid and covers up the wound but there is no healing underneath it.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the motion before the House relates more to the deteriorating political prospects of the opposition Party than to favourable prospects for the Canadian economy. In any case, I shall try to deal with this scatter-gun motion in a systematic way.

After we strip away the political bombast, it appears that the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) is raising questions about the future course of our economic recovery, the February Budget, the Canadian dollar and its relation to interest rates. I will try to address these questions in the short time available to me.

However, I would like to start with the recovery issue. I have read a number of comments, especially by Members of the Opposition who were concerned about the fact that, during the last quarter of 1983, growth had been slower than in the first three quarters of that year.

As I have said a number of times, a slow down is to be expected and is a normal phenomenon in the economic recovery process.

In fact, recovery, like expansion, goes through two major stages. There is the initial recovery stage when growth is very fast, and the second stage when recovery slows down to a pace that can be sustained more readily in the long run. In Canada, production increased very strongly at an annual rate of 7.6 per cent in real terms during the first three quarters of 1983. In fact, we had one of the fastest increases of all industrialized countries. A moderating trend became apparent in the fourth quarter, both in Canada and the United States. The fact remains, however, that the Canadian economy showed a growth rate of 6.6 per cent in real terms between the last quarter of 1982 and the last quarter of 1983. The growth rate in the fourth quarter, and thus for the whole year, was even higher than I had predicted in my Budget on February 15 of this year. I think this should answer satisfactorily the allegations made by the member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), who found my predictions too optimistic.

I feel it serves no useful purpose for Members of Parliament to take either an excessively optimistic or pessimistic view of economic prospects at any given time. I must advise the Hon. Member for St. John's West in the kindest possible way that great damage can be done to economic confidence by exaggerating the risks of new economic difficulties ahead. The recovery has progressed well with a realistic balance of confidence and caution. That balance must be maintained in relation to the prospects for future economic progress.

Let me deal with the argument that my February Budget presented an unrealistic optimistic projection for 1984. The fact is that the Government projection of 4.9 per cent real economic growth in 1984 is below the 5 per cent forecast for Canada by the OECD and well within the range produced by Canadian private organizations. Private sector forecasts have averaged—and I stress the word "averaged"—about 4.6 per cent, just slightly below the federal Government's own estimate. I say "average" in the sense that there are some below 4.6 per cent and some above. Our forecasts for inflation and other measures of economic performance are likewise in the mainstream of private and public sector forecasts.

The recovery has moderated, as expected, but real growth continues at an encouraging pace. I continue to look for real growth averaging at least 1 per cent per quarter during 1984, and growth at this rate would yield the year over year projection of 4.9 per cent. Indeed, 1 per cent real growth each quarter would be well above the average of the past decade.

I am also encouraged, Mr. Speaker, by the fact that employment has accelerated in three of the past four months. The economy has produced 424,000 new jobs since the recovery began. However, because there is a link between success in creating jobs and the attraction of new job seekers into the work force, the unemployment rate actually increased slightly, in spite of 54,000 new jobs being created during the month of February alone.

On balance, the fact that Canadians are encouraged enough about economic prospects to begin seeking jobs again is a positive development. I would much prefer that they take hope from the real economic progress we are making rather than accept the hopeless premise of the Opposition motion. In short, we are on the right track for sustained economic progress.

That brings me to the subject of my recent Budget. The Opposition motion characterizes the Budget strategy as doing nothing to ensure continued economic recovery. This statement simply does not hold. The Government is giving substantial support to the economy in the current stage of recovery, and I refer here to my Budget of April, 1983, as well as my Budget of February, 1984. Hon. Members will remember that I provided for $2.4 billion of tax incentives for the private sector, plus $2.4 billion investment into the public sector in the area of infrastructures, to support the economic recovery in this country. And in my last Budget I provided for additional measures for small and medium-sized business and also to support exports abroad.

The federal Government, in fact, continues to inject much more into the economy in terms of purchases of goods and transfers to persons and corporations than it is taking out through taxes. In 1984 there will be additional stimulus provided by the government sector generally. Total government spending on goods and services is projected to increase 5.8 per cent in 1984, and this growth in government final demand will contribute almost one-quarter of the total growth in Canada's output in 1984.

The motion before the House refers to exchange rates and interest rates in a manner which betrays a serious lack of understanding of the subject. Allow me to provide some basic information for the benefit of Hon. Members opposite. Let us look first at recent events in the exchange market and place them into the context of the current recovery. Since March 1 the Canadian dollar has been depreciating against the U.S. dollar in an environment of fairly large and volatile international currency developments. This decline is certainly not indicative of any fundamental weakness in the competitive position of the Canadian economy.

Since the start of the recovery, our competitive position has been improving steadily. Wage settlements and inflation have declined dramatically. Productivity has grown strongly and the trade balance has remained strong. Recent data confirms that the momentum continues. In the final quarter of last year, unit labour costs in Canada fell to a rate of increase of 0.4 per cent from the fourth quarter of 1982 as compared to 2.5 per cent in the United States. This stands in dramatic contrast to the 3.4 per cent gap against Canada which existed only a year ago. Similarly, the rate of inflation, as measured by the GNP deflator, declined to 3.8 per cent as compared to 4.2 per cent in the United States. Again, this represents a significant improvement in our relative inflation performance with the United States.

Finally, the surplus on merchandise trade in Canada rose to $18 billion whereas the U.S. merchandise trade balance recorded a deficit of $75 billion. Positive developments of this type played a major role in sustaining confidence in the Canadian dollar during the first year of our recovery and should continue to do so in the future.

Despite the importance of these underlying domestic forces in the determination of the exchange rate, other factors also exert an influence. Their influence is particularly evident at the present time. In recent weeks U.S. interest rates have risen in the face of a faster than expected U.S. recovery in the first quarter of this year. Fears that U.S. monetary authorities might move to greater restraint and heightened uncertainty about early prospects for deficit reduction in the United States have cause the Canadian dollar to be pushed down and Canadian interest rates have been pushed up.

Canada is an open economy depending upon international trade and capital flows. Canada is, therefore, inevitably exposed to international economic developments. The ups and downs of the Canadian dollar on international money markets must be viewed in perspective. Against the major OECD countries and excluding the U.S. dollar, the Canadian dollar has appreciated—I repeat, the Canadian dollar has appreciated—by 1 per cent from the end of 1982 to the present, reflecting an appreciation of over 7.5 per cent in 1983 and a subsequent decline of 6 per cent to date in 1984.

On a total trade-weighted basis, which includes the United States, the dollar after trading in a very stable range throughout 1983 has fallen by 2.5 per cent since February. Despite these seemingly large movements, the Canadian dollar, by comparison to other currencies, has been remarkably stable. For instance, during 1983 the Deutschemark fell by 11.9 per cent against the U.S. dollar; the French franc by 18.1 per cent; the British pound by 11.3 per cent; while the Japanese yen rose by 3.4 per cent.

To ensure a sustained recovery while at the same time consolidating and improving our inflation performance, the preferred course would be a stable dollar and stable, if not lower, interest rates. I would have thought, however, that everyone would be well aware of the difficult choices posed by downward movements in the exchange rate. Unfortunately, this does not appear to be the case. The Opposition would have Canadians believe that with rising United States interest rates, it is somehow possible to raise the value of the Canadian dollar while simultaneously lowering interest rates in Canada.

This simplistic view, to designate it charitably, betrays a dangerous ignorance of the economic choices which must be faced by a trading nation such as Canada when confronted by a volatile international situation. Large downward movements in the exchange rate can trigger a costly inflationary spiral that would eventually reduce real growth and interest rates would inevitably go up rather than down. On the other hand, offsetting downward pressure on the exchange rate by large increases in interest rates would also reduce our near term prospects for growth.

Mr. Blenkarn: Right on.

Mr. Lalonde: I am glad to hear the Opposition say "right on" to both these statements.

Mr. Crosbie: So what are you going to do?

Mr. Lalonde: That is what I am going to tell you right now. Since recent exchange rate and interest rate pressures are not a problem of our own making at the present time, it is not one that we can eliminate ourselves.

Mr. Crosbie: The Ethiopians caused it, it was not us.

Mr. Lalonde: The question is how to respond to it. Neither the Bank of Canada nor I wish to see a substantial devaluation of the Canadian dollar with the inflation rate consequences that would follow, and which would ultimately produce higher interest rates as well. At the same time neither would we wish to see a sharp rise in interest rates, particularly at this stage of the recovery. The policy which has been followed, therefore, has been one of moderating movements, both in the exchange rate and in interest rates. My objective is to ensure that the significant and hard won gains in reducing inflation over the past two years are preserved and the momentum of our recovery is maintained.

A strong and durable recovery in this country must be based on the solid fundamentals I have discussed here today. By becoming more productive and more competitive, by holding firm to the course of fiscal and social responsibility, by building economic strength in every possible way, we can create a better economic future for Canada.

As Canadians we share the challenge of living in an economic world which falls somewhat short of being a rose garden. It is a tough, uncertain world on which we depend for much of our economic opportunity. We cannot pull down the shades and shut out the reality of that world. The sooner all of us, including the Conservatives if we can hope for that, stop pretending otherwise, the better it will be for the effort to cope with that world and make our way successfully in it.

I am confident that Canadians are rising to this challenge and will continue to do so in spite of those who parade their lack of knowledge, lack of judgment and their lack of vision in statements such as the motion we are debating today. As a matter of fact, I would say, Mr. Speaker, that this House should reject this motion, which was motivated by the political panic spreading in Opposition ranks.

I ask the Hon. Member to reflect upon the motion and consider if the following would not be more appropriate: "That this House regrets the inability of the Official Opposition to form any policies to prevent their continually sagging popularity from further decline, reverse the continuous increase in the already critical high levels of the Conservative anxiety, and combat the return to steadily rising Conservative infighting, all of which signals an end to any possible recovery of that Party and clearly demonstrates the incompetence of the Opposition and its callous attitude of ignoring the social and economic hardships that the Conservatives would impose on the Canadian people".

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I have several questions for the Minister if we have time. Certainly they worked long and hard in the Department of Finance over the weekend, Mr. Speaker, to prepare the pretty thin gruel for the Minister. Miss Goody Twoshoes must have worked overtime.

I want to be sure we have him correct. Does the Minister take the position he took on February 17, and I am looking now at The Globe and Mail, where he said he approves of the Bank of Canada's monetary policy and wants "very much more of the same"? He was referring to the fact that the central bank keeps interest rates up to support the dollar. Is the Minister telling us he approves of the Bank of Canada continuing the same monetary policy? Since we know mortgage interest rates have gone up .5 per cent and the dollar is still declining in value, and interest rates are going up as I mentioned in my speech, all of which indicates an increase in the Bank of Canada rate, is the Minister prepared to permit that process to continue? Is he prepared to contemplate an increase in interest rates if that occurs?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member knows I have weekly meetings with the Governor of the Bank of Canada. We are reviewing on a weekly basis and, if necessary, more frequently, the evolution of the economic situation, particularly having to do with exchange rates and interest rates. I have indicated before that the Government is in agreement with the policies pursued by the Governor of the Bank and there is no reason for changing that statement. The Bank of Canada and the Government share a common view on the situation and the steps to be taken. These steps are reviewed, as I said, as frequently as needed. At least once a week we examine the situation and we will continue to do the same thing in monitoring the evolution of the situation.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, in the Minister's remarks he inferred—there was not too much precision—that he was opposed to any substantial fall in the value of the Canadian dollar. Of course, he was also opposed to any sharp rise in interest rates. I carefully noted what he said. Would he define for us what a "substantial fall" is? What are the parameters? What is a sharp rise in interest rates? For example, if the prime rate goes from 11 per cent to 11.5 per cent, is that a sharp rise or does it have to go from 11 per cent to 15 per cent or 11 per cent to 22 per cent, as it went under the Liberals a year or two ago? Whawt is a sharp rise or a substantial fall, so that we will have guidance as to what the Minister is talking about?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, even the Hon. Member for St. John's West, when he was Minister of Finance, would have seen that bear trap and would not have jumped in. Although I must say I sometimes have some doubts, he might have jumped into it. I certainly am not going to give him that pleasure today.

He knows that the last thing a Minister of Finance should do is to speculate in that regard and provide specific guidelines for specific targets. The Hon. Member will have to be satisfied with what I have already stated and so will the speculators in the market.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, we have asked the Minister a serious question about whether he is going to allow the dollar to continue to fall, or is he going to increase interest rates to stop it? He said he is going to moderate the movement. I am not sure whether he plans to moderate the movement down the middle of the road or what kind of movement it is. Are you going to allow the dollar to fall to 75 cents or are you not? Are you going to allow interest rates to rise to 15 per cent or are you not? What are you going to do? Will you give us some indication of where we are going? Are we going to have more moderating movement as we blow away exchange reserves and as people speculate against the dollar, as they already are?

• (1220)

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member knows that we have had a floating dollar for over 10 years in Canada. This policy has served the country well over-all. This means that the policy of the Bank of Canada and of the Government has not been to buck the market at all costs, but to prevent excessive speculative moves in support of or against the dollar. That policy has been followed consistently over the last 10 years. It is still our policy. I have already answered that question. I wonder whether the Hon. Member was listening. I said the last thing I would do would be to indicate any particular range as that would just open the door to further speculation one way or the other. I do not intend to do that.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, could the Minister tell the House whether the Minister of Justice (Mr. MacGuigan) has spoken to him since he has been Minister of Finance about the Government's economic performance? Has he suggested to him ways in which there could be economic reform?

Yesterday the Minister of Justice announced his candidacy for the Liberal leadership. He is making the need for economic reform the centre point of his campaign. That implies that something the Minister is doing needs to be reformed, improved or changed. Has he directed any suggestion to the Minister? Why has the Minister ignored the suggestions if the Minister of Justice has made them? Could he tell the House why the Minister of Justice would wait so long to indicate what economic reforms are needed? He has been in the Government for four years. As far as the public knows, he has not opened his mouth for four years. He has allowed the economic policies to go into effect without doing anything about it. Could the Minister enlighten us? Has the Minister of Justice, even since yesterday, passed along to the Minister of Finance the nature of the economic reforms which could help the people of Canada if they went into effect?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I would be very pleased to answer at some length the question raised by the Hon. Member. First of all, all of my colleagues have contributed to the development of the last two Budgets. They have had an opportunity of having input into those Budgets with the result that a number of their recommendations have taken shape in those Budgets. As my Party is going into a leadership campaign, I hope that we will have a number of candidates who will continue to offer ideas.

Contrary to the Conservative Party, Mr. Speaker, the Party on this side of the House has been the Party of reform and responsible change. We have done this consistently through our history. We are going to continue in that direction as a Party. We are not a Party to turn to the past, as the Conservative Party does. We are not a Party of the status quo or reaction. Our Party is constantly questioning itself and its policies to make sure they are better adapted to the needs of today and tomorrow.

I would like to refer my hon. friend to my Budget of February 15 in which we introduced economic reform in the area of gain sharing programs for the workers of this country so they will have a greater interest in the future of their plants and will make sure they are more productive and competitive. We introduced reform in the pension system which will take care of part-time workers, 72 per cent of whom are women. We introduced reform in other areas of the pension field which will provide for early vesting of pensions and better portability of pensions so that the future of Canadians will be better protected. These are all areas in which we have introduced reforms in the last two Budgets. I am very happy to hear comments from candidates indicating they intend to pursue that direction rather than doing as the Conservatives have done.

The Conservatives are the Party of the status quo. They have been saying: "If you want to know where we stand, elect us". The Hon. Member for St. John's West has said: "If the people of Canada knew what we would do, we would never get elected". I think the people of Canada are seeing more and more what the Conservatives would do and they like it less and less. They cannot continue talking about more spending on defence, aid and R and D, and still reduce the deficit and taxes. As a matter of fact, the only sector I have heard the Conservatives state reasonably clearly, through the mouth of the Member for St. John's West, that they would cut was old age pensions and family allowances. In the Speech from the Throne, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that with a Conservative Government you had better not be poor, sick or old. Now they are even attacking women.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): That is the end of the 10-minute question and comment period.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, that comment from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde), the man who would spend $200 million worth of taxpayers's money to save his own face, is unconscionable. He spoke about the Party of reform and responsibility. He is correct. It is his Party that needs reform and bears the responsibility for the destruction of this nation. That is the truth, Mr. Speaker.

We are engaged today in what I would kindly refer to as a sleepership contest rather than a leadership contest. The kindest thing I can say about the candidates who are identifying themselves is that they must have been sleeping for the last four years if they have any thoughts that they belong to the right party or a party which can do anything for the country. Later this week I suspect the sleepership contest is going to turn into a sleazership contest when the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Roberts), the porkbarrel king of the nation, the slush fund king of the nation, becomes engaged in that contest.

There is no sense of joy in standing in the House of Commons today to debate this motion, Mr. Speaker. There can be nothing for the nation but a sense of sadness that the motion is necessary and that the time of the House must once again be directed to identifying for the Canadian people what has happened to the nation in the last four years of stewardship under the Liberal Government.

Earlier today there was some talk about the value of the Canadian dollar. In the last four years of Liberal leadership in the country the dollar has dropped eight cents. What is eight cents, Mr. Speaker? I will tell you what an eight-cent loss in the Canadian dollar is for someone who lives on an income of about $5 an hour, or on a pension or unemployment insurance of between $800 and $1,000 a month. It means between $64 and $80 a month in lost purchasing power. That is an amount greater than the Minister of Finance has chosen to give to the senior citizens of the nation through the guaranteed income supplement. On the one hand they get publicity through the Budget by saying they are going to help the seniors. Hidden on the other hand, Mr. Speaker, is the loss in value of the Canadian dollar and the loss in purchasing power. The senior citizens of Canada will be worse off after those four years of stewardship than they were at the beginning.

There is lots of public relations and positive public profile: "Out here we give you money but over here we take it away from you through hidden taxes and lost value of the Canadian dollar". Canadians should look around and ask whether they are really better off financially four years after the last election. Do they have more discretionary cash? Can they go to more movies? Can they eat in a restaurant more often? Or have they had to batten down the hatches? Has something mysterious been happening to their income? Are they facing a situation in which they have fewer discretionary dollars to spend? Must they put a higher proportion of income into basic necessities, such as food, clothing and shelter?

The overwhelming response to that question in this nation is yes. After four years, Canadians must spend a much larger portion of their income on the basic necessities of life—food, clothing and shelter. They have less discretionary spending money available. That has been the legacy of the Government's Budgets. It takes money with hidden taxes. It does not disturb personal income tax too much but slides the taxes in through energy, manufactured products and unemployment insurance payments. While this money is taken through hidden taxes, it has devalued the dollar. That means another eight cents has gone from everyone's dollar in the last four years simply through devaluation. It is dishonest, immoral and bad for the nation.

This morning I would like to concentrate on the issue of unemployment because I believe it is the number one problem in this country. The Minister of Finance stands up and talks about deficits, taxes and other matters. It is true that we do have a deficit. This means that we are spending today and taxing our children tomorrow to pay for those borrowed funds. Would there be a deficit if the 1.5 million unemployed Canadians had employment? Would it be necessary to raise taxes to try to balance the Budget if those 1.5 million unemployed Canadians could be put to work so that they could become taxpayers instead of tax spenders? Common sense dictates that the only way out of the economic mess into which the Liberals have put this country, with the aid of the NDP, is to elect a government whose priority will be the re-employment of 1.5 million Canadians who currently are not working so that they can be turned into taxpayers.

There is an interesting page from The Globe and Mail of Saturday last. The headline of one article is "Jobless Rate Climbs to 11.3 per cent". The headline below that reads "Jobless Rate in the U.S. Falls to 7.8 per cent". During the last ten years we have heard a great deal about our problems being beyond our control and how we are tied to international events. I suggest that we would be better off if that were true. Other nations are doing better than Canada. For instance, while our unemployment rate climbs, the unemployment rate in the United States falls. Our unemployment rate is almost 50 per cent higher than it is in the United States, in spite of the fact that our country has greater resource potential per person than any other country in the world. This nation has the potential for its people to enjoy the highest standard of living ever known to anyone in the world. Instead, we are ranked at 13 and 14 with respect to our standard of living.

When the Government and its leadership sleepers were first elected, our country had the second highest standard of living in the world and there was optimism that it could be higher. But our position has fallen, not because of international events but because of domestic policy. Our position has fallen as a result of the choices made by the Liberal Cabinet and approved by Liberal back benchers, augmented by votes from the NDP when necessary. The tragedy of this nation if that we have seen a coalition of those who live in a dream world, those who do not have their feet on the ground, and the election of people who make policies from some kind of wispish thoughts that exist in their own heads. Not only do they make policies without listening to elected Members, but they do not take the trouble to go out into the country and listen to people who do have their feet on the ground, those who make this country work on a daily basis.

I stood here almost four years ago in the Fall of 1980 and told the Government that the policies it was putting in place would lead to a massive increase in unemployment in this nation which, in turn, would lead to increased heart attacks, alcoholism, depression, suicides and wife battering. The Minister of Labour at that time said that there are no such figures. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said I was out of my tree, that those things would not happen. They were predictable then by anyone who took the trouble to look at the scientific data. They were predictable phenomena and they have happened.

What would a government with its feet on the ground have done in anticipation of this occurrence? One would expect that if a government knew it was causing increases in unemployment, it would be a compassionate, reform-minded and responsible government. One could have expected it to spend money to deal with the problems it was causing. Surely when a problem is predictable, one would take steps to help take care of the problem. But what did the Government do? It began to cut expenditures in those areas in which it was increasing costs.

According to the Canadian Constitution, the provincial governments in our society have jurisdiction over delivery of health care services, educational services and welfare services. We have seen Ministers of Finance setting public policy to create an increase in health care costs, educational costs and welfare costs for services which provincial governments provide. The federal Government cuts its contribution to that level of government and then has the gall to say to the nation that the provincial governments are not doing their share. The provincial governments were not the cause of the problem. They have struggled mightily to deal with the consequences of the problem caused by the federal Government but their job has been hampered by the deliberate budgetary decisions made by the federal Government to cut spending in areas where need would predictably go up.

We have seen so much flim-flam in the four years that the Government has been in power. We have seen one study group after another examine the problems of unemployment. Last week, another study group reported on the need for educational leave. For 14 months I served as vice-chairman of the parliamentary task force on employment in the 1980s, along with the Member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid). There were seven members of the committee; four Liberals, one NDP and two Conservatives. I remember one occasion in Yellowknife. Do you know who was there, Mr. Speaker? There were the two Conservatives but none of the five others. There were no votes in Yellowknife for them—

• (1240)

Mr. McDermid: It was too far to come.

Mr. Hawkes: —so they did not bother to come and listen. They did not bother to learn.

We spent 14 months on that task force. We prepared 200-plus recommendations for the Government of Canada. They had several themes in them. We asked the Government to accept all or part of those recommendations. By doing so it would begin to make progress in solving the unemployment problem. We know that to be true because we spent 14 months listening to Canadians. We listened to those working in all corners of this land, those with their feet on the ground and those with practical solutions. We brought our report back to this Chamber. It was taken to the Cabinet. But what has been done about it? What has the Government done about the advice it received in 1981? I will tell you, Mr. Speaker. Virtually nothing has been done.

What have successive Ministers done? They have appointed more task forces. We have known for a long, long time that somewhere near 30 per cent of the labour force, adults working or wanting to work, are functionally illiterate. These people do not have enough educational background to be full participants in the computer age. They do not have enough educational background to participate fully in training or retraining for the jobs of the future. That has been a well-known phenomenon in Canada decade after decade.

In the last four years what has this Government done in response to that? The Government has ignored the recommendations, but the Government has gone a step further. It has gone in the opposite direction. This compassionate bunch on the other side of the House tells us it cares about humanity. But it has cut the basic skills funding, which is the funding dedicated to teaching people to read and write. The Government has said that was the priority, and that the 30 per cent of the people in the labour force who are unable to do that sufficiently well are not the Government's concern. The Government would just as soon keep them on the welfare rolls and rotate them in and out of unemployment insurance. That way they are more likely to vote for the Government. It is a policy of this Government which says: "We do not care enough about these people to provide the funding for them to learn to read, write and compete with other Canadians".

Last week the latest advisory task force reported to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. This task force said that the first thing the country must tackle is the illiteracy problem. It said that to a government which has cut out that kind of funding in the last four years. This is the fifth or sixth major study group in the last four years to make the same recommendation. The would-be leadership candidate from the City of Toronto did not even have the courage to say the task force was right, that the problem was a major one but a solvable problem which should be given priority.

Mr. McDermid: The Liberals do not want to admit it.

Mr. Hawkes: The would-be leadership candidate did not have the wisdom or courage to go public immediately and say yes, the task force is right.

Mr. McDermid: They do not want to admit it.

Mr. Hawkes: As my colleague said, they do not want to admit that the problem has been around for the 15, 19 or 20 years they have been in power. This Government does not want to bring to the public's attention that it has thrown into the ashcan 30 per cent of the Canadian labour force when it comes to looking to the future and looking to the jobs of the future.

This is a government that tells Canadians through tax policy to invest in physical things—buildings, cement, bricks and mortar. But its through tax policy it does not give a whit about the average Canadian. This Government does not provide the kinds of tax breaks for individuals to invest in themselves. It does not care about human capital. It is a Government that believes in things, not people.

Look inside the Budget we are criticizing here today, Mr. Speaker, and you will find not only in this Budget but in all predecessor Budgets that every bit of good advice the Government gets about the need to invest in human beings is ignored and all of the tax breaks go to investment in things. The Liberal Party is a Party that needs reform and the voters of Canada will make sure they get it at the first opportunity.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) mentioned the task force concerning employment opportunities in the 1980s. One of the shocking features we found as we travelled across Canada was the rate of functional illiteracy. It shocked me and I know it shocked all members of the task force. For some reason the federal Government has backed off working in the area of basic skills training. Would the Hon. Member expand just a little bit on the recommendations that were given by the employment opportunities task force.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, there were several thrusts in the task force report which I think are very important. First, there was a clear-cut thrust to encourage individual Canadians and Canadian business to invest in human capital and to use the tax system to encourage that kind of investment. That recommendation has been totally ignored for three years, and it has not been brought up in leadership campaign speeches.

Second, there was the clear identification of populations at special risk, which include the handicapped, the functionally illiterate and people returning to the labour force after 20 years. Considerable time and attention was spent on how to target assistance to those groups so they could be fully participating, functioning members of the labour force in the shortest time possible. Virtually all of those recommendations, have been ignored.

There were recommendations about the need for forecasting, simple data gathering, so that someone could speak to young people and say: "This looks like the pattern of employment in the future, and these look like the kinds of job skills that will be required in the future". Young people could then make decent educational choices. This is 1984, Mr. Speaker, and that system is not in place. That data is not available. Young people are left to guess how best to invest in their personal educational future without the kind of data base the country so badly needs.

We still have enormous amounts of federal money being spent on obsolete skills.

Mr. McDermid: Right.

Mr. Hawkes: We have enormous gaps. Employers cannot hire people with the right skills. What we have seen is the creation of slush funds. Instead of putting money into educating our young people, into re-educating those whose skills have become obsolete and investing in work force returnees, we have taken hundreds of millions of dollars and put them into the hands of Ministers so they can create jobs for their friends, using tax dollars to ensure the re-election of Liberal Members of Parliament. That is obscene and has to be stopped. Canadians are awaiting an opportunity to put an end to it for all time.

• (1250)

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Hon. Member a question. I wonder whether he could give me an explanation. I notice that the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Roberts), who is not present this morning, urged the Liberal Party to adopt new policies for the 1980s. He said that what is needed is a new Liberalism characterized by new policies that would prepare Canada for the challenge of the future. He thinks there is a need for a new Liberalism in Canada. I think there is as well—a Liberalism which is out of power, in particular. Also the Minister of Justice (Mr. MacGuigan) wants economic reform in Canada. The Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development (Mr. Johnston) said that people have to understand that governments simply cannot borrow, borrow and borrow, but the Government plans to borrow $119 billion in the next four years. Could the Hon. Member venture a guess as to why these Ministers are disagreeing with the Government? They have been in power now for 16 years. Why does the Hon. Member think they are coming out now? Are they not somewhat late in realizing that there is a need for change? Could we have a comment on that?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): At this stage I draw to the attention of the House that theoretically questions should be based upon the speech of the Hon. Member who has just spoken. Perhaps the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) would be able to rephrase his questions in the future.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, there is an assumption in the Hon. Member's question which I do not accept. That assumption is that they have even thought about whether there is a need for new policy. It is crystal clear that we have a Party on the other side which speaks about the need for new policies. It speaks about the problem of 18 cents per gallon and it speaks about the problem of wage and price controls. They say one thing and do another. That pattern is so consistent that we really cannot listen to the words they use. They use words like "new" because the pollsters tell them that is a new age. They work into their speeches the word "new" with the greatest frequency possible, but there is absolutely no evidence that anyone on the other side understands the problems faced by average Canadians or understands the potential solutions to the problems which average Canadians would propose. All we have are polls, catch phrases and supposedly new thoughts. They use the word "new" without thought. I think a close examination of the pattern over time will disclose that to the satisfaction of Canadians. It really is a sleepership contest.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): The Hon. Member for St. John's West on a short supplementary relating to the speech of the Hon. Member.

Mr. Crosbie: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The Hon. Member mentioned a sleeperama which is going on—the Liberal convention. Why is it that John Turner, a man who has not been in public for nine years, appears to be the only hope for the Liberal Party? Does the Hon. Member feel that these other gentlemen should retire from the race and accept the inevitable, that only a person who has had no association with the Liberal Party for nine years even has a chance to be considered by the Canadian public?

Mr. Hawkes: It is a well-known—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): I would find it very difficult to relate that question to the speech of the Hon. Member. However, I will allow the Hon. Member to respond.

Mr. Hawkes: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think the Hon. Member who asks the question realizes that I have a Ph.D in psychology. There is a great deal to be said for the human memory. When we are dealing with yesterday's man, it is easier to view him in a positive light because yesterday was so long ago. Today's man is an absolute disaster. Everyone has that at the forefront of their memory. Anyone who is tagged with today's problems will be easier for us to defeat. Yesterday's man, because of the lapse of human memory—and only for that reason—stands a little higher in public opinion polls. As today's people remember yesterday's man, we could expect the feet of clay and the sinking to occur rather rapidly as well.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I read this particular motion several times. Each time I read it, the cynicism grabbed me. I find it very difficult to understand an opposition Party attempting to condemn the Government without having the vaguest idea how it would go about improving some of the situations it condemns.

I spoke on a subject very similar to this the other day. I looked around and tried to find answers but I could not find any answers to the problems coming from the other side, except in so far as I detected an idea that they might do the same as the President of the United States—they might follow Reaganomics to solve the problems.

When one talks about the Canadian dollar being in decline, one has to look at the American dollar and the American economy and wonder if that decline is not caused by the very policies which the Opposition would bring into play. Let us look at the two major problems facing the American economy today. One is the extent of the U.S. deficit and, of course, the other is the extent of the U.S. balance of trade deficit. In terms of the U.S. deficit, it stands at about 6.1 per cent of the Gross National Product. One can say that our deficit is 6.8 per cent or 6.9 per cent of the GNP, and I would agree. However, the point of the matter is that there are differences in the accounting which affect how we have to look at the problem. For instance, according to the congressional office, the United States deficit will use up almost 100 per cent of all capital formed in the country in the next year. It will squeeze out any other investment unless it comes from offshore. That is not the situation with our deficit; it is definitely not the situation since we have 2.5 times the capital formation or the savings ratio of the United States.

In other words, given the size of the economy we have 2.5 times as much investment capital available as the United States. Our deficit will not cut into that in any significant way. That is not the problem.

The other factor is that the U.S. congressional office indicates that its deficit is almost 100 per cent structural. That is caused by two things—by the lowering of taxes and the raising of defence budgets. This is exactly the kind of thing I hear from the other side, if I hear anything—lower taxes and raise the defence budget. The structural nature of that deficit is such that unless those two things are reversed the deficit will not disappear but will continue to grow. About half our deficit is structural. In other words, as the economy improves the deficit will disappear or come down to about half what it is today.

Mr. Nickerson: That is not true.

Mr. McRae: Those are two very important factors. Hon. Members opposite shake their heads, but I ask them tho show me where I am wrong. They are not dealing with these factors. They are talking about something that is out there. They are talking about condemning a government without having any idea how they will go about changing things, except some kind of loose thing which says that they will follow Reaganomics.

Mr. McDermid: Then how come the deficit has gone up every year since Turner?

Mr. McRae: I see that it is one o'clock. I would like to have a rest and get started again as soon as we resume Orders of the Day.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

THE COMMONWEALTH

COMMEMORATION OF COMMONWEALTH DAY

Mrs. Suzanne Beauchamp-Niquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, today, Canada and other countries are celebrating Commonwealth Day. At the meeting of Commonwealth Heads of State held in Jamaica in 1975, the Prime Minister suggested that one day be set aside each year to mark our membership of this unique association.

The second Monday of March was chosen, and it was agreed to use this day mainly for educational purposes, and especially to make Canadian students more interested in the Commonwealth and its many activities throughout the world.

Many of us have heard about meetings of Commonwealth Heads of State, Ministers and senior officials, and about the close links that exist between Commonwealth parliamentarians. However, many people may not be aware of the existence of more than 250 volunteer organizations that belong to the Commonwealth and which include people from all levels of society, professional associations, union leaders, academics, students and other groups. Such personal, close contacts with people from all over the world are a factor in strengthening our ties with the Commonwealth and create a climate of international stability for future generations.

I wonder how many people know that Canada has played a key role over the years in the history of the Commonwealth, which has evolved from being a former colonial empire to become an egalitarian association of independent nations, all of whom recognize the Queen as their symbolic Head. They still do so today, and the Commonwealth remains an important part of their foreign policy.

The Commonwealth is also one of the major channels through which aid provided by Canada goes to developing countries. Canadians can be proud of the fact that their country is the most important donor to the Commonwealth fund for technical co-operation, which provides for development aid through the Commonwealth Secretariat.

Mr. Speaker, the Commonwealth is the oldest multilateral association of which Canada is a member, and it is more active than ever. Since Commonwealth Day last year, two more independent nations, St. Kitts and Nevis and Brunei have become members, bringing the total number to forty-nine. This network of countries, large and small, rich and poor, in North and South, with a multitude of races and religions, is a unique forum for discussion, with a frank and straightforward exchange of views in a family atmosphere. It is an example for the rest of the world of multilateral co-operation that works.

Mr. Speaker, for this reason, it is appropriate that we should celebrate this day and remember what the Commonwealth means to us.

COMMONWEALTH DAY

SALUTE TO FAMILY OF NATIONS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, today, Monday, March 12, the second Monday in March, is Commonwealth Day. It was a Canadian initiative in 1975 that set aside a regular day each year to commemorate this unique institution, an organization now of some 49 countries of all races, creeds, and cultures, varying from large, continent-sized states such as Canada and Australia, to such small island states whose names are barely known in the rest of the world, like Kiribati and Tuvalu in the South Pacific, all of which recognize Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II as head of the Commonwealth, while many, such as Canada, recognize her as head of state as well.

The Commonwealth's main institution, though far from formal, is its regular meetings of heads of government which, rather than relying on executive powers for effectiveness, provide instead a forum for free discussion and debate where individual states' mutual concerns can be freely aired in private discussion. This, I suggest, is the Commonwealth's greatest strength.

Today we salute the Commonwealth as a free family of nations, bound together by mutual respect and a commitment to living together peaceably in a troubled world, a salute to the common weal of the nations of the Commonwealth.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SOCIAL SECURITY

OLD AGE PENSIONS—OBJECTIONS TO NOMENCLATURE

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, today I would like to raise an issue which was brought to my attention by a concerned constituent of Malpeque regarding the title given to pensions for our senior citizens. This gentleman was deeply concerned over the fact that the pensions given to the aged had to be termed "Old Age Security". He feels it is unnecessary to draw attention to the fact that it is an old age benefit, and that a less harsh term such as "Senior Citizen Security" could and should be used. In the United States these pensions are referred to as Social Security Pensions, not Old Age Pensions.

None of us like to be reminded of the fact we are growing older. Old age is still something that we really do not look forward to because we may begin to feel a little outdated. Although this is certainly not true, we still usually equate old age with the feeling of increased helplessness.

The term "old age security" is inaccurate, because who is to determine the age at which one becomes old? The age of 65 in today's society is certainly not old. Therefore old age security is not an appropriate term for such pensions. The term "senior citizen" is more appropriate for people over the age of 65 because they are the senior citizens of Canada. Many people at the age of 65 are more active than people many years younger. For these reasons I feel that the term "Old Age Security Pension" should be changed to "Senior Citizens Security".

I hope that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) will consider my suggestion and see if the term "old age" can be dropped from pensions for those over the age of 65 years.

MUSEUMS AND ART GALLERIES

ART GALLERY OF HAMILTON—SUGGESTED DESIGNATION AS ASSOCIATE MUSEUM

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, for a number of years the Art Gallery of Hamilton, which is located in my riding of Hamilton West, has applied to the National Museums of Canada to receive associate museum status. Unfortunately there has been a moratorium on assigning the associate museum designation to any art gallery or museum in Canada since 1975.

This moratorium has meant that a select group of 25 art galleries and museums across Canada have been given an overtly favoured position with regard to funding assistance by the federal Government. The Art Gallery of Hamilton has the fourth largest collection of art in Canada after the National Gallery, the Montreal Art Gallery, and the Art Gallery of Ontario. Because of the quality and scope of the Art Gallery of Hamilton, it deserves to be granted associate status and an equal chance at receiving some of the $3 million which is annually distributed to the select group of museums and are galleries which now have associate museum status.

I wholeheartedly endorse the application of the Art Gallery of Hamilton for this status, and I strongly encourage the federal Government and the National Museums Corporation to conclude their current review of this program and to grant the Art Gallery of Hamilton associate museum status.

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS

DELAY IN ANNOUNCING GOVERNMENT'S POSITION

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, the Constitutional Conference on aboriginal rights in Canada last week was watched not only by thousands but by millions of Canadians, with great interest. At the end of that conference, which some claimed not to be a success, but I do not know whether they can say that justifiably, I felt that one of the major problems was that the Canadian Government did not have a position until the conference opened.

As late as last week my colleague from Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands was questioning the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) about the Government's position, and was not able to get one at that time. That was a poor preparation for the start of the conference. When the Prime Minister did give a position, and the position of the right to self-government, which I support, that brought into the meetings a shock and tension that did not have to be there. I believe that kind of announcement should have been made one month, two months, or even six months ago. I believe that if the provinces and the aboriginal people had had time to examine that proposition beforehand there could have been a much more reasonable response. The dynamic became too hot, too tense, and I feel that it did not accomplish what it could have accomplished.

• (1410)

On a positive note, Governments representing all three Parties, the Liberals, the Conservatives and the NDP, are on side on that particularly important question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

SPORTS

BRIER CURLING CHAMPIONSHIP—TRIBUTE TO MANITOBA RINK

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, countries are identified with events which symbolize their sporting heritage. For example, Greece is identified with the first Olympic Games, and Scotland as the birth place of curling.

In Canada curling has captured the attention of sporting fans through the years, and every year during Brier week this interest reaches a fever pitch.

Manitoba has won 22 Briers in the 54 years it has been held, more Briers than any province. In fact many argue that when the snow begins to fly in the Prairies, we talk only about the price of wheat and next year's crop prospects—and we curl.

As a Manitoban I am also proud to remind the House that rinks representing Manitoba have won three national championships this year. As well as the Brier, there were the Scott Tournament of Hearts, which is the women's championship, and the junior championship.

Yesterday the rink representing Manitoba again won the Brier. Mike Riley, Brian Toews, John Helston, and Russ Wookey maintained the tradition of curling supremacy. I am sure all Canadians and Members of the House not only congratulate them but our hopes go with them as they travel to the Silver Broom in Duluth, Minnesota.

REQUEST FOR SUPPLEMENTARY FUNDS FOR NORTHERN CITIES

Mr. André Maltais (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, during the weekend I was in Fermont where a farewell ceremony was held for its mayor, Mr. Jean-Claude Ménard. I was invited by Mr. Richard Cassista. The reception at the hotel in Fermont was excellent, as is always the case in northern communities. I would like to point out, for the benefit of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde), how pleased everyone was to hear that a moratorium on taxing northern benefits had been maintained. I was asked to point this out here in the House. The people in these northern communities also asked me to tell you the Official Opposition should agree to increase the funds available for the riding of Manicouagan, and for northern communities in general. I met the leader of the metal workers' union up there, Mr. Hervé Bérubé, and I promised him we would have special projects for northern communities, because the people there need them. At this stage, I would like to ask the co-operation of the Official Opposition so that we can get additional funding. I think it is important to do something about unemployment and help people who are in need.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ABSENCE OF MINISTER OF TRANSPORT FROM AUTOMOBILE EMISSION HEARINGS

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, important acid rain hearings were held in Toronto last Thursday and Friday dealing with the important issue of auto emissions. What was surprising was that invitations were extended to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Axworthy) and his officials to take part, only to be ignored.

I see it as important at these meetings attended by the Automobile Manufacturers Association, the Auto Workers Union in Canada, Department of the Environment officials, along with many other important groups and dedicated individuals, that Department of Transport officials attend. The hearings were otherwise well attended and received wide public attention and media coverage.

The Minister of Transport should be reprimanded for missing these very important meetings on auto emission reductions. We are too far behind the U.S. regarding auto emission controls. Here, our new automobiles can legally emit five times the hydro-carbons, seven times the carbon monoxides, and three times the nitrogen oxides allowed in the U. S. Let us hope that the Minister will see fit to attend the next important meeting.

BRIER CURLING CHAMPIONSHIP—TRIBUTE TO MANITOBA RINK

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Mr. Speaker, as a Manitoban and as a sports fan I would like to join my friend, the Hon. Member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), and indulge in a wee bit of smugness this afternoon. Being here in Ottawa last week and reading and listening to the local media coverage of the Brier curling championship, one would have thought that a lot of time could have been saved simply by awarding the prize to the Ontario team. Even today's press referred to the Ontario loss as an "upset".

I do not want to belittle Ed Werenich's skill. After all, he learned and developed his curling talent while growing up in Manitoba. But the record speaks for itself, Mr. Speaker. Manitoba breeds superior curlers. Almost one half of the 50 or so Brier champions have been from Manitoba. This superiority has been demonstrated yet again the last three weekends—first with victory in the junior men's championship by Manitoba's Bob Ursel; the following weekend another Manitoban, Connie Laliberté captured the women's championship, and then yesterday, in an outstanding display of superior skill, Mike Riley—from guess where—led his rink to the Brier win.

To all of these teams I say congratulations—and best wishes as they move on to the world championships. To the Ontario media I say: Sit up and take note of where the real curling talent really lies.

NATIONAL REVENUE

ROWE REPORT ON AUDITING OF FISHERMEN'S INCOMES

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. In December, 1982, the Minister received a report commissioned by his predecessor, from Mr. William Rowe, a lawyer who was asked to look into the situation regarding audits of fishermen. He received that in December, 1982. It is a blistering report and a first class piece of work.

For the most part, the fishermen that the Department went after lived barely above the poverty line. The report pointed out that they did not have the benefit of a formal education, and Mr. Rowe asked this rhetorical question:

> The Department of National Revenue will have to answer for itself if its project was worth it in terms of net amounts recovered, hostility, disruption, financial hardship and diminution of morale and self-esteem.

That is precisely the question I pose to the Minister. Were the seizures of the catches of so many fishermen, the seizures of the bank accounts and the bankruptcies, worth the candle?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I would urge the Hon. Member to read very carefully the report to which he has referred. He will come to the conclusion that most of the recommendations made to the Minister in the report have been implemented. Those having to do with—I see the Hon. Member indicating he disagrees with me. Obviously, he will never admit that the Department followed up on the recommendations contained in the report, excepting of course those which did not fall under the Department's responsibility. I can understand why he is hurting since he is drawing a false conclusion from the report. He is selecting excerpts with which he can agree, which confirm his preconceived ideas and the misgivings that he has been voicing for weeks but that the people keep ignoring because they know they are unfounded. Unfortunately for him, every matter concerning the Department of National Revenue has been followed up.

[English]

IMPLEMENTATION OF REPORT'S RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, it is particularly galling to me that the Minister who, month after month, has denied that there is anything wrong in his Department, has the audacity to say that he has followed up on the 15 recommendations in the report. Will the Minister specifically tell the House what recommendations have been implemented?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, two recommendations come to my mind. Mr. Rowe urged us to provide better training to our people who audit fishermen. We did set up a special program so that our officials who audit individual taxpayers such as fishermen will be more qualified. As recommended by Mr. Rowe, the amount of seizures has been reduced from 50 to 25 per cent and we have kept it at that level. The Hon. Member has chosen to ignore those two measures which were positive responses to the recommendations of Mr. Rowe. I could give him a whole series of such measures, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

MINISTERIAL CONTROL OF DEPARTMENT

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. One of the most important criticisms contained in the report is on page 79, and reads as follows:

—negative attitude of taxpayers and commentators regarding the operations of the Department may have been perceived lack of control, management, and direction over the whole income tax apparatus by the country's elected policy makers.

He is referring specifically to Ministers of National Revenue. There have been eight Ministers of National Revenue in the course of 10 years. They have not put a bridle on their Department, and there has been no sense of ministerial control. It is the Prime Minister of Canada who has to accept responsibility for that. Does the Prime Minister agree with the criticism on page 79 of the Rowe report?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not read the report, but I have listened attentively to the answers of the Minister. It seems to me that he should have satisfied any impartial questioner that the ministry did act on the report.

SEIZURE OF FISHERMEN'S INCOME

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that if the Prime Minister had read the report he would have found in it the statement that the auditing project on fishermen in Newfoundland and the maritime provinces had an extremely traumatic effect. Mr. Rowe visited several hundred homes and found there was a pervasive feeling of fear and powerlessness among the families of fishermen who had been audited, and of anxious and hostile anticipation among those who had not.

● (1420)

In view of the fact that there were 23,400 fishermen who filed returns in Newfoundland in 1980, and some 2,100 who were on the responsibility status, and that their average income was only $7,481 a year—below the poverty line in rural areas—can the Minister explain to the House why his agents were permitted to garnishee 50 per cent of all the gross returns to those fishermen from fish buyers, merchants, and the like? Why was that kind of thing permitted to be imposed upon people who were already below the poverty line, resulting in the pervasive feeling of fear and powerlessness? That is what the Prime Minister was supposed to be doing, checking on these kinds of things, Mr. Speaker, not ignoring them.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has always been known for his hollow and empty rhetoric, so I am surprised he showed his ignorance of the facts as well. The garnishee rate has been brought down from 50 per cent to 25 per cent. I realize the Hon. Member is not very aware of what is going on in the fisheries in Newfoundland, but he ought to know that there has been a 50 per cent reduction in the number of garnishees.

Furthermore, when the Hon. Member was Minister of Finance he could have introduced some good proposals in the House to change the tax system as it applies to fishermen. In fact, at the time the present Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs provided, in his Budget, another option for fishermen, a kind of payroll deduction that would help them pace their instalments in a manner far more appropriate to the kind of business they operate, which meant they would be able to pay instalments in the form of payroll deductions. The Hon. Member totally ignored fishermen when he brought down his own Budget.

[English]

Mr. Crosbie: Does the Minister not realize that the Budget of the Minister of Finance came 14 months after the Minister had this report? He did nothing for 14 months until he was forced by this side of the House to take some action.

RECOMMENDED AMENDMENT OF INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Rowe said in his report that the powers in the Act are unlimited in range, that the Minister's responsibility for the actions of his officials is legal fiction, and that the bureaucrats are really in charge. He recommended that a special task force of Justice Department lawyers, outside tax lawyers and accountants, and progressive officials from the Department, draft amendments to the Income Tax Act to guarantee better legal protection for taxpayers. He said that the provisions of the Act are in conflict with the basic protections guaranteed in the Charter of Rights.

What has the Minister done to carry out any of those recommendations, including the fact that a taxpayer is now required, apparently, to incriminate himself out of his own mouth? What reforms has the Minister instituted, what changes has he started? Has he appointed the task force? When will we see the legislation which carries out the recommendations in this report? Where does the Minister of Finance stand?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have already given three examples of very positive responses by the Department to the Rowe Report. I could give him a long list as well.

As for amendments to provisions in the Act concerning the powers of the Department, this is a matter that comes under the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice and the Department of Finance, as the Hon. Member ought to know.

Regarding the time it took us to respond to a recommendation to have a form of payroll deduction for fishermen, that was done when the present Secretary of State for External Affairs was Minister of Finance. If the Hon. Member had been the least bit interested in fishermen, he would have done the same when he had a chance to bring down a Budget, but he totally ignored the people that should have been his primary concern, the people from his own province and especially the poor fishermen of Newfoundland.

CORPORATE TAXES—LOSSES ATTRIBUTED TO MULTINATIONALS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. There was another report on the weekend that clearly indicates that if the Government spent more time dealing with multinationals in terms of tax revenue, it would not have to harass small businesses all across Canada. Considering that the report has indicated that we are losing, not millions, but billions of dollars because of loopholes in our tax laws, as they effect the performance of multinational corporations in Canada, will the Minister confirm that there are loopholes which multinationals are using, including the establishment of tax havens abroad, which are costing us billions of dollars in lost revenues? Will he specifically tell us how much annually it has been estimated we are losing because of these loopholes? And what action does the Government plan to take to fill them?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, not agreeing with the premise of the question, I cannot agree with its conclusion.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, that will surprise no one. A Government which has increased the taxes of ordinary people by billions of dollars, which harasses small business people all across the country, simply cannot be expected to deal with multinationals in a serious way.

SITUATION OF DRUG COMPANIES

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): I would like to ask the Minister of National Revenue, then, since the Minister of Finance has decided to ignore the question, if he will confirm that his Department is at work now trying to get an estimated $80 million in lost revenue from multionational drug companies in Canada for the period between 1975 and 1978. And does he agree with officials from his own Department who have said, concerning these drug companies: "We do think we are being hosed"? Does the Minister think that the people of Canada are being hosed by these drug companies, and by others? And, if so, what does he think ought to be done about it?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I do not want either to confirm or to refute this figure since all such figures are hypothetical.

However, the Hon. Member will understand that it is extremely difficult for the Department of Revenue to make comprehensive audits in cases such as those involving money transfers provided for under taxation treaties with various countries.

On the other hand, I will tell him that we place particular emphasis on the training of the auditors who must deal with such situations to make sure that, irrespective of the amounts involved, all the companies concerned, whatever the nature of their operations, may be audited as adequately as possible and expected to pay their share of taxes. Other taxpayers must not have to bear the burden of taxes which these companies might try to evade.

ESTIMATED SIZE OF TAX LOSS ATTRIBUTABLE TO MULTINATIONAL CORPORATIONS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I notice the Minister of Finance applauding that. The Minister knows it is his responsibility, not the Minister of National Revenue, to pass the tax law. Therefore, noting that the New Democratic Party has been saying for years that we have been losing millions of dollars in revenue because of loopholes in the corporate tax structure, and since the Minister pays more attention to business groups, I would like to ask him if he is aware that the Arthur Anderson firm of chartered accountants made an estimate on the weekend that we are losing $3.5 billion a year because of these loopholes. Specifically, if we received that sum of money into our tax revenue, it would be enough to take every pensioner in Canada out of the poverty level, or reduce unemployment over the next few months to 8 per cent. Therefore, will the Minister exercise his responsibility to the people of Canada and make sure the multinational corporations pay their share of the tax burden?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to the Hon. Member that any fair examination of the Canadian corporate taxation regime would indicate to him that Canada has as tight a corporate taxation regime as that of any other industrialized country.

Mr. Broadbent: I cannot believe it.

Mr. Lalonde: My friend cannot believe it, because he has not studied the matter. I invite him to take the time to study the matter, to consult and check with experts in the field, and he will find that the rules, for instance, in Canada, concerning the transfer of income and transfers abroad are as tight as those of any other industrialized country.

• (1430)

As far as doing something with regard to small business is concerned, to which my hon. friend referred in his question to the Minister of National Revenue, I remind him that in my last Budget in particular I took steps to simplify the tax system for the small business sector. We are going to cut by two-thirds the tax laws regulating small business, and we are going to add another $150 million in tax incentives for the small and medium sized business sector. This is over and above the measures announced last April which were again biased in favour of the small business sector. This Government has shown more concern for small business than at any other time in our history, and I intend to pursue this line.

THE ADMINISTRATION

GOVERNMENT'S MANAGEMENT OF BUREAUCRACY

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board who must have noted on Thursday evening, on the CBC Journal, that his colleague, the Minister of state for Economic and Regional Development, said, as he kicked off his leadership drive, that the Government, and I quote his exact words:

—can't even manage our own bureaucracy properly.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McDermid: Way to go, Gary Hart.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, would the Minister indicate if he agrees with this stinging indictment of his actions to date with respect to the bureaucracy? Does he agree that the Government cannot manage its own bureaucracy? Or is he more inclined to refute his colleague and demonstrate once again the discord which exists in the Cabinet?

Mr. Lalonde: We are not Tories.

Hon. Herb Gray (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I have to apologize to both my hon. friend and the CBC Journal because I did not see the particular program. For that reason I think the most sensible thing for me to do is to check exactly what was said.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gray: Having said that, I would like to thank my hon. friend for his interest in the leadership campaign of the Liberal Party. I notice that he did not do so well when he tried, and perhaps he would like to see how others can do a better job of it.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I thought I did pretty well last June.

Mr. Regan: I am not impressed.

CROWN CORPORATIONS—STATEMENT ATTRIBUTED TO MINISTER OF STATE FOR ECONOMIC AND REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance, who may even be changing his spots; I see he has an Adam Smith tie on today.

Referring again to the same CBC Journal program on which the Minister for Economic and Regional Development, who, I note, has not even been in the House since, stated, and I quote directly—

Some Hon. Members: There he is.

Mr. Crosbie: They moved his seat.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Took the paper bag off his head.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: The Minister will be able to check this wording, but the exact wording is:

I'm not interested in seeing the Government managing private sector enterprises, except in very rare circumstances . . . by and large, it's a terrible mistake.

Would the Minister of Finance indicate whether he agrees with his colleague when he makes that statement? If so, how does he rationalize that statement with the fact that in his fiscal plan, brought in with the Budget on February 15, he provided for $6.8 billion to cover the deficits of government-run businesses between now and 1988?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised the Hon. Member would be so confused if he cannot even see across the aisle whether Ministers are in the House or not. I would point out that recently the Minister of State for Economic Development moved to the left.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Depends which way you look at it.

Mr. Lalonde: As far as the specific question the Hon. Member has raised is concerned, I would like to point out that the Government has had a policy of supporting Crown corporations in many areas which are very important for the future of the country, going all the way from CNR to corporations like—

Mr. Crosbie: Canadair.

Mr. Lalonde: —to corporations like Canadair, indeed, and de Havilland, which we in this Party and this Government have supported, and will support—

Mr. Crosbie: PetroCan.

Mr. Lalonde: —because we believe it is very important for Canada to remain competitive and active in a number of sectors where we have the potential for the development of high technology.

Oral Questions

UNIVERSALITY OF PROGRAMS—STATEMENT ATTRIBUTED TO MINISTER OF STATE FOR ECONOMIC AND REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice who, I understand, is the Acting Minister for Social Development. I am sure the Minister will have followed Canada AM with Pam Wallen, where the Minister of State for Economic Development indicated in no uncertain terms that he was not in favour of the concept of universality as it applies to social programs. He said in effect that social measures should be a trampoline rather than a safety net, and that they should be reserved for those who really need them.

I ask the Minister, if he were Prime Minister, would he allow one of his Cabinet colleagues to go around and attack the concept—

Some Hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: —of universality in social programs?

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member knows the rules relating to ministerial responsibility. He should direct his question to the Minister in his capacity as a Minister of a Department.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice is the Acting Minister of Social Development directly concerned with responding in this House to questions with respect to such matters as universality for old age pension or unemployment insurance.

I will ask the Minister the question again. Does he agree with the proposition put forward by his colleague? On the basis of collegiality in Cabinet, is that an acceptable statement for a Minister of the Crown to make on behalf of the Government?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member know, I am sure, that that is not the policy of the Government. However, I fail to understand why he is directing the question this way. Why is he not directing the question to his colleague, the Hon. Member for St. John's West, who is one of the principal proponents in Canadian politics of the position of which he is accusing us?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any question: our position is quite clear—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: A press release has gone out—unlike the Liberal Government, which is equivocating, and which the people of Canada have every reason to fear after another election, with respect to this issue.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

STATEMENT ATTRIBUTED TO MINISTER OF JUSTICE

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Minister of Finance who, I am sure, had the opportunity of watching Canada AM when the Minister of Justice was interviewed by Pamela Wallen this morning. He indicated that he was not in favour of a policy of the present Government which solves problems by throwing money at them. He indicated that we cannot continue to go on that way. I ask the Minister of Finance whether he accepts that point of view and that criticism of his Government from a Cabinet colleague? Or, if he does not agree with that statement, does he think it would be more appropriate, if these Ministers are going to be diverging from Government policy, that they should do the honourable thing and resign from their portfolios while they are seeking the leadership of the Liberal Party?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry; I do not watch Canada AM even when I appear on it.

Mr. Epp: I don't blame you.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: I have to tell my hon. friend that I fail to understand how he would be scandalized by such a statement. I made it myself many times in a lot of areas. The solution to a problem is not throwing money at it.

Mr. McDermid: Why do you keep doing it?

Mr. Lalonde: This is the line we have taken—pursuing a responsible fiscal and monetary policy, and also, however, showing compassion for people in need. This has been and will continue to be the policy of this Government, contrary to that of the Conservative Party who have singled out the old, the sick, and the poor, as their targets. And women, as we have discovered recently.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

FINANCE

CORPORATE TAX EXPENDITURES

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In 1972 David Lewis spoke eloquently of the corporate welfare bums, pointing out that the total share of taxes paid by the corporate sector dropped from 28 per cent to 17 per cent, while that paid by individuals increased since 1951 from 24 per cent to 43 per cent.

Will the Minister advise the House when he intends to table the latest figures for 1983 on corporate tax expenditures? The last time such figures were tabled was in 1979. They showed that over $6 billion had been spent. In early February the Minister promised he would be tabling these figures. When will the people of Canada be given an accounting of this waste of taxpayers' money?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is typical of the NDP to consider any incentive given to the creation of jobs by the private sector to be a waste of money. I am sorry if that is the philosophy of the socialists. It is no surprise they are where they are at the present time, because this is not a philosophy which is shared by this Party and the Government.

We believe that the jobs needed by Canadians will be created fundamentally by the private sector, with the support of government tax incentives. If we are not going to be competitive and make sure that the taxation regime in our country compares with the taxation regimes in the United States, Europe or Japan, we will be out of business as a country and will not have the jobs Canadians need. The NDP should understand that, once and for all.

TYING OF TAX BREAKS TO JOB CREATION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has refused to indicate when he will table these important figures. These massive tax breaks are viewed almost universally by economists as being completely ineffective in dealing with the problems they are supposed to be dealing with, primarily, the unemployment of almost two million people.

Recently an economist said: "Banks are in a position to smile at tax authorities . . . they are close to a voluntary (tax) system".

When will the Government face facts and say that not another tax dollar from ordinary Canadian citizens will go to corporations unless they can prove they are creating jobs directly with those tax dollars? When is the Minister going to table the relevant figures, as he promised in early February to do?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer my hon. friend to the Budget of April, 1983 because he does not seem to have read the Budget of February, 1984, and I cannot ask him for too much. I invite him to go back to the April, 1983, Budget. He should have had time to read it by now. He will find that we have provided very significant research and development tax incentives. We provided for investment tax credits which are all tied to investments taking place in Canada and creating jobs in Canada. The measures contained in the last Budget, as well as the Budget of April, 1983, are indeed geared to the creation of jobs in the private sector by investment in Canada. I invite my friend to look at it and get the facts. Then he will know what the answer is.

Oral Questions

COMPARISON BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance as well. Last Friday it was announced that the unemployment rate in the United States dropped from 8.0 per cent to 7.8 per cent while, for the same period in Canada, the rate increased from 11.2 to 11.3 per cent. Before the Minister trots out the same deceptive and misleading response which he used on Friday, to the effect that the reason for this poor performance is the increasing participation rates in the labour force, let me give him some figures.

From the pre-recession peak to the bottom of the recession in the U.S. total employment dropped by 2 per cent, while in Canada it dropped much further, by 5.1 per cent. From the bottom of the recession to date jobs created in the United States increased by 5 per cent, but in Canada by only 4 per cent. Is there any explanation for this substandard performance in job creation in Canada other than the misguided economic policies followed by the Government since March of 1980?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is keen on providing us with a number of statistics. He referred to what happened to unemployment in the United States and Canada last month. He should have also pointed out that in Canada last month we created 54,000 jobs. We had an increase in full-time and part-time jobs. We had an increase in youth employment as well as in the goods producing industries. All sectors of the economy experienced growth in job creation last month. At the same time there were 75,000 new entrants to the work force in Canada last month.

My friend will have a second question and I invite him to tell us what the increase in the participation rate in the United States was in February. He will find that proportionately there were not the same amount of entrants into the United States labour force last month as in Canada. That is the explanation.

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I said it before and I will say it again; that is misleading and deceptive.

Mr. Lalonde: Give us the figures.

Mr. Wilson: The simple fact of the matter is that employment in Canada is still 3.7 per cent below its pre-recession peak, and in the United States it is 1.7 per cent above that same peak. Since the record of this Liberal Government is so far short of the record in the United States, and since recent figures show the situation is degenerating further, will the Minister explain to the House why he has presented a stand pat Budget which, if it stays as it is, could lead us to being in an early recession just at the time the United States is booming?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have asked the Hon. Member to provide us with one specific piece of information which he neglected or refused to provide us with in his supplementary question. He said that we have known a deeper recession in Canada than has been known in the United States. This has been said many times, including by myself at various times. I have indicated that Canada was experiencing a strong recovery and that, in terms of growth, we were going to regain everything we had lost in the first part of this year, and that by the middle of this year we were going to reach the level of employment we knew before the recession.

We are facing a year of strong growth of about 4.9 per cent, which compares very favourably with the type of growth we experienced in the seventies. By pursuing a policy of responsible fiscal and monetary management we will ensure the kind of growth this country needs, and not just by the rhetoric of the Hon. Member.

GRAIN

FREIGHT RATES ON CANOLA SHIPMENTS

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. The Government's proposal to replace the minimum compensatory rates as they apply to canola products on shipments east of Thunder Bay with commercially set railway rates, will impair the western crushers' ability to penetrate the domestic and export markets east of Thunder Bay. What representations has the Minister of Agriculture made to his colleague, the Minister of Transport, on behalf of the western crushers?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if I understand correctly, that is still very much under discussion. We received representation from both East and West on this. We do not intend to do anything to destroy either production entity.

WESTERN CRUSHERS' SHARE OF MARKET

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Minister will be aware of the fact that the replacement of the MCRs with commercially set rates will increase the freight rate to the western crushers by 165 per cent. Is the Minister taking that into consideration? Will he come to the defence of the western crushers in order that they might be able to maintain their fair share of the market?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Hon. Member also knows that the whole package of the Crowsnest Pass legislation gives them an advantage to ship their products through to the export ports. I am talking about shipping them right through to Halifax. He knows that for sure. They have a special concession made to them to ship through to the West Coast ports also. The total amount of money he is talking about is $2 million to $3 million. I am sure that he knows as well as I do that if $2 million or $3 million is going to break that industry, it is in pretty darn poor shape. It is not in that bad shape, and he knows that.

FORESTRY

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT'S EXPENDITURES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. On Friday Southam news reported that the Minister met with the B.C. Council of Forest Industries and informed them that the reason for inaction on reforestation in British Columbia results from two facts: first, that they did not vote Liberal, and second, that they do not lobby well enough.

Since the 1982 Environment Canada policy statement entitled "A Framework for Forest Renewal" calls for a federal contribution of $130 million by 1987, which would have provided over $50 million for British Columbia this year alone, would the Minister explain why he has only put up $5.5 million for this entire coming year for British Columbia? Would he also explain to members of the House how he justifies those two crass and gross remarks to the largest industry in British Columbia?

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, if they were correct I would have to justify them, but they are totally incorrect and therefore I do not need to justify them. I just disclaim them for what they are, incorrect and inappropriate.

We had a very good meeting, and we did go into the importance for the forest industry to be present at the centre when consultations take place, particularly at the most recent ones. That was one portion of the discussion.

The other one dealt with the question of renewal of agreements, and I am ready to confirm to the House today that I have received a request from my counterpart in the Province of British Columbia for an extension of the existing agreement by one year, until March, 1985, at which time I hope the Government of British Columbia will have made a decision about what kind of long term agreement in forestry it wishes to make. At that time we will be able to deal with that particular proposal and make the decision ourselves.

With respect to the substance of the total forestry renewal agreements, I am glad to confirm that, looking at the figures for those agreements that we have renewed this year, apart from the fact that the Government has invested well over $200 million in 1983-84 in a variety of ways in the promotion of the forest industry, ranging from water bombers to research and development and other activities, our renewal shows up very well with the agreements that have expired this year. I will be glad to give the Hon. Member more detailed information if he wishes me to do so.

Mr. Fulton: The facts of the matter are that British Columbia is now only going to spend $11 million in total federal-provincial dollars. The Minister's own Department identified the need for spending over $100 million.

REQUEST THAT JOB-CREATION PROJECTS BE UNDERTAKEN

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the Minister's Department has identified that there will be a falldown effect, particularly in northern British Columbia, which will mean cut-backs in production by a third or more in less than five years. That is right across northern B.C. This will mean that hundreds of jobs will be lost on the Queen Charlottes, in Prince Rupert, Kitimat, Terrace, the Hazeltons, and Smithers.

I have a very practical request for the Minister. Since he and his officials were proposing more than $50 million in federal money for B.C., would he undertake to make direct contracts for service for nurseries, restocking backlog lands, insect control, and advanced silvaculture in northern British Columbia, which would mean in this coming year, for British Columbia alone, 2,000 $25,000 per year jobs? This is very much required with the kind of downfall we are already having, let alone the very severe falldown effect that we are expecting in less than five years.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, in the fiscal year that is ending this month the Government of British Columbia has invested some $90 million in silvaculture in that province. It has an additional $93 million in the budget beginning April 1, 1984. Evidently, the Government of British Columbia recognizes the fact that it owns 90 per cent of the forest lands in that province, and that it has a big role to play in reforestation and rejuvenation on those lots.

When the Government of British Columbia is ready to come forward with a proposal for the next five years, we will be glad to look at it. It has decided to come forward with a one-year proposal. We are in the process of working out an agreement for that period of time. Obviously the province has a major role to play in this particular respect.

AGRICULTURE

COMBINE OPERATORS' ACCESS TO UNITED STATES

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. He will be aware that since the end of World War II there has been a tradition in western Canada of Canadian custom combiners going south to participate in the American harvest, and later in the year of American custom combiners coming back and participating in the Canadian harvest.

Custom combiners on both sides of the border have played a very important role in assisting with the economy of their counterpart nations. Unfortunately, that practice seems to be jeopardized by a change in American policy. As a result it appears that a number of Canadians custom combiners, including a dozen from my province who are solely dependent upon this for their livelihood, will not be given the opportunity to participate in the harvest this summer. Could the Minister tell us what his Government is doing to ensure that this practice, which has been so important to our economy, will continue?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we have made representations, and I understand that our ambassador in Washington is making that kind of representation on our behalf at the present time. If he has not done it already, he will be doing it this week.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have the impression, considering the history of relationships between Canada and the United States—I am thinking of Garrison, and now of this particular problem—that it appears the Government across the aisle has been unable to influence the Americans in a way which would be beneficial to our country. Why is it that Canadian-American relationships seem to have deteriorated so much under the present administration?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not know from where he is getting his facts, but the Hon. Member should check them. Our trade in agricultural products with the United States has never been better. Our relationship with them has been very good. The U.S. Secretary of Agriculture and I have a rapport back and forth any time we want, and we have talked to one another about this problem of combine operators. I am sure that he knows that, because of the drastic cut in production last year, many combines sat idly in the United States and did not do anything. They are concerned about that at the present time, and the reduction in their wheat crop this year is still down. But we are still optimistic that some of the custom combiners will be able to carry on the business that they always do.

Introduction of Bills

NATIONAL REVENUE

DEPARTMENT'S USE OF THIRD PARTY DEMANDS

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. He will know that there has been a significant increase in third party demands on bank accounts by Revenue Canada. What is the percentage increase between September or November a year ago and now? Based on information from banks in my constituency, how does the Minister justify an almost 100 per cent increase in third party demands in that area? Does he presume in his Department that there are 100 per cent fewer trustworthy people, or that many more crooks? What is new in the Department that makes it feel that there must be that many more third party demands?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I could not say off-hand what the percentage increase is exactly. However, I have had the opportunity to discuss this issue with the Hon. Member before and I could once more state the reasons which I have already given him.

At the same time, I had suggested to the Hon. Member to contact the Director of his district office, to discuss the matter with him, seeking information first-hand from the man who administers the Income Tax Act and who is aware of all the particulars of this situation. I now realize that by disregarding my advice the Hon. Member has not discharged his basic responsibility as a member.

The fact that we have now nearly $3 billion in accounts receivable demonstrates clearly that a great many taxpayers have failed to pay their taxes and are therefore liable to seizures.

I strongly suggest to the taxpayers within the Hon. Member's riding who might be delinquent with Revenue Canada to sit down with its officials and come to an understanding on the way to settle their indebtedness and avert possible legal action.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION

BREACHES OF PRIVACY ACT

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. Last week he told me in the House that, in spite of the information that was handed to him by us on this side, relating to certain breaches of the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Privacy Act, no prosecutions were taking place. He said nothing was being done about these allegations, which leaves the implication that the law is being applied one way for civil servants and another way for the rest of us.

Question No. 383—Mr. Howie:

1. Will the General Development Agreement with New Brunswick expire and, if so, on what date?

2. Are there any negotiations to replace or renew it and, if so, what is their status?

Mr. Rolland Dion (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development and Minister of State for Science and Technology): 1. The General Development Agreement with New Brunswick, like all other G.D.A.'s, will expire on March 31, 1984.

2. Discussions with provincial authorities on an Economic and Regional Development Agreement (ERDA) as a successor to the GDA are in progress. The objective is to have the new agreement in place by March 31, 1984.

VIA RAIL

Question No. 396—Mr. Howie:

1. During the period December 21, 1983 to January 2, 1984, on how many occasions did the eastbound Ocean Limited VIA Rail passenger train arrive in Halifax on time?

2. What plans does VIA Rail have to replace its fleet of locomotives and railcars?

3. Will new locomotives or railcars be used in the Montreal to Halifax operation and, if so, on what date will such use begin?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Transport): The management of VIA Rail Canada Inc. advises as follows:

1. From December 21, 1983 to January 2, 1984, Train 14 "The Ocean" not once arrived on schedule in Halifax because of weather conditions and a major passenger train derailment at Amqui during this period.

2. VIA is currently accepting delivery of the second order of LRC equipment (10 locomotives and 50 cars). Delivery commenced late in 1983 and will continue through to early 1985.

VIA is about to embark upon a prototype passenger car development program. The first phase will be the design and construction of prototype equipment suitable for long and short haul service. The acquisition of new equipment based on the prototype experience is sheduled for the late 1980s.

Programs for the modernization of selected existing equipment are currently under study.

3. VIA considers fleet renewal to be a high priority and is also currently studying measures to improve existing equipment, but it is too early to state when such improvements might be implemented and what operations would be affected.

Order Paper Questions

CANADIAN COAST GUARD VESSELS

Question No. 451—Mr. Howie:

Are any vessels currently engaged in the Coast Guard Service and, if so, how many and does the service have any plans to replace ships or acquire new ships during 1984 and, if so, what are they?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Transport): One hundred and nineteen vessels plus some auxiliary support craft are currently engaged in the Coast Guard service. The Canadian Coast Guard have no plans to replace or acquire ships in 1984. However, some vessels presently under construction will be delivered in 1985/86.

CANADA MERCHANT MARINE

Question No. 475—Mr. Howie:

1. Did the Government take any initiatives to establish a Canada Merchant Marine?

2. Since January 1, 1983 were any studies carried out on this subject and, if so (a) by whom (b) at what cost?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Transport): 1. On January 6, 1983 the Government announced several policies relating to the Canadian offshore, including changes to the coasting trade regime.

In the December 7, 1983 Speech from the Throne, the Government announced that it intended to establish a labour-industry task force on the deep-sea fleet. This announcement was made because of growing evidence that the competitive environment for international shipping had changed to a point where consideration of the need for incentives to establish a Canadian deep-sea fleet was justified.

2. (a) and (b) The Marine Administration undertook research in 1983 directly associated with the review of Canadian coasting and deep-sea shipping. Expenditures included a $7,000 consultant contract for a study by Professor Mary Brooks entitled "Canadian Tax Policy and the Shipping Industry: An Evaluation".

PERSONS EMPLOYED BY LAW REFORM COMMISSION

Question No. 525—Mr. Howie:

1. In the last three fiscal years, were any persons employed by the Law Reform Commission of Canada and, if so, how many and what total amount was paid for (a) salaries (b) other professional services?

2. In the last fiscal year what was the highest personal remuneration?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Minister of Justice): In so far as the Law Reform Commission of Canada is concerned:

1. FY 1983/84. On January 26, 1984 the Commission had 45 full-time employees plus one part-time employee on strength. The average number on strength throughout the year to date was 44.

(a) The total amount paid for salaries for the above was $1,074,847.

(b) To January 26, 1984 the total amount paid for other professional services was $1,334,348.

FY 1982/83. The Commission had 45 full-time employees plus two part-time employees on strength at the end of the year. The average number on strength throughout the year was 44.

(a) The total amount paid for salaries for the above was $1,265,981.

(b) The total amount paid for other professional services was $1,520,366.

FY 1981/82. The Commission had 43 full-time employees on strength at the end of the year. The average number on strength throughout the year was 38.

(a) The total amount paid for salaries for the above was $931,836.

(b) The total amount paid for other professional services was $1,205,551.

2. Fiscal year 1983-84—$79,120 to $93,040 (salary range).

SECTOR FIRM PROGRAM

Question No. 642—Mr. Stewart:

1. Is there a Sector Firm Program and, if so, what (a) department or agency administers it (b) is its stated purpose?

2. In the fiscal year (a) 1982-83 what total amount was expended under the Program (b) 1983-84 what amount was budgeted under the program?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): 1. Yes. (a) The Canadian Industrial Renewal Board (CIRB). (b) The Sector Firm Program is designed to encourage the textile, clothing and footwear industries to restructure, rationalize and modernize in order to improve their efficiency and become more competitive, so that reliance on quantitative import barriers can be reduced.

2. (a) During the fiscal year 1982-83, $3,301,949 was expended. (b) For the fiscal year 1983-84, $27,500,000 was budgeted.

Mr. Evans: I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The questions as enumerated by the Parliamentary Secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 62—FEBRUARY, 1984 BUDGET

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Crosbie:

That this House regrets the failure of the government to include measures in the February, 1984 Budget to prevent the continually sagging Canadian dollar from further decline, reverse the continuous increase in the already critically high levels of unemployment, and combat the return to steadily rising high interest rates, all of which signals an end to any possible recovery and clearly demonstrates the incompetence of the government and its callous attitude of ignoring the social and economic hardships that it is imposing upon the Canadian people.

Mr. Paul E. McRrae (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I began my speech just before lunch. I discussed the motion in terms of the kinds of things the Opposition might do. It is very hard to tell what the Opposition policies are since the Opposition seems to have a hidden agenda.

We probably know four things that we could talk about in terms of what the Opposition is saying. The Opposition is talking first about cutting taxes in some kind of an incentive way to create jobs. The Opposition is talking, I think, about increased defence spending. Opposition Members have been pretty specific about this. They seem to be talking about moving closer to the United States, particularly in our economic relationships. The finance critic has from time to time sounded like he wanted some kind of customs or economic union. Opposition Members seem to feel favourably about Ronald Reagan and his Government.

The problem facing the Canadian dollar is one that is generated for the most part in the United States. It is generated because of the first two policies which the U.S. Government has initiated. One is a massive cut in taxes and the other is a massive increase in defence spending. The office of the congressional budget tells us that the $200 billion deficit which the U.S. Government will have in the next year is caused entirely by these two factors and that within a year the deficit would disappear if it were not for these two factors, namely the increase in defence spending and the cut in taxes. If you were an American, Mr. Speaker, you would have a cut of about $15,000 in personal taxes if your income, before tax, were $80,000. If your income were around $10,000, you would lose $204. That is the kind of government they have in the United States.

The fact that the U.S. deficit is roughly $200 billion, about 6.1 per cent of the Gross National Product, is one factor. The other factor is the savings ratio—the tax cuts that were supposed to go into savings—is less than half ours. Savings in the United States is about 5 per cent of people's income, whereas in Canada it is about 12.5 per cent. The entire savings in the United States, we are told by the office of the congressional budget, will be used up by the Government of the United States. The U.S. Government and people in the United States, in order to have savings for investment and so on, will have to bring in money from abroad. That is precisely the reason the American dollar is under stress. In order to get this money from abroad, you have to increase the interest rate. It must be made attractive to investors to bring money into the United States.

Canada's economy is very close to the American. It would be much closer if I hear correctly what the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) and the critic for finance are saying. In order for us to maintain some equity in the United States, it is necessary for us to do one of two things. Either we keep the dollar pegged at 80 cents or somewhere close to that and let interest rates rise with U.S. interest rates, or we let the dollar fall a little bit and keep our interest rates stable.

Let us see what the advantage is of the latter. I am not impressed with the first. What are the advantages of letting our dollar slide a bit and leaving the interest rate fairly well pegged? I believe there are two advantages. First, Canadian exports would be priced lower on a very competitive world market. This would be of great advantage to us.

There is another problem with the American dollar, which is the reason the Americans are in trouble while we are not. This year the Americans will have a roughly $80 billion deficit in their current account; that is, the account with other countries. In other words, the United States is running a very large deficit. The United States is selling less than it is buying by about $80 billion. In the last couple of years—and this year looks like it will be the same—we have had a slight favourable balance in our current account. This means that we are selling more than we are buying. If the dollar goes down a little, we will sell a little more, we will move more grain, sell more manufacturing products and so on. Also the Canadian entrepreneur benefits as against higher-priced imports.

One of the problems is that it will cost us more for imports, but Canadian entrepreneurs will benefit. These two things are job creational; they will create jobs and therefore are helpful. Of course, one concern is that we will have to pay more for our imports and then we have an inflation factor. However, I am told that high interest rates are twice as inflationary as increases in the cost of imports by reason of the dollar declining.

There is another reason we should be very careful about not allowing our dollar to follow the American dollar. In other words, we should keep our dollar at a lower rate and therefore keep our interest rates at a good level. This is tremendously important. If we expect Canadians to build homes, to build offices, to build factories and do the kinds of things they will have to do, we have to keep interest rates at a lower level. We are in a fortunate position because our savings ratio, as I mentioned, is about 2.5 times what it is in the United States. If the dollar comes down a bit, there will be less incentive or it will cost more to buy American dollars and invest in the United States. Therefore Canadians will want to invest in Canada. These factors are to our advantage.

I come from the community of Thunder Bay where 85 per cent to 90 per cent of all basic production, such as in pulp and paper, it being a major port and so on, goes into the foreign market. It is very important for us to be competitive. Allowing the dollar to drop somewhat and not raising interest rates will increase our ability to sell forest products in the United States and all other parts of the world.

This is why I think it would be a great mistake for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) and the Bank of Canada to pursue the policy that was pursued two or three years ago which allowed interest rates to go to very high levels. This would be a great disadvantage to us as Canadians. It would hurt our internal economy and we would not obtain the kind of activity we have experienced in the last year or so. At the same time as we keep our dollar up, our competitive position with regard to the rest of the world, that is the ability of our local entrepreneurs to sell and compete against imports, is adversely affected. All these factors would be affected adversely if we did that. I will ask the Minister in caucus—and I will keep it up, as I have done for year—to keep interest rates as low as possible even if the dollar suffers to some extent.

Another concern about which I keep hearing is unemployment. The Opposition has some simplistic ideas. I hope I have demonstrated how simplistic is the idea that we should keep both interest rates and the dollar up at the same time. That is what is implied in the motion, that we should do both. This is another area in which we have a far more serious problem that the United States. That problem has existed for a long time. It is not a simple one of asking why they have cut their unemployment rate and why we have not.

If we go back to the early seventies, we see that we have always had a far larger increase in growth in the labour force than the United States. If was perhaps two to one for a long period in there. Last month we had a growth in employment or jobs created of .5 per cent. That is a 6 per cent growth rate per year. Unfortunately the rate of increase in the labour force, that is the number of people coming into the labour force over the age of 16 years, was almost 7.2 per cent on an annual basis. We constantly have this problem of growth. It started years ago. I recall when we first saw it in the schools. When I was a high school principal and was involved in all kinds of building programs, I saw nothing but more and more young people. Of course, those young people are coming on to the market and we have the serious problem of having to deal with that growth in the labour force.

There are some answers. I am not convinced that we are able as a nation to create jobs at a rate much faster than 6 per cent on an annual basis. I do not think that is really possible. I just do not think a country can do such a thing. No matter what manner we use to do it, it just does not work. It seems that the cost of maintaining a 7 per cent to 11 per cent unemployment rate is very high, not only in monetary terms but in terms of attitudes and what it does to people who are not part of the system. When we have far too many people for the amount of available work or the work which will be available in the future, I do not think any amount of investment will change the situation very much simply because of these two large factors. When we have such a situation, we have to start talking about redistributing the work among the people available to do it. It does not make sense to have one segment of the population working eight hours a day, 50 weeks a year for 35 or 40 years, and another segment of the population being unable to move in at all. If we want to look at the situation seriously, we should look at the amount of money it is costing to create jobs or to keep people on unemployment insurance or welfare. Then perhaps that money could be used toward redistributing the work more fairly so that the vast majority of Canadians, or the 94 per cent who want to be in the work force, can find work. That is the only way we can do it. I worry about people who think that it can be done by increasing investment.

I believe this particular motion is a bad one basically because it contains some principles which I find difficult to accept, particularly the idea that we can have a stronger dollar and lower interest rates, that there is some magic which will bring that about, and the idea that we can create jobs at a rate faster than 6 per cent per annum. Therefore I think there have to be other solutions. I do not find those solutions on the other side. I do not see the other side as an alternative to what we are doing and about what we are thinking at this particular point.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, we could clearly have a stronger dollar and lower interest rates if the people in this country had confidence in the Government and its economic approach. Could the Hon. Member tell us what representations he will be making to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) when later this week the prime rate goes to 11.5 per cent or perhaps 12 per cent? Will he be telling the Minister of Finance that this will cost enormous numbers of jobs in his constituency, or will he say that it is perfectly all right? Will he be advising the Minister to let the dollar drop to perhaps 75 cents? Perhaps the Hon. Member will know that, following the Minister's speech today, there was massive interference in the marketplace by the Government bidding up the dollar and allowing interest rates to rise. Will he comment on the actions of the Government in that respect?

Mr. McRae: Mr. Speaker, I heard the same question asked of the Minister by the Hon. Member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn). I think it is a good question. However, I think the mistake in the question is in asking whether we would let the dollar drop to 75 cents or let the prime rate rise to 12 per cent and so on. I do not think that is the basic question. The answer is this. I would say to the Minister: "I want you to keep interest rates down. I want you to do what you have to do". I have been doing this for years so it is not something new. I want you to do what you have to do to keep interest rates from not going up. If that means the dollar has to decline, so be it.

The other point the Hon. Member makes is that this is a weak economy. It is not a weak economy. In terms of world currency, Canadian currency has appreciated, even this year, by 1 per cent. There has been a net appreciation. It is still a very strong economy in terms of economies in the rest of the world.

As far as I am concerned, the dollar could drop to 75 cents, but I am not saying it should. I am saying that we should keep interest rates as low as we possibly can and not worry about our dollar versus the American dollar. The American dollar is a far weaker currency than our currency for the reasons I mentioned before, and I will mention them again. First, we have a savings ratio that is very high. Therefore, the federal Government is not, by reason of the deficit of 6.8 per cent or 6.78 per cent of its Gross National Product, creating tension within the savings ratio. There are lots of savings for the private sector. Second, at least half of the Canadian deficit is a structural deficit and the rest is a deficit which will go away as times improve. That is the second factor. The American deficit is all structural, unless they get away from their defence spending and cut taxes, which is a totally structural factor. We do not need that.

In the long run, the Canadian dollar is very strong. It will not hurt us to peg the interest rates as low as possible and not let them go up. Internally this is a very important matter. My community, your community and the rest of the country would be much better off not worrying about the dollar. We would be much better off keeping interest rates as low as we can.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, it is rather incredible that the Member opposite would prefer that senior citizens pay more for tomatoes than allow interest rates to go up for those who want to borrow money. That is really the essence of what he is telling us. But to stand in the House and indicate that our dollar is stronger than the American dollar when it is dropping every day is the height of fantasyland and identifies to the House part of what is wrong with the policy.

The most incredible admission, and I thank the Hon. Member for making it, is that he and his caucus, and he made it clear to us today, have given up trying to create jobs for Canadians. He said to this House that they are prepared to accept 12 out of 100 Canadians being unemployed. His only solution is job sharing. He would like us to go to 50 per cent or 60 per cent of the work force employed part-time as a way of getting the figures down. That is totally unacceptable to us on this side. We believe Canadias have right to a job, a decent income and a decent standard of living.

Does the Hon. Member think the $15 billion to $20 billion currently spent on welfare payments and unemployment insurance might be better spent by allowing people to take training when they receive those dollars, instead of saying they have to sit and do nothing? They could make a contribution to society by involving themselves in the development of new skills; and in particular, would he allow the 30 per cent of the work force that is functionally illiterate to use those support dollars to learn to read and write?

Mr. McRae: Mr. Speaker, I have no problem with the last question. I would like more of those dollars to go in that direction. I have no problem with that part of the question at all, but I have a problem with the myth he is perpetrating which says that we can create many more jobs than we are creating now, that we can create jobs at the rate of 6, 8 or 10 per cent. I want to know how. I have not heard anybody tell me how.

We can allow for earlier retirements. We can do a whole series of things to spread the work among the work force available. We can create a lot of wealth doing that. We do not have to go to half-time jobs. There are people who would like to work part-time. Many would like to work on a split basis. I am not suggesting that it be mandatory; there is already a voluntary pool.

Many people would prefer leisure to working long hours. That is something we should look at very carefully. I defy the Member to tell me how he is going to create jobs at an annual rate much higher than 6 per cent or 7 per cent per year.

Mr. Hawkes: It is very simple. Call an election.

Mr. McRae: The Hon. Member says it is very simple. We have tried to use some of the methods suggested by Members opposite to create jobs, by tax incentives and creating other incentives. They produce the least productive jobs of all the efforts we have made. Do not tell me that we will solve the problem in that fashion.

We have to redistribute some, not all, of the work. We must also spend more money on training; there is no question about that. I have no argument with it. That is an admirable way of doing it. The federal Government must decide what the training program will be, not the provinces. I agree that that is one of the solutions. However, there has to be a multi-faceted approach to this. We are not going to solve it just by creating more jobs. It will not happen and the cost is far too high.

Mr. Dubois: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Hon. Member. I will ask it in French and he can listen to the translation.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker—

An Hon. Member: In English.

Mr. Dubois: I will speak to him in French.

Mr. Speaker, I heard my colleague talk about economic conditions in Canada and in the United States as well as the issue of job creation and the general economy in the United States.

Could the Hon. Member give some details or compare the performance of the Government of Canada with that of the United States? Is it not true that economic conditions in Canada are as good if not better than in the United States considering President Reagan's drastic policies?

[English]

Mr. McRae: Mr. Speaker, the whole debate today centres around the inadequacy of the Reagan government. There is no question that the fiscal policies—the cutting of taxes, increasing defence spending to nearly 10 per cent of the Gross National Product of that country, which I and many other people do not believe is necessary—has created a very bad situation in our country. I do not see any way that Canadians would accept what the Reagan Government has done in terms of cutting entitlement and cutting back on social security. This year we are adding $50 a month to our GIS payments, whereas that country has cut social security and lunch programs. They have cut a whole series of programs. I do not see any way that Canadians would accept that.

We have done the opposite. We have added to our GIS. We have said that we are going to ensure that Canadians have good private pension plans. We will ensure that people have enough to live on. We are going to have a fixed interest rate or a very limited spread in interest rates for those wanting to buy a home. What we have done is the very opposite of what President Reagan has suggested for the United States. I believe that is what the Opposition would do if they were in power because that is what they are telling us.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): The period for questions and comments has expired.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Huron-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to join in this discussion today and to share my regrets and fears over the February Budget with respect to the incompetence of the Government in its management of the economy as a whole, and, in particular, with respect to the Government's disinterest in the social and economic hardships which it is imposing on several groups with which I am personally concerned—farmers, small businessmen, home owners, pensioners and the unemployed.

Several measures regarding these groups were proposed in the Budget, some of which are more positive than others; but as several of my colleagues pointed out in the Budget debate, many of the real problems facing us today have not been addressed in a meaningful way. Many problems have been ignored and many have been made worse. Those which have been addressed have not been assigned any real sense of urgency. None of the big changes promised by the Budget can take place until the Government introduces legislation to put them in effect. We have been given discussion papers; in other words, we have been given only promises, and at this point I do not trust the Government to keep promises.

We have been promised legislation on improved tax assistance for retirement savings and simplification of taxes for small business. We have been promised a profit sharing plan and improved security for home owners. And we have been promised a plan for pension reform.

I should like, Mr. Speaker, to deal with my views on these proposals shortly, but first I would like to discuss my opinions of government promises.

The Government, while in opposition, promised restraint in government spending. In the four years since then, spending has grown by an average of 15.7 per cent, while GNP has grown by an average of 10.7 per cent. It promised affordable housing. In the past four years, thousands of Canadians have lost their homes due to soaring interest rates, and now thousands are still locked into mortgages at interest rates of 22 per cent and even higher.

The Government, while in opposition, promised not to let a recession happen. It claimed that it would, and I quote, "Not simply stand by and let the recession come". We all know what happened with that promise.

The Government promised to lower unemployment. There are now 193,000 fewer Canadians employed than there were at the start of the recession, and 563,000 jobs were lost during the recession. Now, when we are apparently out of the recession, our unemployment rate is up 3.6 per cent from 1980, and youth unemployment is up 5.8 per cent.

I could go on, Mr. Speaker. The point which I am trying to make here is that the people of Canada do not want government promises. They have heard many of them before. They do not buy them any more. The people of Canada would like to believe that the proposed changes in this last Budget, at least those with which they do agree, will happen. I, too, would like to be convinced. I would like to know that more is happening with this Budget than the tabling of a series of white papers out of which nothing may come.

I should also like to discuss another general concern I have about this last Budget. I am concerned that while the Government claims to be interested in improving social programs and claims to be concerned with the welfare of Canadians, it is doing little to secure the economic recovery which is necessary in order to provide social programs. It is very difficult to establish any permanent, decent safety net, without a very considerable improvement in the current economic situation.

The Budget did nothing significant to increase investment, our international competitiveness, or our domestic productivity; it did nothing to decrease the size of the deficit and it did little to encourage consumer spending or to reduce unemployment. All of these things are necessary, according to common sense and even according to past comments by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde), in order to maintain the momentum of recovery. By ignoring them, the Government is only contributing further to the current slowdown of the economy.

In spite of the Government's rosy projections, the reality is that the economy is worsening. On February 24, Statistics Canada said that the recovery is still winding down and that this trend will continue for several months. The Conference Board of Canada agrees, noting the decline in GNP growth, the increase in unemployment, the decline of the dollar, the increase in interest rates, and the drop of business and consumer confidence.

Instead of decreasing the deficit, the Government projected a higher deficit than anticipated. A recent report by the C.D. Howe Institute has warned that unless the deficit is reduced, we will suffer, "a deterioration in competitiveness" as a consequence, among other factors, of interest rates being pushed higher than they would otherwise need to be.

This is already beginning to happen. As the Canadian dollar declined to a level below 79 cents last week, a factor which apparently does not concern the Minister of Finance, the bank rate climbed to 10.2 per cent. Recently, the spread between interest rates and the inflation rate has been widening.

We are presently enjoying a current account surplus, a factor which would normally support our dollar. The recent decline in our dollar, which is expected to continue, is a major indication that confidence is declining. The Government, through allowing the deficit to increase, is demonstrating that it has no control over spending, which is fuelling that lack of confidence. To decrease the deficit, the Government must be prepared to make some tough decisions, which it obviously either does not know how to do or which it simply does not want to do in an election year.

We cannot support further declines in our competitiveness. In 1981, we ranked fifth in the world in international industrial competitiveness; we dropped to sixth place in 1982 and now we sit at eleventh place. While the Budget is apparently aimed at building a partnership "for competitiveness and productivity", the proposed productivity growth of 1 per cent to 1.25 per cent a year from 1984 to 1988 is not enough to get excited about. According to most economists, what is required is that the Government concern itself with nurturing the right environment for productivity growth, which includes controlling inflation and providing stability. This Budget showed concern with neither, and meanwhile, productivity continues to be well below capacity. Our industrial productivity has risen at the slowest rate of that of any major industrial nation since 1971.

Unemployment is expected to remain at 1.5 million for at least the next year, and over one million for as long as the Minister can project. Our present unemployment rate is the second highest of any major industrialized nation, and it was higher in February that it had been in January.

Youth unemployment, which the Budget claimed to address, will not change significantly merely by the addition of $150 million. There are 1.5 million jobless Canadians, and 565,000 young unemployed. According to recent figures, these numbers are on the increase. At most, $150 million will offer short-term jobs for about 2 per cent of unemployed young people. That is not very encouraging for young people who will graduate this year and who will be looking for jobs.

What concerns me, Mr. Speaker, is that the Government has ignored these and other fundamental questions. It has glossed over them, offering only self-praise for its past record rather than looking to the future, and, I might add, its past record is not one to be very proud of.

I would like now to turn to the specifics of the Budget and to deal, first of all, with its impact on farmers. Farmers are a large and important group in this country, and they make up a large proportion of the population of my riding of Huron-Bruce. There were some concessions made to farmers in this Budget, to which I will turn shortly, but first I would like to mention a couple of inexcusable disappointments which were found in the Budget.

Farmers had been anticipating an extension of the Farm Credit Corporation's special interest rate rebate program which is now coming due. Many of us were hoping that the Government would consider the severe financial distress which continues to plague many of our farmers, as we apparently come out of this most recent recession.

We hoped that the Government would make some move toward dealing with the serious situation of farm bankruptcies, or would at least have indicated that it recognized that there is, indeed, a problem. Last year, Mr. Speaker, farm bankruptcies were up 16 per cent from 1982; they rose from 410 to 488. Ontario led the nation with a total of 165 bankruptcies, and prairie farm failures doubled last year. There is no mention of the voluntary bankruptcies, which in my riding and the surrounding area are triple this number, but are not recorded. This situation is worsening. In January, farm bankruptcies were 62 per cent higher than the record level of 1983.

The Government did nothing, absolutely nothing, which would indicate that it is sensitive to the economic crisis which continues to face agriculture today. We did not see an extension on the special interest rate rebate program, nor the introduction of any other measure which could assist farmers who are facing the loss of their farms. The issue was simply ignored, which I feel is inexcusable. It is clear to me that the Government did not do sufficient homework on this issue, otherwise it would have seen fit to introduce some measures to help those farmers who need it.

Another disappointment was the way in which the Government dealt with Section 31 of the Income Tax Act. Basically, it just did not address that situation at all. Section 31 has been a problem for some time, but the Government did nothing other than to promise yet another study, which indicates a lack of awareness of the real problem. In spite of recommendations by farm groups and even by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), the Budget did not increase the $5,000 farm loss provision to a more realistic figure. More important, the Budget did not even propose amendments to the criteria on which full-time farmers as opposed to hobby farmers are assessed. The biggest problem, aside from the loss provision itself—which has not kept up with inflation—is the fact that many legitimate farmers are not classified as farmers. The situation is compounded by the real economic difficulty in farming today. Many young or new farmers, not to mention experienced farmers, facing financial troubles are forced to work a full eight-hour day off the farm, when they can find it, and then to spend another full eight hours, and very often more than that, working on that farm. Very often, in the absence of the farm owner or manager, the farm is looked after by the spouse or young children in order to create enough revenue to meet mortgage payments on the farm and to provide decent living. That is a reality of farm life today, and Section 31 does not recognize that reality. That part of Section 31 was completely ignored in February's Budget.

Some concessions, however, were made to farmers, which should be commended, with reservations. The Budget proposes to allow full-time farmers—and again the stress is on so-called "full-time" farmers—to invest up to $120,000 of taxable gain on the sale of qualified farm property in an RRSP, based on $10,000 times the number of years since 1972 during which a farmer has been in operation. While this provision is welcome, I would like to remind the House that the Budget of 1979, which was brought down by my colleague, the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), had a similar provision without the strings attached. As my colleagues have noted, this proposal was ignored even though the Government has enacted much of what was contained in the 1979 Budget.

In the intervening years, Canadian agriculture has suffered. Most important, the Government has not addressed the real problem facing agriculture today, which is declining profitability. Farm income in 1983 was down 2.6 per cent relative to 1982, and the Government has done nothing to reverse that trend.

Concessions were made to home owners in this Budget, again in the form of promises. These promises are welcomed by home owners if implemented and if they are further defined in a positive way. They are welcome to me. However, proposals in this area are, again, just promises. The Budget promised to examine a mortgage rate protection program to provide mortgage rate insurance. The Government promised a similar mortgage relief vehicle in the form of indexed term deposit certificates in 1982, which came to nothing. Similarly, legislation to make it easier to repay a mortgage was introduced in this Budget, as was promised in the 1974 election campaign as well. So we return to the same problem of government promises. While these proposals are welcome in themselves, again with reservations, many questions with regard to them remain to be answered. I wonder if we will ever see them enacted. I hope that some of them are. I hope that this matter, as all the others which the Government has pledged to deal with, is really addressed and not just put on the back burner one more time.

I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, about the elderly poor in this country. Therefore, I was pleased to see the issue raised. Any help for the elderly poor is most welcome. However, once again, the Government has fallen short of reasonable expectations. By 1985, when the guaranteed income supplement increases are fully implemented, recipients of the old age pension and the GIS will still be living almost $1,900 below the poverty line. The guaranteed income supplement should make living decent for the elderly.

As this House is aware, a parliamentary task force on pension reform recommended a GIS increase of $102 a month for those single elderly Canadians who have no other income except the guaranteed income supplement and the old age pension, with the increase reduced by a dollar a month for every dollar of outside income. I regret that the Budget did not accept this recommendation, which would have meant that the poorest elderly would get double the increase proposed by the Government, without increasing government expenditure.

I was also outraged by the fact that the new GIS regulations will actually result in a decrease of income for those pensioners who are disabled. I refer to the fact that beginning this year, Workmen's Compensation Board pensions are to be counted as part of a pensioner's income. What this means, Mr. Speaker, is that in the case of Workmen's Compensation Board pensioners, the Government, apparently in defence of equity, is bringing one group of low-income pensioners down to the level of another low-income group. At the same time, tax benefits are being offered to upper-income earners bringing them up to the level of another high income group through changes in contribution limits for RRSPs. I understand that an official in the federal Health and Welfare Department has admitted that this application of the equity principle is "unfortunate". It is more than unfortunate, Mr. Speaker, it is unjust. It is appalling. The elderly disabled in this country deserve a better deal.

However, I was pleased to see the issue of the guaranteed income supplement—the only one in the pension area—treated with a sense of urgency. While $50 a month increases in the GIS fall short of what I would have liked to see, we can at least rest assured that they will happen and, therefore, that much needed assistance for the elderly poor is forthcoming. It should help some 750,000 needy senior citizens. I am worried that we might never see the other pension reforms. Canada Pension reforms, for example, have been delayed one more time pending discussions with the provinces. That, from past history, could take months, if not years. The provisions for RRSP contributions, also included in a discussion paper, will not come into effect until 1985 for those with no other pension plan. Those with a pension plan must wait until 1988. Why must we wait this long for these measures to take effect?

We did hear of proposals for business tax simplification, another study, which could eliminate the $1 million cumulative earnings limit over which a business ceases to be considered small and which could reduce the tax rate for incorporated professionals. These are positive measures, Mr. Speaker, which our Party has been advocating for years. I would like to remind the House, however, that as a representative of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business has stated, this legislation, if passed, simply clears up tax complications which this Government itself introduced in 1972.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, there are some positive proposals in this Budget, some "goodies". But as the headline in The Financial Post asked, when can we open this box full of goodies? When indeed, Mr. Speaker, will the Canadian public really see the contents of that box of goodies?

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Hon. Member if he would be prepared to abolish all limits on losses and at the same time make the cash accounting basis available to all persons who want to get involved in farming?

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Speaker, I do not believe it would be fair to abolish all cash losses. We must make sure, when we are dealing with Section 31, that we allow for the viable farmer. I believe it is more important to define who is a full-time farmer than just to say flatly that we will write all farm losses off regardless of what they are doing, whether or not they have another profession. We still have to address the issue of what is a full-time farmer.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, I take it the Hon. Member is not in favour of abolishing Section 31, as many Members of his Party have advocated. I take it as well that he is satisfied with the definition of a part-time or full-time farmer as contained in the information circulars published by Revenue Canada.

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Speaker, I have not had the pleasure of reading what Revenue Canada defines as a full-time farmer. All I know is that we have been having problems in defining a full-time farmer. It does not seem to matter how it is written, because there seem to be many ways of interpreting what is a full-time farmer. I have many people in my riding who have been forced to take off-farm jobs to meet mortgage payments, whether it be to the Farm Credit Corporation to banks or whatever. There are farmers who have the full intention of becoming full-time farmers, but Revenue Canada interpretations will not allow them to do that. I think we should have Section 31, we should have some controls to help maintain and preserve the family farm, because these are efficient producers who want to stay in agriculture. I do not think farming should ever become something for corporations to invest in for the purpose only of incurring losses or otherwise for tax reasons.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the Hon. Member's speech with the intention of trying to find out what the Tory policy might be on some of the issues he addressed. However, as we are accustomed to hearing in the House, we heard a whole litany of what is wrong. One could get the impression that nothing is right and that we are living probably in the worst country in the world. The Hon. Member has not made one suggestion as to what should be done. I would like to ask him: If the Tory Party has a single position on any issue, would he state that position now?

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Speaker, I should remind the Hon. Member that we are a Party in opposition; it is not our place to come up with policy for this lame duck Government. Certainly we have a policy and he will see our policy when the appropriate time comes. In what I have said here in the past 20 minutes or so, I complimented the Government in some areas where it has done well. Did the Hon. Member not listen to that? Certainly I have criticized where it was due. If we wanted to get into real criticism, it would take a lot longer than today. We could not begin to dig up everything and throw it out here on the floor and debate it. We had to touch on some issues that concern people in Huron County and Bruce County as well as people in the ridings of Members on the other side who have the same problems we do. We have addressed some of those issues.

Budget measures, Mr. Speaker, the good ones we see here today, were taken from Tory policy at one time or another over the past few years. After the next election, when you see a Tory Government, you will see good policy and good management of this country, people working and things going well.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, the last statement the Hon. Member made was the silliest of all. If he complimented the Government, it must have been during the 45 seconds I was out answering the telephone. It is obvious that the Party opposite has no policy, or if it does, it does not intend to share it with the Canadian people. They have no right to know, according to that Party. Since the Hon. Member is concerned with the elderly poor, is it his position, as it is the position of the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), that there should be a means test applied to the elderly of this country?

Mr. Cardiff: My position in dealing with the elderly poor and pensions would be to take the recommendations provided by the committee which was chaired by a Member of the Liberal Party. I think if we followed the guidelines we were given there, we would all be doing justice to the senior citizens of this country.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): You did not answer my question.

Mr. Hargrave: Sure he did.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, does the Hon. Member agree with the recommendations of the Ontario Minister of Agriculture, Dennis Timbrell? Does he agree with his desire to have a beef marketing commission in Ontario?

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Speaker, that is not a position for any Member of Parliament to take, regardless of Party affiliation. Any marketing organization put in place should be asked for by the producer, and all marketing organizations in the Province of Ontario have been implemented by vote and with a majority of over 60 per cent of the producers asking to have their products marketed that way. We hope that in Ontario those producers will exercise that right again. If they ask for assistance in marketing their product, it should be given to them. If they turn it down or reject it, that is what should happen.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, at last we have a clear definition of Tory policy. They are opposed to what Dennis Timbrel is attempting to do in the Province of Ontario.

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Speaker, that was not a question, it was a statement. Has the Hon. Member ever read the policy of Dennis Timbrell? I should not have asked the question, Mr. Speaker, but judging from the comment he made, I am sure the Hon. Member has not studied that policy at all.

Mr. Gurbin: He does not know what a cow is.

Mr. Cardiff: No, I give him more credit than that.

Mr. Gurbin: All we have been getting from him is bull.

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Speaker, we have to commend the Ontario Minister of Agriculture for his initiative. The producers of the Province asked for some help in the beef industry. He has come up with a program and he has appointed a commission to study the alternatives. I believe he will come up with something fair. We do not know what that program is going to be, but let us give the Minister time to do it. We know there is a deadline. I have been here in the House for four years and I know that we have waited for a policy on agriculture for many, many years and a policy on other matters. We have heard the Minister say, "Look, I have a plan", and this has been going on for four years. Tripartite stabilization is a fine example. Had it wanted to help, this Government would have co-operated and brought forward a national tripartite stabilization program to help all farmers, but it has failed to do so. It tries to divert our attention to a provincial Government and it is not doing its job here.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member said that neither he nor any other Member should take a position on a beef marketing board for Ontario. Is it clear then, to extrapolate from that, that the Hon. Member believes that Members of Parliament should not take a position on things until they are forced by their constituents to do so. In other words, he believes that Members of Parliament should not lead, they should just follow.

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Speaker, that is unfair. The Hon. Member knows full well that this is not the intent. In a democracy, and this country is a democracy, the producers of a commodity have a choice of collectively marketing if they wish. That is usually exercised by a vote of a majority of those producers, and there is nothing wrong with that. Too many times we govern from the top down. It is time we started governing from the bottom up. It is time that we listened to the grass roots. Whenever this Government has nerve enough to call an election, we will see what happens to the Liberal Government. It will be turfed out. The people of this country are sick and tired of this nonsense.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): That is the end of the 10 minute question period. The Hon. Member for Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe (Mr. Tobin) on debate.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I am going to a reception tomorrow night for Canada's athletes who have won medals at the Olympic Games. If I had my way, the Hon. Member opposite who has just spoken would be given one of those medals. It is not easy to try to speak intelligently when both of your feet are planted firmly in your mouth. I have never seen an Hon. Member so diligently straddle the fence and still be able to walk away from the debate without being knock-kneed. I can only say this because Members on this side have been kind and understanding.

I sit in the House today, Mr. Speaker, as a Member who stands to defend the Government of Canada, the policies of the Government of Canada and, in particular, the most recent Budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde). I am here because of a motion put to the House by the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), who I note is not here.

An Hon. Member: He knew you were speaking.

Mr. Tobin: For the last day or two I went into great detail in preparing the kind of technical and detailed arguments I thought would be required in an intelligent debate. I went into the type of detail meant to refute what I thought would be intelligent, well researched Opposition comments, criticisms and perhaps some sound suggestions. As I sat waiting to speak, Mr. Speaker, I had to discard that well researched speech and, much to my chagrin, because I cannot stand to participate in a partisan shouting match, I had to pull out my political speech.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, and having indicated the level of debate we are having here today, much to my disappointment I asked myself what purpose could possibly be served and whether I should even bother participating in a debate on a motion put by the Hon. Member for St. John's West, which obviously was not put in a sincere and caring manner with the notion of improving the lot of Canadians, but was put rather for pure partisan gain. Why should I participate? I decided that if this debate serves no other purpose, it shall serve one, that is, to alert the people of Canada who are listening to what we say today in this Chamber to the total paralysis of policy on the other side of the House.

Canada has come through a couple of years of recession, as has every other country in the western world. It is not unique to our country. We do not live in a bubble or a vacuum. We are part of the world community. The real way to evaluate the Government and the Finance Ministers of the day is to ask how we have dealt with that recession as compared to other nations. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that when one looks at the last Budget one sees that we have been diligent and vigilant in particular in resisting the temptation to try to spend our way out of that recession. We have made progress in taking the steps necessary to lower that deficit. However, we have not done it, as has been suggested by Members opposite, on the backs of the people who can least afford it and are having the most difficulty in weathering this recession. We have respected the integrity of the individual in Canadian society.

I laughed out loud several times today, and I am sorry if I disrupted the House, when I heard some of the speeches of the Members opposite. As I look at a newspaper clipping of October 26, 1979 I read the headline: "Will keep Interest Rate Up to Beat Inflation, PCs, Prime Minister Joe Clark and Finance Minister John Crosbie". Their policy was to keep interest rates up to beat inflation. Under Liberal Government we have low inflation and low interest rates. Where are the crocodile tears now?

The answer of the Hon. Member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark) to the criticisms of the day for the ill-fated Budget and policies of the Hon. Member for St. John's West was, "Come up with a better idea". The people of Canada did. They elected a Liberal majority Government in 1980.

Another headline reads: "Crosbie: Interest Rate Anti-Inflation Tool". This was said when he was Minister of Finance, but now we hear a completely different tune as this Party sits in Opposition.

I said this would illustrate, for the information of the public, not only the paralysis of policy on the other side, but the tug of war, the trench battle which is taking place on the front benches of that Party. I am not one of those satisfied to say that we have not heard Conservative policy because they do not have any. I know that is not true. They have policies over there. Each and every Member of the front bench has a different perspective on policy. They have four or five different policies. They are not quite sure yet who is going to win that battle. They are not sure whether the newly elected Leader, the newly elected recipient of the policy of the pin-cushion mentality of the backbenchers shall win, or whether it will be the Minister of Finance, who forgot to have a look on the last ballot to see who actually won the leadership convention. He still believes that he came out ahead. Or it may be the Hon. Member for Yellowhead, who is as loyal to Mr. Mulroney as Mr. Mulroney was to him.

Some Hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Tobin: He was as loyal to his Leader as his Leader was to him.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order please. I remind the Hon. Members that other Members must be referred to by their constituency and not by name.

Mr. Tobin: My point, Mr. Speaker, is that they have different policies. I mentioned the Hon. Member for Yellowhead, the Right Hon. former Leader of the Opposition. I am saying that he is as loyal to the present Leader, the Hon. Member for Central Nova (Mr. Mulroney)—only the Honourable, not the Right Hon. yet, and maybe never—as the Member for Central Nova was to the Right Hon. Member for Yellowhead when he came and endorsed his continued leadership in Montreal.

Let us not suffer from any illusions. It is not just that there is no policy on the Conservative side of the House, but there is a battle going on between right-wing demagogues and twiddle-about do-nothings who have no notion of how to administer, manage, and govern the country. There is a battle going on between those who believe they should say what they stand for and those who wake up in the morning and the first thing they put their hands on is the Gallup poll. They, the dinosaurs in that caucus say, "My God, if we can only hide ourselves, if we can only keep beneath the surface and away from the Canadian public, we just might have an opportunity to vent our spleen upon the Canadian public."

On August 7, 1979 the Hon. Member for St. John's West said they were not going to do something just because it was promised during the campaign if they have now decided it is not the right thing to do. They have had a switch in policy. During the campaign they told us what they were going to do, but afterwards they changed their minds. Now their policy is that they are not going to tell us at all, because they cannot agree among themselves.

Witness the shameful episode last week of the Hon. Member for St. John's West, who claims to speak with authority for the Conservative Party on the question of offshore ownership in Newfoundland, being publicly backhanded across the cheek by the Member for Central Nova and being told that his statements on universality are not the policies of the Party.

I will have more to say about that because I believe it is the policy of the Conservative Party. It was the policy enunciated by the Hon. Member for Central Nova when he was a candidate for the leadership of that Party. He advocated cutting back on social programs in the country. He advocated needs and means testing. He advocated an end to universality.

I thought it might be a useful exercise to look at what the finance critic for the Conservative Party said after the last Budget of the Minister of Finance. When you separate the gibberish, the nonsense and the partisan foolishness, what does he say about the Budget? He says that the Minister does not have much room to manoeuvre. He goes on to say that he wants a massive deficit reduction, on the backs of people who cannot afford it, if necessary. With respect to the question of reducing the deficit, he went on to say that there is not any easy way to do it. They asked the Hon. Member for St. John's West, since he was arguing that the deficit should be reduced, how it is to be done. His very detailed answer was that he cannot point to any magic area to reduce the deficit. He went on to say that one has to consider the question and must look again to see whether, on the social side, it is possible to introduce more needs testing, so the programs will not be universal.

They also talked about unemployment, health services and family allowances. The Member for St. John's West says that as Finance Minister he would have to look at matters such as transfer payments for health care services and family allowances.

The Member for St. John's West, the future Finance Minister, we presume, was asked about unemployment in Canada. Since he comes from Newfoundland he would understand the destructive nature of that problem, so how would he solve it? His answer, with great compassion, was "We can't do much about unemployment now, if anything, unless we resolve the deficit first". He was asked about employment creation programs. He said that there is no quick solution and there is not any Party which could offer one. One would not know that today, listening to his colleagues.

He was asked about employment programs. The question was: "You said there may be some money that is being misspent". His answer was, "Yes, I would say that. There is too much being spent on temporary employment programs, not being well spent." He said that in fact these programs should be reduced. The fact is that in 1979 they did away totally with those programs. I would like to know which of his constituents in the small rural fishing communities surrounding his riding, who sent him to Parliament to represent them are prepared to thumb their noses at the chance at least to retain the dignity of having a job rather than being on welfare after the fishing industry went through a disastrous recession and an upheaval. That is what the Member for St. John's West had to say. If that is not bad enough, let us look at the record of the front bench candidates to the leadership of their Party.

What did we see when it came to the Budget? Conflict. The Leader of the Opposition, when he was a candidate, said that his program when he was elected would be to balance the Budget over the life of the Government. Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, the kinds of massive cuts that are being designed in the backrooms, away from the light of day, only to be sprung upon the electorate if and when the public is ever foolish enough to put them back in power?

What did the Right Hon. Member for Yellowhead, the former Leader of the Opposition, have to say? During the leadership campaign he avoided a commitment to balancing the budget over a period of four years, and I might say sensibly so. With respect to Crown corporations, the Member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) wanted to sell them all off. What did the Leader of their Party say about that during the leadership campaign? He did not promise to sell any Crown corporations. How did he respond when told of the comment by the Member for Etobicoke Centre that CN and Air Canada should be sold? He asked, "Why does he say such things?" He even gave the figure of $13 billion. Who will pay it, he was asked? "I don't know", he said. "I don't know of a bank which will finance this operation. I don't know of any". Is that solidarity in policy?

What do they say about free trade with the United States? The Hon. Member for St. John's West said that we should have free trade, that we should break down the barriers with the United States and study the possibility of a common market with the United States. Referring to the proposals made by the Member for St. John's West, the Right Hon. Member for Yellowhead said, "Presented as they are, I find his proposals dangerous". The current Leader said, "Free trade with the U.S. is like sleeping with an elephant. Canadian plants won't be able to compete with larger scaled U.S. firms without some kind of protection". He said that Canadians rejected free trade with the United States in 1911, and they would do so again in 1983.

Are we to believe that they have a coherent Party policy? Perhaps it sounds cruel but those people, historically and by their very nature, have frozen mentalities. They are bound by their ideological dogma. It goes off at every spectrum, starting at the centre and going all the way down to Genghis Kahn right. It is impossible that such individuals as these can be fit to govern a country as diverse and different from region to region as Canada.

It is obvious that the Member for St. John's West is not even present for the debate on his own motion. In fact, very few members opposite are here on the debate on a motion that they would tell us is important. But if it serves no other, it should alert the Canadian public to the fact that there is a political Party opposite that is confused and suffers from an opposition mentality. If it has a policy, it is not prepared to present it. Its members cannot decide among themselves what their policies should be. They cannot even govern themselves as a Party. An example of this is what is taking place with respect to Manitoba. We see the example of serious disagreements on the question of social programs, on whether or not to balance the budget, as well as serious disagreements about job-creation programs and free trade.

If the debate serves nothing else, it should serve to tell the public to demand that the Party opposite stand up and say what its policies are on such issues as the offshore, an issue that is very important in my province. On an issue that is vital in my province we see the Member for St. John's West on the one hand tell the House, fellow Newfoundlanders and the people of Canada that if Members opposite form the government, the offshore will belong to Newfoundland. On the other, we hear the Member for Central Nova, the Leader of the Opposition, say in the House to the same Newfoundlanders and Canadians that he really cannot comment on his position, that it is a hypothetical question that cannot be answered until the Supreme Court rules. The court ruled last week. We still do not know his policy.

The Member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), who practically lives on the doorstep of the Member for St. John's West, tells us that their policy really has not changed since 1979. When asked what that was, he said, "We are working on it". He said that there is a position paper being developed. If they cannot make up their minds on as honest, fundamental and straightforward a question as that and do not have the courage of their convictions in public life, I predict that they will meet the same fate as they met in 1979.

The Member who spoke before me, when asked what his policy is, said that it is not their job to enunciate policy because they are in Opposition and it is their job to oppose. He said it is not their job to put forward policy. I ask the Hon. Member if he has ever wondered why they have been in Opposition for so many years. Does he really think that the Canadian public can be sold a government in the same way you would package and sell peanut butter? Does he believe that if you put a pretty label on the product, consumers will buy it? They may once, but not twice. With those comments, Mr. Speaker, I thank you for the opportunity to participate in the debate.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I believe many of us in the House have some idea of the depth of unemployment in the Province of Newfoundland and the concern that Canadians everywhere have for the human and social tragedies that affect that province. What really astounds me is to see a Member of Parliament from that province rise and never once speak out about the tragedy of the unemployed in Newfoundland, never once. That tragedy is always raised by Members on this side of the House. The Hon. Member for Humbert-Port au Port-St. Barbe (Mr. Tobin) stood on his feet for 20 minutes and never once raised the plight of the 50,000 people who are out of work in the Province of Newfoundland. He never once spoke about the problems their families face. He never once looked at who has been in office for the last four years and whose policies have deliberately thrown most people out of work.

It is a tragedy in this country today that a Member from the province where unemployment is higher than in any other part of the country will not address the problems of his people, will dodge, weave, bob and duck in every way shape and form so as not to bring their problems and their tragedies to the attention of this House.

It is no longer enough that a back-bench member of the Government—and that is why he will be on the backbenches because he will not speak up on behalf of his constituents—

Mrs. Beauchamp-Niquet: Question.

Miss MacDonald: I am sorry the Hon. Member does not seem to know that this period also allows for comments. We can comment on the real failings of one of her colleagues, the shortcomings of her colleague who will not take upon himself, as he must, the responsibility for the decisions that that Government has made that have thrown 50,000 people out of work in the Province of Newfoundland, which represents one-quarter of the population. This affects families, dependants, children and spouses. Those people are out of work because of the uncaring attitude of that Government.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the Hon. Member got up and sought to sooth her wounds. Obviously my comments bit her right to the quick. I have seldom seen her, in such an absolute explosion of partisan bile, respond so quickly.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Tobin: What about the unemployed in Newfoundland and Labrador, Mr. Speaker? I only wish I were standing—maybe some day I will, in 25 or 30 years—in the Legislature of Newfoundland while I addressed these comments.

Mr. Blenkarn: They will never let you.

Mr. Tobin: It is the Conservative mentality, it is the notion that confrontation is better than co-operation that has led Newfoundland, more than any other province of Canada these last four years, to suffer from recession. It is the confrontation mentality of Premier Peckford, who is unable to make a deal with Ottawa at a time when Premier Lougheed—would you call him a Tory?—when Premier Buchanan—would you call him a Tory?—when Premier Bennett—you may as well call him a Tory—have been able to deal with Ottawa. It is only Premier Peckford in all of Canada who is unable to negotiate.

Mr. Bradley: Where were you last week?

Mr. Tobin: What was his reasoned response upon hearing the news, the very sad news, that the Supreme Court of Canada had to rule on the question of the off-shore? Is his response to look at the facts as they are, to examine as chief executive officer his options, and to make an intelligent response? No. His response is, "I do not care what the courts say, even though I referred the matter to court. No matter what the Newfoundland court said or what the Federal Court said, I am going to have my way or we will continue this economic stagnation in Newfoundland". He has it in his mind that the people of Newfoundland are willing to pay the cost of his ego and his stubbornness with their livelihoods and their way of life.

The Hon. Member asked what am I doing for the unemployed. Let me quote what the Hon. Member for St. John's West said. He said, "In my own province of Newfoundland on job-creation programs, $4.6 million odd was spent by the department of fisheries building wharfs and breakwaters and repairing wharfs and that kind of thing. And every cent was spent in five Liberal ridings".

On the one hand we have a Member who says that we are not working to look after our ridings. On the other hand we have the Hon. Member for St. John's West complaining that we are doing too much. If that is not hypocrisy in action what is?

An Hon. Member: You.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, the last two times I have heard the Hon. Member in the House he has talked about confrontation. On both occasions when he talked about confrontation his voice decibel rose about 5,000 per cent. He started to scream, to rant and to rave. Could I have his definition of confrontation?

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, in a low voice or in a loud voice I am prepared to give the Hon. Member what my definition of confrontation is, especially when it applies to a gentleman who wears two hats in Canadian society. That is the job of a political leader. The one hat is that of the guy who goes out and stirs up the troops, who puts forward his policy and platform—which the Hon. Member has failed to do—and who tries to be elected on the basis of that policy and platform. But the other hat he must wear, having assumed office, is the hat of chief executive officer of the company. Any province is like a very large company. Premier Peckford has left his chief executive officer's hat growing dusty in some long forgotten closet. He has never stopped the campaign from day one. The people of Newfoundland know today, more than you would realize, my friend—you should come to Newfoundland—just how costly it is and how expensive his own ego and desire are to be listened to always. He has surrounded himself with a caucus of 44 members who jump to his every bark. He has somehow got confused. He believes that everyone else in Canada, including the people of Newfoundland, will jump to his every bark. I can tell you they will not jump anymore. I am afraid the only person who will be doing some hopping in short order at the next provincial election is Premier Peckford on his way out of the Confederation Building.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Hon. Member. The Opposition Party has referred to unemployment. What does the Hon. Member regard as being the rationale of the Progressive Conservative Party when it was in power for a short period, and what is the PC Party's rationale now? Is its policy to do away with all term employees of the federal Government, as it did? Five hundred jobs were lost to Newfoundland when the PCs were in power. But even more important, what rationale would be used, does he think, since he has made reference to the Progressive Conservative Party, for discontinuing all direct job-creation programs under the federal Government? What effect would that have on his riding?

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the Hon. Member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker) has asked that question. It is easy to laugh up your sleeve at job-creation programs and say, "They are only temporary. They are only painting the graveyard fence and they are a waste of money". But job creation programs in a constituency such as mine not only provide people with the dignity of work but with the opportunity to say, "I sweated today and I worked for my living". But in ridings such as mine and in other rural parts of Canada—and I do not think the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) understands what rural Canada is all about—

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, that is slander.

Mr. Tobin: —it provides the opportunity to instal in some communities facilities as basic as a water system with running water. Only now in the 1980s are there wharves and facilities for fishermen to take that resource from the sea, town halls and fire halls to make their communities safe, and the Tories cancelled that program with a loss of jobs and a loss of ability to improve their way of life and to improve their lot—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member but the time for questions and comments has expired.

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, unlike the Hon. Member for Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe (Mr. Tobin) who just spoke and ranted and raved, I wish to address the problems and plight of the unemployed in the Atlantic region whose cause the Hon. Member from Newfoundland totally ignored in favour of making an utterly partisan statement and speech which served no purpose whatever other than to take the time of the House.

Today the House of Commons is debating a motion of condemnation of the Government for bringing the economy of the country to the brink of disaster. Every major economic indicator demonstrates that we are about to enter another recession. Yet the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) continues to boast about vigorous recovery. Either the Minister is misleading the Canadian people or he simply does not know what is happening in the country. In either case our economy is once again in deep trouble. The one man, the only person upon whom Canadians are counting to lead us out of the mess, fails to recognize that the mess even exists. The Minister of Finance is the Captain E. J. Smith of 1984. He is sailing the Titanic at 25 knots an hour full blast toward a gigantic iceberg, totally unaware of the ominous trouble ahead.

If this sounds like so much exaggeration or hyperbole, let me assure you, Sir, that if anything I have understated the case. The Canadian economy is lurching toward potential disaster. To make matters worse, the only man in the federal Cabinet who has shown any real leadership—and I pay him that respect—is turning a blind eye to all the warning signals. He prefers to let the orchestra play through the night while the ship sails to catastrophe.

The Minister's immediate predecessor, the present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen), made the same mistake in misreading the warning signals. We are still paying the price for his policies, predicated as they were on assumptions about the economy that were totally out of whack with reality and with the real needs of the country. The current Minister of Finance, like the Bourbons of old, has forgotten nothing and has learned nothing. Repeating his predecessor's mistakes, he persists with policies strapped to recovery when what we have in Canada is not recovery at all but the re-emergence of a full-fledged recession.

Nothing more graphically illustrates the problem than the juxtaposition of two news stories in the business section of The Globe and Mail over the weekend. One was headlined, "Canadian Jobless Rate Climbs to 11.3 per cent". Directly below that article was another one that read, "Jobless Rate in U.S. Falls to 7.8 per cent". Those headlines tell it all. At a time when unemployment in Canada jumped sharply for the second straight month in 1984, the unemployment rate in the United States plunged to its lowest level in 2.5 years. The American rate was a full .3 per cent lower than it had been two months earlier and 3.5 per cent lower than our own rate. Rather than sharing in the North American recovery, Canada is pulling it down.

On Friday in Question Period, I drew to the attention of the Finance Minister the jobless trend in my Province of Prince Edward Island to illustrate the problem. In P.E.I., over 1,000 jobs were lost from January to February out of a total workforce of 47,000, an increase in unemployment of .8 per cent in one month alone. In the last three months the unemployment rate has skyrocketed 2.5 per cent on the Island. The overall picture right across the country, from coast to coast, is one of steadily rising unemployment in the midst of what is supposed to be recovery.

On Friday I asked the Minister of Finance the question, since unemployment has risen three months in a row in Canada, and he calls that recovery, what then does he consider recession? The House and I were treated to a lecture on how much more the Government has been spending in P.E.I. than anywhere else in Canada. I acknowledge that the federal Government is pouring money into job creation in P.E.I. and in other provinces. Certainly, in the face of Gallup polls that show the Government would be trounced in a federal election, the Government is flooding the country with cash, mostly in Liberal-held ridings. But the fact that unemployment is soaring, the fact that it is continuing to rise despite such spending, reveals the extent to which the Canadian economy is fundamentally and structurally unsound. No amount of makeshift, no amount of ad hoc, patronage-motivated job-creation schemes, will shore up an economy devasted by 16 years of mismanagement and neglect under this Government. All current economic indices prove that fact. Canada remains far below its pre-recession peak levels of production, employment and income while the U.S. has surpassed them. Indeed, had the Canadian economy performed as well as the American economy since the outset of the 1981-82 recession, there would be 450,000 more Canadians with jobs than there are now. That increase would be more than enough to slash in half the total number of people without work in the Atlantic region and Quebec combined.

Unfortunately, the worst is not behind us. The spectre of steadily higher interest rates threatens to snuff out what little recovery there has been as plummeting investor and consumer confidence constrains the industrial expansion and private sector spending so vital to job creation.

On Thursday, the Bank of Montreal, the Bank of Nova Scotia and Montreal Trust fell in line with other lenders by raising mortgage rates. In the case of the Bank of Montreal, for exemple, one and two-year rates were jacked up by half a percentage point to 11.25 per cent for open mortgages, while the five-year rate was leaped to 12.75 per cent. Markets analysts predict steadily sharper hikes in coming weeks and months as the Bank of Canada props up the dollar's relentless slide here in Canada.

For the past nine days our dollar has been trading well below 80 cents relative to the American currency. At the end of last week the dollar closed at 78.5 cents U.S., its lowest level since July 1982. When the value of our dollar plunges in such a fashion, imported goods become correspondingly more expensive because our currency simply loses its buying power. It takes more Canadian dollars to purchase foreign goods and services when the dollar is weak than when it is stronger. Some 35 per cent of the goods we use in Canada are imported, and it is impossible to substitute domestic goods for many of them, especially in winter months when we depend upon fresh produce from abroad. The declining dollar will most certainly trigger a new round of inflation. In fact, each one per cent drop in the dollar generally adds one-third of a percentage point to the consumer price index. Such inflation in turn compounds the unemployment problem, for instance, by reducing the amount of disposable income available to Canadians for the purchase of cars, appliances, furniture and other big ticket items that normally lead to industrial expansion and jobs. An unemployment and inflation spiral is heading in our direction, threatening to suck away the few economic gains our country has been able to make in recent months. Now the Bank of Canada is expected to support the sagging dollar by jacking up interest rates even further. Some reputable analysts are expecting a return to 14, 15 or 16 per cent mortgages by the end of the summer and into the fall. How can such a development do anything but devastate housing construction in the country, one of the most job-intensive sectors of the country?

What is the response from the Minister of Finance to the spending crisis? He says he is not losing any sleep over it. Those were his exact words. The Minister said:

I am not spending my nights up worrying that the dollar is not at 81 cents, I can assure you.

What we need is a Minister of Finance who will start worrying about the Canadian people, who will suffer a little bit on behalf of the poor, the underprivileged and the downtrodden, who are disadvantaged so much by such economic trends, and especially the unemployed for whom a shaky dollar is the worst possible threat to their job prospects. More than anything else, we need a Minister of Finance who recognizes that the Canadian economy is not in recovery but, rather, heading for recession.

Now is no time, for example, to be imposing a heavy layer of additional taxes on the Canadian people. They need more buying power, not less, if industrial growth and job creation are to be fostered. Just as his predecessor misjudged the extent of the recession in 1981 and inflicted a whole range of tax burdens on the Canadian people, thereby compounding the problem, so also is the current Minister deepening this new recession with whopping tax increases that are no less severe simply because they are hidden. The Minister's April, 1983 Budget ushered in billions of dollars worth of tax increases that in many cases will take effect in the next few months, in the middle of the recovery crisis. In October of this year, federal sales taxes will be hiked on construction material, alcoholic beverages and tobacco.

In the past, the federal Government has not collected the first $200 of federal taxes payable, but this tax break is to be eliminated all together in 1984 for many Canadians and reduced significantly for others in the following year. The standard $100 tax deduction is being eliminated. The child tax credit and the tax exemption for children and other dependants will be sharply reduced through de-indexing. At the same time, unemployment insurance premiums are to be raised sharply in each of the next four years.

Most offensive of all for many people is the Canadian ownership charge of four cents on every gallon of gasoline. This odious tax was originally imposed as a temporary measure to pay for Petro-Canada's purchase of Petrofina. Now, long after that purchase was made at a cost of $1.5 billion to the Canadian public, the tax is to be made permanent.

The Minister of Finance must realize that there is not enough momentum in the economy to support such heavy new taxes. The Minister's overly-optimistic projections of economic growth in the next two years have already been proven wrong. The Conference Board projections, which have been consistently more accurate than the Government's, indicate a growth of only 3.3 per cent this year and .3 per cent in 1985, compared to forecasts of 4.9 per cent and 3.5 per cent respectively in the February 15 Budget. Worse still, the Conference Board projects that there will be negative growth in all four quarters in 1985. That is a recession by anyone's definition.

The Government should shift gears immediately to policies more sensitive to the realities of a flagging recovery. A few moments ago the Hon. Member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) asked the Member then on his feet what policies the Progressive Conservative Party would put forward. I will tell him what some of those detailed policies are.

The federal Government should tackle the deficit with equal measures of frugality and sensitivity to the needs of the poor, and the unemployed in particular. It should get the tax collector off the backs of small businesses and individuals so that they can get on with the job of creating wealth not only for themselves but for the country as well. It should stop pouring money into Crown corporations without procedures for accountability and cost effectiveness. The money saved should be put into enterprises that are self-sustaining in the private sector in a way that will help men and women and especially the youth who are unemployed in countless thousands. It should stop wasting money. We are not against Crown corporations, but we want to make them more effective. We want to ensure that money spent on them is money well spent.

The Government should restore to Parliament control over the bureaucracy and Government spending, both now out of control. It should reduce the tax burden on all of us, particularly in the energy field, so as to encourage consumer spending and job creation and ultimately to foster more revenue for the Government. It should replace a reliance on transfer payments with policies aimed at building self-sustaining local industries in the so-called have-not regions of the country.

Transfer payments are a valuable and useful instrument for creating wealth in the have-not regions of the country, protecting the underprivileged and assisting the unemployed, and in general furthering the objectives of the country. An over-reliance on transfer payments at the expense of genuine job creation of a self-sustaining sort is, however, bad policy for the very parts of the country those transfer payments are intended to serve.

Most of all, the country needs a Finance Minister who gears his budgets not to the whims of his advisers or to his own whims, but rather to conditions in the real world. He is courting disaster by imposing high taxes when rising interest rates and a plunging dollar threaten investor and consumer confidence, without which no recovery is possible.

If the Minister of Finance is not prepared to provide such leadership, he should take his cue from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and leave the stage altogether. Certainly the Canadian public would welcome a fresh start. In the event the Government will not provide real leadership to Canadians, we in the Opposition are prepared to provide it just as soon as the Government screws up enough courage to test its record in a federal election. For most people, especially the unemployed, and most especially for those in the Atlantic region who have been so disadvantaged since Confederation, largely as a result of policies followed by this Government in the last 16 years, that day cannot arrive soon enough.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): There is a ten-minute period for questions and comments.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 62—FEBRUARY, 1984 BUDGET

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Crosbie:

That this House regrets the failure of the government to include measures in the February 1984 Budget to prevent the continually sagging Canadian dollar from further decline, reverse the continuous increase in the already critically high levels of unemployment, and combat the return to steadily rising high interest rates, all of which signals an end to any possible recovery and clearly demonstrates the incompetence of the government and its callous attitude of ignoring the social and economic hardships that it is imposing upon the Canadian people.

Mr. René Gingras (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, thank you for this opportunity to address the House today. On February 15, the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), said that it was necessary to be hard and mean and to do all kinds of unpalatable things. In referring to future budgetary measures by Progressive Conservatives, he added: That is why I am not going to tell you what they will be.

I might add that the last Budget brought down by the Progressive Conservatives in the fall of 1979, by the same Hon. Member, was not exactly a big hit here in the House. I would even go so far as to say that thanks to that Budget, Abitibi voters decided to do their duty and elect a member on the Government side. Today, we are discussing a motion that says more or less they are sorry the dollar is going down and that there is unemployment. They are afraid interest rates will go up. They are blaming the Liberals but are carefully refraining from telling Canadians what they would do if they were in power. Mr. Speaker, they even go so far as to say we are not dealing with the social problems arising from the recent recession. Mr. Speaker, I maintain the Progressive Conservatives are not the people to teach us how to deal with social problems. Today I am not going to pose as an expert on economics. Personally, I do not claim to know or understand fully all the factors that can affect our economy. However, Mr. Speaker, I do know one thing and that is that the world economic situation always makes things difficult for us. And when that is the case, the Government of all Canadians does give special attention to those who are affected by the vagaries of the economy. I also know that the Liberal Party has a philosophy that, contrary to certain Conservative ideas, is more sensitive to individual hardship.

In his last Budget, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) decided against a Budget surplus so that he would not have to cut off Canadians in need. Mr. Speaker, constituents in the riding of Abitibi have also suffered from the effects of the recession. During that time, they put considerable pressure on Members of Parliament to have measures taken that would help them. I am from Abitibi, which is a resource region. Most of its resources are priced on the international market, and many are subject to tariffs on the export market.

As far as I know, Mr. Speaker, we are not going to set the price of gold here in the House, not anymore than we will decide the international price of leather, or the price of lumber, or even less the price of zinc. Those products come from Abitibi. While the world price of those products is decreasing, the motion of the kind now before the House will do nothing to change the situation. To put it quite simply, this motion is meaningless.

Earlier today we heard Members on the other side raise objections against job creation programs. That is not what the people of Abitibi want to hear, Mr. Speaker, for they know that no one can, overnight, create a gold mine, a copper mine, a paper mill or a saw mill to offset a temporary decline in the price of those products. No Conservative in his right mind will promise to do away with those make-work programs if he wants to be elected in the riding of Abitibi. The last budget of 1979 is still too fresh in their mind.

Although I would rather not dwell on such an insignificant motion, I do want to take this opportunity to make a few comments. Right along with the industries I referred to earlier, Mr. Speaker, the first occupants of our country make their homes over a sizeable part of my riding.

Last week, I had the honour to be appointed Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development at a rather crucial time of our history. The First Ministers held a conference last week, the outcome of which was not particularly promising, but I did notice that those conferences can be tainted with political partisanship. When one hears somebody refer to the equality of women in terms of such or such political party being in power, one has the impression that certain provincial premiers simply cannot understand our Prime Minister's way of thinking. I was extremely shocked to realize that self-serving considerations stood in the way of progress for our native people.

I shall not take up any more time today, Mr. Speaker. I have much more important things to do than to dwell on such silly motions which are not even in order and which, even if they were acceptable, would be defeated.

[English]

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the Parliamentary Secretary, especially toward the end of his speech when he spoke about political partisanship at the First Ministers' Conference last Thursday and Friday. I attended the conference as well, and I take umbrage at what the Hon. Member had to say. There were provincial Premiers from the same Party who had different points of view on how to reach the same goal. The Hon. Member mentioned the equality clause. To my understanding, all ten Premiers and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) supported the equality clause which was proposed on the Friday afternoon. In fact, it was the assembly of First Nation which rejected that and promised to give its answer within three weeks' time. I ask the Parliamentary Secretary if, in fact, that is not true. And how could he say that there was partisanhip when there were Premiers from both Parties who took different points of view?

• (1700)

Mr. Gingras: As far as the equality clause is concerned, if the Hon. Member will recall, it was not discussed by all the participants. The question was put to the native groups, and the last one to be interrogated was the Assembly of the First Nations which said: "We are not ready just yet. We would like to ponder over this for three or four weeks".

I was referring more specifically to the issue itself. If I made a mistake with respect to political autonomy for the Indian people, I am sorry. On this issue, the Province proved to be extremely reluctant, and I was giving my personal opinion earlier when I said that it was because of a certain political reluctance on the part of the Premiers.

[English]

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I will ask a supplementary question because I believe what the Parliamentary Secretary must be very careful of is using our aboriginal people for political purposes. I believe something like this, a subject which is so important today, should be placed above politics. I believe it is fair to say that there were some provincial Premiers of the same political Party who had disagreements with other Premiers of the same Party. I do not believe there is any question about the fact that they want to reach the same end somewhere down the road. However, I think it is the method of getting there that counts. I would hate to think that the Parliamentary Secretary is trying to bring politics into this very important subject, which is going to be a matter of very serious debate over the next short period of time, both with respect to equality rights and the subject of self-government.

[Translation]

Mr. Gingras: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to spend too much time on this issue, but in responding to the Hon. Member, who is the critic of his party for Indian Affairs and Northern Development, I must say that there was no question in our proposals of having partisan political debates. I only said, and it is fortunate that the Hon. Member himself has recognized this, Mr. Speaker, that some of the provincial Premiers could be playing politics at the expense of native rights. That is the only thing I said, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, in looking at the motion before us and having listened to the debate, Sir, I would say that nothing more clearly indicates the lack of leadership of the Liberal Party today than the comments which we have heard coming from the government benches. I would ask you, Sir, to take a look at what the motion says. The motion says:

> That this House regrets the failure of the government to include measures in the February 1984 Budget to prevent the continually sagging Canadian dollar from further decline—

There has been no explanation, none whatsoever, provided by anyone who has taken part in this debate as to the reasons behind the sagging Canadian dollar. If the Hon. Member opposite thinks that the Canadian dollar has not been sagging in recent days, he should take a look at the markets and see what is happening. We have no one standing up over there to tell us what the Government proposes to do about this, and obviously the Budget did not do anything about it, except perhaps to trigger what is happening to the dollar.

The motion goes on to say: that this House regrest the failure of the government to:

> —reverse the continuous increase in the already critically high levels of unemployment—

And they have gone up. The Hon. Member may not be aware, may not be cognizant of what is taking place in the country, but hundreds of thousands, millions, of Canadians are aware of the fact that they are out of jobs and unable to get work. There was nothing, however, from the government benches today to tell us why, or how the Budget would even begin to address that very serious problem. The motion also says: that this House regrets the failure of the government to:

—combat the return to steadily rising high interest rates—

People all over the country are terrified by the upward trend in interest rates. Investment has stopped, building has stopped, and jobs have stopped because of the high interest rate policy of this Government. It has been going on and on.

I listened to some of the things which the Hon. Member for Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe (Mr. Tobin) said. He talked as if there had been no high interest rates with this Government. Interest rates have been at the highest levels in Canadian history. They have thrown hundreds of thousands of people out of work and they are on the climb again. Is it any wonder people are absolutely terrified by the lack of leadership of this present Government? That is set out very clearly in the motion we have before us today, Sir. It is a statement of failure of the present Government. It is a statement of failure of this Government, in the first place, to avoid the recession which it did so much to create. It is a statement of failure, in the second place, to diminish the economic calamities of a world recession. It did not take any buffers and put them into place. And it is a failure, in the third place, Sir, to find a way out of the mess into which it has plunged all of us, but mostly the unemployed, the poor and the elderly who are suffering so much more as a result of this depression.

On this side of the House, Mr. Speaker, my colleagues have spoken to this motion and have discussed the failure of the Government to manage its own finances, and its economy more generally. They have shown how the misguided policies and, indeed, Sir, the foolish, wasteful spending of this Government, has severely crippled a country which is rich in natural and human resources, and how these policies have practically brought our economy to its knees. They have shown, indeed, during the debate today, how this recent Budget has done nothing to alleviate the problems of so many Canadians from coast to coast.

However, Sir, these are the fiscal considerations. A mounting deficit, high interest rates, and a sagging dollar are all in fiscal and monetary dimensions.

There is something equally important which government Members would not address today. Not only are the fiscal considerations important, but equally important are the social costs which are inflicted upon Canadians by a clearly incompetent Government. And I say they were inflicted upon them because time and time again the Government has had the opportunity to reverse some of its disastrous policies, but it has not done so.

Social costs, Sir, which in spite of the Government's often repeated claims of having preserved the social safety net, exact their painful toll on those people who are already at a disadvantage. Nowhere, Sir, did I hear it expressed more clearly than the other night by the Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development (Mr. Johnston). He said, "Why should we have universality? Why do we not question universality?" Here is a man who is running for the leadership of the Liberal Party, hoping to become Prime Minister of this country, and the first words out of him after he makes his declaration known is that he is going to question universality. He does not want safety nets. He said, "Do not have a safety net. Instead, make it a trampoline". He wants people bouncing up and down unprotected by the social security safety nets. He does not want the security which exists for people who are old, unemployed or single parent mothers. No, indeed! Put them on a trampoline, he says. That is what he would do with them. That is the man in charge of the economic development envelope for this Government. All I can say is, thank God he is not in charge of the social development envelope or there would be a great many people in far worse straits today.

Last week, Mr. Speaker, the most recent unemployment figures were released and they showed what we have been saying right along. The recovery in this country has stalled. That is tragic for a great many people. The unemployment rate in this country is now 11.3 per cent; 1.5 million people are out of work. With their dependants, it runs into the millions. But that is not the total figure, that is just those we see in these statistics. What about the many hidden unemployed, the discouraged unemployed?

While the unemployment rate in this country was mounting, Sir, what was happening south of the border and in other industrialized countries? The unemployment rate was going down. Canada is the reverse of all these other countries. In the U.S. the unemployment rate fell to 7.8 per cent last month, in Canada it rose to 11.3 per cent. It accelerated. Yes, officially we have 1.5 million unemployed, but, Sir, the discouraged unemployed would bring that figure to two million. There are 350,000 fewer full-time jobs in this country today than there were when the recession started. That is absolutely incredible, Mr. Speaker. And our population is growing all the time. That figure in itself shows the difficulties we have entered into.

There are hundreds of thousands of people, Mr. Speaker, besides those officially listed as unemployed, hundreds of thousands who no longer report to Canada Employment Centres because they are victims of defeat, despair and discouragement. All Members of Parliament, I am sure, have heard from those people. We have letters from them, we have telephone calls from them, we have visits from them. They come to us pleading for us to do something. But not one of those people was mentioned by the Hon. Member for Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe. I do not know, perhaps he does not have any of those people coming to his door, but I do. The Members with whom I sit do as well. They come with very, very difficult stories, tragic circumstances. I have a letter from a young man in Kingston who says:

I am a 24 year old male and the last steady job I have been able to attain was in 1981 . . . I have subsequently been forced to go on Welfare. Through Welfare I attended an Industrial Orientation Course wherein I was told to write down 100 possible employers. Since then I went to every place plus over 100 more here in Kingston.

I get up at 6 a.m. every morning in order to be at "Kingtario" to sign in and then proceed on to job searches. After this I go back there and report to my worker on where I have gone to look for a job. I've been doing this for 3 weeks now and because I have found no work she wants to put me down in a dark basement sanding mailboxes for $5.00 a day.

This is the absolute dead end, he explains, because $5 is not enough to cover any costs he may have. Yet he is taken off the job search routine, he cannot even get out to look for a job. He writes:

I don't want to be on Welfare, I want a job and I want to work for the money I earn.

I have excellent references from past jobs and all I want to do is work. I don't want to go back to school, just work.

If you have any ideas or suggestions as to where I can turn, please help. Anything at this point would be helpful.

Those are the people we hear from, Mr. Speaker. Those are the people who have been thrown out of work by the policies of this Government. They do not have a chance; they despair, and they are dejected. They have lost faith in a system of government which encourages them to study and look forward to making a contribution to their country, only to see the doors of opportunity close in their faces. Moreover, they are being robbed of their self-dignity and sense of worth. As long as they remain unemployed or unable to find work, of necessity there is a large and unproductive drain on the financial resources of this country.

A recent report on social development by the Canada Council indicates that unemployment and welfare payments as well as tax revenues forgone because of the unemployed average almost $15,000 per unemployed person last year, or about $20 billion in all. That cost is relatively easy to calculate, as is the increased spending under the Canada Assistance Program. Toward the end of last year the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) came back and asked for a Supplementary Estimate of almost $300 million for the Canada Assistance Plan. He did that, Sir, even though he made a forecast just six months previously as to what would have to be spent in that plan. But he underestimated because he could not predict the increasing numbers of unemployed and the cost involving people who would have to come off unemployment insurance and go on social welfare, the people who would be deprived of work.

That $300 million, Sir, was not approved because the Government was suddenly making a magnanimous gesture toward the poor. No, indeed, it had no discretion in this matter. It had to pay that money although it underestimated the number who would have to go on welfare and social security. These are people who really do not want to go to these offices.

However, Mr. Speaker, unemployment insurance and welfare expenditures are relatively easy to calculate, so is the cost of lost tax revenue. But there is a far greater cost than the mere dollar figures that we can come up with in this way. That is the human cost of being poor. That is what this Government will not address, the costs represented by the tens of thousands of Canadians who are simply not making it in the system. These are the faces, the people behind the statistics. It is the cost of lost dignity, lost hopes and dreams, the cost of broken homes, family violence, juvenile delinquency, the cost of petty and more serious crimes, the cost of alcoholism and drug addiction. These costs soar with soaring unemployment.

Last Friday I asked the Minister of Finance to respond to a front-page article in The Toronto Star the headline of which said: "Deaths, diseases rise with jobless rate—". I asked him whether any studies were being done in the country to show the linkage between unemployment and the tremendous social costs that are being built up. The story in The Toronto Star said:

Canadians are paying a frightful price in ill health and early death for today's heavy unemployment—

It went on to list some of the costs and some of the ways in which this is coming through. It said that a study was conducted at Johns Hopkins University, which is no mere fly-by-night institution, though the Minister of Finance tried to dismiss it as such. The study has shown that for every 1 per cent increase in the jobless rate there is a 2 per cent increase in cardiac arrests. For every 1 per cent increase in unemployment there is a 3 to 4 per cent increase in infant mortality. For every 1 per cent increase in unemployment there is a 4 to 5 per cent increase in suicides and homicides. For every 1 per cent increase in the jobless rate there is a 5 to 6 per cent increase in admissions to psychiatric hospitals.

These are costs that will not go away overnight. They will be there building up in our society on an ongoing basis. That is why some of us are so concerned. The person who was heading this study at Johns Hopkins University in the United States said that what is applicable to the United States will apply to Canada as well. He went on to say that while no research has been done here on the link between unemployment and health, his impression is it would be the same in Canada. He told the conference that the stress and shock of being without a job strongly influences psychiatric disorders and aggression and is reflected both in the home and in crime. Those are the things which are connected with unemployment. Those are the issues which we should be addressing.

When I asked the Minister of Finance about that on Friday, he said that this is a subject on which we can make no scientific assessment or studies. Other countries are doing these scientific studies. Other countries are making these assessments and discovering that we are building into our social patterns a kind of disorder and burden down the line which we simply should not have to bear. Families and individuals are being put under pressures that may be reflected in today's unemployment figures, but will further be reflected in tomorrow's suicide rates, psychiatric problems and infant mortalities, as is mentioned here. Those are the problems which have to be studied. We cannot dismiss the linkage between unemployment and social problems and social costs. They are there and they are deep.

I know that you have indicated that my time is expiring, Mr. Speaker. The other day the Minister of Finance said that this is an issue which cannot be addressed in a scientific manner. I urge him to look at some of the studies already done in Canada. One has been put out by the Social Planning Council of metropolitan Toronto and the Ontario Social Development Council. It is called, "And the Poor get Poorer". I could give you some very telling illustrations from that report. Another one was put out the other day by the National Council on Welfare. It is called, "Sixty-five and Older". It indicates the kind of poverty there is in our older generation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): I regret to interrupt the hon. lady but her time has expired. There is now a 10 minute question and answer period following the remarks of the hon. lady.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands. She stated that construction has decreased. I would think that this would be logical in a country such as Canada where we have a harsh winter climate. It would only be normal for some types of construction not to be undertaken during our extreme winters. This is unlike most of the countries south of us where there are not such extreme climates. The fact is that construction employment increased by 5.4 per cent in February 1984. In February 1984, 54,000 new jobs were created. In fact, during the recovery period, 424,000 jobs have been created, and in the last month full-time jobs have increased steadily. Part-time jobs, admittedly, have been showing fluctuations with seasonal needs. The decline in employment in January was due entirely to a decline in part-time employment. Does the Hon. Member suggest we should be putting emphasis on part-time jobs rather than permanent jobs?

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I am just saying that there should be emphasis on job creation. This country needs to get people back working again. That has not been done. Unfortunately, as I said in my address, there are 350,000 fewer jobs today than when we went into the recession, whether that happens to be in the construction trades, the fishing industry, agriculture or in office work. There are a good many people who have come of labour force age. My emphasis would be across the board in every field possible, because the best social security net for anyone in the country is a job.

[Translation]

Mr. Henri Tousignant (Parlementary Secretary to Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the speech we just heard by the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) could have been made by any other Canadian, because the Hon. Member was dealing with the present unemployment situation, and every Canadian understands the situation. We on the Government side do not need a Member of the Progressive Conservative Party to tell us to be sensitive to the needs of the unemployed. The Hon. Member mentioned the problems and the hardship, and the connection with the suicide rate and with all kinds of illnesses among the unemployed, and so forth. Mr. Speaker, this is all quite true, but there is not a single Government that would be stupid enough to wish a high unemployment rate on the country. No Government would do that. We would be the first to want full employment. Personally, I would be much happier if we did have full employment, and if people, instead of calling me up regularly to ask about a job . . . I would not have to cope with all these problems. I am surprised Opposition Members are not telling us what they would do. It is easy enough to say: the Government is doing a bad job, but I would prefer to hear some concrete proposals. Moreover, when we ask to hear them, they do not know what to say. Mr. Speaker, it is funny how it is always easy to criticize. On the one hand, they are saying we are not—

Mr. St. Germain: Call an election!

Mr. Tousignant: Yes, we are going to have an election, my dear sir, we are going to have an election and you will bite the dust once again, because your leader has no credibility . . . sorry, but you asked for it. Your leader has no credibility, and you are going to bite the dust once more. So, Mr. Speaker, as I was saying, we are being accused of poor administration and of having large deficits, and on the other hand, we are told to create jobs.

What kind of equation does the Hon. Member have in mind when she suggests that we create jobs, when it means we would not be competitive or would become less and less so? The Hon. Member says we lost 350,000 jobs since the beginning of the recession. Mr. Speaker, if those people were now employed, but not employed efficiently, what would happen to our prices? How would we be able to compete on the international market? I wish the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) would address those problems. Let's have an intelligent and non-partisan debate on these issues and let us make a joint effort to find solutions. As I said earlier, there is not a single political party or Government that would be stupid enough to keep unemployment rates high on purpose, just for the hell of it. There is something wrong somewhere. Did we put too much pressure on the economy? Did we as Canadians make too many demands on our economy and is that why it is now "overheating"? That may be the problem. Therefore, I wish the Hon. Member would make concrete proposals. Mr. Speaker, back in 1979, if we had not had a Government in Quebec that wanted to separate the Province from the rest of Canada, we probably would have let the Progressive Conservatives remain in power. However, we did not want to run that risk, since the Leader of the Government at the time would have been completely wiped out by the Premier of Quebec. He would have lost his shirt, and today, the country would be as good as split in two. We did not want to run that risk, but otherwise, we probably should have let the Progressive Conservatives govern the country, and inexperienced as they were, they would have panicked and cut all social programs. Actually, it is rather funny to hear Progressive Conservative Members, like the Member for Kingston and the Islands, trying to teach us a thing or two about social programs. But if they had been elected, they would have slashed all social programs. It is the first thing that would have come to their mind in an attempt to bolster the economy—do away with all social programs. The result would have been political chaos, Mr. Speaker. Fortunately, because we ran competent men, men of experience, men who have already seen—

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I understood that this was a ten-minute question period for the individual who had the floor and not a ten-minute speech by the Hon. Member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Tousignant).

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order, please. The Chair must point out to the Member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Tousignant) that his remarks must at least have some bearing on the speech made by the Hon. Member who had the floor.

[English]

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I was waiting for him to finish that rather long, involved and preambulating comment that seemed to wander all over. I think he tried to incorporate a question into it as to what positive proposals I would put forward. I have put them forward a couple of times.

First, I say to him that I would not put the senior citizens of this country on a trampolene, like the Minister of State for Economic Development would be prepared to do. That is what I would say at the outset.

The second thing I would say to him—and I have already made this recommendations with regard to the Budget measures—is that rather than make proposals which would benefit people in the $55,000 and over income bracket with regard to retirement plans, I would have directed that $300 million, which the Government will lose in revenues as a result of that, to people who really need it in social programs, not those who earn over $55,000. You should be ashamed of yourselves for doing that.

In this regard, I suggest to him that we look at the $300 million that the Government has used in its special porkbarrel, the Special Employment Initiatives Program, and put it into the job career programs for training young people so that they can learn the new technologies of today. It would be far better to train these young people in the proper technologies than to try to buy somebody's vote in a Liberal riding.

Mr. Louis R. Desmarais (Dollard): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) said in his remarks that he regrets the failure of the Government to include in its February 1984 Budget, and I quote, " . . . measures to prevent the continually sagging Canadian dollar from further decline, reverse the continuous increase in unemployment, and combat the return to steadily rising interest rates".

In reply to the Hon. Member for St. John's West, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that his remarks reflect a misinterpretation of the basic measures required to sustain the economic recovery which has been under way for some time now. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the main purpose of the February 1984 Budget is exactly what the Hon. Member is accusing us of ignoring. As it happens, our February 1984 Budget acknowledges that the best way to prevent a further decline of the Canadian dollar, reduce unemployment and maintain interest rates at an acceptable level is to promote productivity and ensure the best possible competitive position against foreign competitors. That, Mr. Speaker, can be done through incentives to the private sector and sustained confidence in our society, from both an economic and a social point of view.

Here is an excerpt from the February 1984 Budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde):

> If Canadians are to meet the challenges of the future, we cannot be satisfied with past performance and past habits. These will not sustain us in a fiercely competitive international marketplace. We must become better than the competition—better at producing and marketing goods and services; better at working together for the shared economic interests of all Canadians. If we measure up to that challenge, then we shall create new opportunities for Canadians to find good, satisfying, permanent jobs. We shall create opportunities for more Canadians to buy a home, to start or expand a small business, and to invest with confidence in our future. In short, we shall create the opportunities for Canadians to build better, more fulfilling lives on a foundation of economic strength.

The budget of February 1984 encourages the private sector to become more competitive with foreign industries.

First, it proposes new and important initiatives to strengthen the productivity, competitiveness and export capacity of our industries.

Second, it simplifies the taxation system and reduces the administrative burden resting on the small business sector which is the main reservoir of jobs in Canada.

Third, it simplifies the filing of income tax returns for individuals and makes for a fairer taxation administration.

Fourth, it proposes innovative mechanisms to increase the economic security of homeowners and market stability for builders.

Fifth, it announces new significant initiatives designed to bring about a reform of the Canadian pension system and to provide for greater assistance to those most in need.

• (1740)

Sixth, it continues to pursue fiscal responsibility by limiting and reducing government deficits to provide for growth potential in the private sector.

Finally, it keeps us on the road to success in our fight against inflation.

Mr. Speaker, how do we plan to meet this objective? First, by maintaining wage and price restrictions; by creating a new Productivity Centre; by creating an Aid-Trade Fund; by simplifying the taxation system as regards small businesses; by enhancing as I was saying earlier, the economic security of individual Canadians and by proposing an action plan for pension reform; by implementing a mortgage rate protection plan—

[English]

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not wish to take very long on this point of order, but I would draw your attention to page 1785 of the House of Commons Debates for March 5, 1984. The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault) said:

> Order, please. May I ask the Hon. Member to address the House orally as provided for in our rules and traditions? This is the second time I have reminded him.

I draw this matter to your attention again, Mr. Speaker. I trust that the same regulation applies now that applied on March 5.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): The Hon. Member's point is well taken. The rule still applies as it did the other day. I ask the Hon. Member, although he is allowed to quote documents provided that he identifies the document, to speak orally.

[Translation]

Mr. Desmarais: Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief. I am definitely under the impression that what the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) is advocating is exactly what our budget is aiming to do. I think that, in addition to being contradictory, his motion is unfounded and should be withdrawn.

[English]

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, does the Hon. Member for Dollard (Mr. Desmarais) agree with the Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development (Mr. Johnston) when he is alleged to have said that the deficit has a very pragmatic restraint which people do not see? I mean that people have to understand that governments simply cannot borrow and borrow. Would the Hon. Member agree with that? Would the Hon. Member be taking that advice from the Minister when he is voting on the borrowing authority Bill and approving a Budget that contemplates the Government's borrowing, borrowing, borrowing, and borrowing into the indefinite future?

Mr. Desmarais: Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that the debate on borrowing, borrowing and borrowing will take place tomorrow on Bill C-29, I believe. I am prepared to speak on that tomorrow if the Hon. Member would like to attend.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, does the Hon. Member feel that the Canadian dollar should be allowed to drop? Does he approve of the Government's interference today when the Government started again to use its reserves to bid up the dollar on the marketplace? Is that the kind of economy the Hon. Member would like to see?

Mr. Desmarais: Mr. Speaker, I believe that our policy has been to let the dollar float within reasonable limits. The fact that the dollar is dropping, as the Hon. Member knows very well, helps our exporters to do more business. It helps to create jobs in Canada. It is a subject I understand the Opposition has been harping and carping about at some great length.

Miss MacDonald: Because unemployment is going up as the dollar is going down.

Mr. Desmarais: Why would the Opposition continue to talk about it?

Miss MacDonald: Because unemployment is going up as the dollar is going down.

Mr. Desmarais: It also helps us to maintain the interest rates where they are. This helps private enterprise to improve plants and equipment and to create more jobs.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I was noting the comments of my colleague. I want to draw to the attention of Hon. Members the fact that the foreign trade surplus has increased to $18.3 billion in the fourth quarter of 1983 from $16.3 billion in the third quarter. The fourth quarter surplus was about twice the pre-1982 record level of $8.8 billion in 1980, which was the same as the 1982 level. The trade surplus for December stood at $19 billion.

If we were to implement the provisions in the Budget to make more money available to Canadian corporations to bid on projects in the Third World countries, how will this affect our Canadian job market? Will this increase employment for Canadians and result in a better pattern of world trade, which would even further enhance our exports?

Mr. Desmarais: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the Hon. Member brought up this matter. It leads to another point. Currencies around the world are not controlled by Canada, whether we like it or not. Let us take a look at currencies last year. Say, for instance, you had done business in Italy in June. You would have found that if you had waited two months, the money you would have received for a product would have depreciated by 20 per cent. It makes a whole lot of difference. It is true that if we permit our exporters to sell more overseas, this will create more jobs here. It is important to remember that in September of last year plant utilization in Canada was 70.5 per cent. This means that a 30 per cent capacity was not being used.

It is true that this creates more jobs, and it is very important that that point be made clear to Canadians.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I want to confirm with the Hon. Member for Dollard that he really believes we would improve employment by allowing the dollar to drop. Would he give the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) that advice? That is an important consideration. In other words, the dollar drops and more people in the world can buy our goods. Presumably if the dollar were to drop to, say, 75 cents compared to the U.S. dollar, we would have more buyers and more employment. I presume that is the argument. Conceivably, if we get the dollar down to 50 cents, we could really have full employment. Would that be the advice he would give to the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Desmarais: No, Mr. Speaker. My advice would be to increase productivity. That is what we are trying to do. If we increase productivity, our dollar will not drop. It will maintain its level. Hon. Members must remember that all other currencies in the world went down last year compared to the American dollar; all but the Canadian dollar. The Canadian dollar is now sliding a little bit. There is no harm in that. I think you have to let it float. If you increase productivity, you will increase the value of the dollar.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I am literally amazed at the various solutions offered by Members on the other side of the House. They realize how disastrous the economy of the country is.

Mrs. Beauchamp-Niquet: That is what you think.

Mr. Blenkarn: We had the Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development (Mr. Johnston) announce his candidacy the other day. In announcing his candidacy for the leadership he was very concerned about the borrowing and the continual deficit action of the Government.

I wonder how a Member of the Government side can stay a Member of the Government and go along with Cabinet decisions that produce budgets that inevitably lead to borrowing, borrowing and borrowing, and then on the street and in halls around the countryside, as reported in the press, attack his own Government, attack the very essence of the decisions made when he was a member of the Cabinet, and indeed stay in that Cabinet. It is inconceivable that any form of Cabinet solidarity would allow that to occur. Indeed I am surprised that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) would allow it, but I suppose I should not be surprised because we have the Minister of Justice (Mr. MacGuigan) doing the same thing. The Minister of Justice says, "When we have a problem, we throw money at it". That is exactly the answer of the Liberal Government—throw money at a problem. He says that it does not work, but he stays in Cabinet.

One must wonder where we are going with a Government where two Ministers so far have elected to put themselves up as leaders of this motley group across the hall with entirely different philosophies from those that have been pursued by the Government over past years. Yet they want to remain members of the Government. Is it because they receive first-class and unlimited travel as Cabinet Ministers, so that they can continue to toot around the countryside?

Our Whip has put a question on the Order Paper indicating that we would like to know where the JetStars are going, but that will not prevent them from using their ministerial offices in their campaigning. Surely yesterday's man on Bay Street should have the same privilege as the critical men here.

I would like to refer to an article by Don McGillivray which appeared in the March 9 edition of The Citizen and to quote just briefly from it. In part it reads:

The finance minister's February 15 budget was a gamble that interest rates would fall and growth continue strong through this year. It's already looking like a bad bet.

We had better believe that it is a bad bet. The unbelievable Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) goes before the Beth Zion Synagogue this weekend and says, "Our forecast is for a decline toward the end of the year". Boy, we will have a decline. As long as these fellows stay in power, we will have a decline. It will not be in interest rates, as he suggested. It will be in economic activity as more and more Canadians every month find that they cannot obtain a job.

This morning the minister said that his projections were based upon a 4.9 per cent growth factor. He has already retreated from 5 per cent. Also he said that other economic forecasters have averaged up to 4.6 per cent. That is right, as he was averaging in forecasts of last summer when it looked as if there might be some resurgence in Canada's growth and when it looked as if they might possibly get a hold of things.

If we take a look at every economic forecast this year—in January, February and March—the average is more like 3.5 per cent and maybe not even that. Tom Maxwell, Chairman of the Conference Board, suggested in Calgary last week that 1985 would be the beginning of a real recession. He said that the last one was chicken-feed and "waint until we get this one coming up".

So what do they do? They put forward a Budget which does absolutely nothing for anyone, except increase unemployment, see the dollar drop and see interest rates rise. Yet their apologists on that side all day today have spoken about how wonderful they are. We are finding out how wonderful they are as various members of the Cabinet put themselves up as the new leaders of Liberalism. One by one they stand and say, "We have not been doing very well, have we?" One says that we must borrow and borrow and borrow. The other says, "We throw money at it." But none of these things work.

They have program after program supposedly to put people back to work. What kinds of programs are there? There is half a million dollars for Liberal ridings, each of them. There are make-work programs, maybe. Do they give jobs? Yes, they do; they are trying to ensure that Liberal Members come back. That is the affirmative action program of the Liberal Party. Those are the kinds of jobs we will get, but do they really get at the problem?

Do they really say that if they take money out of the economy, there is no money for young businessmen who want to start to put people back to work in real jobs? If we borrow and borrow, do we not drive up interest rates? That is what Mr. Bouey has said. That is what Paul Volcker has said. That is what every economist has said. That is what is happening. Yet they do not seem to concern themselves with it. They seem to have some idea that the brains over there know how to run the country and know how to put people to work.

They talk about job creation as if they created jobs. They do not create any jobs at all. What job did government ever create that was not just straight overhead? Government may be involved in the redistribution of wealth. Government may be involved in looking after the poor, helping the blind and the disadvantaged. Does Government really create any jobs or any wealth? Nonsense, nonsense. Government is a spender, government is a drag. This Government is a real drag. Under the Government and its leadership, including both provincial and municipal governments, Government expenditures last year were well in excess of 47 per cent of the Gross National Product. If we add Crown corporations—and this Government is great at creating and feeding them—well over a half or probably 55 per cent of the GNP of the country is in the maw of Government. Is that not what is wrong? Where are the policies from that side?

The policies are such that a week ago Statistics Canada reported that it could not find $6.6 billion which was supposed to be in the exchange fund or in the current accounts surplus. What happened to it? They say that it must have gone on illegal drugs, Florida real estate or was lost in the tax havens on the Cayman Islands. Where did it go? It went because the people in Canada who earned those moneys found that Canada was not a safe place in which to keep their money and so they invested it elsewhere. A government which was active and working for Canadians, a government that was attempting to put Canadians back to work and to make Canada grow, would be a government attracting into Canada savings and wealth from around the world.

This country could be the Switzerland of the world. We have more opportunity than any nation. Here we are with but 25 million people to share our vast resources, sitting next to the largest, most profitable and most commercially-sound market in the world—the United States. Yet we have unemployment. Here we are right on the edge of the Pacific Rim with various people looking for our technology and resources, and we have unemployment. Here we are with clear access to the major countries of Europe, and we have unemployment.

Is there any justification for why Canada should have unemployment when Japan has little? Those rocky, barren islands with virtually 100 per cent employment have interest rates down in the 5 per cent category. There is no justification for the mismanagement, incompetence, sloth and waste that we have had from the leadership of the country.

The various members of Cabinet who are now standing before their Party asking to be nominated ought to resign; they ought to resign. If they want to criticize their Party, if they want to criticize their Government, if they want to stand up for Canada, they ought to resign and reorganize the Liberal Party. We need two Parties in the country, but we do not need this kind of government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member but it is now six o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 45 deemed to have been moved.

FINANCE—EFFECT OF TAXATION ON DISTILLING INDUSTRY. (B) MEMBERSHIP OF TASK FORCE

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Mr. Speaker, during Question Period on February 6, 1984 I asked the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) what he intended to do about the economic downturn in the distillery industry, brought about by his Government's taxation policies. On February 24 I again raised the matter with the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. MacLaren).

The issue I was bringing to the attention of the Government was the plight that the distilling industry is facing today. It was brought on by the introduction of the ad valorem taxation system introduced by this Government in 1980. Ad valorem taxation resulted in an excise tax increase of 15.2 per cent in September, 1982, and a further increase of 13.3 per cent a year later. The obvious conflict with the Government's six and five program would have been enough in itself to prompt the Government to reassess this unfair method of taxation, but the problems go much deeper than that.

This method of taxation actually fuels inflation, even when there are no price increases at the manufacturers' level. Ad valorem increases of the excise taxes on alcohol products are based on the rises in the consumer price index. The increases are automatic, regardless of their effect. The Association of Canadian Distillers has pointed out that "since excise duty leads the retail price, the index feeds itself". These increases raise the consumer price index and are reflected the following year by a further increase in taxes, not to mention inflation.

These excessive tax increases have resulted in a decline in consumption by Canadians and tourists, which has in turn resulted in the layoff of 2,500 workers in the distilling industry, at a direct cost to the Government of at least $40 million in UIC payments and lost income taxes. This costs the Canadian taxpayers, me and you.

That is not all. By forcing down sales in this way the Government is losing tax revenue from the industry. The number of cases of alcohol sold declined by 15.5 per cent from 1981 to the end of 1983. It is called "killing the goose that laid the golden egg". My economics professor very early taught me the law of diminishing productivity. That is what we are seeing. If the present trend continues, the Government will actually start to lose tax revenue by next year. It will lose revenue through increased taxation. That is the issue here, lost revenue and lost jobs, not morals.

This is the situation I was trying to point out to the Minister. I asked what he intended to do about it. What I got was a lecture on morals by a Minister who has none. He made a little mistake of $200 million in his budget, but that had nothing to do with morals. He said he didn't change the budget. He said he does not disapprove of this situation because it reflects a situation in which Canadians are changing their habits. The Minister of Finance is trying to use the tax system to bring about social changes and to alter drinking habits. That is not what the tax system was set up to do. It is unfair and an abuse of the system.

Sales are down because the federal taxation system has priced the products beyond the reach of an increasing number of Canadians and visitors. This has resulted in a loss of tax revenue for the Government and a loss of job, jobs and more jobs. In the House the Minister implies that this is not the case, yet in a private letter to his colleagues he expressed concern that the federal share of tax revenues from alcohol products declined from 41 per cent to 31 per cent in the past. But "O holier than thou" does not admit this, does he?

Where does the Government really stand? It introduces a system to increase the federal take, and the result is a decline in revenues. The minister then applauds this situation by saying that Canadians are becoming more moderate and furthermore, he adds, just for good measure, any excessive taxation is the fault of the provinces. The Minister then sets up a task force—that we knew nothing about—to look into the very concerns I have raised, in the hope that it will find alternatives that may meet the objectives of both industry and government. This is a cop out.

The Minister cannot have it both ways. Either he must accept the consequence of his tax policies, which is a drop in tax revenues for the Government—which he applauds—or he can accept the fact that the Government has brought about this situation, and remove the ad valorem tax system, if he is truly concerned, as he appears to be, judging by the establishment of the task force. However, he cannot go on applauding Canadians for their so-called moderation, blame the provinces for excessive taxes and ignore Canadian shareholders in a Canadian industry to boot.

Provincial taxes are applied after federal taxes, so that every increase in federal tax means an automatic increase in provincial tax, which means higher prices and an automatic increase in federal taxes. So the whole process repeats itself several times a year.

The Minister cannot go on ignoring the effect of all of this on the tourism industry. These taxes are costing the industry more than 37,000 jobs and will add $700 million to the tourism deficit this year. Individual tourists and conventions alike do not want to come to Canada with our bulging prices on liquid refreshments and tobacco, which suffer the ad valorem tax, and the price of gasoline and accommodations.

I put my questions and concerns to the Minister again, and hope that he can provide a more appropriate response than the one he gave on February 6, and which was supported by the Minister of State for Finance.

How does the ad valorem system fit into the six and five program? Why does the Minister applaud declining sales and tax revenues then set up a task force? Why does the Minister believe that the provinces are responsible for the effects of his policies? Why does he not lead the provinces with solutions?

Finally, why does he tell me one thing in the House, then tell his colleagues and constituents another thing in his letter, to cover his guilt? Who is he misleading? Where does the Government really stand, and what does it intend to do about the problems that I have outlined?

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the taxation of alcoholic beverages is a multi-faceted subject which encompasses a number of complex and controversial issues. The major question concerning the taxation of alcoholic beverages, on which the discussion is now focused, concerns the indexing mechanism used in adjusting excise levies on these products.

For the purpose of background information I should put on record some examples of what is happening in the liquor industry. I use a moderate sized purchase which would retail for $13.46. Out of that the Government of Canada, through excise tax and sales tax, takes 26.1 per cent; in Ontario the provincial Government takes a total mark-up and tax on top of that mark-up of 57.4 per cent, leaving the distillers with 16.5 per cent. The Hon. Member is quite right when he says that not only do we have a provincial tax on top of a federal tax, but we also have a provincial tax on top of the provincial mark-up; the mark-up is about $6.29. That accounts for a good deal of the problem and I want to make sure that the Hon. Member knows where the money goes.

The alcohol and tobacco industries have made representations concerning certain problems in the technical operation of the indexing system. For example, they have expressed concern over the linkages of the federal levies with provincial taxes on these products, and the ability of one industry to affect the taxes imposed on its competitors.

In response to these representations, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) on November 7, 1983 announced the creation of the Task Force on Alcohol and Tobacco Tax Indexation to examine the current indexing mechanism and to consider whether other such systems can be devised to better meet the objectives of both government and industry. As announced by the Minister on November 7, 1983, the task force is chaired by Dr. Douglas Peters, senior vice-president and chief economist from the Toronto-Dominion Bank who is currently serving a two-year appointment with the Department of Finance. The other four members of the task force were drawn from the distilling, brewing, wine and tobacco manufacturing industry associations.

The task force first met on November 7, 1983, and I understand they have since had several meetings and are continuing to work diligently at achieving the objectives of the task force.

The Minister also announced on November 7, 1983, that written submissions to the task force could be directed to Dr.

Peters. To date the task force has received and given consideration to a number of submissions from industry and consumer groups, and other interested citizens, and I am sure that the task force would welcome any representations that the Hon. Member might wish to make.

FINANCE—(A) ALLOCATION OF JOB-CREATION FUNDS. (B) GOVERNMENT POSITION. (C) REQUEST FOR LIST OF PROJECTS FUNDED

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I rose in this House in early February to ask about the issue of the contribution of the Special Employment Initiatives Program to Canadian unity, to the willingness of Canadian taxpayers to pay taxes. I made four allegations over the course of a week, Mr. Speaker. I made the allegation that this was a program which would divide Canadians because it created first class unemployed Canadians in Liberal ridings and second class unemployed Canadians in ridings held by members of other political parties. I made the allegation that it took this Party two years to find out the criterion for allocation of some $300 million. I made the allegation that the Government was in fact ignoring the criterion which it finally gave us almost two years later. And I made the allegation that it was the Prime Minister's office, and not the line Ministers, which was controlling these funds. In effect, Mr. Speaker, we had the total use of Canadian taxpayers' dollars put in the hands of the backroom manipulators in the Prime Minister's Office, the unelected backroom manipulators, who would determine who in Canada was to get a job and who in Canada was not.

Behind those allegations was the certitude that we were involved in the expenditure of taxpayer dollars to build favours for a leadership campaign—that was the thrust of it—to build favours for the re-election of Liberal Members. These backroom manipulators were using taxpayers' dollars for purposes which were never voted by this Parliament, and in ways which were never contemplated by the electorate of this country.

What have we found out, Mr. Speaker? I represent the riding of Calgary West, one of five Hon. Members of Parliament from a thriving city of some 600,000 which has been hurt by the National Energy Program. I represent a city in which 42,000 people are unemployed. These 42,000 unemployed, Mr. Speaker, have families, spouses, children, economic hard times, high interest rates on their mortgages, and so on. Of the $186 million which we currently have in the lists provided for us by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy), out of 15 government departments, not 10 cents of the Special Employment Initiatives Program was spent in the City of Calgary. Not a job was created, not a dime was spent, Mr. Speaker.

What is the characteristic of the City of Calgary? It has all Conservative Members of Parliament. There is not a Liberal in the bunch. Some two-thirds of the voters in this city chose to send Conservative Members to this chamber. We have a $186 million expenditure, supposedly to be used to create jobs across the country, and out of 42,000 unemployed people in the City of Calgary, not one can get a job under this program.

Alberta, as a province, has one independent and 20 Conservative Members. They received $3.3 million out of this total program, somewhere near 2 per cent of the funds. The Province of Quebec has 74 Members out of 75 who are Liberal. It has about 27 per cent of the Canadian population. However, out of this fund, Mr. Speaker, 48.48 per cent of the funds go to that province which is represented in this chamber predominantly by Liberal Members.

The Province of Ontario, Mr. Speaker, received $53 million. It is a province which has Members from all three political parties. However, 90 per cent of the money in the Special Employment Initiatives Program in the Province of Ontario—90 per cent of $53 million—went to Liberal ridings.

Surely, in our four years of experience in this House, there is no greater case for condemnation of a government for the misuse of public expenditures. At the same time, Mr. Speaker, Revenue Canada is out there badgering taxpayers to pay more taxes. How can Canadians feel good about paying their share of taxes when they have a government at the centre of the country which so badly abuses that sense of public trust and public responsibility?

Back room manipulators in the Prime Minister's Office were telling line Ministers how to spend the funds voted for this program by this Parliament. Let us look at what some of those line Ministers did. In Fisheries, Mr. Speaker, 80.5 per cent of the money went to Liberal ridings. Under the Department of Health and Welfare, headed by that great champion of the underdog in this country, 97.8 per cent of the funds went to Liberal ridings. Is that the kind of person we want as the head of Health and Welfare in Canada? Under Energy, Mines and Resources, Mr. Speaker, 100 per cent of the funds went to Liberal held ridings. Under the Department of the Environment—surely of public concern, with acid rain and all those good things—100 per cent of the funds went to Liberal ridings. Under Public Works, Mr. Speaker, 91.1 per cent went to Liberal ridings. Under Transport, and that great saviour of the West, the Transport Minister, who will probably become a candidate for the Liberal Party leadership, 85.2 per cent to Liberal held ridings. Under Correctional services, 100 per cent to liberal held ridings. Under Central Mortgage and Housing, that great body supposed to provide shelter for all Canadians when they need it, 89.5 per cent to Liberal ridings. Under Canada Post it was 95.7 per cent. There was one exception, Mr. Speaker, that of DRIE, under which 26.6 per cent went to NDP ridings; that is for Jim Coutts in Spadina. Even there they—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member, but his seven minutes are up.

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): As concerns the comments made by the Hon. Member, I believe that whenever he refers to the Department of Transport, he should mention the amounts which will be invested in the Vancouver area under the new Western Grain Transportation Act. He should check the figures involved and ask his colleagues from the Vancouver area whether they supported us when this legislation was passed. Not one Hon. Member of his group spoke against the Bill at second or third reading stages in this House because the money was to go to the Vancouver area. The Hon. Member should not be selective in quoting these figures; he should take all of them into consideration. He would then see what is the actual economic situation. The Hon. Member has made many allegations to the effect that the funds set aside for job creation were only allocated to Liberal constituencies.

Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Roberts) has explained several times these last few weeks, all the funds were spent by the federal Government to create jobs. This has been explained very clearly and put on the record. As for the way the funds were distributed among the Provinces, it was in every case in relation to the number of unemployed in each Province. It can hardly be suggested that two classes of unemployed have been created, as the Hon. Member opposite has said over and over again. He should know that unemployment has nothing to do with what is usually referred to as class divisions.

I would also like to remind the Hon. Member opposite that the job creation programs which he criticized are part of a comprehensive government initiative which, along with the $2.4 billion of economic incentives announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) in his April budget, had substantial effects in all provinces whatever their political allegiance. The evidence is found in the number of jobs created last year. Over 400,000 jobs, Mr. Speaker.

Naturally the Hon. Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) has found fault with the special job creation projects. As the Hon. Member knows full well, it is only one aspect of the government's job creation programs. As the minister said when he tabled the complete list of job creation projects, the funds granted for job creation by the CEIC have now reached $2.5 billion for a 2-year period from 1983 to 1985. The special recovery projects, which are meant to increase employment, are funded by several federal departments within the framework of previously established programs. This will provide a total of $2.4 billion in additional funds during fiscal years 1983-84 and 1984-85.

I have indicated to the Hon. Member with regard to job creation programs . . . It is quite surprising to hear the Hon. Member opposite complain about this situation, because when his party was in power for a little while, a very little while in 1979, it was overanxious to get rid of all the job creation schemes as we know them today, such as the Canada Works program. But when benefits are being paid the unemployed in their own constituencies, they always feel it is too little and too late.

These people speak from both sides of their mouths, just like their leader does, concerning job creation programs. They just do not know where they stand, Mr. Speaker.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—UNEMPLOYMENT IN NEW BRUNSWICK. (B) EMPLOYMENT—SPECIAL EMPLOYMENT INITIATIVES PROGRAM—DISTRIBUTION OF FUNDS TO NEW BRUNSWICK RIDINGS

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, Members on this side of the House in Her Majesty's Official Opposition have consistently and constantly been belabouring the inaction of the Government over the desperate unemployment situation that exists in the country. I would like to refer to a question which I asked of the Minister responsible on February 23 in which I brought to his attention the fact that the construction industry in the Province of New Brunswick is considered to be the bellweather of the economy. I pointed out to the Minister that recent figures available to me indicate that in the Saint John region, and I suspect the same is true throughout the entire area of New Brunswick, unemployment is absolutely astounding and totally unacceptable. I referred to the construction trades in particular.

I pointed out to the Minister that the unemployment figures for the Saint John building and construction trades during this period of time were as high as 84 per cent in some areas. That is in the labour force. There was a total membership in the labourers' union in Saint John of 889, of which 748 were unemployed. Another astounding fact is that unemployment of plumbers and pipe fitters reached 83 per cent. Out of a total workforce of 588, some 489 were unemployed. There is 82 per cent unemployment among carpenters, 75 per cent unemployment among millwrights, 72 per cent unemployment among operating engineers and 76 per cent unemployment among sheet metal workers. The list goes on and on, Mr. Speaker.

One of the most discouraging things about the high unemployment figures, particularly in the construction trades, is that it specifically and particularly affects the youth. The Government has made reference time and again to how much it is doing to encourage youth to get into the workforce, and what it is doing to promote special programs to take care of the extremely high unemployment factor amongst the youth.

In response the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) brings in a Budget which says it is going to generate lasting and meaningful jobs. He says jobs are going to be available to all Canadians who want one. In effect, Mr. Speaker, this is a bunch of nonsense that has been set into meaningless motion by a Minister who does not have the slightest care or the slightest idea of what unemployment is all about in Atlantic Canada, let alone in the rest of Canada.

We have a Government, Mr. Speaker, that attempts to place a project in the Miramichi of New Brunswick. I am referring to the phase out of CFB Chatham, the airforce base where eventually 3,400 or 3,500 jobs will be either directly or indirectly adversely affected. The Government says it is going to place a prison up there. That prison is currently under construction. The Atlantic region's project manager said that one of the main objectives, if not the prime consideration in the spending of $43 million at this construction project at Renous, is to utilize local and New Brunswick professionals and, of course, skilled and unskilled labourers.

It came to my attention, Mr. Speaker, that the structural steel contract, which would be of substantial importance to the local region as well as to New Brunswick's economy because it would be labour intensive, was awarded outside the province. This is directly contrary to the promises that were made by the Government to the people of the region and to the workforce of New Brunswick. Yet the Government turned around and awarded contract that outside the province. I attempted to elicit a response from the Minister as to why this was done. I approached him last July 29, almost a year ago, asking him for an explanation as to why this structural steel contract was awarded outside the province. Just recently I received in my office correspondence from the Deputy Minister which was dated January 23. It has taken them all of August, September, October, November, December and most of January to respond to my inquiry as to why that contract was awarded outside of my province when, according to the promises that were delivered by the Government, it was supposed to be designed for the employment of New Brunswick workmen.

The reason given to me was that it was influenced because of the need for delivering a high quality product within prescribed timeframes; that it is the normal practice to let general contractors choose their own subcontractors. In this case the general contractor engaged a subcontractor whom he felt was more advantageous to him. The entire purpose of the project was to provide something that would be advantageous to local labour. The Government chose to ignore it, the way it has continued to ignore the plight of the unemployed, and the unfortunately ridiculous situation that has been brought down on their heads by a very uncaring and insensitive Government.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as regards the allegations made by the Hon. Member concerning contracts that were awarded, strangely enough, I did not hear the Hon. Member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Corbett) talk about contracts given for the construction of six new frigates and notably about the two contracts given to the St. John's Dry Dock in New Brunswick. The Hon. Member did not say a word about that and I recall the Opposition critic for National Defence, the Hon. Member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon), congratulating the government for having given the frigate contract to the St. John's Dry Dock and saying this was the best thing that could happen. That is in New Brunswick, the St. John's Dry Dock, and the Hon. Member should know that.

Mr. Speaker, the most recent figures reveal that at the end of 1983, the level of economic activity in New Brunswick was back at 98 per cent of pre-recession level, that is during the first quarter of 1981. The economy has improved some 2.5 per cent in 1983. Moreover, it is anticipated that the economic situation in New Brunswick will continue to improve this year and indeed, the growth rate could even reach 4 per cent for the first time in five years. The Minister knows that you are worried about the level of activity in the construction industry. This industry will certainly experience a marked recovery in the spring when ongoing construction sites reopen and new projects are launched in a context of economic recovery.

Along with putting questions about the construction industry and economic forecasts, the Hon. Member has criticized as being ineffective the spending of job creation funds in New Brunswick. Let me ask the Hon. Member from New Brunswick how he can describe as ineffective job creation expenditures totalling $89 million for 1982-83. He might say that not enough money is being spent on job creation in New Brunswick, but I challenge him to prove that these $89 million allocated for job creation in New Brunswick have not been spent in an effective manner.

The Hon. Member also referred to Nova Scotia. In total, Mr. Speaker, over $83 million have been invested in direct job creation in that province. This is 5.2 per cent of all moneys spent for job creation throughout Canada, while Nova Scotia accounts for only 3.5 per cent of the unemployment in the country. These funds have been allocated in both provinces in order to help the unemployed people in all ridings.

As far as specific allocations are concerned, Mr. Speaker, I do not think the Hon. Member for Fundy-Royal has any complaint about the amount of $122,000 allocated for special job creation projects in his riding, or about $131 million being spent for special job incentive projects in New Brunswick, including $22.5 million in York-Sunbury and $10 million in Carleton-Charlotte, two Conservative ridings.

Mr. Speaker, the $2.5 billion spent over two years for job creation in 1983-85 and the $2.4 billion allocated for job incentives are an indication of the Government's major efforts to encourage employment in every Canadian province, including New Brunswick which is one of the provinces and which is getting its share.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at eleven o'clock.

At 6.30 p.m., the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1984-85

The House resumed from Thursday, March 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacLaren that Bill C-21, an Act to provide borrowing authority, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, the last time this matter was up for debate I went into the issue of whether it was really necessary for the Government of Canada to be borrowing $29.5 billion, an amount equal to what was not too long ago our entire budget. Included in that total are amounts for contingencies which, for Members of the Opposition, represent a flashing red light. When the Government of Canada asks for over $4 billion more than its budgeted requirements, according to the Supplementary Estimates (B) and (A), there is reason to be concerned about whether the contingency amounts requested are totally necessary.

We on this side, on behalf of our constituents, expressed concern at the lack of priorities of this present Government. To compound this concern, we have obvious divisions within the Liberal Government and Cabinet on what should be the policy concerning financial accountability to the Canadian people and Parliament. On one hand we have a Budget brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) which claims one thing. On the other hand we have members of Cabinet, who are now aspiring to become leader of their Party, expounding entirely different positions. That brings into question the credibility of this Government and Cabinet policies because there are obviously divisions within the Cabinet on just what direction this Government should take.

I would like to give a few examples of the contradictions between members of Cabinet and the policy as expounded in the Minister of Finance's Budget. One of the most crucial matters is that of economic development, and therefore we look to the Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development (Mr. Johnston). We find he is espousing certain things today which are not necessarily the position of the Government of the day as it proceeds with its request for $29.5 billion. I will give the House an example. On March 9 the Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development said:

I'm the last one to say that once you create a program it should stay there forever.

All programs can be improved. This question of universality—that's a buzzword which I don't even like to hear these days. The point is that social programs have to be married to the economic requirements of the country so that people use those programs to help themselves get back into the mainstream of economic activity.

He went on to say:

I think all Canadians understand that governments have to live within their means and that the only way of getting at the deficit is either more taxation or, on the other hand, cutting programs, or inflation, because that's another way governments traditionally have gotten rid of deficits in historic times.

If it is the intention of the Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development to cut the deficit, as quoted on March 9, why is the Government asking for $29.5 billion which would increase the deficit? Why is the Government requesting $4 billion more than it has fiscally spelled out in its 1984-85 requirements?

We can refer to other members of Cabinet to show that the Cabinet is obviously all over the place on what fiscal responsibility is. I maintain that no government can act any differently from any individual managing their household or any business person managing their business. When you spend more than you have on a continuing basis, sooner or later you are going to have to face reality. Money is going to cost more. When money costs more, inflation goes up and the value of the Canadian dollar goes down. As all caucus members in all political parties are aware, interest rates are now rising quite rapidly. Last week one-year Treasury bills moved from 10.44 per cent to 10.95 per cent interest, an increase of over 50 base points or one-half of 1 per cent.

The present net federal debt matures within about two and one-half years. It is essential following interest rate debt. The effect of last week's increase in interest rates alone increases the cost of carrying the $150 billion net debt of the country by $750 million. This little increase totally shatters all of the Budget figures of the Minister of Finance. This point should be well made by all members of the Opposition. The forecasts in the present Budget of the present Finance Minister are already out of date and we are still debating a borrowing law for $29.5 billion which is $4 billion more than the Government really needs.

To explain the differences of opinion within the Cabinet, I would like to quote a statement of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) made on November 7, 1982. At a Liberal Party biennial policy convention, "bleeding heart Munro" supported a motion that we eliminate universality. He said:

> The Government is wasting millions of dollars by sending monthly pension cheques to wealthy senior citizens and baby bonuses to families who do not need the money. Such funds should be redirected to help the most needy.

• (1115)

It is very damaging to the position espoused by the Liberal Party, that universality is here to stay, when statements like that are made within the Cabinet of the Liberal Government today by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. They require some clarification from the Government as to what the policy is. Now that the Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development are travelling throughout the country telling people that what the Government is doing today is not right, it behooves us in the Opposition to confirm their positions and ask the Government of Canada what it will do about it.

Back in the early 1970s the Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development produced a book which is dedicated, to use the words of the Minister:

> —to all Canadians who share my belief that Canada, with its beauty, its resources, its people, and its legal-political heritage, could be a country of unequalled opportunity and happiness, were it not for too much taxation, too strong a bureaucracy, too much government, too much welfare, too many politicians, and too few statesmen.

There are so many inconsistencies in statements by Ministers today that one wonders if a Finance Minister who brings down a Budget calling for a projected debt of the country of over $31 billion and a borrowing requirement of some $29.5 billion is really fiscally accountable to the Canadian people.

Another article for The Toronto Start last year written by the same Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development states:

> What we really require in Canada is solid fiscal reform on the revenue and expenditure sides to make our system more efficient and equitable. The taxing mechanism itself must be readjusted. At the same time we must address ourselves to the expenditure side, attacking inefficiencies and specific superfluous programs on a department-by-department basis. Wielding the big axe on programs across the board may have some political appeal but it's impractical and inefficient.

If I go into a few of the matters that need to be addressed by this Parliament, I think I would be repeating the Minister. We should occasionally look at some of our Crown corporations which were alluded to by the Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development as needing some cut-backs. We should look at Canada Post. The advertising costs in the post office are rising faster than the postal rates. Advertising costs are projected at $2 million in fiscal year 1983. According to Canada Post Corporation President Michael Warren, this will at least double to $4 million or $5 million in fiscal year 1984. The post office spent $500,000 to explain postal rate increases implemented in the spring of 1983.

Let us look at transport for a moment. Mirabel Airport has appropriately adopted a white elephant as its symbol. This unnecessary and unwanted airport has cost the taxpayers of Canada a total of $841 million to date, including construction costs of $514 million and total operating costs of $327 million. In the last fiscal year 1982-83, Mirabel lost $35 million compared to a $43 million profit as Lester B. Pearson International Airport. I think we should rename Mirabel Airport "Pierre Elliott Trudeau Airport".

Out of 336 ministerial JetStar flights in the first seven months of 1982, 44 per cent were to transport Cabinet Ministers to and from their ridings. The estimated cost of this, based on Transport Canada charges of $1,000 per hour, is $300,000. Air Canada sent 20 executives to California for a $600 a day medical examination.

Let me deal with Petro-Canada and take a moment to point out a couple of matters that have recently developed with that Crown corporation. Petro-Canada is considered to be the "Big Brother" watching over consumers in Canada and trying to protect them. It has now entered into signed reciprocal trading arrangements with the Seven Sisters. This is a case of Big Brother joining the Seven Sisters in an effort to protect Canadian consumers. What are these reciprocal refinery agreements, some of them long term, 15 years or more, doing to Canadian consumers today when they go to buy gas at the pumps? They are forcing up the price of gas at the whim and fancy of our protector, Petro-Canada. I think it is time for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Chrétien)—

• (1120)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Mazankowski: Continue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): A ten-minute question and answer period will now be provided. Are there any questions or comments? The Hon. Member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson), for debate.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to participate in the debate on Bill C-21, the borrowing authority Bill. This is not a routine piece of legislation but with the number of times we have debated the question of government borrowing over the years we tend to think it becomes routine. It is, though, one of the most important pieces of legislation before this House. The debate today is a debate on whether or not we are giving the Government authority to borrow moneys sufficient to finance the deficit, a deficit of 31.5 billion this year. It is a debate also on the implications of Government borrowing money of that magnitude.

I want to start by asking a very simple question of Hon. Members. Is there anybody in this House who wants to go through another recession like the one we went through in 1981-82, where employment in Canada dropped by over 5 per cent, where industrial production dropped by about 17.5 per cent, and where as a result thousands of businesses and many, many farms were lost? The answer is obviously no.

What we remember most about that period is the fact that interest rates were far higher than they should have been. Interest rates sky-rocketed during that period to between 22 per cent and 25 per cent. The reason was largely because of what went on in the United States and the very high interest rate policy followed there. Canada was going to have a deep recession regardless, but the effect of these high interest rates meant that the recession was far, far worse than it was in the United States. The unemployment rate in the United States went from 7 per cent to 10.5 per cent, whereas in Canada the unemployment rate went from 7 per cent to 13 per cent, almost double that of the U.S.

Why did this happen? What were the differences in Canada compared to the United States? We had the National Energy Program which totally undermined one of the most important industries in Canada. What about the way the Foreign Investment Review Agency was administered? There was the attitude toward investment, both domestic and foreign, and we had the 1981 Budget which raised taxes just at the point in time when the economy was falling into recession and we should have been reducing taxes. This caused a tremendous disruption in the economy. These were significant factors where deliberate economic policy in Canada added to the natural economic forces that were leading to a recession at that time. Our budgetary deficit was too high to give the Government the flexibility to offset the impact of higher interest rates in the United States or to follow a different economic course here in Canada. As a result, we were helpless as we watched the United States rates climb higher and higher. Canadian rates followed and in some cases were pushed even higher than those in the United States.

Today we are facing a similar scenario, Mr. Speaker. The Government still has not learned the lesson we suffered so dearly in 1981-82. It is likely that we will be facing a recession either later this year or early next year brought on by policies followed by the United States which we have no opportunity or flexibility to offset. All the ingredients are there. We have a slower recovery in Canada. Employment growth is far slower in Canada than in the United States. The unemployment rate in Canada has risen from 11.1 per cent to 11.3 per cent over the past two months. In the United States it has gone down from 8.0 per cent to 7.8 per cent. Business investment in Canada is flat. The latest figures for the Gross Domestic Product show that it has turned down.

By contrast, the United States economy is quite healthy. The unemployment rate, as I said, has gone down. Business investment, investment which creates tremendous numbers of jobs, in now projected to increase in 1984 by 12.8 per cent. That is the highest increase in real terms since 1966. The United States response is a classic one. It wants to temper this very healthy economy by leaning against it somewhat. The obvious response is to allow interest rates to move up ever so slightly to temper the boom and not let it get out of control.

What is the Canadian response to our slow recovery? What would we expect? Are we allowing interest rates to fall somewhat because of the slow economy? Will we try to encourage business investment or the purchase of automobiles or houses by lowering interest rates? No. Interest rates are going up. They have risen about one percentage point over the past few weeks. Why are we moving in lockstep with the United States economy? This Canadian response is irrational and inappropriate. It will surely lead to the recession which we do not need at this time.

The Government says that we have no option, that United States rates are going up and that we have to follow because of our very close relationship to the U.S. economy. Surely that forces us to ask ourselves one question: How can we unhook ourselves from the United States economy? How can we gain a greater degree of independence of action? How can we distance ourselves somewhat from United States interest rates today when it is inappropriate for us to follow the same interest rate policy as the United States? Or, simply put, how can we avoid falling into the same trap that we did in 1981-82?

It is obvious that we cannot be totally independent from the United States. With 70 per cent of our trade and the great amount of integration between the two economies, we cannot become totally independent. However, we can achieve some independence and flexibility in our policy response when our economy is moving in a different direction. Right now we do not have that independence or flexibility. We have been described by some people as the tail on the end of the dog. I would describe it as being the flea on the end of the tail of the dog.

How can we achieve that flexibility and independence? I want to draw the attention of Hon. Members to the experience of the United Kingdom. In 1981 it took a policy decision to reduce its public sector borrowing requirement relative to total government spending by a significant amount. The result is that today its borrowing requirement or its deficit is about 8.5 billion pounds. That is roughly 6 per cent of over-all spending compared with about 30 per cent in Canada. Also it is about 2.6 per cent of its national income compared with about 8 per cent in Canada. The United Kingdom has moved differently from the United States because its economy is a little weaker. Previously its interest rates were very much the same as those in the United States, but we have seen a very interesting phenomenon over there: its interest rates have become unhooked from the United States ones.

I should like to give some figures on this. U.K. Government rates are 10.71 per cent. The U.S. Treasury rates are 12.05 per cent. United Kingdom corporate rates are 11.6 per cent and in the United States the corporate rates are 12.75 per cent. The bottom line of all this, when we take the different inflation rates into account, is that real interest rates in the United Kingdom are 4.9 per cent as against 7.2 per cent in the United States, a difference which is appropriate for the different performance of the two economies.

The U.K.'s lower deficit has done two things for them. It has taken the pressure off interest rates. It has also given to the Chancellor of the Exchequer flexibility in his forthcoming budget to drop taxes or increase spending, depending on what he feels is appropriate at this time. He has that flexibility. He has that independence of action which we do not have at this time. The policy that they began in 1981 to reduce their deficit in a significant way has given them that flexibility to follow different policy approaches when that is appropriate.

There are other examples. I have just talked about the U.K. There is also the contrast between Germany and France, two countries living side by side with a fair amount of trade between them. It demonstrates that this is possible because of the better economic performance of the Germans relative to the French. They have been able to keep some distance between the two policy responses in those two countries.

That is the lesson of the Budget deficit that we have in Canada. The 31.5 billion deficit, plus the borrowing of the Crown corporations, is far higher proportionately than most other countries. Of the industrialized countries, only Italy is higher than us. Relative to the United States, we are about 50 per cent higher. That is why we must take action now on our deficit. We have to start taking those first steps today. With Bill C-21, this borrowing authority Bill, we are presented with that opportunity.

Let me summarize the economic costs of a higher deficit. First is the interest burden that all Canadians pay. The cost of the interest is $1,900 per taxpayer per year. Second, we have lost our flexibility within the Budget. One dollar out of three revenue dollars is spent on interest alone. One dollar out of five expenditure dollars is for interest alone. That is far too much. It reduces the dollars available for other programs. The third cost is that heavy government borrowing of the order of magnitude that the federal Government is borrowing today crowds out other productive investment, whether it is business investment or borrowings by individual Canadians to buy a car or a home. All of these are going to be squeezed back, particularly when you consider that over-all government borrowing today of $29.5 billion is about 92 per cent of the personal savings of individuals amounting to $32 billion.

The next point is that it forces foreign borrowing by the Government and by the Crown corporations directly through U.S. dollars, Swiss francs, German marks or whatever, or indirectly because of the amount of bonds that are purchased by individuals or institutions in other countries. Also, it forces provinces and corporations to move into foreign markets to borrow money when they cannot find that money in Canada. Canada today over-all is one of the largest international borrowers in the world, up in the big leagues with Mexico, Brazil and Argentina.

The next point is the high interest rate that are caused because of the concern of investors that these deficits are going to lead to higher interest rates and higher inflation. There has been a debate among economists that this is not so, but the fact is that in the real world investors have said that it is so and have acted accordingly. That is one of the reasons real interest rates are as high as they are in Canada and the United States, the two countries with the most significant deficit problems.

The final point is the loss of confidence by investors in Canada and abroad. That is very clearly demonstrated in the weakness of the dollar, not just in these past few weeks. It is coming to a head right now, but this has been going on since 1976 when the dollar was $1.03. It is now 78 cents. That is purely and simply a lack of confidence in the financial management and performance of this economy. Today we are seeing the inevitable result of excessive government borrowing and government mismanagement. It is all tied together in that one figure, the level of the Canadian dollar in the foreign markets today.

These costs translate directly into lost jobs. It is a clear reason why today employment in Canada is still 139,000 jobs lower than it was at its peak in the middle of 1981, or 1.3 per cent. In the United States the comparable figure is 2,796,000 jobs, or 2.8 per cent higher than it was in the pre-recession peak. Where the disparity becomes even more serious is in full-time jobs. In the United States they are 1.7 per cent above the pre-recession peak. We are 3.7 per cent below that pre-recession peak in terms of full-time jobs.

That contrast should be all that is necessary to tell the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) and Members of Parliament that the policies that this Government have been following are wrong, wrong, wrong. The place to change this policy direction must start with action on the deficit. The time to do it is now. It will give us more flexibility; not immediately, but it will start that process where we will be able to do the same as the U.K. has demonstrated in its performance in recent years.

Let us take advantage of the strong economic recovery in the United States. Let us move with them. If we can cut our deficit and be carried along by the momentum of the deficit in the United States, the pain here of reducing the deficit will be considerably less. Action today would give confidence to both Canadian and foreign investors to put money into this country, to give some upward lift to the Canadian dollar. That in itself would give the Bank of Canada some opportunity to relieve the pressure of interest rates and pressure on the Canadian dollar.

I stress that this will not happen overnight. It will take time. We have to start those steps today with a substantial reduction in the amount of borrowing requirements requested in this Bill. The reason why it will take time is that there is no confidence on the part of investors or individuals in the policy statements which this Government has made. Over the years we have heard various Ministers of Finance say: "We are going to hold government spending to the rate of growth of the national economy". Let us look at what has happened here. I want to give some examples. There have been four years in the past 14, one of which was a year of Conservative Government, when that actually took place.

Let us look at some of the times when it did not take place. In 1974 GNP went up by 19.4 per cent and government spending went up by 29 per cent. The next year there was an 18.7 per cent increase in the GNP and government spending went up far higher than that. In 1977-78 it was 13 per cent as against 19.6; in 1981, 20.4 per cent as against 14.3 per cent; and in 1982, 18 per cent as against 5.2 per cent. No one believes what the Government is saying. That is why we have to show the public by our actions, not by words which have a very hollow ring to them.

Let me summarize the message that I have been putting forward to Members here today. We have to start today to take action. This was demonstrated clearly in the Estimates that we saw the other day. Spending controlled by legislation, so-called statutory spending, is up by 8.1 per cent. Discretionary spending, spending that can be controlled from year to year, is up 13.2 per cent. Therefore, there is no demonstration yet of the discipline needed to get this deficit under control.

The message to Canadians is that we have to reduce government borrowing. If we do reduce government borrowing, we will free up savings of Canadians for use for productive purposes, such as business investment, the purchase of cars, houses and the creation of jobs. We will reduce interest rates. There will be less pressure from the Government of Canada on the markets which will allow interest rates to come down. Most important, we will be able to increase the independence of action and flexibility of the Government of Canada in following policies which are appropriate to the Canadian economy, rather than being forced into slavishly following the United States when their economy is performing differently than ours. That is why we have to cut borrowing. That is why we as Members of Parliament have to take a hard line and tell this Government that it must cut back its borrowing for the good of all Canadians, for the health of our economy and the health of our society.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in listening to the Hon. Member, as I am whenever he speaks, but I would suggest to him that a great deal of a mumbo-jumbo type of analysis went on. Does the Hon. Member honestly believe that the whole problem with the economy can be wrapped around the deficit? He said that we should be reducing the deficit. I think all of us would agree that we want to see the deficit reduced. The specific question that he must answer is how it will be reduced. The Hon. Member said that we could reduce the deficit in many ways. Let us have him put some specifics on the table. Precisely how does he suggest that the deficit be reduced right now?

Second, does the Hon. Member realize that our economy is significantly different from that of the U.S. and the U.K.? Our economy is a resource-based economy. Has he looked at past history? Does he realize that a resource-based economy is typically hit harder in times of recession and that when facing world competition for those resources, it will have a difficult time restoring employment?

The main areas of unemployment in the country are in the resource industries. Those industries are facing stiff international competition. What, perforce, would the Hon. Member suggest the Government do in order to make those resource-based industries more competitive with world competitors immediately? Those are a few of the questions I would like to put to the Hon. Member.

Mr. Wilson: Mr. Speaker, perforce the Hon. Member would listen to my speech the next time and perforce he might learn something. Let me try to recall for him what I said in my speech. The Hon. Member said that all are in agreement with the need to reduce the deficit. Has he discussed with the Ministers the reasons it is important for us to reduce the deficit? I ask that question because I think it is important that we in the House do not get distracted by where we are going to cut. What is the most important point? It is of absolute importance to reduce the deficit so that we can have a healthier economy and deal with some of these other problems.

I am not suggesting to the House that the only problem we have is with the deficit, but I am saying, and I think the Hon. Member would agree with this, that it is the most important problem. Finding a solution to that problem will help us deal with some of the other problems with which we are faced.

The Hon. Member asked me where I would cut. If the Hon. Member had been in the House last week, he would know that I addressed that question then. If he would like he can check back in Hansard to see what I said.

Let me address the Hon. Member's second question which dealt with the fact that our economy is significantly different from that in the United States because our economy is a resource-based economy. That is precisely the point that I am making. The fact that our economy is different should be taken as the primary reason why we should be in a position to have the flexibility and independence to do the things we need to do for our economy without having to follow what happens in the United States. If we have a deficit of $30 billion and we have spending of $100 billion, 30 per cent of that is deficit spending. When we are spending one dollar out of three revenue dollars on interest and interest alone, what flexibility do we have to deal with the problems in the resource industries?

The Hon. Member asked me what I would do about these problems. Let me tell him what I would not do about them. I do not know how the Hon. Member can say to the House that our industry is resource based and we must be concerned about the loss of competitive positions for the two main industries. What happened to the mining industry 10 years ago? We took a series of steps which increased taxation in the mining industry just at the point in time when the competitive position of the mining industry relative to the rest of the world was beginning to suffer. That is when the Government significantly increased the tax load on that basic industry of the country.

What about the National Energy Program which began in 1981? The Hon. Member knows and I know that the steps taken by the Government led to a weakening in the energy industry of huge proportions which resulted in a loss of economic activity in that industry from which we are still suffering today. Obviously what we must do is look at the resource industries not as a cash cow, not just as a source of revenue for government, but as basic industries in the economy which are essential to our over-all competitive position and important to our over-all economic performance.

[Translation]

Mr. Deniger: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my colleague opposite how he can possibly talk about reducing the deficit when his own Party wants to increase military defence, and that considerably, and increase transfer payments to the provinces, and is also proposing tax relief for business, and when he himself said, in his answer on October 23, 1981, on Question Period to Mr. McGillivray, that he was prepared to reduce tax rates for high income groups?

[English]

Mr. Wilson: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has raised the question of three or four different elements of spending. I think he realizes that he has picked three or four different areas from within the Budget. There are other areas in which cuts can be made in order to allow for an increase in spending in those very important areas to which he refers.

If the Hon. Member were to look at the amounts of money that are involved, he would see that those amounts of money are not large relative to the over-all spending of $105 billion. In my remarks I mentioned that discretionary spending, spending that is up to individual Ministers and the Government as a whole each year, is up by 13 per cent in the era of the six and five program. Statutory spending is up by about 8.8 per cent, I think. I am telling the Hon. Member that we should increase discretionary spending by 5 per cent. I think he would find that by holding the line on some of that discretionary spending, plenty of money exists which will result in an ability to pay for the increased spending which we have committed to transfers to the provinces for post-secondary education and health care as well as for military spending.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the former Minister could advise us what will happen with the increase in interest rates which took place in the last week. The Hon. Member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) will know that one-year Treasury bills moved from 10.44 per cent to 10.95 per cent in one day last week, an increase of 55 base points. What does that do to our net debt which now stands at $150 billion and is moving to $180 billion? How does that affect the total cost of carrying the debt?

Mr. Wilson: Mr. Speaker, using a quick calculation, I believe that that will come to something like three-quarters of a billion dollars being the over-all cost of the debt if that is carried through during the course of one year. This is one of the key elements which I think Members opposite should understand. If by taking a tougher line on government borrowing we can reduce the pressures of government borrowing and therefore reduce interest rates on government borrowing, that in itself can free up a tremendous amount of money to put toward other more productive uses, such as increasing military spending and increasing transfers for post-secondary education and health care.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Hon. Member would be specific. The Party has indicated it will increase defence expenditures, increase or at least hold the line on transfers to the provinces for medicare and post-secondary education and reduce taxes on businesses. The Hon. Member should realize, if he does not, that he is not going to reduce the interest burden on the Budget in a short period of time. Over time, yes, it could be reduced, but it cannot be reduced overnight. The Hon. Member is talking about reducing the deficit now. The question is that if expenditures are going to be increased in those areas and revenues are going to be cut in other areas, and from what the Hon. Member apparently just said—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member but the time for the question period has elapsed.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to follow my colleague the Hon. Member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) in debate. I feel he made a very thoughtful and constructive presentation—

Mr. Evans: Very constructive, but—

Mr. Mazankowski: —and very logical. I am happy the Parliamentary Secretary agrees. It was a very responsible presentation and it certainly is incumbent, I feel, upon Hon. Members on the other side to become more responsible in their presentation rather than giving us the kind of political rhetoric and flim-flammery that we hear coming from Hon. Members across the way.

Bill C-21, Mr. Speaker, represents the largest borrowing authority ever to come before Parliament. The last largest Bill was, I believe, for $19 billion. This Bill asks for $29.5 billion. It is the eighth time this Parliament has been presented with a massive borrowing Bill. I believe the total borrowing works out to something like $103 billion.

My colleague, the Hon. Member who just spoke, talked about the tremendous burden this magnitude of borrowing imposes upon the Canadian economy and upon individual taxpayers. He indicated that the interest alone costs every taxpayer some $1,900 per year. Interesting as well is that the interest on the debt in the 1984-85 fiscal year will equal 4.7 per cent of Canada's Gross National Product, and this compares to a figure of 2 per cent when the current Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) first took office. That is a more than a doubling, Sir, and I believe that gives you some idea of what we are really faced with.

Another way of putting this, Mr. Speaker, is that in the fiscal year 1968-69, it required one out of every nine tax dollars to service the debt. Today, as a consequence of the successive deficits and the current irresponsibility of this Government, it takes one out of every three tax dollars to service the deficit. Two disturbing thoughts emerge from this, Mr. Speaker. First of all, I am sure the public, particularly those people who are thoughtful and are concerned about the economic future of this country, have the impression that spending is clearly out of control and that the Government is not treating their tax dollars with any degree of respect. It has gotten so bad that the Government cannot even predict accurately. The budgetary deficit for this fiscal year, according to the former Minister of Finance, was supposed to be something in the order of $11 billion. It is instead $31.5 billion. So there was a mistake in calculation of $20 billion. That really goes not augur well for generating any confidence in the minds of the average Canadian.

This Government is so impaired, so drunk with spending, that it should lose its licence for life. I feel in the minds of people there is a sense of unfairness, a feeling that somehow the Government is not only spending unwisely, but it is being very unfair in the way in which taxpayers' dollars are being distributed throughout the country. There is a sense that there is discrimination and inequity in the distribution of the people's money. We know of the tremendous amount of money which is used for political purposes, the porkbarrelling, so to speak.

What emerges in the minds of the Canadian public is that there are really two classes of unemployed people in this country. There is regional discrimination, and the result of that, Sir, is regional disharmony and division. In some cases it creates a genuine feeling of disgust. One only has to look at articles which have been written, some recent and some not so recent. I will quote from an article by Brian Fox of Southam News in the July 30 edition of The Citizen. It outlines in detail the Special Recovery Projects. The headline reads "Liberal ridings win at handout time". The article begins:

> The federal government has been using its pump-priming $2.4 billion capital works program to pour millions of dollars into Liberal ridings and the backyards of influential cabinet ministers.

It continues:

> Politics undoubtedly has been a major factor in determining where these valuable federal funds would be spent.
> For example, in Nova Scotia $25.4 million has been budgeted to improve 31 small harbors. Of those, 19 are in Cape Breton Highlands-Canso, held by Allan MacEachen, now minister of external affairs and deputy prime minister.
> Interestingly, MacEachen is one of nine Liberal ministers on the sub-committee which approves the siting of the projects.
> Of the remaining 12 harbors, 10 are in other Liberal ridings and the remaining two are in Progressive Conservative territory.
> To date, those two harbor improvements are the only projects that directly benefit PC ridings.

The article concludes:

> In true Liberal fashion, these goodies are timed for the middle of the byelection campaign—

That sums of the kind of feeling of unfairness and inequity which pervades the country. This is the feeling of people who are strapped and finding life very difficult when they see this kind of money thrown around simply for political gain. And it will probably continue. It will probably get worse. An article in Edmonton's The Journal talks about the secret film which unveils Liberal strategy, and I quote from the article:

> The 30-minute film implies throughout that the Liberals will use taxpayers' money to woo key electoral groups—women, youth, the urban middle income groups and ethnic voters.

In addition to Canadians being discriminated against, I believe they feel a sense of "being had", being conned by this Government with their own money through advertising, through straight porkbarrelling and through the kind of seductive practices which will be contained in this 30-minute film. The total picture is that respect for the institution of Parliament, respect for government and respect for the departments of government is being eroded very dramatically. If we couple that with what is going on in the Department of National Revenue and the high-handed, Gestapo-type tactics which are being employed by that Department to extract every last bit of blood out of the taxpayer, there is a real feeling of disgust and anger out there.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, it means that there is something dramatically wrong and something must change. If we are going to have a voluntary income tax system, there is going to have to be some improvement in the integrity of that system. There must be some improvement in terms of accountability so that this institution, Parliament, will have some control over the expenditure of taxpayers' dollars.

The Government fails to recognize that what it is spending here is not money that falls from the sky, it is the people's money. The lack of respect, indeed the disrespect, this Government has had over the years for the people's money is really at the root of the problem.

On successive borrowing authority Bills our Party has tried to zero in on the need to reduce waste. We have identified many areas where in our opinion there is waste and extravagance. We have tried to identify areas where excessive government expenditure could be reduced. We have tried to identify programs which we believe have outlived their usefulness and should be reassessed. We have supported the Auditor General in his desire to ensure money is spent on the basis of adequate value received—comprehensive analysis. What we find disturbing, Mr. Speaker, is that when these areas are identified this Government uses distortion, fear and hysteria. When you question any expenditure the Government immediately says: "Oh, the Tories are going to cut this and that". That is very irresponsible, Mr. Speaker. How can you, in a rational way, attack this problem which has built up over the years? Why can we not have a rational debate on this issue?

We have recommended that a sort of no holds barred committee be formed to get right into the nitty-gritty of the Government's expenditure program. But the Government pooh-poohs the idea. That is only one suggestion for getting to the bottom of some of these things, and I am sure there are others. But we know the Government will not go that route because it would restrict its ability to porkbarrel, to cajole the voter into supporting the Government. It would restrict the Government's ability to con people with their own money, to buy votes.

The Special Employment Initiatives Program is a clear example of discrimination in the most crass manner that one could ever envision. We have waste and unproductive investments, and all of it adds up to a massive burden on the producers of this country.

We are hearing a lot about the new Liberalism, the new era of Liberalism of the 1980s. If the slick media campaign being unveiled is any indication where the new Liberalism is going to take us, then we can only expect that we are going to have the same kind of thing. The former Minister of Multiculturalism, in his expressions about ballyhoo and manipulative tactics, gave an accurate description of this Government today. I sense it will be an accurate description of the Government under a new leader, irrespective of who that leader might be.

I would like to give you a couple of examples, Mr. Speaker, to illustrate clearly the motivation of the Government in its abuse of the taxpayers' dollar. First of all, there was an announcement by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Axworthy) some time ago concerning the expenditure of some $306 million for the establishment of four new maintenance centres for VIA Rail. There was one in each of Winnipeg, Halifax, Montreal and Toronto. I want to talk about the Montreal facility because I think that is a real can of worms in this project.

At present VIA Rail rents a facility under a three-year lease with a one-year renewal option over a six-year period. It is paying roughly $3 a square foot, with 600,000 square feet of available space although it is using only 70,000 square feet. The facility is pretty good. It was built by Hawker Siddeley. However, rather than maintaining that facility or purchasing it, which it could do for something in the order of $11 million, and renovating it for probably $14 million to $15 million, for a total cost of $25 million, what do we see here? The Minister of Transport announces a commitment to build a facility worth $147 million. Add in the equipment and interior improvements and we are really talking about a figure in the order of close to $200 million. But they have a facility there now which the Government could have for roughly $25 million. That is the kind of abuse and irresponsibility we are talking about.

My colleague from Peterborough talked about Mirabel, and I could talk about the aborted airport at Pickering. We know that when the Mirabel airport revolving fund was renegotiated the airport was losing something in the order of $52 million per year. With the write-down and rearrangement of the airport revolving fund the losses were cut, simply through a book transaction, to some $20 million or $25 million. On August 24, 1982 the Windsor Star said: "The elephant is still white but now there is hope. After seven years of failure new federal plans may be able to revive Mirabel". It is not being revived, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pepin: It is.

Mr. Mazankowski: The former Minister of Transport says it is. Well, if registering deeper losses is a revival, then it is well on its way. In 1982-83, Mirabel lost $29.174 million. In 1983-84 Mirabel lost $43.912 million. In 1984-85, according to this year's Estimates, it will record a loss of $48.168 million. There have been losses of close to $500 million since this thing opened, which symbolizes the reckless political expenditures made time and time again by this Government.

Mr. Huntington: What's $500 million?

Mr. Mazankowski: What is $500 million? What's a billion? That is really the attitude. It does not matter because it is not the Government's money, it is the people's money. This Government, any government, is charged with the responsibility of preserving and ensuring those dollars are spent wisely and in a productive fashion. The taxpayer should not be abused.

When you look at this piling up of deficit upon deficit, Mr. Speaker, we could liken it to a family living beyond its means. Year after year after year they take out a new mortgage on their home to buy groceries and pay for their vacation and gasoline for the car. I am very interested in the remarks of the Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development (Mr. Johnston), who is running for the leadership. On March 9 he said that he thought all Canadians understand that Governments have to live within their means and the only way of getting at the deficit is either through more taxation or, on the other hand, cutting programs. Or through inflation, because that is another way governments traditionally have gotten rid of deficits in historic times.

Well, Mr. Speaker, we have a situation where the Government is really mortgaging the homes of Canadians, Canadians today and Canadians in the future. This has had a major impact on the nation's confidence, and a major impact on our ability to engage in productive investment which would increase the size of our Gross National Product. This is at the root of the problem of medicare and social programs which are under attack. It goes back to the issue of poor economic management. Mismanagement is really the buzz word for the Government's performance.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member will appreciate that the amount of borrowing required depends to a large extent on the growth projections in taxation and so on in the country. In his Budget the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) forecast a growth of 4.9 per cent or 5 per cents, depending on how you read it. In the House yesterday the Minister said that the average projection for growth by economic agencies was 4.6 per cent. I know the Member studies economics and economic forecasts. Has he ever seen any growth projections by a private forecaster issued in January, February or March of this year that indicated any growth projection of 4.6 per cent, let alone an average of 4.6 per cent? Is the fact of the matter that the only growth projections everproduced this year have been in the order of 3.3 per cent, similar to the projection produced by the Conference Board?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I and my colleagues on this side of the House would prefer to follow the projections of the Conference Board of Canada because it has consistently been more accurate than the Government. The Minister of Finance should have some credibility. We should be able to believe him. The Government does have the resources and facilities with which to make accurate projections. However, the Minister said that in 1983-84 we would have a budgetary deficit of $11.8 billion. It turned out to be 31.5 billion. I submit that does not provide much credibility to any figures which flow from the mouth of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I know that the Hon. Member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) comes from a constituency which has many farmers and ranchers. That group of people are heavily dependent on capital, and often borrowed capital. If the Government gets another $29 billion of borrowing authority, does the Member have any concerns or fears that that might have an impact on inflation and interest rates? Of what detriment might that be to the people in his constituency?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, it will be a very major detriment. In The Globe and Mail this morning it was reported that agriculture is in depression. The number of bankruptcies is 58 per cent higher this year than last year. Last year there were 488 farm bankruptcies registered. That is about 400 per cent more than in 1979. That four-year period is significant because that is when the Government was returned to power. Naturally the increased borrowing will cause pressure upon the capital markets and will drive up interest rates. It will have an impact upon inflation as well.

Our Party advanced a 10-point agricultural program a year ago. We have renewed those principles time and again. One of them is the provision of at least $100 million to allow farmers who are locked into these high interest rates to bail themselves out. We also support the establishment of farm finance review boards which would assist farmers as an arbitrator functioning through the auspices of the Farm Credit Corporation offices, in negotiating with banks. We have also advanced other initiatives such as the reduction of the 9 per cent sales tax on farm fuels and fuels used by fishermen. In other words, we believe it is counter-productive for the federal Government to impose a heavy tax burden on the producers of food.

I could elaborate further. The fact is that there was nothing in the last Budget to assist and motivate optimism and hope in the agricultural community. The Government is looking after retired farmers but is certainly not looking after the young farmers and the farmers who find themselves in severe difficulty at the present time.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Hon. Member for Vegreville. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) took office in 1968 about $12 billion was required to look after the affairs of the nation. At that time we numbered something like 20 million people. This year we have seen a Budget tabled which calls for more than $98 billion, and with the supplementaries it may well run to about $103 billion, to look after a nation which now numbers about 25 million people. Does the Hon. Member feel these excesses were necessary? Why does he believe it takes more than eight times the amount to look after five million extra Canadians?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is correct. When I came to the House in 1968 the Budget was $11 billion or $12 billion. Today it is $100 billion. Is that money needed? I guess there is room for some increases. I believe it really illustrates the growing intervention of government into the lives and economic activities of Canadians.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mazankowski: We see potential leaders running across the country espousing a new Conservatism and a new Liberalism. That is really what they are talking about. They want to distance themselves from the socialistic policies which have hampered the productive and entrepreneurial spirit of the country. We have really had 15 years of socialism rather than 15 years of a government dedicated to private enterprise.

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the shouts from the Official Opposition are most meaningful! I hear my colleague from Mission-Port Moody (Mr. St. Germain) who is also in the House and speaks very well, both in French and English. He just nodded to me, and I must say I am very pleased to see him in the House this morning. Well, Mr. Speaker, about the situation concerning Bill C-21, an Act to provide borrowing authority, we are hearing a lot of comments from the Opposition to the effect that the Government's deficit is a disgrace, that it must be brought down and that spending must be rationalized. However, we do not hear many comments telling us what programs should be cut. Of course, one of the Opposition Members has said that perhaps it would be a good thing to reduce or cut universality of health care, and it was the former Minister of Finance of the Progressive Conservative Government, that short-lived Conservative Government of 1979, who had dared to say so, and his comments were printed in the press. He was reprimanded by his Leader who said these services must not be touched. So it is all very well to make comments and get excited here in the House and say that the Budget deficit is a very serious thing and that we must do something about the fact that Canadians, according to the Opposition, are in difficulty. Mr. Speaker, there are many Government programs that are administered either by the federal Government or jointly by both levels of government. Obviously, there are many programs that require funding, and consequently, the Canadian Government, on the basis of its economic or social policies, must respond to the needs of Canadians. Whether we are talking about the spouse's allowance, the guaranteed income supplement or a pension system, the Government must act in response to the needs of Canadians. That is why in his Budget Speech, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) approached this subject that is very important to Canadians who are eligible for these benefits. He said in his speech, on page 14 of the Budget papers, that about 750,000 single senior citizens, three-quarters of whom are women, will benefit from the increase in the guaranteed income supplement. The Minister goes on to say that the additional Government support will amount to $460 million in a full year. The important thing is that Canadians approve of these social measures. And as far as the health care system is concerned, the polls show that Canadians generally favour the present system, and consequently the Canadian Government must continue in that direction.

About the deficit—because we have to finance these programs if Canadians are to benefit—we must ask ourselves: Where does the deficit come from? It seems that a large part of the increase in the deficit is due to increased public debt charges. Only a relatively small portion of the expected increase in the deficit will be due to official measures taken by the Government. However, the Government is prepared to accept an increase in the deficit in order to provide strong support for the economy. When the April 1983 Budget was brought down, at some point, perhaps a few weeks before, economists were asking the Government to increase the deficit if it had to, provided it released funds for job creation and for stimulating economic activity. They said that stimulating the economy would automatically reduce the deficit. Therefore, after reading the usual articles on the economy in general, we can say that our deficit is a cyclical, not a structural deficit. This means that if the number of jobs continues to increase, Opposition Members will say there was an increase in the unemployment rate over the last month. We must not forget that although 54,000 new jobs were created, there were also 75,000 Canadians entering the labour market for the first time.

What we have to do is adopt incentive measures that will automatically reduce the deficit and create jobs. Once jobs are created, economic activity will reduce the number of people drawing unemployment insurance benefits and thus reduce public spending. Similarly, the amount of corporate tax and sales tax collected will increase as well. Furthermore, once the planned increase in the tax rate, partly required to finance the incentive measures announced in the April Budget, becomes effective, that too will help bring down the deficit.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I would like to discuss our job creation programs. When we talk about job creation, we are talking about the employment situation of young people, men and women and in fact the population in general, but when we look at the statistics, we try to focus on the situation of our young people. For instance, right now we are preparing for the Summer Canada Program. For the fiscal year 1984-85, the Canadian Government wants to give Summer Canada a budget of $70 million, so that 27,000 Canadians will be able to take part in this program and we will be able to help these people during the summer. There is also the Canada Works Program and Section 38, which will help people go back to work. The Career Acess Program is also very important and also requires considerable funding. If we look at the budgets for 1983-84 for job creation, and I am referring to Canada Works, a grand total of $812.8 million has been earmarked for it. Benefit costs will amount to $66.5 million and the actual program will have a budget of $614.3 million. There will also be an unemployment insurance budget of $123 million. As far as participation in terms of person-years is concerned, there will be a total of 250,000 jobs which equals 58.4 person-years of work. The important thing is that we have all these job creation programs, including Canada Works, LEAD, Career Access. If we take the case of Career Access, this program will help people who have been unemployed for some time and who, in some cases, may have exhausted their unemployment insurance benefits and are looking for a job. For 1983-84, the Career Access Program will have a grand total of $115,000 million.

Mr. Speaker, all these programs have to be financed. If we want to reduce our deficit, we must provide a stimulus for workers and employers to create jobs. In the Budget Speech of February 1984 and its predecessor of April 1983, the Minister said that the private sector, with the incentives provided by the Canadian Government, is a creator of jobs. We have a number of temporary programs. For instance, in 1982-83, we introduced the NEED Program. There were other programs that existed at the time, including the CCDP, Canada Community Development Projects. We injected money into the system to put Canadians to work and reduce the amount of unemployment insurance benefits being paid. We wanted to keep these people in the labour force and keep the economy going.

If we look at the NEED Program—and I am thinking more specifically of my own riding—last year, Mr. Speaker, under this program which was announced when we returned to the House around October 20, if I remember correctly, when the Minister of Finance brought down his Budget on October 27, 1982, the sum of $170 million had been earmarked for the Province of Quebec. At that time, there was an agreement with the Government of Quebec, which was concluded in December 1982. The agreement was broken, however, and now both levels of Government are pursuing their own objectives, and in the riding of Lotbinière we were able to get $1.5 million—in other words, people presented projects and job creation was the result.

The important thing was that these programs such as NEED and Canada Works were made available to the private sector in order to stimulate employment. When an employer in the private sector hires a person who is in a job creation program, he may, if he is satisfied, decide to employ that person on a permanent basis, thus possibly taking someone off the welfare rolls or off unemployment insurance. As I said earlier, economic activity stimulated by the Government has an impact on employment. When, with the incentives made available to them by the Government, employers are employing people who had left the labour market, these programmes, for instance in the riding of Lotbinière, are beneficial.

Through the Canada Community Development Projects for 1982-83, the riding of Lotbinière received over one million dollars. That year, as I said earlier, we were able to get $1.5 million under the NEED Program. For Summer Canada, we got nearly $200,000. The Canada Works budget for the riding of Lotbinière is one million dollars, and this year, Summer Canada will have a budget of $147,000.

Mr. Speaker, these are job creation programs, programs that provide incentives for employment. If we consider the entirely temporary aspect of summer job creation programs, the effect will, of course, be felt only over a short period, because students are concerned here.

But, Mr. Speaker, we do have to work if we are going to finance all those programs. It is important to set those funds aside as an incentive to encourage employers to hire those people. The Career Access Program, to which I referred earlier, is a commendable undertaking, and the Canada Manpower Centres in every riding are open to employers and people who want to submit their applications. All those job creation programs are designed to help the private sector hire young people and others who have been seeking employment unsuccessfully for weeks. Other programs are specifically open to women or the handicapped. I heard somebody on the other side say that we have been experiencing problems and running a huge deficit over the past 15 years as a result of the Government's massive intervention in the private sector. When it comes to providing incentives, this Government is just as concerned as the private sector. I do not think we have any lesson to learn from Members opposite, particularly not from the Official Opposition. There is no doubt that we have to co-operate with them, as we have been doing for many years, Mr. Speaker, and we have been working even closer together since the Budgets of April and February were brought down. Never before have we had as much consultation as has been the case since the current Minister of Finance came on the scene. There was some, but not that much with the private sector. What were the priorities of the private sector in terms of job creation and lower deficits? As I was saying at the outset of my remarks, some economists pointed out in April 1983 that perhaps the Government should not be overly concerned about the deficit, that it should offer incentives, stress the importance of job creation and realize that it was more urgent to turn the economy around without constantly worrying about the deficit and thus steer the country right out of the doldrums and the recession we were experiencing. That is exactly what happened. There are other economic sectors where program financing is needed, and that is why we have to seek borrowing authority regularly at the end of each fiscal year. Invariably, we hear the same arguments from Opposition Members who take us to task for financial mismanagement and urge us to slash expenditures here, there and everywhere.

Mr. Speaker, we simply cannot ignore the fact that these are hard times and that we must face up to the heavy financial commitments which those various programs entail. Should we tighten the purse strings of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, even though that Department does make financial contributions to job creation programs? Should we reduce the funds earmarked for social programs or for the Guaranteed Income Supplement? Should we set less money aside for health insurance or post-secondary education which is financed by the Government to the tune of about 60 per cent? All those benefits are built into the system, people ask for them and want them maintained. I suggest that we must act responsibly and fill those needs, while at the same time providing financial incentives to create jobs and respond to the plight of the unemployed. And then, Mr. Speaker, the Government took the initiative of its 6 and 5 program. We said to the public sector: Listen, we have to face reality, we are going through an economic recession and the Government must be among those that set an example in terms of salary increases, we simply cannot afford to go beyond certain limits. After that, of course, we urged the private sector to adopt a similar approach. In my opinion, that policy had an extraordinary impact throughout the country. Some of the unions were perhaps reluctant at first, but then they wondered whether it would not be better to warn their members that the economic situation was bleak, that interest rates were quite high, and that they might be well advised to protect their jobs while waiting for an economic upturn and better prospects for income stabilization.

I believe that this fact was very readily accepted by the business community and the unions and in proof of this we have seen companies negotiate with their employees wage increases which allowed them to meet their obligations. This has been a period of co-operation and of increased awareness about existing conditions, and I believe that labour has now come a long way and seen the need to show some self-control and to be realistic considering existing economic conditions. I believe that labour has understood this very well. And when the Government decided to set an example in this area with respect to the implementation of its 6 and 5 policy, it was able to use some of the money thus saved to provide certain benefits for the vital sectors of our economy such as the building industry by offering purchasers of new or existing housing subsidies of up to $3,000 which were used to help create employment. People often say that when the building industry is in good health, so is the rest of the economy. I think that it was important to have such programs, Mr. Speaker. However, the incentives and assistance programs which we now have must be funded. As I was saying earlier, if we maintain these incentives and continue to create jobs, then the deficit will go down. I therefore believe that the House should support this Bill and approve the borrowing authority requested by the Government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Are there any questions or comments?

• (1230)

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I have been listening to the Hon. Member's speech. I noted with some interest that he said one of the main reasons for the borrowing of money was the creation of work. He listed a number of programs, Canada Works, New Horizons, community development programs and so forth.

Bearing in mind that what we are doing now is talking about $29 billion, or a $102 billion deficit, does the Hon. Member not recognize that every time we borrow money of that kind we rob the borrowing market, which results in very stiff competition for the private sector? This causes pressure to increase both inflation and interest rates. In turn a negative impact on capital construction occurs in the private sector throughout the country and in fact it robs the country of jobs. While on the one hand the Hon. Member is trying to claim that you borrow money to create jobs, basically borrowing money destroys permanent job creation in the factories in favour of whitewashing local cemeteries. In other words, a job is created once and then destroyed thereafter.

Mr. Dubois: Mr. Speaker, I cannot agree with what the Hon. Member has said about the situation. The economists were saying after the April 1983 budget and also after last February's budget that the Government had to provide some incentives in spite of the deficit. This is what has been done since April 1983, and, whatever the Hon. Member might say, the rate of inflation has gone down considerably from between 10 and 11 per cent to about 6 per cent. It has fluctuated from one month to the next. While the Government made use of the borrowing authority which was approved last year, the inflation rate has gone down, incentives have been provided to create jobs and labour demands for wage increases have been reasonable. This is because, whatever the Hon. Member may say, there has prevailed a climate of confidence and it has been possible to lay some emphasis on job creation in the private sector with the assistance of the Government and because of all this the inflation rate has gone down and the economic activity has increased. When they saw that the economy was on the road to recovery, instead of keeping their money in the bank, Canadians began to reinvest in the economy in order to accelerate this recovery. As a consequence thereof, while many economists say that the deficit should be reduced, existing programs, in the areas of job creation, financial assistance and social legislation, for instance, must continue to be funded. If we had no unemployment insurance plan no social security programs, where would we be now, Mr. Speaker? Indeed, we have lived through the recent recession. Contrary to the Hon. Member's opinion, I believe that incentives, reasonable wage increases and job creation programs, have shown the general public that the Government wanted to co-operate with the private sector and that this did not stop the economy from recovering as everything proves it has been doing since last year.

I therefore believe that we must continue to honour our financial commitments and to do what we have been doing since October 1982, April 1983 and even June 1982 by way of the 6 and 5 program. This is why the budget brought down in February stated that the restrictions would be lifted but that wage increases would have to be reasonable. As concerns the confidence of Canadians and the fact that they were afraid that interest rates would increase, this is why, especially to help the building industry, the mortgage guarantee program was proposed. I believe that with programs and incentives such as those we shall be able to keep inflation at a reasonable level and continue to encourage people to invest in the Canadian economy and in their own businesses, because economic recovery is a worldwide phenomenon, and in this way, the Canadian people will continue to have their place in the sun.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Hon. Member for Lotbinière (Mr. Dubois) a question. Later on, when this debate is finished, we will be voting to increase the public debt. By the time we accumulate all the votes we have passed over the years, the full public debt will be something like $140 billion to $150 billion.

Mr. Blenkarn: It will be $180 billion.

Mr. Friesen: My colleague tells me that it will be $180 billion. I suppose it would be all right for us to do that if in so doing we could in some way promise that we would pay it all off during our lifetime. The fact is, however, that we will not pay it off ourselves, we who are voting for it. Perhaps the greatest injustice we are doing is that we will pass on this debt on which we are voting to our children, our grandchildren and our great grandchildren. They will inherit our vote, what we are voting today. The children who will be born next year and in the next generation will immediately, with the first breath they take, be in debt $5,000 to $6,000.

Mr. Malone: By one government.

Mr. Friesen: Most of it done by one government. In all fairness, does he think that is right?

[Translation]

Mr. Dubois: Mr. Speaker, the best example of this is, having in mind the economy, if we refer to a small business or a farm ... Let us take the example of a farm. The Hon. Member wants to speak about farms! I could go on for quite a while on the subject. We know what the situation is in Alberta and we know what the situation was under the Crow rate. The Hon. Member was certainly against its being changed! In fact, the purpose of this change was to increase the railroad capacity and to promote job creation. Let the Hon. Member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone) raise the farm problem if he wants to!

Let us have an example, Mr. Speaker. We have a father operating a farm and increasing year after year its production capacity and improving its equipment, and everything that goes with farming operations. Unless he was born wealthy and has all the money he needs, he must borrow on the financial markets to be able to do all that. So he borrows to increase his production capacity and to purchase farm equipment. This increases the value of his farm. When he sells it to his son later in life, he must take these value increases into account, which means that the son who buys the farm must pay somewhat more. To reply more specifically to the question, I can say that all our general services and programs, at the post-secondary level, for instance, will produce assets, and while our children will inherit some indebtedness, if the economic situation continues to improve as it is now doing, the public debt will decrease accordingly. I am sure that, with all the facilities we have, with all our export and import programs, with the markets which we are developing through our industrial, business and job creation programs, our children will be able to face the future. We shall put at their disposal the ways and means of coping with American and European competition and of producing on our own markets, so that while we may have some debts, we shall also have the assets and the wealth to meet these debts. I have therefore no worries as far as the future generations are concerned, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): This concludes the question period. Debate will now resume.

[English]

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate on Bill C-21, an Act to provide borrowing authority. In the Budget of February 15, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) proposed expenditures of some $98 billion. The Minister projected borrowing requirements of $25.5 billion and a few days later the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Gray) comes forward and asks for a borrowing authority of $29.5 billion, an additional $4 billion in less than three weeks. Like many Hon. Members on this side, I never cease to be amazed by the cynicism of the Liberal Government.

Why does the Minister ask for a borrowing authority for $29.5 billion rather than the $25.5 billion projected in the Budget? I think that begs some questions. Is the Budget some mere device rather than the primary economic document of the nation? Did the Minister suddenly discover that the Government needs an extra $4 billion? How will this $4 billion be used? Will it be used as petty cash for the Government? Is the Minister angling for a status like C. D. Howe had when he stated; "What's a mere billion"? The President of the Treasury Board wants $4 billion. Is he trying to attain a higher status?

As Members of Parliament we have the final responsibility for the administration of public funds. The amount is mind-boggling, almost $100 billion. My constituents understand the revenue side very well. They understand the tax structure and that Revenue Canada is very efficient in gathering tax moneys. A small business in my riding has found itself in difficulty because of a receivership. They are subcontractors who had amounts owing to them of somewhere in the neighbourhood of $80,000. They are unable to receive their moneys, but Revenue Canada is on top of them requesting their tax money. If they pursue this, this small cabinet business will have to close. That is the kind of tactic being used. This is what is happening to the small businessman.

What about the corporate structure, the large multinationals which are able to write off large amounts of tax? Canadians do not understand why the Government is asking for this $4 billion. Perhaps this money will be used to subsidize the transportation of western coal to eastern Canadian markets. Why not look at something like this? We have repeatedly asked this question in the House. Over 4,000 lakes in Ontario are dying because of the sulphuric acid in the air.

We import 16 million tons of dirty coal from the United States. This costs almost $1 billion a year. That dirty coal has a sulphur content 800 per cent higher than western Canadian coal. What is wrong with a program whereby the supplying province, the consuming province and the federal Government work together to create jobs in western Canadian coal fields, supplying central Canadian markets and stopping $1 billion from leaving this country each year as well as putting thousands of Canadians back to work?

Those are the kinds of programs we should be looking at. What does this Government do? It joins with the province in a project in northeast British Columbia which is costing billions of dollars. There is now a subsidy for the project. A study which has been conducted indicates that if that coal is shipped at less than $100 a ton, it will have to be subsidized. It is currently being sold at $84 a ton. Hundreds of miners are being laid off in southeastern British Columbia for short periods of time. We are vying for the same market, using taxpayers' dollars for a program that puts Canadians out of work in southeastern British Columbia. Does that make economic sense?

The Government asks for an additional $4 billion. It certainly will not get my consent for that kind of program. If the Government looks at something sensible that will create not only a clean environment but keep $1 billion a year from leaving the country and creates employment here, it will have my support.

My constituents are concerned about this $4 billion. Will it be used as another slush fund to elect Liberals? My constituents have difficulty with the gigantic tax expenditures mandated by this Government. Knock out a few of those tax expenditures and the Government would not need this extra $4 billion. Why not drop the measure in the Budget that allows lawyers and doctors to pay less than their fair share of taxes as a result of RRSPs? Why not cap the amount Canadians can lock away tax-free in RRSPs? Why not start taxing corporations and banks at a level equal to what ordinary Canadians pay?

In the booklet Budget in brief there is reference to energy and resource taxes. It states that the incremental oil revenue tax will be deferred for an additional year, to June 1, 1985. This alone will save the oil companies $190 million. Our small business people and farmers are being pushed to the limit, going into bankruptcy right across this country, at the same time as we are giving the rich oil companies even bigger breaks. Through the Petroleum Incentives Program the Government will come up with as much as 93 cents on the dollar for exploration programs. Where, oh where, is it going to end? There is no commitment that Canadian products will be used or that Canadians will be hired, thereby alleviating our unemployment situation.

I also want to comment on the mortgage insurance program. What a scam this Government is putting forward! This mortgage insurance program will ensure that the banks get their interest rates. That is exactly what it will do. When you walk into the bank, the manager will say to you: "You are running pretty tight here; I do not think we would consider making this loan unless you have an insurance policy to ensure you can carry it through". Is that the kind of program we want? When the mortgage is due in three years, the interest rate may have gone up another 6 per cent or 7 per cent. This person would have to start again at that rate.

This program will only benefit the banks. If the mortgagor wants to sell his home, he will not be able to sell his insurance program, so up will go the interest rate. Who will buy at those kinds of interest rates? The Government knows that interest rates are going up yet it brings in this scam to cover up, telling the people not to worry, that they will be able to take out an insurance policy. What a joke!

I want to comment on the employment programs of this Government. It has a role to play and it must start playing it seriously, particularly in the area of technological change. In Japan it was found that there is a need to develop an early warning system in the form of flow of information about the planned introduction of new technologies. They have a program which studies the workplace to the year 1990. They have communications with their employees about their plans and programs, what they are doing in the workplace. They know the number of people who will be retiring and the replacements that will be needed. They are starting to train the replacements. Until we come up with that kind of program, we will have serious economic development programs. If we do not recognize that very soon, other countries will take over the major trade and we will be in an even more serious situation than we are today. It is unfortunate this Government uses patchwork programs, throwing money in any direction to try to carry it through so that it can be re-elected.

I want to refer for a moment to the comments made by the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). He stated in Vancouver that if the Conservatives were in government, they would take a serious look at pensions and family allowances and possibly at bringing back the means test. I hope they never get in government if they are looking at those kinds of policies. I hope this Government will recognize that the B.C. Conservatives have taken over the government of that province, whether they call themselves Social Crediters or Conservatives. They are cutting education programs. Busloads of secondary school children have to travel 35 kilometres to school. Classrooms are being closed and they are being bussed to other areas. That is a shame. It should not happen with the resources that we have and it can only be related to the mismanagement of the Government of Canada.

Mr. McRae: May I ask a question?

AGRICULTURE

INCREASE IN FARM BANKRUPTCIES

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, government Members continually say that we are in a recovery period. If it is judged by the fact that there were fewer personal and business bankruptcies in the first two months of 1984, I grant some substance to that statement. However, based upon those same figures, the agriculture industry remains in recession, or rather, in a depression. In January and February of this year 114 Canadian farmers declared bankruptcy, 58 per cent higher than in the same period last year. That does not include what I am sure would be an equal number of farmers who voluntarily liquidated and sold out.

The Government continually refuses to recognize this problem. Canadian farmers are in trouble. The Government continually refuses requests for emergency funds, implementation of agri-bonds, more Farm Credit Corporation dollars, lower interest rates, and reduction of energy taxes. It has turned its back on farmers all too often.

It is time government Members paid attention. What has to happen before they wake up? It is time for the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) to get the Government to do something realistic, or he should resign.

FISHERIES

MAGDALEN ISLANDS SEAL HUNT

Mr. Rémi Bujold (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I want to tell the House how deeply I regret last weekend's events on the Magdalen Islands, which are part of my riding.

I cannot help condemning the members of the animal welfare group for their provocative actions. Seal hunting on the Magdalen Islands and elsewhere in Canada has taken place for several centuries and the people who take part in it do so in a humane fashion and always with the greatest concern for the welfare of the animals.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, this hunt provides a great many people in my riding and elsewhere with additional incomes at a time of the year when unemployment is extremely high.

Finally, I am sorry that a number of seal hunt supporters of the Magdalen Islands caused damage, but I can understand their disappointment and frustration in the face of these provocative actions by individuals who are seeking to make names for themselves and promote their own personal interests.

POLITICAL PARTIES

SELECTION OF LIBERAL PARTY LEADERSHIP CONVENTION SITE

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, Liberal members are like bottlecaps on an assembly line. Singular in purpose, they scour for power. Hour by hour, they drink and bathe in power. Who can tell, Sir, what happens to Liberal Members when they go walking in a snow storm? What destiny do they witness in a frozen sky? How badly does a winter blizzard numb their neurons?

Edmonton's Liberal alderman, Julian Kiniski, lobbied to encourage that Edmonton might host the upcoming Liberal leadership convention. That indeed was a laudable objective, for which I commend him highly. However, when Edmonton was not awarded the convention, he playacted animated anger, claiming that he had never been so furious in his life, and alleging that the reason Edmonton did not receive the convention was because the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) did not assure that the Government would not be defeated during the convention.

That was some ferocious blizzard within which Liberal Members took a walk which caused them to reason that, because of the over-population in China, the alfalfa production at the Prince Edward Island weather station will cause the Grand Canyon to fill with uranium and there will be nuclear war, and therefore high school will be let out early. That was some blizzard, Sir.

In the past when conventions have been held for the NDP or the Conservative Party, the Government, by tradition, has recessed the House. Are we to expect that it would forget to recess the House for its own convention? Does Kiniski and other Grits expect that Parliament would convene with no government Members present? Kiniski is naive. Such meetings do take place, but they are not called Parliament. That, Sir, is a caucus.

HOUSING

PROVINCE'S REFUSAL TO ALLOCATE NON-PROFIT HOUSING UNITS TO TORONTO

Mr. Douglas Fisher (Mississauga North): Mr. Speaker, CMHC's federal allocation for public non-profit housing was announced in January. Under this important program Ontario gets 1,400 new housing units. However, the Province of Ontario which administers this program refuses to allocate any of these units to either Toronto or Metro Toronto. Furthermore, the provincial Minister of Housing, Claude Bennett, is using flippant and very political language to try to assure the people of Toronto and hide his personal indifference.

The reality behind this situation is quite a different story. Single parents, seniors, pensioners, disabled people, and low-income earners across the City of Toronto are being denied access to new housing. The long waiting lists in that city are getting even longer. Now the Government of Ontario, which has traditionally neglected its housing responsibilities, is offering not only financial neglect but adding to that a very serious geographic neglect.

In the biggest city in the country, public social housing is grinding to a halt. This is unconscionable. The Province of Ontario's Minister of Housing must be condemned for this insensitivity and his flippant arrogance.

CALL FOR NATIONAL JOB CREATION STRATEGY

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, in Canada 85 per cent of the people work, and 15 per cent of the people do not work. This is unfair and is quietly killing those who do not work.

In the Province of British Columbia 25 per cent of the young people are unemployed. We will face a lost generation, and that is a tragedy. Unemployment is the major problem in Canada today, and I call for a national commitment to full employment. I call for jobs for all by 1989.

Now, more than ever, Canada needs new ideas. I propose that we take the $13 billion from unemployment insurance payments, the $8 billion which is given to the oil companies, tax those fat cat banks, and use that money to create a national job-creation strategy. We should begin by upgrading, not downgrading, our educational system, so that we have the finest in the world, and we should create jobs for all by 1990.

In 1960, Mr. Speaker, I remember John F. Kennedy saying that America would put a man on the moon by the end of the decade. Let us make a commitment to put all Canadians, especially young Canadians, back to work and have full employment by the end of the 1980s.

EXCHANGE VALUE OF DOLLAR

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, economic confidence in a nation is reflected by the value of its currency. The plunging Canadian dollar illustrates the lack of confidence which the market holds in the decaying Liberal Government and the lack-lustre quality of the various candidates seeking leadership of that sinking ship.

Exchange problems have been compounded by the amazing behaviour of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde). One day he does not care to what low levels the dollar sinks; the next, he instructs the Bank of Canada to buy Canadian dollars in any amount in order to camouflage the market response to his misguided policies. Tomorrow, as he again pirouettes with considerably less elegance, might I say, than his erstwhile leader, we face the inevitability of higher interest rates. The Canadian dollar will not cease its drift, nor will it stabilize, until the Canadian people have ousted the present Government and replaced it with a Conservative Government in which all can have confidence.

MEDICAL CARE

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF MEDICAL INJURIES COMPENSATION BOARD

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, at a recent conference of the Canadian Institute of Law and Medicine, Justice Richard Holland suggested setting up a medical injuries compensation board which would eliminate the need for medical malpractice lawsuits. Under this scheme patients would recover damages based upon the extent of their injuries, rather than having to prove medical negligence in court in order to win a monetary award. I, too, see merit in this recommendation, in view of the rapidly escalating costs of medical malpractice insurance premiums which have come about as a result of many judgments exceeding $1 million in personal injury suits.

• (1410)

A second reason is the presumption of guilt stigma which is attached to members of the medical profession charged with malpractice, even if they are innocent. Malpractice litigation is now truly a growth industry as lawyers are more prone to take court action in malpractice suits. The Canadian Medical Association must consider these recommendations and explore their implementation through the justice departments of provincial legislatures.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

REMOVAL OF STREET LETTER BOXES

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, for the past several weeks I have received many letters from concerned citizens in my riding of Timiskaming. The majority of these letters are from senior citizens who have written to me complaining about a relatively new Canada Post Corporation program involving the removal of street letter boxes.

In one particular area of Kirkland Lake a street box has been removed in the interests of post office efficiency and savings. However, what the post office does not seem to take into account when it removes these street boxes, are the hardships faced by senior citizens who used to rely on the corner box near their homes.

One lady wrote me and stated:

I am a woman, 76 years of age, and find it is hard, especially in the winter, to mail my letters, because I use a cane. I hate to ask anyone to go out of their way for me. I know there are a lot of elderly people in this district who write letters, so it must be a hardship for them to get their letters mailed.

Surely Canada Post, in its efforts to cut costs and increase efficiency, can retain a degree of compassion when implementing policies such as the street box removal plan. I urge the Minister responsible for Canada Post to ask the President of Canada Post to rethink his corporation's policy with respect to relocating street letter boxes. I urge Canada Post to consider the thousands of senior citizens in Timiskaming and throughout Canada who rely on the post office, and to reinstate street boxes in neighbourhoods where there is a high concentration of elderly people.

INCOME TAX

TAXATION OF WORKERS' COMPENSATION BENEFITS

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I rise on an important matter affecting those elderly Canadians who receive workers' compensation benefits following work place injuries. GIS benefits to the poorest elderly are being cut because the Government now treats these receipts as income rather than compensation.

This change was buried in an omnibus tax bill following the MacEachen and Lalonde Budgets, and slipped through almost without notice. The change will mean more disabled workers are forced to subsist on incomes below the poverty line. The Government consistently refuses to increase old age pensions to eliminate poverty among the elderly, but must it begrudge the elderly the miserly sums they do receive? Why must benefits to the disabled be cut back?

This amendment is unwanted. Members on all sides have spoken against it. Even Revenue Canada, not noted for its generosity, has chosen to disregard the law and advises tax filers to ignore the change for most tax purposes.

We, in the New Democratic Party, call on the Government to table legislation immediately to ensure that GIS is not reduced by workers' compensation benefits. We are prepared to deal with such a bill as expeditiously as possible. One Minister has already advised the House that ministerial discussions on this matter are under way, but how long must the disabled suffer while the Ministers dither?

FUNDING SOUGHT FOR P.E.I. ELECTRO-MECHANICAL TECHNOLOGY PROGRAM

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I would like to discuss an issue brought to my attention by the President of the Architects' Association of P.E.I., concerning funding for an electro-mechanical technology program for Holland College, the community college of Prince Edward Island.

Holland College has made application to receive funding through the Skills Growth Fund offered by the Department of Employment and Immigration. The program the community college wishes to develop includes computer aided drafting, design, and manufacturing.

I share the sentiments expressed by the President of the Architects' Association in that there is a need for the development of technological skills. In an attempt to alleviate the employment problems faced by our youth, it is necessary to provide exposure at post-secondary institutions to equipment which will help accelerate the growth of design and manufacturing sectors.

New advancements in technology will bring within the grasp of small businesses new markets within Canada as well as abroad, and provide employment growth. With increased emphasis placed on new technology, a strong demand for education and retraining of the work force is created. If we wish to keep abreast of this growth, we must provide the necessary tools, equipment, and programs, to train our young people properly and provide an on-hands learning experience to which students all across the country are entitled.

I urge the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Roberts) to support this worth-while project for the Province of Prince Edward Island as it is an investment which will pay dividends not only for P.E.I. but for all Canada.

CONDEMNATION OF GOVERNMENT POLICIES

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, the Liberals have lost all credibility. During the last 16 years the Grits have perpetrated policies upon the Canadian people resulting in one and a half million people being without work; a national debt which is 500 per cent higher than it was in 1968; thousands of farmers in a state of desperation, with 488 having gone bankrupt last year, and a program which will send most businesses in Banff into bankruptcy or receivership.

Now some of the Ministers are preaching solutions to the ruinous policies which they themselves imposed on the people. The Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Johnston) even said: "These programs are not carved in stone. We have to look at them . . ." Well, let us look at the land rentals in Banff which are completely under the control of the Liberal Government. One business paid $300 in land rents in 1979. This was increased in 1980 to $10,536, an increase of 3,500 per cent. Another business paid $1,800 in 1979, and faced an increase of 1,600 per cent in 1980, to $28,842.

No business can raise its prices sufficiently to meet such gigantic increases, and the former Minister of the Environment who imposed the rents and the present Minister, refused to change them. Not carved in stone? Indeed! To re-elect the Grits would be like hiring the arsonist to put out the fire he started. Promises to change disastrous programs now, in a desperate attempt to stay in power, means nothing to the Canadian people who can no longer believe a word the Liberals say.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

INTEREST RATE LEVELS—GOVERNMENT POLICY INQUIRY

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Economic and Regional Development. The Government has allowed interest rates to climb about 1 per cent over the past three or four weeks. This would seem to me to be a totally inappropriate and wrong policy response at a time when unemployment is growing and when business investment, a part of our economy which is most affected adversely by high interest rates, is projected to have no growth at all in 1984. Could the Minister explain this irrational and inappropriate policy response?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, first of all, the Hon. Member knows very well that this is not a policy issue. This is an interest rate movement. There is no one on this side of the House, and I would hope not on the other side of the House, who is promoting high interest rates.

Let us remember what we have been successful in doing in this country over the past year and how far we have brought inflation down during that period. The question of the Hon. Member is rather naive in suggesting there is some policy implication here. We all know the forces which work in terms of determining interest rates. We have had that painful experience. Let us make sure it does not happen again.

COMPARISON WITH UNITED STATES ECONOMY

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, that is precisely the point I am making. Why is the Government allowing the interest rates to rise? I heard the Minister of Finance say that it is related to interest rates in the United States. However, the United States economy is strong. The Canadian economy is weak. Its unemployment rates are falling, ours is rising. Its business investment is rising to record levels; ours is flat. Its retail sales are up; ours are down.

It does not make any sense at all for us to have this situation in Canada where interest rates are allowed to rise. Is the Minister telling us there is no alternative, that the Government has no flexibility and no other options but simply to follow the policy of the United States lock-step, and watch our economy fall into the doldrums again?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Well, Mr. Speaker, this seems to take me back to debates which we have had across this floor over the last several years. We have debated the issue of interest rates and the forces which affect interest rates ad nauseam. We all know what kind of external pressures to which we are subject.

One thing we can do to improve our own interest rate situation, which we have done, is to control the rate of inflation. I know the Hon. Member would be the first to agree with that. We have gone a long way in that direction. Let us hope that that trend will continue and that we will keep pushing that inflation rate down. That is one thing, indeed, we can do, we have done, and will continue to do.

EFFECT OF GOVERNMENT BORROWING

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the Hon. Member is paying attention to the debate which is going on today, which is on the borrowing requirement. Surely the Minister realizes that with a deficit of $30 billion or, if I might paraphrase something he said, "if the Government simply borrows and borrows", the result must inevitably be a weak dollar, or high interest rates, or a combination of both? Are we not seeing today the inevitable result of many years of excessive government borrowing and continuing government mismanagement? Is that not the reason why we have a weak dollar and the Government is being forced to let interest rates rise?

• (1420)

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development and Minister of State for Science and Technology): I think quite the contrary, Mr. Speaker. The Government's position on the deficit has been expressed many times by my colleague, the Minister of Finance. Everyone in the western world is concerned about deficits. The Americans are concerned about their deficits, as we are concerned about ours.

Mr. Wilson: They are doing something about it.

Mr. Johnston: That is exactly why the Minister of Finance took the position he did when he brought down his Budget. Those deficits have to be controlled and brought down in a measured way. We all know the impact of borrowing. We all know the more debt we have, the less funding is available to embark on those programs the Government would like to embark upon. The French, the British, and the Americans all kow that, and we certainly know it. That is precisely why the Minister of Finance is attempting to keep the deficit in line and reduce it over a period of years.

SIZE OF GOVERNMENT BORROWING

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for Economic Development, who is supposed to be a voice of quiet intelligence in the Government. Now we can see that he is quiet.

The Minister said on March 9 that people have to understand that Governments simply cannot borrow and borrow. In view of the fact that this Government borrowed $101 billion in the last 11 years, and plans to borrow for deficits totalling $142 billion this year and in the next four years, what are people to understand from that—that this Government is composed completely of hypocrites who never do what they say should be done? Is that what they should understand?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development and Minister of State for Science and Technology): I do not know what kind of an outburst that was, Mr. Speaker. We all know that one cannot borrow, and borrow, and borrow; that is precisely the point the Minister of Finance made. We have come through the most difficult recession this country has known since the 1930s.

Mr. Wilson: Why was it difficult?

Mr. Johnston: We know the effect on the deficit of the automatic stabilizers in our system. The Minister of Finance is taking steps to ensure effectively continued and sustained economic growth, which is the best way of getting the deficit under control through revenues which will accrue as a result. Therefore I am not quite sure what the Hon. Member's point is. If he is decrying the size of the deficit, welcome to the club. We have all been concerned about the deficit. We are also concerned about the recession, and the programs which have been absolutely necessary to sustain Canadians through this period. That is in large measure why the deficit is where it is today.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I thought this putative leader had the answers. We certainly have not heard them today.

LEVEL OF JOB CREATION

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, in an address called "New Financial Impediments to Economic Recovery", Mr. Mackness of the Bank of Nova Scotia points out that job creation, which was very rapid in the early stages of the Canadian recovery, has ground to a halt. Employment has increased at an annual rate of less than 1 per cent over the last six months compared to 5 per cent in the first eight months of recovery, and compared to U.S. job creation which is still surging ahead in excess of 5 per cent.

Why is it that in Canada our job creation is now less than 1 per cent in the last six months while in the U.S. it is 5 per cent? What policies does the Minister suggest which could bring us up at least to the level of the U.S.? What is he doing, rather than what is he saying?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development and Minister of State for Science and Technology): I wish I could do something for the Hon. Member who is wallowing in misery over there, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Crosbie: It is the 1.5 million unemployed who are wallowing in misery.

Mr. Johnston: The fact is that this country has a record in job creation that is unexcelled.

Mr. Wilson: That is wrong.

Mr. Johnston: We knew, and everyone forecast, that the very strong recovery, which far exceeded everyone's expectations, would begin to slow down. I believe most economic indicators are indeed very promising. That Budget was designed effectively to stimulate the private sector and create jobs in small and medium sized businesses, where many, many thousands of jobs have been and will continue to be created. That is what the Budget is all about, and I hope the Hon. Member for St. John's West is around here to watch the results which are, frankly, extraordinary by international standards.

MINES AND MINING

WESTERN CANADIAN COAL PRODUCTION

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Hon. Minister of Mines. Given the Government's concern over high unemployment and the weakness of the Canadian dollar due to capital outflow, and given the desire of all Canadians to reduce acid rain, can the Minister assure this House that, as a corrective measure addressing these problems, his Ministry has done its utmost to promote the use of high grade, low sulphur western Canadian coal which will create thousands of jobs, clean up the environment, and save $1 billion from leaving our country?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of State (Mines)): Mr. Speaker, not only are we concerned about western Canada coal, but I can tell the Hon. Member that we have a study under way in the Department on the use of non-ferrous smelters, and we hope to be making some further announcements about that in the near future. I have consulted with my colleagues, the Minister of the Environment and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and I can say we are very actively working in support of the Government's objective to deal with the problem of acid rain.

IMPORTATION OF UNITED STATES COAL

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, could the Minister then explain why, in 1983, central Canadian coal users continued importing 16 million tons of low-grade, high sulphur American coal, the use of which threatens some 48,000 lakes in Ontario? At the same time production in one of the richest deposits of high quality Canadian coal steadily declined, throwing men out of work and threatening the economic viability of western Canadian coal mines.

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of State (Mines)): Mr. Speaker, I can point to a number of initiatives where we have assisted western coal in British Columbia. For example, the largest part of our trade with Korea is in coal, and it is growing rapidly. We are making every attempt to export Canadian coal, and I think it is showing some results.

1981 AUDIT OF FISHERMEN'S EARNINGS

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. According to the report commissioned by his predecessor, the Rowe report, during the audit of fishermen in Canada in 1981 the average earnings of Newfoundland fishermen were $7,481, and in Prince Edward Island $8,752. The poverty line in Canada as defined by StatsCan is $9,300 for a family of four, or $11,400 for a family of six.

Why did the Government, specifically his Department, conduct an audit of a group of people whose earnings were below the poverty line?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I suggest the Hon. Member is looking at this issue from the wrong angle. The way he directed his question would seem to imply that legislations such as the Income Tax Act which are Revenue Canada responsibilities should not apply to particular groups of individuals.

If the Hon. Member read the Rowe Report a little further, he would realize that Mr. Rowe indicated clearly that when penalties and fines are imposed following an audit, they are imposed in compliance with the legislation, and that when contributions are assessed, it is in conjunction with existing incomes. That is a truism. The figures which the Hon. Member has quoted, therefore, are average earnings and do not apply in all cases, which means that some individual earnings are higher, while some others are lower, and the tax rate for the former is greater than for the latter. His question, therefore, has nothing whatsoever to do with departmental responsibilities or the Income Tax legislation as it exists now.

• (1430)

[English]

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, judgement is the issue here. The Minister does not seem to be exercising that in his answer, and certainly not in his actions.

ROWE REPORT FINDINGS

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Is the Minister trying to justify to the House and the country an audit of a group of people whose income is clearly below the poverty line, some of whom have had third party attachments on them for as much as 60 per cent of their gross incomes? The rationale for the audit in the first instance was because of a mistake made by the Government, namely, a ground fish subsidy of 2.5 cents per pound which was paid for four years by the Government, on which not T-4 slips were issued.

Given all those circumstances, and the fact that the Government has had this report for over two years, why was a stop not put to that disgraceful audit?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member knows perfectly well that when the report was published, the audit had been terminated. The Hon. Member knows that. Furthermore, he knows perfectly well that a . . . Mr. Speaker, instead of preparing the next question because he realizes his colleague does not know enough about the issue and that he has to tell him what to say, the Hon. Member should at least have the common decency to listen to the reply and show a little more intelligence in his understanding of the situation.

If assessments were made, this means that there was equivalent income. He is using an average figure as the basis for his claim that there should not be a tax audit. He knows perfectly well that this is a false premise.

[English]

DEPARTMENT'S POWERS

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Finance. It has become crystal clear that the powers of search and seizure, the powers of collection, the powers of garnishee, and the powers of seizing people's bank accounts, are far out of control and in need of legislative change. If that was not clear, it has certainly become clear as a result of the 30 pages of the Rowe report which deal with the civil liberties of individuals.

Has the Minister read the report? What steps are going to be taken by the Government to correct this very serious problem? Does the Minister agree with the general principle that the Department of Revenue has far too many powers?

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I have not read the report to which the Hon. Member refers. I shall do so at the first opportunity. I hope to be able to respond to him at that time.

NON-APPEARANCE OF OFFICIALS BEFORE CONSERVATIVE PARTY TASK FORCE HEARINGS

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of National Revenue. In a letter dated February 24 to the Member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe the Minister gives reasons for the inability of his officials to testify. He says "the anonymity of public servants, and their political impartiality and loyalty" were at stake if they did testify. How does the Minister reconcile that reasoning with the fact that the Assistant Deputy Minister of Revenue for the western region appeared on Cross Country Check-up and gave a speech to the Chamber of Commerce where he made the most controversial of statements? Why can they appear on public radio and give speeches to Chambers of Commerce, and yet not speak to Members of Parliament?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member fails to see that he is daily undermining his own credibility by making statements that are based on pure fantasy.

First of all, he knows perfectly well that, provided Members of the Official Opposition and their caucus are prepared to observe the rules governing parliamentary activities, departmental officials are prepared to give briefings for the benefit of those members and to do so at any time. That is basically the point I made in the letter I sent to his colleague.

I may add that the Hon. Member and his colleagues are acting irresponsibly in making a political football of an issue as important as the administration of the Income Tax Act. They have made themselves unworthy of their privileges and rights by using the taxpayer to play their game of petty politics.

[English]

HOUSING

RESIDENTIAL MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for housing. In his absence I will direct it to the Minister of State for Finance, if I can get his attention. My question has to do with the spectre of high mortgage interest rates which is once again coming to haunt Canadian home owners. I would like to remind the Minister and the Government that those interest rates rose to an appalling 23 per cent just three years ago and thousands of Canadians lost their homes. What has the Government in mind now to prevent those interest rates from soaring out of sight, causing thousands more Canadians to lose their homes?

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I do not share the view of the Hon. Member that there is any likelihood of mortgage interest rates soaring out of sight in the time ahead. On the contrary, indications within the Canadian economy with regard to long term interest rates remain favourable. The recent modest increase in mortgage rates is not, in my view, indicative of any trend contrary to that favourable long term trend which I have indicated.

In any event the Hon. Member should bear in mind that in the recent Budget we have provided for a mortgage rate protection program which will assure a mortgage holder that he or she will not again experience the type of mortgage rates which we had in Canada a year or two ago.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, the Minister's response reminds me exactly of what his predecessor said when mortgage interest rates were around 12 per cent or 13 per cent in 1980.

MORTGAGE INSURANCE SCHEME—AMOUNT OF PROTECTION FOR HOME OWNERS

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote Mr. Peter Carter of Royal Bank mortgage and consumer services. He said: "People will only start to claim under the insurance program when interest rates—God forbid—reach the levels of 1981 again". The Minister does not need to be reminded that at that time mortgage interest rates were 23 per cent.

Will the Minister acknowledge that if the interest rates rise by 3 per cent the home owner who has this insurance will still end up paying 75 per cent of the increased mortgage costs out of his own pocket? Will he also undertake to persuade the Minister of Finance that the only real protection for home buyers and home owners is to have the Government require that banks set aside a specific portion of their lending portfolios for mortgages, at long term stable interest rates?

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the Member opposite must know that the real protection against higher mortgage rates in Canada is the reduction in the level of inflation in Canada. In recent months in Canada we have seen a sharp decline in wage rate levels. We have seen wage settlements. We have seen a rapid increase in productivity. We have seen a moderation in cost increases in industry. These are the real factors which create protection against higher mortgage interest rates in Canada.

The Member opposite must also realize that in the Budget we not only provided a mortgage protection plan, but we offered a mortgage-backed securities scheme which should also ameliorate the circumstances in the mortgage market generally, and contribute to a limitation on the rates of mortgage in the time ahead.

TOURISM

INDUSTRY DEFICIT—EFFECT ON EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for tourism. It is clear that the Liberal Government has neglected tourism over the past decade to the point that our tourist deficit has skyrocketed from a staggering $1.3 billion in 1982 to a record $2.1 billion in 1983. This has resulted in the incredible loss of 100,000 jobs last year alone. A lack of cost competitiveness in Canada is virtually pricing the tourism industry out of business, despite the low Canadian dollar vis-à-vis the American dollar. Can the Minister tell us what he is doing specifically to alleviate this very, very serious problem in our economy?

• (1440)

Hon. David Smith (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, specifically, we recently launched a television campaign directed toward Canadians, encouraging them to vacation in Canada. I am sure many Members will have seen this campaign, and I think it will have a beneficial result.

In addition, we will be launching a major television campaign in April all across the northern tier of the United States that is within a one day's drive to Canada. I am sure we will see a real turnaround in terms of the number of American visitors who will be coming to Canada.

Mr. Jelinek: I did not know the Minister was that naive. Surely he knows, as John Lawson of TIAC pointed out, that this increase in the advertising budget of $22 million does not get to the root of the problem but simply brings the advertising budget back to what it was a decade ago.

AWARDING OF ADVERTISING CONTRACTS

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister explain to the House and to Canadians generally why his Government has awarded advertising contracts exclusively to Liberal advertising agencies, namely, agencies which are part of Red Leaf Communications, headed by recently appointed Liberal Senator Jerry Grafstein? Justify this further porkbarrelling by the Liberal Government.

Hon. David Smith (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the advertising firms that will be carrying out these specific campaigns are firms that have done work for Tourism Canada for some years. They have done an excellent job. They made excellent presentations. We do not switch firms when they do an excellent job, and that is exactly what they have done.

FISHERIES

SEAL HUNT—REQUEST FOR BAN ON CLUBBING WHITE COAT PUPS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. As the Minister is aware, the fishing industry on the East and West Coasts, as well as in central Canada, is facing very serious marketing problems in the United Kingdom and the United States because of the seal issue. In view of the fact that the Newfoundland sealers decided last year not to hunt seal pups, and the sealers have again taken the same stand this year, backed up by the Newfoundland Government, will the federal Government, in the interest of protecting the over-all Canadian fishing industry, put a complete ban on the clubbing of white coat seal pups anywhere in Canada?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the Hon. Member that the House of Commons has, in several instances, unanimously passed resolutions defending our sealers in Arctic Canada, Labrador, northern Quebec, and the Magdalen Islands. They were passed unanimously by the House. I assume that this is still the position of his Party.

Second, I would like to remind the Hon. Member that we are not dealing with rational people on this issue. We are dealing with fanatics who have been spreading lies about our fishermen and our sealers. I would ask the Hon. Member to reflect on what would be the reaction of those fanatical people if you give in on something which they have already destroyed themselves and if we should go to the point of declaring something illegal that, at this moment, is not happening in Canada because they have destroyed the market for our fishermen.

Mr. Crouse: I would remind the Hon. Minister that this is the second year in which the Newfoundland fishermen have voluntarily withdrawn from the clubbing of white coats, and that we did support the position put forth a moment ago, as he stated. But times change. They will change after the next election. We are changing with the times.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER LAUNCH PUBLICITY CAMPAIGN

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister, in conjunction with the External Affairs Department, establish a publicity campaign to inform the world that Canadians no longer engage in the clubbing of white coats, or seal pups, and will he inform the United Kingdom, and all the Europeans, at the same time that their fish quotas in Canadian waters will have to be reconsidered since each seal eats approximately a tonne and a half of fish per year?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly give serious consideration to all of the valuable suggestions of my hon. friend. On the other hand, I am happy to report to him that as of 2.45 p.m. today, the report that I have from my Department, which got in touch with every single important buyer of Canadian fish, is that not one of them will give into that blackmail because they realize that, if they give in on this issue, tomorrow there will be blackmail on the fur industry and other single issue causes, by people who are determined to blackmail. Last year they tried to destroy the market for the sealers and they did not succeed. This year they are trying to blackmail the fishermen. The buyers realize that if they give in to this group this year, next year it will be on another issue. It is in their own interest to resist any blackmail.

DECLARATION OF TIPS AS INCOME

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. April 30 is fast approaching and workers getting tips are still facing the inequity of having to pay taxes on their total income while the Unemployment Insurance Commission is not collecting contributions accordingly. I know that the Minister had advised me to direct this question to the Minister of Finance, but in his absence, will the Minister of National Revenue tell us whether, in view of the date set for the filing of income tax returns, he has made any recommendations to correct this injustice, which he recognizes himself, and whether the Minister of Finance has responded favourably to suggestions for correcting it?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has not provided me with any answer because I did not ask him the question. However, I must remind the Hon. Member that, as far as the Department of National Revenue is concerned, the declaration of tips is the responsibility of the workers themselves. This means that, before their tax returns have been filed, we do not know in advance the amount of tips they will declare.

The Hon. Member is certainly referring to the proposal made by the Quebec Government and he knows how strongly this proposal is still being challenged.

REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): The Minister of National Revenue is aware that the Unemployment Insurance Commission regulations as applied by the Department of Employment are obviously being unfair considering the fact that the Department of Employment and Immigration is assessing the contributions of the worker who receives tips on the basis of his wages without his tips being taken into account.

The Minister is also aware that he is responsible for collecting the contributions and that many Canadians pay income tax without ever being entitled to the corresponding social benefit provided under the Unemployment Insurance Plan. The Minister is aware of all this and I would like him to explain why, since he is aware of this injustice, he has not already recommended and requested quite legitimately from his colleague that the situation be straightened out so that all these Canadians who pay taxes without being entitled to the corresponding benefit under this social program will be treated fairly.

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I do not see why the Hon. Member is asking me this question. The Minister of State for Finance, who represents the Minister of Finance, is in the House, as is the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, who is responsible for the administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

The Minister of Revenue has some responsibility in the administration of the Acts which, as the Hon. Member is well aware, deal with the Department of Finance and certain other departments. However, it is not up to the Minister of Revenue to propose changes to the legislation referred to by the Hon. Member.

FISHERIES

GREAT LAKES SPORTS FISHING—IMPORTANCE TO TOURIST INDUSTRY

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. It concerns the tourist industry and sports fishing. Has the Minister identified any new programs for the Great Lakes which would enhance sports fishing on the Great Lakes and thus assist the tourist industry?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member knows, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans works very closely with the provincial Government. Every time that we receive a request for co-operation with the provincial Government, we have a very close relationship. I will be very happy to entertain any suggestion from the Hon. Member.

MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, I would take it that the Minister's response is no. He has received a submission. Has he considered that submission? Can he identify any new programs that would enhance sports fishing on the Great Lakes?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I will take the question of the Hon. Member as notice.

NATIONAL REVENUE

RESPONSIBILITY FOR ISSUING THIRD PARTY DEMANDS

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. Where is the final authority for third party demands when a person arrives at a bank with a briefcase full of blank third party demands, with the signature stamped on a third party demand, a fact which can be documented? Who ultimately is responsible for closing out these peoples' accounts when staff from Revenue Canada come and simply hand out stamped third party demands?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I find the Hon. Member's remarks rather blunt. I suggest that he should follow the advice I gave him recently. When he called my attention to a situation which is specific to his riding, I told him to contact his district officer, discuss the matter with him and obtain first-hand information.

On the other hand, if he is aware of some definite cases, it is his basic responsibility as a Member of Parliament to discuss the matter with the district officer who is responsible for administering the act and would remedy the situation.

If he is aware of definite cases and can refrain from making blunt statements, I would be willing to receive his representations and investigate the matter.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

AUTOMOBILE EMISSION HEARINGS—NON-APPEARANCE OF DEPARTMENTAL OFFICIALS

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Last week the acid rain subcommittee of this House met in Toronto to hear briefs concerning automobile emissions. Representatives of the Minister's Department were asked to appear and give their position with respect to present standards and possible changes. Nobody from the Department turned up. Nobody offered any apologies. The Committee of Members of the House of Commons was treated with absolute contempt by the Minister's Department. Would the Minister like to explain why?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to clarify the remarks made by the Hon. Member. In fact there was a member of the Department of Transport at the hearings, as an observer. Second, I had communicated with the Chairman of the Committee at an earlier date indicating that we would not be in a position to appear before the committee until such time as we had an opportunity to examine the studies that were under preparation. These studies were tabled just last week. We will now undertake careful consideration of them and consult with the appropriate bodies, as both my colleague, the Minister of the Environment, and I indicated publicly. Certainly there was no intention to have any disrespect for the committee. I will be very happy to appear before the committee. We will when we have something to say and a position to put forward.

MINISTER'S ROLE

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, the Minister's servant who appeared was far too frightened to say a word.

Was it the Minister's direct instructions that kept anybody from his Department from coming before a parliamentary sub-committee of Members of the House of Commons? Most certainly we did not have any information that the Minister had declined to come or declined to have any of his people there, nor was any reason given. Why did the Minister allow a situation to exist where a House of Commons committee of Members of Parliament that asked for representatives of the Department to come before it was absolutely refused? Such conduct is absolutely contemptible.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the Hon. Member for Vancouver South that I think he is jumping to conclusions. It may be the practice in his Party to let prejudice interfere with the facts. I prefer to make decisions based upon a proper examination of the studies that are available.

Mr. McDermid: It means you are running for the leadership.

Mr. Axworthy: It was certainly our intention, and it would be my intention very happily so, to appear before the Committee when we are in a position to do so. That means having the opportunity to see what the studies say and determine what kind of standards would be appropriate to alleviate the situation. That kind of message was communicated to the Chairman of the Committee.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

FRIGATE CONSTRUCTION PROGRAM CONTRACTS

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. When the Minister served in his former position with respect to the Canadian frigate program, he made a statement. It was contained in an announcement he made in June, 1983. He said that two-thirds of the contract, referring to the total frigate contract, would be supplied by Canadian firms. Now as the Minister for National Defence can he assure this House that of those contracts that have been let for the patrol frigate program fully two-thirds have been awarded to Canadian firms?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I can advise the hon. gentleman that, yes, we are meeting the target that had been set at the time the contract was signed. I might point out to the hon. gentleman that I was before the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence this morning defending my Estimates. I would have liked to have discussed that issue with the hon. gentleman in the Committee. I do not have all the details, but I will be pleased to provide him with as many details as I possibly can, in another forum.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER TABLE LIST OF CONTRACTS

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Mr. Speaker, the Minister will know that the major contractor for this project is Saint John Shipbuilding which has as its U.S. partner Sperry Inc. It in turn has established a Canadian subsidiary by the name of Paramax Electronics Ltd., and in large measure it is responsible for determining the sub-contractors under the frigate program.

In the event the Minister is as sure as he has indicated here today that fully two-thirds of this contract will be awarded to Canadian firms, would he be prepared to table in the House a list of the contracts that have so far been awarded, along with the monetary value of the same?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to look into that matter in order to respond positively to the hon. gentleman's representations. I might point out to him, though, that Paramax will have its sub-contractors and Saint John Shipbuilding will have its own sub-contractors, relating to their own specific areas of responsibility. Saint John Shipbuilding is the master of the total contract, but it deals basically with the ships and ship engineering, whereas Paramax deals with the weapons system and the integration thereof.

I will be pleased to provide the Hon. Member with as much information as can be made available, taking into account some commercial confidentialities that have to be maintained.

EMPLOYMENT

STATEMENT ATTRIBUTED TO MINISTER OF STATE FOR ECONOMIC AND REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development. On the evening the Minister declared his Liberal leadership aspirations on The Journal, in answer to a question on a comparison between his views on the economy and the views of the Hon. Leader of the Conservative Party, he told Barbara Frum:

I suspect that on some of those questions there might be a coincidence of issues and values.

Does the Minister stand by that statement? Is that government policy? If he does stand by that, and we continue to have the situation where, by the Minister's own admission, the private sector is not creating the jobs, then how does he propose to create jobs for our unemployed youth today?

Mr. Malone: A paid political announcement.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to outline how I would propose to create jobs for the unemployed youth today. But as to the specific question with respect to the Leader of the Opposition, the difficulty I have, and the difficulty I had with Mrs. Frum's question, is that I really do not know what are the policies of the Leader of the Opposition. Hence, it made it somewhat difficult for me to determine whether or not there really was a coincidence of values, but I also added that perhaps he had read some of the speeches—mine and perhaps those of others—made on this side of the House, and was trying to develop some ideas based on them.

EMPLOYMENT

REQUEST FOR COMMITMENT TO FULL EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to let the Minister off the hook so easily. In my own province there is a 25 per cent unemployed rate among young people who have a feeling of hopelessness about the situation. Will the Minister commit himself and the Government to a program of full employment by 1989 for people in Canada? John F. Kennedy did it in 1960 when he said that the Americans would put a man on the moon by 1969. They did it. Is the Minister prepared to rise in his place and say to the young people of Canada: "We will give you hope and we will give you a commitment to full employment by 1989"?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I love targets; I believe in targets. I am also concerned, as has been demonstrated many times on this side of the House, about the plight of young people who are unemployed. Our answer to that is a strong, vigorous economy, with sustained growth for long-term, meaningful, permanent jobs—that is the way that problem is to be addressed—and also to ensure that people coming out of our educational system have sufficient skills and sufficient flexibility to be able to seize the opportunities which we see developing day after day. I know the Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway has often mentioned the potential of those jobs, particularly in areas of advanced technologies, not only at the high-tech end but as applied to the traditional sectors. Let us put our shoulders to the wheel and ensure that those jobs are there and that people have the skills to fill those jobs.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION TO DESIGNATE MR. KNOWLES HONORARY OFFICER OF HOUSE

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, today, I am in the very fortunate position of having to move in this House a motion that has the unanimous support of all three Party Leaders, and it will come as no surprise to the House that this unanimity was easily achieved, since the motion concerns the future of the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

[English]

It is nearly 60 years since September, 1924 when Stanley Knowles, as he was then known, as a little boy came to visit Parliament for the first time. We now learn with regret, and at the same time relief, that he will not be running again. I say relief because I believe when the Hon. Member the other day referred to me he indicated that my own past and future were the subject of some apprehension. Nonetheless, we are learning with sadness that he will not be running again. We sought together for a way in which we might recognize not only his outstanding service but associate him in some way with the future workings and operation of this Chamber.

Therefore, after consultation with the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) and the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), we agree that we should propose a motion which I will now move with their support. I am happy to see the Hon. Member wearing a rose.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: He indicated the other day when he was speaking to the announcement of my retiring that he remembered the past when I had shown some interest in his Party. I see a hopeful symbol from our side that in the future he may see an interest in our Party.

It gives me great pleasure to move, seconded by the Leader of the Opposition and by the Leader of the New Democratic Party:

That this House, desiring to record its deep appreciation of the distinguished and faithful service to Parliament and to Canada of the Honourable Stanley Knowles, P.C., B.A., B.D., LL.D., designate him, effective upon his retirement from his membership in the House, an honorary officer of the House of Commons with an entrée to the Chamber and a seat at the Table.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, Winnipeg North Centre has gained lustre from the attainments of its extraordinary Member. It goes down with such ridings as Prince Albert, Mount Royal and Algoma East, which became household words because of the stature of those who represented them. If this were hockey, we would retire his riding—

Mr. Broadbent: Wishful thinking!

Mr. Nielsen: —like one retires the sweater of a Richard or a Gordie Howe. But in the hard arena of political life, one cannot retire a riding simply to honour a Member.

We have done the next best thing and, in an extraordinary parliamentary gesture—never before to my recollection has a sitting Member been distinguished by this sort of honour—expressing our rare affection for a man embodying the best qualities of parliamentary life, we are offering him a life membership in the institution which he has graced by his presence. Some time in the future, whenever he shall choose to avail himself of the privilege, the Table of this House shall become, for a time at least, a small corner of Winnipeg North Centre. We look forward to that experience, as I am sure does the Hon. Member whom we so justifiably honour in this fashion today.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, it is with immense pleasure that I rise to second the motion moved by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) just a moment ago. The House is in the process of uniquely honouring a unique Canadian. Throughout his 38 years the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has graced the political process in our country, I think for two reasons. One is that he has been a man passionately committed in his political life, not simply to the abstract principles of social democracy, but to the details of reform for pensioners, to the details of reform for the poor, to the details of achieving equality for women. He has been a man who has seen that the parliamentary process is used, and passionately used, to bring about concrete change and improvement in the living conditions of ordinary people.

• (1510)

Second, and perhaps of greater importance in terms of the reason all Parties in the House are honouring him today, Stanley Knowles has seen the importance of the civilizing process of Parliament itself and has accepted this, I think more deeply than any other Member of Parliament during his time. He has well understood the unwritten rule of parliamentary democracy, which is that the deeply felt divisions that exist in society would be expressed violently ultimately if it were not for the civilizing process of parliamentary, democratic change. Throughout his life, Stanley Knowles has well understood that and has had that important lesson to teach the rest of us. His passionate commitment to the rules of this House has not been a fetish concern with irrelevant tradition. It has been a concern with the fundamentals of democratic change. That is what Stanley Knowles is all about.

On behalf of my colleagues, I thank the Prime Minister most directly for this initiative on his part. I was not able to be here about a week ago when other things were said about the Prime Minister's retirement. If I had been here, I would have made some deeply-felt, positive remarks about the Prime Minister. I would have been more sparing on those matters on which I disagree. I want to stress that this is an act of unqualified generosity on the part of the Prime Minister which has received the support which it ought to have from all Members of the House. For that I thank him on behalf of my colleagues.

I also want to refer to his observation that the man we are honouring today is wearing a rose. The Prime Minister suggested that, just as Stanley Knowles referred to the early days when the Prime Minister truly was a wise person, perhaps in his latter years Mr. Knowles had changed his political views. I simply want to say to the Prime Minister that Stanley is elderly, but he is not senile!

I conclude more graciously by once again saying thank you to Members of all other Parties in this House who have joined with us in honouring this truly distinguished Canadian.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I first wish to express pleasure in joining with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in wearing a beautiful rose today. I may even take the opportunity to say that the rose I wear today was presented to me by a person who no doubt presents one to the Prime Minister from time to time, namely our very good friend Joyce Fairbairn.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: I am happy to be associated with what was said about the Prime Minister on March 5. Of course, I am extremely grateful for the proposal he is making to the House at this time. I have to be careful not to make the kind of long speech we used to be able to make. However, let me say that it means a great deal to me that so many people are making kind remarks about the job I am trying to do as a Member of Parliament.

Many people have written to me. What they have written has been very helpful. I am particularly grateful for the book about my life prepared by my good friend, Dr. Susan Mann Trofimenkoff. In addition, a very interesting book was prepared a few weeks ago by Dr. Gerry Harrop, formerly of Saskatchewan and now in Nova Scotia. In his book he describes my work with the phrase that I have been "an advocate of compassion". To have that suggested as a description of my work as a Member of Parliament means a great deal to me. Perhaps I should go on to say that if that is true, that there are some of us who work hard with compassion for the people of this country, I recommend that form of activity to another 50, 100 or more Members of Parliament. It is good for us as Members of Parliament to work for a better life for the people we represent.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: I am, of course, extremely grateful for the suggestion made by the Prime Minister and others to try to give me a chance to live again. Members know of my difficulty after my years of hard work. I have damage to my brain because of a stroke I suffered, and the last two and a half years have been difficult for me. For the first year and a half I dared to hope that I could run again. However, when one tries to work with brain damage like this, one realizes there are some things one cannot do. Perhaps my troubles are more difficult than I realize with the speech I am making now!

Let me say that it helps a great deal when people are kind to me. I appreciate it. I thank the Prime Minister for the suggestion he has now made, namely that I have the opportunity after the next election to return here to the Table and be here from time to time. It will give me the feeling that I am still alive. I am still interested in the job I have done in past years. It means a great deal to me if I can report to my doctors that I am feeling a little better. Maybe I can say it is partly as a result of the proposal that has now been made by the Prime Minister.

Those must be my words. Perhaps I might say a word or two not normally permissible under the rules pertaining to speaking. I would like to conclude in this way: Pierre, I want to thank you so much for what you have done for me. You have given me a chance to live. I deeply appreciate it. I will try to do my best. Thank you ever so much.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is carried unanimously.

Motion (Mr. Trudeau) agreed to.

CITIZENSHIP ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-227, an Act to amend the Citizenship Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this amendment is to protect foreign-born Canadian citizens from the politically motivated administrative acts of some Iron Curtain countries, such as Czechoslovakia, whereby, before being granted a visa to visit their country of birth and their relatives still living there, these new Canadians are being required under duress to take an oath or some other declaration of allegiance to their native land. With the protection which this amendment offers, Iron Curtain countries will no longer be able to blackmail their erstwhile nationals into renewing their allegiance.

ANSWER TO QUESTION NO. 234

Question No. 321—Mrs. Cossitt:

1. To the knowledge of the Government, what was the longest period that a question remained on the Order Paper unanswered after having been repeatedly asked in each new session of Parliament and in each new Parliament?

2. (a) Has question No. 234, on the subject of Air Canada passes and the Canadian Transport Commission, been on successive Order Papers for approximately seven and one-half years (b) to the knowledge of the Government, was it one of the longest-standing questions left unanswered to date and, if so, for what reasons?

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): The information requested, if existing, might be available in the Index and Reference Branch of the House of Commons. See also Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Fifth Edition, Citations 357 and 363.

MARITIMES FOREST RESEARCH CENTRE, FREDERICTON, N.B.

Question No. 443—Mr. Howie:

Is there a contemplated date for completion of the Maritimes Forest Research Centre at Fredericton, New Brunswick and, if so, what is it and what is the current estimated cost of the project?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Public Works): The Maritimes Forest Research Centre is part of a program involving shared common facilities with three other establishments. The research facility portion of the complex is scheduled for completion in February, 1986, at a cost of $22.5 million.

CUTTING WOOD ON CROWN LANDS

Since January 1, 1983 were any new rules for cutting wood on Crown lands at the Acadia Forestry Station and Canadian Forces Base Gagetown implemented and, is allocation of such rights now made by tender?

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of the Environment): Since April 1, 1983 all cutting of wood on Acadia Forestry Station has been done by timber sales agreements which are issued after tender. Prior to that time, cutting was done by timber permits which were issued following an application from an individual. Since April 1, 1983, all new cutting and clearing on the military manœuvre area of Canadian Forces Base Gagetown has been done by timber sales agreements issued after tender. On the remainder of the base, timber permits are still used for the sale of timber and are issued to traditional operators for cutting on their traditional cutting areas.

CANADA TOMORROW CONFERENCE

Question No. 450—Mr. Howie:

To date what was the total cost of the Canada Tomorrow Conference and what were its purposes and objectives and did it achieve them?

Mr. Rolland Dion (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development and Minister of State for Science and Technology): The Government of Canada sponsored the "Canada Tomorrow" Conference to begin a process of consultation among Canadians who are developing, implementing and being affected by technological change.

The total cost of expenditures and commitments related to the "Canada Tomorrow" Conference was $651,000. Included in the figure are preparation for the Conference, the commissioning of research papers, administration for the conference and the production of the Conference follow-up materials: a summary, to be made available to the general public; and, a record of proceedings, collection of commissioned papers and hour-long videotape summary, to be sold to interested parties.

The Conference was successful in defining the critical issues of technological change. It was the first Conference to feature such extensive participation from the different sectors and was the beginning of an ongoing process of exchange.

Did the Department of the Environment agree to assist the Banff water supply system and, if so, what was the cost of the assistance?

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of the Environment): As owner of the Banff water supply system, the Department of the Environment is responsible for its funding. The current estimated cost of the funding is $3,800,000.

CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY

Question No. 557—Mr. Ogle:

1. With reference to the annual report of the Canadian International Development Agency under "Special Contributions" did the Agency make such contributions to the International Atomic Energy Agency and, if so, did such contributions rise from nil three years ago to $400,000 in 1980-81 and to $520,000 in 1981-82?

2. For what purposes are these contributions used?

3. Are these contributions consistent with the Agency's mandate?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Canada along with other donor countries has been a member of the Technial Assistance and Co-operation Fund of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) since 1962. The Fund's mandate is to promote the transfer of theoretical and practical knowledge on the utilization of atomic energy for peaceful purposes and to assist developing countries in improving the efficiency and security of their activities in the atomic energy field. Particular fields of activity covered by projects administered by the Fund are general atomic energy development, nuclear physics, nuclear chemistry, prospecting, mining and processing of nuclear materials, nuclear engineering and technology, the application of isotopes and radiation in agriculture, medicine, biology, industry and hydrology and safety in nuclear energy.

In the statistical annex of CIDA's Annual Review 1981-82 the line "special contribution" is a mistake. Special contributions to the Technical Assistance and Co-operation Fund have not been made since 1978. However, a Canadian "special contribution" for technical assistance was given to the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), an independent intergovernmental organization under the aegis of the United Nations, in the total amount of Canadian $300,000 payable in three equal installments, one in 1977 and two in 1978.

2. This "special contribution" was used to support several projects in developing countries in the fields of agriculture and medicine, these projects having been approved by the IAEA but for which no funds were available under the Agency's (i.e. IAEA) technical assistance program.

The amount of $ .32 million for 1979-80 shown in the Annual Review represents Canada's regular annual contribution to the Technical Assistance and Co-operation Fund of the IAEA. This figure should show on the above line "International Atomic Energy Agency" and in line with $ .40 million for 1980-81 and $ .52 million for 1981-82.

3. Membership in the Technical Assistance and Co-operation Fund of the International Atomic Energy Agency falls within CIDA's mandate to support multilateral technical co-operation efforts.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1984-85

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacLaren that Bill C-21, an Act to provide borrowing authority, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone).

Mr. McRae: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Just before the House adjourned at one o'clock, I had risen at the end of the speech made by the Hon. Member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker) to ask a question. I understand that he will accept questions and we have not had a 10-minute question period after his speech. I wonder if we could have that period before you recognize the next Hon. Member, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: A 10-minute question and commentary period is allowed after the speech made by the Hon. Member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker). Does the Hon. Member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone) agree to this provision?

Mr. Malone: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McRae: Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in a number of points which the Hon. Member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker) made, but I am particularly interested in what he has said on other occasions as well dealing with moving coal that has very low sulphur content from the Kootenays, British Columbia and presumably Alberta to markets in eastern Canada for hydro purposes and the like. I am interested in those remarks for three reasons. The first reason I am interested in is that if we are to do something serious about acid rain, we will have to use the kind of coal to which the Hon. Member refers rather than the coal with high sulphur content which we are buying from the United States.

Second, I agree with the Hon. Member that the coal to which he refers is a Canadian product. If there is no great difference in cost, particularly when adding in the cost of reducing the sulphur content of the American coal to prevent acid rain, I would be very interested in seeing his coal brought to market in the east.

The third reason I am interested, and I must say this very strongly, is that we in Thunder Bay have developed a major coal terminal. If we were to move coal through that terminal the way I think we would, that coal terminal would become almost as large as the one in Vancouver. Certainly jobs on the railways in Atikokan, Thunder Bay and throughout the country would be created if this happened.

I think we on this side of the House are very interested in the kind of proposition made by the Hon. Member. I would ask him if he can give us a little more detail than he has furnished up to now regarding the expected costs of this operation, bearing in mind that some very large savings can be made, particularly in terms of environmental savings and savings through the creation of jobs. If those jobs are not created, we will have to use the UIC and other forms of federal assistance to support the people who will not have those jobs. If we can create more jobs, it will be a great advantage. I would ask the Hon. Member to give us a little more detail on this subject.

Mr. Parker: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to answer the question put to me by the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay-Atikokan (Mr. McRae). There has been an extensive study done on this matter by the United Mine Workers of America, District No. 18, being the Submission on Canadian Use of Western Canada Coal of June 15, 1983. That study was presented to the Ministry of Transport which has been looking at it. From the information which was supplied to us through a conference of coal producers and others, that Department is looking at the possibility of a requirement for a subsidy in the neighbourhood of about $23 a tonne.

At the present time about three million or four million tonnes of western Canada coal is coming from Byron Creek and Alberta and going to Ontario. That coal is mainly being shipped to eastern Canada for blending in order to stop the kinds of things we are talking about with regard to acid rain. As the Hon. Member knows, we are shipping some coal from the west at the present time but another 16 million tonnes of coal with tremendously high sulphur content is coming in from the United States.

As the Hon. Member has stated, this scheme would do away with a large amount of unemployment. We would also have the opportunity of blending coal to meet the needs of Ontario Hydro and steel mills in Ontario. As well, we know at this time that some contracts contain minimum and maximum clauses, and even if we were dealing with the minimum clauses in those contracts, we could immediately begin, to ship in the neighbourhood of another five million tonnes of coal from western Canada, whether it be from British Columbia, Alberta or Saskatchewan.

Dealing with the specific questions asked with regard to acid rain, those answers are not available to us. We do know that it makes sense to deal with the cause rather than the effect of using dirty coal. As I suggested, the coal we are using produces sulphur emissions of 800 per cent whereas the coal in western Canada has a sulphur content of .05 per cent. The coal that is coming in from the Appalachians has a sulphur content of anywhere between 4 per cent and 5 per cent. The ramifications and opportunities are tremendous.

In the communities of the Kootenays and in Alberta resolutions were put before the committees requesting that a study be done on the cost of transporting this coal, and that the study look at the possibility of the cost being shared equally. If we are talking about a $23 subsidy on the transportation of coal, $7.50 would be charged to the consuming province, $7.50 would be charged to the producing province, and the third $7.50 would be charged to the federal Government, which would help to solve the acid rain problem. That is the kind of study we would like to see put forward. I hope I was able to answer the Hon. Member's question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. May I appeal to Hon. Members that they keep both their questions and their responses brief and to the point in keeping with the guidelines.

Mr. McRae: Mr. Speaker, I ask the Hon. Member if he could supply a copy to our office of that particular study which he appears to have in his hand. I would be very interested in receiving it. That is the United Mine Workers' study.

Mr. Parker: I would be very happy to do so.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If there are no further questions, we will now proceed with debate. The Hon. Member for Dollard (Mr. Desmarais).

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I was recognized.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Yes, the Chair realizes that Mr. Speaker did recognize the Hon. Member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone). I had forgotten that. I do now recognize the Hon. Member for Crowfoot.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The job of French translation and interpretation will be made much easier now if I can say something.

I would like to address the question of the borrowing in which our country has become involved by starting out with the perspective that this country is unique in the world. It ought not to have the economic problems it does. This is a resource-rich nation, one which has been blessed with virtually every resource one could possibly imagine. We are wanting in almost nothing. We have an educated population, we have standards of health, transportation and communication which should advance this nation very much into the forefront of the industrialized nations of the world. Yet, Sir, it is against this background that we recognize that Canada, with all of this enormous natural wealth, is borrowing at a rate parallel to that of Brazil, Mexico and other Latin American countries. Our debt, Sir, is one of the highest of the industrialized nations. We are a country which borrows, borrows and borrows.

In this particular Parliament, we have had presented to us Bill C-30 for $12 billion; Bill C-59 for $14 billion; Bill C-111 for $6.6 billion; Bill C-125 for $7 billion; Bill C-128 for $4 billion; Bill C-143 for $19 billion; Bill C-151 for $10.71 billion, and now we are debating Bill C-21 for the highest amount, that is, $29.55 billion. That is a total of $102 billion of borrowing in one Parliament. While I recognize that that amount is to be spread over a four-year period, the truth of the matter is that we are borrowing more in this particular Bill than the sum that made up the total budget of the Government when the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) came to power. We are borrowing more than double that amount.

Most people in the private sector of Canada are intuitively aware that borrowing is not automatically wrong. However, when we borrow for the purposes of making money it has much more credence than borrowing just for our common pleasure. It makes sense for a farmer to borrow to expand his land base or to buy machinery and for a store owner to borrow to expand his operation because they are borrowing on an economic principle, which is to make their equity grow.

This Government is now, Sir, borrowing to pay for the debt of its past borrowings. One-third of the tax dollars collected are used to pay the service of our national debt. Every time a taxpayer anywhere in Canada pays $3 to the Government of Canada, one of those dollars is used to pay interest on that accumulated borrowing. We have become a part of a treadmill of debt from which this Government has found no way to remove itself.

We are now some $180 billion in total debt as a nation. One of the difficulties, which I find, Sir, is that while the notion of democracy is something which is near and dear to the hearts of most Canadians, and while the concept of democracy implies that the people govern themselves, we are now dealing with numbers so large that on these issues the people, in essence, simply give up. They do not know what a billion dollars is and they do not know the implication of the increase from $15 billion of borrowing to $29.2 billion of borrowing. Therefore, in some attempt to simplify it, or at least to make it understandable, let me underline just how much a billion dollars is. A billion dollars means that if you spent $100 a minute for every minute of every hour for 24 hours a day for seven days a week, it would take you 19 years to spend a billion dollars. That, Sir, is the magnitude of that number.

Yet, Sir, Canada is locked in in an undisciplined way to the American economy following the difficulties here, which are also present in that nation. That nation has a debt which will approach $1.8 trillion by March of 1985. The amount is so staggering that people cannot use the latex of their minds to stretch around its circumference. But that debt, Sir, means that if $1,000 bills were stacked one on top of the other, it would make a column going up into the sky that is 120 miles high. As a Member of Parliament from Alberta, every time I fly between my constituency and Ottawa, I am flying at a height of approximately 40,000 feet. That seems to me like a long way up. Yet, that distance is just a little more than seven miles. If we ran into that column of the debt of the United States there would be still 117 miles of debt above us. All I can say is that we are dealing with numbers that are enormous in scope.

North America must get off the treadmill of borrowing, at least borrowing to the extent we are now. Generally speaking, we have taken the perspective that we can borrow in a healthy economy up to about 2 per cent of our Gross National Product. Canada today is borrowing between 5 per cent and 8 per cent of our Gross National Product. The ratio of debt to the strength of our economy is such that we are certainly extending ourselves beyond the capacity of our GNP to grow. That is the important fact to bear in mind, because when we borrow to improve our standard of living today, we are mortgaging the future of tomorrow's generation. If we borrow beyond the capacity of the Gross National Product to grow, future generations will be born with a debt. A new citizen born today inherits a debt of about $1,700 at the moment of birth. This treadmill must be broken, because this borrowing of $29 billion is such that it creates a real hardship for our citizens today and for those to come tomorrow.

A speaker from the Government side projected earlier today the view that the purpose of the borrowing was, to a large extent, to provide make-work projects through Canada Works,

New Horizons projects and community development programs, and is therefore justified. I suggest to him—I believe it was the Hon. Member for Lachine (Mr. Blaker)—that he read the latest issue of Time Magazine, that of March 5, 1984, which talks about the deficit and borrowing in the U.S. The simple conclusion one can draw from that article is that there are three specific areas in which borrowing does significant damage to a free enterprise economy: the effect on interest rates, employment and inflation.

We have to recognize that it is not only governments that borrow money. The private sector, farmers, fishermen, businessmen and manufacturers, all seek ways to increase their capital. However, when the Government goes to the market and asks for $29.2 billion, it has the effect of driving up interest rates for everyone else. That is precisely the situation we are in today. Interest rates, while lower than a year ago, are still artificially high, certainly when compared to the average over the past decade. The real creators of wealth, the private sector, are attempting to build their businesses and create jobs, but they cannot do that efficiently because the Government has taken all the cheap money for Government services, which is the least efficient use of capital. Because interest rates are up there has been a decrease, as the statistics show, in the establishment of new businesses, with a resulting negative impact on employment in Canada.

As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member across the way took the position that when the Government borrows money, we are able to supply make-work projects. I, like other Members, will apply for the money for make-work projects in my constituency when it is there, but I hope the day will soon arrive when we no longer have make-work projects, because it does not do us any good to pay a student to paint a hall somewhere after which he is out of work again. What we need to do is to build permanent factories, create permanent jobs, which in turn creates the wealth from which the Government collects tax dollars. That is the way you pay for the social needs of this country. We have to build a bigger pie.

I do not understand for a single moment how the little island of Japan, with a few resources such as fish, tin and nothing else except an educated people, has the second largest economy in the world. Sir, I started that sentence wrong. I said I do not know how. Well, I do know how. They do it through productivity; their people work. But what do we do here? We create every stumbling block you can imagine to discourage people from working. We put interest rates up so high that no one is going to borrow money to develop his business. We have Revenue Canada which acts as though it were the Gestapo, chasing people to try to gather the money for the Government of Canada to spend. When you see the frustration of constituents in trying to deal with the Government, trying to get through the red tape and inefficiencies, knowing that when they pay their taxes $1 in every $3 goes to pay for past borrowings, it is no wonder the economy is grinding down.

It makes you wonder what the Japanese would do if they ever got hold of this country. Here we are, Sir, blessed with an educated people, one third of the world's fresh water, tremendous natural resources, and we cannot put our act together. It seems to me the message is clear: there is something wrong with the Government because the management of this country is obviously faltering.

It would be interesting, Mr. Speaker, if we could get more Liberals to speak on this issue. We have $29 billion in borrowing authority being sought, and hardly any of them stand up to comment. To repeat, economists generally agree that we can safely borrow up to about 2 per cent of our Gross National Product. We can borrow more when we have an expanding GNP. But here we are hovering around 5 per cent to 8 per cent of the GNP and the money is not being used for productive purposes.

It behooves me to say we are on the Turner turnpike. It was the former Minister of Finance, John Turner, who started us on this road. He introduced the greatest spending of any Minister of Finance to that date in history. It was John Turner who gave us the largest debt we had until that time. It was his Budget which compelled succeeding Ministers of Finance to take the same road. Therefore, while there are those who would appreciate not having a Liberal leadership convention, who believe that John Turner should simply be anointed leader, the truth is that this country is in this desperate economic position because of John Turner. He started us down that road, and the Government has been going in that direction ever since. We have failed to pay our debts. As a nation, we believe falsely that the next generation could pick up this debt. Some day the pillars will crumble, the economy will collapse, and the future generation will have to pay the debt. People in private life recognize that.

Governments have two hopes. The first hope they have is that there will be a period of extended inflation. That is one way to cure a debt. Certainly it is an unsatisfactory hope to have. The other hope is that there will be a total collapse of the economy. I should add that there is a third hope, which is that the bills will be paid. In 16 years there has been no effort made by the Government to take the position of paying its bills. The debts continue to grow, and today we are just short of $200 billion in total accumulated debt.

I see you are giving me a high sign, Mr. Speaker. It would be most unfortunate if I were cut off now as I am not yet through the first two pages of my comments. I am just warming up to what the Government is doing to us. We must bear in mind that Canada is now one of the world's most indebted nations. We rank with Brazil and Mexico. We are indebted on a larger percentage of our total wealth than are most other nations in the world.

Earlier in my speech I said that by March of 1985 it is projected that the United States will have a debt of $1.8 trillion. That is a column of $1,000 bills 120 miles high. Members on the Government side may shrug and suggest that that is not the debt in Canada. There are well over 200 million people in the United States and only about 24 million in Canada. Canada's per capita debt is 50 per cent higher than that in the United States. Based on a per citizen average, our debt is much higher than theirs.

I have caught sight of your signal, Mr. Speaker, and I will sit down soon. It is interesting that for four years the United States has made every effort possible to turn around its debt situation. That is largely a measure of the campaign which is going on now. My final comment is that Canada must get control of its debt. It must decrease the amount that it is borrowing, or an unnecessary peril will befall all of tomorrow's children of this great and blessed land. They should not have to bear that burden.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I was very impressed with the opening comments of the Hon. Member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone) when he stated that we are wanting in almost nothing. Those were his actual words. I agree that this is a great nation with a tremendous future, tremendous human and natural resources, good government, good social programs and a safety net put in place by a Liberal Government. We have a safety net for society for the difficult times brought on by a world recession, one which served us well prior to the recovery. To date it has produced something like 424,000 jobs in Canada.

Could the Member explain why, during the two years prior to the Diefenbaker years, the percentage of debt compared to the GNP was 2 per cent lower than in the Tory years and then dropped off dramatically in the later sixties? Even this year it is only 1 per cent above those Tory years of the late fifties and early sixties.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, neither the past nor past administrations are important. The economy is important and so is how wisely we steward that economy and how well we create jobs. Whatever the Hon. Member might be attempting to project, save the extreme world-wide recession of the 1930s, we have never had an unemployment situation in the country which matches the one we have now. Employment opportunities will be redressed when the private sector of the nation begins to put in place permanent, long-term jobs. That will only take place when we back away from government involvement in the private sector, when there is trust in Revenue Canada, and when the borrowing on the international markets is not competing to such a significant extent to drive interest rates up as to curtail the investments of the private sector and to hold down the opportunities of employment in the country.

I know the Hon. Member from his good constituency of Lambton-Middlesex (Mr. Ferguson). I believe he would be one of the first to recognize and admit outside the House that it is time we began to encourage efficiency and permanent employment by a stimulus of the private sector. That will come about, irrespective of what the past may have been, by Canada's addressing itself to a policy which recognizes that to be the engine of our economy and by attaching ourselves to a policy which makes us stronger and more economically independent of any one nation. Until that is done we will not be a leader as Japan and others have been able to be.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a comment and then ask a question of my hon. friend and colleague. The Hon. Member mentioned that to repay the billions of dollars we are borrowing we are taking $1 out of every $3 collected. That is an excellent way to put it. Because of this we are unable to carry out some programs. We are unable to give women between 50 and 65 a decent living and we are allowing them to exist on welfare. This not only prevents us from doing certain things, but it requires the Government to do certain things.

I refer particularly to that excellent railway line between Dinosaur and Stettler which serves scores of farmers in a wonderful grain growing and cattle raising country. There is now talk of closing that railway and leaving those farmers with the enormous expense of having to travel extra miles. This will ruin the lives they have planned for themselves.

If we are to get rid of this borrowing and live within our means does the Hon. Member think we would have to close excellent railway lines such as the one from Dinosaur to Stettler?

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I will go even further than my good friend and neighbour, the Hon. Member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor). I will say that the railway line ought to remain open from Dinosaur to Fertile junction. It serves 108 miles of line through 10 very vibrant communities. Should that railway line be abandoned, it will decrease the net income of more than 1,000 permit holders along that line. As their net income is decreased, so is their capacity to pay tax. It will add to their expense because they will then have to make long hauls. Some of those hauls will be in the neighbourhood of 50 to 55 miles from the more central points. When net incomes are decreased and less revenue comes to the Government of Canada the instinct of the Government is to borrow more money. This becomes a perpetual treadmill.

Obviously any railway has to stand on its own merit. There has been a rationalization across the Prairies of many of the old railway lines. I do not argue with that. In my riding there has been abandonment of more lines and miles of railway than in any other riding on the Prairies. In all probability it is a railway line that will become profitable by 1985 on the basis of the new rates, coupled with the new production of grain, which has been increasing at a rate of 40 per cent in the last five years. That amount will double in the next five years largely because of the new development with solonetzic soils in that area. I can document the fact on the basis of information from resource people in the area that, without equivocation, it will be a paying railway line that ought to stay in place. I say that it will make money for Canada, which will decrease our need to borrow. It is an excellent idea that the Hon. Member for Bow River but forward, and I appreciate it.

• (1600)

Mr. Parent: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I misunderstood what the Hon. Member said. We are dealing here with a principle. I believe he said that the Government should get out of the lives of businesses and let them do their work, which is creating jobs and so on. What would the Hon. Member do about tax credits which are given to small and large businesses with regard to their capital costs? Would he also eliminate that type of subsidy, if you will, granted by the Government to business?

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member commenced by asking me the question on the basis of principle. I will first answer it on the basis of principle because it will be necessary to separate what I say from any specific case he may raise. The answer, purely on principle, would be yes. It would be necessary to get away from subsidies because, by their very nature, they create inefficiency. If he wants to extract that statement and use it against me in some future election, he can do so at the risk of breaching his own principle.

Let me go further and say that we all recognize that since certain regions of the country are more disadvantaged than others, there are systems which are put in place from the municipal to the federal level that do not simply take the bottom line into account. This is done because we care about people. Therefore, there are railway lines that extend to places that are not efficient. There are mines operating in places that are not efficient. However, when the question is asked purely on the basis of an economic principle, the answer is yes, let us not provide subsidies but, rather, let us make businesses stand on their own feet.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The time for questions and comments has expired.

Mr. Louis R. Desmarais (Dollard): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make one point with respect to Bill C-21, which deals with the borrowing authority of the Government. This entire debate relating to our borrowing authority boils down to one question: is the Government's approach to encouraging economic recovery the proper approach? In other words, from a global point of view, will the expenditures of the Government as provided for in the current Budget encourage the recovery of our economy? I believe that our Budget will lead to economic recovery.

There are various ways in which we can look at this problem. I find it far too easy to single out certain items in the Budget and indicate that they are not sufficient or wrong. It is far too easy for us to ignore the medium or long-term effects of the benefits of a Budget, particularly the one we are studying today.

Naturally, we are looking toward a reduction in our deficit, as is any Member of the Opposition. We would like to see the deficit eradicated as soon as possible. There is more than one way to approach this problem. One approach is to slash expenditures and cut various programs, with the eventual hope of arriving at a balanced set of books. We do not believe in that approach. We believe that the only way to balance our Budget is by improving the productivity of the country to the point where revenues will increase in an amount sufficient to meet our expenditures. Increased productivity is also necessary in order to improve our competitive position in the world. We face problems if we cannot sell our products around the world.

The main purpose of our Budget is to increase productivity. We intend to do this by proposing several measures. First, we will attempt to simplify the tax system. As Hon. members are aware, that system has become so complicated that even our expert tax lawyers will no longer give an opinion on it. Second, we will attempt to initiate steps that will increase confidence in the country, including that of the private sector and of investors whom we will try to entice to Canada. At the same time we want to establish some confidence in the workers of the country. In that respect we will improve our pension system.

One of my objectives when I came here five years ago was to examine the possibility of improving the lot of Canadians over the long term. I recognized full well that we had become far too dependent on the state and that this could not continue over the long term.

I am very proud to have served as vice-chairman on the task force on pension reform, and am deeply grateful to the Government for accepting our recommendations, which will help Canadians to help themselves. They provide the means and the mechanism by which Canadians can look after their own problems in old age. In the next ten or twenty years I think the items contained in the Budget with respect to pension reform will be of great, great benefit to this country.

By encouraging our youth, which we are doing through measures in the Budget, I think we are at the same time improving productivity. By increasing the security we are offering to home owners through an insurance scheme which will guarantee interest rates that home owners will be paying we are increasing confidence and productivity.

Some of our sales tax changes will improve the climate for business. We are proposing some tax assistance for employee profit participation plans, which is another way of improving productivity. We are proposing tax assistance for employee stock option plans, which is yet another improvement to productivity.

In short, the fact that the debate has come this far is testimony that Members opposite, to my mind, have either not read the Budget or, if they have, have not understood it. I think that because we are asking for borrowing authority based on a Budget which is reasonable and predicated on arriving at the same end as that proposed by Members opposite, it is a waste of time to discuss the amounts involved in it, because these have nothing to do with what will be spent. That will come through in the Estimates. I rest my case, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I have only one question for the Hon. Member for Dollard (Mr. Desmarais). I noted with some interest, a reference he made, I presume, to himself and to his Party. This is as close to a direct quote. I believe he said "We, just as much as anybody in the Opposition, want the deficit decreased."

In light of that statement, why is it that during every fiscal year borrowing has increased save in 1979 when the Conservative Party was in power? Why is it that each year the amount has increased, if we are to believe that Members opposite as much as anyone else want the debt to decrease?

Mr. Desmarais: Mr. Speaker, I think the question put by the Hon. Member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone) has to be taken in relative terms. When he says that the deficit has increased every year, I do not think he is correct. In some years, for instance in 1979, 1980 or 1981, it decreased as a percentage of the Gross National Product. I think the deficit has been increasing since then because of the recession we have been through. There is nothing wrong with that. Governments are there for that purpose. I do not think the Hon. Member is correct in saying that the deficit has increased year by year without fail.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member spoke about increased productivity. We have had an excellent record of job creation since the recovery began. Has this job creation reflected on export surpluses? Is there any trend toward increased exports in 1984, bearing in mind that there has been a dramatic increase in permanent job creation and in increased productivity?

Mr. Desmarais: Mr. Speaker, unless I am mistaken I believe the December figures show that our trade surplus was of the order of $2 billion, which is the highest figure in history for any given month. That very clearly equates to jobs and it is an achievement we have to keep up. That is really what I think our Budget is doing. It is essential and very important that we continue to create jobs. I see the Hon. Member for Crowfoot has another question.

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Hon. Member for Dollard (Mr. Desmarais). He just indicated that the surplus was $2 billion for exports. Does he have any idea how much of that is attributed to the export of heavy oil to the United States because Canada does not have the refining capacity for heavy oil?

Possibly while the Hon. Member is on his feet, could he also indicate to us why it is that in Canada there has not been the up-turn with regard to the creation of jobs that there has been in the United States and that Canada's unemployment figures are still rising? We have still not replaced the jobs we lost in the early part of the depression that we have just experienced.

Mr. Desmarais: Mr. Speaker, I do not have the answer to the first part of the Hon. Member's question. I do not know how much heavy oil was included in export sales to the United States.

As to the second part of his question, my information is that we have created some 440,000 jobs in the last year. However, our work force is increasing at a faster rate than we are creating jobs. But we are proposing to create 1.5 million jobs within the next six or seven years. Hopefully, that will bring unemployment down to a level which is more respectable.

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, If there are 1.5 million people unemployed today, and taking into account the number of young people entering the labour force each year, amounting to close to 300,000 to 400,000, if we are going to create 1.5 million jobs in the next six or seven years, that would indicate, would it not, that we will have higher unemployment at the end of seven years than we have today?

Mr. Desmarais: Mr. Speaker, my recollection is that the percentage of unemployment in the year 1987 will be something like 8 per cent, compared with 11 per cent or 12 per cent today. I am not sure that the figure of 400,000 youth, which the Hon. Member says is entering the labour force each year, is correct. If it is, it means we will be creating more than that many jobs each year.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I am tempted to say that I have just one more question, but I have already said that and then changed my mind.

I have a question for the Hon. Member, who is attempting to defend the Government's borrowing, and I give him credit for that attempt. How does he justify or what does he presume is the reason that the per capita debt in Canada in 50 per cent larger than that in the United States?

Mr. Desmarais: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that we are not comparing apples with oranges. The manner in which they calculate the debt in the United States may not be at all the way in which we calculate it here in Canada. I would like to get a little more advice on that subject before I answer the Hon. Member's question.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacLaren that Bill C-21, an Act to provide borrowing authority, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Mr. Speaker, here we go again! For the eighth time since the last election the Government is before Parliament asking for more borrowing authority. This time the borrowing Bill is the largest in Canadian history. Just a moment ago the Hon. Member opposite asked if they were not doing something right. They are doing everything wrong.

In the first session of this Parliament the Government came to us seven times for additional borrowing authority. That is truly a remarkable record of fiscal management, accountability and responsibility.

On May 10, 1983, during debate on the last borrowing Bill I noted that the Government had approached the House only three weeks after bringing in a Budget which added $31 billion to our existing gross national debt of a staggering, and I say staggering, $134 billion. With this Bill it wants to increase that burden by an additional $14.7 billion. As I said, here we go again! Three weeks after the Budget, the Government is seeking to borrow an amount which is almost equal to the entire gross debt of $31 billion when the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) took office. Now the Government wants $29.55 billion.

This borrowing should be exactly halved to make any sense whatsoever. It should be no more than $15 billion. Right now there is $5 billion in their till. It is more than enough to take these wastrels to November 1 at least. What an accomplishment this Government has! What a legacy the Prime Minister leaves to his successor, to all Canadians and to our future generations! Our children are buried in debt, inundated. That is what it is all about.

As I said, the Government does not really need the money because a new Government Leader, unfortunately a Liberal, will take office shortly after June 17, and this Government's Budget will no longer be the Budget of the Government. Leadership candidates in Liberal ranks are already making statements about government waste and profligacy. The two of them walked right into that trap the other morning. We heard the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) take them apart inch by inch and piece by piece. The Minister of Justice (Mr. MacGuigan), of all people, said that the Government's response to problems was to throw money at them. The Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development (Mr. Johnston) questioned universal programs. It was not us, it was the Government. We are the Party of free enterprise with a social conscience.

What could happen to the country? The new leader could go to the people in August, which of course would mean the election of a new Progressive Conservative Government. Or he could wait, prevaricate and finally go in 1985, and obviously the new Leader would not need money then because he would have to bring in a new budget anyway. The most we on this side of the House could countenance is $15 billion.

Bill C-21 provides the authority to borrow up to an additional $29.55 billion. Of the $29.6 billion projected deficit, only $25.55 billion must be borrowed, after taking into account non-budgetary sources of $4.05 billion. It was not long ago that C. D. Howe said, "What is a million?" The new C. D. Howe of this era is P. E. "What's a Billion" Prime Minister. What is a billion? the Hon. Member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone) gave his definition of it. I should like to give a few examples to Canadians as well in terms that even a Prime Minister with no interest in economics whatsoever could understand.

A billion minutes ago Christ was walking on earth. A billion hours ago our ancestors lived in caves. A billion dollars ago was last week in terms of the way the Government sees things. What about $31.5 billion? Laid end to end in a line, that many dollar bills would stretch for three billion miles, or the equivalent of 304 round trips on the Trans-Canada Highway, or six round trips to the moon. On the other hand, 31.5 billion one dollar bills, stacked one on top of the other, would reach a height of 108 miles. Stacked separately, the Government could put 317 piles of dollar bills as high as the CN Tower in various cities and towns across Canada. Simcoe South could use one of those piles because it did not receive a cent from the Special Employment Initiatives Program, the slush fund of the Liberal Party. This is probably why the Government wants those extra $15 billion to $19 billion. All these towers could stand as monuments to Liberal fiscal irresponsibility. The House does not have to take my word for it. Hon. Members just have to read the reports of the Auditor General over the years of uncontrolled, runaway, profligate spending by the people across the aisle.

Bill C-21 is just another indication that the Government has given up on the concept of accountability. It needs no more than $15 billion, and it throws a red herring at us of $29.55 billion, part of a so-called $4 billion contingency fund. We are not told how this money will be spent. Will it be for one of those job-creation programs, which in reality is a job-replacement program? Will it be for another local initiatives program where every Liberal riding gets another poke at $500,000? The cracks are widening across the way. The Government would like to show us as being opposed to social programs when in reality we are the champions of them.

We are considering the largest borrowing Bill in the history of the country. The requirements in the Bill are equal to 91 per cent of forecast personal savings this year. The cupboards will be bare when the private sector comes looking for funds to expand, invest and create new jobs. We will be so poor if we let them go at it one more time that we will not be able to raise umbrellas. One more go with this outfit, and I just do not know what will happen to our wonderful country of Canada.

Even this is not the total picture. The phalanx of Crown corporations do not require special authority from Parliament to raise funds in financial markets, nor must they tell Parliament what their financial requirements will be. Deficit financing is the legacy of the present Prime Minister's Government.

The Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) stated the Liberal position quite clearly on February 22, 1983, long before we were thinking about this debate, when he told the House that "a deficit is no more and no less than an increase in future tax liabilities". He went on to say:

> The present economic situation being as it is, I believe that the best way to stimulate the economy and maintain the income support programs that are necessary in our economy is to use the deficit.

That is the philosophy of the Government. The Liberals have certainly used the deficit; however, the only thing that has been stimulated has been the deficit itself. By their policies our dollar is softer than pita bread dough.

As Hon. Members are aware, interest rates are now rising rapidly. Last week one-year Treasury bills moved from 10.44 per cent to 10.95 per cent, an increase of over 50 bases points or about one-half of one per cent. The present net federal debt matures within about 2.5 years and its essential following interest rate debt. The effect of last week's increase alone increased the cost of carrying the $150 billion net debt by $750 million. This "little" increase totally shattered the Budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde), in my opinion.

On a national accounts basis, spending has climbed from $12.6 billion in 1968, a year that I would like to forget, to an estimated $107.5 billion this year. That is an increase of 773 per cent. Most of that increase has occurred since the Liberals were re-elected in February 1980, believe it or not. Relative to fiscal 1979-80, spending has risen by 97 per cent on a national accounts basis. There has been 97 per cent increase in spending since that day in 1980 when the Prime Minister stated, "We will not allow the deficit to rise any higher from any new program we announce". Let us keep that high-sounding promise in mind as we review the situation today.

By the end of this fiscal year the gross debt will be $190 billion. It was $31 billion when the present Prime Minister took office. The net debt this year will be $150.7 billion compared with $17.7 billion in 1968. The Budget of three weeks ago will add $110.8 billion to the net debt over the next four years. Remember, we have an increase in excise tax coming in October. The net national debt will have quadrupled to $261.5 billion in only eight years. Is it any wonder they have no qualms about walking in here and asking for an extra measly $29.5 billion? Government spending is now 26 per cent of GNP. How silly can we get? The cost of servicing this shameful debt in fiscal 1983-84 is $18.1 billion, rising to $24.7 billion by 1988, an increase of 17 times the cost at the time when the Prime Minister took office.

In 1984-85, service costs will reach $20.4 billion, or $800 per capita, or $1,900 per taxpayer. As has been pointed out, this is double that in the United States. Is it any wonder that Revenue Canada must stoop to such depths to wring every dollar from Canadians and then some? The cases on my desk alone are horrifying.

The only difference between this Government and Jesse James is that the latter used a gun. People knew exactly what he wanted and how he planned to get it. With this Government, most Canadians do not have a clue where we are going or how we are going to pay the cost of getting there. As I said, this Bill does not tell us one thing about how the money will be spent.

The enormous cost of servicing the debt interferes with private sector borrowing. In the 1983 calendar year, federal Government borrowing accounted for 58 per cent of the net new security issues placed in Canada. This forces interest rates up for the private sector borrowers who must compete for what little is left after the Government gets its share. As long as this continues, there is no way that the private sector can bring about an enduring economic recovery. It is obvious that the Government cannot do it. The result is the economic quagmire in which we find ourselves.

In its submission to the Macdonald Commission on the economy, the Bank of Montreal points out the danger to private sector-lead growth stemming from the Government's deficit financing policy. It says that the most likely way to achieve higher rates of business investment over the medium term is to foster a decline in real rates of interest, a task that will be difficult to realize without a reduction in the federal Government's ever increasing claim on a limited pool of savings. It says also that without a reduction of the structural deficit, the resultant higher real rates could negate many of the tax incentives aimed at promoting business investment. John Bulloch of the CFIB pointed out another aspect of the problem in a speech last year when he said:

> We still have to face the fundamental fact that we are looking at core deficits in our society that cannot be financed unless we curb its costs. To try to tax people for that amount would blow us out of the water as an economic power in terms of competing with the United States.

Note the references to core and structural deficits. The huge debt has become a fact of economic life in Canada. It seems that these ever-increasing borrowing Bills are here to stay, at least until the next election. That is what 16 years of this Prime Minister's style of socialism has done for us, started by the man who has the desire to replace him. It is too late for a new Liberal leader to make any difference. What is needed is a new Progressive Conservative Government committed to reducing the deficit, getting spending under control and restoring confidence—a word that Members opposite do not know the meaning of—among the business community. In its 1983 year-end economic assessment, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce noted:

> In order to undertake long-term investment, business must be convinced that inflation and interest rates will not surge again. A clearly defined Government commitment to spending restraint and deficit reduction would go a long way toward providing an economic environment conducive to long-term business investment.

What is happening? We are standing here criticizing $29.55 billion more, directly the opposite. This Government policy will heap abuse on our future generations. Business would be hard pressed to get a commitment from a Government that comes to Parliament seven times in one session looking for more and more money.

What are those programs doing? They are a disaster for the country. Nor does the investment community have much faith in a government that continues to live so far beyond its means. Everyone knows what happens to the neighbour down the street who does that. It does not take very long. We are lucky that it is not a lot worse. They do not want to hold the currency that continues to be debased by excessive government borrowing. Interest rates remain high as the Government attempts to support the dollar, driving job-creating capital investment elsewhere. If you do not believe me, look at some of the big corporations of Canada to see where they are putting the money. Where are the oil rigs, et cetera? This is the situation today because the Government has not balanced its books since fiscal 1969-70, and it shows no sign of doing so in the future.

In the past 20 years, as was pointed out by one of my colleagues, only the Crosbie Budget contained measures to reduce the deficit in a significant way. The Liberals, by contrast, cast money at every problem they encounter. What happened to the promise of no gasoline tax over 18 cents a gallon, and I say gallon? Canadair and de Havilland for example, have cost Canadian taxpayers $2.6 billion to date. That sum of money would have bailed out every small business that declared bankruptcy in 1982. It has been proven beyond doubt that in the past two years, only the small business sector has created jobs. They do not understand that because they have never been there.

Today the federal Government spends money at the rate of $274 million per day, $11 million per hour or $190,000 per minute. Just think of how much was spent during the time that the Prime Minister was walking through the snow last week. It is a safe bet that he was not contemplating the economic mess that he is leaving to his successor. If his successor is the one I am thinking about, he is the father of deficit financing in the Liberal Party. Woe to Canada if that should ever happen.

Perhaps he was thinking about Petro-Canada, which is yours, mine and ours, or about the National Energy Program, which western Canadians do not think of as theirs. Perhaps he was thinking of the state of affairs in the fisheries, now state-controlled, the seal hunt, or the forestry sector of the economy working at a little better than half speed.

Maybe he was wondering how he could throw more money at these problems since they do not want to go away on their own. Crown corporations are a crock of that well known stuff that you and I know all about. There is no cost control, no firings for inconsistency or incompetence. Never. Who in CIDA got fired over the project in Haiti with the $25 million waste? Was the Prime Minister considering his successes with VIA Rail, Canadair, de Havilland, Challenger, Maislin and Dome? How much does Dome Petroleum owe in back income taxes? What about the state of our Armed Forces and the reduction of our commitment to NATO? I will bet that no part of that $29.55 billion even crossed his mind in those years. I doubt he gave these problems much thought. They have never been a priority of this Government in the past. From 1980 until today, a period in which the Canadian economy has experienced the worst depression since the 1930s, the Prime Minister has been out of the country a total of 187 days. His salary and expenses are somewhere around $130,700 per annum. The cost to the Canadian taxpayer in salary alone is $66,946 for his absence, not to mention private jets, gifts, meals and so on. In the same time period, the President of the United States had been out of his country a total of 36 days. He is looking after the shop.

Mr. Tobin: He is on vacation in Florida.

Mr. Stewart: You had your chance yesterday. If you would stand sideways, I could see the people between your ears. Today the United States is showing a strong recovery while Canada lags far behind. Perhaps if the Prime Minister had given more of his time to pressing domestic matters and less to globe trotting, we would not be in the shape that we are in today. Perhaps the Government would not be before us seeking almost $30 billion to pay for the misguided policies of the past. I would like to equate them to that slippery slide to socialism. Those policies have resulted in Canada having one of the largest deficits in the western industrialized world, and only Italy will have a proportionately larger deficit than Canada in 1984.

I have a great deal more to say about the OECD and where we stand in the western world, Mr. Speaker, but I see that you are indicating that my time is up. All I can say is that I do not intend to support any action that will make more money available to Liberal slush funds, and I urge all Hon. Members with any backbone at all to stop this crazy deficit spending and send this Bill back to its creators with a hearty amen. Canadians expect more.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I have both a comment to make and a question to ask. While I have not been sitting in my place in the House for the whole of the Hon. Member's speech, I listened very carefully to the last part of his speech while watching the television in the lobby. I would like to make the comment that it is with a great deal of sadness that we listened to a Member opposite making a speech about the Budget and, in an apparent fishing expedition in his own mind, trying to find any and all ways of levelling criticism at the Government and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). It is sad that the Hon. Member should foolishly, I think, choose to describe as a waste of time and money the activities and the peace initiatives undertaken by the Prime Minister all around the world on behalf of all Canadians.

I might mention, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister's peace initiative is one which has enjoyed the non-partisan support of the House. It is a peace initiative endorsed not only by Members on this side of the House unanimously but one which has been endorsed by Members of the NDP and endorsed quite strongly by the Hon. Member's own Leader, the Hon. Member for Central Nova (Mr. Mulroney). It is an initiative which has received the very strongest of all possible support from the former Prime Minister and former Leader of the Opposition, the Right Hon. Member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark), who has said repeatedly these last few months that the initiative is one that he believes has been undertaken by the Prime Minister in the most sincere way possible, that it is an initiative of Canada and of all Canadians and is one which he says deserves the support of all Canadians. I was pleased to hear the new Leader of the Opposition, the Hon. Member for Central Nova, echo in the House and elsewhere in Canada those sentiments. My comment, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must—

Mr. Tobin: My question, Mr. Speaker, is—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Hon. Member has made a comment. Again, I appeal to all Hon. Members in the House to make their questions or comments brief and to the point. The Hon. Member is going a little bit overboard in this case. Perhaps we should allow the Hon. Member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart) to respond, and if there is time, we will then return to the Hon. Member for Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe (Mr. Tobin).

Mr. Stewart: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will be very brief. Of all people, I do not think that the Hon. Member across the way should talk about a fishing expedition when he knows what has happened to the fishing industry in his province, when he knows how many unemployed there are in his province and when he knows that the only relief for those unemployed is the porkbarreling under the Local Employment Initiatives Program and a few other programs which have been implemented there for re-election purposes.

As far as the Prime Minister's peace initiative is concerned, I did not say one word against that and never would. I applaud the peace initiative taken by the Prime Minister. That has nothing to do with 187 days of travel. That peace initiative consisted of a few goods days well spent, and we still applaud it. I would like to say one thing to my hon. friend. If that initiative was so successful, why did the Prime Minister tender his resignation?

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I was about to question the Hon. Member's integrity regarding this debate, but nothing I could say could more vividly exemplify his narrow partisanship than the kind of deficient answer he has given. I knew that the vision was narrow but I did not know that it could be focused on a pinpoint. Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for allowing me this chance to comment on that spurious attack on a great peace initiative.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): I recognize the Hon. Member for Mississauga North (Mr. Fisher) on debate. Speeches are now to be 10 minutes long.

Mr. Douglas Fisher (Mississauga North): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise today. Before I begin, I wish to say that my father, Clancy Fisher, is currently a guest of the Canadian people and is enjoying a little stay at the University Hospital in London. I cannot think of very many better ways to see the Government spend its money than by making him comfortable in that marvellous institution. If we are going to talk about government spending today, I would like to dedicate my remarks to that great Canadian, my father, and wish him all the best on behalf of all of us.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fisher: I see that it is a non-partisan sentiment. I know that my father is watching today and that he will thank the Tory and NDP Members for the kind words they have just passed along.

Today, Mr. Speaker, we are debating a borrowing authority Bill. We are talking about government spending, and that takes us right to the heart of the political viewpoints and philosophies of each of the Parties in the Chamber. I think that in this pre-election period, it is important for us to note the general direction in which the given Parties would take the country. We do not have to turn to campaign rhetoric, to third-Party endorsements, or to some special economic analysis. We may turn right to the statements made by the individuals themselves in the Chamber. That is where we see how each Party would guide Canada if elected in the next general election. That is an analysis that I would like to undertake in the next few minutes.

Based upon its track record, I think it is clear that the Liberal Party believes in a partnership with the Canadian people. Members of the Liberal Party believe in a balance between what is needed and what is affordable. We believe that we should stimulate the economy in tough times, we should reach out to people who are in the greatest need, and we should use the country's resources as a blessing to cushion us when the rest of the world is having difficulty. That is the position taken by the Liberal Party.

The position taken by the Conservative Party is somewhat different. That position was revealed clearly by the remarks made by the last speaker. As we analyse those remarks, I think we will notice that Conservative Members love to wallow around in their love of money. It has gone beyond a desire for frugality and has become an obsession with Members on the other side. They love to pick out areas in which they think the Government can cut back and then to trumpet these from coast to coast. Again, we are in an analytical mood today. Let us note that Members of the Conservative Party cannot wait to hack and tear at the basic fibre of this marvellous country.

Let us look at what the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) said as quoted in The Toronto Star of February 21, 1984:

Crosbie told reporters that in order to get deficits down: "You have to be tough, mean and nasty and do all kinds of unpleasant things. That's why I'm not going to outline what they would be now. That's for a government to do."

What a marvellous position to be taken by a man who is a former Minister of Finance and who claims that he will be the next Minister of Finance!

Let us move one step further to another voice in the Tory Party, that of my neighbour, the Hon. Member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson). He said, as reported in Hansard on March 6, at page 1828—and you do not have to take my word for it, you can look it up—the following:

● (1650)
—there must be broad spending cuts—
—spending must be reduced in the broadest possible way—
—by cutting right across the board so that everybody would feel they had some involvement in the reductions that were being applied through an over all discipline.

Then he went on to say in that same speech that that is the way you do it in business. Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is the way you do it in business. I once worked in a business where they did it that way. The place went under within months. It is the dumbest possible approach to say that you can take that kind of meat axe and cut right across the board. The Hon. Member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn), another neighbour of mine, attacked the very heart of our support for the business and cultural communities in his speech on the Budget. He went after the CBC, VIA Rail, the post office, the energy grants, Canadair and de Havilland, and the Atomic Energy of Canada. He stopped only because his time ran out, and in each case it was attack-slash, attack-slash, attack-slash.

There was yet another example of what the Hon. Member for St. John's West was going to do in an article in The Toronto Star two weeks ago. The headlines were massive and shocking. He said at that time that he would introduce a means test to make sure that seniors and families did not get access to every government program that they have a right to enjoy.

All of this Tory attack is creating a clear image for the rest of the country. Again, do not take my word for it. Read what the observers themselves have to say. The Toronto Star on February 18 had this to say about the Hon. Member for St. John's West:

No wonder he isn't willing to tell Canadians before the next election how his Party would reduce the deficit.

So where is Crosbie going to cut? Is he going to cut the $10.4 billion going for pensions for the elderly, the $2.3 billion of family allowances, the $3.4 billion spent on welfare payments to the poor? Or will he cut into the $5.8 billion going to provincial governments for equalization. Or will he slash Ottawa's $7.7 billion share of the country's medicare and post-secondary education costs?

Within days the answer came from the Hon. Member for St. John's West. The answer to those questions was, yes, he would do that, and at least every Canadian in Toronto read the quote in the newspaper. They know where the Hon. Member for St. John's West and the frontbench Members opposite would take this country. Jamie Lamb of the Vanvouver Sun had the same kind of denunciation. He said on February 20:

As a result of Mr. Mulroney's activities last week, the public may begin to turn away from him. They may even choose the . . . policies of a party that at least plays at statesmanship, in preference to the trite trumpetings of rank opportunists.

That is what he said about the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney), and he is perfectly correct. Contrast that, Mr. Speaker, with what we heard from the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) today when he summarized his career as politics of compassion. Do we want to be ranked with the opportunists or do we want to be with those who have compassion? I say that compassion wins in that argument. Look at this Government's record. Over the past recession, this Government, along with Sweden, has preserved the social network in this country. We are one of the two countries in this world to preserve and expand the social network. We did not abandon it in the Tory slashing kind of way. We built it up when it was needed. We added to the guaranteed income supplement for seniors. We increased job-creation funds. We extended special help to businesses in trouble. We expanded resources for the Farm Credit Corporation. We renewed the Small Business Bond Program. We introduced a Canada Mortgage Renewal Plan for home owners. That, in the eyes of the Tories, is the wrong course. In the eyes of the Canadian people it is the right course.

It is the right course to offer people help when they need it with the rich, prosperous, productive land we live in. It is the right course to give our communities resources to those most in need. That is the Liberal approach and that is the approach I agree with. That is the approach of the politics of compassion about which we heard today. I say, begone to the rank amateurs, begone to the opportunists, begone to the people who want to slash and hack at the fibre of our country. Let us in the course of the next election turn again to those people, the Liberal Party, the people who want to build, preserve and add to our productivity and to the social network we have for the needy people in this country. I am proud to stand on that analysis and I believe it is an analysis that will drag down that bunch across the floor.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Questions, comments? Debate.

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, what we have before us this afternoon for consideration and debate is a simply shocking one-page piece of legislation. We in the law always used to say that when you have a bad case you just shout harder and you pound the table more than ever before.

Bill C-21 is a simple, unabashed, straightforward case. It is a straightforward request by the Government for parliamentary authority to go out and borrow $29.55 billion. I noticed that my hon. friend, who is just now leaving this House, did not once refer to the amount of $29.55 billion. It is more than the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) had included in his total Budget. I wonder if any person in the House can envisage just what the amount, the extent, the equivalent of $29.55 billion really is. That amount includes a $4 billion contingency fund. It is not earmarked to any source of production or social legislation. It is $4 billion by way of contingency which, by the record of this Government, will undoubtedly be spent and this Parliament will never know on what.

I am sure all Canadians have difficulty envisaging an amount of $29.55 billion. It was the amount of $4 billion which triggered the ringing of bells not so long ago which almost brought this Parliament to a halt. This borrowing is in an amount which each of us is trying to depict to our listening and reading audience. It is an amount which represents over 90 per cent of what all Canadians together, all across this land, will put away in savings in any single year. It is an amount, Mr. Speaker, approaching $3,000 for each Canadian taxpayer. It is, in short, Mr. Speaker, a staggering sum of money which simply cannot be justified. Cut it in half! Deficits were once the domain of accountants and economists. The ordinary Canadian paid little or no attention to what deficit financing was, until John Turner came along. In fiscal year 1971-1972, the deficit of this nation stood at $702 million. Four years later, just four years, that deficit was approaching $5.5 billion. Canada has not looked back since, except once. The sole exception was the fiscal year 1979-1980 when the Progressive Conservative Government addressed the problem of our national deficit and trimmed it by almost $800 million.

I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): The House will now proceed to Private Members' Business.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING GREYHOUND RACES

Mr. Raymond Dupont (Chambly) moved that Bill C-210, an Act to Amend the Criminal Code (greyhound races), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased with this opportunity to speak to Bill C-210, which I tabled in the House on December 20, 1983. The aim of this Bill is to amend Section 188 of the Criminal Code, and its title is: An Act to amend the Criminal Code concerning greyhound races.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, we do not often see private businesses prepared to invest $12 million without asking the Government for financial assistance. As far as job creation is concerned, 600 new jobs could be created in a project of this kind, which would promote the dog breeding industry in Quebec and several other Canadian provinces.

In terms of economic potential, Mr. Speaker, establishing the first greyhound track in Quebec on the South Shore, less than an hour's drive from a major urban centre with a population of three million, would have an impact, and people are inclined to forget this, on the use of public transportation on the South Shore. Second, Mr. Speaker, it would also have considerable bearing on the development of tourism and the necessary infrastructure, such as hotels, restaurants and all the accommodation, goods and services required within the immediate vicinity of a greyhound track.

Another important point, Mr. Speaker, would be the tax revenue this would generate. An undertaking of this size would generate tax revenue in the form of amusement tax and business tax in connection with race track operations. This would make it possible to generate greater regional activity in other areas. For instance, the town of St. Hubert alone could collect between $600,000 and $1 million in taxes. With one race track, the Provincial Government could collect over $20 million in taxes the first year.

On December 22, 1978, the Government of Quebec passed a Bill regulating lotteries, races, advertising contests and amusement parks, which, in addition to horse racing, allows all other kinds of racing, including greyhound races.

Mr. Speaker, the reason we must act quickly is that the United States might get ahead of us in this field. Only last weekend, Mr. Speaker, I read in the weekend press that a greyhound track was scheduled to open in the Vermont region at any time. As far as support for the plan in my region is concerned, it is coming from the Société pour le progrès de la rive sud, the town council of St. Hubert—a large town in my riding which 63,000 inhabitants—where the first greyhound race track could be located. There are also the Association touristique régionale du Richelieu, local business councils and so forth. It is unjustifiable that only men on horseback be given a monopoly over the racing industry in Canada. Greyhound races are not a new phenomenon in sports and leisure, Mr. Speaker. England is known as the world capital of horse racing and has over 150 greyhound tracks. Japan, France and Australia have some as well. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, on the continent in which we live, only our country, Canada, has a limited number of such tracks. That is most unfortunate because Canadian Racing Association surveys indicate quite clearly that the demand for this type of entertainment is very strong.

Mr. Speaker, it seems obvious to me that we cannot accept horse racing and bar greyhound racing without being openly unfair to greyhound racing enthusiasts, for reasons which are not immediately apparent, not to mention the fact that many Canadians take holidays to go and spend a lot of money in the United States, either in Florida or in New England. To those who might be tempted to say that this would be direct competition against existing race tracks, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that those two sports attract a very different clientele. I might mention one track at Wonderland Park, Revere, where horse racing revenues were considerably higher in 1979 than in 1978, although the two tracks are only 4,000 feet apart. In addition, Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer to statistics concerning pari-mutuel betting in Canadian race track operations in 1980. The gross amount of bets increased by more than 11.73 per cent over 1979. The total amount was $1.583 billion in 1980 against $1.724 billion in 1982, the latest year for which figures are available. Attendance has gone up by more than 4.73 per cent. The gross amount of prizes won increased by more than 12.36 per cent, provincial taxes by more than 15.03 per cent. There were 3.16 per cent more racing days and the average bet in each race also went up by 7.67 per cent in 1980, all that over 1979. Besides, Montreal's Blue Bonnets race track has opted for five racing days a week, with the result that the number of bets will go up, not down, which is exactly what is expected.

Mr. Speaker, I conclude my remarks by relating a significant fact concerning greyhound training with live animals. I am referring to the 1976 State Racing Rules of Greyhound Racing, page 16, paragraph E: "Live animals for training strictly prohibited and subject to permit cancellation". Here is an article written by Mr. Laurendeau in La Presse:

> Greyhound training has been updated in the past ten years and they now use an artificial lure—Jack-a-Lure—which has gained widespread acceptance. The greyhound's reaction is natural: as a born runner, it will go after any moving object. The State of Massachusetts has been supervising greyhound racing since the beginning in 1935 and the use of live lures is strictly prohibited. Penalties are provided, including suspension of the operator's permit. The United States National Greyhound Association management, made responsible for greyhound registration by the central Government, say that they have never heard of live lures being used to train greyhounds in the industry within the northern states. Only very isolated cases have been reported, mostly in Texas. As a matter of fact, according to the National Greyhound Association, the trend has been reversed over the past ten years (especially in the last four or five years) in favour of artificial lures. The situation is similar among Canadian breeders (mainly in Ontario and Quebec). The Greyhound Owner and Breeder Association claims that its 300-odd members use only artificial lures for training purposes. The Quebec Society for the Protection of Animals is to be commended for campaigning against animal cruelty. However, you somewhat hastily conclude that such treatment would be meted out by those who want to start greyhound races in Quebec.

For all those reasons, Mr. Speaker, I hope to have the unanimous consent of the House to amend Section 188 of the Criminal Code and make it possible to hold greyhound races in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I am glad some of us were awake in the House today when this Bill was brought forward. A few months ago we were caught napping in here and the Bill of the Member for Chambly (Mr. Dupont) was referred to committee without anyone making any speeches on it.

When I first heard about this Bill relating to greyhound racing, Mr. Speaker, I viewed it with a bit of alarm. I just could not imagine greyhounds racing down the highway. I thought this would pose a threat to the other traffic. Then I thought perhaps they would put in an oval track. However, it would be a little difficult if a couple of them went into the corner at the same time. Then I thought perhaps they would do this greyhound racing on a drag strip. It occurred to me that a vehicle as large as a greyhound would have great difficulty attaining any kind of speed in only one quarter of a mile. Then someone told me this greyhound racing referred to dogs and not to busses.

Being a prairie boy I am not terribly familiar with this type of dog. Out there we do not go in for strange looking long, tall, skinny dogs. We like real dogs such as huskies, shepherds or labradors. We do have dog racing out on the Prairies but we attach a whole bunch of them, usually huskies, to a sleigh and then someone chases them across 20 miles of snow-covered forest track in weather that is usually 20, 30 or 40 degrees below Celsius. I never found any attraction in watching an anorexic-looking dog chase a mechanical rabbit around a track for about 30 seconds.

I have been to Florida on one occasion a number of years ago but I was much more interested in spending time on the beach soaking up sun than going to dog racing. On another occasion a number of years ago, on a visit to Melbourne, Australia I saw people walking the streets with funny looking dogs with muzzles on. I was told they were racing dogs, but again it was something which did not offer any great attraction to me.

I must admit I find it difficult to be terribly serious about this bill. I know the Hon. Member has put a lot of thought into it. I listened to his comments. However, I really could not support a Bill of this nature. I think it is obvious from my comments so far that I find it difficult to get terribly serious about the introduction of dog racing into the country. I oppose it simply because we have enough gambling in the country. Within the last year or so we passed a Bill in the House, which was objected to by both Opposition Parties, which instituted a new form of gambling, which we are hearing about in the news in the last few days. That is just beginning to be set up. I am referring to the sports pool through which people will bet on hockey games on weekends.

To begin with, there is enough gambling in the country. People go to the racetrack and buy all of these silly lotteries. Some people are fortunate enough to win, but an awful lot more spend far too much on it. About a month or two ago when Lotto 6/49 was at its peak and everyone was going crazy over it, I was driving down the highway listening to CBC radio from Montreal. They were interviewing people who were lined up to buy these tickets. I heard a woman say she had already spend $240 that week on Lotto 6/49 tickets. One should not judge by the sound of a voice on the radiio, but I had the uneasy feeling that this woman could not afford to spend $240 on Lotto 6/49 tickets, or any other lottery tickets for that matter.

I believe the people who are setting up the sports pools are going to find that the lotteries market in Canada is saturated. I spoke a number of times with the former Minister who put the lottery Bill through Parliament. He assured me that the Department has done market surveys and feels it is going to bring about $80 million a year. To use an old line, "I am from Missouri and I am waiting to be shown". I really doubt the Government will make any money on that sports pool. Aside from the fact that there is too much gambling in the country, I do not think another form of gambling will succeed.

Another thing that concerns me about legalizing dog racing in Canada is the threat it offers to horse racing. In introducing the Bill, the Hon. Member for Chambly tried to offer a counterpoint to that. Horse racing is a fairly large industry in much of the country. In my home Province of Manitoba and in my constituency there are a number of people involved in horse racing. In the City of Winnipeg, the Assiniboine Downs racetrack has been in place for over 25 years. It is one of the more successful racetracks in the country. Even so, it has great difficulty staying alive, Mr. Speaker. In the Province of Manitoba horse racing is one, if not the largest, tourist attraction. Adding something which might threaten an already precarious industry is not in the best interest of what is already in place.

In the last year I met with a couple of people from my constituency who are active in the horse racing industry. They breed and train horses for the track. They told me they are finding it very difficult to stay alive. This is common to horse breeders throughout the province. If anything, they need help. They certainly do not need more competition for the entertainment dollar or the parimutuel betting dollar.

I do not have much more to say on this matter, Mr. Speaker. I will simply restate my position that we in this corner of the House oppose this piece of legislation for the two main reasons which I have pointed out. There is enough gambling in the country already, and we must be concerned about the existing horse racing industry in Canada.

Mr. Gordon Gilchrist (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how much I can add to this debate that has not been said by the last speaker with regard to the benefits and costs of adding more racing in Canada. Anyone who has attended racetracks in Canada has experienced the enjoyment, pleasure and thrill of watching a finely tuned and well developed animal charging around the track. You can go out for supper, watch the ponies, as they say, with the wife and kids, and really enjoy an evening out. You can put down a few dollars and maybe even make enough to pay for supper and an evening of fun and entertainment.

In addition to the enjoyment of horse racing in the country of the public in general, there is the support which horse racing gives to the agricultural base which it sustains in part. Direct or indirect employment is enjoyed by 50,000 people as a consequence of harness and thoroughbred racing in Canada. We should keep that very clearly in mind at a time when the agricultural community is being beset by many problems. At least this is one community to which we do not want to cause further distress.

That brings me to the point of dog racing. While dog racing may be a very enjoyable pastime for those who go to Florida where it has great acceptance, it is not the kind of sporting activity that we need in Canada because of the dilution factor it will cause the horse racing business here. Currently, Canada is beset with too many betting opportunities. There are too many lotteries and too many people putting down their diminishing supply of disposable income to buy tickets that have less chance of winning than being struck by lightning. It is tragic to see what people are spending their money on in lotteries today.

The Government of Canada has reneged on its past offers to get out of that business and leave it to the provinces, to help instead of hinder the lottery business and its effect on legitimate racing. It has got back into that business. There are more opportunities to bet and fewer people being sustained by these lotteries. There are people selling tickets and contributing absolutely nothing else to the economy of the provinces or the federal Government. The effect of this proposal for dog racing is diluting it even further.

Statistically, dog racing supports about one-tenth of a person for every dog that races, whereas in the horse business there are five people supported by every horse that is registered in racing. There is a far greater economic benefit to sustaining our harness and thoroughbred racing industry than there could ever be in adding dog tracks. Specifically, as far as the taxes are concerned, which was the point raised by the Hon. Member for Chambly (Mr. Dupont), the horse racing business in Ontario paid $62 million in direct taxes in 1982, taxes taken right off the handle that is bet at the tracks. In Quebec the taxes paid in 1982 were $31 million. That is a lot of money coming into provincial coffers.

What is not disclosed in those figures is the fact that that industry is in difficulty. The handle is dropping and the attendance at the track is dropping because of the economic downturn. This is no time to be adding more competition to that industry. In New Jersey and New York, where there has been a proliferation of race tracks, such as Meadowlands and other well known tracks, an examination would show that tracks are now closing. They are being turned into shopping plazas and other commercial developments. This is a tremendous loss of jobs to the community. There are far more jobs at the track than can be provided at a shopping centre.

I suggest that the Hon. Member for Chambly is doing his constituency and the area a great disservice at a time when Blue Bonnets needs less competition in the Montreal area. After all, Quebec is now down to four race tracks in total, and all of them are struggling. Blue Bonnets does not need further competition.

The greedy provincial governments should get their hands a little less in the pockets of the racetrack business and turn back a little more to the track so as to keep them healthy at a time of economic downturn. These 50,000 people who are supported by the industry need all the help they can get. I am talking about farmers who grow the hay and straw needed by the horses, about the farriers who shoe the horses and, I suppose, even the people who make the horseshoes. I am talking about the vets who look after these horses and who sustain their living that way and about the people who work in the restaurants and in the administration and operational facilities at the tracks. I am talking about such part-time workers as parking lot attendants. I suggest there are 50,000 jobs which will be seriously and adversely affected by the introduction of a new and a very much less productive form of racing.

I believe the House should pay due recognition to the contribution that the horseracing business provides to the country in the form of jobs and tax benefits to the governments. We should be sustaining and supporting that industry rather than introducing more lotteries, dog racing and other types of racing.

There is also the thought that using greyhounds in this way, having them run around the track frantically trying to grab an elusive fur-covered electrical rabbit, is not the proper way to treat animals. I do not think that I would want to run around and grab one of those in my mouth only to discover suddenly that it was not what I thought.

I believe this is an unwise move for the area in question. It is very unwise for the Blue Bonnets race track, for harness racing and for thoroughbred racing in Quebec, Ontario and throughout the country. If I can speak for myself and this Party, we oppose such legislation.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have the same views in mind as those of the last two speakers. However, I am concerned about some of the statements made by the Hon. Member for Scarborough East (Mr. Gilchrist).

I have two good reasons why I do not support this Bill. The first reason is that I believe we have reached the saturation point in gambling in this country. Perhaps it is time to step back, even from a moral point of view, since the state is encouraging too much gambling and causing abuse to some people in this country. We should not be a party to that kind of abuse. Personally, I do not believe that the state should prevent individuals from doing certain things, because they must decide for themselves what to do. But in this case, we have come to a point of saturation where perhaps we are causing some of this abuse. While it is a fine line to draw, I believe we have reached the saturation point in this particular area.

At this point I have some difficulty with the question of the sports lottery. In my opinion it was a relatively necessary way to raise money for sports in this country. I was in the House, as were a number of us here today, when the Government of the former Leader of the Opposition made an arrangement with the provinces to transfer the Canadian lottery to them. We were told that transferring that particular property to the provinces would be for an amount of approximately $75 million a year.

The former Minister of Sports is not present in the House to verify this, but it was assumed that the Tory Government of the time would try to collect approximately $70 million a year for this purpose. I am told that when the conference of provincial Sports Ministers and the federal Minister of Sports was in session, an edict came from the Prime Minister at the time that $25 million plus some indexing at that stage was adequate. Of course, we were quite shocked at this. It was another attempt by that Government to give more to the provinces and take more from the national scene. I think the federal Government has a responsibility to raise money, and I can justify raising it in national sports, which is what we are doing at this point in the sports lottery. However, I can see other evidence of a deteriorating situation having to do with lotteries of one kind. Bingo, which I think is a pastime for a lot of Canadians and has also been a way for churches and other charitable organizations to raise funds, is an activity that is being undermined. Small groups and churches are being affected by super bingo, and bingo is being commercialized to the point where there is a threat to many people and small groups who are, for charitable purposes, running bingo. I believe we have reached the saturation point. I would not want to see this extended any further.

The way I see it, this Bill is not acceptable for another reason. We have one industry that has developed a tradition over the years where many Canadians, I am told in the order of 40,000, are involved in horse racing and the businesses associated therewith. We have developed a lot of good Canadian breeding stock. There is a very solid and well-grounded fear that were we to introduce greyhound racing at this time, we would not do it as an extra industry but at the expense of an industry that is well established and part of our agricultural and national economy. As I said before, apparently some 40,000 jobs are at stake. I do not think this would happen if the state of that industry were satisfactory. But I am told the industry last year had a net decline in its revenues. For instance, the amount of betting went down, and so on. Therefore, one could assume that if one introduced another racing sport, such as greyhound racing, one could expect there to be a considerable decline in horseracing.

It seems to me this kind of development is fine when you have a very large market, as there is in the United States, where it would not make that much difference if greyhound racing were added to other industries, such as trotting and horseracing, etc. But in Canada, when you have an industry that is not in good shape, that is having difficulty—and I can show figures where this is the case—the effect would be to undermine an industry which is rather important to our economy.

I realize the Hon. Member for Chambly (Mr. Dupont) who introduced the motion is thinking of an industry where the type of dog used is very graceful and is lovely to watch. But basically this would not be, certainly for a long time, an industry that would be indigenous to this country. We do not have very large stocks of greyhounds bred and raised in this country. It is not a dog that is common to Canada. In order to move into this field in a large way—which I think is what the Hon. Member would expect to happen—we would have to import stock. Again, we would be importing stock at the expense of an industry which is indigenous and which has a large capacity for breeding fine animals for racing of one kind or another, whether that be horse racing, trotting or whatever other form that may take. At this point it would be a mistake to pass a Bill which would tend to raise the level of betting. The promotion that would go along with it would do that. The saturation point has arrived. I believe many Canadians are wondering whether gambling is becoming too important and whether some families are not suffering from the excesses in this activity. At the same time greyhound racing would undermine a well-established, long-term, developed industry which is not at its peak and which is not in a very healthy situation at this point.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we do not pass the Bill at this time.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to speak on Bill C-10 introduced by the Hon. Member for Chambly (Mr. Dupont). I note he has already left the House.

An Hon. Member: He has gone to the dog races.

Mr. Nickerson: He has gone to the dogs, like the Liberals.

Mr. Friesen: I guess he is not too encouraged at the prospects of this Bill passing today. I am glad to note there is not any great wave of enthusiasm for the legislation.

When I see legislation like this, one of the first questions that comes to my mind is, what is the motive behind it? Is it a Bill that is being sponsored by dog lovers of Canada? Is it because of this incredible love for dogs that we have legislation like this? I can hardly imagine that the most avid dog lovers across Canada would be euphoric about this piece of legislation. It cannot be because dog lovers want this Bill. Is it because people interested in dog racing are trying to help the employment picture? We have heard figures mentioned today of the number of people who would be employed if we introduced dog racing into Canada. I cannot be that optimistic that the people interested in introducing dog racing are really thinking of the unemployed when they talk about this new industry for out country. We have to get to the bottom of it. We are really not talking here about dog racing and the prospect of providing another form of wholesome entertainment for Canadians. What we are really talking about is broadening another industry, namely the gambling industry. That is what is at the heart of it.

Some time ago a fellow told me that a gentleman in Canada has the franchise for jai alai. I said to myself, why would anyone be interested in a franchise to introduce jai alai into Canada. Is it because Canadians would flock to arenas to watch jai alai? Again, the answer is no. It is because it opens up another avenue for gambling? This is the point on which I disagree with my colleague from Selkirk-Interlake and my colleague from Ontario who spoke previously. Both gentlemen mentioned that gambling, lotteries or other forms of gambling have reached the saturation point. I do not think that is ever the case. I do not think those people who have a proclivity to gambling ever reach a saturation point or that the market ever reaches a saturation point. There is always another way to diversify investment in gambling. If caught by the gambling fever, one never restricts oneself to only one form of gambling. If it is cards or any other kind of gambling, one looks for another avenue, because that is what the game of chance is all about. If one only plays cards or the horses, one has restricted oneself to a single form of chance. People tied to the whole business of getting rich by chance always look for another chance, so the industry never reaches a saturation point. All we have to do is to go to Third World countries to see the multiplicity of gambling opportunities and to realize that there is never an end to the opportunities for gambling.

What I see so wrong about gambling, particularly when the Government is involved as it is in the lottery business, is that for it to be successful it has to create as many losers as possible. Most people have to lose in the gambling operation. That is true whether it is horse racing, dog racing or the lotteries. The Government is supposed to be supporting people, making them winners and making them feel successful, and it is getting them to lose money. We have had the Super Loto, the $14 million one and the Great Grand Chance where there were close to 70 million buyers of tickets. Most of those people lost; all but one lost. I cannot understand why a Government, which is supposed to have a wholesome outlook toward its citizens, would want to make people lose as much as possible and still promote the idea of winning. There is something immoral about that. It is robbery of a kind.

Finally, I want to say that gambling never restricts itself to the gambling industry. My friend from Scarborough mentioned that the race-tracks in New Jersey were in very difficult economic condition and faced ultimate shutdown. I said to myself, "Why are the race-tracks in New Jersey in that tough shape? Could it be that Atlantic City has opened up and people have unlimited opportunity for gambling there, which is siphoning off the business from race-tracks in New Jersey?" Mr. Speaker, you know as well as I that the people in Atlantic City who are gambling are not there with a pure sense of purpose, necessarily, that it is not simply a nice, clean, economic investment. It never fails where gambling becomes an industry—and I emphasize that—that the mob is somewhere involved sooner or later and sooner or later there has to be police control.

If this is such a harmless, innocent pastime, the greyhound racing about which we are talking today, where people spend an evening watching dogs racing, that is one thing. However, if it becomes the threshold or the door for introducing gambling, which then becomes the threshold or the door for the gangster mob, that is another level of crime for our country.

The innocuous way in which the legislation comes to us looks innocent enough, but the multiplier effect of the harm it does to our country and its citizens, we really do not know. Once people become infected, we really do not know what will be the end result.

As I said at the outset, I am glad there is no swelling tide of enthusiasm for this particular Bill. Obviously Hon. Members are committed to making certain that it does not pass. I suppose the Hon. Member for Chambly feels that he has done his duty to whoever approached him to present this legislation as he has already left the House and knows that it will not pass. The very fact that we entertain this kind of legislation is a sign of the time that we look for easy solutions to our economic needs. Instead of being creative and working, we want fancy, new and immediate solutions to our money problems. It does not work. Even if we win, we tend to lose. If we follow the record of those who won grand prizes, we tend to lose even if we win, and therefore I am glad this legislation will not pass.

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I will go against what is apparently the grain and support this Bill. I think it is a great Bill. I congratulate the Hon. Member for Chambly (Mr. Dupont) for bringing it to the attention of the House of Commons.

I am particularly disappointed in the attitude of mind which has been displayed by certain members of the horse-racing fraternity here this afternoon. It would appear to me that they are trying to protect their area of privilege. They do not want any competition. I wish we could bring suit against them under the Combines Investigation Act because these are the types of practices in which they are engaging. They are going around telling everyone what a great thing horse racing is, how it contributes to the national wellbeing and how many jobs it creates. However, they do not want anyone else to start up in a related business or to give opportunity to people who might be unable to go to a horse race track to engage in the same type of activity.

My personal opinion, having been to dog tracks in Europe and in the United States, is that dog racing does not necessarily detract from horse racing. I feel their arguments are invalid on that score. It seems to me that in states like Arizona dog racing and horse racing exist side by side. They are not a threat one to the other. In fact, if anything were to be the case, people very often start off being active in the sport of greyhound racing and graduate to horse racing. I do not buy the arguments of the horsy set at all.

I would like to refer to the moral argument which has been argued very capably by the Hon. Member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen). I do not want to get into the moral argument of whether we should be for or against gambling this afternoon. However, I would point out that if gambling on greyhound races is immoral, then gambling on horse racing is equally immoral. If we buy that argument—and I personally do not—and think that gambling on animal racing is immoral, the course of action we should therefore take as a consequence would be to ban horse racing.

I would not want to see that happen, we cannot use the moral argument to say that we should not engage in greyhound racing when we have horse racing all over the country. It would appear that horse racing is very much the sport of the rich man or the rich woman. Of course, it is known as the sport of kings and that if one is to engage in it, one certainly requires a kingly income. It costs a lot of money if one is to be the owner of racehorses. However, if one is interested in that type of activity and does not have a kingly income, then of course, were dog racing to be allowed, one could get into it much more easily and cheaply. I have known quite a few greyhound owners. Very often the greyhound in question is the household pet. It costs very little to maintain greyhounds. You can do it with only a few dollars a week. If you are prepared to engage in the training yourself, you can have an awful lot of fun with the animals.

If you want to get into the business of operating a track, if it is a horse racing track it will require an investment of hundreds of thousands if not millions of dollars. These facilities can only be built in major population centres. Dog tracks, on the other hand, can be established for only a few thousand dollars. They can be built in localities where there is no way you could operate a horse racing track. In the Northwest Territories, for example, it would be crazy to have a horse racing track. However, I am sure that certain towns there could have a greyhound track operating for part of the year. It would not cost that much and could probably operate quite successfully.

I do not like the idea put forward this afternoon by people who believe solely in horse racing. They are trying to keep to themselves a good thing that they have going, not wanting to let the guy who is not as wealthy have access to the same type of enjoyment.

My final argument this afternoon in support of the exciting sport of greyhound racing is that it is a lot of fun. It is not only fun for the spectators and fun for the owners of the greyhounds, most of all, it is fun for the dogs which go around the track and chase the hare.

Mr. André Bachand (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add a few words to everything that has been said in the House concerning this Bill. Horse racing in Canada is a very large and important operation which is now much too vulnerable from an economic standpoint for the House to authorize pari-mutuel betting on dog races.

If I may, I should like to set the issue in its proper context. As a sport, horse racing has been the biggest attraction in Canada for more than a quarter of a century. It has been estimated that, in 1983, 13 million people went to the races, and many more millions of Canadians attended horse shows, rodeos and other such events. Toronto's Royal Winter Fair is the world's largest indoor agricultural exhibition. Its horse show attracts more competitors than the National Horse Show of New York and more prizes are handed out.

Horse shows are still an integral part of all sorts of fairs, whether they are small community fairs or major exhibitions, and many young people are handling animals for the first time when they come to show a pony or a horse. In fact, horse and pony 4-H Clubs are growing in popularity. Many people seem to think that only the wealthy can own horses. However, this is not true. Farm people have always been as interested in horses as the aristocrats. In years past, farmers used to have at least one work horse or one riding horse on their farms and many of them still do.

Races were often arranged on the spot during small fairs. Local people raced the horses that they were using every day. Nowadays, many city people own horses. Even if they see them as show animals or as pets rather than as work horses, they board them with farmers, and then those horses owned by city people are an integral part of Canadian farm life.

There are well over 750,000 horses in Canada today. Horse raising is an important industry. It is estimated that Canadians have over $2.5 billion invested in horses, $2.5 billion invested in land, buildings and equipment used for their upkeep.

Canadians also spend about $2 billion a year for feed, transportation and other services needed by horses owners. As already mentioned, horse racing accounts for about 40,000 jobs. This industry represents $1.6 million in bets every year in Canada.

The sector is now faced with major financial problems. According to the latest figures, the daily betting average is decreasing on many race tracks. To this date, compared with the same period in 1983, betting has decreased by 17 per cent in Barrie, 3 per cent in Dundas, 8 per cent in London, 8 per cent in Windsor, 3 per cent in Winnipeg, 20 per cent in Orangeville, 5 per cent in Saint John and 3 per cent at the Blue Bonnets track in Montreal.

If we add the rate of inflation to these percentages, we can understand why race tracks are really having problems.

I mentioned the Blue Bonnets race track because Montreal used to have another major race track some years ago, namely the Richelieu Park which no longer exists. Last year, Blue Bonnets recorded a 4 per cent decrease in betting after registering a 14 per cent decrease in 1982. Under these conditions, how long can this race track continue to operate?

The basic problem is that the industry is saturated. If we now allowed the practice of pari mutuel in dog racing, we would be signing the death warrant of many local race tracks and eliminating the livelihood of a whole network of people who are now earning a living in the horse racing industry.

Still, this can be prevented simply by rejecting this Bill, or at least by waiting for economic conditions to improve before approving it.

Until now, we have focussed on the economic aspects of the Bill, but other elements must be taken into consideration. For instance, we have to remember that, in Florida, most greyhounds are trained with live rabbits. They set the dogs loose to chase rabbits in the fields, or they tie up the rabbits and use them as baits to make the dogs run. Animal lovers both in Canada and the United States have already indicated their opposition to this practice. I should mention however that racing rabbits are in fact mechanical devices.

Although racing dogs are fairly well treated, many people object to their running in races. The reason is that dog racing is not part of our traditions. In Florida, certainly, but not here. And many of us object to dogs chasing a mechanical rabbit. We feel that dogs should have better to do than that. I fear even that if we allow dog racing to develop in Canada, our own and our children's perception of dogs would change for the worse.

There are countries where bullfighting is a well attended and respectable sport. There are countries where cockfighting is also popular. For a great many people, a trip to Florida would not be complete without a visit to the cynodrom.

Once again, that is a sport which is foreign to our traditions and is not very popular here. Of course, the public outlook may change. Our attitude may evolve in such a way that it will be possible to introduce betting on dogs, but for the time being, as our horce racing industry is facing a questionable future, I urge the House to defeat this bill.

[English]

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, practically all of the discussion this afternoon dealt with racing. More than that is involved in this Bill. The Bill provides for horse racing, greyhound racing, fight, game or sport. We are opening the door to people with dogs to begin having dogfights. Dogfights can make a lot of money, but where do they lead?

When I was a boy, I had a dog called Jumbo. He was the best fighter in the whole Drumheller Valley. One coal miner, every time he got tight and wanted to make some money, borrowed Jumbo. Jumbo could beat any dog in the country. He made a lot of money on it. However, poor Jumbo came home, and my brothers and I were the ones who had to look after Jumbo's torn ears and bleeding mouth and legs.

I do not go in for dog fighting at all. I do not think it is very good. Since this Bill will provide for dog fights, I think we should throw it out.

Adjournment Debate

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 45 deemed to have been moved.

EMERGENCY MEASURES—MINISTERIAL POWER TO ESTABLISH CIVILIAN INTERNMENT CAMPS. (B) POSITION OF MINISTER OF JUSTICE

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, about a week ago, I rose in the House to ask a question of the Minister of Justice (Mr. MacGuigan) regarding the famous Gazetted Order in Council that deals with emergency planning orders. That Order in Council is entitled 1981, 1305 and was passed in June, 1981. It empowers the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) to establish civilian internment camps; in effect to systematically depopulate federal penitentiaries in order to use them as civilian internment camps.

The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) rose to answer my question, rather than the Minister of Justice. That in itself offended me because the question was put to the Minister of Justice in his role as the protector of our civil rights. My question to him dealt with his role as protector of those civil rights. However, the President of the Privy Council rose to say: "He will," referring to me, "realize that, with a minimum of understanding, he cannot come to that conclusion". The conclusion to which he refers is that the Order in Council had the effect of freeing people who had been convicted of a criminal offences in order to make room for people who had not been convicted of a criminal offences. That is a very simple conclusion.

The President of the Privy Council wishes to infer that I was misreading the particular Order in Council. For the benefit of the record, I will read it verbatim from The Canada Gazette of June 10, 1981. The Order in Council in question states in column 1, "The Solicitor General and His Powers"; in column 2, "Powers, Duties and Functions"; No. 6, "Establish, administer and operate civilian internment camps"; and No. 7, "Facilitate the selective reduction and transfer of prison populations to provide for the establishment of civilian internment camps". I think that is quite clear, Mr. Speaker, and I have not distorted the quotation. That is exactly how it is stated in that Gazetted Order in Council.

I again turn to the Minister of Justice, the protector of our civil rights, to get an assurance from him that he will give us his opinion on that particular Order in Council. He had the effrontery to stand in his place and say to me: "Every proposal put forward by the Government in statutory form or for regulation is vetted by officials of the Department of Justice precisely for that kind of criteria".

First of all, Mr. Speaker, I would point out that the heading on this particular Order in Council is not listed as being statutory but as being under other than statutory authority. If one checks with the law officers of the Crown, the Library of Parliament or any other authority, one finds that whenever an Order in Council is other than statutory, it refers to Crown prerogative. When Crown prerogative has been established by Order in Council, it entitles the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to do as he wishes under the powers described within that Order in Council. That in effect gives the Prime Minister dictatorial powers for the purposes of that Order in Council. I have not even raised the question of the powers assigned to the Prime Minister under this Order in Council.

I see that the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Evans) is present. I want to know what the Minister of Justice means when he says that there are limitations under statutory provisions. The fact is that this Order in Council is not a statutory provision and the fact is that it has no limitations.

Second, the Minister of Justice said that officials have vetted the Order in Council. They may have vetted it but they have certainly not changed it. If I am wrong, I would like the Parliamentary Secretary to stand and say that that Order in Council as it was gazetted in 1981, because of the ease of its misinterpretation, has been vetted by the officials and therefore has been changed in order to preserve our civil rights. If the Parliamentary Secretary can give me that assurance, I will not raise this subject again. However, I am sure he will not do so because I am convinced that that Order has not been changed.

I am sure that the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre has an understanding of what it means to feel that one's civil rights could be abused. I would like the Parliamentary Secretary to rise in his place and tell us that this Order in Council clearly does not mean what I have read into the record. If it does not mean that, I would like to know what it means.

I would like to have the assurance that if this Order is ever enacted in the administrative sense, that we as Canadian citizens, will be protected, because I assure him that there are over 400 people in the Province of Quebec who remember having been arrested in October of 1970. Without ever a writ having been issued and without ever having been charged, they were arrested and incarcerated. There is recent memory of what has happened with these kinds of powers and I want some assurance that we, as Canadian citizens, are going to be protected from an over powerful and overzealous government.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has been told on a number of occasions and must by now be fully aware that the emergency planning Order empowers no Minister to do anything other than to make plans. Yet he continues in his attempts to distort the truth by posing questions and making statements which are based on utterly false premises. It has been clearly stated in this House and elsewhere—and I repeat it again today—that separate and distinct statutory authority will be necessary before any of the plans made under the Planning Order can be implemented.

It must be further pointed out that any planning related to civilian internment camps is based on the assumption that the need would only arise in time of war, and that particular need has never been seriously questioned, even by the McDonald Commission, Mr. Speaker, which indicated, and I quote:

—in any emergency of the kind contemplated by the War Measures Act some potentially dangerous persons will have to be put under restraint.

That is from the McDonald Commission, Mr. Speaker.

The Hon. Member will also realize that safeguards against the abuse of emergency powers, exercised even in war time, will be covered by the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which did not exist, I might add, Mr. Speaker, at the time of the Quebec crisis. This provides for injunctive or compensatory relief in respect of limitations to human rights which the courts decide have been unreasonable or not demonstrably justifiable in a free and democratic society.

Finally, if the Hon. Member has to query the advisability of releasing convicted persons to accommodate detainees, he must be fully aware that no internment camps exist now, nor are any being established, otherwise the measures he questions would not be necessary. He really should make up his mind. Does he want us to build internment camps now so as to have them ready if and when required? Does he want us to plan to use the prisons as provided in the Planning Order? Or does he want us to allow potential enemies of the state to roam at will among us during times of war or armed conflict?

I add again, Mr. Speaker, that at the time of the FLQ crisis in 1970, the Charter of Rights and Freedoms did not exist. It was this Government which pushed for and brought forward those important changes to our constitutional law. This Government certainly is not, in light of that, a government which would set up secret internment camps to intern Canadians in any but the most extreme conditions of war, and I believe the Hon. Member clearly knows that by now.

IMMIGRATION—HEAD TAX IMPOSED ON CHINESE IMMIGRANTS. (B) REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT PAY COMPENSATION

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, on Chinese New Year I presented the case of two elderly constituents of mine who had paid a head tax to come to Canada. I asked the Canadian Government, as a symbolic gesture, to undo past wrongs and compensate Chinese immigrants who were forced to pay a head tax because they were Chinese. We cannot change past laws but we can recognize unjust discrimination and apologize as a nation.

On February 24, I asked the Acting Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice (Mr. MacGuigan) to consider an official Government apology to Chinese immigrants who were forced to pay the discriminatory head tax between 1885 and 1923. I aslo asked if the Government would compensate the survivors of those who paid the head tax. The Minister of Justice acknowledged that we cannot change history but he would look into this matter. I presented this request as a moral, not a legal case.

The Chinese Immigration Act was racist because it discriminated against people of Chinese origin. It applied to no other immigrants and was followed up in 1923 by the Chinese Exclusion Act which effectively stopped all Chinese immigration until 1947. That was contrary to the spirit of our new Charter of Rights.

Canada's immigration policy was only one of the injustices that these early pioneers suffered. They were exploited, poorly paid and restricted in where they could live and work. They lived very lonely lives, separated from their families. It was not until 1947 that they were given the right to vote. The CCF, later the NDP, was the only Party to protest these injustices over the years and to insist that Asian immigrants must have full voting rights. The Liberal Party in B.C. took the opposite position.

Since I spoke in the House there has been a great swell of interest in this issue across Canada. I have received copies of over 600 head tax receipts and heard case histories which must be recorded in the Canadian Archives. Chinese organizations have joined in the request for an official apology and some form of recognition, whether symbolic or financial.

I want to read into the record an excerpt from a letter from the president of the Chinese Canadian National Council to the Minister of Justice. He said:

We are writing to express our joy at the announcement you made in the House of Commons on February 23, 1984 that the Government will consider apologizing to Chinese Canadians and compensating those who were forced to pay a head tax between 1885 and 1923 to immigrate to Canada.

This is a dark page in Canadian history the injustice and horror of which still live vividly among many Chinese Canadians, especially the older generation who personally experienced the harsh measures.

As such, your announcement in the House the other day must be welcomed and congratulated. It is our opinion that the courageous and insightful step as suggested by the honourable member from Vancouver East, that which you are contemplating, not only puts a dark page in our nation's history in the proper perspective, it also reflects genuinely the spirit of equality before the law as stipulated in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The proposed compensation and apology, besides other viable and reasonable measures, will remove once and for all the stigma attributed to Chinese Canadians due to the harsh measures in the past. It will bring new pride to—and is the best assurance for—Chinese Canadians that they are full and equal members in this great nation of ours.

I again ask for a positive response from the Government, Mr. Speaker, to present an apology with some form of compensation and recognition. We must be very sure that this kind of discrimination never again happens in Canada.

Mr. Al MacBain (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has raised the matter of the head tax to which Chinese immigrants were subjected under federal legislation between the years 1885 and 1923. Even a cursory reading of Canadian legal history reveals the discrimination practised against Chinese immigrants and Chinese Canadians.

Chinese people, like so many others who arrived at that time, began immigrating to British Columbia about 1858 in search of gold. It was only some 20 years or so later that much larger numbers arrived in response to the need for labour to build the Canadian railways. This Chinese presence, which only too clearly conferred significant benefits on the economies of British Columbia and Canada as a whole, met with hostility and fear among the general populace and discriminatory legislation was passed by both British Columbia and Canada. While a good deal of this provincial legislation was struck down by the courts, or disallowed by the Governor-in-Council under the Constitution Act, a good deal still remained. It denied to Chinese Canadians the vote, eligibility for elected office, jury service and eligibility for certain professions.

Federal legislation reflected equally hostile attitudes. Under an 1885 statute Chinese Canadians were not permitted to vote. In that same year the infamous Chinese Immigration Act was imposed which required a $50 head tax on Chinese immigrating to Canada. That was subsequently amended raising the tax to $100 in 1901 and to $500 in 1904. Although that tax was repealed in 1923, a new Chinese Immigration Act limited the categories of eligible Chinese immigrants to such an extent that few were able to enter Canada while that legislation remained on the books. Only in 1947 was that Act finally repealed.

These remarks, however brief and incomplete, I believe sufficiently paint a not particularly attractive side of Canadian history. In recent years we have all been made more fully aware that aboriginal peoples and Japanese Canadians in Canada have also suffered from past legislative and administrative acts of discrimination.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to report to the Hon. Member for Vancouver East (Ms. Mitchell) that the matters raised by the Hon. Member will be looked into as she has requested.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—WORKING CONDITIONS OF EMPLOYEES AT CRANBROOK, B.C.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, on February 24 I directed a question to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Gray) regarding a change of working conditions for employees at Cranbrook, British Columbia with regard to the six and five program. CP Rail was included in the public service restraint program which enabled hundreds of millions of dollars to be saved in the rollback of contracts which were in place to come into the guidelines of the Public Service Restraint Program of 6 per cent in the first year and 5 per cent in the second year.

The President of the Treasury Board stated that he would be happy to look into the matter and, if it turned out it was not consistent with the law passed by Parliament, he would see that appropriate action was taken. In fact, CP Rail has asked for a material change in working conditions. I have a letter that was sent to the general Chairman of the workers. It states:

> We challenge C.P. Rails decision to reduce our earning power, to cancel one agreement under which we now work and alter another while the restraint program, Bill C-124, is in effect. It was C.P. Rail who said there could be no negotiation on rule changes this year because it would cost the company money in violation of Bill C-124.

CP Rail cannot have it both ways, Mr. Speaker. The fact is that they are going to reduce the earning power of these employees. Who in fact is governing the country? Is it CP Rail or is it the Government of Canada?

On Friday, March 9, an arbitrator heard this proposal and is going to make a final and binding decision on whether CP Rail has these entitlements. I urge the President of the Treasury Board to bring down a report on this. When an arbitrator is involved to this degree we must remember the decision which the arbitrator has already made with regard to legislation, something that CP Rail may be in violation of.

● (1820)

The blue ribbon committee was guided by the chief executive officer of CP Rail. As a result of his involvement in that, not only did his company save hundreds of millions of dollars, he was awarded a position in the Senate. Now John Turner is coming forward, with the possibility of becoming the new leader of the Liberal Party and perhaps the next Prime Minister. He was another director of CP Rail.

When will the Government begin to govern and tell this company that it has a responsibility to its workers and to this country? For it to materially change the working conditions of these workers at Cranbrook, British Columbia, at a time when this additional burden is not placed on other workers is wrong. I urge the President of the Treasury Board to come forward now and to put a stay on this until such time as he can come in with a report.

I think it is wrong that a Member of Parliament who travels to Montreal as an observer to attend that meeting is denied by CP Rail the right to listen. Is it that worried about what it is doing and what is taking place that it would deny a Member of Parliament the right to be an observer at a hearing that involves workers in his riding who come under the restraint program, and which may have serious ramifications with respect to the working conditions there?

Before I went there I obtained a legal interpretation. Let me quote it as it is important to note. It states:

> The decision of the Ontario High Court of Justice in Re Toronto Star Ltd. and Toronto Newpaper Guild ((1976) 73 D.L.R. (3d) 370, enclosed) decided under the Ontario Labour Relations Act (R.S.O. 1970, c. 232) establishes the principle that where parties are compelled by law to submit to arbitration, it is not merely a private proceeding. The public has an interest in its functioning. Therefore, it is within the discretion of the arbitrator to decide whether proceedings will be public or not. Although the legal framework for a railway arbitration is not identical, it is submitted that the Toronto Star case provides a basis to argue that it is up to the arbitrator to decide whether the public may attend, and there should be good reasons for closing the hearing. The court notes that the request of one party without supporting argument is not sufficient.

I suggest that is a blatant abuse of the Canada Labour Code. It is a blatant abuse by CP Rail of its employees. I urge the President of the Treasury Board to come forward immediately and either put a stay on what is happening and come down with a decision, or reverse the decision and tell the company that it must wait until the six and five guidelines are lifted.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, in response to the matter raised in the House by the Member from Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker) during the Question Period on February 24, 1984, to the effect that CP Rail in Cranbrook, British Columbia, had invoked a material change in working conditions to reduce the wages of employees, I am pleased to inform the House that Treasury Board Secretariat officials have been in touch with CP Rail officials on this matter.

The member rightly pointed out that CP Rail is under the restraint program and as such the compensation plan of the employees cannot be modified other than by a wage increase of 6 per cent in the first year and 5 per cent in the second year.

I am informed that operating considerations have necessitated a change in the manner in which trains transporting coal within the Province of British Columbia operate. As a result, approximately 30 persons have been declared surplus and are entitled to exercise seniority and other rights under the terms of their collective agreements.

There are two employee groups affected by the changes, the trainmen and the locomotive engineers. The changes in Sparwood are affecting employees living in Cranbrook, but it should be noted that these changes are being handled in accordance with the provisions of the collective agreements in question.

Pursuant to the provisions of the groups' collective agreements—Article 47 of the United Transportation Union covering trainment working in the Prairie and Pacific regions and Article 30 of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, which are entitled "Material Changes in Working Conditions", the employer is required to give advance notice of the operational change he wishes to introduce in accordance with its provisions. The article stipulates that the company may not initiate any material change in working conditions without giving as much advance notice as possible to the general chairman concerned, along with a full description thereof and with appropriate details as to the contemplated affects upon employees concerned.

Furthermore, I am advised that no material change can be made by CP Rail until such time as an agreement is reached between the company and the bargaining agents involved or a decision has been rendered by an arbitration board.

In order to minimize the effects of the material change on the employees in question, the parties have held six meetings since October of last year and have agreed upon all but four items with respect to changes in employees' working conditions. I would like to add that the parties have agreed to refer the four outstanding items to binding arbitration. An arbitration board heard these four matters on Friday last, March 9, and a decision is expected shortly. None of the four matters in question deal with rates of pay.

Based on the information provided to Treasury Board Secretariat staff by CP Rail officials, the reported change in operations has been dealt with in accordance with the provisions of the collective agreements in question, and CP Rail's operational change does not appear to contravene the Public Sector Compensation Restraint Act.

Since the member has also written to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Gray) concerning this matter, a reply in greater detail will be forwarded to the member shortly when additional information is provided to the President of the Treasury Board.

AGENCY AGREEMENT WITH CONSUMERS DISTRIBUTING COMPANY

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I, along with many thousands of Canadian business people, was deeply disturbed by the news reports that Canada Post is entering into an agreement to work hand in hand with Consumers Distributing to act as an active agent for that company. This is indeed unprecedented, unwarranted, and unfair competition for the private sector which has enough problems as it is trying to keep afloat in these difficult times.

If this scheme is allowed to proceed, Canada Post in almost every community in Canada would give Consumers Distributing an unfair advantage and unfair access to all the retail markets without significant community investment and contribution in terms of taxes and employment. Canada Post has all it can do to improve the postal service, and should leave the distribution of consumer goods to those who can do it best, the private sector. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I call upon the Government to take the necessary steps immediately to direct Canada Post to countermand such an agreement with Consumers Distributing and other similar hare-brained schemes which may surface in the future.

OLYMPIC GAMES

TRIBUTE TO GAÉTAN BOUCHER

Mr. Raymond Savard (Verdun-Saint Paul): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of all Canadians and especially on behalf of Quebecers, I want to take this opportunity to pay tribute to our compatriot, Gaétan Boucher. At the Winter Games, Gaétan managed to win three Olympic medals, including one bronze medal for the 500 metres and two gold medals. There has never been any doubt as to Gaétan Boucher's athletic skills since he has been able to compete with athletes of his stature.

Mr. Speaker, I also would like to take this opportunity to praise the efforts of Sport Canada which for a number of years has been helping young Canadian athletes across the country.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that Gaétan Boucher is an inspiration to young Canadians who would all like their country to be proud of them some day. Three cheers for Gaétan Boucher, the world champion!

VETERANS AFFAIRS

DELAY IN PROCESSING PENSION APPLICATIONS

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I understand that it takes an average of 10 months for a veteran to get a ruling from the Canada Pension Commission upon applying for veterans' benefits. This is not acceptable. It is too long for a veteran in distress to have to wait. Add to that the length of time for the Pension Review Board to make a decision and you have a total of 19 months. That is an average amount of time. Many wait much longer. That is more than one and one-half years. I am told that the Bureau of Pensions Advocates takes five and one-half months. Add to this the more than two months that the War Veterans Allowance Board makes them wait, and I maintain that it is unconscionable to make our veterans wait that long for a decision.

I also think, Mr. Speaker, that a more compassionate attitude should be extended to our aging veterans, and much more consideration should be given to their health problems, many of which are due to their being burnt out from direct results of war experiences.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

CANADAIR—DEMAND FOR PARLIAMENTARY INVESTIGATION

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my statement is with respect to Canadair. The Canadian Government is picking up a $3.5 billion debt on behalf of that Crown corporation. That is enough money to double the income supplements of every poor pensioner in the country and have $1 billion left over. This is a staggering sum, Mr. Speaker. Canadair has been staggeringly mismanaged. The new company could also lose money since it has orders for jet engines which it must continue to buy.

The Liberal Government has given Crown corporations a bad name in spite of the fact that there have been successes in Canada with Crown corporations at both federal and provincial levels. We have a mixed economy in Canada. The future role of the Crown corporation is indeed a challenge to the left, as well as being open to obvious criticism from the right.

I advocate three things. The first is that this mismanagement not go unpunished. The second is that Crown corporations be open to public scrutiny. Messrs. Strong, Bell, and Austin are strong individuals but are not really accountable to anyone. There should be a special parliamentary committee for Crown corporations which would have the powers of an American congressional committee. Finally, we should integrate Crown corporation strategies into a national industrial game plan. Then we will not have $3.5 billion spent to produce an executive jet. I find that a strange priority. It is a real blight on Crown corporations in Canada.

ALL-PARTY SUPPORT REQUESTED FOR IMPROVING THE ECONOMY

Mr. André Maltais (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, I was very pleased when I found out that Quebec had finally decided to focus more attention on the North Shore, and I am referring to plans for establishing an aluminum refinery in Sept-Iles. Mr. Speaker, it is very important that Quebec and the federal Government co-operate on this project and ensure that it will come to fruition.

I know that the company concerned has already met federal officials and that the Canadian Government has confirmed and is prepared to take part in the project if it receives a request from the Kaiser Corporation.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that all parties in the House will be able to give their approval very shortly so that we can bring a new industry into the region, in order to put the economy back on the rails, and not only in Sept-Iles but in the entire region, which in addition to Sept-Iles includes Schefferville, Gagnon, Fermont, the people of Port Cartier, and the people on the lower North Shore, who all stand to benefit.

REQUEST FOR SUPPLEMENTARY FUNDS FOR YOUNG STUDENTS

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I hope you will allow me to follow the example of my colleague from Verdun and welcome our famous guest. I want to congratulate him on his outstanding performance which has made all Canadians feel very proud. Mr. Speaker, this is the second time I mention this extraordinary performance.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the Minister responsible for student employment that the Government recently appointed a Minister of Youth. However, to give young people hope for the future, we must have budgets that are commensurate with the number of young people who will be looking for work this summer. As far as the Summer Canada Program is concerned, Mr. Speaker—and I know my colleagues are already aware of this—the interest expressed in it by young people vastly exceeds proposed funding.

Today, I want to urge the Minister to make additional funding available so that these young students will not be disappointed when they start looking for jobs this summer. In the circumstances . . . I hear Hon. Members complaining, I am sure I do not know why, Mr. Speaker. On behalf of these young people, I would simply ask the Government to be responsible and compassionate, and to provide additional funding so that this summer, young students will be able to earn a few dollars to help them pay for their education. Mr. Speaker, that was the gist of what I wanted to say today, and I hope my colleagues were listening carefully.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF OLYMPIC ICE SKATING CHAMPION, GAÉTAN BOUCHER

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Mr. Speaker, I want to join with the Hon. Member for Verdum (Mr. Savard), and I am sure all members on all sides of the House will want to support me, when we recognize a great Canadian who has made us all very proud with his accomplishments at the Olympics. I am speaking of the two gold medal and bronze medal winner, Gaétan Boucher, who is here with his father and family today.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SHIPBUILDING

PLACEMENT OF ORDERS ABROAD

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Shipbuilding and Ship Repairing Association has recently reported that already in this year, 1984, four new foreign built supply ships have been registered for use in our East Coast offshore operations. Canadian shipyards could have built those vessels, and the benefit to Canada would have been in the order of $55 million. They were not built in Canada because of the availability of cheaper financing abroad, and muddled federal policies here.

Consider the obstacles facing the Canadian shipbuilder. Not only must the builder contend with direct and indirect subsidies offered by foreign competitors, the builder must also face the fact that the Canadian Government, the Government to which he pays taxes, will rebate up to 80 per cent of the importer's leasing costs or customs duty. A shipowner sourcing in Canada is not eligible for any rebate whatsoever. The result in 1983 was a record importation of foreign built vessels to Canada.

If the Government is serious about job creation and the preservation of a viable Canadian shipbuilding industry, let it act now to encourage sourcing in Canada. No industry should have to fight its own Government in the international marketplace.

FORESTRY

CALL FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF SEPARATE MINISTRY

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, Canada's No. 1 industry continues to decline and the Liberal Government continues to ignore the problem. Yesterday the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Caccia), the Government's excuse for a Minister of Forestry, said that he was too busy to attend the inaugural luncheon for the Canadian Forest Industries Council.

Much of our traditional forest resource has been depleted. Twenty-five million hectares of logged-over lands have not been adequately restocked. Some of our traditional markets are drying up. Logging and sawmill communities suffer from widespread unemployment and economic insecurity. But the Minister does not have enough time to meet with industry representatives.

Long term forestry agreements have not been signed with the major forestry provinces. In 1984-85 British Columbia has to make do with an $11 million extension of an agreement, instead of a new agreement which would have seen over $100 million provided in federal-provincial funds.

This neglect of our basic industry must stop. As a start, the Government should establish a separate ministry of forestry with a full time minister, not a part time person who is out to lunch whenever forest industry representatives come to call.

LOUIS RIEL

GOVERNMENT URGED TO GRANT POSTHUMOUS PARDON

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I, like so many other Canadians, am disappointed at the lack of agreement between the First Ministers and native leaders at the constitutional conference on March 8 and 9. One would suppose that after all the negotiations and study, some agreement could have been reached on the four agenda items under discussion at the conference, namely, equality rights, aboriginal title and rights including treaty rights, land and resources, and self-government. Because of the failure, the federal Government should initiate action on its own to spur the provinces into addressing aboriginal issues in a more substantive way.

The federal Government deserves support for its March 9 announcement on removal of sexual discrimination from the Indian Act.

It is hoped and anticipated that provincial Governments during their annual premiers' conference will place native issues at the top of their agenda.

In addition, it would be appropriate for the federal Government to move to correct an historic injustice by granting a posthumous pardon to Louis Riel. The Government could proceed on this matter through a Bill I introduced in the last session, and which I will be reintroducing again, I hope today.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

CROWN CORPORATIONS

CANADAIR—GOVERNMENT'S PARTICIPATION IN CHALLENGER AIRCRAFT CONSTRUCTION PROGRAM

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. He will know from his experience in this House that Members of this Party have questioned the Government's decision to be involved in the Challenger program, since 1976. In the 1982 Shielding Report, which the Government commissioned, we find:

—the business of selling executive aircraft is undisciplined, ruthless, and checkered by practices which any government should abhor.

Why does the Government continue to damage the job opportunities and the future of those working for Canadair by insisting on carrying on in a business checkered by practices that any Government should abhor?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member ought to check those allegations and make the most of his opportunity to listen to the Minister responsible for Canadair and affiliated companies who is appearing before the ad hoc Standing Committee to explain the situation of Canadair and of other companies controlled by the CDIC. He would find out for himself that concrete steps have been taken to ensure the profitability of Canadair and that the Challenger's development and sales outlook are very promising.

[English]

EXTENT OF GOVERNMENT FINANCING

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, if we cannot get the President of the Treasury Board to explain why he allows appropriations to go through the way this Government directs, will the Minister advise us, if the business of Canadair is only 40 per cent involved in the Challenger and we have already spent $2.146 billion on the Challenger program, why, in the name of employment, would the Government continue to finance the aircraft? After all, most of the parts for the aircraft are made in the United States, the technology is American, the repair and marketing facilities are in the United States, and even the Shielding Report states that the aircraft has little significance to the repertoire of Canadian manufacturing or technology capabilities. Why the money? Why the estimate?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member does not understand what the Challenger program is all about. He is talking about jobs, which is a priority for this Government, although we know it is not one for the Official Opposition. Technological advance and the development of an aircraft such as the Challenger are important as well, not only for the Canadian industry but also for the future technology of our country. Again I would urge the Hon. Member, as I did a moment ago, to attend the Standing Committee which is now considering the Canadair file and looking into prospective markets for Canadair's Challenger aircraft. He will get answers to his questions and, in addition, have an opportunity to learn more about the positive aspects of the Challenger program.

REQUEST THAT CORPORATION BE DIVESTED OF PROGRAM

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): The Minister knows that Canadair has a good staff. It is excellent at building airframes, working on surveillance drones, and with its waterbomber program. However, the Challenger program is a loser, and has been a loser from its inception.

Why does the Government not insist that its friends, Bell and Austin, organize a proper sale of the Challenger program to some other company so that this company can continue to do its worth-while aircraft work and keep the jobs here in Canada?

Mr. Blais: Shame on you!

Mr. Blenkarn: Why does it want to destroy Canadair to build a fancy toy for those who can afford it?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Obviously, Mr. Speaker, the immediate reaction of the Opposition is to reject any initiative aimed at promoting job creation and furthering technological progress in Canada. The Hon. Member for Joliette denies this, so he is at odds with his colleagues from Mississauga South who has just spoken. Get your act together and come up with a policy. We know that your Leader is unable to spell out his policies, but if some Members of the Opposition do have policies and ideas, they ought to combine their efforts and suggest a few policies which their Leader might follow.

[English]

COST OF CHALLENGER PROGRAM

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I want to impress upon this House that we are not criticizing Canadair.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fennell: My question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board, and I want an answer from him because he is responsible for Estimates. In the recent Estimates there is $310 million for the Challenger program. The truth of the matter, and the Minister knows it perfectly well, is that Canadian taxpayers have already invested $2 billion in the Challenger program. There is another $1.5 billion committed to that program. Will the President of the Treasury Board come clean and bring forth Estimates showing that the total cost of the Challenger program is $3.5 billion?

Hon. Herb Gray (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the Estimates tabled in the House which are now being studied by the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, involve a decision not only of myself but of Cabinet as a whole regarding financing for the coming period for Canadair and de Havilland. The Minister responsible for the Canada Development Investment Corporation has been before the Finance Committee providing all the information he can in response to the questions of my hon. friend and his colleagues.

I think my hon. friend should be telling us how he can say that he and his Party support Canadair and not the Challenger when, in the words of his colleague, the Challenger program is 40 per cent of Canadair's business and when, on other occasions his colleagues, like the Hon. Member for Etobicoke Centre and the Hon. Member for Joliette, have said that the Challenger is an excellent program technologically and that they are just upset about Canadair management. As my hon. friend, the Minister of National Revenue, said: "Get your music together because you are certainly not playing in tune today".

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fennell: I am fully aware that the Minister is in front of the committee. We spent four hours with him yesterday. He did not deny the fact that the cost of this program exceeds $3 billion.

Mr. Roy: But how many jobs?

JUSTIFICATION FOR EXPENDITURE

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, how can the President of the Treasury Board justify to Canadian taxpayers the spending of $1 million a day to provide executive jets, toy jets for corporate executives, which the Government's experts state would not cause great disruption in Canada or in the world if they were not produced?

Hon. Herb Gray (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I know my hon. friend would like us to follow the same procedure with Canadair as his Leader followed with Iron Ore in Schefferville.

• (1425)

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I do not think that this is what the workers at Canadair want. I know it is not what Canadians want. If the Hon. Member wants to destroy not only the Challenger Program, but Canadair and the thousands of jobs there, as well as the thousands of jobs in the hands of sub-contractors, he can argue that, but he will be rejected on this by the Canadian people, as his Party was in the last election when it wanted to do something similar with Petro-Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

VIABILITY OF CANADAIR

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, there are certain people in this House who want a Crown corporation to be running, but they want it to be running efficiently, in the interest of the workers directly affected, and in the interest of the taxpayers of Canada. The $2 billion plus bailout is ten times the amount of money the Government is prepared to allocate in new funds for youth employment this year. It is fully equivalent to all the money set aside for job training and job creation for the total number of unemployed, in the Budget this year. What conditions has the Government laid down in terms of the performance of Canadair to give the workers directly affected in Montreal, and the rest of the people in Canada, reason to believe that that company is now a viable entity?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the Hon. Member would find a very direct and explicit answer to his question in the report which was tabled by the Minister concerned in the Standing Committee yesterday. In this report, which is now being examined, the Canadair and CDIC authorities tell Members of Parliament and Canadians at large about the viability of the project and explain how the CDIC and Canadair plan to make the Challenger program a viable one.

Of course, we are most concerned with protecting employment, but we also insist on having a program with commercially viable elements and a marketing potential which will allow us not only to protect existing jobs, but also to use innovative technology so that these jobs will still be there in 10 years from now and will have expanded.

[English]

CORPORATION'S MANAGEMENT—ACCOUNTABILITY FOR EXPENDITURE OF PUBLIC MONEY

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I asked the question I did because the only answer that was given in the committee yesterday by the Senator responsible was in terms of trying to convey the impression that we should have greater confidence because, by splitting the company and the people of Canada absorbing the debt at an atrociously high cost, potential customers for this airplane would know that the company is in a more financially viable position. Potential customers always knew that a Crown corporation backed by the taxpayers of Canada was in that position. Nothing has changed.

Given the past record of very incompetent management that misled the Government, telling it that the company had ten times the number of orders for the aircraft than it actually had at one time, will the Minister tell us why we should have a greater degree of confidence in the existing management of Canadair? Also, what procedures does the Government to implement to give a greater degree of ongoing accountability for this spending of public money?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): As concerns the first part of the Hon. Member's question, Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind him that the fact that the financial situation of Canadair, will improve with CDIC assuming part of the corporation's debt is extremely important from a business standpoint; I think that the Hon. Member does acknowledge this basic fact.

As for the second part of his question which deals with incompetent management, to use his own words, I would like to tell him that this is basically the reason why, a few months ago, the Government decided to create this new corporation to which it assigned explicit terms of reference for strengthening management practices in companies such as Canadair and de Havilland. The evidence given by the Minister concerned and the CDIC officers before the Standing Committee shows that the management methods of these companies have been strengthened and that their operations will be better managed in the future.

Concerning the last part of the question, which dealt with how these companies could be made more accountable to Parliament, I believe that the fact that the CDIC and Canadair, de Havilland, or other corporations regularly appear before Standing Committees as they are now doing, is an indication that there already is an appropriate mechanism to ensure that these companies are held accountable to Parliament for their management. Furthermore, a Bill is soon to be introduced in the House to authorize the changes made to CDIC and related corporations. This Bill will also introduce amendments which will enable the House to hold these corporations accountable to a greater extent for their management.

• (1430)

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the Minister knows that up to this point none of the procedures have been changed in terms of the accountability of this Crown corporation or of any other Crown corporation. The Minister knows that an annual appearance before a committee of the House is a totally inadequate way for Members of the House to assume their responsibility for the spending of public money. The Minister knows that this situation has not been changed when it is precisely what should be changed when dealing with this Crown corporation and with others.

ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW CORPORATION—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister a final supplementary question dealing with the viability of the new entity which will now be financed with hundreds of millions of dollars by the people of Canada. Will he assure the House that if the new Canadair becomes financially viable, as we hope it will, the Government will not, having used taxpayers' money to fund it, turn it over at some point to the private sector which will reap long-run benefits if profits should start to come in?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to come back to the first or one of the first elements of the preamble of the question asked by the Hon. Member. While he said that appearing once a year before a Standing Committee of the House was not enough to make these corporations accountable for their management to Parliament, I would like to point out to him that, in the last few months, there have been opportunities of examining the accounts of these companies both before the Standing Committee where the Minister concerned is now appearing and before the Public Accounts Committee. Yesterday, I tabled in the House a reply given by the Minister before the Committee on Public Accounts which considered the situation at Canadair. I believe that in a year there are more than one opportunity of examining these issues and the Hon. Member should keep this in mind.

As far as the viability of Canadair is concerned, I can see that the Hon. Member is very optimistic and has already been convinced by the arguments put before the Special Committee by the Senator who is responsible, since he is already forecasting profits for Canadair. I congratulate him for being so confident in the new management mechanisms which the Government has introduced to ensure Canadair's viability.

INCOME TAX ACT

PART-TIME FARMERS' INCOME—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I shall make a point of order relating to Question Period at three o'clock.

Now that the Minister of Agriculture has finally entered the Chamber, I would like to ask him a question. The Minister has pointed out that all farm organizations, tax accountants, tax lawyers, and the Canadian Tax Foundation, have agreed that Section 31 of the Income Tax Act dealing with small and part-time farmers must be changed to be in tune with the times. As well, on July 18 and July 20 when the Minister talked with his provincial counterparts in Brudenell, he told them that they did not need to set up another task force but only needed to make representations to him which he would pass on. I wonder why the Minister of Agriculture has failed to convince the Minister of Finance of these things? The Minister of Finance has obviously not taken the Minister of Agriculture's advice, because the Minister of Finance has now set up another task force.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if the Hon. Member would like to check further, he would find that I told the provincial Ministers who attended the conference in Brudenell to go back to their Premiers and get government support for a change. I do not think that I heard one of those Ministers say that he had the support of his Government. I did hear from the Ministers individually, but I did not hear from the Government of Ontario, for instance. I did not hear Premier Davis say that he wanted that change made, and I did not hear any of the other provincial Premiers say that they wanted that legislation changed. The lawyers, accountants, and organizations mentioned by the Hon. Member, will have the opportunity to present their views to the committee which is being set up and which, I understand, will report back very quickly.

Mr. Dick: The Minister of Agriculture made some very interesting comments but, unfortunately, no reference whatsoever was made in the confidential minutes of that meeting indicating that the Ministers were to go and see their Premiers. They obviously thought that they represented the farming communities.

AMENDMENT OF SECTION 31—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance, but he is not present in the House. Perhaps the Minister of State for Finance might be able to comment on why the Department of Finance and the Minister of Finance did not take the advice of the Minister of Agriculture and all groups which have already made representations to have Section 31 of the Income Tax Act modified.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member will know from the recent Budget that provision has been made to hear the opinions of different sectors of the economy, and particularly the agricultural sector, regarding the application of Section 31 of the Income Tax Act. We shall conduct those consultations over the months ahead. I should welcome the views of the Hon. Member as much as I should welcome those of all Canadians who have an interest in this subject.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE RECIPIENTS

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Under the current provisions for war veterans allowance, single veterans over 65 years of age receive a war veterans allowance top-up of approximately $54 per month over and above their combined income from the OAS and GIS. Will the Minister assure the House that the budget announcement of an increase of $50 per month for single GIS recipients will be reflected in a $50 per month increase for war veterans allowance recipients? Will the Minister also increase the war veterans allowance top-up for married veterans to the same level as that for single veterans?

Hon. W. Bennett Campbell (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the Hon. Member that the provisions which were included in the Budget to provide for a $25 increase in the GIS as of July 1, and a further $25 increase as of December 1, will be passed through to all veterans simply by increasing the ceiling. Thus, the full benefits of the budgetary provision which is extended to all Canadians will be applied to veterans as well.

PERMISSIBLE INTEREST INCOME LEVEL

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the Minister said the provision would be applied to all veterans. Does he include those veterans who are not drawing a war veterans allowance and who are under the age of 65? Perhaps he could enlighten us by answering that question.

Veterans who are receiving war veterans allowance are only allowed $100 in the way of interest income per year before they start losing an equivalent amount from their war veterans allowance. In view of the current financial situation, would the Minister now make a commitment to raise this meagre amount of $100 to $1,000?

Hon. W. Bennett Campbell (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could clarify the matter. The $50 increase which is being provided to those who are over 65 years of age under the GIS will automatically be passed through to the recipients of war veterans allowance by increasing the ceiling by a similar amount. Of course, increasing that ceiling for single people who are over 65 years of age will also affect those who are under 65 years of age.

With respect to increasing the interest deduction, as I have indicated to the Hon. Member, I will be proposing a number of legislative amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act as a follow-up to the study which was conducted over the past number of months, and a provision to increase the interest earnings deduction will be one of those proposals.

AMATEUR SPORT

CONDITION OF SPORT INFRASTRUCTURES

Mr. Raymond Dupont (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport.

We are all aware of the presence in the House today of a great Canadian whose extraordinary achievements have placed Canada and speed skating in the limelight of the whole world. To prepare himself for such performances, he has had to leave his own country to train and compete abroad. Could the Minister brief us on the setting up of permanent infrastructures for our athletes in Canada?

Hon. Jacques Olivier (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): On this Olympian day of rejoycing, Mr. Speaker, in the presence of the best Canadian athletes who represented us in Sarajevo, I should like to remind the House that the Government of Canada announced last week that our athletes would no longer have to leave Canada to train in foreign countries. Indeed, we have managed to sign an agreement with the University of Calgary for the construction with the cooperation of that university of an indoor speed skating oval on the campus at a cost of some $35 million, so that our athletes may train here in Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Olivier: Moreover, we are proud of Gaétan Boucher's and Brian Orser's outstanding achievements which have helped amateur sports as well as all Canadian athletes. I must say that Sport Canada, the government which I represent and all Canadians are delighted for this opportunity to help our athletes. Needless to say we will make sure that similar facilities are available in Eastern Canada, so that Canadians may win many more gold medals in the future.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GUYANA—INCREASE IN RACIAL AND POLITICAL VIOLENCE

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The Minister will recall that a year ago he rejected the recommendation of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence that Canada should publicly disapprove of the Guyana Government's human rights policies and practices and should reduce aid to Guyana.

In view of the growing numbers of Guyanese who are clamoring to enter Canada, and especially the rising number of arrivals claiming to be refugees, will the Minister condemn the growing racial and political violence of the Burnham Government of Guyana, and halt aid to Guyana until that Government agrees to end its oppressive policies?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have no difficulty in espousing the cause of human rights in Guyana as has been done by the Hon. Member. We have drawn in the past and in the future we will continue to draw this matter to the attention of the authorities in Guyana. At the present time there has been no decision, nor is it my intention to terminate aid to that particular country—

Mr. Stevens: Shame!

Mr. MacEachen: —which is presently a member of the Commonwealth Caribbean to which we have directed special attention.

VISA REQUIREMENT FOR GUYANESE IMMIGRANTS

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question on the same subject is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In view of the rapidly worsening state of human rights in Guyana and the great danger to legitimate refugee claimants who can now apply to Canada only from within Guyana, will the Minister undertake to reconsider the visa requirement imposed this week? Will he also institute a special program for Guyanese in Canada like the ones previously established for Poles and currently for Guatemalans, and will he also guarantee that for the time being no Guyanese will be involuntarily returned to Guyana?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the Hon. Member's question is no. Just having applied the visa requirement, I do not think we should immediately begin to reconsider it. I will consider fully the other representations made by the Hon. Member.

DISTRICT OFFICIALS' ACTIONS

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, the other day the Minister of Justice told me that he had not been told of any allegations of criminal offences committed by Unemployment Insurance Commission employees, so today I want to ask the Minister of Employment and Immigration if he has had any reports passed along to him by the Department or the Deputy Minister which indicate allegations of criminal offences by a number of Unemployment Insurance Commission employees in several district offices across the country?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry but I did not catch the first few words of the Hon. Member's question. In terms of the substance of the question as I heard it, the answer is no, at least so far, and I certainly have not received any verbal communication of the representations he has described.

POSSIBLE BREACHES OF LAW

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, because there seems to be a pervasive attitude that civil servants who abuse their positions of trust are dealt with quite differently than if they were ordinary citizens, could the Minister please report back to the House on the number of possible criminal breaches that have taken place by Unemployment Insurance Commission employees, and the number of criminal prosecutions that have taken place as a result?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure of the full extent of the Hon. Member's insinuation. In terms of specific information that we have available, of course I will make it available to him in the appropriate way.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

EXPORTATION OF CAPE BRETON COAL

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development. The Minister will be aware of the conclusion of recent negotiations by the Cape Breton Development Corporation with a Japanese steel company and Brazilian Steel for the sale of Canadian coal, not only far below the cost of producing and delivering that coal but also far below the current Canadian export price.

Because this is creating new pressures and difficulties for the rest of the Canadian coal industry, I should like to ask the Minister whether he is aware of this, and how much of the $134 million which has been passed on to that company from the taxpayers in the current year was used up to capture new markets at the expense of other coal companies.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I am not familiar with the particular transaction. The Minister responsible might be in a better position to answer. The Minister responsible for Devco is in the House. It comes under the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, I noticed that the Minister was listening with keen interest so perhaps you could permit him to answer the question. I will put it to the Minister of Regional and Industrial Expansion.

I know the Minister is aware that the Cape Breton Development Corporation has recently completed negotiations for the sale of coal with Nippon Steel of Japan and Brazilian Steel at prices far below the cost of production at the plant, and delivery, and also far below current Canadian export prices. This creates all kinds of new pressures on the other coal companies in Canada. How much of the $134 million of taxpayers' money paid to this company in the current year has been used to subsidize Nippon Steel and Brazilian Steel?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that the sale price of the coal to Japan was less than the cost of production. We do not get involved in the individual transactions undertaken by Devco. The Hon. Member, like all Hon. Members on his side of the House, is always after the Government to cut losses of Crown corporations. I think Devco should be congratulated for trying to be aggressive and open up new markets around the world. I will check and find out for the Hon. Member whether the sale price of the coal was less than the price of production.

I am sure the Hon. Member knows, from his days in business, that in many cases in order initially to penetrate a market, you sell at a different price than you would for a long-term contract.

DEVCO'S USE OF PUBLIC FUNDS

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, if the Minister is not aware that Devco is operating below the cost of production, why would it be that we paid $134 million a year to that company, if it were not operating below the cost of production? No one has anything against that if the cheaper coal is available to Nova Scotia for the production of power. When the company goes out on the export market and uses that money to plan the demise of the rest of the coal industry, we ought to be concerned.

In light of this latest development, would the Minister examine the criteria under which grants are made to Devco, to ensure that public money is not used in this way, and examine in light of his criteria the latest negotiations which led to the sale of Cape Breton coal to Brazil and Japan?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I will go back to the first part of the Hon. Member's question. First of all he asked about one specific contract to sell to Japan. The last time we had an inquiry from one of the members of the Opposition concerning a specific contract with Japan where the product was allegedly sold at a lower price than it was sold to the power company in Nova Scotia, the allegation was incorrect. As a matter of fact we made a substantial profit on the last sale from Devco to Japan.

A comprehensive review of Devco is about to be undertaken with respect to all aspects of it. We think that there are so many exciting prospects for some of the mining projets in Devco that we want to ensure it is going to bring the maximum return not only to the people of Cape Breton and Nova Scotia, but also to all the people of Canada.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

LEVEL OF BENEFITS—CALCULATION OF TIPS AS INCOME

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment who will be aware of the concern expressed recently in Quebec, and elsewhere, by waiters and waitresses about the inconsistency between the policy of his Department and that of Revenue Canada regarding tips. Can the Minister indicate whether he intends to respond to that concern by making a commitment to change the Unemployment Insurance Act to provide that waiters and waitresses will receive UI benefits which take into account their tips in the same way they are now being regarded as revenue by Revenue Canada?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of course of great concern, and I am in the process of making arrangements to discuss with the appropriate Minister in Quebec the proposals or suggestions the Government of Quebec has to make in this regard. My concern would be that, whatever is done, if there is something to be done, it will be done in a way appropriate for the whole country. I would certainly not want to respond with any actions which could be interpreted or would in substance be anything that could seem to be an extension of snooping or untoward prying into the lives of waiters and others who receive tips as a substantial part of their income.

NATIONAL REVENUE—TREATMENT OF TIPS AS INCOME

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, I was not just asking that something be done with regard to the request by the Government of Quebec. I am asking that something be done about this situation right across Canada. In the absence of a commitment from the Minister to do something about this, perhaps I could ask the Minister of National Revenue, until he and his colleague get their heads together and decide what they are going to do about this, would he kindly ask his Department to lay off waiters and waitresses and stop treating them one way in one Department and another way in a different Department.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is confusing the isssue. He should take another look at the Income Tax Act and the provisions of the Act which oblige these people, like all Canadian citizens, to declare their full income, whatever that income may be. Since our basic system is a voluntary one, Canadians who receive income in the form of tips, as in the example given by the Hon. Member, are responsible for declaring and paying tax on such income.

The Hon. Member was asking whether these amounts should be recognized for the purposes of various social measures, but that is an entirely different matter which concerns other departments, and my responsibility is to administer . . . I see the Hon. Member is not really interested. I suppose he is merely interested in asking a question and not necessarily in the answer.

I suggest the Hon. Member take another look at the Income Tax Act. If he wants to blame me for enforcing the Act, that is his business. However, it is my responsibility to apply our voluntary system, and I ask everyone who receives income in this form to declare it on their returns.

EDUCATION

ENGINEERING AND BIOLOGY—DECLINE IN NUMBER OF GRADUATES

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Science and Technology who has read the Page Simons report on Canadian Studies and will know that in 1982 we were producing approximately half as many graduate Ph.D. engineers and biological scientists as we were in 1974. Can he tell the House why the Government is not treating that situation as a serious problem which deserves immediate redress? Why do we not see in the Budget, or in the Main Estimates, anything which would correct that problem for the future?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, as I understand the question, the Hon. Member is concerned about the lack of students in certain disciplines, which clearly is a matter of concern to all of us. I would like to assure him that the Government has gone a long way to increase funding for the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council which has those particular disciplines as one of its target areas. The funding for that Council in 1983-84 has been increased to approximately $282 million. This has been the focus of some very substantial government funding which represents the concern we all have that these particular disciplines be pursued because they are so fundamental to the future of our industrial economic development.

FUNDING OF UNIVERSITIES

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, in a pre-election year we can expect an expenditure blitz; the problem has been caused over a decade. This morning in The Globe and Mail we saw that major universities are intending to put quotas on enrollment for young people. They cannot get jobs, and now they will not be able to go to school.

Given the Minister's responsibility for science and technology, can he tell us why he has been part of a Cabinet which has cut money for universities and why he thinks that is a good public policy in the present climate?

An Hon. Member: That is wrong.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development and Minister of State for Science and Technology): That is just rubbish, Mr. Speaker. There has been no cut in university spending. If anything, this Government is committed to the view that the future of this country rests with the people.

[Translation]

Brain power or "matière grise" as they say in Quebec.

An Hon. Member: He does not have much of that.

Mr. Johnston: That is where we are going to put additional funding. That is exactly the policy we have followed, and we will continue to follow. Mr. Speaker, I just mentioned that we increased our Council's budget by an amount that is exceptional compared to past funding. So when the Hon. Member says that we are not interested, that is just not true. In fact, this is probably our main concern: to increase human resources in Canada.

An Hon. Member: Hear, hear!

TOURISM

EFFECT OF GASOLINE PRICES

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. A government bulletin issued by Tourism Canada, dated February 10, states that "in 1983 Canada had a record travel deficit that will easily top $2 billion", and it goes on to say "an important cause of this deficit is the much higher price of gasoline in Canada compared to the United States", that difference being 45 cents a gallon. In view of these facts, added to the ones I brought to his attention before, would the Government not now give serious consideration to cancelling the Canadian Ownership Tax of four cents a gallon on gas and oil at the pump, a completely unauthorized tax for the last ten months, and which has brought the total of federal taxes added to the price of gasoline since the last election to 50 cents a gallon?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know this is a serious and valid question. The Hon. Member will join me in saying that both he and I give a good example to Canadians because we travel in Canada. I had the pleasure of seeing—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McDermid: I knew you could not keep a straight face.

Mr. Trudeau: —the Hon. Member at Mont Tremblant last weekend, and he was travelling on good Canadian gasoline for which he had paid, no doubt, a larger amount than would be necessary and possible if only the Provinces, which take by far the largest amount of taxation, would begin by reducing some of the provincial taxes. After that we might consider what role we could play here.

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER TAKE ACTION

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, the federal Government owes the country an example in this regard, and tourism is a primary responsibility of this Government. Tourism is suffering a deficit of over $2 billion a year and countless jobs could be provided if that deficit did not exist. I ask the Prime Minister if he would not now, as a way of winding down, give serious consideration to domestic issues such as this one, which are of tremendous importance to the average Canadian man and woman, and to the jobs additional tourism, if it were made available and possible by a lower gasoline price, would provide to Canadians?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I indicated my sympathy and understanding for the question, but it seems to me the Hon. Member has spoiled it by two false premises in his second question. The Hon. Member says it is primarily federal responsibility. Would he indicate in his supplementary question what section of the Constitution says that? The Hon. Member is quite mistaken in projecting his own future dispositions to mine when he says that I am winding down. He may be winding down. I do not plan to wind down.

• (1500)

Mr. Hees: I would like to assure the Prime Minister that I will not be winding down for many years to come.

PENITENTIARIES

CONJUGAL VISITING UNITS—USE BY COMMON LAW WIVES

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General of Canada. The conjugal units placed at federal institutions were originally intended for visits by wives of long term prisoners. Has this program now been extended to common law wives?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, from its original concept the program was meant to include visits by people in relationships which the Hon. Member describes as common law. That is not a change. That has been a permanent feature of the program.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. WADDELL—CDIC BILL

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order pertaining to a question to the President of the Privy Council and Government House Leader on government business. The issue of the CDIC Bill was brought up in Question Period. Is the Minister prepared to tell the House whether he is going to bring that Bill forward?

Mr. Speaker: This is not the time for that matter. Normally questions regarding government business are placed on Thursdays.

LOUIS DAVID RIEL ACT

MEASURE TO GRANT A PARDON

Mr. Speaker: It is my understanding the Hon. Member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) wishes to move his Bill. The Chair would like to make some observations. Before putting the motion of the Hon. Member for leave to introduce a Bill intituled an Act to Grant a Pardon to Louis Riel, the Chair ought to bring to the attention of the Hon. Member that, although this Bill can be introduced and read for the first time, debate on second reading stage should not be entered upon until Royal consent is obtained, because the granting of a pardon is the prerogative of the Crown. I am quoting from May's Twentieth Edition and would like to insert the following passage into Hansard at this point. It reads:

—if the matters affecting the royal interests form the main or a very important part of a bill, it would be courting waste of time if the permission of the Crown to proceed with the Bill were not ascertained at the outset. In such cases, accordingly, the communication from the Queen is signified at the earliest stage of debate—usually the second reading.

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-228, An Act to grant a pardon to Louis David Riel.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that the Hon. Member shall have leave to introduce the Bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of granting permission for the Hon. Member to have leave to introduce the Bill please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It is a matter of custom and practice that Private Members normally have leave to introduce a Bill so that we can see what it says. We are experiencing the beginning of a division on something which Members have not even seen. No matter what the subject matter of a Bill is, it has always been traditional in this place for Private Members to be granted consent at least to introduce their Bill so we can see it.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair is the servant of the House. The Chair very distinctly heard noes when the Chair asked if there was consent. In the circumstances, the Chair has to ascertain whether or not the House approves or disapproves.

Those in favour of granting consent to the Hon. Member for leave to introduce the Bill please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed please say nay. The Hon. Member for Edmonton East.

Mr. Yurko: Mr. Speaker, the Bill which I introduced today is intended to grant a posthumous pardon to Louis Riel. He is a hero of western Canada whose memory is revered from one end of the country to the other by the issuance of stamps, the building of statues, the naming of roads and institutions, and the designation of days of recognition. I ask the Government to make this a government Bill and then, accordingly, to request the Queen, through appropriate procedures, to grant such a pardon. Surely this is the least the Government can do after the abject failure of the First Minister's Conference on Aboriginal Rights.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Hon. Member cannot debate the Bill at this point. A brief explanation of the Bill is all that is permitted.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1984-85

The House resumed from Tuesday, March 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacLaren that Bill C-21, an Act to provide borrowing authority, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, when I concluded my remarks yesterday I was pointing out that John Turner had set the course for the Government's continued deficit financing. Since then Canadians have learned that such deficits are not cure-alls. The Ontario Economic Council points out very forcibly that such huge deficits crowd out desirable investments. When the federal Government borrows 90 cents of every dollar put aside by Canadians, it starts a strong competition for the remaining 10 per cent. The higher interest rates, which automatically follow on supply and demand, lead to increased inflation. We as a people have gone through that cycle once before. We do not want to do it again, Mr. Speaker, nor can this economic recovery about which we are hearing stand a further round of high interest and inflation.

These high deficits are a reflection of over-spending. Federal government spending for the upcoming fiscal year will exceed $98 billion. This represents a year over year increase of 10.5 per cent. The Minister followed the six and five program of restraint, so he says, by promising to hold the line at 4 per cent in his February Budget. It takes a rather elastic line indeed, one that has lost all of its strength and control, to allow a stretch from 4 per cent to 10.5 per cent.

Bill C-21 is the inevitable result of a government's refusal to live within its means. Every home owner in this country knows how discouraging it is to pay on a mortgage year after year and not see any reduction on the principal of that mortgage. When individual citizens or organizations borrow money and go into debt, they must repay their loans as well as interest that has accumulated on it. Governments are really no different, except that some governments close their eyes and increase taxation. It is that simple for them. But tell that to the taxpayers of St. Catharines. They know what a thousand dollars is worth. They believe that their tax dollar is going into Public Works, National Defence, social programs and so on. But not any more. That $1,000 per taxpayer in St. Catharines is his annual contribution to the public debt service charges.

It takes no great intellectual wizard to understand that these service charges will crowd essential programs. We want the Government's spending madness to stop now.

To put it quite simply, I would be treating the taxpayers in my riding with contempt if I voted for this legislation. It is irresponsible and we have had enough. Cut the request in half, I say.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised—or not surprised, I suppose—that there is no one on the other side who is prepared to defend this fantastic attempt to have the House grant the Government unlimited power to borrow when it has once again just shown how incompetent and how consciousless it is when it comes to the spending of public money.

We were discussing Canadair during Question Period. For example, this Bill is not needed to permit the Government to issue guarantees to Crown corporations. Not is it needed to permit Crown corporations to borrow. We are only dealing with the Government borrowing for its own direct purposes. The Government is asking the House to give it the authority to borrow $29.5 billion, more than the Government's alleged deficit, which is supposed to be $29.6 billion in the year beginning April 1. It says that it will have to borrow $25.55 billion on the financial markets. It will borrow $25.55 billion on the financial markets. It will borrow $4.05 billion from the pension funds and the like of the Government. It wants to borrow more than it says its deficit will be. It behooves any Member of the House who believes in parliamentary control to oppose that attempt. Incidentally, I see that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Gray) is here today. I was dumbfounded to read in the newspapers yesterday that he had been having conversations with John Turner. Say it isn't so, Herb, say it isn't so. I have my money put on you to become leader of the Liberal Party of Canada and I do not want you chickening out in this shameful manner, particularly to a right wing extremist such as Mr. Turner. I hope there will be an announcement from the President of the Treasury Board. I hope that it is a leadership committee meeting that he is holding there, across the aisle. I suppose he was speaking to Mr. Turner about his experience with respect to bankruptcies so that he could apply the knowledge to Canadair.

Mr. Tobin: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Never send a juvenile delinquent on a man's issue. Do you realize that the Government has thrown away $2 billion on Canadair?

Mr. Tobin: Tory nonsense.

Mr. Crosbie: Two billion dollars is the equivalent of the whole public debt of the Province of Nova Scotia. The hon. gentleman over there, from whatever riding he is—

Mr. Tobin: Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe.

Mr. Crosbie: —should realize that he is better seen and not heard. It does him a lot of damage when he is heard. Two billion dollars was thrown away on Canadair.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order. May I request that we have some order in the House? The Hon. Member's remarks may not please everyone, but he has a right to say what he wants to say.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, let the record note that a Liberal boar from the porkbarrel is interrupting me with loud shouts.

The Ottawa Citizen today pointed out:

> But even if the 'new' company starts turning a profit, interest on the old debts will push the total taxpayers'—

Mr. Tobin: Are you enjoying yourself, John?

Mr. Crosbie: I am surprised you can get your snout out of the trough long enough to make a sound—other than the grunt that comes from them all. That is the quack quack government. The lame duck government.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Crosbie: They are quaking with their quacks.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I want to know if a press release has been issued by the office of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) authorizing this speech in advance of its being delivered.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order. I believe the House is quite raucous. We can have more order than this. That was not a point of order. Let us hear what the Hon. Member who has the floor has to say. On the other hand, I would remind the Hon. Member that he could make his remarks a bit less inflammatory, which could help him have more calm during his speech.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your fairmindedness and impartial advice. We are the Party of freedom fighters. We are not the Party that has to say yes every time our Leader says yes or no when he says no.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: The hallmark of the brothel keeper is to be a Liberal. It is not the hallmark of our Party. Let me get back to my remarks. The Ottawa Citizen points out:

> But even if the 'new' company starts turning a profit, interest on the old debts will push the total taxpayers' tab to about $3.5 billion—roughly $160 for every man, woman and child in the country—

This is all in aid of 1,200 jobs to produce executive jets. There is something wrong when the Canadian taxpayer has to be asked to pay $3.5 billion in total, in advances of both principal and interest, to any company for that kind of purpose. The article points out that it involves enough public money to double the income supplements of every poor pensioner in the country and have $1 billion left over. If the same amount of money that is being spent on Canadair were spent to double the income supplement of every poor pensioner in this country, there would still be $1 billion left over. It is more than the Government budgeted this year for all the unemployment insurance contributions, direct job-creation schemes and training programs combined. That is how the Government spends public money. That is another reason for us to refuse to support this Bill.

Of course, there are many reasons for refusing to support the Bill. Let me point out another very likely inaccuracy in the figures that the Government is presenting to us. It wants us to believe that its deficit this year will be $29.6 billion. That is a huge amount, but it refuses to tell Members of the House what interest rate projections it is using for this and the coming years when it estimates what the interest payments will be on that debt. It says that it cannot tell the Members of the House what its forecasts of interest levels are because this would indicate to the market what it thinks and would therefore affect the market. It fails to explain why the United States gives these forecasts for nine years ahead without affecting the market. But we cannot do so in Canada.

Other economic forecasters will do that. Chase Econometrics, for example, give their projections of what interest rates will be for this year and for 1985. The Government fails to explain why it is that in the United States of America they can give forecasts for nine years ahead without affecting the market, but in Canada we cannot do so. Other economic forecasters do that. Chase Econometrics, for example, gave its projections on what interest rates will be for this year and for the next five. Its projection is 9.9 per cent on the average this year, then 11.3 per cent next year, and 11.2 per cent for the following year. The Conference Board of Canada gives projections. Data Resources does, and so does Informetrica Ltd. The University of Toronto gives projections but the Government of Canada does not. Why not, Mr. Speaker? Because the Government's forecasts would be a laughed out of the country if it did that.

My analysis is that the Government of Canada is forecasting that interest rates will decline to 7.5 per cent, in other words, 3 percentage points under the estimates of all the other forecasters. That is the interest rate level the Government is using in making its estimates of how much interest the Government will pay this year on the debt. If that is what the Government has done and if interest rates stay at present levels instead of declining 3 percentage points, as the Government appears to be indicating, the analysis in the April, 1983 Budget indicates that the deficit this year will be $5.2 billion larger and the non-Budget borrowing requirements $3 billion more. That is how important this issue is.

Until this Government is prepared to tell the Members of this House what interest rate forecast it is using in calculating the interest to be paid this year, which is in excess of $21 billion, and treats us the same way as all the other economic forecasters do—and they are all willing to make their forecasts for the next five years—we cannot believe what the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. MacLaren) says about what our interest costs are going to be and what the deficit is going to be this year, or whether or not the deficit will be anywhere near what the Government forecasts in the next four years. Come clean with us, Mr. Minister of State for Finance, and then we can consider what to do with this Bill.

I believe my time has expired, Mr. Speaker. I have a lot more to say. Perhaps I could get unanimous consent to continue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Yes, the Hon. Member's time has expired. Is there unanimous consent for the Hon. Member to continue?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Crosbie: There does not appear to be any objection, Mr. Speaker. I will not abuse—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order, please. The Hon. Member does not have unanimous consent.

Mr. Crosbie: But who objected, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order, please. This is not a question for the Chair to determine. The Hon. Member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail).

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate on Bill C-21, the Borrowing Authority Act. Before I begin my remarks to put our side of the argument forward, I want to make a reference to an attempt to describe the previous speaker as the bionic mouth. It has been drawn to my attention that the previous speaker has been very loose with his quips and has attacked the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) and others, as he is prone to do. I would like to remind him of some of his comments regarding his Party's previous election promises. I am speaking of the Member of Parliament for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). He said, "We are not going to do something just because it was promised during the campaign and we decide now that it is not the right thing to do". The Hon. Member for St. John's West went on to say, "I would conclude from these analyses that we have a free hand to do exactly what we think is best for the country".

Mr. Crosbie: That is certainly what you did.

Mr. Harquail: He went on to make a series of other comments, which really, upon reflection, are not worth repeating in this House.

Although we heard many indications from the Tories about wanting to take a new and fresh approach and about the Opposition Party wishing to make a sincere effort to bring forward a new look, a new approach and a new leader, when one reads and listens, as I have done in recent days, to speeches both on the Budget and on this Borrowing Authority Bill, one finds there is very little that is new. Indeed, it is the same old gang spewing gloom and doom and saying nothing is good in Canada. I disagree with that.

I want to say a few positive things this afternoon about the determination of this Government to do realistic and responsible planning with respect to contingency amounts for traditional borrowings that have gone on over the years and for this particular borrowing authority.

This contingency amount is to cover the impact of large and unpredictable foreign exchange operations on the financial requirements and to ensure that the Government will be able to continue its regular debt program in the event the House is not in session or has been dissolved. In essence, the contingency amount is designed to avoid any disruptions in the borrowing program which might lead to unnecessary disruptions in the exchange or capital markets which, in turn, might lead to upward pressure on interest rates. This is something which we on this side are determined to avoid. The Government will account for all the borrowing undertaken in a fiscal year. The Government will not borrow more than is necessary and it does not have to use up all the borrowing authority granted by Parliament. We know Government expenditures are controlled by Parliament and that the contingency does not permit spending beyond that reasonable amount. What we are looking at in this contingency amount is something that will give the Government flexibility in its financial operations. It will help to avoid unnecessary disruptions, as I have already mentioned.

Let me mention some of the initiatives from October, 1982. There was $500 million allocated for the NEED program, which was very successful in creating much needed jobs. Certainly in the Atlantic area this was a welcome thrust to the economy during that difficult winter period. In April, 1983 we saw $4.8 billion allocated over a four-year period under the Special Recovery Program. Indeed, every nook and cranny of the country has in one way or the other, directly or indirectly, benefited from this dynamic, positive thrust by the Government to protect those less fortunate and those unable to find work. There was $1 billion allocated in December, 1983 for youth initiatives which came under the Youth Opportunity Fund. There was an additional $400 million—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order, please. The Hon. Member for Timiskaming (Mr. MacDougall) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. MacDougall: Mr. Speaker, last week when I was making a speech during the debate on the Budget I was corrected by you in the chair for reading a speech. I was wondering whether you are prepared today to make a ruling concerning the Hon. Member who is now speaking.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): If the Hon. Member who has the floor is reading a prepared speech, he should abide by the rules of this House and speak without a prepared text.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harquail: Mr. Speaker, that was a very unnecessary interruption by the Hon. Member. I do not have a prepared text.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Harquail: I am not reading from a prepared text. It is not my habit to read from a prepared text.

Mr. Crosbie: It would be of no help to you anyway.

Mr. Harquail: But I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, that when I am talking about important matters, such as fiscal matters, I have with me reference notes with respect to figures. As is expected of me, I want to be accurate in the figures I quote and not adopt the practice of some Members to your left who are, from time to time, reckless with figures. I do not wish to resort to that practice.

Mr. Taylor: That is what the Hon. Member had when he was called to order.

Mr. Harquail: We know from long accepted practice that one should speak without a prepared text, and I assure you that I do not have such a prepared text.

Mr. Friesen: Methinks he protests too much.

Mr. Harquail: What I am referring to are the figures which I am quoting from documents that I brought forward in the preparation of my presentation today.

I want to tell the Opposition that it should get away from trying to instil fear in the Canadian people. Why do Opposition members not talk about positive things, such as what we are doing—

Mr. Crosbie: Where are they?

• (1530)

Mr. Harquail: The Opposition should look at the reason for this borrowing authority. We want to carry out the important transportation programs which have been adopted by the Government to improve our highway networks, our ports, our airports and all such facilities. I would like to talk for a moment about the transportation need. If our economy is to suceed, we must continue moving forward and creating more jobs. It goes hand in glove that we must have a good transportation system—a good highway transportation system, good and efficient ports, efficient airports and the like, not to mention the need for good highways when we talk about tourism. If we talk about inviting people to come to Canada, we must provide them with good highways to travel about our beautiful country. This is just one element which allows me to rise and speak in a positive way about the reasons for the need for improvements to the transportation facilities in the country. Also I would like to mention the other important programs which my Party has brought forward and this Government has sustained over the years in the area of health and social programs. We are constantly bringing forward new initiatives to assist our youth, our seniors and women who want to develop and hone their abilities to participate in the Canadian workplace. This is the complete raison d'être behind bringing forward this Bill at this time.

As I started to say, the continual traditional, narrow-minded role played by opposition Members in constantly nitpicking everything that is brought before the House does not go unnoticed by taxpayers. Surely Canadian people are on to this type of tactic and strategy—nothing is ever good, nothing is ever worthwhile. However, Canadians see the actual benefits which accrue to them in all regions of the country, certainly in the Atlantic region. That kind of thrust has resulted in new developments, such as new downtown projects which are under way. These projects create jobs for people who want to work. That is the position of the Government. That is what we are endeavouring to do. That is the reason we must get on with approving this Bill.

Naturally we, the majority Government in Parliament, have the support of the Canadian public. This is what Canadians expect us to do. They expect us to accept our responsibilities and to move forward boldly with our policies and programs. They do not want us only to talk about them. They want us to implement them. That is what we are all about.

In conclusion, I invite all Hon. Members, especially opposition Members, to make a sincere effort to look beyond their noses and a little deeper into the benefits accruing to Canadians. Indeed, Canadians are awaiting the approval of funds for projects in their constituencies. We have to allow for people living in those parts of Canada where, because of world economic difficulties they are suffering unemployment. We want to attempt under the new Ministry of Youth to put young people to work in the country.

Mr. Crosbie: You have $4 billion in cash.

Mr. Harquail: I am fed up with the opposition of such Members as the Hon. Member for St. John's West and some of his colleagues. They try continually to tear down some of the positive work we are attempting to do. Let us get on with the job and stop some of this rhetoric.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-21, an Act to provide borrowing authority, asks Members of Parliament to give the federal Government approval to borrow $29.55 billion for fiscal year 1984-85. How can responsible Members of Parliament possibly give blanket approval to such an amount and to such an unspecified request? Why does the Government not indicate which budgetary items this is to cover? How can we approve expenditures which we believe, in the most part, are unnecessary or wrong?

We in this Party do not agree that the Government should have given over $1.35 billion to Canadair. Now it plans to wipe out this debt completely and provide a further loan of $310 million. We did not agree with the PIP grants to oil companies which cost over $1.6 billion. We did not and do not approve the borrowing of moneys for Liberal patronage and slush funds, nor do we approve of the deferral of corporate taxes which could bring $22 billion more into this year's Budget and thus require much less borrowing authority. We do not agree with the loss of taxes from unnecessary loopholes which the Government is only too glad to give to high-paid professionals and high-income people in its latest Budget.

I oppose this Bill for the same reasons that I opposed the Liberal Budget which included unnecessary costs, which forgot the hundreds of thousands of unemployed people, which made only a token grant for youth jobs and completely ignored jobs and training for women. It gave all the benefits to higher-income people and corporations. This is just another Tory type of financing; it is not humanitarian or practical.

In particular, the federal Budget was not a love story for Canadian women. Canadian women are struggling as never before to survive and pay their costs. In many cases they are the sole supporters of their families. The Budget contained the long-awaited increase in the GIS for poor single pensioners. Of course, we would agree with borrowing money for that, but we must point out that it was long overdue and certainly is not enough to bring pensioners above the poverty line. Unfortunately, it leaves elderly single women who make up three-quarters of this group well below the poverty line. The average income of pensioners with no other income will rise to only $7,200. This amount is $624 short of the minimum amount recommended by the all-Party task force on pension reform. It is much below the real poverty line.

We agree with pension splitting between spouses proposed in the Budget. It is another program which was long advocated by women's organizations. It does not cost the Government a cent. Why did it not bring in this policy sooner? However, our major concerns regarding pension reform are that the Liberals, like the Conservatives, concentrate only on private pension schemes. There is no way that this will provide adequate, secure retirement coverage for the needs of Canadian women in particular. The Liberals refuse to reform the public pension plan even though the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) advocated this in earlier speeches. We know that this is the only way to ensure adequate universal pension coverage for all retired people. Canada Pension Plan benefits should have been increased to 50 per cent of the average industrial wage.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare stated in her Budget speech that the Budget brought in "ideal pensions". Then, of course, she had to admit that it depended entirely upon how the private sector responded and to say that this was its last chance. Obviously she is not completely confident that the Liberal pension proposals will be taken up by the private sector. The Liberal pension plan is based upon tax deductions and voluntary individual payments into RRSPs.

I ask, to whom does this really respond, to what income group? Very few working people on average incomes and with families are able to find $1,500 in spare cash to put into RRSPs. Of course, lower-income people, particularly single women, are completely left out of this kind of coverage. How many businesses will be able to find the extra cash flow to put in place schemes for their employees, even though they may be a little broader in proposed coverage?

With the exception of pension splitting, the Budget proposals which reform part of the Canada Pension Plan, the rest of the CPP proposals, are only to be studies. I warn Canadian women that both the Liberals and the Conservatives are playing politics when they talk about a homemaker's pension. That is not going to be in any way valid from the point of view of most Canadian women. Our minority report recommendations and the recommendations of labour and other groups was to raise CPP benefits to half the industrial wage. We believe that a universal public pension scheme is the only way to bring women pensioners above the poverty line once and for all.

● (1540)

The expenditures of this borrowing Bill will not be targeted to the needs of women. In her speech, the Minister responsible for the Status of Women talked about how great this Budget is for women. I asked her to explain why there were no job-creation programs targeted to women, no retraining programs for those who will be displaced by high technology, and no federal initiatives to assist with essential support services so that women can get into the work force and remain there. I asked why there were no support systems such as daycare and parental leave. Instead of answering the question, she praised the Government programs as being quite adequate.

Canadian women do not agree with this answer. Thousands of women want jobs. They want equality in the workplace. They want and need to work, especially women in very risky jobs such as in the clerical and service categories. Every day these jobs are being lost to high technology. The Budget and this borrowing Bill completely neglect this important issue for Canadian women.

There is no job protection or work alternatives for women, something that is really needed. We cannot approve this kind of blanket borrowing authority for billions of dollars. The Minister responsible for the Status of Women also praised the Government's affirmative action program, which is not mandatory, does not include contract compliance and does not apply to job-creation programs. Statistics show that far fewer women are getting into job-creation programs funded by the federal Government. This Government is taking no steps to preserve jobs for women. Why is there no fund to assist over 200 women, mostly immigrants, who will soon lose their jobs at Puretex Canada, a Toronto sportswear factory? The Government quickly found billions of dollars to bail out Dome and Massey-Harris, but cares nothing about saving industries which employ women. Puretex is a good example of that.

The federal Government has added to the hardship of women forced into taking part-time jobs with part-time pay cheques and no benefits. Those who work half-time will be covered by the Canada Pension Plan, but the Government ignored most of the recommendations from their commission on part-time work last year, steps that are urgently needed for women.

Woman have not been considered in the six and five provisions of the federal Government. There will be no catchup provisions for them. We are very concerned about the total compensation comparisons with the private sector. This means women will be locked into the same pay scales, which are far too low for secretarial and maintenance jobs in the private sector.

We criticized the Liberals justifiably. As a British Columbian, I can tell you that it will be far worse if the Conservatives get into government. One of their speakers who spoke earlier today said that if he becomes Finance Minister, he will require a means test. Knowing his record on women, he will be chopping some of the important programs I have mentioned.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, I must say that the time allotment ran out for the last speaker at the most appropriate moment. She was ready to make sure that the rich get more out of the Treasury and deprive the poor.

In speaking to this borrowing Bill, there is a sense of déjà vu. We are back to the same thing again. In the four years in the life of this Parliament, this is the eighth borrowing request. That is in addition to the regular revenues that the Government receives. Within the life of this Parliament we are looking at a cumulative borrowing of $102.85 billion, almost $103 billion. I agree with the other Members that it is bad enough to have such things as the bailout of Maislin and Canadair and some other projects, but I object if much of this borrowing is, as it probably is, to help with the Liberal slush fund. In the last month or two, we have repeatedly heard about special funds provided for Liberal back-benchers only. They have total discretion over how those funds are spent in their constituencies, and maybe in others.

To get a picture of what is going on in the whole scene of borrowing in this country, we have to put it in perspective with past experience. In this one Bill, we are asked to give the Government permission to borrow $29.55 billion. In this one borrowing authority, they are asking for almost three times as much as the total deficit of the entire nation in all of Canadian history when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) came into office in 1968. Our country was in debt for $11 billion for the first 101 years of our history. In one borrowing authority, we are being asked to give permission to borrow almost three times that amount for one year.

I listened with care to the Hon. Member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail), who incidentally reads very well. He said that this borrowing authority, which will supply money for the Government until March 31, 1985, "will help to avoid unnecessary interruptions". That is a very insightful comment by the Hon. Member for Restigouche. What kind of unnecessary interruptions could there be during the next year? Could there be such things as a leadership race in the Liberal Party? Would that be an unnecessary interruption? Following the leadership convention in June, would a possible general election be an unnecessary interruption?

What does the Member mean by "unnecessary interruption"? Does he mean that an interruption is the need to come back to Parliament to borrow more money? In two of the eight borrowing Bills in the last four years we discovered that the Government was asking for far more money than it needed to operate. The Government had to reduce the amount requested in Bill C-125, at the request of the Opposition. It reduced by $4 billion the amount in Bill C-151 because Opposition Members demanded it. The Government was borrowing more than it needed so that it would not have to keep coming back to Parliament for more money. It is a nuisance factor in this parliamentary system for the Government to come back to Parliament and ask for more money. It is a subtle reminder that it is overspending.

The Hon. Member for Restigouche talked about avoiding unnecessary interruption. It is another way of saying that the Government is asking for permission to borrow more than it needs, as it does not want to come back to Parliament to ask for permission at very awkward moments. Those awkward moments happen to be such things as leadership conventions and election campaigns. Between now and March 31, 1985, the Government will have permission to borrow enough money so that it will not have to put up with the nuisance of coming back to Parliament. I do not think that we as Members can afford to see this institution as being a nuisance or an unnecessary interruption for the Government. This is the arena in which the Government must display what little sense of responsibility it has left.

As I said before, if in fact there were no such things as Liberal slush funds or bailouts and the Government still needed all of this money, then there would be another very serious question to ask, and that is, whether we are living within our means. Are we paring down the Budget in such a way that we can operate using our cash flow? When this particular borrowing Bill will amount to 4.5 per cent of our GNP or cash flow, we must ask ourselves whether the Government is prepared to live within the means at its disposal.

I noticed that under this particular borrowing Bill, interest payments alone will cost every taxpayer $1,500 a year. That is needed just to meet the interest payments. That, Mr. Speaker, is like going to Household Finance to pay for your grocery bill. They want a little more every time, and we cannot afford to pay those kinds of interest rates. We are mortgaging the future of our children and our grandchildren.

After the Hon. Member for Lotbinière (Mr. Dubois) spoke yesterday, I asked him if he thought it was right to make sure that our children and grandchildren will inherit a debt over which they have no say at all. They cannot vote on whether or not they want to pay the debt we are leaving to them as an inheritance. His answer to me indicated pretty clearly the mentality of the Government. He said that the cash flow of the Government will keep on increasing, and with the increase in the Gross National Product we will be able to pay this accumulated debt. Is there anything on the record which would substantiate what was said by the Hon. Member for Lotbinière? As recorded on page 2041 of Hansard, he concluded his answer to my question by saying:

> I have therefore no worries as far as the future generations are concerned, Mr. Speaker.

I simply want to ask all Hon. Members if they agree with that kind of statement. Does it not bother them at all that when they support this kind of drunken borrowing mentality, they are saying in effect that their children and grandchildren will inherit a debt that may be beyond their ability to pay? Does it not bother them at all?

I was visiting a shirt-tail relative of mine in the City of Portland a few weeks ago, Mr. Speaker. That relative is a businessman. With a very quizzical look on his face, he said to me: "Do we ever have borrowing problems down here in the United States! Do you people up in Canada have problems like that?" I looked at him and said: "I wish we had your problems". In the United States, they are talking about a debt of $200 billion in a country with a population of about 240 million people. I wish we had those kinds of problems. I told him that our per capita debt this year alone will be 40 per cent higher than his. He shook his head, in disbelief. These are the problems with which we are wrestling, Mr. Speaker.

Do we give the Government a blank cheque to borrow more money than it needs in order to operate this year? Without taking into account rising interest rates, the Government has projected our debt as being $31 billion. With interest rates now rising, we can assume that that debt will be even higher, because the Government will have to pay a higher rate of interest.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we can in no way endorse this kind of irresponsible borrowing. We cannot endorse the kind of mentality of government members who ask for as much as they want for the next year so that they may avoid unnecessary interruptions and spend as they like.

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, on most occasions it is a pleasure to rise in the House, but it is not a pleasure when discussing a borrowing Bill of the size of the one that is before us at this time. One might recall that in 1969, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that we will be on the road to financial disaster if nothing is done to bring spending under control. In that year, we spent $13.8 billion. Now we are spending $100 billion a year and we can see the problems that that has created.

It is interesting to look over the records and see just who was in charge of our public accounts and spending programs in the past. I have a list here which goes back to 1967 when Mr. Benson was the Minister of Finance. Something that should stand him in good stead, I suppose, as he continues in government service for what seems to be a very long time is that he was the last Finance Minister for the Liberal Government who in 1969-70 showed a surplus. He actually showed a surplus of $493 million in 1969. That was the last surplus the Government ever had, and that was 15 years ago or more. The original idea behind accounting in a businesslike way was that one would lose some money one year and save it up the next.

In 1970, Mr. Benson lost $372 million, and the following year the deficit reached $702 million. In those days that seemed to be pretty horrible. The deficit rose to just under a billion dollars in what would appear to be Mr. Benson's final year as Minister of Finance.

Next, the Hon. John Turner came on to the scene in 1972 and began to lead the way. He produced a 1972-73 Budget which lost $999 million. He produced a Budget in 1974 which lost $1,733 million on the year's operations, and then he produced another Budget in 1975 which nearly quadrupled that loss, making a deficit of $5,463 million. At that point, the Hon. John Turner withdrew from public life in shame and humiliation, one might assume, or to protect himself from having the reputation of being a member of the Liberal Party. However, in any case, he disappeared, and I believe he is now being resurrected as the only hope for leader of the Liberal Party and his coronation is to take place in June of this year.

I would like to let it be known that the record of the Hon. John Turner shows that in the first year he took over, he lost about a billion dollars, and in the last year that he was in charge of our financial operations, the deficit was $5 billion. By that time, the gross debt had risen to $58 billion from some $45 billion, which was the amount of the debt when he took over.

The Hon. John Turner was followed by another erstwhile candidate for leadership of the Liberal Party, the Hon. Donald Macdonald. He stayed on for only two budgets and managed to create a deficit of $6 billion as a result of one budget and $10 billion as a result of the other. He is now employed at an outrageous per diem amount to look into Canada's financial situation. He claims that he should not run for the leadership of the Liberal Party because he is involved in the Macdonald Commission which is inquiring into the country's economic status. Mr. Speaker, that former Minister should certainly know how to get into debt and into trouble.

He was followed by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Chrétien) who managed to increase the deficit of that day from $10.8 billion to $12.2 billion. By that time our gross debt was $95 billion. This is the Minister who was one of the proponents and champions of the Challenger.

Then came the second bright spot in this recital. In the year following that in which the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was Minister of Finance, the deficit dropped from $12.2 billion to $11.4 billion. That is when the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) was Minister of Finance. However, good things do not last long; he was followed by today's Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) who had the most disastrous of all Budgets. It is a truism to say now that he was the worst Minister of Finance since the Hon. John Turner, although some people class the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources as being on a par with Mr. Turner. I think the Deputy Prime Minister wins the gold cup, and should keep it forever, for his Budgets. When he left the scene, the gross debt was around $134 billion.

It is therefore no wonder, Mr. Speaker, that we are concerned about giving the Government more authority to spend money. Figures are almost meaningless. The Government wants to borrow $29.55 billion, and it is hard for an ordinary person to relate to that. We have heard about how far it would stretch if it were composed of $100 bills and how much that amount would have represented in the time of Christ and so on, but I find it difficult to explain to taxpayers.

The Government is using this Bill as convenience, to give some of its Members more time to run for the leadership of that Party. It is an interesting commentary on the Government that when the Prime Minister announced his resignation, the stock market went up immediately. That is rather typical of the hardheaded fashion in which the stock market operates. Under the guidance of the Prime Minister it was rather insecure and thought that perhaps it was in for better times when he tendered his resignation. When it found that the two leading challengers were former Finance Ministers in the Liberal Government, the market immediately went down and it has been stagnant ever since.

There are a lot of examples of this Government's misadventures and its waste of money, Mr. Speaker. For instance, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. De Bané) has vastly increased the money to be spent on an advertising campaign to get people of the world to eat more fish. That advertising sounds strange on the West Coast where we cannot catch enough fish at the present time to satisfy the market. Yet the Minister wants to increase the advertising budget. It is possible that at the same time the advertisements might carry a vivid portrait of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

Then there is today's news about the Canadair fiasco. We may lose $3.5 billion on the Challenger. If that company had 3,500 employees, that represents $1 billion each. It could have afforded to give each of them a separation allowance of $1 million six years ago and it would be no worse off today.

As was stated by Decima Research just the other day, people in Canada would like somebody to be the Prime Minister who can sympathize with or understand their problems. That has been a big problem for the Prime Minister, and I am afraid it will be for his successor.

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, this request for borrowing authority for $29 billion is of great concern to all Canadians, but particularly for the agricultural community. We have had a Government, a Minister of Finance and a Cabinet who have not acted responsibly toward spending. The news of the $3.5 billion that Canadair has cost the taxpayers is an example of this.

The Government's total budget for agriculture is $1.26 billion, out of a $100 billion Budget. One must ask where the Prime Minister, the Cabinet and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) place their priorities. I am sure that not only every taxpayer in Canada but every farmer—some of whom are facing bankruptcy and many who are facing very, very serious financial problems—is asking today how the government, the Cabinet and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) could relinquish their responsibilities in the way they have.

The Government is requesting borrowing authority of $29 billion. For practically a year and a half on this side of the House we have been asking the Government to take some action on the Western Grain Stabilization Program. Individual farmers pay as much as $1,200 each into that fund. This is their money, yet the Cabinet, the Prime Minister, the Minister of Agriculture and the Liberal Government have failed to put in place a formula that would trigger a payment to farmers.

When Otto Lang instigated the Western Grain Stabilization Program, the formula was set up to address the cash flow problem faced by farmers. There is $1 billion of farmers' money in that fund, yet the Government will not put in place the formula that would allow a pay-out to address their cash flow problems. This shows how serious our financial problems are and it shows the inability of the Government, of the Cabinet and of the Prime Minister to deal with them.

We have before us a Bill for advance grain payments to producers. We have been calling for that for months and we will give it quick passage. It would allow a farmer to borrow certain amounts of money in advance of delivering his grain. This Government has dragged its feet on agricultural matters.

Concerning the national energy policy, I sat in the committee and saw this Government move to the point where, as we heard today in the House, it is costing the consumers of Canada over 50 cents a gallon more for gasoline here than it does in the U.S. Remember the 18 cents a gallon, Mr. Speaker? Remember how terrible it was that the Conservatives were inflicting an 18 cent a gallon tax on gasoline on the Canadian consumer? Well, we now know the reality.

We on this side have called again and again for the removal of federal fuel taxation on food-producing lands. The Hon. Member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) moved a Private Members' Bill in that regard so as to improve the production of food. Again the Government fails to move and address the problem. This Government, this Prime Minister and this Cabinet must put its priorities in order. We have productive people, productive farmers. But unless we give them tools, opportunities and a fair chance, they will not be the engine of stimulation of the economy. Farmers contribute over $8 billion to the economy. In return, they get back $1.25 billion from a $100 billion budget. I think it is fair for the people of Canada to call upon the Prime Minister to address these very, very serious matters of finance and to reconsider the manner in which he handles the taxpayers' money.

I could read into the record the continuation of a long list of spending by this Government. Under this administration, the paper pushing bureaucrats cost the taxpayer some $17 million for 12,600 metric tonnes of office paper, which works out to roughly 90 pounds for each civil servant. We have done a great job in this country of circulating paper and spending, in this case, $17 million, but what is the return? That is the question this Government has to start asking itself very seriously. We have $50 million for the Maislin trucking company. Again this morning we saw the example of $3.5 billion for Canadair in excess spending. No wonder we have these heavy-handed methods being used by Revenue Canada to collect funds, which are necessary, should I say, when the Government has been very, very lax in spending the taxpayers' money.

I think it is only fair that we call for responsibility on the part of the Prime Minister and his Cabinet, indeed on the part of each backbencher, regarding the handling of the taxpayers' money.

Borrowing Authority Act

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join in this debate on the latest in a long series of Bills to provide borrowing authority to the Government. The purpose of Bill C-21 is to borrow some $29.55 billion for the fiscal year 1984-85. That rather staggers the imagination, but I suppose we have become inured to this kind of request from the Government over the past few years. But we should not be complacent simply because it has become the norm rather than the exception.

In this request the Government has asked for some $4 billion to cover unforeseen contingencies. One of my colleagues from the Conservative Party wondered aloud a few moments ago about what some of those contingencies might be. I have to wonder whether or not the fact we are in the fifth year of the Government mandate has any bearing on those so-called unforeseen contingencies.

Another matter of some alarm is the use to which the Government is putting many of its larger items of expenditure. I and my colleagues appreciate, as do many Members on both sides, the necessity for avoiding a collapse of the Canadian aircraft industry. Many of us here have seen that sort of thing take place in this country in the 1950s and 1960s. We do not particularly want that to happen again, but it is more than puzzling to think of the odd sense of priorities the Government must have when it devotes $1 billion, $2 billion or more to the future of a single corporation which employs some 7,000 to 8,000 people, while that same Government, when faced with the crying need for investment in an industry, such as the forest industry which contributes more than the next five industries put together to the Canadian economy, watches that industry starve and the resource disappear. In British Columbia, for example, the Government has cut its spending on the forest industry from an anticipated $52 million down to $5.5 million in this year. The Government's own reports suggest that within the next five to 20 years we are going to see 30,000 direct jobs and another 30,000 indirect jobs disappear in that Province alone, and that will require a massive bailout of B.C. by the federal Government. What sense of priority can the Government have when that minuscule amount, relatively speaking, is denied for whatever reason?

It can so easily, meanwhile, as it has done again and again, devote billions of dollars to one corporation employing 7,000 or 8,000 people. That reminds me of the conservative Premier of the Province of British Columbia. He said that by the year 2000 high-tech is going to be British Columbia's number one industry. That is not necessarily because it is going to grow, but because they are going to let their basic strengths disappear and wilt on the vine. The Government seems to be doing exactly the same thing.

It makes no sense to build pyramids, no matter how shiny and new. Every time politicians get into trouble they build pyramids. They have been doing that for 5,000 years. It is rather important for them to pay at least equal attention to the basic resource industries which are our major strength in the country and upon which everything else must be built. We cannot have a society with everyone employed shining each other's shoes or recirculating pieces of paper around. Someone in industry must produce the basic wealth to make it all tick. I cannot understand the odd sense of priorities the people over there have shown over the years.

Another suggestion for the discretionary $4 billion for unforseen contingencies is that its purpose may be to intervene in the foreign exchange market to support the value of the Canadian dollar. I, along with a number of other Members, last night attended the annual meeting of the Canada-Italy Frienship Society across the street in the Wellington Building. In his remarks the Italian Ambassador drew attention to the fact that one of the major problems seen in the current period in terms of declining trade between Canada and Italy is the strong position of the Canadian dollar relative to the strength of the currencies of our European trading partners. That is not the only source from which we have had that type of advice. This is causing difficulties in terms of many Canadian products finding access to many parts of the European community.

Of late there has been no shortage of articles, suggesting that, on the urging of the Official Opposition the Government has a lot of its financial priorities backwards. I hope that these stories signify a re-awakening in the discipline of economic analysis. Rather than expending considerable sums of money in the past or the future trying to prop up an artificial value of the Canadian dollar, it would be more in the interest of our major resource industries in this country to let the dollar find its proper level in order to strengthen our exports from resource industries. Along with that, applying some of that same muscle to a pegging of interest rates in Canada, will provide in the long run for a strengthened manufacturing sector.

I am continually puzzled by the Government, Mr. Speaker, because it has become increasingly conservative in its economic policy. I wonder on what kind of platform it thinks it is going to go to the people in the next election. Is it going to be dressed up again in the a new version of reformed Liberalism? If so, does it fit that classic definition of a Liberal namely, one who believes in social reform as long as it does not cost him anything? That is the type of so-called social reform we saw in the last Budget; reform was on the never-never plan. Conservative economics and Liberal politics—the worst of both worlds.

When the Official Opposition Conservatives manage to be consistent for a little while, the type of speeches they made and the kind of advice they gave the Government are exactly the type of advice, the acceptance of which has been getting the Liberal Government in deeper and deeper trouble over the last few years. They are a disaster when they act like Conservatives. No one has anything against legitimate restraint, but the type of restraint programs suggested by my colleagues to the right in the Conservative Party are exactly those proven to be such a disaster in my home province.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order please. The Chair regrets having to interrupt the hon. gentleman but his time is up.

The Chair would like to point out to the House again that some Hon. Members appear to have some difficulty this afternoon in relating their remarks to the subject, namely, Bill C-21, the Borrowing Authority Act.

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Mr. Speaker, I will pay heed to your warning. However, I must say that anything to do with the Government has something to do with Bill C-21 and the borrowing of almost $30 billion. I think, therefore, there might be a fair amount of leeway in debating what is before the House today.

Mr. Tobin: Be nice.

An Hon. Member: He is not even in his seat.

Mr. McDermid: Well, he cannot see from back there. He is so far back in the back corner that he gets nosebleeds back there all the time. The Hon. Member for Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe (Mr. Tobin) should be careful or we will push the down button on his elevator shoes.

Mr. Tobin: That was not even funny, John.

Mr. McDermid: I would like to discuss the borrowing of $29.5 billion. The Government comes back time after time for more and more money. In the 1980 campaign the Liberals made three promises, Mr. Speaker. The first promise was to give us lower gasoline prices. The second promise was to give the guaranteed income supplement an extra $35. They fulfilled that promise but did not fulfill the first promise of lower gasoline prices. The third promise they made was to manage the economy of the country so that we would be far better off than a Conservative Government could ever make us. The facts prove that they did not fulfill that promise very well either.

I would like to review the fine collection of Finance Ministers we have had over the years. There was one by the name of John Turner who started us on this massive deficit. His Budget in June, 1975 had a deficit of about $5.5 billion. He is a leadership candidate. We then had the present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Chrétien). He was the Finance Minister some time ago. We all like to forget about that. His deficit was $12 billion. The two whom I have mentioned are going to be seeking the leadership of that Party. We then had the present Minister of External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) who raised that deficit to $25 billion. He is smart; he is not seeking the leadership of the Party. Now we have the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) who has a $31.5 billion deficit. It continues to go up and where it will stop no one knows. He also is very smart; he is not running for the leadership of the Liberal Party but he is trying to get Mrs. Campagnolo to seek the nomination. That is the history of the economic performance of the Government.

The Government wants $29.5 billion. Let us look at the calendar ahead of us. Our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has resigned. We now have a leadership convention scheduled for June. Some time after June, probably on November 5, they will call an election. If you are betting on anything, bet on that date for an election. November 5 is as good a day as any for an election. However, they want $29 billion, which will carry them well into 1985. What that tells me is that there will be a lot of borrowing and a lot of spending taking place within the next very short period of time. Once again, the Government will try to buy its way into the hearts of Canadians. It will try to bribe the Canadian people with their own money in order to get elected. It is asking the House to approve $29.5 billion in borrowing authority. I say a pox on their house. There is no way that we can approve that kind of unconditional borrowing. To ask for $29.5 billion is completely irresponsible and we will not approve it.

Not only does the Government want to borrow $29.5 billion, there are billions of dollars in tax increases that have taken effect in 1984 about which people have forgotten. Two Budgets ago, the Minister of Finance introduced large tax increases for the Canadian public which were to take effect in 1984. But the people will not notice that until they start filling out their tax forms in 1985. A smart political ploy. Not only does the Government want to borrow more money, it is bringing in billions of extra dollars in taxes this year as a result of the tax increases in the Budget of the Minister of Finance two years ago.

It is completely irresponsible for the Government to ask for this amount of money and we are unalterably opposed to this gigantic amount of funding. The Government wants a blank cheque so that it can have $29.5 billion when it cannot manage what it already has. Let me give one example. It has come to my attention that the federal government funded a very worthwhile conference, the Circumpolar Conference of the Inuit peoples in Canada, together with those from Iceland, Greenland, Alaska and those who were invited from Russia but were naturally not allowed to come.

The federal Government donated $100,000 for this particular conference, but from where did it take the money? The budget from which it took $100,000 to finance that conference was the health care budget of the Indians and Inuit in northern Canada. The reason I was given for taking the money from that source was that the Government believed there would be excess funds in the health care budget of Indians and Inuit in northern Canada.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to name me one health care budget in this country—whether it is in Brampton-Georgetown, Restigouche, Témiscamingue or wherever—that has excess funds. When it comes to health care in this country there is no surplus money. Yet with the excuse that there would be excess money in the health care budget for the Indians and Inuit of northern Canada, the Government took $100,000 and applied it to a conference. Now it returns, cap in hand, with Supplementary Estimates (C), asking to have the $100,000 back. It wants to put it back into the health care budget for the Indians and Inuit in northern Ontario. It was completely irresponsible to take those funds out of that budget in the first place.

One does not simply take money out of the budget for Indian and Inuit health care, or any health care, to put it into something like a conference. While it was a worthwhile conference, if it was going to be funded it should have been funded by the Secretary of State (Mr. Joyal). If it concerns northern affairs, surely funds could be found somewhere other than health care for the Indian and Inuit of the north. Such action is completely irresponsible, yet the Government which would stoop so low to do that is asking us to write a cheque for $29.5 billion. I do not believe the people of Canada want us to do that. I do not believe they expect us to hand a blank cheque to the Government, especially when it does not have a leader now.

Let us cut that request in half and let their new leader come back to tell us what the Government's spending priorities are. Perhaps we will give it the other $15 billion if it needs it. But all it needs right now is $15 billion to see it through to next fall when their new leader is chosen. We are opposed to this Bill. If the Government wants to cut the Bill in half, we will look at it again.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, this is the most inefficient and extravagant government in the history of Canada. It is also the very best government we have ever seen at putting up smokescreens to deceive the people. I do not say that lightly. Let me back up what I have said with some examples.

The Government is inefficient because it does not try to get full value for every dollar spent. It is extravagant in the way it throws money away unnecessarily. It certainly puts up smokescreens in order to hide the facts and deceive the people. While a smokescreen is a useful tool in war to keep things out of sight of the enemy, it is terrible for a government to use a political smokescreen in peacetime to hide what it is doing from the people who pay the taxes.

Let us look at some of these smokescreens the Government has put up and what it is deceiving the people about. In the last Budget we heard the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) and Government members say that there would be no increase in taxation. It is a wonderful Budget because there is no increase in taxation, they declare. However, these increases were mentioned a year ago in the hope that everyone would forget about them. The fact is that there are increases in taxation this year which Canadians will realize when they start paying. For example, there is a 1 per cent increase in the special recovery tax this year that will take $300 million out of the pockets of the Canadian people. Yet the Government says there is no increase in taxation. Talk about a smokescreen!

It made changes to the federal tax reduction that will bring another $445 million into the coffers from the pockets of the people of Canada. It is going to eliminate the standard $100 deduction in income tax which will take another $180 million out of the pockets of the people. The deindexation of the child tax credit income threshold represents $155 million. I could go on and on.

The Government does not even have any compassion for the workers of this country, 1.5 million of whom—probably more—are unemployed. It is sneaking another $45 million out of the pockets of industry and the workers for UIC. These are all in the form of delayed taxes.

The Government is not forthright enough to say that it would take these taxes from the pockets of Canadians last year. It waited a year to do so in the hope that Canadians would forget about it. Workers today do not earn enough to keep their heads above water. Many of them go hungry and their children must do without. But the Government grabs another $45 million from the pockets of Canadians workers.

This adds up to a total of $2 billion in delayed taxation. The Government then has the audacity to tell the people of Canada that there is no increase in taxes in this Budget. There is no increase in this Budget because it was implemented a year ago so that people would forget about it. Talk about a smoke-screen! Talk about camouflage! Talk about deceit! That is why I say it is the most deceitful government in the history of Canada.

Let us see what else it has done. What did the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) say to old age pensioners who were finding it very difficult to make both ends meet? He told them to change their priorities. Right now, some of them eat pork and beans for breakfast and pork and beans for dinner. What is one supposed to do, have beans and pork for supper? They are not getting enough to eat yet the Prime Minister has the audacity to tell these people, who do not have enough food to last a month, to change their priorities.

While the Government tells women between the age of 50 and 65 that it cannot spare anything for them, it pays $800 a day to a rich lawyer because he was once a Liberal. He resigned but he gets $800 a day. Nobody is worth $800 a day. Certainly a Liberal is not worth $800 a day, not even the best. The very best is not worth more, I would say, than two-bits.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Taylor: We talk about a billion dollar government, but it is a two-bit government when it comes to looking after the people. It is a billion dollar government when it comes to looking after Liberals, ex-Liberals and those who are willing to be called Liberals. They can get $800 a day. Aren't Hon. Members across the floor ashamed of that? Why are you not hanging your heads in shame, paying $800 a day—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order, please. May I remind Hon. Members that the Member who has the floor must address the Chair and also must relate his remarks to the subject.

Mr. Taylor: I am talking on the subject, Sir, and I am addressing the Chair. I say to Hon. Members on your right that they are not worth 25 cents a day. They are not worth $800 a day. If you think you are, just ask the people outside.

Another thing, you want people to learn French. What do you do? You send a girl to the Riviera at taxpayers' expense. She went from the Prime Minister's Office. Talk about extravagance! And these Hon. Members to your right, Mr. Speaker, are not hanging their heads in shame? At the same time we cannot find enough money for women who have spent their lives building this country and are now at an age when they cannot work and we cannot find anything for them. They are women between the ages of 50 and 65. We put them on welfare and let the province pay for it. Talk about deceit, inefficiency and extravagance! There has never been a government like this one in the history of the country.

The Department of National Revenue are squeezing the last nickel from some of our taxpayers. They are squeezing the last nickel out of people. Who are doing it? Auditors hired by this Government at $800 an hour, they tell me. What is wrong with Macdonald? He is a chiseller, being a Liberal. But only getting $800 a day? How many hours a day does he work? Is it three hours? He could have had $2,400 a day at $800 an hour. Talk about extravagance and wasting people's money. Then they have the nerve and audacity to ask for the right to borrow $29 billion. I just cannot understand this. If I were on that side, I would go home and tell my people that I cannot stand it. The Government has gone out of its mind. If it ever had any brains it has lost them all.

Let us look at what the Government has done. Since I have been in this House and just since this Government has been re-elected it has borrowed $102 billion. We have a total debt now of $150 billion. With this request it will be $180 billion. Do you know what you are doing to the people of Canada, Hon. Members over there? Do you know what you are telling the people of the next generation and what you are telling every baby born in the hospitals today? You are hanging a debt of $6,000 around every neck. As soon as they get the breath of life, the Liberals are putting a debt of $6,000 around the necks of all the little babies. I see boys and girls coming here to listen to the debates. I wonder what they think when they go home. Here is the bunch, here is the group over on your left, Mr. Speaker—I mean over on your right, Mr. Speaker—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Taylor: This is the bunch on your right, Mr. Speaker, that is putting a $6,000 debt on children before they are even through grade one or grade five, in fact, as soon as they are born. Now it will be worse if this Bill goes ahead. You don't have to worry about it, Mr. Speaker. That crowd on your right will pass anything if the Prime Minister tells them to. They will pass the Bill. They do not care what it does to the people. When that is done there will be a $7,200 debt around the neck of every man, woman and child in this country.

We stand here and say that we are working on behalf of the people. This Government is trying to get every bent nickel out of every citizen of the country that it can. It does not matter whether the people go hungry. It does not matter if they have to change their priorities, just as long as the Government gets its money. Now this Government wants another $29 billion. Shame on you, is all I can say.

[Translation]

Mr. Henri Tousignant (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, once again, the House is debating the Borrowing Authority Bill that will authorize the Government to borrow the money it needs to carry out its operations. I think this is a useless exercise in hypocrisy. Just listen to what is being said in this debate by the Opposition! We are being treated to every possible accusation this House has heard since the beginning of Confederation, and which I myself have heard for at least four or five years. It is an opportunity for the Opposition to repeat these accusations and to express their dissatisfaction with the Government. We have had to listen to these accusations, falsehoods and absurdities, today and since the beginning of the debate on the Borrowing Authority Bill.

As I said earlier, this is an exercise in hypocrisy, in my opinion. First of all, we know that in any case, the Government will have to borrow to run its operations. We know that. It does not matter what the Opposition says. So why waste the time of the House by repeating the same absurdities over and over again? If the Members opposite could make some constructive contribution—

Mr. McDermid: Close the House!

Mr. Tousignant: There are, of course, a few questions we could ask in connection with the current situation. Why does the Government have to borrow to carry out its operations? We must not forget that we have been through a recession, and business has not been good. Mr. Speaker, the difference between a government with its borrowing authority and a private company is easy to explain. A government, and especially a national government, is responsible for maintaining the economy at a certain level. We cannot tell people: Look, business is bad, you do not have a job, you are not earning any money, but that's your problem and we couldn't care less! Therefore, a national government can and must borrow the monies it needs to tide it over difficult periods. Once the economic situation improves, those loans can be paid back. Of course, in the private sector, when someone exceeds his debt capacity, he goes bankrupt. Everybody knows that. So this is part of the authority the Government has, and thankfully, national governments have the authority to borrow money to get us through difficult times. As I mentioned earlier, however, the Opposition is using this debate to rehash all the accusations and litanies of complaints we have been hearing for five years. They talked about Canadair, de Havilland, and the energy policy, and they even talked about senior citizens. Imagine, the Opposition trying to teach us a lesson on how to deal with senior citizens! Imagine! It is absolutely shameless that they should even try to tell us how to treat senior citizens.

Since the Canadair issue has been brought up, I would simply like to ask them a question. It is all very well to talk about Canadair's huge deficits, but the fact is that 8,000 jobs are involved. What I would like them to tell us, for instance, is what would happen if the Canadian Government did not keep that company in operation and how much would be lost in salaries. The same thing goes for de Havilland. In the late fifties, the Progressive Conservatives under Mr. Diefenbaker put an end to the Arrow program. They must be biting their fingernails these days. Perhaps it would have cost a few million dollars more to keep that program going, but how do we know we would not be further ahead today? Naturally, we too wish de Havilland and Canadair paid their own way, but that is impossible for the time being. Is it better to drop those companies, throw all those people out of work, forget all about high technology, let somebody else do it and concentrate our efforts on second rate companies? Is that what the Opposition really wants?

Other Members have quoted figures out of context. Now, that is great fun. It is really too easy to insult the intelligence of people by quoting figures out of context. Earlier today, Mr. Speaker, a Member said that the deficit during the first hundred years of Confederation was three times lower than it is this year. Can you imagine that: during the first hundred years of Confederation, the deficit was lower than it is this year!

First of all, I would like to say to that Hon. Member that indeed, after one hundred years the Canadian Confederation—he probably had the figures for 1867, but I am referring to the figures for 1967—Canada's gross national product amounted to $60 billion. Our business figure or our gross national product was $60 billion. Today, however . . . In 1867, I imagine the GNP was perhaps . . . I will ask Opposition members, they must know that! What was the Gross National Product in 1867? At any rate, it was $60 billion in 1967, compared to $390 billion in 1983.

An Hon. Member: They don't even know that!

Mr. Tousignant: So, if you multiply by three the GNP figure for 1967, after one hundred years of activity, three times $60 billion equals only $180 billion, while the Gross National Product is presently $390 billion.

You must remember the years of Progressive Conservative government under Mr. Diefenbaker, 1958-59, 1959-60, 1960-61. The public debt as a percentage of personal income is now 37 per cent, while under Mr. Diefenbaker—and they seem to complain about recent years, to lament years gone by—under Mr. Diefenbaker, the public debt as a percentage of personal income was 49.5 per cent, Mr. Speaker. It is easy to quote figures out of context, but they should at least have the decency to use official data.

[English]

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, it is always interesting to sit through debates when the Government shows great indignation over the fact that we in the Opposition are concerned with its spending habits. The previous speaker interestingly said that he finds this whole exercise useless. He thinks it is an exercise in hypocrisy because the Government has to have money to carry out its business. Perhaps it is not supposed to be our role or responsibility here in Parliament to question the Government.

Mr. McDermid: Heaven forbid!

Mr. Oberle: Why do we not just close down this institution and go home? Why do we not just transfer all the responsibility to that subculture in the Langevin Block, that group of pseudo-intellectuals who through their social engineering know what is best for the country, know how to plan and structure an economy which works in the best interests of all people? Why do we not do that? Mr. Speaker, if I had to sit all day in the chair and listen to all the horror stories, I would be inclined to rejoin my colleagues and walk home in shame. I would ask that my presence be stricken from the record so that my grandchildren would not know that I was part of the scheme which is being perpetrated upon the Canadian public and upon two or three future generations.

The Government is requesting a further borrowing authority. For those persons who are looking in from the outside, let us put one thing to rest. We will be standing here, at least members of my Party, for the next couple of weeks arguing about this Bill. The outcome is not in doubt. The Government will bring in closure. We will be exercising our responsibility inherent in the mandate from our constituents back home by pointing out what is happening here. However, the outcome of this debate is not in doubt. We will not grant the Government our acquiescence, but it will bring in closure, let us talk ourselves out, the Bill will pass and the Government will have $29.5 billion when it needs only $25.2 billion in accordance with the Estimates that have been tabled. It wants an extra $4 billion just for any contingency.

Does the average Canadian know what is a billion dollars? It is a thousand million dollars. It is a stack of brand-new $1 bills piled 85 miles high. These people want $4 billion in their pockets for any contingency. What might a contingency be? A contingency might be Petro-Canada wanting to buy another oil company. "What is wrong with that?", our friends opposite will say. "After all, Canadians now own their own oil company. Has that affected energy prices? Of course not". It is our oil company which has jacked up the prices five times more than what was proposed in the Budget of the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) in 1979.

Eventually Canadians will derive a profit from all these enterprises—Petro-Canada, Canadair and Devco. I asked a question about Devco today in the House. Last year the federal Government spent $145 million just so that Devco could go to Japan and Brazil and undercut all other coal companies in the country. There is nothing wrong with a government giving a subsidy to an industry which is important in a particular region and produces such an important product that coal-fired generating plants can produce enough power for the region. That may be a legitimate activity for a government; that may be part of the business of government.

When they take taxpayers' money and go into the world markets and sell our coal, wheat or whatever below the cost of production, making it literally impossible for the rest of the industry to survive, we have to ask some questions. That is what we are doing now. This Government comes to us with all kinds of plans and programs. A couple of years ago it came in with the six and five program which was to restrain federal spending. There would no longer be the need to come back every year and pile on the deficit. Incidentally, the gross debt in 1983 was $159 billion. We are adding roughly $30 billion, which will make it $190 billion. Budgetary forecasts will pile another $110 billion on to this accumulated deficit over the next four years.

Are you surprised, Mr. Speaker, that we are upset? Are you surprised that we say we will stand here until there is not a breath left on this side of the House before we give the Government the authority to spend that kind of money? The Government says it will restrain its spending from now on, that public servants will be restricted to six and five, 6 per cent the first year and 5 per cent the next. This year it is five and four.

What has it been in reality? Increases last year were not 5 per cent, as they were supposed to be in accordance with the program which was supposed to produce such incredible results. Inflation is down to 5 per cent, interest rates are down, all because of the six and five program. Last year public servants got an increase of just under 10 per cent. It was not 4 per cent, 5 per cent or 6 per cent, but 10 per cent. That was the increment in the Public Service in fiscal 1983-84. The Minister says there was overtime which the public servants had to work that was not calculated in the six and five program. In addition, the Government was obliged to pay some back pay. Of course, there were some promotions, as well as the normal increments that come with length of service.

Compare that with what goes on in the private sector. Does the private sector not have similar commitments to its employees? The private sector did not have any work for people to work overtime. Plants are shut down, industry is operating at 60 per cent capacity, two million unemployed and a lot of people under-employed. There is work-sharing in the marketplace to permit some industries to maintain a stable work force. Was there any back pay? Unions and companies are negotiating reductions in pay, social benefits, holidays and so on.

We have an incredible situation in British Columbia. The private sector has not been able to increase pay and benefit packages for the last three years, not 1, 2, 3 or 5 per cent. There have been no increases. What do you think the argument in British Columbia is all about? The International Woodworkers of America, traditionally a radical union, settled for a no-increase package in a three-year agreement. Pulp workers face the same situation. However, the Government offers public servants a 10 per cent increase, as if there were no tomorrow. The inflation rate is only 4 or 5 per cent, so public servants ought to be able to match up. The question is, match up with what? The Government can no longer use the excuse that we are in a world recession. The recovery in the United States is almost unprecedented. The wheels are turning. People have regained confidence and the sawdust is flying.

What is the excuse here? The excuse is that this Government spends 25 cents of every dollar it takes in on interest payments. It no longer has any flexibility to give the necessary incentives to the private sector to create jobs and training positions to permit our young people to build their lives, recover confidence in the future and regain the trust and confidence they once had in this country.

Young people are looking abroad. They are looking to the United States for jobs and training positions. What an indictment of a country so richly blessed with natural resources and natural advantages! What an indictment of a government that has been in office for 16 years! It is going to have a leadership convention where it will recycle some of these rejects who were responsible in the first place. This fellow, Turner, whatever his name is, wants to come back. He is the guy who in his 44-month tenure as Minister of Finance increased the federal budget from $18 billion to $36 billion. He is now to be recycled. He is to come back as the knight in shining armour. When he does, he will receive the reception he deserves. If those people opposite should be so naive as to elect him as their leader, when he steps out of the hallowed halls of Bay Street he will receive a reception which the Liberals and John Turner deserve.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Huron-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, we have been presented with yet another borrowing authority Bill, the eighth since 1980, and the largest ever, surpassing the next highest one, Bill C-143, by $10.55 billion. We are not surprised, given the projected deficit for 1984-85 of $29.6 billion, that the Government has come before this House to ask for the authority to borrow in order to cover that deficit of $29.55 billion, of which $4 billion in authority is a cushion above and beyond the $25.5 billion which the Government in its Budget says it requires at this time.

The Budget anticipates a deficit of $29.6 billion. The Government has non-budgetary sources for $4.05 billion. It needs $25.5 billion to cover a deficit which, in itself, is far too large. That $29.55 billion in borrowing authority would allow the deficit to grow to $33.5 billion.

We are not surprised over this Bill, given the inability of this Government to control its expenditures. But we are alarmed. We are alarmed because of what this Bill represents—the deficit of $29.5 billion and the authority to allow that deficit to be $4 billion more than expected. My colleagues have strongly criticized this Bill, and for good reason. I wish to add my criticisms, but not only for the $4 billion contingency fund. More important, I am criticizing the assumptions which underlie a request for the support by this House of continued massive government expenditure and, as a result, an intolerably massive government deficit.

That is what we are being asked to support. We are being asked to agree to the proposed deficit for this coming year. Because we are being asked to borrow to support its expected deficit, we are actually being asked to support a potential of $33.5 billion for 1984-85, $2 billion more than last year's deficit. I share my colleagues' concern over this request to borrow over $29.5 billion. I share their concern for any request above $15 billion because, simply put, this Government proposes to spend too much. The Government is living far beyond its means.

I would like to discuss several aspects of basic economics of which the Government appears to be unaware. I refer to the high economic costs of supporting a large and growing deficit. To support a large deficit, a too large deficit such as that which we have been experiencing for years, the Government has two choices, both of which will continue to harm an already slowing economy. It can borrow on capital markets and it can borrow its $29.55 billion from those markets. However, borrowing as large a percentage of available Canadian funds as the Government is asking for today will crowd out productive private sector borrowing which, by the simple law of supply and demand, will raise interest rates.

The projected deficit for 1984-85 is equal to 91 per cent of expected personal savings. What will happen? Interest rates will be forced to rise as they have already begun to. Through borrowing an additional $29.5 billion on capital markets interest rates will rise further, which will have the result of further slowing the growth which we could otherwise have hoped for.

Productivity and growth in the country are at a lower rate than a country of Canada's wealth and resources should have to put up with. Our productivity is the lowest in the industrialized world. Unlike what we have heard from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde), our potential for growth over the next year is not great. According to both Statistics Canada and the Conference Board of Canada, growth is slowing. An increased government deficit will not help this situation.

The business community to which the Government is now turning for stimulation of the economy cannot achieve its potential in a shrinking money market. It cannot achieve its potential in the current economic environment. Canadians are now afraid to take the risks which are fundamental to increased productivity. If the Government crowds the capital markets further, business investment which dropped 12.2 per cent in 1983 will continue to decline.

We all know what happens when the Government borrows heavily. Interest rates will rise and Canadian investors will be forced to borrow abroad, which will increase our foreign debt, productivity will decline further and unemployment will rise. We have seen this happen in the very recent past, Mr. Speaker, and we will not stand by and watch history repeat itself.

The Globe and Mail carried an article this past Saturday discussing the desperate need for equity capital in Canada. The Government, by maintaining its spending patterns, is robbing business of a chance to raise money for expansion and productive development. Any rise in interest rates will further threaten an already serious situation in which corporations desperately need capital for growth.

Because of the Government's insistence on spending beyond its means and borrowing on capital markets, interest rates will rise, thus denying business the ability to amass its well needed equity. I refer particularly to small businessmen and farmers. We certainly know that the small business and farming sectors are the backbone of the nation. Denying the small business sector the financing it needs at affordable rates will have a definite effect on unemployment. Farmers will be forced to renew mortgages in order to meet capital expenditures and operating expenses. The farmers will not be able to repay these mortgages because we know that interest rates are intolerable at the present time and that we cannot expect to see zero growth in interest rates in the future. We are denying the equity small businessmen and farmers need in order to be productive.

There is another choice for the Government to make which has equally negative effects. The Bank of Canada could simply be given the licence to print money to fund the borrowing requirements of a spendthrift government. The Bank of Canada has created a total of $12 billion for that purpose in the past 12 years. What happens if the Bank of Canada continues to print money? Inflation rises once again.

During the past recession, Canadians have paid dearly for the Government's mismanagement of the economy. We have suffered high rates of inflation because the Government refuses to take responsibility for the economy. If it turns to the Bank of Canada one more time, Canadians will be subjected to another recession like the one from which we are apparently emerging.

There is yet another choice for the Government to make, Mr. Speaker, and it is the only real choice which will not ruin the economy. The Government must do one of two things. It must begin to take the necessary measures to decrease its spending, it must attack its deficit seriously by examining expenditures to see which are unnecessary or wasteful and it must have the guts to priorize spending and cut out those expenditures which do nothing more than increase the deficit. However, if the Government cannot take that fundamental and central step, it must allow another government to do so.

I agree with my colleagues who have stated that it would be irresponsible at best for the House, which represents the people of Canada, to pass this Bill. Simply put, the costs are much too high.

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, across Canada today, farmers are sitting in their kitchens with their wives, sons and daughters and trying to determine how much money they will have to ask lending institutions or the Farm Credit Corporation for in order to have enough money to buy the seed that must be planted this spring, the fertilizer that is required and to pay for needed farm machinery repairs. I would suggest that across Canada today people are working out their budgets and perhaps approaching lending institutions across the country asking for certain amounts of money.

The reason I bring this matter up is that every time and individual walks into a bank for a loan of, say, $25,000, the bank manager will ask one specific question. He will ask what the money is to be used for and where it is to be used. Can you imagine the reaction of a bank manager if someone asked for a loan of $25,000 and really needed only $20,000? What would the bank manager say? He would either refuse the loan completely because the person seeking the loan obviously does not know what he is doing and cannot be trusted to repay the loan if that is the way he treats his finances, or the bank manager would cut the size of the loan down to the proper amount needed.

I believe we must think along those lines here in the House of Commons. The Government has requested authority from the House of Commons to borrow $29.5 billion. According to our calculations, the amount of money required by the Government for the foreseeable future until another election is somewhere in the neighbourhood of $16 billion. It is tragic that this kind of thing is being perpetrated on the people of Canada through the House of Commons today.

Government Members get upset if we even try to ask them, as any responsible body should, why they require the money. The Government have inflated the amount of money that it requires from $16 billion to $29 billion. They say that they need $4 billion as a slush fund. If I were to go to a bank manager and say that I needed $25,000, could only prove to him that I needed $20,000 and told him I needed the other $5,000 as sort of a back-up or slush fund, the bank manager would throw me out the door. He would not recommend that that loan be made. That is a simple way to put the situation in a context which can be understood by people across the country.

I for one do not trust the Government with a $4 billion slush fund, particularly when it is preparing for an election, because it will use that $4 billion-plus of taxpayers' money to attempt to buy the taxpayers' vote—it is as simple as that. We have seen it happen time and time again.

Where will the Government spend this money? Will it spend it on retraining? Will it spend it on the armed forces or the Department of National Defence? Will it spend it to encourage the young people now unemployed—the largest group of unemployed in the country—to get jobs? There is a generation of young people leaving school, ready to tackle the world with hope, enthusiasm and ideas, but we leave them languishing.

• (1720)

Mr. Dantzer: Now they cannot even get into school.

Mr. Shields: My colleague says they cannot even get into school for further education because funding for post-secondary education has been cut back.

All this is directly attributable to the Government's spending habits, its monopoly of the money supply, money that is needed for investment in the country. This is the same Government which, through the National Energy Program, signalled to the investment community of the world that we did not want people investing their money in this country. It is the same Government that gobbles up and monopolizes the investment funds available from Canadian savings. When these things happen, Mr. Speaker, we have a sick government. There is a rot inside this Government's policies. Instead of implementing policies that the country requires, it takes the easy way out and uses advertising campaigns to tell people across the country about the wonderful job it is doing. In many cases it is wasting millions upon millions of dollars.

The Ministers who are vying for the leadership of that Party are now contradicting each other. Last November the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) said that the Liberal Government is wasting millions and millions of dollars. Pretty soon he will announce that he will run for the leadership of the Party. The Government is wasting millions and millions of dollars, Mr. Speaker. It is borrowing money that it does not need and putting it into a contingency fund to be used to buy votes. The voter is not ready to accept that, Mr. Speaker.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Shields: Listen to them squabble and squawk. The voter is not going to put up with that one minute longer. Let the Government bring in a writ and we will see what the voter has to say. That Party should get its leadership contest over with and get its trustee in bankruptcy in place. That is what it is electing—not a leader but a trustee in bankruptcy. It is a bankrupt party with bankrupt ideas.

There is something wrong, Mr. Speaker, when every weekend people come into my riding office, sometimes in tears, because they cannot get jobs. There are people who have never experienced welfare but have now run out of unemployment insurance benefits and must apply for welfare. They ask what is happening to our country. What is happening is that we have a spendthrift Government which throws dollars at everything in an effort to make its position in the House of Commons secure. It is not going to work, Mr. Speaker.

Imagine having $4 billion in a slush fund to use prior to an election, by its own admission. That is what the money is for and let no one think otherwise. There are 1.5 million people unemployed in the country because of the disastrous policies of this Government. The trouble started with the national energy policy, then the Government focused on issues not related to the economy. People are hungry, people are tired, people want to go to work, people are begging the Government to allow investment to come into Canada. Canada is the most valuable piece of real estate there is in the world today, with unbounded natural resources, a plentiful supply of fresh water and educated, willing people.

The Government keeps choking the economy by borrowing more and more, to the point that our children and their children will be saddled with untold debt. They come into the world owing so much money—at least $6,000. This page and a half Bill is a request to borrow $29.55 billion when really the Government requires only $15 billion. The Government admits trying to inflate what it requires, when showing that it has a $4 billion slush fund. It is rotten, it is unjust, it is not fair to the Canadian taxpayer.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Hon. Member for Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington (Mr. Vankoughnet).

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order.

Mr. Vankoughnet: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) rising on a point of order?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I would like to know whether or not there is a period for questions and answers after a speech?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: No. I must inform the President of the Privy Council that we are now at the stage of ten-minute speeches and, unless there is unanimous consent, it is not possible to put questions to the last speaker.

Mr. Pinard: I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: On the same point of order?

Mr. Pinard: Yes. Perhaps you could consider asking for unanimous consent regarding my request to put questions to the Hon. Member? Failing that, the debate would go on.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The President of the Privy Council is asking for unanimous consent to allow questions to be put to the previous speaker. Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Malone: The Liberals said no.

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to participate in the debate on Bill C-21, the borrowing authority Bill, but I am less than pleased that the federal Government is making the request. I am particularly concerned about the magnitude of the borrowing request for $29.55 billion. That is a tremendous amount of money and it is difficult to understand it in average terms today. I would not be so concerned if I thought the borrowing would be beneficial to the people of Canada or the people of the riding that I represent, but that will not be the case.

The deficit lies heavily on the Canadian economy. I have seen many personal tragedies since 1980 which are the result of failed businesses, consumer bankruptcies and unemployment. The terrible magnitude of the request demonstrates a government that is out of control, particularly when one considers that the Budget of February 15 said that the borrowing needs of the Government would be $25.5 billion. Less than two days later the Government introduced this Bill requesting $29.55 billion. For the people of Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington, whose concerns I carry with me, this is the equivalent of spending $19,640 in one year for someone with an income of $13,740. The worst part about borrowing the $5,900 to make up the difference is that $3,900 of that $5,900 is money borrowed to pay interest on a previous debt. The total debt in this hypothetical case increases to $36,000 from $30,000. The average Canadian could never carry on his personal financial affairs in this slipshod fashion.

I stated earlier that I would not be so alarmed if I thought all this tremendous borrowing would be of some benefit to Canadians. However, I do not believe this is the case. It has been demonstrated that the $2.4 billion Special Employment Initiatives Program is nothing more than a re-election pork-barrel for the Government. I find it morally reprehensible that the federal Government should discriminate against the unemployed on the basis of where they live. For a government which states it believes in universality of social programs, this exposes its so-called concern for the fraud it really is.

In the northern area of my riding the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Roberts) deliberately underestimated unemployment in order to deny individuals access to programs which they paid into and are entitled to. Recently a number of municipalities in that area made representations to the Minister and sent him copies of resolutions they had passed regarding the UIC. Part of the Minister's reply says:

> The report I have received from officials of the Commission indicates that the unemployment rate has decreased from mid-October of 1983 to such an extent... that the exemption for repeater claimants has no longer been applicable.

He then quoted an unemployment rate of 9.1 per cent. He dismissed any variations in the unemployment rate in a region as a problem of "statistics", was "unclear" about what to do and said that it was "premature" to respond to this very real and pressing problem.

The Minister may be unclear as to the actual rate of unemployment, but officials in his Department are not. Figures supplied to me by his senior officials, in writing, give a community rate of 30 per cent and an area district rate of 21 per cent. A simple check I had done by the Department, which the Minister is equally capable of doing, indicated the number of individuals in an area drawing unemployment insurance. The latest figures indicate that Bancroft, with a population of 2,305 people, has 475 people drawing UI benefits. That is 20.6 per cent unemployment before school children, senior citizens or home makers are included to determine the actual size of the labour force in a village that size. If there was some indication that the tremendous amount of cash the Government wishes to borrow would go to help these average Canadians, which I do not believe it will, I would find this Bill less objectionable.

What does the federal Government accomplish by doing this to Canadians? Many constituents ask me this. First, by purposely underestimating the unemployment rate, it tries to make the situation look much better than it really is. Secondly, when the so-called rate of unemployment drops to 11.5 per cent, the repeater clause in the Unemployment Insurance Act is no longer applicable. This results in a lower pay-out by the federal Government. It disqualifies individuals who normally should qualify for UI benefits. The Government shifts the burden to the financially pressed local municipalities by inflating their welfare rolls, creating a further hardship on local residents as property taxes rise to meet these obligations. Finally, the area concerned is denied fair access to employment programs such as Canada Works, LEAD, and the Special Employment Initiatives Program, all of which are based on the rate of unemployment.

I believe the Government should be searching for ways to reduce the deficit instead of deliberately underestimating the deficit each time it presents its forecast. The forecast of declining deficits must become a reality if this country is going to sustain a prolonged and lasting recovery into the next century. It is also clear that the negative impact of this huge deficit will adversely affect small business, the number one job creator in this country. The federal Government should be helping small business, not hurting it.

It was appalled by the news that Canada Post is entering the catalogue shopping business by processing orders for Consumers Distributing Limited. There is no demonstrated need for this service and it is blatantly unfair competition. Canada Post should concentrate on improving its level of service before trying something new. The individuals who operate the shops and stores in our local communities have put a lot of time, effort and investment into their business and community. Their taxes subsidize the losses of Canada Post. Now they are being called upon to subsidize competition against their business as well.

How the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Chrétien) or the Minister of Employment and Immigration can say they support free enterprise, entrepreneurialism and the little guy is beyond me. Actions speak louder than words. The present Government's socialism is alive and well in all these pretenders to the Prime Minister's job. Bill C-21 is the latest exercise in fiscal insolvency. I for one do not think we need another $29.5 billion at this time.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Duclos (Montmorency-Orléans): Mr. Speaker, I hesitated before deciding whether or not I should reply to all this utter nonsense from the Official Opposition. If we want Canadian men and women who read Hansard or watch proceedings on their TV sets to understand what is really going on in this country in the area of financial and economic management, I feel compelled, as a member of this House, to disprove some of the false statements which we have heard this past hour in the House.

Mr. Speaker, Canadians must decide for themselves whether members of the Opposition are dishonest or uninformed in financial and economic matters, or jokers or more inclined to demagoguery as weeks and months go by. I leave them to decide that for themselves. I suggest to them, however, that the truth is really a mixture of everything I have just mentioned.

Mr. Speaker, the Opposition condemns the Government for its considerable deficit and, like outraged women, accuses the Government of wasting public funds and squandering taxpayers' money. In my opinion, there are not a great many ways to reduce a deficit: you either have to increase the tax burden or to cut the spending or both. There is no other way, Mr. Speaker.

Well, let us see what our hon. friends opposite have to offer in standing committees during question periods in the House or debates such as this one. First, in the area of spending.

• (1740)

The new Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) has said several times that the Government of Canada is behaving in a shameful manner towards the Canadian Armed Forces, that we are not respecting our commitments to NATO and that the day his party will form the Government, the budget for the Department of Defence will be substantially increased. This is one area where expenditures will increase.

In addition, what did we hear during the debate on second reading and committee stages of Bill C-3, which is still before the Committee? We were told that, if the federal Government could not agree with the Provinces on the issue of health care, it was not because of extra billing or user fees, but basically because of a question of money, and that when the Progressive Conservative Party takes over, the needs of the provinces will be met and transfer payments will be increased in such a way that the Provinces will have the financial resources they need to provide better health care for the public and higher incomes for the doctors. There would therefore be an increase in expenditures for defence and health care. These budgetary items are very important; I am not suggesting a few hundred thousand dollars or something like ten or twenty million dollars. Those are some of the most important budgetary items to be provided for by the Canadian Government.

I have another example, Mr. Speaker. In recent weeks, the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs has been considering Bill C-17, which is, I believe, the Bill dealing with fiscal transfers for post-secondary education. In June 1982, the Government decided that the transfers would be restricted to a 6 per cent increase in 1983-84 and a 5 per cent increase in 1984-85. What was the Opposition Members' position in the Standing Committee? On this issue, the Government has been accused of smothering post-graduate education at a time when the need is so great. They have also said that, when they are elected, or if they were already in Government at that time, they would be a lot more generous with the Provinces which could then afford to provide much larger amounts of money to community colleges and universities all across Canada. They would increase expenditures, Mr. Speaker. They are not suggesting that they would reduce them.

I have yet another example, Mr. Speaker, which involves research and development, and Heaven knows that we have to make considerable efforts in this area and that we are all aware of it. However, if the Progressive Conservative Party were in power, as they have promised time and time again, the Government effort in this area would be even more important. There would be grants for businesses; there would be tax concessions and tax credits, and this means a further loss of revenue for the Government, Mr. Speaker.

On the one hand, they are asking for more expenditures, and on the other hand, they want to cut the federal Government's revenue. Opposition Members are always claiming that federal taxes are crushing the taxpayer and small and medium-sized businesses. Mr. Speaker, it is time Opposition Members woke up. Of course, the Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) said the other day that they were not going to tell us outright what they would do if they were in power. They would not dare but they just might close down Canadair and put 5,000 or 6,000 people in the Montreal area out of work. They have all kinds of answers, but with the electorate, you have to put your best foot forward. You have to woo the voters. You cannot catch flies with vinegar, Mr. Speaker, you have to use honey. And that is the position of the Opposition Parties and especially the Progressive Conservative Party.

Mr. Speaker, it is too bad that they do not understand what a deficit is . . . If you were kind enough to listen, my friends, you might learn something. They do not understand that a deficit is a tool used to apply an economic policy. A government is not managed like a household or a personal budget, because the Government has a responsibility of its own. You know why the budget deficit has suddenly gone up from $9 or $10 billion to $29 or $30 billion, Mr. Speaker? It is quite simple. It is not because the government has recklessly increased its expenditures. Some 70 per cent of the increased budget deficit is due to a drop in government revenues. Another 30 per cent is due to the fact that the recession has saddled the Government with new responsibilities and expenditures, for instance in the unemployment insurance sector.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like the members opposite to tell us specifically which expenditures they would cut, what taxes they would increase and then we could discuss things in an informed and responsible manner without the demagoguery that constantly prevails in the House when the Hon. Members opposite take the floor.

[English]

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the Hon. Member who just spoke for making the best of a very bad situation. The Member spoke about vinegar and honey. The vinegar to which he was referring is very much the record of this administration, which has unfortunately provided a very sour taste for Canadians to contend with for all but a few months in the many years since 1968 when the present Government came to power. The honey which he spoke of I am sure will come in the not too distant future when, as we hope and trust, the Government will screw up its courage and take the issue which is before the House to the people of Canada. We look forward to the opportunity to provide the people of Canada with necessary alternatives.

The Hon. Member also spent a great deal of time looking to the future and speculating on the type of policies a new Conservative Government would bring to the people of Canada. I think he spoke with great foresight. I am sure he is aware, as are the backbenchers on that side of the House, of what the future holds for them. We applaud the Member for his foresight. We hope that the future which he foresees for the country will soon come to be.

However, I would like to deal with the history of that administration as well as the borrowing Bill which is before us, because that is the reality of the moment. As we know and as has been said in the House this afternoon, we have before us the largest borrowing Bill in the history of Canada. It is a Bill that would require Canadians in the future to pay $29.55 billion.

Shortly after the Hon. Member preceding me began to speak, I noticed that some young people sitting in the galleries across from me, members of the Boy Scout organization, left the House. It was unfortunate because it is young people such as them who in the future will have to bear the brunt of the Government's spending policies. In fact, if those young people are aware of what their share of the debt is, they must realize that they owe $7,000 or more. Every person who is born in this country in the days, months and years to come will owe $7,000 or more as a matter of birthright. The longer the Government remains in office, the greater their birthright will become.

As we know, the record of the present Government headed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has been one of irresponsible spending. When the Prime Minister and his Government first came to office in 1968 it was spending approximately $12 billion per year. Presently, if one includes what we anticipate to be in the supplementary estimates, it appears that it will be spending $100 billion per year.

The deficit in 1968 was approximately $491 million. We must remember that the Government's estimates have been far from accurate in the past, but it estimates that in the 1984-85 fiscal year the deficit will be $29.6 billion. The harsh reality of the situation is that it may in fact be larger than that.

Of course, the national debt has grown astronomically during the time in which the Prime Minister has been in office and his Party has been in power. In 1968, the national debt totalled approximately $30 billion. By the end of this fiscal year it will be somewhere in the vicinity of $180 billion to $190 billion. Again, this represents more than $7,000 per man, woman and child.

Unfortunately, the results of this have been largely negative. We wish that they had been otherwise. As a result of the national debt growing at such an astronomical rate, we have seen interest rates rise in the past and we note with concern that it appears they are beginning to rise again. That means, of course, that even the forecast which was presented to us some time ago may be inaccurate because the cost to the Government for its borrowings will be greater than it has anticipated.

It also means that others who would borrow money in the market, such as provincial and municipal governments, businessmen, farmers and others who would use money in order to secure growth, are finding, first, that money is more expensive to borrow than it should be and, second, that they must go outside Canada in order to obtain the money they need. This means that interest dollars which those provincial and municipal governments pay and which people in the private sector pay are often going outside the country as well. Obviously this is a loss to Canada and Canadians.

Consequently, we are spending an incredible amount simply to service the debt which we have before us. In fact, when taxpayers complete their returns at the end of April of this year and send their contributions to the Department of National Revenue, they will sadly realize that $1 out of every $3 they are paying is going simply to pay the debt on moneys already expended. In that sense they feel a tremendous sense of futility and frustration. They are prepared to pay their appropriate share but they believe in many ways that their opportunity to secure growth has been negated by the policies of this administration in the past.

The impact on the average Canadian, the small businessman and the farmers in my constituency is unfortunately very detrimental. First, they find it very difficult to approach their own economic enterprises with confidence because they do not feel that our country is being led in a businesslike manner. They also find it very difficult to borrow money at a reasonable rate of interest. In fact, I could not help but think today of the number of farmers in my constituency who have been forced into bankruptcy in the last few months and those many others who will either be forced into bankruptcy in the months to come or perhaps leave farming because of their inability to carry on. I was thinking of how pleased they would be to have some of their debts eradicated in the manner in which the Government has dealt with Canadair. However, that is another issue.

The problem facing us now is the capacity of this administration to lead this country and the fact that its failure to provide businesslike leadership has meant that there is a lack of confidence in the country, a lack of confidence in the Government and therefore, to a very substantial degree, a lack of confidence in our economy.

There are certain times in history when deficit financing is a suitable strategy. The difficulty with what this administration has done is that it has engaged in Keynesian economics, if that is the term one wishes to imply, since the early 1970s. In fact, I suggest it is fair to say that it began to indulge in this strategy during the days of John "Deficit" Turner, who was Minister of Finance from January 28, 1972 until September 9, 1975. During those years the federal deficit in the first year of administration went from $702 million to a grand total of $5.463 billion in the last fiscal year in which he had responsibility.

Mr. Malone: The Turner turnpike.

Mr. Clark (Brandon-Souris): My colleague refers to the Turner turnpike. Unfortunately, it is a road down which this country has been led in the past at a very high cost to the people of Canada and to the country as a whole. As a result of that indulgence, the Government lost the capacity to be flexible. It lost the capacity to deal with the economic fluctuations of the moment. Therefore, when it finds itself in the present situation of unacceptably high youth unemployment in the vicinity of 20 per cent, and in a situation where their own projections are for 10 per cent unemployment into the foreseeable future, it has lost the capacity to devise new policies to meet that particular crisis.

Lately there has been a great deal of emphasis on the subject of newness. Unfortunately, it seems to me that the Government, by virtue of its spendthrift and irresponsible policies in the past, no longer has the capacity or flexibility to provide us with those new policies which the country so desperately needs. Therefore, the only thing we can see in the future that gives us a ray of hope is an election, when it comes in August, October or November. We will be ready when it is called. We will welcome the opportunity to provide the country with the type of businesslike administration which it so desperately needs. We will provide the country with a new government that Canadians will welcome with open arms.

May I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is a disposition to call it six o'clock. However, I should inform the Hon. Member that his time has expired.

Mr. MacDougall: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if we might be prepared to call it six o'clock at this time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed to call it six o'clock?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock p.m., this House stands adjourned until eleven o'clock tomorrow morning, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 5.58 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1984-85

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House resumed from Wednesday, March 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacLaren that Bill C-21, an Act to provide borrowing authority, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson).

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): I am grateful to my colleagues in the House for the generous reception of my impending remarks.

We are gathered here today to discuss a Bill dealing with the borrowing authority. In one sense it reflects the over-all economic purpose of our Government. We are asking for the authority to borrow funds to finance our programs. Having listened for many, many months now to Opposition debate, I cannot understand why members of the Opposition would not be prepared to support this Bill without debate.

• (1115)

If we listen to members of the NDP, they have asked us to spend much more money, to increase the deficit further. If we listen to the Conservatives, they have asked us to do the impossible. They have asked us to reduce the deficit and at the same time to implement perhaps 150 additional spending programs which are not within our contemplation at the present time.

An Hon. Member: Name one.

Mr. Peterson: The Hon. Member from Winnipeg asks me to name one. For example, in the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs we dealt with the financing of post-secondary education. Did they want us to put six and five limits on the transfers to provinces in that area? Absolutely not. They called for increased expenditures of over a couple of hundred million dollars. What have they asked us to do in terms of financing health care? The Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) said that we must give more money to the provinces. What have they asked us to do in terms of defence spending? They have said that we are not spending enough on defence and, if they were elected, that they would be prepared to vastly increase defence spending.

Mr. Blenkarn: We would get rid of Canadair expenses, and we would look after some other things as well.

Mr. Peterson: This has to be balanced against what the official spokesperson on economic matters for the Tory Party has told us. He has told us that if he had his way, he would get mean and dirty and nasty.

Mr. Malone: With Canadair.

Mr. Peterson: That means that he would be cutting off transfer payments made to the provinces and to individual Canadians in order to create that safety net, in order to create a floor below which no person, regardless of their circumstances, should have to fall.

When we talk about the deficit at this time, perhaps many people would agree that in the past we have made mistakes.

Mr. Malone: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peterson: During the seventies when we had positive growth in the country, perhaps we should have been running some surpluses and setting them aside for a rainy day.

Mr. Nickerson: That is right.

Mr. Peterson: That is history. Let us deal with the Budget measures in the April 19, 1983 Budget and in the February 15, 1984 Budget. Are the Tories prepared to advocate to the House one measure whereby they would cut back on expenditures?

Mr. Nickerson: Canadair.

Mr. Malone: Yes, Canadair.

Mr. Taylor: Patronage.

Mr. Ellis: Do you want three?

Mr. Blenkarn: Call an election.

Mr. Peterson: I would be delighted to hear them make one positive suggestion. They have not broken—

Mr. Taylor: Metric and patronage, that is what we would cut.

Mr. Peterson: —their Leader's injunction to all members of the Conservative Party not to utter a declaration on policy. We see them falling apart. Their Leader told them not to utter one declaration on policy because it might be good for the Canadian people—

Mr. Taylor: That is baloney.

Mr. Peterson: —and we, the Government of Canada, might want to adopt it.

Mr. Taylor: You don't know what you are talking about.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, order.

Mr. Peterson: I would welcome suggestions from the Conservative Party if it had any.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think this is a good time for the Chair to appeal to all Hon. Members to observe the rules of debate. The Member who has been reecognized to make a speech should not be interrupted, according to Standing Order 15. The Hon. Member for Willowdale has the floor.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that courtesy.

I ask where the Tories would cut. They said that they would cut Canadair. That is the one positive policy we have heard from them! Are they telling us to drop the entire Canadair program, the CL-601? Are you telling us that you want us to pull the plug—

• (1120)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Hon. Member must address his remarks to the Chair.

Mr. Peterson: I want to go on record as saying that if it is official Tory policy to pull the plug on the Challenger program, I am delighted to hear for the first time one positive program of the Tories. They are now going back to the glorious Conservative rule when they scrapped the Arrow and sent some of our finest minds south of the border. I will not be part of that. I am glad they have finally come out of the woodwork. They are ignoring the injunction of their Leader. They now have a policy: Scrap the Challenger, kill Canadair.

I would like the Tory Members to make another positive suggestion for the economic development of this country. I am absolutely disgusted that in their role as elected Members they have no positive alternatives to present to us. They will not co-operate with other Members in this House to give us some positive alternatives.

I am pleased that the NDP at least has come forward with very positive alternatives. I do not accept their approach, but they are at least being constructive. Within the limits available to them, they are trying to pose alternatives. They are trying to work with us and the people of Canada to help those who are unemployed. Do the Tories want to cut our unemployment programs? Do they want to cut the amount of money we are giving to the unemployed? Do they want to cut the programs that are designed to create jobs for the unemployed?

Mr. Taylor: No.

Mr. Peterson: There we have a second positive policy statement from the Tories. They do not want to cut the money that we are giving to the unemployed. I am delighted. Where, then, are they going to cut if they want to reduce the deficit?

Mr. Taylor: Metric.

Mr. Peterson: We have taken a very positive approach in the last two Budgets. When we in the Finance Committee advertised right across Canada for people to appear before us to discuss the April 19 Budget, we had three requests only. That was a sign of the acceptance of that Budget. At least the clown prince of the Tory Party had the integrity to admit that it was a pretty good Budget in the circumstances. I say as well that the February 15 Budget in the circumstances was a first-rate budget.

The Official Opposition have come up with none of the alternatives that I feel it is their beholden responsibility to come up with as trustees of the public will, elected by those in their ridings. They were not elected to come here to say they have no policy, and if they had, that they would not tell us what it was anyway. Their constituents told them to come here and work with us in a constructive way to try to tap the incredible potential that we have in this country. That is the type of spirit which I would hope to see from all Members in the House. I regret to say as a Member of Parliament, albeit a new one, and perhaps I am not wise to the ways of Parliament, that I did not expect Tories would come here and adopt an official Tory policy of no policy and, if they had one, that they would not tell us what is was anyway.

Mr. Taylor: That is patronage.

Mr. Peterson: It is not. That is the approach that I believe trustees of the public will take in dealing with their beholden responsibilities to the people of Canada. I would hope that in the days ahead they will change their head-in-the-sand policy and exercise their responsibilities as Members of Parliament in a constructive and positive way.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise and take part in this important debate on the borrowing authority Bill, Bill C-21. Two days ago, all Members of the House joined in honouring the work done over a period of some 60 years by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who has fought long and hard on behalf of the poor, pensioners and the powerless for a better and more compassionate Canada.

I was pleased to be a part of the group which honoured the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre that day and I think it is important that when we take part in a debate on a Bill as significant as this Bill, which seeks authority to borrow almost $30 billion, we reflect on some of the principles of which the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre spoke during the remarks he made two days ago. I think it is important that we recognize very clearly our responsibilities as the representatives of the people of our constituencies. I think it is important that we not bicker with one another but speak out constructively regarding our options and proposals to deal with what is clearly the most important economic crisis facing the people of the country, and that is the devastating crisis of unemployment.

It is essential that the Government, when seeking the authority to borrow some $30 billion, clearly recognize that its most important priority must be putting back to work the almost two million Canadians who want to work and cannot find jobs. We are not only dealing with the literally hundreds of thousands of people who are in their fifties and early sixties and have been laid off from their jobs or fired or, as a result of technological change, found themselves no longer able to continue with the work they have been doing for many, many years. We must deal as well with a whole generation of young people.

In excess of half a million young people are desperately looking for work but find that the doors are closed, that as a result of the bankruptcy of the Government's economic policies they are unable to work. At the same time, because of the catastrophic economic policies of the Government, we find that access to post-secondary education is becoming more and more restricted. Young people are being hit with a double-whammy. On the one hand, they are unable to find work; on the other, they find that the opportunities for continuing education are becoming more and more restricted as a result of cutbacks in post-secondary education funding.

As well, Mr. Speaker, we find that women and the disabled are affected to a very significant extent by cutbacks. Governments, both federal and provincial, have refused to implement mandatory affirmative action plans to ensure that women are not the first victims on the firing line in these rough economic times.

Many of us are also concerned about the fact that at a time when Canadians are bearing a record level of debt on a per capita basis, the Government refuses to make the necessary changes to the federal income tax system, whether to the corporate income tax structure or to the personal income tax structure, to ensure that loopholes are closed and that large corporations are paying their fair share.

We hear much talk from members of the Official Opposition about the size of the deficit. I share the Opposition's concern about the burgeoning deficit but they are silent when it comes to putting an end to the massive network of the so-called corporate tax expenditures. These expenditures amount, in effect, to direct grants to the corporate sector and in 1979 totalled some $6 billion. We know that the tax system for the banks in this country is effectively a voluntary "pay-as-you-go" system. How on earth can they defend a system in which Revenue Canada puts the boots to ordinary working men and women at the same time as they turn a blind eye to loopholes which permit literally billions of dollars to be retained in corporate coffers instead of being spent on job-creation programs?

There are many ways in which we could move forward to create jobs in this country, such as by significantly enhancing research and development. Our record of R and D is one of the worst in the western economic world.

There is a host of other programs which could be implemented immediately to create jobs, whether it be identifying public works projects in conjunction with local municipalities, work that has to be done now and should be done, such as in the forestry sector which has been disgracefully neglected by both federal and provincial governments. As the Science Council of Canada has noted, there is a serious crisis in the industry and if we are not prepared to take emergency steps toward reforestation and conservation of our forest industry, we may lose it. For a Member of Parliament from British Columbia where forestry is the number one industry, that is obviously a very serious matter.

There must be a fundamental restructuring of our economy to strengthen the manufacturing sector. There is no excuse for the fact that Canadians are the largest per capita importers of agricultural and mining machinery in the world. We are quite capable of making our own mining and agricultural machinery and putting Canadians to work in that way. We should have a Canadian merchant marine and ship Canadian goods on Canadian ships.

It is essential that in dealing with the whole question of technological change we must be its masters and not its servants. Where working people are affected by technological change, they should have the right to negotiate and there should be provision to give them ample notice. It is women who are affected to a disproportionate extent by technological change. We must look at the length of the work week, at early retirement, at part-time work for those who want it and at effective retraining schemes for those affected by technological change.

Over the past six or eight months, I have gone out to the doorsteps of my constituency of Burnaby and listened to the people I represent. In my constituency office in south Burnaby my assistant, Del Carrel, and I have noted a dramatic increase in the level of personal hardship and suffering being experienced in that community. I am sure the Hon. Member for Vancouver Centre (Miss Carney) and others from British Columbia have experienced the same thing. We see the devastating impact of the Government's economic policies on the people we represent, whether they be pensioners, young people or those thrown out of work.

What alternative does the Official Opposition offer? Occasionally we get a few hints. The Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) has said: "If I told you what I would do we would never get elected". Just a few weeks ago he told us what the Tories would do with respect to the means test for old age pensioners and for family allowances. He is the official finance spokesperson for the Tory Party. He said:

> You have to look and see, on the social side, whether it is possible to introduce more means testing so that programs are not universal,—

That is the vision of the Conservative Party in this country. We have seen the devastating impact of the Liberal Party. Now more than ever it is essential that Canadians listen to the voice of the New Democratic Party, listen to the voice of the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre. It is time for a government which puts people ahead of profits.

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, in the first two presentations made this morning you have heard the voice of profligacy. You heard it from the Liberal Party, desperately trying to defend the proposal to borrow some $30 billion, and you heard the voice of the New Democratic Party—that voice that is getting weaker day by day as people realize what they are up to—saying that a $30 billion deficit is not enough, that we should spend more. If the Liberals are bad, as they are, then the New Democrats are three times worse.

Now you are going to hear the voice of responsibility, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): It is five times worse!

Mr. Nickerson: That is the voice of the Conservative Opposition. We are completely of a contrary mind to the Government when it comes to its request to borrow some $30 billion. We note that even in its own Budget documents tabled in the House, the requirement was only for some $25.5 billion. That is what it told Parliament it needed for the balance of the fiscal year. Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that; I think the Government will come back for yet another borrowing authority later, but that is what it said.

When we examine this Bill we see that there is built into it a borrowing authority for $4 billion in excess of what the Government told us it wanted a couple of weeks ago. It is pretty obvious what it is up to: it wants to establish a $4 billion slush fund. We know why it wants that slush fund; it is because an election will be coming up in the not too distant future. I wish we could have it next week and get it over with and have a new government in Canada. I am scared of what might happen if we let these gentlemen go around the country with that $4 billion at election time. In the past we have seen what they do when they have money in their pockets, money with which they are prepared to try to buy votes, money with which to bribe the public of Canada—trying to bribe the public of Canada with its own tax dollars which have been confiscated by the Government.

Let us put this borrowing request into context. This is the eighth time in this Parliament that the Government has made a request to borrow yet more funds. Every time it comes before Parliament with this request it is for more money; it is a roller-coaster request and there seems to be no end to it.

In the Budget documents presented on February 15 the projected financial requirements from the current 1984-85 fiscal year over the next three years to the 1987-88 fiscal year is some $87.25 billion. Even if that estimate is correct it means that within the next three years the Government will come back time and time again with a request for more borrowing authority. I hope the election is called soon and the Government changes so that we can have a responsible government which will put a responsible financial policy into effect and these requests will not be necessary. Under the present system, the present spending plan of the Government, a steady stream of like Bills is guaranteed. There is no hope for the taxpayers of Canada with the present Government in office.

Let us look, Sir, at the history of the financial mismanagement of the Liberal Party. When did we first get ourselves on this treadmill? I believe it started in the days when John Turner—John "Deficit" Turner, as my friend, the Hon. Member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Clark), called him the other day—was Minister of Finance. Previous to that we had been in a state of balance for some time. Some years there may have been a deficit and some years a surplus, but things would even out. That is the way government should be run. However, Sir, under the ministry of that hon. gentleman, the leading light, the golden boy of the Liberal Party—or so the press would have us believe—deficits were run up of some $5.5 billion.

When that gentleman left office, Sir, in came someone who is presently contending for the leadership of the Liberal Party, a gentleman who presently occupies the position of Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Chrétien). As Minister of Finance he, in the Liberal way, went a little further than his predecessor. He ran up a debt of some $12.25 billion during his term of office. After that in came another leading light in the Party opposite, a gentleman who is presently Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen). In his term he almost doubled the record of the previous incumbent. He came to Parliament for $25.25 billion. Finally, Sir, in this history of mismanagement we come to the present incumbent in that high office, the gentleman who in one year can run up deficits of $31.5 billion. It gets worse and worse.

John Turner put us on this treadmill and no one yet has been able to get us off. If you examine the sequence I have just outlined, Sir, you will see that in good Liberal tradition that Party alternated between an English-speaking Canadian and a French-speaking Canadian for that ministerial position. I am told this is a tradition with the gentlemen opposite. But this formula, this transition from English to French, at least when applied to Ministers of Finance, appears to be nothing more than a formula for disaster.

I would suspect that were the same to occur in the leadership aspirations of the gentlemen opposite, much the same would occur. That Party has gotten us into such a state now that the accumulated gross national debt at the end of this month, the end of the present fiscal year, will be some $190 billion. This is about half the annual Gross National Product of Canada. This is the situation in which we find ourselves.

Hon. Members on this side of the House have spoken eloquently on what this means to Canada. What it means, Sir, is the destruction of the national economy of Canada; of that there is no doubt. That has been explained on many occasions.

I see that I have very little time left. Suffice it to say that just the costs of servicing this debt are now $20 billion per year. That is about $1 in every $3 raised in the form of taxes from Canadians. The result of this policy of financial mismanagement year after year after year has been the following: a higher burden of taxes on all Canadians; higher interest rates, as the Government has to compete within the capital markets of the country, affecting employment, housing construction and other elements of the economy.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, once again, it seems, we must stand in the House of Commons to bring to the attention of the Government the seriousness of the situation which it is foisting on the Canadian people. I was really distressed this morning as I listened to the Hon. Member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson) because he is so far off base in what he says. It is hard to understand how an elected representative of the Canadian people could be so far off base. In trying to protect the Budget just brought in by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde), he is misleading not only himself and his colleagues but he is misleading the Canadian people.

It was an April fool's budget, Mr. Speaker, nothing short of that, simply because of the fact that the Minister in that Budget was trying to back-pedal to 1976 and even before that. An example of that was the rollover of capital gains. I do not need to remind you, Mr. Speaker, that prior to 1976 we did not have such a thing as capital gains in Canada. The Minister of Finance is now trying to back-pedal and everyone on the other side of the House says it is a good Budget.

Mr. Nickerson: Who brought capital gains in?

Mr. Towers: The Hon. Otto Lang brought it into this House of Commons. The Government would not listen to us when we told it the mistake it was making. He foolhardily went ahead with it and now the Minister of Finance is trying to back-pedal to get away from that position. In the meantime, however, we have suffered disastrous consequences as a result of it.

It was the same thing with the National Energy Program and its taxation system. The Government has to realize that it cannot keep siphoning off all those dollars through the taxation structure. They have to be left in the system if we are going to function properly. This is a lesson which the Government apparently has not learned. I am really surprised at the Hon. Member from Toronto not realizing what one of that city's main newspapers had to say with respect to some of the things which must happen. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that you will permit me to read a portion of that editorial?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is perfectly permissible to quote, as long as the Hon. Member reveals the source of the quote he intends to use.

Mr. Towers: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is an article in the Toronto Sun of February 16. This is the advice it gives to the Government and, I would think, to the Hon. Member for Willowdale:

> The Liberals have missed their last chance to do something effective. High taxes, high government spending and the resulting inflation have wrecked Canada's economy.
> If Lalonde really wanted the private sector to create jobs he should have slashed government spending and cut taxes. Instead he's merely handed out minor sops.
> Yet in spite of all the bluster, taxes are going up. The 1 per cent increase in the federal sales tax will result in large across-the-board increases on everything.
> This is not leadership—just more jiggery-pokery that's caused our once strong dollar to lose 25 per cent of its value and the Canadian deficit to grow 30 per cent larger in per capita terms than that of the U.S.
> How was it done? Simple. By reducing competitiveness through ever-increasing government regulation and interference—

It is just as simple as that. Apparently, Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Willowdale is not reading his own local papers. He says we have no policies. That is what we believe in. That is just exactly what we will do when we form the Government.

• (1150)

I am sure Canadians do not realize the amount of money the Government is spending which it does not have. The rapidly increasing expenditures are going to put a burden on future generations which they will never be able to pay off. We are mortgaging the lives of our children and grandchildren. We cannot spend $11,250,000 an hour 24 hours a day every day of the year, Sundays and holidays included. This is a horrendous sum, Mr. Speaker.

The Canadian people must begin to realize the direction in which the Government has been leading them. In my constituency I find that more and more people are starting to think about what is happening. I hear a lot of people talking about the tremendous deficit and the effect it is going to have on the economy, their lives and their livelihood. It cannot be otherwise. The Government is taking too much out of the system and not leaving enough for the business community to survive or expand. That is the engine we must use to get back to where we were in 1968 when the present administration took over.

I would like to bring to the attention of the House some comments made by Mr. W. R. Wyman, who is Chairman of the Board of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce. This is his advice as to what the Government should do. This is free advice. It is available to the Government but apparently it does not understand what it reads. He said:

> What we need is not nostalgia, nor is it a new crop of trendy slogans touting temporary restraint. We do need a new national commitment to an economic regime that is based on individual freedoms and responsibility, with that individual freedom protected by the right to acquire, hold and use property. And, lest anyone miss the point, it will be impossible to promote that freedom and responsibility unless the distribution of rewards is determined by the free market.

That is where the Government has gone wrong, Mr. Speaker. The Government is not allowing the free market system to make this determination. The Government is making this determination. It is being made by Members such as the Hon. Member for Willowdale who does not understand what it is all about. Mr. Wyman went on to say:

> To use an overworked phrase, the "Just Society", based on individual freedoms, cannot prevail if people interfere in the market, and the rush to regulate in the last two decades has not, on balance, proven its worth to our society. Quite the opposite. It has retarded growth, encouraged inflation, and undermined our competitiveness.

No, the long-term path to progress—to recovery, if you will—lies in Government restraint not just in spending but in overall terms. In its size. In its activities. In its will to guide us from cradle to grave. No thinking person would deny Government's role in formulating economic and social goals for Canada, but I'm suggesting it need not and should not be concerned with specifying the means to achieve those goals. That is better left to the marketplace.

That is sound advice, Mr. Speaker. I do not know where you would get any better. In place of that we have the Minister of Finance saying he is not worrying because the value of the Canadian dollar is depreciating. He is not lying awake at night thinking about that. When the value of the Canadian dollar depreciates the first effect is that we run into inflation. This is devastating. We must be able to control inflation. The only way we will do that is to have more responsibility put into the marketplace in the hands of the Canadian people. The Government must create that climate in order for that to take place. That is the best advice I can give the people opposite. I hope they pay attention.

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, the Bill we have before us is very light and short. The body of the Bill is contained on one page about eight inches by eleven inches. Even though it is light and very short, that is not the effect it is going to have upon the Canadian people. Its weight will substantially add to the burden of debt which rests upon the shoulders of Canadians today. The effects will span the years and enchain our children and our children's children for generations to come.

I have lost count of the times I have heard Liberal spokesmen declare that their intention was and is to exercise restraint and reduce the deficit. However, like most of the predictions made in so many areas, the announced goals were seldom, if ever, realized. In seeking borrowing authority for the unprecedented amount of $29.55 billion in this Bill before us, the Government has reduced its diminishing credibility to minus zero.

I listened with interest this morning to the speech of the Hon. Member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson). He stated that we in the Progressive Conservative Party have been asking for the impossible in requesting reduced deficits. Why, then, has that been promised so often by the Liberals? Apparently they had no more intention of reducing the deficit and exercising restraint than they had when they promised to keep the price of gasoline lower than that which was predicted by the Conservative Government several years ago.

The Government is asking for authority to borrow $29.55 billion. This is the eighth time the Government has come before this Parliament to request such authority. Bill C-30 was for $12 billion. Bill C-59 was for $14 billion. Bill C-111 was for $6.6 billion. Bill C-125 was for $7 billion. Bill C-128 was for $4 billion. Bill C-143 was for $19 billion. Bill C-151 was for $10.71 billion. Now, Mr. Speaker, we have the unconscionable Bill C-21 requesting $29.55 billion. This is a total of $102 billion requested in this Parliament.

As has been underlined by several of my colleagues in the course of debate, the amount requested in this Bill is far in excess of the amount required to meet the Government's commitments. There has been no clear reason given why the request has been made or for what purposes the money will be used. The Government's spokespersons, including the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde), have loudly declared that economic recovery is the prevailing trend today. I suggest that the evidence points to the contrary. I think it is safe to say that any seeming degree of recovery is, at the very best, exceedingly fragile. Furthermore, unemployment as of January this year stands at 11.2 per cent. Manufacturing is at 70.5 per cent of capacity and business and farming bankruptcies continue at an alarming rate. Farm income is declining. These facts do not indicate or support in any way the claim that recovery is a continuing reality.

I would like to call attention to the report of the Conference Board of January, 1984. It points out that the Canadian economy will experience four quarters of negative growth in 1985. The rate of job creation will slow over the course of 1984 and 1985, and will be negative in the last half of 1984. As a consequence, unemployment will fall to 10.8 per cent this summer and then rise to 11.3 per cent by the end of next year. It points out that the federal deficit is seen as remaining in the $27 billion range on a national accounts basis. Short-term interest rates will rise by two percentage points between now and the end of 1985. Capital investment will continue to be weak or negative. I do not believe there is anything in those figures that would indicate that the recovery is even holding, let alone improving across the country.

I suggest that the Bill in its current form is completely unacceptable. While we can acknowledge the necessity to meet the legitimate costs of a responsible government, we cannot meekly permit the Government to build up a surplus to finance unknown activities at taxpayers' expense.

When we look at the entire picture, I cannot understand how the Government has the colossal nerve to come before this Parliament and ask us to support a measure that will impose such a further horrendous deficit upon the Canadian people and demand that they contribute another $29.5 billion without indicating what it will be used for or how it will affect our country.

If we could see that these vast expenditures were improving the lot of the Canadian people, perhaps it would be entirely different. However, the figures that I and many of my colleagues have presented to the House would indicate that, to the contrary, it is simply a matter of pouring money into a hole in the ground. Rather than seeing an improvement so that our people are happy, contented, prosperous and confident, I believe when people see the activities of the Government and the demands it is making on the taxpayers of this country, they become increasingly depressed, to the point where we find that the social effects upon Canadian society because of the economic situation are resulting in disaster as far as many people in our country are concerned.

I repeat that there would be some reason for hope if there was an improvement but the Government is placing an increasing burden of debt upon Canadians and putting succeeding generations in a position where they will not be able to carry this debt plus a possibly increased debt in the future if, God forbid, a government like that remains in office for any further length of time.

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, when I decided this morning that I would speak for a few moments in this debate, I realized that I was tired. I did not know whether I was tired because I have had a few late nights, whether I might have spring fever since spring is nearly upon us, or whether I might even be tired because of a heavy work load. But Members of Parliament do not work hard, so it could not have been that. Then I realized that I was tired of the Government. I was tired of the excesses that have resulted in bringing before us the eighth borrowing Bill in this Parliament. My colleague from Fraser Valley East (Mr. Patterson) detailed the various numbers to the House and I will not do that again. However, this is the largest borrowing Bill in Canada's history.

Let me compare the projected deficit with some other projections. In 1979, my colleague from St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) projected some deficits. He indicated that by this year we might well have a deficit as high as $9 billion. We are now looking at a deficit of approximately $30 billion.

His successor, the first Minister of Finance in that infamous government that is now in power, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen), projected in 1980 that we would have a deficit in the $12 billion range this year. Once again, it is far off the mark. Less than a year later that same Minister projected that he would have that deficit down to $10 billion. He did not do that.

Finally, the current Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) projected last year that he would bring the deficit down to $31.3 billion. They are finally making projections of what the figure actually is.

I realized that I was tired of the incompetence of the Government. Like my colleague from Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling), I think in terms of municipal governments. I spent many years in municipal government. I think in terms of Mayor Zegouras of Belleville, Warden Rabel of Hastings, Warden Kotchopaw of Prince Edward and the other reeves and mayors in the small communities of my constituency. They must budget annually for their requirements and are required to pass a borrowing bylaw to borrow the funds which they might need to fulfil the commitments they make in their communities throughout the year. They are concerned with real money because they budget and borrow exactly what they need and, at year end, their budgets are very close to the mark. Indeed, if their budgets are off, it is usually by a small surplus because they very carefully consider what must be done throughout the year. Would that this Government have that kind of decency.

I also realized that I was tired of the misconduct of the Government, particularly as displayed by Revenue Canada recently. I could add many stories to the tales of woe that we have heard. I think of one case which came to me just a few days ago of a woman who is widowed with one child living on a small cheque left over from her husband's estate and one disability cheque, for indeed she is disabled. In an entire year, that woman lives on what the Government spends in two seconds. Despite that, she owed Revenue Canada some money and was paying it off. She found she could not make the payments in the amount she promised and continue to live at the same standard, so she decided to move to cheaper accommodation and found a less expensive place to live. However, in moving to that less expensive accommodation she had to pay the first and last month's rent together. Consequently she missed a couple of payments to Revenue Canada. This woman, who was living on such a small income, had her bank account of $500 seized by Revenue Canada. That is why I am tired.

We are told that the federal Government must borrow money in order to pay the income tax refunds that will be coming due. The Government is giving taxpayers some of their own money back. The Government is borrowing money and paying interest—at least, the taxpayers are going to pay the interest—to give people their own money back. Would that it had some of its own medicine inflicted upon it. Would that its bank account be seized as well.

I realized I was also tired of the unbusinesslike ways of this Government. We know that this Government is going to spend $18 billion this year just to pay interest on the debt. We know the Government is into the money market for over 50 per cent of the money to be borrowed this year. We have businessmen who want to make Canada grow, who want to build buildings, who want to produce products and create jobs. But frankly, they cannot borrow the money to do it because of the bungling of this Government.

I talked to a businessman just the other day, Mr. Speaker. He needed to borrow really just a very small amount, $4.5 million, only he found that the markets do not have money available right now. It could be that the markets are fudging a little bit because people can see interest rates going up and they will hold money for a few more days to get higher rates of return. We are told there is no money because the Government is into the market so heavily that there is no excess money around.

I am tired of the malicious boondoggling and make-work programs that partly cause this problem, but when the Minister and his Department are caught, they express such righteous indignation that indeed they could ever be the cause. Yet we know there are hundreds of millions of dollars being spent in these phoney make-work programs that produce nothing, unless you happen to be in a Liberal constituency.

Then I realized that I am tired of the blundering and the stupidity that goes on. This is my country, Mr. Speaker. I think my constituency of Prince Edward-Hastings—I may get an argument from some of my colleagues—is God's gift to Canada. I think Prince Edward-Hastings is one of the most perfect places in the entire country to live. People are happy and proud, as I am, to live in this beautiful part of Canada, but I find they do not have the confidence they once had. When I talk to them, as I do every weekend at meetings and at functions, I find they are concerned, disturbed and upset. They are not sure where this country is going. They are not sure that their children will make it through the various schools or make a niche for themselves in the future. They are concerned that maybe next year the tax burden, which is already horrendously high, will be just that little bit too high and they will not be able to make it. People are concerned about the deficit because they are hearing more and more about it and feel that it will finally catch up to them. They are concerned about the way in which this country is going.

I find that I am tired, sick and tired, of the posturing arrogance, the pompous conceit, the egotism and the insolence of this Government. It is not spring fever, Mr. Speaker. It is the need that we have for a new government, the need to get rid of this crew and put in a government with some spirit and belief in Canada, a government that will make a difference.

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity of speaking to the House this afternoon on Bill C-21. Just in case, Sir, that you are unaware of what this debate is about, it is debate on second reading of a Bill to give authority to the Government to borrow $29.5 billion. This is the largest borrowing Bill in Canada's history.

When you talk about borrowing in the House, that inevitably brings up the question of the deficit. The deficit brings up the general question of taxation, and taxation and all of these other subjects bring up the general topic of the economy of the day. Certainly, Mr. Speaker, it is not easy these days to get people excited about the economy, but it is, nevertheless, the single most important Government issue facing Canadians in general today.

Any way you look at it, Canada is in a deepening financial crisis. I think any doubts about that were rudely dispelled by last month's federal Budget which told us that Canada's deficit—and the borrowing Bill is directly related to that deficit—will be $31.5 billion this year and more than $25 billion for each of the next four years. By the end of the fiscal year 1987-88 the national debt of Canada will climb to $261.5 billion. That is almost four times the 1979-80 level of $68.6 billion. Four times in less than ten years the national debt has grown.

These multibillion dollar figures are almost impossible for me to grasp—I do not know about you, Sir—considering that most of us will never even see a million dollars during our lifetimes. But these horrendous deficits do affect us all directly in ways in which I think we can all easily understand. Basically those deficits, and this borrowing Bill, mean that higher interest rates for bank loans or for mortgages will be inevitable. It will mean less value for our Canadian dollar if we travel abroad. It will mean higher taxes and less money for personal spending. That in turn means business and industry cutbacks. People simply will not be able to buy new cars, new appliances, or new homes. As a result there will be fewer jobs. Everything is all related, all down the road. I say every Canadian suffers as a result of these deficits.

The question obviously is why do we have them? I must say to you, Sir, that from today's perspective it is a great deal easier to explain how they came about than why they came about. Spending at all levels of government in Canada has been rising since the end of World War II, partly at least in response to increased public demand for more government aid and more government services. Until the early 1970s growth in government spending was matched by rising government revenue: a very logical and simplistic balance existed. As people wanted more services and wanted more government aid, we were able to match that at all levels of government because rising government revenues balanced and matched those expenditures.

Then in the early 1970s governments seemed to become concerned about raising taxes. However, they also started spending at an even greater rate, especially the federal Government. To make up for this imbalance, governments, especially the federal Government, began borrowing against the future through deficit financing. That has resulted in the Government's asking the Parliament of Canada today to pass a borrowing Bill which, as I say, is the largest in Canadian history.

• (1220)

In 1976 the accumulated federal Government debt since Confederation—a time period which encompasses two world wars with vast expenditures on armies and armaments—totalled $22 billion. Now, as the last Budget indicated, our federal deficit is increasing yearly by more than what was our 109-year total just eight years ago. Last year the federal Government alone borrowed more than $26 billion. Ottawa's total debt now exceeds $130 billion. Mr. Speaker, that means you and I are $5,200 in debt; $5,200 for every man, woman and child in the country. According to the Budget forecast, $800 will be added to that debt each year for each and every one of us. Incidentally, when those of us who live in the Province of Ontario add on the debt of the Ontario Government—and I am sure it is roughly the same for every provincial government across the country—we have a debt of about $8,000. Every resident of the Province of Ontario, thanks to the combined governmental debt load of both the province and the federal Government, is now about $8,000 in debt and it is getting heavier by $1,100 every year.

I was very interested to read just recently that the Chairman of the Toronto-Dominion Bank, for instance, pointed out that if the parents of a child born today started borrowing in that child's name at the same rate of $1,100 per year, by the time the child was 25 years of age he or she would be in hock for almost $120,000. That is a great deal of money as far as the average citizen is concerned. Obviously no responsible parent would think of doing that. It is almost inconceivable, yet that is exactly what is being done to our children and their children right now through government deficit financing and the imposition of a government Bill borrowing to the extent we are being asked to authorize today.

What is the answer? There is no easy one, but I think we have to start looking at it a darn sight harder than we have in the past. Otherwise we will awaken one day to find that we have a major economic collapse on our hands. Obviously part of the problem is that government has grown too large and has become too fat in the process. We must look at it closely to determine whether we really need and can afford all those offices, all those employees, all those bureaucrats, all those expensive Crown corporations and all the services they provide. We have to put it bluntly to our constituents: if we want to keep all these services, then we will have to start paying for them through much higher taxes. It is as simple as that.

If the question is put fairly to these people, I suggest they will realize that we have to go the other route. Obviously there is some fear that reducing the deficit must mean a cutback in the universal social welfare system of which Canada is so proud, such things as the family allowance and the old age pension. In fact, they are a very small part of the problem. Recent calculations show that if old age pensions and family allowances were restricted to families with less than $30,000 annual incomes, the savings would only be about $1 billion. That is a tiny proportion of next year's projected $30 billion federal deficit. This is why we as a Party and our Leader last week reaffirmed that we were certainly committed to reducing the federal deficit. Universality of social programs and opposition to any form of means test is a cornerstone of this Party's political philosophy in any event.

This is the only vehicle I have as a Member of the House to protest deeply the Government's mismanagement of the economy over the whole time it has been in office. This is why I speak today and voice my opposition to the horrendous Bill before us.

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak against the present proposal to borrow $29.5 billion. This would mean a crushing debt of about $2,000 for every member of the workforce in Canada. Perhaps it would be a little over $2,000. The figures have to be rounded because the Government does not explain clearly how big is the workforce. The numbers keep shifting.

It is especially unsatisfactory since probably half this amount of money will go as gifts to large corporations. On past experience, approximately $15 billion or more will go as tax gifts to the largest corporations, not to corner grocery stores, not to small factories nor to little service operations. It will go to oil companies—

Mr. Fennell: And Canadair.

Mr. Heap: Yes, to Canadair—and to the very large corporations which have the ear of government, whether it is the Liberal Government in Ottawa or the Conservative Government in provinces like Ontario. Also it will go to land speculation which will make land more expensive without actually increasing its value. It will go to mergers and take-overs which have already destroyed many thousands of jobs. It will go to foreign investment in the way of tax gifts to those projects. Generally speaking, those projects do not create any more new jobs. They may create a few jobs by destroying more jobs, but the net result is that they do not create any new jobs. What the country needs above all is a restoration of employment and the prospect of full employment for everyone who is willing and able to work.

A year ago the Roman Catholic bishops spoke on this point and advocated two principles which the borrowing Bill opposes. One principle was the preference for the poor. The principle was that if we fulfilled the needs of the poor, the rich would also have their needs fulfilled. That is the opposite of the trickle-down theory espoused by the federal Government and by most provincial governments. The trickle-down theory holds that if we take taxes from poor people and give them to the rich, then some day some of that money will be returned to the poor people from whom it was taken in the first place. Most poor people do not think they will live long enough to see that day.

The second principle was the priority of labour over capital. Obviously the bishops do not mean by "labour" the Canadian Labour Congress or by "capital" the Canadian Manufacturers Association. They were talking about a basic fact of human life, namely that live, present labour uses past or dead labour. The goods we produced yesterday, a year ago or a century ago, whether they be railroads, trucks, factory buildings, electrical power, food or whatever, are dead labour. They are capital. They are intended to be used in the service of live labour, which is the new work we will do today. That is how I understand the teaching of the Roman Catholic bishops. They are saying that today's work must take priority over the results of yesterday's work, not the other way around.

This Bill ignores that principle. It suggests the Government should have more billions of dollars to hand out in the way it has been handing them out; that is, giving to people who simply increase the dollar value of yesterday's work. They will argue about who is going to be the president of the company that will control that capital. No new jobs will be created with that $29.5 billion.

It would be possible to support this borrowing Bill if the Government would reverse that principle. I am certain that support could be found in this corner of the House. I cannot speak so confidently for the moss-backs to my extreme right, but I hope that support will be found across the way. If the order were reversed, the working men and women in Canada would support it.

One-fifth of the workforce in Canada is either completely unemployed or severely under-employed. That is our greatest unused resource. If we had 25 per cent more people working, that one-fifth, that is 25 per cent more than now, working at their best, we could wipe out a $29.5 billion debt in very short order. We would cure many other troubles as well. It would be worth borrowing the $29.5 billion if the Government would apply it in that way. The Government would have to reform the tax laws so that over half of it would not be given to corporations. Instead, they could institute a program that would eliminate unemployment in a short while by suggesting that each worker should work four days a week and be paid the fifth day to study, train or improve himself or herself for the new challenges in the workforce that are in front of us right now.

We say we need a workforce capable of doing something more than dull manual labour or pen-pushing. That is true. We need a workforce capable of handling the new challenges of modern technology. The way to do that is to enable not just a small, select few to study, not just those who have been forced out of active work by layoffs to study and not just those who have been discouraged by years of unemployment. They should have the opportunity to study until they are ready to be employed again when the country is ready to use them.

If this $29.5 billion were used to enable all workers—men, women, youth, middle-aged and older workers—to study one-fifth of their time and also include the one-fifth unemployed and under-employed in the active workforce, we would not only save close to $15 billion in unemployment insurance but save another large amount in welfare. We would restore our educational system which is falling into ruin through cutbacks if we applied this $29 billion in that way. Best of all, we would mobilize the workforce with a kind of enthusiasm that has not been seen since World War II. We have not had a labour shortage in Canada since World War II. We should have such a problem again!

With a program such as this, we would put a hopeful prospect in front of all Canada's workers, both those who are working and those who are not. We would give them something to look forward to by way of sharing in active terms as workers in the growth of this country. I hope that an idea like this will be taken seriously by those on the Government benches, to the extent that they will seriously want to reconstruct Canada, to rebuild our economy. The resource we have to use is the one-fifth of our workforce that is unemployed or under-employed. The best place to use the $29 billion is in putting those people immediately to work.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, what prompts me to get to my feet are the numerous charges coming from across the way, particularly today from the Hon. Member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson), with respect to the absence of policy on this side. I must go quickly because of the fact that I only have ten minutes to address the subject of Crown corporations. As Hon. Members know, during the past few months the Progressive Conservative task force has been examining this very important subject. We have consulted widely both within the public and private sectors. While the report is not yet finalized, some of the interim recommendations we have received as policy matters are as follows:

First, rationalizing and clarifying the Government's relationship with Crown corporations, based on a return to a system of effective individual ministerial responsibility.

Second, a revised classification system for Crown corporations based on the extent of a corporation's reliance on Government financing and its role in implementing public policy objectives.

Third, stringent measures to restrict the incorporation or acquisition of Crown corporations, subsidiaries and affiliates; including a requirement that aparent Crown corporation may only be created by a special Act of Parliament. This would end the ability of Ministers to create corporations by Orders in Council with absolutely no scrutiny or control by Parliament.

Fourth, a requirement for the submission of three to five-year business plans by each parent corporation for government approval and for tabling in Parliament, and for annual reports and quarterly financial statements of the highest possible quality and integrity.

Fifth, expansion and clarification of the role and responsibilities of the Auditor General in auditing Crown corporations and in his relationship with private sector auditors.

Sixth, improved accounting procedures and practices for Crown corporations conforming to principles and practices accepted in the private sector.

Seventh, clarification of the role and responsibilities of directors and officers of Crown corporations, including a requirement that the duties, responsibilities ands liabilities that apply in the private sector also apply to Crown corporations.

Eighth, creation of a joint Senate and House of Commons Standing Committee on Crown corporations, with the mandate and resources to undertake effective cyclical reviews of individual corporations.

These are just some of the policy suggestions that have been developed by this Party. It may be, however, that some of these proposals will be implemented before we are called upon to form the next government. I rather expect that we might see some of them at three o'clock when amendments to the Financial Administration Act are brought in by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Gray).

After years of neglect, the Liberals now tell us that legislation will be introduced next month. That means this month, because I am reading from a speech given on February 23 last in Toronto by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) on the subject of Crown corporations. That is where the policy came from. Nobody picked it up, let alone the Hon. Member for Willowdale or anybody else over there. Let no one say that we are not addressing policy matters.

After years of neglect and years of prodding by this side, the Liberals now tell us they will be introducing legislation today which will address the problem of Crown corporations and financial control. The reason, of course, is that the existence of our task force has caused a flurry of activity in the Government, just as our task forces on tax simplification and Revenue Canada practices caused the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Bussières) to do something which is yet to be observed but caused the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) to address the subject in his recent Budget.

One can only hope for the country's sake that the existence of the task forces of the Progressive Conservative Party on productivity enhancement, youth employment and the employment impact of technological change will prompt further Liberal action, where they are taking our policies and putting them into their legislation. That can only result in good for the country. Better yet, Sir, perhaps we should start a task force on when to hold the next election.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) is a hard act to follow. He has successfully attempted to repudiate the accusation of Liberal Party members that we do not have any policies.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Carney: I am sorry that they cannot give me the courtesy of listening to my speech. Perhaps they are still so upset by the House Leader's accurate report of our policy that they cannot contain their concern about the next election.

I would like to talk about the fact that, as pointed out by the Hon. Member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence), this Bill is the biggest borrowing Bill in Canadian history in that it calls for $29.5 billion of additional borrowing. This is also the eighth borrowing Bill since 1980. Eight borrowing Bills have been sought in only four years, yet the need to borrow this massive amount of money attracts the interest of only about a dozen members on the government side. During the course of this debate, I have counted the number of government Members present in the House and the count has fluctuated between eight and 12. I see that not one member of the NDP is sitting in the Chamber to discuss the fact that the Government has gone back to the trough for $29.5 billion. The other point is that $4 billion of this—

Mr. Riis: I rise on a point of order.

Miss Carney: Excuse me, Mr. Speaker. I thought I heard a member call to be recognized on a point of order. It is the custom of the House to—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair also heard the call to rise on a point of order but does not see anyone standing other than the Hon. Member. She may continue her remarks.

Miss Carney: Mr. Speaker, another point I would like to make is that the Government is asking for authority to borrow $4 billion now for a contingency fund which can be carried over into another fiscal year. That means that $25.5 billion must be used in 1984. Of course, we are concerned about the use to which this contingency fund will be put. Having a contingency fund in an election year raises the fear that it will be used as a political slush fund, as has been the use of so many of the funding programs of the Government in the past.

One of the candidates for the Liberal leadership race, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Roberts), has just left the House. The Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) has accurately described that Minister as the "Minister of oink oink". As the House knows, that Minister has managed to spend $186 million through a special employment initiatives fund, mainly in Liberal ridings. Our big concern is whether or not this $4 billion will be used for this kind of sleazy slush fund in an election year.

I can only remind you, Mr. Speaker, of the concerns of Conservative members, and I have raised this matter in the House, about the 15 per cent unemployment rate in British Columbia, a province which received only 5.5 per cent of the funds to which I just referred. Other members of the Conservative Party have pointed out how strange it is that none of the needs of the post office in the next fiscal year can be met at all in Conservative ridings. Similarly, Canada Mortgage and Housing projects are apparently only desired in Liberal ridings. Even members of the NDP, and I now give credit to the finance critic for the NDP who has returned to the House, have pointed out that in terms of this particular program the average funding across Canada amounted to $150 per unemployed person. The Province of Quebec received $206 per unemployed person, the Maritimes received $227 per unemployed person and British Columbia is at the bottom of the heap, having received only $60 per unemployed person. That is what concerns us about this kind of borrowing in an election year.

Another point we must keep in mind when debating this borrowing Bill is that borrowing is the true legacy of the Prime Minister's years in the House. We have heard a great deal about the Prime Minister's contributions to the House but his main contribution during his tenure was the shattered dreams and the debt burden that he placed upon Canadians. He will go down in history as the Canadian Prime Minister who mortgaged the future not only of ourselves but of our children and grandchildren; the one who eroded the hopes of many people to ever own their own homes; who drained the bank accounts of small business either through tax policies or harassment by National Revenue; and who has consistently, through policies of high interest rates, bankrupted farmers, lost family homes and shut the doors to the education of children. He has left a mammoth legacy of grief with which we must live.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Carney: However, I noticed that the candidates for the Liberal leadership race are trying to put some distance between themselves and these Liberal policies. It is fascinating to see the Minister of Employment and Immigration go on national television and talk about how he has new ideas and that he is a man of the future as compared to a man of the past, referring to the former Finance Minister who started the whole program of spiralling deficits. I look forward to seeing such a person return to the House of Commons so that we may lay all the numbers on the table and he may discover what he began when he first took a balanced budget and added $5 billion in deficits, until the deficit has now reached over $31 billion. It would be enchanting to have the opportunity to table his record as Finance Minister before the House.

Let me return to the issue of the man of the future with new ideas and a new outlook. I was reminded of last weekend when some of us in the House attended a Canada-U.S. parliamentary delegation meeting to discuss our mutual problems. Of course, American senators were talking about the astounding development surrounding Senator Hart. One of our American colleagues said that yes, he himself was a new hopeful; he was younger than Senator Hart, he had been in the House for fewer years than Senator Hart, he had some new ideas since breakfast and he may even have had some new ideas since lunch. He would be prepared, if he could just think about those ideas long enough, to articulate them and present them to us as a hopeful leader of his Party.

That situation reminds me of the situation of the unfortunate "Minister of oink oink", who truly believes that a man of his tattered reputation can possibly be taken seriously by the Canadian electorate, particularly by those who live in ridings which were deprived of his particular brand of porkbarreling.

Indicative of the legacy of the Prime Minister's years, I think, is the calibre of the leadership candidates as evidenced by the Minister of Employment and Immigration. That he is all the Party can offer to date is really the best commentary that can be made on the fate of the Liberal Party and the best reflection of what its members have done to the nation as a whole.

What has this terrible legacy cost us? Some of the figures have already been presented. For instance, it has cost us an increase in interest rates. Last week, Treasury bills had risen again. That move puts the terrible fear in the hearts of Canadians that interest rates will again increase and we will be faced with a terrible spiral of mounting debts and hopeless futures. Furthermore, the amount of money we will be paying in terms of the additional debt will be some $50 million.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Carney: I am sorry that the Liberal members who are present find this so distressful, and I am sorry they cannot listen and take heed. Perhaps if they run as leadership hopefuls as well they will have a new idea to present: no debt.

• (1250)

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, as I rise to speak on Bill C-21, the $29.5 billion borrowing Bill, I must say that it is difficult to find words to cope with such a complex piece of legislation. If we wanted to review the borrowing Bills in this Thirty-second Parliament, we could start with Bills C-30, C-12, C-59, C-111, C-125, C-128, C-153 and now C-21. Each Bill requests an increase in borrowing authority.

There is concern with this ever-growing interest burden not just in this House, Mr. Speaker, but all across the country. In 1984-85 the servicing of this debt will cost an estimated $20.4 million, $800 for every man, woman and child in Canada, or $1,900 per taxpayer.

As a new Member of Parliament I should like to take a few moments to describe my feelings about this $29.5 billion. In 1968 when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was chosen to lead the Liberal Party, he said there would be a just society for all Canadians. Mr. Speaker, I should like to say to you that the problems in this country will not be bilingualism or regional distribution; the problem in this country is the porkbarreling that is going on.

Before being elected as a Member of this House, Mr. Speaker, I thought it would be an honour to have the opportunity to represent the riding of Timiskaming and take part in the history of Canada as one of the 282 Members of Parliament. The day of my election, October 12, 1982, was a great day for me, when I became one of those 282 Members.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDougall: I felt that I could work not only for Timiskaming but for all parts of the country. But my expectations have been diminished by what has happened in the last few months, Mr. Speaker.

Unemployment is a major problem not only in my riding but in other ridings which have 12, 14, 16 or 22 per cent unemployment. The Government and the Minister introduced a Special Employment Initiatives Program but apparently it was only available to members of the Government. That is a tragedy, Mr. Speaker. The ridings which surround mine received generous funds; Timmins-Chapleau $459,000, Sudbury $957,000, Nipissing over $1 million. But the riding of Timiskaming received only $130,000.

Some Hon. Members: Shame!

An Hon. Member: Do your job.

Mr. MacDougall: Before my election to this House I was told, and I believed, that as long as one was honest and sincere and worked hard for his constituents, it would be for the betterment of the country. When there is 13 per cent unemployment in my riding, I do my utmost to help people but if I do not have an opportunity to get a fair allocation of the funds available, I cannot. What we are doing is dividing this country, not working together, and that is certainly indicated through that program.

I made application for two major projects under the Special Employment Initiatives Program, Mr. Speaker, one for a water tower and sewer projects in Kirkland Lake and the other for the extension of an arena in Haileybury. I received a letter from the Minister's office assuring me that the Minister would be writing to me in the near future. That does not create jobs,

Mr. Speaker, it just delays matters and it does not give me any of the funding that has been made available to elected Members.

The last Budget did nothing to help the unemployed of this country, Mr. Speaker. In this country there are mines, sawmills, and industries in which men and women have worked 20 or 25 years and at the age of 45, 50 or 60 have found themselves out of work. Today there is nothing for them. Was this addressed in the Budget? No, it was not. Did the Budget address the question of financial assistance to the spouse of 50, 55 or 60 years of age who has lost her husband? No, it did not. What has been offered to help the young people who have just come out of college with a degree and find that the only job available is driving a taxi? Nothing has been done for them.

I should like to look again at the work programs, Mr. Speaker. Under the Canada Works programs, this year the riding of Timiskaming received $96 per person yet the riding next door, which is of a different political stripe, received $146 per person. Is this a just society, Mr. Speaker? I really believe that if we are going to work together the unemployed of this country should not be punished because they happen to have a democratic right to elect whom they please.

The people who are unemployed or on welfare, those who cannot find work, are being discriminated against because in a democratic election they decided to support the Conservative Party. Now they are being penalized for that. Hon. Members opposite should consider the position of these people. How would those Members like it if they lived in a small community and after 12 months their unemployment insurance benefits ran out? The only thing those people can do is humbly walk into the municipal office and, with tears in their eyes ask for welfare. Their future is shot.

If we are going to grant a $29.5 billion borrowing authority, Mr. Speaker, then every Member of the House should be treated equally; but I am afraid that will not happen under this Government. There will only be equality when the people of Canada are given the opportunity to judge the Government, that tired Party, on what it has done to Canadians. I urge that that judgment be taken as soon as possible, no matter who may lead that Party. The unemployed have been hurt, Mr. Speaker; people have lost their homes, their businesses, their farms. There are men and women who fought for this country in a number of wars and who came back to what they thought was a just land.

I see that it is one o'clock, Mr. Speaker. I thank you for giving me the opportunity to speak today.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

NATIONAL REVENUE

TAX COURT OF CANADA—BACKLOG OF CASES

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, public attention focused on the operation of Revenue Canada has revealed auditing and assessing practices that have resulted in financial difficulty, even disaster, for many Canadian taxpayers. The disturbing element in many cases is that Revenue Canada's quest for money overrides fair application of the taxation rules.

In order to protect Canadian taxpayers from over-zealous and unfair tax collectors, it is essential that we have an effective and accessible appeal process. This process should involve independent officers who can apply impartial judgment to tax questions. In short, the tax appeal process must provide a judicial forum for settlement of tax disputes.

In 1983 Parliament created the Tax Court of Canada, presumably to guarantee fair treatment for Canadian taxpayers. The Government claimed that the Tax Court of Canada would provide easy and expense-free access for taxpayers who dispute tax assessments made by Revenue Canada. It is, therefore, disturbing to discover this newly constituted tax court is already jammed with a backlog of cases, which will create unreasonable delays in processing cases. Justice delayed is justice denied, especially when those taxed must pay in advance.

If the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Bussières) wants to be fair to Canadian taxpayers, he will act immediately to expedite income tax appeals and ensure that the Tax Court of Canada has adequate personnel and resources to carry out its parliamentary mandate.

POLITICAL PARTIES

ATTITUDE OF LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Mr. Gaston Gourde (Lévis): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Leader of the Opposition is now reaping his whirlwind. By showing he is only an illusion, he is now losing those who might have been his best supporters, in fact, all those who have been deluding themselves about his capabilities.

The Leader of the Provincial Conservatives in Alberta, Mr. Gary Filmon, did not mince his words in today's edition of the Globe and Mail . . . sorry, Manitoba . . . He said that one day, the Leader of the Opposition—the Progressive Conservatives are amused—but it was Manitoba, and in any case, it is a fact that last night Mr. Mulroney, the Leader of the Opposition, turned down an invitation to attend a meeting of ethnic groups, apparently because of a previous engagement, while several weeks ago he had accepted an invitation to be the Honorary President at this dinner.

One day he repudiates the Member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie) and other members of his party because of their position on bilingualism, one day he claims he will not tolerate dissent in the party on a subject as important as bilingualism, and the next day he says that dissent is permissible in certain areas.

Mr. Speaker, I think Francophones in Canada will not forget what the Leader of the Opposition has done for bilingualism in this country by failing to commit himself.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

INTERIM BARLEY PAYMENTS REQUESTED

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, fortunately for western feed grain producers, off-board prices are rising rapidly and will soon attain values of 30 cents to 35 cents per bushel above initial prices offered by the Canadian Wheat Board. Because of relatively stable world prices, helped by the United States payment in kind program and drought, our Canadian producers deserve a better deal from the Canadian Wheat Board. This can only be accomplished if the Government approves another interim payment on barley and a first such increase on malting barley and oats.

The Pool has sufficient funds to satisfy such a request. Perhaps as much as $1 billion of farmers' money will be in that Pool by the end of this crop year if no further interim payments are made. Farmers need this money now as they prepare for Spring seeding. They also require action from the Government on the Western Grain Stabilization Fund, farm interest rates, particularly extension of the Farm Credit Corporation rebate program, farm fuel prices and taxation, and the list goes on. Food production must be given more serious attention by the Government.

MINING

ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW ALUMINUM COMPANY IN QUEBEC

Mr. Pierre Gimaïel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Mines)): Mr. Speaker, in a speech he made this week in Montreal, the Quebec Minister of Industry and Trade, Mr. Rodrigue Biron, announced that a special group of officials had been formed to meet representatives of major aluminum companies throughout the world and persuade them them to locate in Quebec. Mr. Speaker, as the Member for Lac-Saint-Jean, I am rising in the House today because I wish to point out to the same Minister that aluminum has always been one of the major industries in my region. Over the years, more than 10,000 people have been employed in aluminum refineries in the Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean area. In my riding and more specifically in Alma, we have lost 600 jobs out of 1,200 available over the last six years. Mr. Speaker, I am concerned about the fact that the Government of Quebec, in its worldwide campaign to bring new aluminum companies to my province, seems to have forgotten the development potential of the Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean area for this industry. I think this is unfortunate, in view of all the infrastructures that were provided by the federal Government, including gas, harbour and airport facilities, thus making it attractive for new companies to locate here with Alcan, especially considering that Alcan has to modernize its facilities to remain competitive, with the resulting loss of jobs which started a few years ago. I therefore urge the Government of the Province of Quebec to remember those who pioneered in the aluminum industry in Canada and the Province of Quebec, the people of the Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean area who very strongly supported—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the Hon. Member. The Hon. Member for Saskatoon East.

HUMAN RIGHTS

SUPPORT URGED FOR LATIN AMERICAN CONFERENCE

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw to the attention of this House the upcoming Conference of the Latin American Association for Human Rights which begins tomorrow in Montreal and continues through Sunday. This event is of particular interest because it brings Latin Americans of note, including the Vice-Presidents of Bolivia and Ecuador, to Canada. It provides a special opportunity for discussing and developing initiatives for defence of human rights and the establishment of peace with justice between Latin Americans and with their American colleagues.

One aspect of the preparation of the Conference is troubling. Although its organizers, the Latin America Association for Human Rights and Canadian co-sponsors, La ligue des droits et libertés, the Canadian Catholic Organization for Development and Peace, and the Inter-Church Committee on Human Rights in Latin America, have made frequent representations to the Department of External Affairs seeking limited financial support and high level personal participation in the conference, neither the funds promised nor the participation have been confirmed.

Given the level of significance of the visitors from Latin America, and the scope of the issues before the event, I fail to undertand this attitude. I am disturbed by this seeming lack of enthusiasm and I encourage the Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) and the Hon. Minister for External Relations (Mr. Pepin) to support the Conference and ensure high quality representation from the Government of Canada.

AGRICULTURE

HOLSTEIN DAIRY PRODUCTION IN BOIS-FRANC

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, today I wish to make a statement under the provisions of Standing Order 21 about the Holstein Association of Canada. The Association was founded in 1884, and this year, its annual convention is being held here in Ottawa, to celebrate its 100th birthday and to honour various Canadian breeders belonging to the association. Among the various Holstein associations in Canada, there are a number that have been in existence for some years.

Mr. Speaker, in my riding, we have the Holstein Association of Bois-Franc, which is now fifty years old. Members of the association are in the visitors' gallery, and I am proud to see them here today. The Holstein Association of Bois-Franc has many members who have enhanced Canada's reputation in Holstein cattle breeding and have improved Holstein milk production in the region. I am happy to see that the Holstein Association of Canada has chosen Ottawa to hold its annual convention and also to honour the master breeders who received this award last year. Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should explain that in the region of Bois-Franc, which is in the riding of Lotbinière, a number of people have been classified as master breeders, including, this year, Mr. André Laroche of Warwick. Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to see that the Holstein Association of Canada continues to progress and that it has a very solid Quebec membership. People in the riding of Lotbinière are active members of the association, whose local chapter has more than 300 very active members who are a valuable asset to the Holstein Association.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SIOUX VALLEY BAND SCHOOL

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I recently visited the Sioux Valley School which is operated by the Sioux Valley Indian Band in my constituency. On that day the students were unable to attend classes because the sewage system had backed up. There were other problems. The school is actually a cluster of small buildings, and the result is a fragmented student population. As well, there are no gymnasium facilities to speak of, and one building is a health and safety hazard.

Despite these conditions, in the five years since the Sioux Valley Indian Band assumed responsiblity for operating the school, the student population has grown, attendance has improved, and students who had once dropped out of off-reserve schools have now returned to Sioux Valley to finish their education. Clearly this band has risen to the challenge of preparing for self government.

It is ironic, therefore, that the federal Government is discouraging the band's efforts. Despite repeated pleas by the band for a new school with decent facilities, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has refused to construct one until at least 1987, and very possibly much later. The band has offered to take out a loan to finance the construction, but it needs a loan guarantee from the federal Government, and that has not been forthcoming. The Sioux Valley school, therefore, joins a growing backlog of capital projects in Indian education.

Like numerous other Indian bands, the Sioux Valley band has demonstrated that it is capable of meeting its own commitment to education. The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development should hold up its end of the bargain.

HUMAN RIGHTS

U.S.S.R.—PLEA ON BEHALF OF ANATOLY SHCHARANSKY

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, today, March 15, 1984, Anatoly Shcharansky, Jewish prisoner of conscience in the U.S.S.R., begins his eighth year of imprisonment. We all recall in 1977 when this brave and courageous man was arrested and later brought to court on trumped up charges of having acted as an agent of the U.S. Government. Shcharansky's 13 year prison sentence can only reflect the harshest element of a society which continues to persecute its most vulnerable community.

Shcharansky, who first applied to leave the U.S.S.R. 11 years ago, now symbolizes all Soviet Jews who desire only to be allowed to leave the U.S.S.R. to be reunited with family in their homeland. Last month his mother was given permission to visit him in prison, the first visit in over 18 months. His condition continues to deteriorate. He has heart pains, and suffers from bone and spine diseases.

A new regulation in the prison, Para. 188.3, was in effect under which he could automatically and repeatedly have his sentence extended by up to five years if his behaviour was deemed improper. Previously a change to an inmate's status required a court ruling. Now the commandant can simply note on a prisoner's dossier the details of the alleged misdeed.

At this time, with a change in leadership in the U.S.S.R., we appeal to the Soviet—

Mr. Speaker: I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

S.O. 21

AIR TRANSPORT

CANADIAN TRANSPORT COMMISSION—ANNOUNCED CLOSURE OF VANCOUVER OFFICE

Mr. Gerry St. Germain (Mission-Port Moody): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Transport Commission's Air Transport Committee office in Vancouver is being forced to close in April. This office, which enforces CTC air regulations affecting the licensing of air carriers, is closing because Treasury Board refuses to grant one and one-half more person years. Only five field officers cover our entire nation. Yet other sectors receive billions of dollars. The best way to promote air industry is to ensure safety.

When the Vancouver office closes, the Edmonton field office will have to cover B.C., Alberta, Yukon, and the Northwest Territories. B.C. is experiencing the fastest growth in Canada in the number of new air carriers. Small carriers servicing the resource industries are sprouting up all over B.C. and the Yukon. Yet the Minister of Transport (Mr. Axworthy) shuts the Vancouver office, and keeps the Winnipeg office open despite the negligible growth in Manitoba.

Effective licensing enforcement is crucial for air safety. The air industry is a very exacting and technical industry. The terrain in B.C. and the Yukon is among the most treacherous in the flying world, Mr. Speaker. For the safety of all Canadians, all tourists, and everyone flying in B.C. and the Yukon, I urge the Minister of Transport not to close the Vancouver office, to remain within his budget Estimates, and to consider alternatives other than safety.

THE LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter affecting national unity. Our Constitution allows our citizens unrestricted travel from one province to another. Sadly, I must report to the House that the Leader of the Official Opposition, the Hon. Member for Central Nova (Mr. Mulroney), is not being allowed to travel to the Province of Manitoba.

The provincial Leader of the Conservative Party, Mr. Filmon, is reported as saying that Conservative memberships are down and donors are refusing to give money. In reaction to the negative feeling in Manitoba toward the federal Leader, Mr. Filmon is quoted as saying: "I've seen the letters. It's not a crisis . . . but whether it reaches crisis proportions I can't say right now".

Before this crisis is allowed to occur, the House must act. I recommend that the House pass an all-Party resolution stating that the Conservative Party Leader has a constitutional right to unrestricted travel within Canada, and that this must be respected by the Manitoba Tories. To make the passage of this resolution easier I recommend that a House order be passed stating that each Party be limited to one speaker, that the motion be deemed to be passed without a vote, and that the Manitoba Conservative MPs be allowed to reach the airport before the debate begins.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FINANCE

INCREASE IN BANK OF CANADA RATE

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. On March 7 he made the incredibly stupid statement that he was not going to spend his nights up worrying that the dollar is not at 81 cents. As a result the dollar is now struggling to stay above 78 cents with the help of the Government and the Bank of Canada, using up our U.S. reserves. On March 11 the Minister said that interest rates would remain stable for most of 1984 and drop toward the end of the year.

Today the Bank of Canada rate went up from 10.20 per cent to 10.56 per cent. The prime bank rate is 11 per cent. Why is it the policy of the Bank of Canada and of the Government of Canada that interest rates should go up? This increase is very likely to force up the bank prime rates and all other interest rates in Canada.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we will have to see what evolution takes place in terms of the prime rate in the next few days. The Hon. Member knows there are pressures at the present time upon interest rates, both in Canada and in the United States. There is strong speculation that the prime rate in the United States will also go up in the next few days. We will carefully follow the evolution of the situation.

As to detailed explanations in that regard, we had a debate in the House on Monday of this week at which time I made quite an elaborate statement on the Budget. The Hon. Member was in the House. If the Hon. Member wants to refresh his memory on the position of the Government in this regard, I invite him to review the debate in the House on March 12.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, the problem is not refreshing my memory. The problem is to obscure the memories of everyone who heard the Minister's stupid statements of a week ago.

EFFECT ON COMMERCIAL BANK RATES

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same Minister. Historically the difference between the Bank of Canada rate, which today went to 10.56 per cent, and the prime bank rate, which today is 11 per cent, is 1.25 percentage points. The corollary from that is that this increase in the Bank of Canada rate, which has been approved by the Minister, will inevitably force up the bank prime rate, and all interest rates in Canada. Can the Minister explain to the House why that is this policy? Can he tell the House how Canada's economic recovery can be on schedule, as he said on Sunday, if these rates are going to go up again?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, insults are the last resort of those who are at a loss for arguments and for those who lack the intelligence to find any. I will let my hon. colleague decide to which category he belongs.

What I said, I said in the House at the beginning of the week. My hon. colleague has been Minister of Finance. He knows as well as I do that it is not the Minister of Finance who determines the weekly rate for Treasury bills. The rate is set at a weekly auction held every Thursday under the auspices of the Bank of Canada, and that is when the rate for Treasury bills is set.

I must say my hon. colleague has a very short memory, but if he has forgotten that the rate for Treasury bills is set in the way I just described, he should at least recall his own statement in the House when he was Minister of Finance, when he said that as far as he was concerned, there was nothing he could do about interest rates.

MINISTER'S OCTOBER STATEMENT—REQUEST FOR RESIGNATION

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): The present Minister of Finance is responsible for the debacle that this country now suffers. Why did the Minister, on October 19, last Fall, five months ago, state that interest rates would likely drop by another two to three percentage points in the next six months? Why would he make that prediction and then so conduct himself that today he and the Bank of Canada, to which he can give directives, are now forcing interest rates up? I remind him that the 180-day T. Bill rate today went to 10.95 per cent, almost 11 per cent, which will certainly force those rates up.

How can the Minister have any credibility since he prophesied five months ago a two to three percentage point drop, when the rates are now going to go up? When will he tender his resignation?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is getting deeper and deeper in his own hole, I am afraid.

Mr. Crosbie: You got us all in your hole. Everybody is going down the hole with you.

Mr. Lalonde: My poor friend does not even have a memory.

Mr. Crosbie: You are Brer Rabbit.

Mr. Lalonde: He can't even read. I invite him to go back to that alleged statement of last fall—

Mr. Crosbie: The Toronto Star. The Liberal bible.

Mr. Lalonde: I said at that time that I had hope, and indicated—

Mr. Crosbie: Could I have the camera, please?

Mr. Lalonde: I said that the forecast was for a decline of interest rates in 1984 and that I hoped at best that there would be a decline of up to 2 per cent and 3 per cent in 1984. But I stressed quite clearly that this was, at best, a hope. It was not a forecast.

Mr. Blenkarn: It is a hopeless Government.

Mr. Lalonde: In effect, for 1984 we have forecast a decline in interest rates in Canada between now and the end of the year, and I still believe that this is a possibility. This has been stated in the Budget, and it is still our view.

This does not mean that in the course of the year there will not be upward pressure on the interest rates. As I have indicated—and I indicated that in the article to which my hon. friend refers—this was extremely dependent on what would happen in the United States. If interest rates in the United States go up, as they have been doing lately, it is quite clear that it would be impossible to prevent them from going up in Canada also. We have done everything we can, and continue to do everything we can, to ensure that there will be no large increase in the interest rates in Canada and no large decline in the value of the Canadian dollar.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

CANADAIR—CHALLENGER AIRCRAFT CONSTRUCTION PROGRAM

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. When will the Government get its act together? The Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development states that he will get rid of Canadair altogether. The Minister of State for Social Development is planning a paper cover-up. Will the President of the Treasury Board agree to spin off the operation of the Challenger in order to secure the jobs for the people working at Canadair on the profitable ventures that they have under way?

Hon. Herb Gray (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, what my hon. friend says has a familiar yet ominous ring. It reminds me of what the Conservative Diefenbaker Government was saying not too many years ago. It said that the A.V. Roe Company was a great company, but the Avro-Arrow had to go.

Mr. McDermid: St. Laurent made that decision, and you know it.

Mr. Gray: That is what the Diefenbaker Government did. It killed the Avro-Arrow, which killed A.V. Roe and the thousands of jobs involved. My hon. friend wants to do the same thing, but we will not let him and the Canadian people will support us in that.

CONTINUATION OF PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, enough is enough. There is an article about Canadair on the front page of The Wall Street Journal that is damning to the company. There are no further funds available for development beyond the 601. The Falcon 900 and the Gulfstream 4 will be out in 1986, with far higher technology and a far better capacity. What right does the Government have to continue this operation that has already cost the taxpayers of Canada $3.5 billion?

Hon. Herb Gray (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is now saying that his Party's policy is guided by The Wall Street Journal. I say that our policies are determined by the best interests of Canada for the Canadian people and Canadian workers generally. This is what we are doing. He can rely on The Wall Street Journal; we will serve the interests of Canada.

FINANCE

EFFECT OF INCREASE IN BANK OF CANADA RATE

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. He knows that the announced major increase in rates by the Bank of Canada today will be passed on, with major increases implemented by all of Canada's chartered banks. This will mean that many small businesses that were going to expand will not be able to do so. The input costs of all our farmers will go up, and mortgages that are going to be renewed from coast to coast will be on the increase as well. All of those facts can only mean that the precarious economic recovery that seemed to be under way could be brought to a devastating halt. Given those facts, why is the Government of Canada pursuing this very regressive economic policy?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to point out to my hon. friend that mortgage rates, for instance, started to go up before the bank rate went up.

Mr. Broadbent: They will go up higher now.

Mr. Lalonde: When my friends says that the increase in the Bank of Canada rate today will be passed on wholly to the consumer, I think he is running ahead of himself. We will have to see what will happen in the market in terms of increases in the rates.

Like my hon. friend, I do not like any increase in interest rates. I would certainly prefer to have lower rates, but I must remind him again that we do not live in a glass house. We live in North America and are extremely dependent on what is happening in the United States, and the rates in the United States have pushed upward in the last few weeks. This is the unfortunate situation in which we are living at the present time.

We have brought our rates down as low as we could in relation to the Americans. Over the last six months there has been no difference in the prime rate between Canada and the United States. We have been able to achieve this.

The rates seem to be edging up in the United States. I have not heard any sensible suggestion from the NDP or Conservative side as to how we would prevent rates from going up in Canada when they are going up in the United States.

With respect to my hon. friend's conclusion, I would like to remind him again that he has seen rates going up in the United States and this does not seem necessarily to have stopped the recovery. The recovery seems to have been going on in spite of some increase in the U.S. rates.

FLOATING VALUE OF DOLLAR—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, the Minister knows that almost every private sector group in the Canadian Economy, whether they are institutions or economists, indeed I suspect his own officials have also told him that when interest rates in Canada go up, the very precarious recovery that is under way could grind to a halt. The million and a half who are unemployed will be increased in number instead of having the opportunity to get jobs.

One reason he has given for increasing our rate is to protect the level of the Canadian dollar artificially. Considering that lower rates will mean easier business opportunities for small business, better opportunities for home owners, lower input costs for farmers, and I add that if the dollar drops a bit it means increased exports in our forest products sector, increased exports in our manufacturing sector, and increased exports in almost all of our trade, which means more jobs for Canadians, not fewer, why does the Minister not let the dollar have a clean float?

Mr. Crosbie: He wouldn't lose any sleep about it.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, for a very simple reason. Movements both in interest rates and in the exchange rates would have negative impacts. I have myself spelled the positive elements that result from some decline in the value of the Canadian dollar. But there is also the negative side, as the Hon. Member knows, in terms of inflationary costs to the Canadian consumer for everything we import. That will also be passed on to the consumer and will mean higher costs of living for Canadians.

I have indicated that our policy, that of the Bank of Canada and that of the Government, is to moderate strong swings in terms of higher interest rates or a lower dollar. We are not trying to prevent the natural flow of the market, but we are certainly not going to be indifferent to strong speculative movements in either direction.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I have difficulty understanding that the Minister actually believes all of what he has just said. He did not say it with his usual élan.

1980 ELECTION PROMISE

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I would like the Minister of Finance to address the substance of the argument, in so far as he can in the Question Period. Lower interest rates at home also mean lower costs for all our small producers, farmers, and home owners, which means more growth in the economy. Since a dollar that drops just somewhat would also mean a good increase in our export sales, which would mean more jobs for Canadians, why does the Government, I repeat, not see those trade-offs, see the limited impact on inflation that a higher dollar would have, and say it makes a lot more sense in terms of Canadian job interests and in terms of Canadian recovery for ordinary people to have lower interest rates, and deliver what the Liberals promised in the 1980 election, which was lower interest rates?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in reply to this question, perhaps I may refer my hon. colleague to what was said in the House on Monday, March 12 of this year. Unfortunately, the Hon. Member was not in the House when we discussed the entire matter of interest rates and the value of the dollar. My reply is therefore the one given on page 1981 of the Hansard, where I said:

> Neither the Bank of Canada nor I wish to see a substantial devaluation of the Canadian dollar with the inflation rate consequences that would follow, and which would ultimately produce higher interest rates as well. At the same time neither would we wish to see a sharp rise in interest rates, particularly at this stage of the recovery. The policy which has been followed, therefore, has been one of moderating movements, both in the exchange rate and in interest rates. My objective is to ensure that the significant and hard won gains in reducing inflation over the past two years are preserved and the momentum of our recovery is maintained.

PUBLIC WORKS

MIRABEL EXPROPRIATIONS—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DOCUMENT

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. This morning I read in the papers that the people who were expropriated at Mirabel have been turned down again, and that the Federal Court has refused to accept as evidence the Cabinet Document of March 1970.

Last September, I asked the Minister whether he could make public, or table in the House, a document on the Mirabel land assembly project for the new International Airport. The Minister answered that he would make enquiries—this was several months ago—and that as soon as he got the document he would give me a reply.

Considering the Minister's desire for a fair solution which, I am sure, he still has, could he table that document in the House, so that the people expropriated at Mirabel would have a very legitimate argument to present before the Court?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, last fall when the Hon. Member raised the matter, I made enquiries to find out whether I could table this document in the House. At the time, our departmental legal adviser informed me that since the matter was before the courts and the document in question was involved in the proceedings, it would be unwise to discuss the document, the case being sub judice.

I do not know if, in view of the information we had this morning to which the Hon. Member was referring, the situation has changed. I will have to consult the Department's legal adviser, and if it will serve a useful purpose to provide this information, I will do so. Of course, I will have to follow the advice of my legal adviser.

DEMAND THAT DOCUMENT BE TABLED

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): The Minister gives the impression, as does the Attorney General for Canada in this case, that the Government does not want to publish this document, since it confirms the monstrosity of the Mirabel land purchase, stressing the partisan nature of the Government's action in refusing to give the land back immediately to those who were expropriated.

In the circumstances, since the Minister has confirmed today that this document exists, and in the interests of equity, I think that since there are people who have been expropriated and who would be able to use this document to support their claim that the expropriation was not justified, I demand, on behalf of these people and on behalf of the just society that an almost former Prime Minister promised us not so long ago, I demand therefore that the Minister insist on tabling this document, in the same of equity and justice for these people, and prevent the Government from concealing a document that would be very revealing for all Canadians.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member, who himself was a Member of Cabinet though only for a short time, is putting me in a very difficult position. In his first question, he told me I had made some attempts at appeasement and had tried to find a compassionate solution. That is what I have done. In fact, last week's announcement reflects the results of my work.

As far as the Hon. Member's second question is concerned, which he asked after I told him that my Department's legal adviser asked me not to mention the matter or give my views since it was still before the courts, the Hon. Member is indulging in pure rhetoric.

All I can say is that I am unfortunately bound by the advice of my legal adviser not to comment on this case.

INCOME TAX ACT

POWERS OF SEARCH AND SEIZURE

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. As he knows, the administration of the Income Tax Act is the responsibility of the Minister of National Revenue. Changes in the actual legislation are his responsibilities. Yesterday in a judgment of the Federal Court of Canada, Mr. Justice Cattanach described the powers of search and seizure as awesome. We know that the soul of the Rowe Report, the 30 pages that deal with the rights of people, is the responsibility of the Minister of Finance. Has the Minister read the Rowe Report? Does he himself believe that the powers of search and seizure are too broad and must be restricted? When will the Minister bring in legislation to restrain the officials in Revenue Canada with respect to these powers?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend refers to a particular judgment. I think I heard on the news this morning of another judgment by the Ontario Court of Appeal which declared that the rights of search and seizure given to National Revenue officials were not violating the Charter of Rights. This judgment would appear to be in contradiction to that of Mr. Justice Cattanach. I will read those judgments, obviously with great interest, and study their points of view. I have not read the full report of Mr. Rowe, but I have had an opportunity to examine a summary of it and its various recommendations. I will examine those recommendations further with great care. I will take the point of view of the Hon. Member as a representation.

NATIONAL REVENUE

ACCESS TO INFORMATION FOR MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question, in the absence of the Minister of National Revenue, is for his Parliamentary Secretary. Two days ago in the House the Minister of National Revenue announced that as a result of questions which Members on this side of the House were asking with respect to Revenue Canada, we had deprived ourselves of our privileges and from now on applications for material within the Department would have to be made under the auspices of the Access to Information Act. Would the Parliamentary Secretary please amplify upon this? Is the Minister saying that there will be one rule for government Members and another rule for opposition Members? Do we have to make application under the Access to Information Act, whereas Hon. Members on the other side of the House do not? Is that the exact position of the Government?

• (1440)

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Hon. Member for his representation, and I will have to leave it at that. I do not know whether I could confirm or deny what he is saying, but I will certainly look into it and get back to the Hon. Member.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

NON-PROFIT HOUSING—ALLOCATION SOUGHT FOR TORONTO AREA

Mr. Douglas Fisher (Mississauga North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The Minister has announced the 1984 CMHC allocations for Ontario for public non-profit housing units. The Ontario Minister, Claude Bennett, however, has announced his plan to distribute these units to every municipality except Toronto and Metro Toronto. Could the Minister tell us what action he is taking to correct this incredibly insensitive imbalance, especially given the long lines of seniors, pensioners, single parents and other low-income groups in the Toronto region who desperately need low-cost housing?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, in the area of social housing we recognize that we must make a special effort to direct housing units to those most in need and who have been waiting the longest. Because of this, when I gave provincial Ministers of housing the allocations for 1984, I asked them to indicate how and where they would use these units, and what priorities they were giving. I was quite amazed, not to mention shocked, to find that the minister in Ontario had completely ignored the needs of cities like Toronto and Ottawa where there is—and everyone recognizes this—a very serious need, and in fact had used the tactic of not allocating units to those areas as a pressure tactic. I must confess that I find that a bit naive on his part.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

CANADAIR—MINISTER'S POSITION ON POSSIBLE SALE OF CORPORATION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, on a number of occasions we in this Party have made it perfectly clear that the people of Canada, through their Government, will be asked to come up with hundreds of millions of dollars to assist the development of Canadair. If and when it becomes a viable company, we do not want to see it turned over as a prize to the private sector. However, today the Economic Development Minister said that he would love to see Canadair sold. The Minister of Employment and Immigration also said today that he thought we would all be happy to sell it and that he, especially, would be happy to sell it. Is the Minister of Employment and Immigration speaking government policy when he says that he would like to sell it?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if the Hon. Member had paid full attention to my remarks he would have realized that all I have done is simply restated what has always been government policy, that at the appropriate time it would be desirable to sell, not Air Canada as I think he said—

Some Hon. Members: Canadair.

Mr. Roberts: —but Canadair, if there is a Canadian buyer—hypothetically and with the condition that there is a Canadian buyer—who is prepared to do so and to maintain the positive benefits which government ownership of Canadair has provided up to this point.

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister of Canada. Could he confirm that this is government policy? His Minister has just indicated that, after Canadians have been asked to spend hundreds of millions of dollars essentially to bail out Canadair, it will be turned over to the private sector. Is that the view of the Prime Minister?

Mr. Crosbie: Sell the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Riis: Is it government policy to use taxpayers' money to set up a Crown corporation, make it viable, and then turn it over to the private sector?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think we have made it clear over the years that our policy in regard to Crown corporations is that they were an instrument of government policy.

Mr. Crosbie: That is the old Liberalism.

Mr. Trudeau: We could, and did, and do use them, but we do not think that they necessarily have to be government owned and directed forever if there is no longer any reason to achieve government policy through them. In the case of Canadair, and de Havilland for that matter, the decision of the Government was taken because we did not want this high technology to flow out of Canada as it had, as the President of the Treasury Board reminded us, in the case of the Arrow. We wanted it to remain in Canada. The private sector was closing it down, and therefore we kept it open. Once it is open, once it is operating and once the technology is assured in Canada, we have no policy objection to selling it for good and valuable considerations; maybe for $1 and other valid considerations, to use a formula.

To speak seriously, in terms of keeping it in government direction forever, the answer is no. The question is purely hypothetical. We are keeping it in Canada; we want the technology to remain here; and the future will speak for itself.

Mr. Crosbie: We want Roberts. We want Roberts.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION

LAY-OFF OF PART-TIME WORKERS IN KITCHENER

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. He may be aware that some 18 part-time, casual or contract employees at the UIC office in Kitchener will be laid off at the end of the month. These people process unemployment insurance claims and, coincidentally, are doing a great deal of overtime work. Some of them are doing as much as three nights a week.

Without necessarily expecting the Minister to know the individual cases, but as a matter of departmental practice, is it his practice to effect these lay-offs on the one hand and, on the other hand, continue to pay what I would presume to be very costly overtime payments? Is that a cost effective procedure?

Second and much more important, what guarantee or assurance could the Minister give us that this will not result in undue delay in the processing of claims, as has been the experience in the past, during this period of peak unemployment wherein there has been not only a great deal of human suffering on the part of applicants but other agencies, such as social welfare agencies, have had to step in in the interim and provide some measure of relief for applicants—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Hon. Member has asked his question.

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is yes, I am aware of this situation. The Hon. Member for Kitchener on this side of the House brought it to my attention. I may not be aware of all the details which are in the hands of the Hon. Member. I can tell him that I have raised the matter with officials and have asked for a full report, so I will have those details.

It is not our policy or approach that there should be lay-offs of term employees while overtime work is being performed by other employees, though there may be specific ad hoc and rather short-term situations in which overtime employment would take place even though there is, in a broader sense, loss of some employment. The fact is that we are having fewer unemployment insurance claims and therefore do not require as many term employees as was the case last year. It is not surprising that there should be some dimunition of employment in that sense. There are, upon occasion, specific instances which require other employees to perform overtime tasks. The general answer to his question about whether there was a policy to this effect is that the policy, or administrative direction, is to avoid that kind of situation. I will be able to give the Hon. Member a fuller report after I have received the information from my officials.

EMPLOYMENT

CANADA-QUEBEC AGREEMENT ON JOB CREATION

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Verchères): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Regarding the Canada-Quebec agreement on job creation programs for municipalities, I would like to know what the agreement involves and whether the Government has indeed the intention of signing an agreement? If so, when does it intend to do so?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to announce to the Hon. Member and the other members of this House that we and the Province of Quebec have agreed to sign an agreement, and I expect to do so, with my Quebec counterpart, tomorrow morning.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

PRESENTATION OF AMENDING LEGISLATION

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, today the President of the Treasury Board will be tabling a very complex series of amendments to the Financial Administration Act. I have just come from the briefing which was allowed one member of this Party. The briefing does not do very much for the work of the Public Accounts Committee, the work of the Auditor General and the Treasury Board over the years since 1978, in that it completely appears to diminish the role of Parliament in the overview and control of these Crown corporations. It does not do anything to address—

● (1450)

Mr. Speaker: Order. I invite the Hon. Member to put a question.

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, in view of the total failure of these amendments to the Financial Administration Act to address the real issues that have been on the table and before committees of Parliament since 1978, why is this legislation, which has taken five years to develop, being rushed in today when he had on his desk legislation from the Clark Government, C-27, which was a far more fundamental approach to these problems than is apparently coming in today? It took only six months to prepare. Why has it taken five years to deliver this pile of confusion that is coming in today?

Hon. Herb Gray (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend's question is rather novel since it is based on a Bill which has not yet had first reading, but regarding which, as a courtesy which is rarely extended in this House, I have enabled him as an Opposition critic to have some advance briefing. I reject categorically as inaccurate and unfounded the premises of his question. Once the Bill receives first reading it will be found to be a very responsive and complete response to the concerns we all have about the need for a better framework of accountability and control of our Crown corporations. When that Bill is tabled, I believe the House in general and the public will agree with what I have said, and will regret that my hon. friend has so misconstrued what is a very important and forward-looking piece of legislation.

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has difficulty at this point. The Hon. Member is referring to something which is not a Bill. It relates to a briefing which was presented in a capacity which the Chair cannot take official recognition of, at this stage.

Mr. Nielsen: It was on CTV this morning.

VOLUNTARY ORGANIZATIONS

DENIAL OF CHARITABLE ORGANIZATION STATUS TO QUEBEC ASSOCIATION

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. In his absence, I will direct it to his Parliamentary Secretary. It relates to Department of National Revenue harassment of voluntary groups in Canada. L'Association des services de rehabilitation sociale du Québec, which advises the Solicitor General of Canada on Crime Prevention Week, has been denied charitable status. The reason for the denial, the Parliamentary Secretary will be interested to hear, is because of its support for the give-and-take tax proposals and also because it advocates that there be no more prison construction. Can the Parliamentary Secretary tell the House, and other voluntary agencies in Canada, why there is this attack on this Quebec-based voluntary agency?

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I do not really know that there is an attack on this organization per se, or any group of organizations that feel the same way that it does. If this association made an application for a Revenue number which has been refused, it should certainly have reasons for the refusal. If that is the case, I would be pleased to look into it and find out why it was refused a Revenue number for charitable purposes.

REQUEST FOR REFERRAL TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Government House Leader. For some time the Secretary of State has been promising the House that there would be a task force to look into this type of harassment of voluntary sector groups, and to bring some incentives forward. There was a reference to this task force in the Throne Speech, but no incentive in the Budget. When will the reference be tabled for the parliamentary task force to look into all aspects of support for Canadian voluntary groups?

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the question. In fact a few minutes ago I was speaking with the Secretary of State. We should be in a position to come to the House and, hopefully, get the reference with a very short debate, or with no debate, to allow the committee to look into the matter. I assure the Hon. Member that his concerns are being taken into account on this side. We are about to raise the matter with House Leaders so that we can allow parliamentarians to look into the matter in an orderly fashion.

EMPLOYMENT

SPECIAL EMPLOYMENT INITIATIVES PROGRAM—GRANT MADE TO TORONTO INTERNATIONAL FESTIVAL

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It is with regard to a $1.3 million grant under the Special Employment Initiatives Program for the Toronto International Festival. Can the Minister confirm that the Festival was notified of its reception of this grant before the program was even announced, and that there are no terms attached to this grant requiring that jobs be created? Is it part of his new Liberalism to give away job-creation money under such conditions?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker. The assumptions underlying the Hon. Member's question are false. To the best of my knowledge the grant was approved something like four months after the program was started. Indeed, there are considerable benefits in terms of job creation, not only for those who participate in employment during the Festival but in terms of spinoff benefits for employment which will be involved in the Festival, creating tourism, dining and other business activity in Toronto during the festival.

Mr. Sargeant: That is contrary to what the chief director of the Festival, and one government official, have said.

FEE PAYABLE TO TENOR

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I point out to the Minister that one of the entertainers at this Festival, whose fees will be paid SEIP funds, is Placido Domingo, who is arguably the finest operatic tenor in the world. He is also one of the world's wealthiest recording stars. Is it part of the Minister's new Liberalism to pay wealthy entertainers with money intended for Canada's unemployed?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member's question is obviously fatuous. The singer he described is coming with the visit of the Metropolitan Opera to take part in the Festival. That is one of the keystone events of the Festival. It is not I, nor this Government that has provided those payments. They are coming from the Festival which is supported by a variety of governmental organizations. The objective of the Festival is not only to celebrate the sesquicentenary. It is, as I just said to the Hon. Member, to create employment, and that is what it is doing.

SOCIAL SECURITY

DENIAL OF INDEXED PENSIONS TO BRITISH SUPERANNUATES

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Today Members of all three Parties met with British parliamentarians from all three Parties, under the auspices of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association. One of the issues raised was the subject of 40,000 British retirees living in Canada, who are being denied an indexed pension paid by the British Government. If these people had remained in England, they would qualify today for a fully indexed pension. Because they chose to live in Canada, many of them with their children, they are being denied a full pension. Will the Minister tell these 40,000 pensioners what her Department is doing to convince Prime Minister Thatcher and her Government to pay full pensions to these British citizens who chose to live in Canada?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I guess the answer is everything, except become a Tory. We have written several times to this and previous British Governments. I have met with my counterpart, my various counterparts I must say, more than once. We have supported and will continue to support the work of the British Pensioners' Association from within Canada, which is doing an excellent job with regard to information, pressure, education and so on. These people have paid for an indexed pension and they are not getting it. They bought it with their income tax. Past that point, I am afraid our country has no recourse but to try to convince British public opinion that this is a question of equity and fairness.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ATHABASCA BANDS' FINANCES

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Some bands in my area have had to close their offices and lay off staff. Some bands are unable to pay the salaries of their chiefs and coucillors, forcing them on to welfare. This is due to under-funding in their budgets for administration. They are not allowed by departmental officials to transfer funds from other parts of their budgets. Based on statements the Minister has made supporting Indian self-government, why is he allowing his officials to interfere in the internal management of band budgets?

● (1500)

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, that type of question indicates contradictions in approach. Members of the Official Opposition have berated me because I was not prepared to interfere in the internal management of bands when certain non-native people were owed money by the Indians. They wanted me to interfere and tell the Indians to pay. In this particular case the Hon. Member wishes to adopt a different approach and tell me not to interfere in the internal management of a band. I agree with him that I should not interfere in the internal management of a band. It could be that in this particular case the band itself over-spent its budgetary allotment and for that reason is asking for more money from the Department.

I think that I know which band the Hon. Member is talking about. If we were to give additional moneys to that particular band, because the budget is fixed as voted for in the Estimates, we would simply have to take the money away from other bands which perhaps are in the immediate vicinity. That does not exactly go over too well, as the Hon. Member knows.

PUBLIC SERVICE

MINISTER'S REFERENCE TO SIZE

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Yesterday in Toronto during his Ides of March candidacy announcement he said: "We have what has tended to become a somewhat bloated system in both the civil service and in the executive." I would like to ask the Minister if he could explain what he meant by that statement. Does it in any way relate to the failure of the Minister to hand out money fairly under the Special Employment Initiatives Program?

Perhaps while I am on my feet I could ask the Minister what has become of the $90 million left for the SEI Program. If that money is still available, will he put it toward the Youth Initiatives Program?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is that I went on to say, as I hope the Hon. Member heard, that I thought tremendous progress had been made over the past four or five years in strengthening both parliamentary institutions and control at the centre of government. I believe that, in any institution as large-scale as the federal Government, there are bound to be areas in which there is excess employment as well as over-employment of officials.

The answer to the second part of the Hon. Member's question is, as I think has been indicated to him before, that a considerable amount of funding still remains in that program. A variety of applications have been received for its use, including many from Members opposite, and those applications are being put through the normal process of consideration.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

RESIGNATION OF MEMBER FOR SCARBOROUGH EAST

Mr. Gordon Gilchrist (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, it is with great regret and a deep sense of personal loss that I have today tendered my resignation as the Member of Parliament for Scarborough East. It is my unshakeable belief that my constituents are entitled to the best possible representation without any shadow of doubt cast on the integrity of their Member of Parliament. The verdict in my tax trial has created a doubt as to my ability vigorously and honourably to represent my constituents. If I cannot serve them honourably, I will not serve at all.

However, let there be no doubt in anyone's mind. I believe that this judgment is wrong. My company, my family and I are innocent and I believe that was proven by the evidence which was presented at the trial. Accordingly, I have instructed my counsel to commence appeal proceedings immediately. I only wish that this appeal could be heard well before the coming election. Without that certainty, I cannot in all fairness allow my personal situation to impair the choices of my constituents in the crucial issues which they and all Canadians must judge in the next election. Similarly, I cannot and will not allow this issue to in any way reflect badly upon the great Party and the outstanding Leader which I have been so privileged to serve.

The costs of defending my company's good name, measured both in dollars and in personal anguish to the members of my family, have been enormous. They have caused me to understand in all too graphic terms the staggering burden imposed on the taxpayers of the country in meeting both the absurd complexities of the Canadian tax system and the overwhelming power of Revenue Canada. In spite of these burdens, I intend to pursue this matter to clear the good name of my business, my family and myself. To this end I am therefore privileged that Mr. John J. Robinette, Q.C., has agreed to act as counsel on my appeal, furthering the fine work already done by Messrs. Stikeman, Elliott.

I cannot adequately express my gratitude for the steadfast support which I have received from so many of my constituents irrespective of their political affiliation throughout this entire ordeal. It has been a privilege and an honour to have served them. I thank them from the bottom of my heart and hope that I have met their expectations in the performance of that service. Finally, I am deeply indebted to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) and to every member of the Progressive Conservative caucus for their undiminished support and friendship.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, could I please ask the Government House Leader what will be the business of the House for tomorrow and as far as he can take us into next week?

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will resume debate on the second reading stage of the security Bill, Bill C-9. We hope that this Bill will go to committee as early as possible, and hopefully tomorrow. The back-up legislation to that Bill is Bill C-10, the Divorce Act, to be dealt with on Friday and Monday.

Tuesday of next week we will resume debate on Bill C-21, the borrowing authority Bill, if need be. The back-up Bill to that is the report stage of Bill C-12, the Fiscal Arrangements Act. Next Thursday will be the last allotted day of this period of supply so I wish to designate next Thursday as an allotted supply day.

Finally, some time next week we would like to be able to send to committee the Insolvency Act, Bill C-17, without debate. I wish to inform my hon. colleagues that I have just learned that the amendments the Minister has committed to propose to the committee were distributed to the Conservative critics three weeks ago. I would welcome an agreement to send the Bill back to committee because we will recall that when the House prorogued, the Bankruptcy Act had been debated at length in the House and was at committee stage. We would like very much to see this Bill sent to committee again without debate in the House and with the commitment of the Minister responsible to bring in the amendments which were made available to the opposition Party three weeks ago.

In essence, Mr. Speaker, that is the business of the House for the coming days.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, just a moment or so ago, I learned that our critic had received those amendments, as the Government House Leader suggested. I will discuss the matter with the Hon. Member for Cambridge and respond to the Government House Leader accordingly.

In the meantime, before the Hon. Member for Algoma was promoted to Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board, he was Chairman of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. The Government House Leader will recall that I obtained from the Prime Minister the assurance that the Canada Elections Act amendments, which at one time were contained in Bill C-169, would be going to that committee. When the Hon. Member for Algoma was Chairman of that Committee, he said that he was expediting steering committee meetings to deal with Bill C-169.

Could the Government House Leader give us the assurance that he will encourage that Committee to meet as quickly as possible in order to consider the report of the Chief Electoral Officer for 1983, which, among other observations, contained observations concerning Clause 72 of Bill C-169, the section which is giving such widespread concern to Canadians throughout the country?

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I am very surprised by the question asked by my hon. colleague. First of all, his Party gave unanimous consent to the passage of the legislation, Bill C-169. Second, a radical group in the country has decided to go to court with it and the matter is sub judice. It is not my practice to discuss, even in the House, sub judice matters. I have respect for the courts and I am told that the matter is to be tried very shortly, perhaps in mid-April. I would hope that the courts will look at the unanimous consent that was given in the House and see if in fact the legislation is or is not contrary to the Charter of Rights.

In so far as the Chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections is concerned, despite the fact that he has been made Parliamentary Secretary, he will remain the Chairman of that Committee for the next period of time. I am sure he will assume his responsibilities and his duties as chairmen usually do, that is, without the interference of the House of Commons, unless we develop some kind of unanimous agreement. It is not my practice to interfere with the business of committees.

This Committee has a report made by the Chief Electoral Officer, which was tabled in the House and referred to it. It will look into it and establish its own priorities. Of course, if it feels it necessary to deal with some parts of Clause 17.1 and 17.2 and matters in relation to editorials in the newspapers that my hon. colleague raised before in the House and with me, I will not object to the Committee doing so. Certainly I will not instruct any committee or any chairman of a committee how to do his job. I think the chairmen are able to do their job and I am convinced that the report of the Chief Electoral Officer will be dealt with in a responsible way by the Committee.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I am really surprised at the twist the Government House Leader has given a very civil question requesting a civil answer, which I do not feel I have received. I put the first question to the Prime Minister on January 23 and he very responsibly replied that the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections which the Hon. Member for Algoma, apparently the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board, is still chairing. I am glad to see him in the House now because he was not here when I put the first part of this question to the Government House Leader. I am now going to put the question to him.

I did not ask the Government House Leader to instruct the Committee. If I could have the attention of the Government House Leader, I just want to say that I did not suggest he instruct the Committee. I chose my words very carefully. I asked him if he would "encourage" the Committee to commence its meetings, as was promised by the Prime Minister and the Chairman of the Standing Committee when I put the question to him two or three weeks ago. At that time the Chairman of the Committee said he was holding a meeting of the steering committee to determine the agenda for dealing with the report of the Chief Electoral Officer. Since he is still Chairman, I am asking him whether there has been any progress in that steering committee, not so that any radical group representation, as the Government House Leader puts it, can be brought before the Committee, but so that the report of the Chief Electoral Officer for 1983 can be considered in its entirety. That is what the Prime Minister said.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I can only reiterate the answer I gave the last time to the House Leader on the opposite side, that a steering committee of the Privileges and Elections Committee has met and it will make a report to the full Committee at nine-thirty next Tuesday morning. That Committee will consider the report of the steering committee relating to the report of the Chief Electoral Officer. I cannot prejudge or reveal what is going to be recommended at this time to the full Committee. If the Hon. Member will just be patient it will be revealed at that time what the steering committee has agreed on and it will be debated before the Committee.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Parliamentary Secretary for his civil reply. I am very gratified to learn that the Committee will meet next Tuesday.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Government House Leader. In the November Speech from the Throne there was a promise that the Government would remove the discriminatory provisions in the Indian Act. Since that time, the then Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister said on January 16 that it would be introduced within a month. The Prime Minister, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Minister responsible for the status of women have all made the promise that a Bill would be introduced to amend the offending sections of the Indian Act which discriminate against Indian women. Would the Government House Leader tell us when we might expect that Act to be introduced?

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member surely knows that the Liberal Party and the Liberal Government usually stand by their commitments.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, almost a year ago in April 1983, the Fifth Report of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons recommended establishing a Standing Joint Committee of Official Languages. On the Order Paper, under the heading "Government Business", we find proposed motion No. 11, to amend Standing Order 69(3), in connection with the proposed committee. I would ask the President of the Privy Council and Parliamentary House Leader (Mr. Pinard) if he could inform the House when the Government intends to call proposed motion No. 11 which would make it possible to set up this Standing Committee of the House?

Mr. Pinard: I apologize to the Hon. Member. I can confirm that the matter has been raised and that I am now negotiating with the Opposition Parties with a view to disposing of the motion concerning the creation of the Standing Committee as soon as possible. The motion is on the Order Paper and is self-explanatory. We intend to follow the recommendation of the Special Joint Committee and the Commissioner for Official Languages. We shall very shortly introduce the motion to create the Standing Committee on Official Languages, and today, I have already submitted to my colleagues, the Parliamentary House Leaders, a proposal to dispose of this motion as expenditiously as possible. I think we should normally wait until after next week's caucus meetings before calling the motion. However, I can assure the Hon. Member that this is an important matter and a priority one for the Government, and that we intend to call this motion in any case, and shall be doing so in due time.

PETITION

MR. FRIESEN—TESTING OF CRUISE MISSILE ON CANADIAN SOIL

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition with a list of signatories from Surrey-White Rock-North Delta collected by an organization known as End the Arms Race of Vancouver, which says that it is alarmed by the threat to survival of humanity posed by the existence of nuclear weapons and the continuing arms race. It goes on to say:

We the undersigned residents of the federal riding of Surrey-White Rock-North Delta call on our Member of Parliament, Benno Friesen, to make every effort to prevent testing of the Cruise missile in Canada. In signing this petition we support the following statement endorsed unanimously by the United Nations in 1982: The increase in . . . nuclear weapons, far from strengthening international security, on the contrary weakens it. Enduring peace cannot be built on the accumulation of weaponry.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I believe the Hon. Member has indicated the purpose of the petition. I do not believe it is in order to read a lengthy statement.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING PENALTIES FOR DRUNK DRIVERS

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-229, an Act to amend the Criminal Code (drunk driving).

Some Hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this Bill is to amend the Criminal Code, to deter persons from driving motor vehicles while having alcohol in their bodies. Every day we read about drunk drivers and their innocent victims. Statistics show there were nearly 158,000 impaired driving convictions across Canada last year. That is more than 400 each day. Of recorded driver fatalities, 34 per cent had a blood alcohol level above the legal limit and over 42 per cent had been drinking to some extent. I believe there is agreement among all Parties that the problem is a serious one and I trust when this Bill comes before Hon. Members it will receive unanimous support.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

VIA RAIL—FOOD AND BEVERAGE SERVICE

Question No. 337—Mr. Heap:

1. Were any crew reductions made in the food and beverage service on trains running through Sudbury and Capreol?

2. Does the use of a dispensing cart in the aisle of a moving train meet all relevant federal safety legislation and regulations?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Transport): The management of VIA Rail Canada Inc. advises as follows:

1. Crew levels on meal service cars vary seasonally and depend on traffic volumes. The daily meal service crew complement on trains 8-7 Winnipeg—Capreol, has been reduced. This change occurred when a café lounge car was replaced by a café coach car.

The other train servicing the route is the "Canadian", trains 1-2. A new type of meal service introduced in February, 1983 streamlined the employees' workload, thereby permitting a crew reduction from seven to five persons during off-peak periods.

2. Yes.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of the Environment): 1, 2 and 3. The planning of the project is the responsibility of the Forest Ranger School in Fredericton, N.B. Therefore, all questions should be directed to the School.

The Department of Environment will contribute 50 per cent of the cost of the project up to a maximum of $10.5 million.

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY

Question No. 363—Mr. St. Germain:

Since April 1, 1981, did any firms and/or individuals receive financial assistance under the Canadian International Development Agency's (a) Industrial Co-operation Program (b) Information Development and Dissemination Program (c) Starter and Viability Studies Program (d) Canadian Technology Transfer Facility Program (e) Canadian Project Preparation Facility Program and, if so, which firms or individuals and, in each case, what amount was received by them under the program?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Evans: I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Mr. St. Germain: Mr. Speaker, on October 11, I placed a question on the Order Paper inquiring about federal assistance to Iron Mountain golf course. It was Question No. 5,309. In the new session I resubmitted this question as No. 422. The question remains unanswered, despite the fact that a November 4 interdepartmental memo from Doug Sawyer to the NEED Secretariat Director, Michael Calott, contained the information. That memo was sent to me and accidentally ended up in my constituency office, yet I have received no answer. Can the Parliamentary Secretary reply to that?

Mr. Evans: Certainly, Mr. Speaker. I believe the Hon. Member mentioned October 11. That was in the last session of Parliament. That question died on the Order Paper when the House prorogued.

Mr. St. Germain: Mr. Speaker, if the Parliamentary Secretary had been listening he would have heard me say that I resubmitted it in the new session as Question No. 422.

Mr. Gurbin: Give him the number again. He did not hear it.

Mr. St. Germain: It is No. 422, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, you can see from the size of this document, that the Government is doing a good job in answering questions.

I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1984-85

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacLaren that Bill C-21, an Act to provide borrowing authority, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): For various reasons, Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak to Bill C-21 to provide borrowing authority. Since the beginning of this debate, I have heard my colleagues opposite make every kind of unwarranted accusations. I should think that the basic question in this whole debate is whether the Budget will foster the economic recovery. It all depends on the political approach or doctrine which one may have or uphold in this House, and that is what we have been hearing since the beginning. Some Conservatives whom I will not mention, even though I made a note of their riding—my time being limited, I do not intend to single out every unwarranted allegation that has been made—have tried to isolate certain votes, one in particular which this Government adopted to promote investment in high technology, de Havilland and Canadair in this case. However, they remained silent about de Havilland when the Government was blamed for its approach to the future of Canadair. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said in answering a question today, we have to decide whether technology will stay here or be exported to other countries such as the United States.

Mr. Speaker, a number of countries in the world—France, England, Belgium and the United States among others—have developed their aeronautical industry through defence budget appropriations. If we in Canada want to support our aeronautical industry, we will have to spend money and foot the bills. When it was decided to take over de Havilland and Canadair from the private sector in 1975-76 to secure the future of our aircraft industry, I remember very well that Canadair had 825 employees. Eventually, Canadair ended up with a labour force of 8,000 in that field of high technology.

That is the challenge which the Liberal Government agreed to face in that highly technical field, so as to offer job opportunities to young Canadians now attending school.

Last March 8 in the House, I stressed the importance of developing that high technology sector. In Montreal alone, 12,310 CEGEP graduates of 1982 and 1983 invaded the labour market to seek employment in engineering and science. There are seven engineering schools which specialize in research and have created 2,110 graduates in 1982-83. It is for them that we want to promote high technology, Mr. Speaker.

I was proud to hear the Prime Minister and the President of the Treasury Board say today that, of course, it is imperative to change the structure of Canadair. When he appeared before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs on March 13, the Minister responsible, Senator Jack Austin, spoke of our awareness to make some changes in Canadair. Those changes were explained when the Budget was under consideration. We know that Canadair management was wont to see everything through rose-coloured glasses. Not that we did not try to tell them! They had an overly optimistic outlook on marketability and closed their eyes on obvious operational problems. Even their accountants were riding on cloud nine. In addition, they tried to make the Government look on the bright side, while at the same time glossing over their difficulties. The company was overstaffed and the responsibilities of management were not clear cut. That is why the Canada Development Investment Corporation made it a priority to bring the company back to earth and reduce its operational expenditures. As a result of those measures, the deficit went from $145,100,000 in 1982 down to $83 million in 1983. So, there were two possibilities: either take the approach of the Progressive Conservatives and bail out, or adopt the Liberal philosophy, see what could be done to improve management and maintain jobs in the field of technology. Mr. Speaker, I have here an article published in the Montreal Gazette of February 20 and written by Mr. Nick Auf der Maur. It is a biography of the Leader of the Opposition and it says:

Killing of Arrow Still Hurts Today

Twenty-five years ago today, at 11 a.m., Prime Minister John Diefenbaker got up in the House of Commons to announce a momentous decision that still lives with us.

He cancelled the Avro Arrow program, the CF-105 fighter-interceptor that aviation experts say would still be one of the best aircraft in the world if it were flying today.

Arguably, it was a decision that adversely affected Canada's industrial capacity, and wreaked such havoc on our aerospace industries that they still haven't fully recovered.

That day, Feb. 20, 1959, is still known as Black Friday in the industry.

That day, 22,000 Canadians were thrown out of work—14,000 at the A.V. Roe and Orenda engine plants in the Toronto region, the rest from suppliers mostly in the Montreal area.

And an estimated $475 million in development and production costs were simply poured down that drain. (That was roughly the same cost as the St. Lawrence Seaway, built in about the same period, or an estimated $3 billion in today's terms.)

[Translation]

It is exactly the same attitude Progressive Conservatives are taking twenty-five years later. They would rather get rid of the problem instead of coping with it. We on the Government side are prepared to support the aerospace industry, and as far as Quebecers are concerned, the questions that have been asked since the beginning of the debate on this Bill are entirely unacceptable. The Progressive Conservatives are denying Quebecers an opportunity to take part in the expansion of our high technology industries. That is the difference between our Liberal philosophy and the philosophy of the Progressive Conservatives. To hear them talk, we ought to close the airport at Mirabel. The Member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) has spoken many times here in the House, and the leadership candidate, the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), said today that Canadair should be shut down! What will be left for Quebecers with a Progressive Conservative Government and a balance-the-Budget philosophy? Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of attitude, and when I look at the investments the Government of Canada has made in the Province of Quebec in the last few months, and I am referring to federal investments in major industries in the Montreal area, it really confirms that we have a different approach, especially when we look at the Budget, which has earmarked $996 million for the construction of patrol frigates, $368 million for research and development at Pratt & Whitney . . . That is the kind of funding Parliament is being asked to approve to provide various departments with the money they need and to continue the economic recovery process in Canada. I could go on, Mr. Speaker: $165 million for the Bell Helicopter project; $30 million for the agro-food research centre; $15 million for the office automation research centre in Laval; $10 million for the robotics centre at the Lionel-Groulx CEGEP; and I could go on and on Mr. Speaker. We have $2.843 billion that will be spent by the Liberal Government on developing the high-tech industry in the Province of Quebec. As for the attitude of the Progressive Conservatives who spoke in the House and who regularly question the Government about developments at Canadair, twenty-five years ago that very same group buried the Arrow when Mr. Diefenbaker was Prime Minister. Their Party has not changed. It still has the same philosophy, but we on the Government side feel that we cannot follow their course of action and say no to this challenge. We say that Canadians too must have high technology. We are going to develop the aerospace industry, and the aerospace industry will be to Quebec what the automobile industry is in Ontario. That is the difference between the attitude and the approach of a government with a Liberal philosophy and the attitude and the approach of the Members of the Official Opposition, Mr. Speaker!

[English]

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I realize the next speaker for the Conservative Party wishes me to speed up. He has his birthday party later today and he wants to get to it. Congratulations to the Hon. Member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn).

I rise to speak on the borrowing authority Bill. I will be making a speech very similar to a speech I made a couple of years ago on another borrowing authority Bill which was before the House of Commons. At that time I pointed out that the Government had no economic direction or strategy for the development of our country. In the two years which have elapsed since I last spoke on a borrowing authority Bill, nothing has changed in the country. We see project after project which are basically short-term make-work efforts and bailout operations by the federal Government. The Government has yet to come up with a concrete economic plan for the development of the country. With regard to interest rates, the Government reacts to what is happening in the United States, allowing interest rates to go up, as they did today. With regard to large scale economic developments, it is not a matter of planning but of reacting to what happens in the private sector.

I cannot support the Government's request for borrowing authority for $29 billion worth of debt for Canadians now and for future generations. Before the Government makes any more requests for borrowing large sums of money we need a plan from the Government stating where it wants to take the country and what it needs the money for. Rather than this, however, we have money going all over the place for small projects. This is increasing our national debt without any direction at all or any plan from the Government for developing the country.

Another reason I object to the borrowing authority Bill before the House is that the Government has been so unfair in levying taxes over the years. The average Canadian citizen pays about 20 per cent of his income in income tax. The average large corporation pays much less. The big five banks pay only 8 per cent of their profits toward federal income tax. In 1982 the Royal Bank and the Bank of Montreal have made hundreds of millions of dollars in profit and did not pay 1 cent in federal income tax.

If one studies the pattern which has developed one will see that industries, banks and financial institutions other than banks owe as much as the borrowing authority Bill is requesting. Deferred corporate taxes for 1980 are $22 billion. These are the latest figures we have. The Bill before us is requesting borrowing authority for $29 billion. If the Government collected all the taxes owing from corporations in the country at the present time we would not have to go into debt for $29 billion. We need economic planning and we need the Government to collect the money owing to it at the present time. We also need the Government to develop a strategy to ensure fair taxation so that banks and large corporations do not make huge profits without paying income tax.

Let me give some examples. In 1981-82, a number of corporations made millions of dollars in profits but did not pay one cent in tax. It is completely unacceptable for an average Canadian taxpayer not to pay his income tax. He goes to jail or is threatened by taxation officials and has all sorts of personal problems. This country has legalized a system which allows corporations and some rich individuals to pay not one cent in tax, even if they make hundreds of thousands of dollars in income. It is a ridiculous situation which the Government has not attempted to address in this Bill. It has not attempted to overcome the unfairness that exists within the tax system.

It is completely unacceptable for the Government to come before us year after year, increasing the national debt as it does so, to say that it does not have to change the tax structure in this country, collect money that it is owed by important corporations or take money from the banks. The Government comes before Parliament continually to ask for $20 billion, $22 billion and $29 billion and thus increases the national debt. Unfortunately, I think Canadians are beginning to accept this simply as the way in which things are done in Canada. I and my Party do not believe that this is the direction in which Canada has to proceed.

In closing I suggest that before the Government attempts to seek borrowing authority of $29 billion it should introduce a tax scheme that is fair to all Canadians so that all Canadians who make money will pay their fair share of taxes, and nothing more. It should tell the House its plans for the country and why it needs to borrow $29 billion. It should ensure that the corporations that owe Canadians billions of dollars will pay that money to the national Treasury so that we will not continue to put not only this generation into debt but future generations of Canadians.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to participate, albeit briefly, in this very important debate on the Government's borrowing Bill, Bill C-21. I suspect that people have become desensitized to the amount of deficits and the amount of money that the Government spends on their behalf, whether it is by various forms of assistance or various forms of taxation. I think that when the average Canadian is told that the Government is seeking to borrow $29.5 billion to meet its obligations, that figure does not really sink in, but it is $29,500 million. Many people would love to have an income of $29,500 and would consider themselves to be wealthy. The Government is asking the Parliament of Canada to support legislation to borrow an amount in excess of the expenditures that have been authorized by this Parliament. When one considers the amount of money involved, it boggles the mind.

I listened to government Members say how they will stand up for the right of Canadians in terms of Canadair and how they will support this Crown corporation, which has spilled $3 billion of the Canadian taxpayers' money. I have heard them say that they believe that this money should be used to support that enterprise.

I believe that one of the tragedies of this debate, as we get closer to a federal election, is that the back-benchers of the Liberal Party are becoming more concerned about being re-elected and are starting to lash out irrationally and say things out of sheer desperation. They are prepared to act like a bunch of sheep, as they have been depicted by many columnists and others over the years. They are terrified of the prospect that the people of Canada will say to them that enough is enough. Canadians will say that it is time for an accounting, and where were they when this kind of overspending took place. They will want to know where those Members stood within their caucus in terms of asking their Leader and Cabinet about the amount of money that has been literally stolen from the pockets of Canadians.

I see that the great leadership aspirant, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Roberts), is here to take his place during his duty hour. This reminds me that Canadians have been given the opportunity recently to see the attitudinal posture of the Liberal Party and of those who aspire to the leadership of that Party and how they approach the management of public funds. Here is a Minister who, with malice of forethought, created a slush fund of $300 million. Was this fund conducted on an orderly basis? Was there some logic to the expenditure of that money on a properly managed basis? The answer is no. The fund was set up purely for partisan political purposes.

I can only surmise that this kind of expenditure of public funds was made for the purpose of creating some type of support within the Minister's caucus so that they would say, "What a jolly good fellow that old John Roberts is, he gave me $500,000 to spend on my favourite project in my constituency".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order. I must remind the Hon. Member that he should refer to Members of the House by their constituency.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I apologize for that breach. I will not get involved in a procedural debate. I was just paraphrasing what Liberals were saying about the dear old Minister of Employment and Immigration.

The fact of the matter simply is that we have seen the attitude of the Liberal Government which likes to spend money just before election time. In order to give an idea of how the Liberal Party considers the whole question of financial management, let me hark back to the activities of the Liberal Party the last time it had a convention. The reports indicate that the $23 billion federal deficit in 1982 would look minuscule by comparison if the federal Government were to take into account the Party's resolutions passed in the Liberal Party policy convention. The fact is that if Liberals are given their way, the debt obligations of this country will be placed on the shoulders of our children and our children's children for years to come.

In defence of the Government's overspending in terms of Crown corporations such as Canadair, it says that this money is absolutely essential to salvage this corporation. We in this Party understand that it is important to take action as a government in order to keep employment levels up. No one has any complaint about that. I simply want to know which members of the Liberal Party stood up to ask what was happening when these enormous and almost criminal overexpenditures on Canadair took place at the expense of the taxpayer? Where is the accountability? What Minister had the courage to stand up and take political responsibility for this very scandalous situation? It is not in the lexicon of the Liberal Party. It does not believe in accepting responsibility. It is always the fault of someone else. What director was reprimanded? What deputy minister was asked to account for the activities of Canadair? What Minister has stood in his place and said that there has been a serious breach in terms of management principles with respect to Crown corporations? There is not one Member across the way who has the political courage to stand up on a question of principle and resign either his portfolio or his seat. It is simply not in their lexicon. That is one of the problems we face now in terms of political responsibility.

• (1550)

My Leader has gone on record with specific and concrete proposals with respect to accountability in Crown corporations. We, as a Party, have taken steps and brought in legislation that would have made Crown corporations accountable. Right now there is less accountability in a Crown corporation than in any private corporation. Private corporations have far more requirements in terms of specifying and protecting the investment of people who have moneys invested with them. Where was the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans)? He was mute. He refused to stand up. He aspires for a Cabinet position. He would not stand up and jeopardize his possibility for advancement. My Leader has brought forward proposals and suggestions on behalf of our Party. These had to do with accountability and management practices for Crown corporations that should have been adopted. Today the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Gray) brought down his answer concerning Crown corporation accountability in Bill C-24. This legislation, I think it is fair to say, is at first glance a failure in terms of addressing the problems concerning accountability for Crown corporations. This legislation is a continuation of a cover up for which this Government is so famous when it comes to its operation of Government enterprises which are clouded in secrecy.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order, please. May I request that Members who want to make interjections come out from behind the curtains so they can be identified.

Mr. Malone: Come out of the closet, John.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I am never distracted by the utterances of Members who do not have the courage to come into the House and participate in the debate. I have never in my life been frightened of a sheep. This is a sheep in sheep's clothing, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Neil: He is pulling the wool over our eyes.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I must conclude because you have indicated, Sir, that I have only two minutes remaining.

If the Government is really interested in the accountability of Crown corporations and in one aspect of it that we as parliamentarians are able to deal with on the floor of the House of Commons, Members on the other side would read the position set forward by our Leader and our Party in terms of the accountability of Crown corporations, which rationalizes and clarifies the Government's relationship with Crown corporations. It is based on a return to the system of effective individual Ministerial responsibility. These fellows over there do not know what that term means, Mr. Speaker. They would probably not understand a revised classification system for Crown corporations based on the extent of the corporation's reliance on Government financing and its role in implementing public policy objectives. This document fails to meet that particular criterion. I could go on and on but, I see that my time is up.

If I were a Member of the Liberal Party and a member of that Government—

Mr. Evans: No such luck.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: —I would hang my head in shame, having come to the people of Canada with an unprecedented request for borrowing authority in the amount of $29.5 billion. I say to the Liberals and to this Government that they should be ashamed of themselves.

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to address Bill C-21 which requests authority for the Government to borrow funds far beyond what it has need of in the next year and obviously even farther beyond what it needs before the next election.

My constituents sometimes ask me what borrowing authority Bills do. I explain to them that Governments all require parliamentary authority to borrow new money. The question why this Government is now asking Parliament for authority to borrow for the eighth time since the last election is not so easy to answer. First, people want to know how much money these eight requests add up to. Telling them that the Government has forced us to borrow $102.85 billion since 1980 begs another question. The answer is that Government spending is out of control.

Since 1968, Government spending has increased approximately 668 per cent. Since 1980 alone, it has risen by 97 per cent to the point where it is now 25 per cent of our gross national product. What has this done to our requirement to borrow? Well, in 1984, according to the estimates, we will spend 21.5 per cent of Canadians' tax dollars on servicing the national debt. In the year just before the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his gang of spenders over there took over, the Government was spending only 11.6 per cent of taxes on paying off that debt. This has caused us to borrow over $100 billion in the last four years. This Government has thrown money at all its problems rather than taking the time to look for real solutions. By doing so, the Government has increased Government spending from just over $12 billion in 1968-69 to slightly over $100 billion in 1983-84, all at the expense of the taxpayer.

When I explain this to my constituents they cannot understand how little regard the Government has for their hard earned tax dollars. I try to explain the situation to them. Imagine that the Government is a bank, that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) is the bank president and Parliament is its board of directors. On this board of directors, the president has a majority of the votes on his side. Each of the eight times in the last four years the Government has needed money, the bank president has asked the board to give him another loan. As loyal friends of the president the majority of the directors, without question, agreed to do so. However, the minority of directors did ask questions, and twice succeeded in reducing the amount of the loan slightly. Because the board, in this case Parliament, was loaded with unswerving and unquestioning followers of the president—the Minister of Finance—the loans were granted. This was done irrespective of the financial position of the loan requestor, the Government, or of the interests of its owners, the people of Canada.

I would like Hon. Members sitting over there on the Government benches to put themselves in the position of the bank manager of one of their local banks. If any company came to you today and made a request to borrow $29 billion, what questions would you ask? First, you would ask for the company's financial position as of its last fiscal year. If that company told you that its deficit last year was about $31.5 billion, I think you would then ask what their net position was at the end of last year. A response giving a net debt of over $150 billion would not, I am sure, dispose you towards lending further funds to that company. If you asked a company what it expects its profit to be over the next five years, as Revenue Canada does of some farmers, and the company told you that it expected its yearly deficit to remain nearly constant and its net debt to almost double, would you not write them off as a bad credit risk, as does Revenue Canada?

I have been through this kind of an ordeal with constituents of mine who were applying for loans through the Farm Credit Corporation and through the Industrial and Regional Development Program. Neither of these institutions would touch a company or an individual in this type of financial position. On a few occasions they have told companies that they must change their management structure, as they obviously were not being run correctly, before they would even talk to them about Government loans.

● (1600)

What we have here is a Government which, if it applied for its own loans, would undoubtedly be turned down if the same criteria were applied to the Government as they are to those whom it is supposed to be helping. Unfortunately, the Government has no new blood. The people of Canada are not about to give the Liberal Party or its ghost of Budgets past, Mr. Turner, a chance to continue running our economy into the ground after the election.

It is amusing to watch the Liberal "lack lustre" leadership race developing. The first nag out of the gate, Mr. Johnston, was obviously trying to dissociate himself from the policies of which he has been a part. On the subjects of the deficit and the borrowing authority, he had the following to say on March 9 on Canada AM:

> I think all Canadians understand that governments have to live within their means and that the only way of getting at the deficit is either more taxation or, on the other hand, cutting programs, or inflation, because that's another way governments traditionally have gotten rid of deficits in historic times.

Mr. Johnston also stated in The Globe and Mail on the same day:

> The deficit has a very pragmatic restraint which people don't see. I mean, people have to understand that governments simply can't borrow and borrow.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It is bad enough that the Hon. Member is reading a speech, which is in violation of the Standing Orders, but he is using the names of Hon. Members in a way which is totally inappropriate. I would appreciate it if he were called to order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): The point of order is accepted. The Hon. Member can mention the name of a Member when he is quoting. He has been making quotations, but I believe he should keep the point of order in mind.

Mr. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): I am sure the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) must have shuddered when he heard the suggestion of cutting programs and increasing taxation in an election year. The comment of the Economic Development Minister about not being able simply to borrow and borrow money is foreign to the philosophy of the Liberal Party and certainly goes against the interests of Bill C-21, which asks to borrow billions of dollars more than the Government actually requires before the end of the 1984-85 fiscal year.

In closing, I would like to join my colleagues in repudiating this Bill. There is no need for the Government to borrow money now for use after the 1984-85 fiscal year. Indeed, if government spending were under control, there would be no need to borrow money at all.

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to participate in the debate this afternoon on Bill C-21 which requests the authority to borrow some $29.5 billion. If we relate that to millions, it is $29,500 million. It would not be so bad if this were the only borrowing Bill that had been before the House during this thirty-second Parliament. If one looks back at the first and second sessions, one realizes that in a four-year period the Government brought in some eight borrowing Bills. These Bills provided for the borrowing of a total of $102.85 billion, an astronomical figure. That figure represents the incompetence and absolute irresponsibility of the present Government, yet Hon. Members on the other side have risen in the debate time after time to defend the Government's position. They see nothing wrong with it. They do not realize the harm which the policies of the Government have done to the country and to the people of Canada. They do not seem to understand that the country is bankrupt. They do not realize that if they continue year after year borrowing more and more money and spending more than is taken in, we will end up in an impossible situation. That is what has happened over the years.

Many constituents have asked me about government expenditures and government financing. I relate government to a small business or a farming operation because there is no real difference. Government is a business, big business. If any business, whether large or small, spends more than it takes in year after year, it ends up in a bankrupt situation. Of course a government cannot go bankrupt.

When I came here in 1972, the Budget for that year was between $15 billion and $16 billion. The Budget for this fiscal year alone is over $100 billion. The gross debt in Canada now stands at $190 billion. If we net that out, that is take away the assets of the country, we still have a net debt of $150 billion, and the Auditor General has said that the Government has overstated its assets by some $20.4 million.

To service our debt or to pay the interest for which we are responsible costs $20 billion per year. That is more than it cost to run the entire country in 1972. That represents some $800 per capita or some $1,900 per taxpayer. If we analyse the situation, we see that one ouf of every three tax dollars goes to paying the interest on the country's debt. We are leaving an unbearable debt load for our children, a legacy of the Trudeau years.

When our children and grandchildren are our age, Mr. Speaker, will they have the Old Age Security pension? Will they have the guaranteed income supplement? Will they have the Canada Pension Plan? If we continue borrowing at the rate at which we are presently borrowing, all the revenue of the country will be required to pay the interest on our debt. There will be nothing left for social programs for our children and our children's children. What about unemployment insurance? Nation-wide the cost of unemployment insurance is between $11 billion and $12 billion this yeaer. That is more than the combined spending of the four Atlantic provinces for this year.

Paying an individual unemployment insurance does not do anything for our Gross National Product. It is a drain. It is interesting, Mr. Speaker, that time after time in this House of Commons, Government Ministers have stood up and said they are spending x number of dollars and creating thousands of jobs. I hope that someone sometime will sit down and add up all the jobs the Liberal Government said it has created in the last ten years, because it would amount to millions. We do not have enough people in this country to fill all the jobs they say they have created. We would have to bring people from offshore by the planeload and boatload. Despite all these make-work programs and the jobs the Government says it has created over the years, we still have 1.5 million persons unemployed in Canada.

When speaking in the House earlier, the Hon. Member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson) posed the question, "What would a Conservative Government do under the circumstances?". A Conservative Government would run a good, efficient government. It would not be bribing the taxpayers with their own money. It would not build white elephants like Mirabel. It would not spend $266 million of the taxpayers' money on advertising. It would not spend several billion dollars on Canadair and de Havilland.

I have heard comments from the other side condemning our attitude toward Canadair. I happen to be on the Public Accounts Committee and I have some knowledge of Canadair. It was a disaster, it was mismanagement and it was a waste. An interesting news report came across my desk yesterday issued by Senator Austin. It was regarding the revamping of Canadair. One thing he said was that they were going to reduce the number of vice-presidents in the company from 22 to 12. Imagine having 22 vice-presidents in a company like Canadair, a Crown corporation. This is unbelievable.

We have Centennial Towers where the Government spends $1 million a month on rent. The building has just recently been occupied, and then only three out of ten floors are rented. I see my time is up, Mr. Speaker. I simply want to say that this Party cannot support incompetence and irresponsibility, which is really what this Bill is all about.

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacLaren that Bill C-21 an Act to provide borrowing authority, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on the Borrowing Authority Act by which the Government is seeking to borrow an additional $29.5 billion. All of us agree that borrowing money is not necessarily wrong. I am sure at one time or another all of us have had to borrow money. The question is, how much and for what will it be used? Let me use the example of an unemployed worker. There is a major difference between that unemployed worker borrowing a substantial amount in order to go to Hawaii for a vacation and borrowing to purchase a car so that he can get to a nearby town to find employment. There is a big difference between this Government's borrowing money so that it can give $8 billion over the next few years to oil companies that will be drilling on Canada Lands, whether or not they drill dry holes, and conversely borrowing money to be used for labour-intensive projects which would help restore our economy to a sound footing, putting people back to work and ending some of the misery of unemployment.

Our Party would be much more open to this Bill if the Government were serious about the major problems affecting Canada today, but we see no indication of that. Where is the Government's commitment to reverse the loss of jobs and the drain this creates on the total economy? Victoria, B.C., in the southern part of my constituency, now has the second highest level of unemployment in Canada. People in that community are suffering deeply from the knock-out punch of the punitive attitude of the provincial Social Credit Government and the neglect of the federal Government. While a great deal of attention has been focused on the punishing attitude of the provincial government and the neglect of the federal Government, the attitude and drift it has taken toward basic resource industries such as forestry and the fisheries is, in the long run, almost as disastrous as the punishing attitude of the Socreds.

Another area of Government neglect about which I would like to speak briefly is the whole area of Indian Affairs. Last week Canadians witnessed the last minute conversion of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to at least the rhetoric of aboriginal self-government. There was some surprise when the provinces did not buy this rhetoric as it was presented to them.

If we look at the Prime Minister's proposal, we see that it lacked any real commitment to the aboriginal people. We see that the Government's response to the report of the Special Committee on Indian Self-Government lacked any specific economic commitment to the Indian people. Indian self-government without economic commitment to back it up will be nothing more than a comic opera, a meaningless charade.

Let us look at housing on Indian reserves. Housing is connected to the concomitant problems of sewer and water. These are woefully inadequate on reserves from one end of Canada to another. We can point to some outstanding examples where housing, water and sewage systems are good, but by and large the housing situation across Canada is woefully inadequate. It is tied in with the terrible standard of health that Indian people have to face, the high drop-out rate of Indian children at shcool, unemployment and the loss of culture. When people do not have adequate housing and an adequate infrastructure in their communities, all of these other things tend to go by the board as well.

Across Canada right now, there is the phenomenon of Indian people being forced off the reserves and away from their home communities into the crowded ghettos of large cities. Once those Indians are in the ghettos, the federal Government thinks it is able to wash its hands of them and no longer provides them with basic services. For example, educational services to off-reserve Indian people were terminated last year. Indian people find themselves forced into a welfare system.

This year, the Department of Indian Affairs is saying that it will not be able to fund training programs for the urban training centre in Vancouver. Last December, some attention was directed to the case of Joyce and Birdie Canton, an Indian couple from the Wabigoon Reserve in northwestern Ontario who moved to the City of Winnipeg because their home on the reserve was condemned for health reasons. However, I think it is important to remember that a couple like the Cantons are not the exception to the rule. Rather, they were exceptional only because of the fact that they received a certain amount of media attention because they refused to submit quietly to the indignity of bad housing and welfare when they did not want to do so and should not expect to have to do so.

In 1979, it was estimated that the Indian people across Canada had a housing shortage with a backlog of some 13,000 units. Five years later, our best guess is that there are still some 10,000 housing units urgently needed on Indian reserves. I say that that is the best guess because no up-to-date national survey has been done. This year, approximately 2,400 housing units will be built, and this will keep up only with the necessary replacements needed for deteriorating homes and new family formations. However, it does nothing to address the continuing backlog of 10,000 or more needed housing units. Last year, special recovery funds went toward building an extra 900 units, and it is rather depressing to realize that those 900 units represented the largest single dent that had ever been made in the badklog.

It would be encouraging, Mr. Speaker, to see some of the money that the Government is borrowing used to address this urgent national problem. However, we do not see the Government addressing that problem with any degree of urgency. In addition to the inadequate funding, there is inefficiency in the way in which the Department delivers the funding. Money often arrives too late for the Indian people to take advantage of the short construction season experienced in many parts of northern Canada. When Indian bands receive their funding late, it means that they are stuck with high interest charges.

The Government is committed to Indian control of Indian education, or at least it is committed in its rhetoric to Indian control of Indian education. However, in situation after situation we find that there is no funding to provide for new schools on Indian reserves, even when it is clearly recognized that they are needed. Building schedules are being constantly pushed back, promises are made and then denied. In Manitoba, some 40 school buildings are needed.

The Government indicates it wants to borrow $29.5 billion, yet government Members have announced plans for the spending only of some $25 billion. The Government wants to borrow $4 billion more than it has planned to spend. We say that government Members should bring in a plan which would indicate to the people of the country where they want to use that money. I would like to suggest some areas which urgently need that money. There should be increased attention paid to the forests and to the fisheries, particularly the fisheries of the Pacific Coast, and increased attention to the need for decent housing and sewage and water systems in the Indian communities.

The Government's approach to the economy has been one of drift, mismanagement and borrowing to make up the difference. I do not think that is good enough any longer. Let the Government do some long-term planning that will help to get the economy moving again. In short, we cannot accept this Bill because it is too large, too loose and we do not know what the Government wants to do with the money.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, standing in the Chamber today, I am reminded of the day that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) called Members of Parliament nobodies. Far too often, when out in our ridings around the country, we tend to think that what happens in the Chamber of the House of Commons is irrelevant to the day-to-day lives of the people. Today, Mr. Speaker, we are looking at the largest borrowing Bill in Canadian history. We can predict that members of the Liberal Party of Canada will stand up in the Chamber and vote for it. Will that affect the lives of individual ordinary Canadians?

On a day-to-day basis this week we have watched the value of the Canadian dollar drop. During the auction for Treasury notes today, interest rates went up better than one half of 1 per cent. Anyone who bought a home this morning or who yesterday put in his offer to buy, did the paperwork necessary to receive a mortgage, but now finds that he is having his pocketbook tapped this afternoon. One half of 1 per cent on a $50,000 mortgage amounts to extra payments of better than $20 a month of after-tax income out of a wage earner's pocket. If that mortgage is $100,000, one half of 1 per cent amounts to an extra $40 a month. That is $40 a month that people cannot use for food, clothing, entertainment and education.

This situation has been caused by a further four years on top of 11 years of economic mismanagment. It is hurting the country. It is costing the country jobs. It is costing the people anxiety and putting more people in hospitals. How did such a situation come about? Government Members, including all the leadership candidates, are asking Members of the House of Commons to give them permission to borrow $29,550 million. That is a sum so staggering that it defies the imagination.

Let us put that amount in perspective, Mr. Speaker. There are 24 million Canadians, and some of them are in the fortunate position of being able to save money either by putting it in banks or in a variety of money certificates. The amount of money the Government wants to borrow from those who save is 91 per cent of all the money that will be saved in the country this year. This government borrowing Bill does not even include the amounts to be borrowed by Crown corporations, which are an extension of Government.

If the Government will borrow 91 cents out of every dollar that every Canadian saves, that leaves only nine cents for the rest of us to borrow for the purchase of a car or a home. Because of this, what happens to the interest rates, Mr. Speaker? This Bill has not yet been passed, is not yet law, and the borrowing has not even begun. We are only at the beginning stages of this Bill, and already interest rates are up one half of 1 per cent. Perhaps they will rise another 1 per cent, 1.5 per cent or 2 per cent. Everyone who borrows money in the ocuntry will have to pay that extra amount.

Pensioners in the country who are on fixed incomes will have to pay more for the food they eat because the costs run down throughout the entire economy. Rents will go up and the cost of medical supplies will go up as well. If any Member of this Chamber thinks that what we do here does not affect ordinary Canadians, he is pulling the wool over his eyes. This is the largest borrowing Bill in Canadian history.

This year the Government plans to spend almost twice as much as it planned to spend the day it was elected. In four years it has almost doubled its expenditures and it has more than doubled the amount of money it borrows. People do not like high interest rates. They complain that their business went bankrupt because they could not afford those rates, that they had to turn their home back to the mortgage company because they could not pay the interest, or that the finance company repossessed their car. They should hold every single Member of the Liberal Party of Canada accountable because they support Government mismanagement year after year after year. It is the Government's willingness to borrow year after year after year that is causing the problem. Some may say that the blame lies with the Cabinet, but that is not so. Members of this Chamber vote for these measures and so it is the job of government backbenchers and opposition Parties to hold the Cabinet accountable and put some common sense into the legislation. When government backbenchers do not do that job, then the voters of the country have a job to do, and that is, to kick each and every one of them out of this Chamber so that they never have an opportunity to do this sort of thing again.

When I was elected almost five years ago, 17 cents out of every tax dollar went to pay interest on the public debt and 83 cents was left for health care, unemployment insurance and so on. Now, not quite five years later, 31 cents out of every tax dollar goes to pay interest on the public debt. That leaves 69 cents instead of 83 cents to go into health care, pensions, and all the things people expect the Government to provide. That is a tragedy, Mr. Speaker.

There are 1.5 million people unemployed. Young people want to go to university, but governments are cutting back on funding for universities. People want to go to hospital and cannot because beds are not available. The reason behind all this is the economic mismanagement of the Liberal Party of Canada, and it has gone on far too long and hurts too many people.

The story must be told and the lessons learned, Mr. Speaker. I urge Canadians, wherever they live, to take a good, hard look at the behaviour of their politicians and what they say they believe in and compare it to what they do in this Chamber. What they do is to vote to support that mismanagement and the Cabinet. Unless Members across the way have a change of heart and start to behave differently, Canadians have an obligation to turf each and every one of them out, not only in this election but for the rest of the elections in this century. That is the obligation of Canadian voters.

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Mr. Speaker, I participate in the debate on Bill C-21 with the faint flicker of hope that the government Members may exercise their ancient but rather atrophied power to bring some sense to the Government's spending policies. Bill C-21 is an abomination. It lays an immense burden on the people of Canada today and on future generations. That is spelled out in the rather brief piece of legislation which provides for the Government to borrow $29.55 billion or, as my colleague has just put it, twenty-nine and a half thousand million dollars. That tidy sum for a profligate and spendthrift administration exceeds by $4 billion the entire financial requirements of the Government for a full fiscal year. That is not the full fiscal year that we are now in but the full fiscal year to come. That projection of the requirement was announced in the House one month ago today. Now the Government brings in a Bill asking for $29.55 billion to see it through the entire fiscal year beginning April 1.

I pause here to note that it is rather strange that there existed on February 29 a full $5 billion in unused borrowing authority, and I asked myself why it is so essential that today, before the fiscal year begins, the Government should ask Parliament for authority to spend the entire financial requirement as projected in the Budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) well in advance of the period yet to begin.

It occurs to me that it might be convenient if the House were no longer required by the Government of the day—if it might be sent into recess while those seeking the hollow grail of leadership of the Liberal Party were permitted to travel the country pursuing their own personal goals. It would also be convenient if the House were muted in its discussion in this place of the waste and extravagance undertaken by the Government. In place of the legitimate criticism that is levelled in the House we might have an expensive advertising campaign initiated by the Government to tell the people of Canada that the days of wine and roses has returned. The contrary is the truth, Mr. Speaker.

Yesterday, as a consequence of a meeting of a committee of this House, we heard that the Government had decided to pump an additional $310 million into Canadair. That is in addition to the $1.4 billion that had been accumulated as a consequence of the guarantees provided to that corporation—guarantees of the Government of Canada over the years and written off, assumed by the Government of Canada in 1983. Senator Austin has told the country that the project undertaken by that company will succeed and that it will be profitable. I wonder what would have happened to the Ford Motor Company if the chairman of the board had said that they would sell Edsels and that Edsels would be profitable.

The problem with the Government and the Crown corporations that it sustains is that there is no relationship between reality and its goals. It is appropriate to think positively and it is wise and prudent to endeavour to achieve the best we can with the instruments that have been given to us. It is foolhardy, however, to pursue goals which result in the further wasting of the finances of the people of Canada. These funds are not the Government's funds. They are the funds of the people of this nation. The people sitting in this House as Members of Parliament have an obligation to the people whom they represent to administer their financial affairs astutely. It is for that purpose that my colleagues and I stand here in our places and endeavour to persuade members of the government Party to come to their senses. Just a smattering of good judgement exercised by them would stop this process.

What is the process with which we are currently involved? It is the borrowing of money, which has the effect of creating an opinion of the way in which this Government has performed, not only in the financial community of Canada but in the financial communities of the world. And what is the judgement of those who can reflect their judgement in a positive sense? As compared to other currencies, our currency is under attack. It is under attack because it is overvalued as a result of the Government of Canada reaching too far into the combined savings and assets of the people of this nation. The Government has shown internationally that it is unequipped to deal with the financial affairs of Canada.

The Minister of Finance stood in his place in the House and explained that interest rates, if they rise, are beyond the control of this Government because interest rates in the United States are increasing. Interest rates will rise, Mr. Speaker, so long as the Government and the Minister of Finance intervene with the Bank of Canada, as they do regularly. The Government, in fact, instructs the Bank of Canada on what price should be paid at the Treasury bill auction every Thursday. We know what the effect of that was today, that is, 10.56 per cent. We know what the increase will signal to the financial community. It will signal that interest rates should also go up on commercial loans and on home mortgages. What will the effect of that be, Mr. Speaker? It will return this nation to the series of bankruptcies and home foreclosures and judicial sales of the assets of the people of this nation, from which we hoped we might extricate ourselves, relying on the financial recovery of the United States. That will not occur if this Government persists with the spending practices which it has unveiled in Bill C-21.

I urge Hon. Members of the House, if they are concerned about their constituents and about the welfare of Canadians in general, if they really hope to create employment through the resurrection of a stable, profitable business community, and if they hope to keep people who have acquired homes in those homes, to reflect upon the lack of wisdom which is embodied in Bill C-21.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, in making some remarks on Bill C-21, the Borrowing Authority Act, 1984-85, it is difficult to place in perspective the effect the provisions of this Bill will have on Canadians and on the economy. Many Hon. Members have stood in this Chamber and tried to indicate the enormity of borrowing $29.55 billion and the effect it will have. Mere numbers do not indicate the harm, economic and otherwise, it will do to Canada. It is a real challenge to try to bring meaning to figures like $100 billion in expenditures, $70 billion in revenues, and the deficit which arises with expenditures at such a high level and revenues at such a low level. It is very important, indeed vital, that we get across to Canadians the relevance of this legislative measure to their daily lives.

We have heard time and time again what the borrowing of this amount of money, over $30 billion, added to the existing national debt, will create for each tax-paying Canadian at the national level alone. It is a debt of $15,000 to $16,000 for each taxpayer. When you add to that the provincial debt which is represented and applied to that taxpayer, you get a figure well in excess of $20,000. Every taxpayer in Canada carries with him on daily basis, in addition to whatever personal debts he or she may have incurred by way of mortgages, car loans, and so on, the government debt in excess of $20,000.

What is the effect of all this debt accumulation, Mr. Speaker? It has a very important effect on all Canadians, but it has an immediate effect on interest rates. Only today we have seen a further additional increase in basic interest rates which will be charged by banks, because the rate for 180-day Treasury bills has risen to 10.95 per cent. That, Mr. Speaker, is plunging us into another series of interest increases which will bring us up not only to the double-digit level, but higher. If that kind of inflationary trend in interest rates and other prices occurs, we can look forward to a termination of any thought of economic recovery. That again will affect each and every Canadian and the way of life to which each and every Canadian is entitled.

What are we going to do about it, Mr. Speaker? That is the real question. We know the disaster of deficit financing over a long period of time. We know about the crushing burden of accumulated debt, not only on the Government of Canada but on individual taxpayers. We must face the problem of what we are going to do about it. For taxpayers, there is not only, as I indicated, the problem of interest rates, but they are also faced with the need and desire on the part of the Government of Canada for additional revenue. This has shown up in two ways: first, in the increase in the tax load for individual Canadians, and, second, in the acceleration and emphasis on tax collection by Revenue Canada.

We have heard time and time again in the House of Commons and elsewhere in Canada about the disastrous effect of overzealous tax collection. I want to point out to Hon. Members of the House and to all Canadians that we now have a very sophisticated tax system. Not only does it deal with direct taxes such as income taxes, sales taxes and the like, but there are very subtle ways of taxing Canadian people. Those subtle ways include changing the method by which tax deductions are assessed and the hidden taxes we find, for example, reflected in the price of gasoline, transportation fuels and commodities which are used by virtually all Canadians. We are hit by taxes from all sides and many of the taxes imposed on Canadians are not even known to them.

I have here an indication, Mr. Speaker, of what each Canadian family with a net income in the area of $22,000 pays in taxes. The global rate approximates 45 per cent. That is to say that a Canadian family with a net income in the area of $22,000 pays $11,000 in taxes. That is inclusive of all taxes paid to all levels of government. The result is that the crushing burden of taxation on Canadian people is coupled with the effect government borrowing has on the interest rates available to Canadian consumers. That is magnified by the collection practices of Revenue Canada, which pounces on these burdened taxpayers and demands, without any justification, every inch of the tax requirement plus, in many cases, something more. Decisions are at all times against the taxpayers, forcing them into appeal procedures which are costly and time consuming and serve to discourage Canadians who might otherwise want to contribute more to the economy and the productive capacity of the country.

• (1650)

Reversing this process is going to be very difficult, Mr. Speaker. However, we cannot stand helplessly and do nothing. I believe Government Members are entitled to ask what we would do. As opposition Members there is an onus upon us to indicate ways in which we would reverse this process. When one looks at the public accounts and at proposed expenditures, it is quite easy to find ways of reversing this process. There have been expenditures such as $900 million on Mirabel which could have been eliminated. Time and time again in the House of Commons we have spoken about the $3 billion which has been virtually wasted on Canadair and its related activities. Yet the Government tries to tell us that expenditure was made in the interest of all Canadians, that it saved the aeronautic technology and provided employment for 1,200 persons. At the same time the Government refuses to provide less than $100 million to the Sydney Steel Company in Nova Scotia to eliminate its public debt and enable it to function on a businesslike basis. That plant would employ over 2,000 steel workers. As well, the Government would be assisting an industry which is basic to an industrialized economy, has export capacity, and has the abilily to provide local employment.

I am trying to point out that it is not the amount of the expenditures which the Government makes, but rather, it is the quality and the kinds of expenditures that are made which count. In that respect, Mr. Speaker, over a period of 15 years the Government has lost track of the purpose of government expenditures. No one disputes that social services are necessary. However, it is in the area of optional government expenditures that the Government has failed completely and miserably. That has led to this deteriorating situation which has resulted in such damage to the Canadian economy. The Government has failed to recognize that some government expenditures are productive and others are not.

I will give you one example which is at a low level but it can be magnified and demonstrated in other areas. The Government spent $2 million on empty office space because the Solicitor General of Canada (Mr. Kaplan) anticipated that there would be a new security agency ready to occupy those premises some months ago. The Government spent $100,000 on a crazy advertising assessment scheme which related to the Special Recovery Program. Those are minor expenditures, but we can find expenditures of much greater amounts which have been documented time and time again in the House.

The point is that we need to clean house. The only way the Canadian people will get the benefit of that housecleaning is to elect another government which can take a new approach, start from square one, look at the purpose of government expenditures and recognize the difference between providing necessary social and health services on the one hand and reviewing the optional expenditures which should only be made by Government when they have a productive result. That does not include pouring money into an industry which has no hope of success. That is only deluding the persons involved in that industry. There is no place for buying votes with programs which have no long-term beneficial result. There is no place for $400,000 expenditures per Liberal constituency.

I will conclude by saying that the public is finally catching on to the Government. People are finally realizing what the policies of the Government have done. It is our duty to bring this message to the attention of the Canadian people.

Mr. Gerry St. Germain (Mission-Port Moody): Mr. Speaker, it is always an honour to rise in the House, but to oppose Bill C-21, the borrowing Bill, is truly a great honour for any Conservative or any Member on this side of the House. This should have been called the blank cheque for $29.5 billion detabe. The amount of $29.5 billion is beyond the comprehension of most Canadians. It is a clear indication of the Government's waste, mismanagement, incompetence, irresponsibility and lack of accountability. Yesterday the Hon. Member for Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe (Mr. Tobin) said we had not done enough research on this. We do not have to do any research, Mr. Speaker. It is so blatant.

I would like to address the lack of accountability, Mr. Speaker. That is why we oppose the Bill in its present form. Early last fall when I came into the House I was asked to attend a meeting. As a matter of fact, I was a member of the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration. We asked about the Special Employment Initiatives Program. We asked what the criteria were to gain access to these funds so that all Canadians could share them. We were never given an answer, Mr. Speaker. It became a slush fund for the corrupt crew across the way. That case and many more could be cited.

No one knows how damaging our huge deficits are to the economy. In the United States they are concerned about the ramifications of the huge deficit. I do not like to compare us with anyone else because we are Canadians. We should compare ourselves only with perfection. Our deficit is devastating. It has been pointed out in the House before, and I do not believe it can be pointed out too often, that every Canadian owes in excess of $6,000. The average family of five owes about $30,000. You could work your hands to the bone to pay off your debts, but you would still have the debt incurred by those people across the way. They blame the recession. Why is it they had a deficit before the recession came, Mr. Speaker? They are to blame, not the recession or anything else. The Liberal Party is to blame. How big is the Canadian deficit? There are more zeros in the Canadian deficit than there are in the Liberal Cabinet. I believe there is a direct correlation between these two groups of zeros.

I would like to dwell on something close to my heart in which I participated, that is, small business. Mr. Speaker, most of the Hon. Members across the way have obviously never produced anything prior to coming here. If they had run any form of business, they would never have presented a Bill such as Bill C-21 in its present form. They would have understood that you cannot borrow your way into prosperity. Every Canadian knows this, whether he is a householder or a business person. Small business is the one sector of our economy that is the most affected. Bill C-21 is what will make interest rates rise again, such as they have today. That will be the death of how many more small businesses? It is small businesses that will create 60 per cent to 70 per cent of the jobs in this country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Shall all orders and items preceding No. 37 stand by unanimous consent?

Narcotic Control Act

NARCOTIC CONTROL ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING THERAPEUTIC USE OF HEROIN

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East) moved that Bill C-221, an Act to amend the Narcotic Control Act (therapeutic use of heroin), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this Bill, as implied in the title, is to amend the Narcotic Control Act to allow for the therapeutic use of heroin by designated physicians, particularly those in cancer clinics, in order to help alleviate the pain and suffering of those who are terminally ill with cancer. There are 40,000 Canadians who die every year from this terrible disease. In my opinion, many of these suffer terribly and, in many cases, needlessly.

I cannot take credit for this Bill, although I do not hesitate not only to sponsor it but to embrace and support it totally. This Bill was introduced in the House on April 29, last year, by the late Hon. Walter Baker who was the distinguished Member of the House for Nepean-Carleton. He was a Member for 13 years.

He was prompted to introduce the Bill by a personal experience with cancer in his family. Somebody very close to him had contracted cancer and had been successful in overcoming it. But he saw at first hand the suffering that is associated with this dreaded disease and what happens in our cancer clinics. It is one of the tragic ironies that when he introduced the Bill on April 29, 1983, he thought he was in reasonably good health. Less than six months later, he was dead from cancer. He did not know that he had it at the time.

I suppose there is not a Member of the House who has not been touched either directly or indirectly through knowing someone who has had this dreadful terminal disease. Consequently, I suppose we can all speak about it with a certain amount of feeling. I do not understand why the laws of this compassionate nation do not allow for the medical use of heroin for those suffering people. That, of course, is the whole purpose of this exercise here today.

There are 37 countries in the world that do permit heroin to be used for medical purposes to help alleviate the pain and suffering of those who are terminally ill. I hope that the House today will either agree to second reading of my Bill, which is a very simple Bill, or at the very least agree to compromise and allow the subject matter of the Bill to be referred to committee. I anticipate the latter because there have been the usual consultations. I thank the House in anticipation of that, not for my own sake but out of respect for the memory of the late and distinguished Hon. Member for Nepean-Carleton, my friend, the Hon. Walter Baker. That is what he wanted. He wanted the Bill to go to committee. He wanted to have at least the subject matter of the Bill go to committee so that Members could hear evidence and hear expert witnesses and come to a consensus on this very important matter.

There is a division of opinion among certain medical practitioners, but the consensus among those who are most closely identified with the suffering, that is, those selfless people in the nursing profession, is that we should permit the medical use of heroin to ease the suffering of those who are terminally ill. I have not been able to find one nurse in this country who expresses any reservations whatsoever on this subject. Indeed, most of them are militant and ask why in the name of suffering humanity we do not permit the use of heroin, which is many more times effective in alleviating the suffering and pain identified with cancer.

I had a brother who died of cancer. I remember watching the terrible agony he went through before he died. That agony could not be alleviated by morphine or any of the other painkillers because his suffering had become so acute that he had passed the threshold. If they had increased the amount of morphine, it would have been fatal. However, if they had been permitted to give him heroin, his last days would have been more peaceful. There are many in this country who are in the same position.

When my late friend and distinguished colleague introduced this Bill, he quoted from a letter from a Dr. Colin D.B. Cunningham of the Queensway Carleton Hospital in the City of Nepean. I will not quote the entire letter but there is one very important point which he made. I quote the following from Hansard of July 1, 1983, at page 25937:

> There is no other drug quite like heroin or as effective as heroin in suppressing pain and discomfort and I feel most strongly that it should be available as a prescription drug to alleviate the terrible pain and suffering of some late or terminal cancer patients and others.

There is also a syndicated column under the pen name of W. Gifford-Jones. The column is called "The Doctor Game". The person who writes that column is a distinguished physician by the name of Dr. Kenneth Walker. I want to quote from one of his columns. This is what he says about nurses:

> They clam that nearly 100 per cent of their patients eventually receive heroin by injection. And that it would be cruel not to have heroin available when needed.

● (1710)

He is quoting here nurses he interviewed in Great Britain where the use of heroin is permitted for medical purposes. Then he goes on to cite a case of a 17 year-old girl terminally ill with bone cancer who was suffering dreadfully. This girl was given 1,700 milligrams of heroin every four hours—five milligrams is the average dose for postoperative pain. The doctor said:

> It would have been impossible to control her pain without heroin. You simply couldn't inject such a huge dose if you were using morphine.

Other instances are cited. I believe that we have an obligation to the suffering people of this country who are terminally ill with cancer. I fail to understand why we cannot amend the Narcotic Control Act to permit doctors, designated physicians and nurses in designated cancer clinics, to apply this pain-killing drug which is so much more effective than the drugs now in use.

I do not profess to be an expert. I am merely putting forth a layman's opinion. But I believe that we, as Members of Parliament, are entitled to determine whether or not the case can be made for amending the present legislation and permitting the use of heroin in Canada.

I remember the day that my colleague died. There was a great out-pouring of respect, affection and admiration for him. He was a distinguished and dedicated parliamentarian. I would hope that, out of respect for his memory and out of consideration for the hundreds of suffering people in this country today who are terminally ill, the House will agree to get on with the study of this important subject and will hear witnesses. Hopefully, from that will emerge a consensus to amend the parent legislation so as to permit doctors and nurses to use heroin to alleviate the pain of those who are terminally ill.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I will speak briefly on this Bill. Like the Hon. Member who has just spoken, I would like to see the House come to a decision to deal with this Bill today, and I do not wish to prolong the discussion unduly. In common with my colleague who has just spoken, I am very much aware of the fact that this Bill was introduced by a very distinguished and well-respected Member of this House in response to family concerns at a time when he himself was very well and could not have expected that he would die shortly of this disease. Cancer is a disease which has probably touched everybody here in one way or another.

In the developed countries, cancer is responsible for approximately 20 per cent of the total number of deaths. Although pain is not inevitable, from 65 per cent to 85 per cent of patients experience moderate to severe pain, and about two-thirds of those dying of cancer experience severe pain.

This is an enormously difficult subject for relatives and friends as well as for the person dying. In our society up to now, insufficient care and thought has been given to the whole question of managing pain in a way that gives the patient dignity and choice.

Palliative care, the hospice movement, which started in London, England, has started to bring a large change in attitude. Terminally ill patients in palliative care are considered in their social context and in the context of their families, and pain is regarded in the total context, involving not only physical but also psychological, social and spiritual factors. The evidence indicates that the best results in pain control are achieved with this approach. Indeed, the careful and intelligent use of drugs enters into it. Drugs are given regularly and at intervals as short as required to prevent pain rather than to treat it repeatedly, aiming at a continuous pain-free state, the aim being that patients remain pain-free, alert, and with no abnormal effects. This approach would allow the dying to be pain-free but also to have quality of life and dignity. This is something we would all want.

The question of the use of heroin in terminal illness is one that has been fraught with controversy. In 1955 we saw the United Nations' decision to try to ban the use of heroin. At the same time there were many physicians who said that heroin was particularly effective in the treatment of pain and that in our concern about the abuse of drugs we were forgetting about the need for their legitimate, controlled use. On the other hand, there are studies that say that heroin does not have any more efficacy in the control of pain than morphine or other drugs, if applied correctly.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) has established a committee which is now studying pain control. It is the advisory committee on pain, which is reviewing all the available information on heroin. The Minister is prepared, if the results of that committee so indicate, to make recommendations about the facility and use of drugs. But it is a very technical matter, as the Hon. Member said. Those of us who are not physicians have impressions but these are not backed by scientific study. The study to be produced by the committee established by the Minister should make an important contribution to our understanding of pain management. I also trust that the subject matter of this Bill will be sent to the standing committee where representatives of the Advisory Committee on Pain and other experts can be heard so that we do whatever can be done as soon as possible to ensure more humane treatment and effective management of pain in those who are terminally ill.

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, I would like to start my remarks first by thanking the Hon. Member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) for giving us another opportunity to speak on this matter. As the Hon. Member for St. John's East already indicated to the House, we are also grateful to the late Hon. Member for Nepean-Carleton, Walter Baker, for introducing this Bill in the first place. The intent of the Bill is certainly one that we on this side of the House support wholeheartedly.

Bill C-221 before us today is identical to the Bill introduced by the former Hon. Member for Nepean-Carleton. When the earlier Bill reached second reading stage on June 1, 1983, the New Democratic Party spoke in favour of the Bill. At that time the Liberal Government talked out the Bill. I hope that the Government, upon second consideration, will not do that on this occasion. As has already been indicated to the House, as I understand it, this will not be the case and the Bill may perhaps be referred to committee.

The purpose of the Bill itself, as Hon. Members know, is to amend the Narcotic Control Act, thus permitting designated physicians, particularly in cancer clinics, to prescribe heroin as a pain killer for terminally ill cancer patients.

• (1720)

Despite its use in other countries, most notably in the United Kingdom, legitimate use of heroin has not been allowed in Canada since 1955. The United Nations World Health Organization recommended in 1947 that member countries ban heroin used medically, as a measure to fight increasing illicit use and addiction. The rationale of the World Health Organization was that such a move would limit the availability to addicts and pushers, and there was widespread belief that a synthetic drug of equivalent potency was just around the corner. Neither prediction has come true, some 30 years later.

Meanwhile, the illicit import and use of heroin in Canada has become a multi-million dollar business on an annual basis. Nothing found in nature or in test tubes comes close to heroin as an analgesic, with the arguable exception of morphine.

It is on this point, the question of whether heroin is a more effective pain-killer than morphine, that the medical profession is sharply divided. Due to the fact that heroin has been illegal in Canada since 1954, doctors, at least in this country, have not had the opportunity to conduct any comparative studies of their own. Research in other countries has resulted in divergent findings.

If the medical community cannot come to a consensus, then I as a non-expert am not about to take up the cause of one side or the other. However, I do believe that the comparative effectiveness of pain-killers merits examination, given that 30 years have passed since the banning of heroin. Also the fact that there are many credible physicians who advocate a change in the law regarding the therapeutic use of heroin adds impetus to the need for a re-examination of the issue.

No two pain-killers are entirely identical. A cancer patient may have an adverse reaction to one drug yet be able to tolerate another. This alone justifies having alternative pain-killers available, especially in the case of terminal cancer patients, many of whom experience a great deal of pain. Surely the principle of the Bill and the heart of the issue is, if I may quote the late Hon. Member for Nepean-Carleton, Walter Baker, "that physicians should be armed with every weapon to look after every case to the extent that is possible". It is time that this matter were re-opened.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) has undertaken two initiatives. The first was the appointment of the Committee on the Medical Management of Severe Pain early in 1983. The committee was directed by the Minister to "draw up a guide for Canadian doctors on treating severe pain and to discuss within this document the optimal clinical use of various analgesic drugs including the medical need for heroin for the treatment of pain associated with preterminal malignant disease". The Committee has met on a number of occasions and, I am told, is now in the process of writing its first report, which it is hoped will be completed by this fall.

Dr. Kenneth Walker, whom many Members will know by his other name of Dr. Gifford-Jones, has led a controversial media camaign to legalize heroin for therapeutic purposes. Dr. Walker has contended that the choice of members of the Medical Management Committee amounts to "loaded dice against heroin". I am not in a position to agree or disagree with Dr. Walker's opinion. However, given the importance of the issue at stake and the weight that would or should be attributed to any medical or scientific opinion emanating from the committee, I think the committee's credibility before the public is critical. Hence, I would like to see the issues surrounding the Bill receive a broader and more open hearing by referring it to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

The Minister's second response to public pressure was the announcement in May, 1983 of the trial clinical use of heroin. The purpose of these proposed clinical trials would be to measure the effectiveness of heroin versus that of other pain-killers. The trials are to be conducted in ten centres specializing in cancer treatment, and apparently between 300 and 350 patients are to be involved. These tests were supposed to have begun last fall, but now it is hoped that they will begin this summer. This delay concerns me, especially since the trials themselves are to take place over a period of between 12 months and 18 months. I strongly urge the Minister to expedite the start-up of these clinical trials.

Even if it were to be found that heroin for therapeutic purposes should be legalized, there is the question of security and control surrounding the drug. Many legitimate concerns have been raised regarding the appeal that such high-grade heroin would hold for addicts and pushers. However, surely security concerns also apply to drugs now used in hospitals, clinics and pharmacies. No doubt this could be dealt with by access and licencing controls. No matter how valid these concerns are, they should not pre-empt the potential for alleviating pain. Even the Minister herself has accepted the premise that suffering Canadians should have access to the complete spectrum of choices involving relief from pain.

We as Members of Parliament have a responsibility for leading the way in society's attempts to humanize the health care system, particularly as it pertains to the treatment of terminal illnesses. It is for these reasons that I would like to see the Bill sent to the standing committee where public and expert opinion could be vetted and where the scope of the deliberations of the standing committee could be broadened to include matters such as security and control. This should take place concurrently with the clinical trials and the Medical Management Committee. Needless to say, time is of the essence.

As was pointed out earlier by the Hon. Member for St. John's East, according to Statistics Canada the figures for death caused by cancer in 1982 would indicate that in the male population a total of 23,449 died of cancer and in the female population, some 18,515, for a total of both sexes of 41,964. That was in 1982 alone. Also, as the Hon. Member pointed out, Mr. Baker died of that particular disease not knowing that in actual fact he was suffering from it. More recently, within the last several weeks, another Member of the Conservative Party died of exactly the same disease, the late Hon. Member for Calgary East. In my own case, both my parents died of cancer. It is a disease, as has been pointed out, which touches every person in Canada and elsewhere in the world. We as legislators have a responsibility to ensure that people suffering from this dreaded disease receive the kind of assistance which would at least allow them to die with some dignity.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, it is a distinct honour to be able to rise in the House this afternoon to associate myself with the comments and the initiatives of the Hon. Member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). He has clearly and well expressed the fact that his work is the continuation of the work of our former late colleague, Mr. Walter Baker. It is also an opportunity to participate in that the Hon. Member for St. John's East presented this Bill and its subject material with the dignity, concern and sensitivity that the subject deserves. In that as well he was following no better example than that of our late colleague.

• (1730)

Members of Parliament often have to take positions on controversial issues, issues where other members of society might say it is easier to take no position at all. This is one of those issues. It is also incumbent on Members of Parliament to make value judgments on issues where our training or experience does not give us any technical background on which to make an assessment. The only background or preparation for that kind of decision is one's understanding of society and one's sensitivity to society and to those events which bind us all as human beings. What we are discussing today binds us all together in the most personal way.

The Bill that my colleague has put before the House has as its central theme making herein available for therapeutic use. It should be understood in that narrow context. I want the public who is watching and those who will read this debate later to understand clearly that what we are doing in this House today is not legalizing heroin. That is important to understand.

It is ironic that in order for this matter to be debated one of the arguments put forward is that it could create heroin addicts, that there might be problems of control in our hospitals, medical clinics and doctors' offices. It is ironic in that that ban being there has not stopped the illicit trade in heroin in billions, when whe are talking about money, nor in the destruction of life. The purpose of my colleague's Bill is the opposite, to enchace life.

I mentioned earlier that I am not a medical expert. What do the experts say? I went back to the Canadian Nurses Association who, as compassionate individuals in our hospitals, deal with this every day. What do they have to say on the subject? I quote one sentence from a document entitled "Statement to the Expert Advisory Committee on the Management of Severe Pain", dated August, 1983, submitted by the Canadian Nurses Association. It reads:

> Although major studies on the conceptualization and treatment of pain have demonstrated that pain can be adequately managed, far too many patients with cancer do not achieve the degree of pain relief that is possible.

That is what this Bill addresses. I know there is a debate going on within the Canadian Medical Association as to whether or not the therapeutic use of heroin would in fact achieve the goals that have been stated by my colleague. That is the reason we want this matter taken to the standing committee, so we can study the subject matter. I will come to that later when I get to that technicality. There is a debate in the medical community, and that is exactly the reason why I would suggest that debate should be brought to the standing committee. Let us look at the evidence. Let us look at the facts. I look forward to that opportunity.

Additionally, I read from an article by Jeanie MacFarlane which formed part of a larger presentation entitled "Pain, New Ways to Manage one of Man's Oldest Mysteries". There is an extensive study on pain and its effects. That has been in medical circles before, but with technology, with the whole question of what I think Dr. Kubler-Ross has brought so well to the public attention, the whole question of death and dying and the dignity that surrounds it, as well as the ethical questions that surrounds that fact of human life that all of us some day will face. It is important to read this sentence:

> It's such a powerful sensation—severe pain is real and naked and incapacitating. It's an equalizer, and it's one of the most dehumanizing things we ever endure.

Maybe nobody of our collective humanists has said it better than the poet John Keats. He said:

> Pleasure is oft a visitant; but pain clings cruelly to us.

I am honoured today to associate myself with the work of my friend and colleague from St. John's East. I will be moving in a minute that the subject matter of the Bill be referred to the appropriate standing committee. I hope that that committee can sit soon. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacLellan) is in the Chamber. He and I both realize that the study of the Canada Health Act will be concluded in the committee on Tuesday next by agreement. He has been co-operative in that committee. I look forward to that continued co-operation in the committee on this subject as well. I look forward to this subject being taken up quickly by that committee, not waiting until summer, and I also hope we will not hear the argument put forward that the Estimates are now before the committee. We could sit extra hours and bring in the experts that we need to hear on this matter.

Having made those comments, I want to move, seconded by—and I believe this to be an expression of further co-operation on this matter and a further recognition of the work of our late colleague—the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans):

> That Bill C-221 be not read a second time, that the order be withdrawn and the subject matter referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion (Mr. Epp) agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Accordingly, the order is discharged, the Bill is withdrawn and the subject matter thereof is referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Order discharged and Bill withdrawn.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Given that we have found unanimity on this item of Private Members' Business which is before us, may I suggest that perhaps you could call it six o'clock and we could move on to the adjournment debate?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Shall we call it six o'clock?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 45 deemed to have been moved.

MULTICULTURALISM—MEDIA PORTRAYAL OF VISIBLE MINORITIES. (B) USE OF VISIBLE MINORITIES IN ADVERTISING COMMERCIALS

Mr. Laverne Lewycky (Dauphin-Swan River): Mr. Speaker, I want to pursue a question I raised in the House on January 25 concerning media portrayal of visible minorities. This particular question is based upon a study conducted by Dr. Gary Granzberg of the University of Winnipeg which concluded that prime time television misrepresents, stereotypes and discriminates against blacks, Asians and native Indians. The study calls for the Canadian television networks to find ways to portray minority groups more accurately.

I would also like to acknowledge the fact that the President of the CBC responded regarding the serious statements which had been attributed to the Manitoba regional director of the CBC when commenting on the Granzberg study even though I did not find the President's comments totally satisfactory.

The multiculturalism directorate had previously conducted its own studies in areas such as the presence and portrayal of non-whites in English-language television advertising as well as the attitudes of the general public toward visible minorities in television commercials. These studies have always resulted in the same sort of conclusions, so there is no real need for the Government to wait until parliamentary committee and other reports are presented. By now, the federal Government has a good idea of the problems existing in the media's portrayals of visible minorities since the recommendations of these studies are very similar. Now is the time for the federal Government to act.

On another occasion, I made reference in the House to the excellent example set by Radio-Quebec with its Planète series on television. That series is perhaps a good model of multiculturalism in action. Documentaries have been made on some 20 various ethno-cultural groups in those various languages and shown to the people of Quebec. Of course, as an example I could specifically refer to the show about the Ukrainian holocaust. The Planète series is shown on prime time.

I would ask why the Minister is not acting on the conclusions of these various reports in order to see that guidelines and instructions are given for more adequate presentations in this regard. In other words, why is the Government not acting on this particular measure at this time?

[Translation]

Mr. Robert Gourd (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, in answering my hon. colleague, I can inform him that this is not true. The Government is not taking any action, and on the contrary, as my colleague, the Hon. Minister, said previously in the House on January 25, it was not the Ministry of State that ordered the study. It had simply given a grant to a professor last year, and the professor's decision to publish the results of that study had nothing to do with the Ministry.

I also understand that the CBC has clarified the statement attributed to its regional director in Manitoba. He indicates that he did not recall using remarks referring to financial disaster in connection with any affirmative action programs in relation to the media.

On the issue raised by this question, it would be inappropriate for me to comment at this time, given that the Special Parliamentary Committee on Visible Minorities will undoubtedly be considering this topic as part of its report, which I understand will be tabled shortly in Parliament.

GOVERNMENT DECENTRALIZATION—ANNOUNCED TRANSFER OF HEALTH AND WELFARE BRANCH FROM HALIFAX TO SYDNEY. (B) IMPACT ON EMPLOYEES

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, it is my purpose and intention to review in greater detail a matter which I raised in the House on March 8, 1984 by way of a question to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Gray). That matter concerns the transfer of employees of the Income and Securities Branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare from their current location in the Halifax area to the City of Sydney in Cape Breton. The chain of events that resulted in this proposed transfer of these employees goes back prior to 1979. Let me first mention the circumstances under which it was brought to more recent light.

A report in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald referred to a meeting attended by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) in honour of my good friend and colleague the Member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. MacLellan). The Secretary of State for External Affairs congratulated the Hon. Member on the fact that the Treasury Board had approved the expenditure of $500,000 to enable this transfer.

One of the unfortunate aspects of the whole situation is why this is being done. Is it simply to implement the policy that was established in the past when reasons for it may have existed, or is it being done simply to satisfy the special concerns and needs of members of the Liberal Party who represent these various areas of the Province of Nova Scotia? For that reason it is important to review the history of the matter.

Prior to 1979 the Liberal Government proposed the decentralization of government offices. That would have an understandable effect on government employees who would have to be transferred to these new locations. In 1979 when the Right Hon. Joe Clark became Prime Minister, a review was conducted of these proposals. The then President of the Treasury Board decided that in the interests of economy some of the proposals to decentralize and transfer employees would be scrapped. One of the proposals, namely, that of the previous Minister of National Health and Welfare, to transfer employees of the Income and Securities Branch at three locations across Canada to new locations, was scrapped. In 1979, the idea of moving employees from Halifax to Sydney was not only delayed but was actually abandoned.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) revised that proposal in June 1982, for two reasons. First, she said she wanted to integrate the staff dealing with the Canada Pension Plan, family allowances and old age security, and, second, she wanted to help create jobs.

The Public Service Alliance of Canada has given a full and complete answer to the Minister's proposal with respect to these transfers. It indicated that the transfers would involve $34 million and that the money could be spent more effectively on job creation and other programs. That should have been a complete answer. It was also clear that no benefit was to be derived from this transfer with respect to the more efficient administration of the programs.

• (1750)

As my colleague from Cape Breton and the Sydneys knows, I have the greatest admiration for Cape Breton, and the people in it. However, Halifax is the capital of Nova Scotia. It is the central spot and programs of this kind can be more effectively administered from that location.

However, Mr. Speaker, that is not my only concern. The fact is that there is a human element in this. The transfer involves over 60 employees, most of whom are in the low paid clerical bracket. In fact, over two-thirds of the employees involved earn between $14,000 and $21,000 in their clerical classifications. These are not the kinds of employees who can easily relocate to a totally different part of the Province, into a totally different atmosphere. In most cases, they are members of families who would not be involved in the relocation, second income earners, in some cases, who would prefer to remain with their spouses in the area in which they have perhaps lived their lifetimes. Notwithstanding these human considerations, government officials, aided and abetted by their political superiors, have charged on and sought to effect this transfer.

I stand here to appeal to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who apparently is the authority involved, and to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Gray), to the extent the Treasury Board is involved, to stop this unnecessary action right now. I understand that out of 23 employees involved in this transfer who were advised they must make a decision to move from Halifax to Sydney, 17 have refused to make the move. They have some benefits under Treasury Board regulations but, by and large, those benefits will not be effective because there are no jobs available in the federal public service in the Halifax area, nor, indeed, in the whole of the Nova Scotia and Atlantic regions. They are not going to be able to take advantage to any great extent of vacancies which might occur from time to time. In most cases it will simply result in the loss of their employment. In cases where the employees do make the transfer, they will be going to an environment which may be hostile to them at their particular stage of life.

My final request is an appeal to the authorities in government and in Parliament to end this move, to review the whole situation and decide that it is in the public interest to allow these employees to remain at their present location in Halifax.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I take great pleasure in replying to the remarks of the Hon. Member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby). I can assure him that the employees who are decentralized from Halifax to Sydney will not be going to a hostile environment. In fact, they will be treated most cordially and hospitably, as are all people who visit Cape Breton Island. The employees who will be decentralized number between 75 and 85.

This is a very important decentralization for Sydney. Sydney has a very high unemployment rate, as has the whole industrialized area of Cape Breton. This decentralization will not only create a federal presence on Cape Breton Island, not only create jobs which are badly needed, but because these jobs will be located in downtown Sydney it will help create a catalyst for the redevelopment of the downtown area.

The Hon. Member is right in one thing he said. The President of the Treasury Board under the former Tory administration did cancel the decentralization of Health and Welfare from Halifax to Sydney. When Hon. Members talk about patronage in ridings which are held by Liberal Members, then I feel the most blatant example of patronage which I have seen was the cancellation during the Clark administration of the decentralization to only those ridings in which there were Liberal Members.

The money which would be used for this decentralization cannot be better used, Mr. Speaker. These are permanent jobs and these jobs will have a spin-off with respect to the whole economy of the industrialized area of Cape Breton. The employees who are presently working with income security in Halifax, Mr. Speaker, have been given notice of the decentralized move. The decentralized move is not beginning until December. They have been assured they will be given first opportunity to other jobs in the federal service in Halifax. I have been assured it is very unlikely that even one of those people will not be placed. On the one hand there is the industrial area of Cape Breton with a very severe unemployment rate, and on the other hand the area of Halifax-Dartmouth which has one of the lowest unemployment rates in the country.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—FRIGATE CONSTRUCTION OF PROGRAM CONTRACTS. (B) REQUEST THAT MINISTER TABLE LIST OF CONTRACTS

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Mr. Speaker, I raise at this time the unsatisfactory response given to me by the Minister of Defence (Mr. Blais) earlier this week when I pressed him with respect to the Canadian Patrol Frigate Program and his commitment made in June of 1983 that two-thirds of the entire project would be awarded to Canadian firms. In replying to my question on Tuesday of this week the Minister said:

I will be pleased to provide the Hon. Member with as much information as can be made available, taking into account some commercial confidentialities that have to be maintained.

My request, very simply, was that the Minister's promise that two-thirds of the contract would be awarded to Canadian firms be maintained and that he identify the contractors which had been selected, so that we might be assured on an ongoing basis that that original promise was being kept. I know there may be a substantial difference between the promise of Government and the delivery.

I am mindful of the comment the Minister made with respect to this project on June 29 that two-thirds of the contract will be supplied by Canadian firms. I draw to the attention of the House a statement which appeared in the Speech from the Throne on December 7, 1983, that small scale entrepreneurs are the unsung heroes of the recovery. Small businesses are a perpetual source of inventiveness, valuable export earnings and vast job creation potential. To assist this sector an expanded "shop Canadian" program was to be launched.

I have had some rather unfortunate personal exepriences in dealing with the present Minister of National Defence when he served in his former portfolio as the Minister of Supply and Services. I approached him on behalf of a constituent of mine, Delavel Turbine Limited of Maple, Ontario. Delavel was among a number of competitors for a contract to be awarded by the National Research Council. Among the competitors were foreign suppliers of a similar product from Switzerland and West Germany. I interceded on behalf of my constituent and asked that special consideration be given because there were 400 employees of this firm whose jobs were substantially at risk in the event that this contract was not won. I pointed out that special subsidies were awarded to the foreign contractors by their governments and it was inappropriate that an award be made in the absence of special consideration of those hidden benefits and subsidies.

On April 18, 1983, I received a letter from the then Minister of Supply and Services, the now Minister of National Defence in which he said to me:

You will have received my reply to an earlier letter on this subject in which I advised that this particular procurement is subject to the GATT agreement on Government procurement with which all signatory countries are bound to comply. My understanding is that it is among the provisions of the agreement that no premiums for domestic content will apply to purchases that are governed by the agreement.

It was impossible, according to the Minister, to intervene on behalf of a Canadian supplier.

• (1800)

We are concerned in this patrol frigate program with a potential expenditure of $3.85 billion for the six ships. In the event that the Government does not on an ongoing basis supervise and examine the awarding of these contracts, I can assure you that by the time the contracts are fully awarded we will find that the Canadian content element will be substantially less than the two-thirds to which reference has been made by the Minister when he served as the Minister of Supply and Services, and by the Minister as he sits in the House today who commented favourably to my request for assurance earlier this week.

When I first came to Parliament I spent about two years serving on the Public Accounts Committee. It is a committee which examines matters after they have taken place. What I discovered with respect to the icebreaker program undertaken by the Government in terms of contract procurement was that mistakes were made that were extremely costly to the Government. But the matter was over. You could not go back and rectify something that had been done.

I am drawing this matter to the attention of the Government so that something may be done on an ongoing basis before all the contracts are awarded and the money is spent, when we begin to lament the inadequacy of representations that have been made to assure Canadian industry that they will get a fair share of this entire project.

One of the great tragedies about our defence procurement policies is that the electronics and the armament and weapon systems on the ships will all be bought off the shelves from a foreign nation. Regrettably, that is the result of the Government of the day failing to maintain an adequate armament industry in this country.

Not long ago the Minister spoke of the fact that he acquired small arms for Canadian soldiers. He indicated that the contract was going to cost twice as much as a similar supply of material in the United States, but that it would be made-in-Canada production. The reason we are in that predicament is that unfortunately our defence industry has shrunk, almost vanished. It is clearly time that we begin to protect Canadian industry. By supervising carefully the awarding of these contracts we will be doing just that.

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to say in all fairness that the question as discussed, with specifics brought to the attention of the House, is unfair inasmuch as I only have three minutes to respond. The question does not cover that which the Hon. Member has raised in the House and on which this debate is based. I would suggest to the Hon. Member for York North (Mr. Gamble) that he should bring the specifics of this question before the Minister of Defence at a meeting of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence. He should provide the Minister with the details and obtain the answers he seeks from him. He will in that way get the response he wants.

In the meantime I want to talk generally about what is happening in the specific field covered by the question. That is, what is the Canadian content and what are the industrial offsets of the Canadian Patrol Frigate Program which is now in force and which has been in effect for approximately a year.

I want to assure the member that there is no doubt that this is not the first defence contract of this magnitude the Government has undertaken. The ability to negotiate substantial benefits to Canadian industry in this very complex environment is well proven by the efforts involving the new fighter aircaft, the Aurora aircraft program, as well as the Leopard program.

Even though the CPF contract is only beginning, we are fully confident that what the Government set out to do, that is, acquire an excellent weapons system while at the same time maximizing benefits to Canada is achieved. The contractor's commitment to the Government is to achieve at least $1.6 billion, two-thirds in Canadian content and one-third in offset benefits. This represents approximately two-thirds of the contract target price, less federal sales tax. The commitment is to be achieved over the life of the contract and is made up of specific sums for each contract year. The first contract year will end on March 31, 1984.

Keeping in mind that the time for adjournment debate does not permit any further discussion, I will give the Hon. Member the list of the contracts he seeks and, of course, welcome him to the next meeting of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence at which the substance of his argument can be debated in greater detail.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow morning at eleven o'clock.

At 6.05 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

BOY SCOUTS OF CANADA

FOURTH LEAMINGTON SCOUT TROOP—PRESENTATION OF CITIZENSHIP AWARDS

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Essex-Kent): Mr. Speaker, this morning several young Canadians attended in the precincts of this House and obtained their gold and silver citizenship awards in a ceremony that was rather impressive to all who saw it. That they come from the Fourth Leamington Scout Troop is, of course, important to me, but I think they represent the best of what scouting stands for in all of Canada. This is something I am sure is important to all of us in this House.

Their leadership demonstrates that voluntarism is alive and well in Canada, and that we as Canadians can conclude from these achievements that a bright future lies ahead for Canada as a result of what they have achieved and of what the volunteers who are behind them have allowed them to achieve.

PENITENTIARIES

INMATE UNIVERSITY EDUCATION PROGRAM

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, last year the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) announced that he was terminating innovative educational programs offered in nine federal penitentiaries by four Canadian universities. These programs were of proven worth since only 14 per cent of prison students become repeat offenders, compared to 52 per cent of all prisoners.

Following sustained pressure from Members in all Parties in the House, the Minister reversed his decision and announced he would reinstate the program. However, the Minister's policy on the reinstated program is subverting its goals. He called for bids from universities over the Christmas period, giving them from three to seven weeks to bid for a three-year contract. The main obstacle, however, to an adequate re-implementation of the program is the Minister's insistence on charging fees for the inmates. On the surface, $40 per course does not seem much, but when prisoners earn $3 a day and have to pay for toothpaste and other personal items out of this, it is a lot of money. Not surprisingly, the correctional service is experiencing difficulties in working out arrangements with universities. These difficulties are so great that one official from correctional services recently suggested to the University of Victoria that it sub-contract the first two years of its program to a community college whose courses are free to inmates.

I urge the Solicitor General to re-think his misguided attitude toward the reinstatement of these valuable and cost-effective courses.

MEDICAL CARE

LICENSING OF FOREIGN TRAINED DOCTORS

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, a serious problem is developing in licensing foreign trained medical doctors to practise in Canada.

The foreign trained doctors to whom I am referring fell into two categories. The first consists of Canadian citizens who were not accepted at Canadian medical schools and received medical training in foreign medical schools.

The second category is composed of foreign born doctors who have fled hostile environments and have received landed immigrant status. In southern Ontario alone there are approximately 600 such doctors, with an estimated 100 coming from Poland. Not all of these are in the refugee class. While most of these doctors have successfully completed the Medical Council of Canada's evaluating examinations, the shortage of residency training facilities seriously impedes their chances of completing their internship requirements to qualify for licensing examinations.

I urge the Provincial Colleges of Physicians and Surgeons and the Medical Council of Canada to initiate whatever measures are necessary to solve this problem so that these foreign trained physicians can commence work in their chosen profession.

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA

ABSENCE OF CODE OF CONDUCT FOR PARLIAMENTARIANS

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, what standard governs the public and private affairs and activities of a parliamentarian who holds a seat in the House of Commons or the Senate of Canada? Our new Constitution Act and the Statutes of Parliament offer no real guidance. Indeed, those few obligations that are imposed are couched in language best described as vague and uncertain.

The responsibility for the absence of a clear code of conduct must be borne by parliamentarians, past and present. Yet circumstances are continually arising in which individual parliamentarians must assess their own actions to determine whether they have violated any recognized standard of behaviour.

The process of personal self assessment is difficult for anyone, but for an elected representative sworn to perform parliamentary duties it is a nearly impossible task. Only vague legislative provisions and obscure historic precedents are present as guides. The answer to questions of personal conduct can only be found in the heart and soul of the person who examines his or her own conscience.

• (1110)

It is in that context that Canadians should consider the decision of the Hon. Member for Scarborough East (Mr. Gilchrist) to resign from the House of Commons. I am certain no code of conduct, however strict, enacted by Parliament, would ever require a Member of the House of Commons to resign while judicial proceedings were pending and the verdict not finalized. Nonetheless, the Hon. Member for Scarborough East has imposed upon himself a higher standard of conduct, one dictated by his own conscience and not imposed by any legal authority. No one has the right to stand in judgment on another but, if judgment is rendered, it must be that our colleague acknowledged a higher command—

Mr. Speaker: I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member, but his allotted time has expired.

DISARMAMENT

PEACE PETITION CARAVAN CAMPAIGN

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, Hon. Members of the House should be aware that a country-wide peace petition campaign has been officially launched. Called the Peace Petition Caravan Campaign, organizers and thousands of participants hope to impress upon Hon. Members, upon candidates for the next federal election, and upon the three political Parties, the urgency of ending the arms race and the critical need to end Canada's participation in it.

The campaign has four stated goals—no Cruise testing, declaration of Canada as a nuclear weapons-free zone, conversion of arms industries to other industrial production, and a free vote in Parliament on those issues.

It is a pleasure to tell Hon. Members of the House and concerned Canadians working for the Peace Petition Caravan that all of us in the New Democratic Party support the campaign and heartily endorse its four goals. In fact, we have been working toward the same goals and publicly advocating them for some time.

In the House it has been the NDP which has twice brought forward motions for no Cruise testing in Canada, motions defeated by the combined opposition of the other two Parties. We have raised, time and again, questions about Cruise testing, and we have brought forward Private Members' Bills to declare Canada a nuclear weapons-free zone. All of us, and all NDP candidates for the next federal election, support the goals of the Peace Petition Caravan Campaign. I urge other Members and other Parties to do the same.

THE ECONOMY

CONDEMNATION OF GOVERNMENT POLICIES

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, the chickens of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) are coming home to roost. His February Budget did nothing to restore confidence in the ability of the Government to run the financial affairs of Canada which, I might remind the House, have been on a downhill skid ever since the days of John Turner.

The Grit ruse of using the recession to disguise its failure to address the underlying cause of high interest rates and inflation, is ended. Today's prime rate of 11.5 per cent, up half a per cent as a result of increases in the bank rate yesterday, foreshadow higher mortgage rates and a consequent decline in residential construction and industrial activity.

Canada is bleeding foreign reserves in a vain attempt to prop up a sick dollar and an even sicker Liberal popularity. Inflation is up again—last month at an annualized rate of over 7 per cent—giving the lie to the Liberal six and five program. How much longer must we tolerate this nonsense? We must have an election, and we must have it now.

AIRPORTS

HAMILTON CIVIC AIRPORT—EFFECT OF CONSTRUCTION WORK ON HAMILTON FLYING CLUB

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, once again I wish to draw to the attention of the House the problems of Hamilton Civic Airport. For those Hon. Members who may not instantly recall the runway configurations at Mount Hope, let me outline what is happening as a result of the airport's expansion. Expansion is not the issue. All of us in the greater Hamilton area welcome the upgrading of our dilapidated airport to first-class regional status.

What concerns me and my constituents is the financial hardship this construction is causing members of the Hamilton Flying Club. This club was established in 1928 and is already having trouble keeping its head above water, or above the clouds, as the case may be.

Regional officials of Transport Canada decided to close down the main runways 6 and 24 for four months beginning June 1, 1984. In addition, Transport Canada is closing down the east-west runway. It is runway 24 that the northwest winds favour during the summer months, and that is the peak period for pilot training at Hamilton Civic Airport.

Transport Canada is demanding extra ramp charges and rentals for buildings at the airport, in keeping with the Department's policy when airport development is proceeding. In my view this is highly premature and unfair. Surely Transport Canada should not be trying to kill all flying operations during improvements which benefit the entire Hamilton region. Surely the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro), who is aware of the situation, could consult with his colleague, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Axworthy), somewhere along the campaign trail—

Mr. Speaker: I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member, but his allotted time has expired.

FISHERIES

STORAGE OF LOGS IN COWICHAN RIVER ESTUARY—EFFECT ON FISH HABITAT

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, our Party and everyone else concerned about the West Coast fishery have been very skeptical about the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. De Bané) and his policy of trading off fish habitat in one area for so-called enhancement in another. On December 20 the Minister assured the House that there would be a public process whereby all sectors would have the opportunity to put forward their views.

Last week the Department approved one of these trade-offs in the Cowichan area. There was no public process to hear the views of local people or of their elected representatives. They could not even get information about what was happening. Under the agreement, Doman Industries Limited gained the right to store logs on an increased area of the estuary, an action that will adversely affect fish habitat. In exchange it has dedicated 23 acres of farmland for habitat. This will be dyked at public expense, and Doman retains the right to pasture cows in the area.

Trading part of the estuary for a cow pasture cannot be described as no-net loss of fish habitat. It is a sellout of a public resource to private interests. I call on the Minister to reverse this so-called no-net loss policy, and to protect fish habitat so that we will continue to have a fisheries resource on the West Coast.

Oral Questions

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE ECONOMY

CONSEQUENCES OF GOVERNMENT'S POLICIES

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance who brought down a Budget about a month ago in which he said: "My budget today is dedicated to building a strong and growing economy." Since that Budget was brought down, every indicator revealed has shown the exact opposite. Today the inflation rate is up again to a 5.5 per cent increase year-over-year. The underlying trend of the inflation rate is even higher; it is over 7 per cent. As the Minister knows, the dollar has depreciated from over 81 cents and is now struggling to remain above 78 cents. Interest rates are up. The prime rate of the banks is going up to 11.5 per cent. The Bank of Canada rate is up. The unemployment rate has been up two months in a row—11.3 per cent, 1,476,000 people.

I could go on and on, with every indicator, capacity utilization, and so on. All are bad. The Minister brought down his Budget about a month ago. These are the economic facts that have been revealed since. What does he plan to do to arrest this trend? What action does he plan to take to bring Canada back into a recovery? What is he going to do? His Budget has obviously been a complete failure.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to see that the Hon. Member has finally taken time to read the Budget. However, I would like to point something out to him in case he did not read other statistics that came out recently. I remind him that the retail sales for January, the latest figures available, were up significantly. Industrial production is up significantly. We had a record trade surplus in January, higher than in any previous month. In February we created 54,000 new jobs. Employment has been increasing steadily.

The Hon. Member referred to the inflation rate. I forecast in my Budget that in 1984 we would have an inflation rate of around 5 per cent. As the Hon. Member knows, the latest increase is due in great part, according to the Statistics Canada statement, to an increase in food products, resulting in particular from bad weather conditions in the United States. This is affecting the cost of fresh produce. These are the facts. Every indication is to the effect that the Canadian economy will know a strong rate of growth this year, with a reasonable level of inflation.

• (1120)

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Minister says that 54,000 new jobs were created. The unemployed will say: "Tell it to the marines," and there are 1,476,000 of them. The rate of unemployment has risen.

Oral Questions

MINISTER'S POSITION

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, the Minister might note that in Britain yesterday the banks lowered their prime lending rate to 8.5 per cent from 9 per cent. That is happening in a country with a Government which is attempting to do something about the economy rather than just talk and do nothing.

Inflation is up, the unemployment rate is up, interest rates are up; the Canadian dollar is down, business investment is down, real incomes are down, and of course the Government should be out. There is no trade-off between any of those areas. Normally unemployment would go down if the inflation rate is going up. However, in this whole series of statistics we see no trade-off. Will the Minister tell us what he is going to do now to correct the situation? Every indicator is bad, and there are no trade-offs. What is the Minister going to do?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, after hearing the Hon. Member I think that the main bad indicator is that of the decline in support for the Tories because of their panicky behaviour in this House and elsewhere.

The Hon. Member has a great deal of admiration for the situation in the United Kingdom. I remind him that in that country the unemployment rate is around 13 per cent at the present time, and the inflation rate is higher than it is in Canada. I believe it is around 8 per cent or 9 per cent. That is the great model which a Tory government would propose to the country. I can understand it if the Canadian people are saying to the Official Opposition: "Thank you very much, but we would rather pass and keep you fellows in opposition".

REQUEST FOR GENERAL ELECTION

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, if the Minister thinks that the popularity of some other political Party is declining, why does he not persuade the Prime Minister to call an election? Or is he waiting for the new emperor who does not have any fiscal clothing either?

Let me ask the same question of the Minister again. There are 1,476,000 people who are unemployed. The real personal disposable income of every person is down, and the cost of living is going up for everyone. Interest rates are going up and will stop any pretence of economic recovery. You are the Government. You have been the Government for four years and you are a miserable failure. What are you going to do about it? What steps are you going to take?

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I invite the Hon. Member to address his remarks to the Chair, please?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to see that the Hon. Member is losing his cool again. I must say that one good reason why an election is not being called now is to allow the public to see more and more of what kind of alternative exists on the other side. It is quite clear that, the more they look at it, the less they like it. The Canadian people are becoming more and more aware that the Hon. Member has taken the position that the public should not know where he stands because, as he said: "If you knew what we would do, we would never get elected." It is becoming more and more obvious to the people across the country what that Party would do to the country if it were ever chosen. That is why it is going down the drain.

As far as we are concerned, we have announced a set of policies in the April Budget of 1983, and are pursuing those policies through the Budget of February 15, 1984. They are policies which will ensure consistent, steady and solid growth for the country over the next few years. We will not engage in any knee-jerk reactions. We will provide stable, solid leadership to the country in the economic field, as we will in other fields, and that is what the people of the country want.

REQUEST FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE GOVERNMENT SPENDING PROGRAMS

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, it is clear that the world has lost confidence in the Government despite the policies of April and February, because interest rates have risen, the unemployment rate has risen, and mortgage costs have risen. Everything goes up except the value of our currency. In view of this enormous lack of confidence, I wonder if the Minister would accept some advice from the House.

• (1125)

Would the Minister get the President of the Privy Council to appoint a special committee of the House to examine, in the broad range, the spending programs of the Government and the borrowing programs of the Government, so that the House could be responsible for some of the things that are happening and that it could have an input, thus giving the Minister assistance?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the official critic loses his cool, and the assistant, or substitute critic, is verging on the ridiculous.

There is a Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs; estimates are before that committee; the Committee is sitting, so there is the possibility for examining the Estimates of all Departments before the committees at great length. If the Conservatives have anything to propose, or suggest, they can do it before those committees any time they want, or they can do it in the House. Last Monday we had an opposition day debate on a motion put forward by the Conservative Party, but they did not have a single constructive idea to put forward—not the beginning of an idea.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: You would not know a constructive idea.

Mr. Lalonde: The Conservatives have had plenty of opportunities to express their viess, but we know they have none. That is what the public is finding out, more and more. Those guys have no policies; they do not know whether they are coming or going, and they are just showing their divisions and their inability to come out with anything worth-while for the country.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Your nose is growing.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, through his rhetoric the Minister is trying to patch over the problems the country faces. There is a tremendous lack of confidence, and we are asking for something to restore confidence.

GOVERNMENT'S SPENDING PLAN

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, the Minister knows that the present committee system does not work effectively in policing the over-all spending program of the Government, nor does it do anything with respect to the over-all borrowing requests of the Government.

What we are asking the Minister to do is to come up with a new program. He has had his six and five program, but that did not work. He has proposed a 4 per cent program, and that did not work. Will he take the House into his confidence and have a special committee of the House go over the over-all spending plan for the Government?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is referring to the situation in Canada. I may remind him about the present situation in North America. He must have noticed that both interest rates and the rate of inflation have increased in the United States. Our two economies are extremely interdependent, and there is certainly no question of a lessening of confidence in the Canadian economy. What is happening now is specifically a North American phenomenon, and the Hon. Member is aware of the close interdependency between the Canadian and American economies. About his suggestion that the Opposition should be able to examine the full range of the Government's spending, that is exactly why annually, the Estimates for the various Departments are referred to the Standing Committees. Today, at this very moment, parliamentary committees are sitting to discuss the Estimates. If the Opposition has any useful ideas to propose, it can easily do so before these Committees or in the House. There have been Opposition days and there will be more. There is Question Period. At this very moment we are having a debate in the House on the Government's borrowing authority and the Opposition has ample opportunity to propose initiatives it would like to take. However, the only suggestion we have received was not made in the House. It was made by the Official Opposition Critic, who said that as far as he was concerned, he would cut family allowances and old age pensions. This was later denied by his Leader. I am very anxious to see when those two will reconcile their differences and we will be able to find out what the Progressive Conservative policy is on this issue.

INCREASE IN RATE OF INFLATION—EFFECT ON INTEREST RATES

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Finance. Over the past three years we have seen the inflation rates of the country increase, and because of this fixation, this traumatization that has occurred around an increase in inflation, the Government has always responded by increasing interest rates. The idea has been to increase interest rates and throw thousands of Canadians out of work in an effort to bring down the rate of inflation. Well, over the past number of weeks and months we have seen a gradual increase in inflation. We see it again today. Can we expect the same kind of behaviour by the Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada in terms of the typical knee-jerk and mindless response to this increase in inflation? Are we going to see interest rates increased?

• (1130)

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Government does not increase interest rates. The slight increase in inflation we have known this month is not one which will lead the Government somehow to direct that there should be an increase in interest rates. This is not how the economy works, and my friend knows it.

The fact is that interest rates had been edging up in the United States before they started edging up in Canada in the last several weeks.

I am confident that the increase in rates we are seeing at the present time is not going to be substantial. I hope it will not be long lasting. The evolution of the situation in the United States, in particular, is being followed very carefully, and there is every reason to believe that we will not see large increases in interest rates over the next several weeks.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER ORDER REDUCTION OF INTEREST RATES

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has got to stop hoping that interest rates are not going to increase, and stop wishing for a recovery. It seems to me that the Minister of Finance is at a crossroads. He is at a very important point. With the decreasing value of the dollar, the inclination is for him to increase interest rates. With the increase in inflation, the reaction is again to increase interest rates.

The Minister knows full well that with an increase in interest rates the recovery is not going to be sustained. Will the Minister of Finance take it upon himself to provide some leadership and face this problem, in terms of ensuring a prolonged, sustained recovery by stopping this increase in interest rates and taking some action in directing the Governor of the Bank of Canada to reduce interest rates?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, ever since my appointment I have tried to provide strong, clear, and responsible leadership on an economic basis. I certainly would not, however, follow the route suggested by my hon. friend, which is not only naive but would be irresponsible in the circumstances.

ROLE OF CHARTERED BANKS—INCREASE IN PROFITS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I think it is appropriate to point out that, because of the policies of the Minister of Finance, as he is trying to keep down interest rates and trying to provide economic leadership, the obvious winners have been the banks. We found out just the other day that in 1983 there were hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars in bank profits. As a matter of fact, the domestic profits of the Royal Bank of Canada were up 130 per cent in 1983 over 1982, some of the highest in Canadian banking history. Why is it that the Minister of Finance continues to take direction from the banks? Why does he not start paying some attention to the people of this country, and introduce an interest rate policy which reflects people as opposed to bank profits?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the more I hear the Hon. Member the more I think that he should be a member of the Social Credit Party rather than of the New Democratic Party.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: I am not saying the Social Credit Party of British Columbia. I mean the genuine Social Credit Party of Major Douglas himself.

I am not taking directions or instructions from the banks. I have consulted with all kinds of groups of Canadians in the preparation of last two Budgets, labour leaders, representatives of business, farmers, consumers, women's groups. This I have done and intend to continue to do. The policies I have put forward are policies which I have arrived at following all those consultations. They are aimed at helping the average Canadian and making sure that we will create jobs over the next few years in the private sector where the jobs should be created, particularly in the small and medium-sized business sector. This is the gist of my last Budget as well as of the previous Budget, and I intend to pursue those policies because I believe those policies are the ones which are going to be best for the country.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

ROLE OF BOARDS OF DIRECTORS

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the President of the Treasury Board I would like to address my question to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. The new Crown corporation legislation fails to address the priority problem with respect to the role of the boards of directors in Crown corporations. In light of the fact that Governor in Council appointments of chairmen and chief executive officers ignore all the recommendations of the Lambert Royal Commission, of the Auditor General and of the Public Accounts Committee, could the Right Hon. Prime Minister tell us why the Government has not addressed this most essential element in Crown corporation accountability?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Bill does address the subject, probably not in the way in which the Hon. Member would have done it, but that is not surprising. If the Hon. Member wants to argue the substance of the Bill, we will ensure that he will have a chance to do that early on second reading.

EXEMPTION FROM LEGISLATION OF INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT RESEARCH COUNCIL

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, if the Bill is so good why has it not covered, and in fact ignored, 109 mixed and joint enterprises and their subsidiaries? Perhaps the Right Hon. Prime Minister could also explain why the International Development Research Council has been given complete special exemption?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in the latter case it is because the IDRC is a very special type of corporation. As the Hon. Member probably knows, it is composed 50 per cent, roughly, of directors who are not Canadian citizens. They are nationals of other countries. This was done when the Bill was first passed by this Parliament more than ten years ago. It was to ensure that this agency, which is exemplary in the sense it is being used as an example for other countries which want to follow Canada's lead in establishing a research centre on North-South problems, will not be carrying out the policies of government. This corporation is in a very special situation, and that is why we have treated it differently.

As far as the first part of the question on directors is concerned, Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member refers to a lot of joint corporations. I do not know the examples he has in mind. However, they are not presumably Crown corporations. They are corporations in which the Government of Canada has some shares, but not the control.

TRADE

ACCESS FOR NEWSPRINT TO EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade. I want to draw his attention to the action by the European Economic Community in restricting duty free access for newsprint from 1.5 million tonnes to 500,000 tonnes. This action has now been referred to GATT. I want to know from the Minister just what the federal Government is doing to state the Canadian case before GATT and to ensure that this action is rescinded? Would the Minister also tell us whether he realizes just how serious the consequences of this kind of reduction would be to our pulp and paper industry in Canada?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Hon. Member for his interest in a very serious trading problem for Canada. We have carried on negotiations at all levels, including involvement by myself as Minister, over many months with the European Economic Community in an attempt to reach a settlement which would be reasonable from the point of view of Canada's interests and from the point of view of our producers of newsprint. These producers provide a great number of jobs based on that market, particularly in the Atlantic Provinces and eastern Quebec.

Unfortunately the European Economic Community has been unable to come forward with a proposal which would be accepted. Against that background, I have finally turned to GATT for Canadian rights to be protected. A GATT panel, which will be fully presented with the Canadian case, will make an adjudication upon its merits.

What the European Economic Community has done is to establish an interim quota of 500,000 tonnes. That does not mean that 500,000 tonnes is the total amount that we can ship, or that there may not be some flexibility beyond that point. However, there was not sufficient flexibility to provide a figure which would be acceptable to me, and it is on that basis that I have taken action to protect the Canadian interest.

• (1140)

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to know what the Minister has done to assure that GATT deals with this matter expeditiously so it can be resolved. It creates all kinds of uncertainty. As he knows, we ship more than 500,000 tonnes of newsprint to Europe, and the industry cannot absorb the proposed 10.5 per cent import tax. I would also ask the Minister what precipitated this action in the first place. Where is our system flawed in that we did not know this was coming on and we did not take the necessary steps to prevent this from happening in the first place?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the Hon. Member that if he had followed the issue and kept in touch with the unions and companies involved, or with my Department, he would know that we did indeed know the matter was coming on and that we did everything possible, through negotiations over a sustained period of time, to reach agreement with the Europeans. Indeed, we thought we were making substantial progress. Unfortunately they backed down from indications in that direction. I might say that the way the European community operates on some matters seems to indicate it must have agreement of all members, and it is the lowest common denominator, if you like, which may stop it from making a reasonable settlement.

However, this was brought on primarily by the fact that the European community has entered into a special arrangement on trade with the Scandinavian countries which now gives special access to newsprint from that area into the European market. European producers themselves, pressing for some limitation on the amount which can move on a duty-free basis into their area, turned to the NFM situation. We, as the largest supplier outside of Europe, are the ones most affected by what they propose to do. We certainly do have to ship them more than 500,000 tonnes, and I am confident that this year we will do so. I am also confident that our position will be vindicated at GATT.

EMPLOYMENT

WELFARE RECIPIENT—REFUSAL OF ACCESS TO GOVERNMENT SUBSIDIZED JOB

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is for either the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Employment and Immigration, and they can handle it together if they wish. What possible explanation can there be for a person, having run out of unemployment insurance benefits and ultimately being forced on welfare, being refused the opportunity to take a job for which there is a wage subsidy paid? Why would it be that a person on welfare would be considered less acceptable to be employed by an employer receiving a wage subsidy from the Government, than a person who is on unemployment insurance?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would like to know a little more about the context of the Hon. Member's quesiton. If he is referring to a specific case, I would be happy to look into it. If he is referring to a specific program requirement, I would like to know which program he is referring to so I can look into that.

CASE IN WINDSOR

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, in Windsor the employment branch of the Ministry refused to allow a welfare recipient, who had been employed for eight and a half years as a janitor and ran out of benefits in November of last year, to apply for a job for which a wage subsidy was being paid. He was told: "If you are on welfare, you do not qualify". What possible explanation can there be for a person, having exhausted his benefits and being forced onto welfare, being refused the opportunity to take a job?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it sounds to me as if either there is some selectivity or distortion. I am not arguing that there necessarily is.

Mr. Riis: It is your program.

Mr. Roberts: Either that is the case, or there has been a tremendous misunderstanding expressed in relation to one of our programs. If the hon. gentleman will give me the details of the person involved, I will check to see if someone has given the wrong information. Without the specifics, I cannot inquire into a specific case.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

SOCIAL HOUSING POLICY STUDY

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works who is responsible for CMHC. A study on social housing policy has been going on within CMHC for quite some time now. Could the Minister tell us the status of that study?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the final results of the study were circulated to provincial Governments and interested groups, and MPs, I believe. If not, I will be happy to send it. These organizations have been asked to prepare comments. Some have come forward, but I still have not had a complete enough reaction to be able to indicate when the policy recommendation would come forward. I hope to do that before the summer.

SPECIAL RECOVERY CAPITAL PROJECTS PROGRAM

HALIFAX WATERFRONT COMPLEX

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works as well, involving the Special Recovery Capital Projects for the City of Halifax. In April of 1983 his colleague, the Hon. Member for Halifax, announced a $51 million office complex for the Halifax waterfront. Ten months went by, nothing happened, and then the same Member announced a $30 million complex for another part of the city. Can the Minister of Public Works explain just what is going on? Will he take the opportunity to tell us how it comes about that a $51 million waterfront complex shrinks to a $30 million office building in another part of the city? What has happened to all the architectural drawings and processes, not to mention the loss of 1,000 jobs that were promised?

Mr. Regan: That will not save your seat.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that if I were to get a building worth $30 million, or $50 million, or $20 million, or $10 million in my city, I would be very happy and proud. The fact is that there has been some delay because of the difficulty in obtaining the site for the building. However, after difficult negotiations we have had to resort to expropriation, which process is now underway. Meanwhile planning for the building and preparing specifications for tendering are going on, and I expect the matter will be resolved in six or eight weeks.

STARTING DATE INQUIRY

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, that is a new twist for the Liberal Party. They used to say: "What's a million?" Now they are saying: "What's $20 million?" Why was the project reduced from the $50 million initially proposed, which would have provided 1,000 jobs according to the Hon. Member? I want some guarantee from the Minister, not from the Member for Halifax who has made many promises, that this project will go ahead. I would like to know when it will start, that is to say, when do you start employing people and stop having press conferences?

Mr. McDermid: He has announced it six times.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the project will go ahead with the enthusiastic support and assistance of my colleague, the Minister of State for International Trade, and in spite of the carping criticism of the Hon. Member.

Mr. Crosby: We will see.

HEALTH

ST. REGIS INDIAN RESERVE STUDY

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare who yesterday released volume I of Dr. Selikoff's study on environmental contamination of Cornwall Island. This past January I spoke to an associate of Dr. Selikoff in New York who told me that the study was complete and would be in the hands of the Department by mid-February. It is now mid-March, and I would like to ask the Minister why, one month later, only one part of this report is being released.

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the study on the contaminants found in the reserve is in fact, up until now, already 18 months late. We have been putting on pressure in all ways, including a letter from the Department of Justice, but I do not want to turn the problem into a legal one. We have no reason to worry, other than the fact that Dr. Selikoff and his team have undertaken maybe too much work at the same time.

• (1150)

What we received yesterday, and that I released immediately, was the first part of the health study giving the results of the fluoride level in the blood of the people living on the St. Régis Reserve. I think it is important to have the first part at least completed and released into the hands of the Indians who are before the tribunal in the United States, and who, I hope, will be able to make use of that study.

REQUEST FOR SPEEDY RELEASE OF REPORT

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Mr. Speaker, the taxpayers have spent some $1.6 million on this study, and we have waited for it for a total of four years. The Minister has only released the part that relates to the fluoride emissions. What about other contaminants that have been studied, such as mercury, mirex, and PCBs, that have been found in the bloodstream of Indians on that reserve? Can the Minister assure us that she will not keep the remainder of the report under wraps any longer and will release the rest of it to the House immediately?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that anyone who has worked with researchers is well aware of the problem often associated—too often, unfortunately—with getting a report out of their hands. I think we should not read any bad faith or other problems into it.

The first part is concluded. We released it immediately. We will do the same thing, and continue to press for a report on mirex, PCBs, and mercury, which are the other three contaminants that Dr. Selikoff and his team are studying at the Mount Sinai school in New York.

THE ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT JOB-CREATION PROGRAMS

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Talking about ridiculous, I would say that he is the one in this House who is ridiculous. The Minister says the Government has no effect on interest rates; however, 92 per cent of savings goes toward government consumption. Unemployment in the United States has gone down, whereas it has risen in Canada. While the Government has introduced some excellent tax breaks for successful businesses, what will it do to create new employment in new enterprises, to get the country going and create jobs for Canadians?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to hear the tribute the Hon. Member is paying to the measures that the Government has already announced in the last two Budgets. It is nice to hear this from the Conservative side, and I hope he will have a word with their finance critic to convince him of the value of the measures that the Government has announced.

As far as the creation of new jobs is concerned, I remind my hon. friend that I introduced measures, in the last Budget particularly, to help small and medium sized businesses. The simplification of the taxation field will generate about $150 million in tax savings for that very important sector of our economy.

I also remind him that in the area of support for small business, the investment tax credits and the research and development tax credits are in operation at the present time and available to those who want to get into business. As well, the incentives and support provided by the taxation sector in Canada compare quite favourably with the incentives provided in almost any other industrialized country. In the last Budget we provided $2.4 billion worth of tax incentives to the private sector. That is the sector from which the jobs will be created fundamentally in this country.

We have several billions of dollars in expenditures in terms of job training, direct job creation in the public sector, and for temporary jobs, in order to alleviate the high level of unemployment that we know at the present time. However, it will fundamentally be through the private sector that the jobs will be created.

Mr. Fennell: What the Government is missing is confidence on behalf of investors and entrepreneurs to start new businesses.

EFFECT OF INTEREST RATES ON NEW EMPLOYMENT CREATING ENTERPRISES

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, the fact that interest rates have risen another one-half per cent frightens people off. What will the Minister do about interest rates to provide security and create new enterprises in Canada?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member knows, interest rates have come down quite significantly over the last two years, from approximately 22 per cent to 11 per cent. So there has been a very significant decline.

My hon. friend should not panic because there is a slight increase in the interest rates taking place at the present time. For instance, he knows that we have put forward a proposal for mortgage rate interest protection in the housing area. This proposal has been extremely well received by the housing industry, and I hope to be able to come to the House with a specific Bill in the next several weeks which I hope will have broad and strong support from the Opposition so that the legislation can come into effect and, indeed, provide the type of security that Canadians wish, and for which the Hon. Member is asking. This will provide a great deal of security to Canadian home owners and potential home buyers concerned about increases in interest rates.

As far as the general business sector is concerned, the Hon. Member knows that we expect that, both in Canada and the United States, in spite of temporary increases in interest rates there will be a decline in interest rates over the year.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

NEGOTIATION OF AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. In two weeks the Young Offenders Act will be proclaimed and to date there has been no announcement of any appropriate funding arrangements with any of the provinces. Would the Minister apprise the House of whether any agreements have actually been signed and, if so, what the nature of those agreements is?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, no agreements have in fact yet been signed. However, a federal offer has been on the table for well over a year and a half. Last week I did make that offer public. I would be prepared to send the Hon. Member, and any other Members, a copy of the proposal of the federal Government. I think he would agree, after he read it, that it was a very fair and reasonable contribution for the federal Government to be making to a program for which it has no constitutional responsibility at all to contribute to financially. Nevertheless, a very substantial offer has been put forward.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: It is certainly not a question of whether I feel that the offer is generous or otherwise. The problem is with respect to whether the provinces feel that this offer is appropriate.

ROLE OF PROVINCES IN ENFORCING LAW

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the offer that he has made—the $45 million, 50-50 split on the operational aspects of the program—what will the Minister do with respect to this program if the provinces do not accept his offer, having stated his intention to proclaim this Bill on April 1? How will he ensure that there will be even handed application of the law relating to young offenders across the country if the provinces are not going to co-operate with the Minister?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I have not heard of any province that is not prepared to co-operate and discharge its responsibility pursuant to a law which this Parliament unanimously passed. The provinces can be looked to, to govern themselves accordingly. I am sure they will recognize, as they must, that in the interest of decent treatment for young offenders, the new law ought to be applied evenly across the country. We look to the courts for the proper application of law, and I do not think the courts will let us down either.

As far as our financial responsibilities are concerned, when the new law is proclaimed, old funding arrangements will cease to be valid in many cases across the country because we had different agreements with different provinces, all of them covering the same basis of contributions. For some provinces the agreements will terminate.

At the moment it is hypothetical to ask what we will do in the event that no agreements are signed before then, because more than two weeks remain and I am optimistic that agreements can be signed before that time.

EMPLOYMENT

YOUTH OPPORTUNITIES PROGRAM—EXTENT OF FUNDING

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration is supplementary to that asked by the Member for Ontario. There was $150 million set aside in the Budget for the Youth Opportunities Program. First, could the Minister tell us how that money is to be spent and how much is to go into Career Access? Second, will he tell us if he intends to put the $90 million left over from the SEIP slush fund into Career Access, which now only has a total budget of $300 million?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first question is that proposals are being prepared for Cabinet consideration on the $150 million that my colleague, the Minister of Finance, provided to augment the Youth Opportunity Fund, bringing it to an over-all total of $1.3 billion. The Cabinet documents for the distribution of those funds are being prepared now, but Cabinet has not yet considered them. Therefore, I cannot give an indication to the Hon. Member of how those funds will be allocated.

• (1200)

The answer to the second part of the Hon. Member's question is, no, I do not intend to make the transfer out of the Special Employment Initiatives Program that he has recommended. I have received recommendations for a large number of projects, many of them coming from Members of the Opposition, which can legitimately be considered within that program.

FISHERIES

SEAL HUNT—UNITED KINGDOM COMPANY'S BAN ON CANADIAN FISH PRODUCTS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct my question to the Hon. Minister for Fisheries and Oceans. On March 13, 1984, in response to my question calling for a ban on the clubbing of white coat seal pups, the Minister said that it was not necessary since his Department was in touch "with every single important buyer of Canadian fish" and that not one of them was boycotting our products.

Yesterday one of the directors of Safeway, which has over 100 large stores in the United Kingdom, telephoned me, informing me that his company has asked all wholesale fish suppliers in England not to ship any fish caught in Canada, whether it has been canned, is whole, or mixed with fish from another country. Will the Minister in light of that fact, which contradicts his statement in the House, set the record straight, and now tell this House what he plans to do about this issue, so that our fishermen and plant workers will not soon be unemployed?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to the Hon. Member that the situation is monitored on a daily basis. I receive a daily report from our marketing directorate. I do not think it is conducive to the public interest to give a full, detailed report of the situation.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deans: I think you will regret that one.

Mr. De Bané: I do not think if you really have the interest—obviously you are not from a fishing area, Mr. Deans—

Mr. Speaker: Will the Minister please address the Chair?

Mr. De Bané: Today I had the Davis Report. All of the reports we have show that no buyer has cancelled any contract. On the other hand, because my hon. friend has a very important role as official spokesman for his Party on fisheries, I can arrange for him to have on a confidential basis a detailed report of the situation by my Department's officials. I do not think it is conducive every day in the House to say that we spoke to Mr. So-and-So in this or that company. We can give the Hon. Member a detailed report on the situation of each company. I am sure he is as dedicated as I am to the well-being of our fishermen and our fishing industry. I do not think it is proper for the Minister to give a report every day of where it is at.

Mr. Speaker: A short supplementary.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Minister for that answer. But in light of the information that has been conveyed to me, it is obvious that his own staff are not giving him the correct facts on this issue. I will accept a briefing.

NEWFOUNDLAND FISHING INDUSTRY

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I have a short supplementary question for the Minister. Since the restructuring of the Newfoundland fishing industry is simply not working, it has done nothing to date to help the 40,000—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With respect to the hon. Member, this is hardly a supplementary to his original question. The Chair recognized him, bearing in mind we have gone beyond the normal hour for Question Period. If the Hon. Member has a supplementary question, could it please be short?

Mr. Crouse: The sealers now have no income in Newfoundland, which is directly related to the first question. What does the Minister intend to do to assist not only those fishermen, but those in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island? These are independent companies that are being threatened by the situation at the present time.

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I do recognize the great interest of my friend in the situation. I reiterate to him my offer to give him a full briefing of the situation as of today. We can keep both the Hon. Member for South Shore and the spokesman for the New Democratic Party informed on a confidential daily basis, if they want. I think we would be shooting ourselves in the foot if we echo daily every piece of information that appears in the press. I can tell the Hon. Member that several companies have reported increased sales to me. However, I reiterate my offer because I know my hon. friend is a very responsible spokesman.

MR. FRIESEN—TESTING OF CRUISE MISSILE ON CANADIAN SOIL

MR. OGLE—TESTING OF U.S. NUCLEAR DEVICES

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition given to me by mothers and children from Ontario and other parts of Canada to the Honourable the House of Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled. The petition of the undersigned residents of Canada, who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your petitioners in the certain assurance that our Honourable House will therefore provide a remedy, humbly sheweth that at this critical period in a new cycle of nuclear weapons which could be unverifiable, Canada must give strong support to those parties in European governments who are refusing to accept the Cruise and Pershing missiles.

Wherefore the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon the Parliament of Canada to cancel any agreements for testing US nuclear devices or their delivery systems.

And as in duty bound your petitioners will ever pray.

The cost of acquiring these two subsidiaries was subsumed in the aggregate cost of acquiring Pacific Petroleums Ltd., i.e. $1,496,389,000 and the reason was because these subsidiaries constituted parts of a larger purchase.

(b) These subsidiaries have been "inactive" since their purchase by Petro-Canada.

2. Yes. (a) G.M.I. Co. (Bahamas) Ltd. and Petro-Canada Norway A/S are wholly-owned subsidiaries of Petro-Canada Inc. which is a wholly-owned subsidiary of Petro-Canada. G.M.I. Co. With reference to the revised answer to question No. 4,751 of the First Session of the 32nd Parliament, on the subject of the BP reidentification program (a) what amount constitutes "a standard agency commission" (b) apart from insertion and design costs, what costs were incurred in running the "series of advertisements designed to inform the public of the BP reidentification program"?

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Petro-Canada reports as follows:

(a) The requested information is proprietary to Petro-Canada.

(b) Apart from insertion costs of $483,845.74 and production and design costs of $25,116.96, which amounts included the standard agency commission, no other costs were incurred.

The figures provided in the revised reply to question No. 4,751 of the First Session, 32nd Parliament answered September 23, 1983 were cost estimates whereas the above-mentioned figures are actual costs.

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): The Department of Fisheries and Oceans (DFO) intends to continue with the orderly replacement and acquisition of new seagoing vessels in 1984. The program includes the five vessels currently under construction, two of which are expected to enter service this year. In addition in 1984 DFO intends to: (a) start the conversion of a large stern trawler into a fisheries research vessel; (b) acquire approximately 25 launches and small craft; and, (c) initiate contracts for the design of four new vessels and the mid-life refit of two vessels.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: The questions as enumerated by the Parliamentary Secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I rise at this point with respect to the performance which the Parliamentary Secretary indicated yesterday was a very successful performance with regard to the answering of questions. I have put a series of questions on the Order Paper which do not require intensive investigation or research. Indeed, I have received responses from one Ministry that I recall, Revenue Canada, which is preoccupied with other things these days. That Department had the ability to respond to the question concerning names, titles, and positions of all exempt staff for the Minister. The Parliamentary Secretary will know that I have a series of questions on the Order Paper relating to each Ministry of the Crown.

Security Intelligence Service

First, I am anxious to find out about the staff each Minister has. It is important for us to know this to make sure Ministers are attending to their duties. Second, I want to find out in each of those instances whether they receive any income, financial assistance, or benefit other than the designated money available for payment of exempt staff. These are important matters in terms of the Cabinet of the country and they should be answered immediately.

• (1210)

Would the Parliamentary Secretary give me some indication of how soon we might expect answers to these very important questions? There have been abuses with respect to Crown corporations such as Petro-Canada giving exempt staff of the Minister of Energy interest-free loans with respect to residences. I just want to ensure that there is a clean ship as far as the Government is concerned.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I will certainly look into those questions. We will have an answer for the Hon. member as soon as humanly possible. However, I would like to add that I have not heard of any cases where the privileges of exempt staff of Ministers were abused. I think the case mentioned by the Hon. Member was in fact an example of executive interchange, if I am not mistaken.

Mr. Nielsen: Nonsense.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House resumed from Friday, March 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Kaplan that Bill C-9, an Act to establish the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, to enact an Act respecting enforcement in relation to certain security and related offences and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof or in relation thereto, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Pierre Deniger (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to defend Bill C-9, which is aimed at establishing the Canadian Security Intelligence Service. My views are based on evidence collected over the last fifteen years. On the basis of this evidence, I believe that it is absolutely necessary to create a civilian security and control system. Two Commissions of Inquiry, the Mackenzie Commission in 1968 and the McDonald Commission in 1977, reached the same conclusion, namely, that the nature of policy operations is not the same as that of security operations. In other words, law enforcement and the duties of a security service are two distinct activities between which there is no comparison and which definitely require totally independent structures. Years of discussion and debate have made it clear that we must give the responsibility for collecting intelligence to an organization other than the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. That is the purpose of the Bill now being considered in the House on second reading. With this Bill, we want to give Canadian citizens the assurance that their individual rights and freedoms will be respected. It puts an end to the status quo and breaks with the uncertainties of the past and those of our present security intelligence system which has no framework, no public mandate, no judicial control and no independent or external review mechanism. In other words, Mr. Speaker, it has none of the controls that are essential to protect our society's rights and freedoms.

Breaking with the old formula was not easy, and the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan), who had to take up this challenge, did so with great skill. The Bill we are being asked to approve is aimed at establishing a civilian intelligence service, and the responsibilities of this service were defined to take into account those aspects that are fundamental to the concept of a security service under a democratic system of Government.

Mr. Speaker, in a democracy, a security service must maintain a delicate balance between the security of the State and the protection of democratic values; between the legitimacy of certain State secrets and the public's right to information; between the principle of ministerial responsibility and that of an autonomous service, free from all partisan considerations; and between the need for an efficient service and respect for the rule of law. Mr. Speaker, you will agree that with so many factors to be considered, any attempt to establish a civilian security service becomes a very complex undertaking. Furthermore, individual perceptions of the ideal balance between these multiple factors tend to differ. However, after many consultations, after listening to advice and seeking a consensus, the Solicitor General has come up with an end product that is more than satisfactory. Bill C-9 strikes a balance between democratic principles and the security of the State.

For instance, Mr. Speaker, at the present time, only the Solicitor General is fully responsible for security services. He is the only person outside the service who is kept fully informed of the service's activities. The secrecy that such activities necessarily entail prevent him, of course, from giving complete answers to Parliament, and owing to the confidential nature of security activities, often Parliament is not informed.

However, Mr. Speaker, Bill C-9 will considerably improve the situation. Under the new legislation, judges and not the Solicitor General will issue warrants allowing the service to exercise intrusive powers, and these warrants will be issued on the same basis as warrants issued today under the Criminal Code to authorize electronic surveillance.

Mr. Speaker, the inevitable result will be greater objectivity. After all, judges are not directly concerned by the success of an operation. Furthermore, every application for a warrant must first be approved by the Solicitor General, which means that as in the past, the Solicitor General will be accountable for the activities of his Department.

The new legislation provides further guarantees. There will be an external Security Intelligence Review Committee made up of Canadian citizens.

Mr. Speaker, Bill C-9 is the result of hard work and sustained efforts, and I support it without reservations. That is why I move, seconded by the Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans):

That the question now be put.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: No.

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I am really rather appalled at this procedural manipulation of the House. I want to point out that the Hon. Member who has just sat down is only the third member of the Government benches who has spoken in the whole length and breadth of this terribly important debate about a matter which could affect the civil liberties and security of every citizen of the country. This is merely a procedural manipulation, a half-hearted—and I could use another word—procedure by government Members which will rebound on them completely. If they want to gag the House and rush this Bill through the House, what they are doing is opening up the possibility that every single Member, whether or not he has spoken before in this debate, can now rise again in his place. I would suggest to the Hon. Member and to the Government House Leader, who was obviously behind this rather stupid move, that, if anything, it will delay the passage of this measure through the House.

For instance, one of the main principles missing from this particular Bill, on which I will not speak too long today, is the one about ensuring that employees and operatives of this new agency obey, and strictly obey, the rule of law. I do not intend to talk about that particular absence in the Bill even though it is a terribly important one, simply because some of my colleagues have already spoken about it and there will now be opportunities for them to speak again about it.

There are other measures which are terribly absent from the Bill which should protect and concern us all. One that has not been referred to by any Hon. Member yet—and I want to speak about it in the very limited time I have available to me today—is the terrible lack of control and monitoring in regard to electronic eavesdropping in the country at the moment, and as certainly would be the case if the Bill were passed in its present form.

● (1220)

I am not contravening my oath of office in indicating some of these concerns. I am not contravening the Official Secrets Act in publicizing some of the things I want to publicize in the House today. Anything I intend to say here today has already been published in Canada by others. I am prepared to back it up by showing anyone the articles, stories or books which are source material for the argument I am making today.

First let me indicate the extent of the problem. To eavesdrop on any person in this country, in any place at any time, no physical intrusion or trespass is necessary. The technology exists, for example, for anyone in the American Embassy on Wellington Street to eavesdrop on conversations taking place in offices in these Parliament Buildings, or vice-versa. One can buy a microphone on the electronic market here in Canada today that is smaller than a 25-cent piece but which can hear whispers through walls almost two miles away. In the early 1960s the Americans were able to listen to Krushchev having a conversation in a limousine by means of a satellite rebroadcast in space. Aimed parabolic microphones can pick up quite clearly conversations taking place ten miles away. Laser devices can be aimed at windows or even walls and can rebroadcast conversations by reproducing those conversations from the smallest measurable vibrations on those flat surfaces. Hundreds of sophisticated tape recorders are turning right now in Canada, recording conversations that have been activated by the use of certain code words or phrases which automatically turn them on.

The eavesdropping of conversations is one of the major and most efficient tools being used today in the battle against crime and the gathering of information of all sorts, both by public agencies and, I suspect, by private organizations. Internally, domestically here in Canada this industry is supposed to be controlled either by judicial warrant for criminal investigation or ministerial warrant for security investigations, or prohibited by law for private or personal use.

I suspect, although I have no proof, that accountable, effective control, supervision or prohibition, as the case may be, is largely illusory in this country. There is simply too much of it going on both within and without the Government. In this Bill, the authorization process for security targeting is moved from the Minister's office to the courtroom. A few monitoring or auditing group will have new inspection powers if they know, can find and put realistic controls and auditing practices on the use of the facilities. Obviously, I remain pretty skeptical but I am willing to see how it works out.

I am concerned that there is still at least one very large gap in this whole process over which neither the Minister nor this Bill seems to envisage any accountable control in any way whatsoever. The impression the Minister attempts to convey is that this Bill, in conjunction with Part IV of the Criminal Code which deals with criminal investigation, specifies that henceforth all legal authorizations for third party eavesdropping or the obtaining of information by electronic or other means will have to be judicially authorized. That quite definitely, quite seriously and quite dangerously is totally wrong.

We have a so-called ultra-secret agency in this country that quite closely works with, feeds into and extracts from both the huge National Security Agency's sprawling facilities and the computer complex in Fort George Mead in Maryland, Washington, and also the large listening and cryptological centre in the United Kindgom that has been in the news lately because of certain spy and union problems.

Canada's agency is mainly operational here in the Ottawa area and is called the Communications Security Agency, the CSE. I am willing to bet that most Members of Parliament here in the House today, and I surmise even some Cabinet Ministers, have never heard of the CSE. In the scheme of things, it is located under the jurisdiction of the Department of National Defence, although it is never listed in the Estimates, never mentioned in any budgetary item in this House or any of its committees and rarely appears on departmental organizational charts. I am also willing to bet that even some Ministers of National Defence have never heard of it.

The purpose of the three or more nation group is to monitor all telephone, telegraph, telex, microwave, or radio emission signals or messages anywhere in the world or in space, and they do it. Sensitive radio receivers tap microwave and satellite transmissions of telephone conversations, for instance, while a computer equipped with limited speech recognition capability quickly filters through thousands of tapes and intercepts by seizing on key words. It would not take too much imagination to believe that four triggering words would be "diplomat, terrorist, bomb" and "explosion". I leave it to Members to think of some of the other trigger words.

Decoding devices and unscrambling gear are obviously an integral part of its facilities. These agencies, Canada's included, obviously not only listen to international wave lengths. By their nature, they have the potential to listen in to everything and anything that hits the airwaves and more, both outside and inside Canada. Computer data banking information is fed by telephone facilities. Telephonic communications are carried on by microwave. Microwaves are intercepted by this agency.

I am not arguing that these facilities for both security and economic purposes are not necessary or useful. I am arguing that this Bill does not seem to recognize either that ministerial knowledge or judicial approval that is designed to lull us into the comfortable belief that all is well and being controlled, authorized and monitored.

There is a terrible potential for abuse in the CSE and its allied and international agencies in other countries. They can, and I am convinced they do, listen in, break into, decodify and store conversations of people in this country with no independent control, supervision or monitoring.

In conclusion, may I say that at a time when more and more personal, private, governmental and commercial communication and transmission is being handled through the airwaves, including easy access to data banks, it is simply appalling that this Bill, which is designed to allay our fears respecting some elements of personal privacy and civil liberties and at the same time provide an efficient framework for our protection from foreign influences, both hostile and friendly, ignores this rapidly expanding capability. Part II of this Bill facetiously labelled "Judicial Control" is a fraud. I for one will not vote for legislation that is so seriously flawed.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an oportunity to participate in the debate and to oppose Bill C-9. I am a little surprised at the motion of the Liberal Member that the question be now put. Knowing him a little bit, I know that he knows full well what it means. What it means is that Members on this side of the House, on behalf of our constituents and all Canadians, now do not have the opportunity to put forward amendments. We could allow Canadians to have some understanding of what are the major flaws of this Bill by debating them. What effectively happens now is that the Liberal member, after only three Liberal members have spoken on this important legislation, has put a gag order on the House so that the debate will gradually run out by allowing us only 10 minutes to speak. This is a gag being placed on parliamentarians who would either want to move amendments themselves or participate at some greater length in an important debate relating to security service legislation.

• (1230)

Be that as it may, the Hon. Member says that he is a soldier. I am sure that the gun was held to his head by the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) or someone else in order to force him to move such a motion. However, there are three key elements in this legislation which must be scrutinized carefully. Canadians can be certain that this Party at least will fight here in the House, in committee and, if the legislation comes back to the House, again in the House to make sure that changes are made to the legislation or that it is blocked. Those three key areas to which I refer are the proposed mandate, the powers which are to be granted to the security service and the oversight, an area which I would have expected the Solicitor General to be more supportive of. However, he is apparently not.

Let me give a very brief history of this legislation, Mr. Speaker. I think I am the only peace officer in the House and the only person who is not a lawyer who has worked within the criminal justice system. Therefore, I have some idea of the larger venue of crime, and here I am thinking of international crimes such as smuggling and heroin importing. I have been involved in such trials and have some idea of the deficiencies found by the RCMP in terms of dealing with that kind of international crime. I am aware that there is some need for the expansion of a service to help with those deficiencies.

I was present in the House one day when the Solicitor General was berating members of the Official Opposition for not allowing this legislation to move quickly so that the Pope could be protected while he is in Canada. I do not think that that kind of fear-mongering is necessary, proper or realistic for the Solicitor General to be presenting to the Canadian public as a reason why this kind of legislation should be rushed through. Quite clearly, our traditional police forces in the country should be capable, one would hope, of protecting the Pope and others while in Canada. This security service is being proposed for quite another reason, as I think I will be able to reveal as I deal with Bill C-9 as it exists even with minor changes from the previous Bill C-157.

In 1976, it was revealed that the RCMP security service had been involved in a number of criminal wrongdoings in the Province of Quebec. We have been looking at security service matters in one way or another since 1969 with the Mackenzie Commission. However, in 1977, the McDonald Commission of Inquiry was established, one of the most expensive and long standing royal commissions Canada has ever seen. The McDonald Commission sat until 1980 and held hearings across Canada looking into security-related matters. Mr. Justice David McDonald and his commission found that there had been widespread institutional lawbreaking by members of the Canadian security service.

One of the things which I think is very germane to this debate is that to this time, no RCMP security service officers or members have been prosecuted for illegalities outside of the Province of Quebec since the revelations of the McDonald inquiry. I think that that fact really leads into this debate and shows why members of the Official Opposition will have to struggle even harder to ensure that the civil liberties of Canadians are protected. Those liberties were not protected even when the Government across the floor knew and had all of the evidence to show that federal statutes had been broken. No actions were taken. The Solicitor General has indicated that certain actions were taken against individual members, but what was really done has never been revealed either to us as Members of the House or to the general public.

At the foundation of what I have just said is the simple fact that the Canadian judicial system was subverted by the actions taken in the past by the RCMP security service. It is our responsibility as legislators to protect Canadians. The Solicitor General might think that he is the only legislator but my constituents expect me to ensure that legislation is passed in this House which protects their interests as well as the interests of the country as a whole.

Following the rejection of Bill C-157 not only by this Party but by most of the Attorneys General, by civil libertarians, academics, editorialists and a broad section of the Canadian public, the Solicitor General decided to send the Bill to the Senate and have Mr. Pitfield, who had been involved in this matter before, rewrite the Bill a bit. It is interesting to note that when Bill C-157 was introduced, the only Party in the House that publicly opposed the content of Bill C-157 was this Party. The public record will prove that.

Mr. Lawrence: Nonsense.

Mr. Fulton: The Hon. Member says that that is nonsense. However, the public record has been checked and it has been discovered that the only person to my right who had anything to say about this Bill was Elmer Mackay, the former Member for Central Nova. He is now the senior policy adviser to the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Mulroney). At that time he said that there were too many civil liberty safeguards in Bill C-157, exactly the opposite of what the Tories are trying to say now. However, that was the only public statement that was made at the time Bill C-157 was introduced.

Mr. Lawrence: Where were you? Were you at the Senate committee meetings?

Mr. Fulton: The Hon. Member asks me why I was not present. I am the environment critic for my Party and I have never once seen him or most of the Tory members at Fisheries and Forestry Committee meetings where I happen to be active.

The facts show pretty clearly where the Tories really stand in terms of this legislation. While the Pitfield committee was studying this legislation in the other place, all but one or two of the clauses that are now contained within Bill C-9 were unanimously endorsed by members of the Conservative Party.

Mr. Lawrence: Nonsense.

Mr. Fulton: Again they are trying to sit on both sides of the fence. All one needs to do is look at the number of speakers they have put up to discuss this Bill to date in terms of the number of speakers they are allowed to put up. We can see pretty quickly and accurately the position of Tory members. They support this legislation in the Senate and in certain circles. They pretend to debate against it in the House and yet, when the original legislation was introduced, all they said was that there were too many safeguards in the Bill, exactly the opposite of what was being said by provincial Tory Attorneys General across the country.

Three major parts of this Bill seriously jeopardize individual civil liberties in Canada and are not required in terms of the national security of the country. They are contained within the proposed mandate. Let us look at that mandate and see exactly what it means. The mandate is found in Clause 2 under the definition of threats to the security of Canada. Although some people who have looked very carefully at this definition feel that it has been somewhat improved by the Pitfield committee, it is still far too broad and even falls short of the recommendations of the McDonald Commission. Even the Attorney General of the Province of Ontario, Mr. McMurtry, has said that the mandate is dangerously vague. For example, Canadians who might be interested in sending funds to Nicaragua or to the Afghan rebels or who wish to be involved in any kind of activity outside of Canada may well find that their entire organization, be it a church or local community organization, could fall under the intrusive techniques of Bill C-9.

I have two more very brief points to make, Mr. Speaker. One point is related to the powers contained within this Bill. There is a complete absence of political accountability for both the legislation and the RCMP. The most important oversight, Mr. Speaker, is that the proposal put forward by the Solicitor General does not allow for parliamentary scrutiny even by a parliamentary commitee. This would mean that those individuals who are democratically elected in the country and belong to the NDP, the Conservative Party or the Liberal Party and who represent all Canadians are being precluded from this committee. As the Solicitor General well knows, even the proposal that he has put forward, which is terribly flawed and will not protect civil liberties of Canadians, does not allow this little Privy Council group or the Inspector General to have access to the political documents given to it by Cabinet. Again, Mr. Speaker, it is terribly flawed legislation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

• (1240)

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House have waited for some considerable length of time for an opportunity to discuss Bill C-9 in some detail. The Government has had the opportunity to concern itself with the security service and subject it to close examination and scrutiny for 15 years, but today it attempts to limit the consideration that the Bill deserves.

The issues before us are complex. The Government tries to draw a fine line between the security service, whose responsibility is the protection of the state, while on the other hand it says that we as a democratic nation are concerned with the rights and freedoms of each individual. We are travelling a fine line indeed, Mr. Speaker.

In 1969 the Mackenzie Comission recommended a separate security force. This brought before the Government the question of the "civilianization", as it were, of that security force. The result of the abuses that took place was the establishment of the McDonald Commission and the recommendation, like that of its predecessor, for the separation of the security service from the RCMP. Two years after receipt of that report the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) introduced Bill C-157. All Members of the House are aware of the controversy brought on by that Bill. Protest letters poured in from every imaginable group. With one legislative swoop the Solicitor General managed to offend just about every segment of the country. Too many people were afraid that Canada was to get its very own KGB.

There is a limit, however. A bad piece of legislation cannot be protected forever. Bill C-157 was referred to a Senate committee for study. Time does not permit me to go into the recommendations of the Senate committee, Mr. Speaker. In general, however, the senators were unanimous in their castigation of the provisions of Bill C-157.

After considering the recommendations, the Solicitor General and Senator Pitfield urge early passage in order to prove that the parliamentary process works. What would the result have been if we had been under the same pressure with respect to Bill C-157, Mr. Speaker? Senator Pitfield might be satisfied with Bill C-9, but we certainly are not.

Our concerns lie in three general areas, Mr. Speaker. First, the mandate given to a civilian security service; second, the powers granted to the intelligence service; and third, the accountability that goes with the necessary protection of a democracy and through Parliament to the people of the country.

A civilian security service—any security service for that matter—holds a high degree of potential for abuse. If we are serious about rights and freedoms in Canada, it is paramount that all Canadians have a very clear understanding of what this proposed Security Intelligence Service is established to do. Bill C-9 is anything but clear on this. For example, the service is to collect, analyse and retain information and intelligence respecting activities which are suspected of constituting a threat to the security of the nation. Canadians are entitled to know what constitutes a threat under this Bill. That concept of a threat to the security of Canada is given a stretched definition indeed, far beyond that which any reasonable Canadian would expect to be necessary.

Will files be taken out on Canadians who support Solidarity, the Sandinistas or the Afhgan rebels? We hope not; it is part of our way of life to express our opinions without presenting any kind of threat to the security of the nation.

More could be said about the mandate, Mr. Speaker, but I want to move on to the broad powers the Act gives to the security service. Quite frankly, those powers are enormous. Once the service obtains a warrant for inclusive surveillance, the individual under suspicion would lose virtually every shred of his or her right to privacy. That person's life would become an open book and subject to scrutiny. His mail would be subject to scrutiny, confidential files could be examined as well as phychiatric reports and income tax returns. What is left of individual rights and freedoms? Wiretapping and eavesdropping are considered fair game.

My final primary concern is the accountability aspect, Mr. Speaker. Accountability is absolutely essential. Canadians learned this lesson well in the 1970s when no one, not even the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) or the Solicitor General of the day, would accept any responsibility for security breaches which took place at that time.

It is a fundamental principle of parliamentary democracy that the buck has to stop somewhere. Bill C-9 allows that proverbial buck to waft in the breeze. Neither the Inspector General nor any review committee envisaged in Bill C-9 would have access to Cabinet documents. Those who concerned themselves with the Freedom of Information Act know how quickly and how well materials can be marked "confidential" or "Cabinet document" and buried, at least for our time.

The Government has had 15 years to consider this legislation. The Canadian people now deserve a fair opportunity to scrutinize Bill C-9 and to offer their recommendations and amendments. We in this Party intend to give Canadians that opportunity.

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I would have preferred to speak on Bill C-9 without the rather silly and irresponsible action that was taken by a Member on the Liberal side a few moments ago when he and his colleagues denied the House the right to put forward any reasoned amendments. Notice was certainly given of at least one such amendment from the critic in this Party. It ill behooves a responsible Minister and his colleagues to take that kind of action regarding a matter as delicate, in terms of basic civil liberties, as would be any law which intended to broaden the scope of police or investigative powers within a democratic society.

Henry Ward Beecher once said that "laws are not masters but servants". We would do well to remember that, Mr. Speaker. Whatever agency in Canada is to be responsible for our national security and any investigations in pursuance thereof should take that saying very much to heart.

At the Strasbourg Conference on Parliamentary Democracy last year I had the opportunity to contribute to the debate in the European Parliament and to stress what I thought were some of the dangers that were increasingly evident throughout much of the world, particularly on the subject of the new and sophisticated communications technology which is available. I emphasized, of course, some of the benefits and pluses which this new technology can afford in terms of democratic government and general progress. However, I went on to point out some dangers and I would like to quote from my remarks at that conference because I feel they are very appropriate to the Bill before us. I quote:

> But the same technology that can allow for this option can also be used to centralize control and centralize authority and power à la the Orwellian nightmare society of 1984. I do not think that it is necessary to remind everyone that 1984 is next year. But that nightmare society envisaged by George Orwell is now very much a technical and physical possibility and is one of the threats against which we must guard. Because the power to keep populations under close surveillance is here, as was illustrated at some length in the pages of that important work, we must guard more than ever against the legalization of hitherto illegal though uncommon surveillance practices for security and other reasons. It may—indeed—be preferable to recognize that, from time to time, law enforcement agencies may, in pursuance of their mandates, circumvent or go beyond the law. At least if the perpetrators of excesses are caught, they risk being penalized or prosecuted. But it may be preferable to go that route rather than to brutalize the law itself, because if previously criminal or illegal acts are made legal, their common use will undoubtedly be extended and become the norm rather than the exception, and we go on from there until 1984 will indeed be with us.
> While electronic surveillance . . . may be necessary from time to time, especially when so much information and currency is transacted electronically—thus eliminating physical evidence of its use or transmission, it may be preferable to ignore investigative excesses from time to time rather than to codify and legitimize them and thus guarantee their use and encourage excesses that go beyond them.

What I am suggesting, Mr. Speaker, and it is my own opinion, is that sometimes it is better to lift the telescope to your blind eye. You cannot make a constant practice of it, but as I said at the conference last year, it is preferable to brutalizing the law and encouraging regular use of mechanisms which up until now have been illegal. It is better to have a silent understanding that from time to time you look the other way, if excessive methods are required in terms of some imminent danger, rather than to brutalize and corrupt the whole process of liberty as we have come to know it.

There is another saying, which I would like to make note of here, by Doctor Harry Emerson Fosdick: "Liberty is always dangerous, but it is the safest thing we have".

There are three major areas in this Bill: the proposed mandate for the service, the powers which are suggested for it, and the oversight and accountability mechanisms. In terms of the mandate of the service itself, it is again, I regret, not to receive adequate attention due to the action of the government in refusing to allow this House to consider any reasonable amendments.

Mr. Kaplan: Why not move them in committee?

Mr. Kristiansen: Largely, Mr. Speaker, because this place is more appropriate for matters as fundamental to the institution of liberty itself, as is this Bill and the ideas encompassed in it. They are of overriding importance and deserve, because of the nature and type of laws we are discussing, to be discussed openly in the highest court of this land—

Mr. Blais: What is a committee, then? It is open. It is a committee of the House.

Mr. Kristiansen: —and that is what this House of Commons is. What is the Government afraid of?

Mr. Kaplan: We are afraid that the Bill will never move forward.

Mr. Kristiansen: The mandate of the proposed security service is found in Section 2 in the definition "threats to the security of Canada". The definition, although improved by the Pitfield committee, is still far too broad and falls short of the recommendations even of the McDonald Commission. It has recently been denounced by the Ontario Attorney General as being dangerously vague. Canadians who have broken no law whatever but fall within its scope could still be subject to all intrusive techniques of the security service. For example, the church group which sends funds to the African National Congress to support liberation work in Africa, or to a Central American liberation movement, could be targeted and all of its members subjected to the powers of the new agency.

I know that the Minister has said that no one will be subject to investigation unless they are, in fact, going beyond what the law allows. However, we must design laws not only for normal times but for abnormal times. All we have to do is look back to the Prime Minister's "whiff of grapeshot" in 1970 to see what can happen in a society when something other than the normal circumstances prevail. In such times, people and governments panic and do things which in the normal course of events they would never even consider. Our laws have to be designed to deal with the important matter of protection of our liberties, taking into consideration the fact that these laws must serve us and serve the cause of liberty in abnormal as well as in normal times.

In those kinds of times when some event evokes strong emotions, suspicions are rife and people feel insecure. With the kind of easy access to hitherto illegal surveillance made possible by this Bill, can the Minister say that groups who do not at any time go beyond the pale of the law are not going to be investigated? The security service, as a matter of course, will want to find out whether suspected persons are, in fact, counselling or acting within the law, or in breach of the law in a manner which is unacceptable to the Government under its mandate. If these kinds of powers are easily available to it, any security investigative agency is going to check into all kinds of legitimate organizations, as security agencies have done many times in the republic to the south of us. Even without these permissive threats to liberty which are contained in this Bill, we know what our own security agencies in Canada have done prior to this time.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that I regret the decision of the Government to rush this matter through and so to try to prevent the House itself from dealing directly with possible amendments—of which there has been notice given—because this issue is basically fundamental to the rights and freedoms of the people of Canada.

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I regret very much the action of the representative of the Liberal Party in trying to terminate this debate. People have waited for a great many years to have this matter come up for public examination. It now seems that the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) will do anything he can to prevent effective public examination. He says, of course, that the Bill should be brought into committee where it can be discussed. However, we all know what a Liberal majority can do under his direction in committee. It can run it through fast, run it through the House again, and no doubt that is his intention, so that it will be out and into law before the election, at which time they hope that people will forget about it, either during the leadership race or at election time.

It is our intention, Mr. Speaker, to do whatever we can within the law to make sure that this Bill is not rushed through without public consideration. Public consideration does not just mean debate within this House. It means that the central issues, the central faults in this Bill, should be recognized by the public.

I understand, Mr. Speaker, that it is now one o'clock.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

[English]

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, as I was saying before lunch, this Bill is so flawed that the Solicitor General clearly wants to run it through as quickly as he can before the public recognizes that the essential faults which aroused so much opposition to Bill C-157 are still here.

Mr. Kaplan: I just wanted you to have two chances to speak.

Mr. Heap: It is not quite so extreme, but essentially as bad. Clearly the Minister has no intention, even in committee, of considering any serious amendments on the matter of the mandate, which is far too vague; on the matter of the broad powers, which are far too broad—

Mr. Kaplan: You can move amendments.

Mr. Heap: —or on the matter of the lack of proper parliamentary review. That is why his disingenuous plea that we send the Bill to committee to be discussed has to be turned down. Once we approve it in principle on second reading, then there is no possibility of stopping the Minister from ramming it all the way through.

On the matter of the mandate, Mr. Speaker, the point is simply that this Bill legitimizes what previously was perhaps unclear or possibly illegal; that is to say, the suppression of dissent, of legitimate criticism and legitimate organized opposition to Government policies. It is legitimate in that it does not involve any action or intention of violent overthrow or illegal subversion. Nevertheless, the experience of the last several decades shows that the present conduct of the RCMP, which will be no different in whatever civilian service replaces the RCMP, has been to use the Public Service to suppress dissent against a government, to suppress opposition.

One example of this, Mr. Speaker, is the widespread use of police photographers to film things like peace demonstrations. The most peaceful, even the smallest peace demonstration is subject to this kind of surveillance. We have the RCMP photographers there, in plain clothes but identifiable and sometimes acknowledging identification, taking pictures of everyone who goes on such a picket at the American Consulate, Queen's Park, City Hall or anywhere. That is a form of mild harassment which ought not to be used by the defenders of the law but is used regularly.

Another example is not so widely known but is much more intensive, and that is the harassment of individuals. I refer to the case of a student some 30 years ago who was registered as an ordinand in an Anglican college in Montreal. This student was actively engaged in a civil rights organization on McGill campus after a building had been padlocked by order of the then Premier of Quebec, Maurice Duplessis, under the infamous padlock law. This allowed him to padlock any building for a year on his say so because he thought it was being used for Bolshevik propaganda.

The city-wide protest against the padlocking of the United Jewish People's Organization hall because an Irish Roman Catholic priest had been allowed to speak about international peace was something that clearly the RCMP thought they had to suppress. So a student was harassed because he was active in a civil rights organization. The RCMP went to his teachers, the principal of his college, the dean of the Faculty of Divinity, and it was made known through the grapevine that if he did not withdraw from that organization he would probably not be recommended for ordination. That is a contemptible abuse of the RCMP's power. Never did they allege this person had done anything wrong, let alone lay any charge or information against him. They merely said they have this man under surveillance and that was enough to intimidate the principal of the college. In turn, although it is regrettable, it was enough to intimidate the student into withdrawing from this organization.

There was also the case of a priest of the Anglican church who, when he moved to another diocese and took up secular work with the agreement of his bishop, found that within a few months the RCMP followed him to that diocese and made the same sort of dishonest insinuation to the man's employer and his bishop in the new diocese. In other words, they were attempting to undermine a person against whom they could make no accusation. This is the kind of dishonest trick which the RCMP has carried on in many cases.

I have given one example which I can document but I have heard of many others. This is the kind of thing which will now be legitimized by this Bill. This Bill will now give the appearance of legality to things like this. That is why this is a very destructive Bill. It will specifically allow, of course, the opening of first-class mail without the knowledge of the sender or recipient and without any possibility of any real control over it. It will specifically allow the infiltrating of groups for the purpose of disruption.

• (1410)

The final fault in this Bill is that there is simply no serious parliamentary review provided for. Members of Parliament are to be excluded from the opportunity of finding out what this service is doing, except such things as the service may choose to tell Members of Parliament. There will be no real opportunity to examine what is actually happening. Even the Mickey Mouse committee that is to be appointed will not have a real opportunity because the most vital documents can be and will be withheld from it. There will be no independent reporting on the doings of this secret service, this Canadian "Gestapo".

Mr. Roberts: That is shameful.

Mr. Heap: What is also very unfortunate about this Bill is that it appears to provide for putting the Canadian security service under the control of a foreign power.

Mr. Kaplan: There is a little difference between the RCMP and the Gestapo.

Mr. Heap: There are the provisions of allowing the service to sign agreements with unnamed governments. In other words, it does not have to report to the people of Canada but it may very well report to some secret service agency of any other government.

Mr. Kaplan: Does all of your caucus think that the RCMP is the Gestapo?

Mr. Heap: That is why this Bill is an affront to the liberties of Canadians. That is why the hyenas across the way are trying to drown out or suppress any opposition.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is against the rules to interrupt an Hon. Member who has the floor.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. When the RCMP are characterized as the Gestapo—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the Hon. Minister please state his question of privilege?

Mr. Rossi: Say that outside of the House and see what happens to you.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to enter a serious discussion of Bill C-9, an Act to establish the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, when one members calls the RCMP the Gestapo and another tells him to step outside the House and the RCMP will descend upon him, in some vague fashion which he does not explain.

Mr. Rossi: That is not what I said.

Mr. Crosby: I do not know whether that confirms the status of the RCMP as the Gestapo or denies it, but it tells us how much serious consideration is given in the House of Commons by the government Party and the New Democratic Party to a very important issue like the establishment of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service.

I want to say that it is a legislative measure that gives me a lot of difficulty. I say that after a 25-year career in the administration of justice in Canada. That includes a ten-year career serving as a prosecutor and dealing on a day-to-day basis with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and another ten years dealing with the defence of criminal offenders charged under the laws of Canada.

Let me begin by saying that I stand firmly for the belief that anyone charged with a criminal offence in Canada has a full right to the opportunity to defend themselves. I believe in the principle that no one is guilty unless guilt is established before a legitimate court. We operate under the rule of law in this country. What is at stake in a legislative measure like that proposed by Bill C-9 is the rule of law in Canada. I want to state very clearly that if a new intelligence service will advance the protection of Canadians under the law, I am in favour of it. But if it is another opportunity to deprive Canadian citizens of their traditional rights under the law, then I am against it.

That is the problem we face. We do not know what kind of organization this is. If we could rely on the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) as the paternal authority in this case and as the father of this new intelligence service, if we could place implicit faith in his ability to develop an appropriate and responsible intelligence service, then we would not need to debate this Bill. However, the problem is that the Solicitor General and his colleagues in the Government have destroyed any possibility of that kind of faith in the administration of justice in this country. We must question whether the proposal contained in Bill C-9 is legitimate and whether it is really for the benefit of Canada.

The basic principle at stake involves the question whether the RCMP, which has traditionally for decades dealt with all national police matters in this country, including internal security, should continue to perform that function or whether there should be a new organization. Quite frankly, based on present information and 25 years of experience in the administration of justice in Canada, I would suggest that we stick with the RCMP until we find for certain a better method of controlling security and all national police matters in Canada. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police have developed a tradition over generations that can only be achieved with that kind of history. It has established itself over its long history as an effective police force, as upholders of the legal tradition. Indeed, the motto of the RCMP is to uphold the law. That means law in the broad sense, not just the Criminal Code or particular statutes, but the whole purpose of the law, namely, the reasonable control of private and personal activities in Canada.

If we reject that history and that tradition of fair play in law enforcement that has been established by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police over decades and generations of Canadians, then we must make absolutely certain that what we are substituting will at least uphold that same tradition and, because of the expenditure of public funds involved, presumably improve it.

I must ask the Solicitor General and his Cabinet colleagues what evidence there is to show that this will be the case. What indication is there that the Canadian Security Intelligence Service as proposed in this Bill will be able to accomplish anything, or at least provide an effective service in that area?

There is mention of judicial control in the Bill. Unless the organization has within its own body the essential controls and attitudinal positions that are necessary to protect Canadians from a super force, the judiciary and Parliament will be powerless. It will not be able to intervene effectively.

The injustices that occur in Canada do not come to our attention on the floor of the House of Commons. The injustices that occur in Canada take place on Dorchester Street in Montreal, Yonge Street in Toronto and Barrington Street in Halifax. We never hear of those injustices. That is what injustice is all about. Injustice is not evidenced in the courts of Canada, it is present on the streets of Canada on a day-to-day basis. Unless one is involved in something like legal aid or in the administration of justice in a practical way, one does not even know about it. Do not tell me that some kind of super force created within the legal system of Canada can be subsequently controlled.

In my view, the obligation of all Members of Parliament is to ensure that, before this potential vehicle of suppression is launched, we know exactly what we are creating. Since we do not know, we cannot take the responsibility for creating a security agency that is an unknown quantity, particularly in view of the fact that we presently have a national police force that has proven its worth and merit over a long period of time.

• (1420)

The Solicitor General may say that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police do not want this function, that they think it should be isolated from normal police duties on a national basis and put into a separate organization. All I can say, Mr. Speaker, is, who is running the country? Is it the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his colleagues? Or is it the Superintendent of the RCMP? I do not care if the Superintendent of the RCMP does not want to perform this function; that is totally irrelevant. Sure, he wants to get into functions that are more normal police work. He wants the personnel in his force to perform functions more normally related to police activity. But that is no answer.

It is our right and our duty to impose that responsibility on the RCMP whether they like it or not. If the present Commissioner of the RCMP does not want to head a security force, which is an institution, and does not want to take the responsibility for internal and international security in this country, then quite frankly he had better find something else to do because the people of Canada are relying, not on the Superintendent of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, but on the tradition built up over decades and generations to protect them in the way that they have always been protected. That is to establish a fair balance between the rights of citizens and the protection of citizens. That has been the function of the RCMP for decades and generations. That should continue to be the function of the RCMP, and that is the answer to this question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a few words on the Bill before the House today. I come from rural Saskatchewan where the RCMP polices many of the communities and small towns, and there have been a lot of questions asked about this Bill.

Mr. Roberts: Would you compare them to the Gestapo, like your colleague?

Mr. Nystrom: I have never compared them to the Gestapo, Mr. Speaker.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nystrom: I wonder if we could have a little bit of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair is beginning to wonder whether the House would like to dispense with the services of the Chair. I appeal to all Hon. Members to respect the rules of debate. The Chair has recognized the Hon. Member for Yorkton-Melville.

Mr. Nystrom: I think we need the protection of the Chair, Mr. Speaker. I got up to speak and all of a sudden I heard calls of "Gestapo". I do not know what that is about.

Mr. Roberts: Your colleague said that.

Mr. Nystrom: Maybe that is some new Liberalism from the new Liberal leadership candidate, I am not sure. Perhaps he can pursue this in the Question Period.

In any event, I was saying that the RCMP police many of the small towns in Saskatchewan. Their training headquarters is in our capital city of Regina. Many questions are being raised about the new Bill before us as to how it will affect the financing of the RCMP, its role and so on. That is why I am interested in seeing as much political accountability and as much debate as possible in this House as well as seeing a good hearing at the committee stage.

What we are dealing with is a very important topic in any democracy in terms of the policing or security of a democracy. When we look at the establishment of a security force in the RCMP or outside the RCMP, we have to strike a very important balance. That balance is between giving the force adequate powers to do a proper job for the security of the nation and the people, and not giving the police too much power where they actually go overboard in trying to fulfil their mandate. I think it is a crucial balance that we are trying to reach here. It has to be a balance, on the one hand, of protecting individual rights and liberties of the citizens at large, and dealing adequately with genuine threats to the national security of Canada. That is what we must look at.

There is some concern being expressed by groups such as the Canadian Civil Liberties Association whether or not under this Bill the Government is going overboard by giving too broad a mandate, too sweeping a mandate, to the new security service and there would be too little parliamentary accountability. I have a transcript from CTV's Question Period which was aired February 5, 1984. Mr. Alan Borovoy, general counsel of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, was the guest. He was asked what he thought of the legislation that is now before Parliament. He said in part:

> I think that the powers of intrusive surveillance are still needlessly broad. Under the terms of this Bill, as it is now formulated, Canadian citizens could have their conversations bugged, their mail opened, their homes surreptitiously searched, and their confidential records invaded, even though there isn't the slightest suggestion that any lawbreaking is involved.

He went on to say:

> I think, at the very least, there should be a requirement that there be reasonable grounds to believe that there is a serious security-related breach of the law involved. I think, before they could get a warrant for any of those intrusive techniques against a citizen or a permanent resident, they should have to meet that kind of test.

In other words, the test of reasonable grounds. I am not a lawyer nor am I an expert in this area. I have immense respect for Alan Borovoy. I know he is respected on all sides of the House and by my friend, the Hon. Member for South West Nova (Miss Campbell). I was thinking of Central Nova but I knew that was not the riding. I know she feels exactly the same way. Perhaps she is more impressive than the Hon. Member for Central Nova (Mr. Mulroney) in terms of her contributions to debates in the House, and that is not very hard to do.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nystrom: My main concern is whether by the creation of this new security service we are giving it a mandate that is too sweeping in terms of civil rights, freedoms and liberties. As I said before, I think it is a very delicate balance that we have to strike. From what I have read and from the contacts I have had with ordinary citizens, I feel that what is happening here is that the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) is giving too much power to this security service.

As I look around the House I still see a few Members who were here in October, 1970 when we had the October crisis. The Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was here, I was here, and the Minister of State for External Relations (Mr. Pepin) was here as well. My mind goes back some 13 and a half years to what happened in October, 1970. There have been some well documented facts that the RCMP and the public authorities went overboard in responding to the FLQ crisis in the Province of Quebec. Just look at the number of people who were arrested, people who were innocent and had absolutely nothing to do with subversion in this country or anything to do with violence. They were picked up and thrown in jail. Their rights were stripped away from them by the invocation of the War Measures Act at that time.

I was one of the 16 Members of Parliament, along with the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre, who stood up in this House and said no, that the Government should not invoke the War Measures Act. I think we were right. I think history has proved us right. I remember seeing an interview given by Robert Stanfield, who was the then Leader of the Opposition. He said that one of his major mistakes in public life was to support the invocation of the War Measures Act. I know at the time he was very bothered and caught up in the public fear and paranoia resulting from what we were being fed by the media and by the Government across the way. He said that was perhaps the most serious mistake he had made in public life. I have immense respect for Robert Stanfield, for his judgment and for his humanitarian feelings. I think what he was saying to us is that often in society we can get carried away if we give too much power to law enforcers or to a special force.

Having gone through that experience once, albeit in extraordinary circumstances or in extraordinary times, I do not want to take the risk as a person representing 70,000 Saskatchewan people of giving a too sweeping mandate or too sweeping scope of powers to a new security service. I cast my mind back to the days leading up to the McDonald Commission and its inquiry into the wrongdoings of the RCMP, to the barn burning by RCMP officers in the Province of Quebec and to other things which occurred at that particular time. Those kinds of issues which some of us in the House have experienced as parliamentarians make us extremely wary of giving a sweeping mandate to any security service.

I say this for a number of reasons, one of which is that we do not have proper parliamentary scrutiny or accountability for what we will create in the Bill before the House today. When it comes right down to it, the only person who will be responsible for ensuring that there is not an over-zealous application of the powers of the law will be the Solicitor General. That is not adequate in a parliamentary democracy; that is wrong. There should be much greater parliamentary accountability built into this legislation as well as into almost every Bill we pass in the House.

It is important that the security service not be there to stifle legitimate consent in the country. It is important that it not be there to harass legitimate protestations or demonstrations against governments of the day. It is important that it be there to stop illegal and violent activities, not to thwart in any way legitimate dissent in Canada. Without the proper kind of parliamentary scrutiny and accountability—and they are not built into the system at this time—I am afraid that the powers under its mandate are too sweeping and too broad. I say that having seen the October crisis and the many occurrences which led up to the inquiry by the McDonald Commission.

I see Mr. Speaker indicating that my time is up. Perhaps I could continue at a later date.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I have to rise at this point in time to participate in the debate, under the circumstances. I draw the attention of the House to what exactly we are debating. I suggest that it is a motion which was put surreptitiously, in bad faith, by the Deputy Whip of the Liberal Party that the question on second reading be now put.

For those uninitiated in parliamentary procedure, let me describe what this means. Purely and simply it is a motion by an arrogant, unthinking and callous government to impose closure on a debate involving a very serious problem with respect to the security of the country. Simply put, that is what we are faced with by this Government. We have had the opportunity of considering this matter for some three days on the floor of the House of Commons. Granted we have had over eight hours of debate. Also we have had the opportunity of hearing some very interesting points of view. But as was pointed out earlier by my colleagues, we have had no more than three government participants. The purpose of one of those interventions was to move the motion of closure. That is the way in which this Government views this important issue. That is the kind of so-called bona fides with which they approach the issue of a security service in Canada and allow elected Members of the House of Commons an opportunity for full and frank debate about the merits of the legislation. That is an indication of the way in which the Government will deal with what I consider to be fair and reasonable Opposition amendments.

Quite frankly, we can disabuse ourselves of any idea that the Government has any serious intention of listening to the Opposition or to any other interest group, especially on the basis of the way in which it is now operating with respect to the legislation. Government Members say that the Senate has heard representations concerning this legislation. They have said that there have been royal commissions. However, what they are saying to Canadians is that, as far as their elected representatives are concerned, they are nobodies who have no say in what goes on in terms of this legislation.

I say to the Government and to the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) in particular that they should not have any illusions with respect to the sincerity with which we approach the legislation. In the course of this debate they will find, if and when we are forced by the Liberal majority to terminate the debate on the floor of the House of Commons, that the end is not necessarily in sight. We will not be pushed around. Whether or not the Solicitor General somehow thinks that his colleagues are out seeking the leadership of that Party, I would like to hear from each and every one of the leadership contestants what they think about this kind of tactic. Do they think the Liberal Party with its majority should be forcing through by a form of closure legislation to impose on Canadians a civilian security intelligence agency with some serious defects? As I pointed out to the Solicitor General, this piece of legislation requires much serious work.

I am not here to be an obstructionist. I have been attempting to find some rational middle ground concerning a full and reasonable examination of the matter in committee. The Solicitor General knows that. I have approached him on a number of occasions asking that a special committee be established to take the onus off the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs which will be faced with an enormous workload. I asked that the special committee have the authority to do some reasonable travel across the country.

I will tell the House why I feel strongly about the power of the committee to travel. I come from a part of the country which is not driving distance from Ottawa. My constituents are concerned about national issues but, in order to participate in the process in Ottawa, they have to travel some 2,000 miles, very often at their own expense. Some people say that they are losing their respect for parliamentary institutions. In Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, when it takes that amount of expensive travel to make representations in person, no wonder there is a sense that somehow parliamentary institutions are not fulfilling their potential. The idea of travelling to Saskatoon, Regina, Vancouver, Halifax, St. John's or places where serious Canadians want to participate in national debates to make their input known is a service to these people. If the Solicitor General thinks that he should contain the committee in Ottawa, rush through the process and ride roughshod over the Opposition with a Government majority on the committee, as is the case in the House of Commons, I tell him that he is doing himself a disservice.

I felt that we had an opportunity for making reasonable arrangements with respect to committee consideration of the entire issue. I took the Solicitor General to heart when he said on the floor of the House of Commons that he was prepared to listen to Opposition suggestions. What do we get in response to an Opposition suggestion concerning the handling of this matter by committee? We get closure.

Mr. Kaplan: It is not closure.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I hear the Solicitor General. He knows the effect of the motion that the question on second reading by now put. The Government has the majority and no further amendments can be put. He knows that the callous Government majority will ram through legislation which involves the civil liberties of Canadians.

We have heard much about the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who is now retiring and the Charter of Rights. This will be his monument to greatness. I ask the House to reconsider what kind of government uses its majority to impose closure on a matter of such serious implication as this to the civil liberties of Canadians.

Mr. Deans: A majority government.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Yes, it is a majority government. It is a government which is able to exercise once in a while—and on occasions such as this—great and enormous powers with respect to ramming legislation through the House of Commons. I put the Solicitor General on notice that I will not accept the bona fides of the Government with respect to this matter. There is real reason for Canadians to be concerned about the bona fides of this Government with regard to this legislation and its real intention to accept reasoned amendments to the legislation, to accept any suggestion for improvement, whether it comes from the Opposition or important interest groups in this country.

I rise now to address this Bill on a second occasion, which I did not think I would have to do. I do it with a sense of great disappointment. I do not think we have been unreasonable. Everyone from my Party who participated in this debate made an intelligent and worth-while contribution. I do not think anyone can say that we have been obstructionist or that we attempted to speak just for the sake of speaking. What kind of thanks do we get for that approach to this legislation? We get, I am sorry to say, a motion moved which is tantamount to closure. The people of Canada will remember this when they regard this Government at the time of the next election.

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, as you will recall, I spoke on Bill C-9 this time last week. I was quite content to have had my say at that time. I thought I made some interesting observations with regard to the principles contained in the Bill. I would have been quite happy to sit quietly in my seat and let the debate proceed to its natural conclusion. However, we find ourselves now faced with a motion that amounts to closure imposed by the Government side. I now feel compelled to speak a second time and to point out the wrongness of what the Government is trying to do to limit debate.

The Hon. Member for Kootenay West (Mr. Kristiansen), in his meagre contribution to the debate this afternoon, continued to talk about the principles of Bill C-9, saying that we should not change anything, that it is okay for all of these illegal things to go on and be engaged in by the security service, so long as we do not know about it. I found that a rather funny attitude on behalf of that member of the NDP. I could not understand it at all.

It is not my intention to rebut the Hon. Member for Kootenay West, but rather to deal with this serious threat to Parliament that we face this afternoon. The motion is that debate be now terminated, that the vote on second reading of Bill C-9 take place without any further opportunity for discussion. I am unable to understand the motivation of the Government. The debate seemed to be proceeding in an orderly manner. We have had two or three days' debate on the issue. It has not been excessive. Government Members chose not to participate in the discussion. We cannot force them to if they are not interested in the matter before us. Perhaps they have been instructed to keep quiet. I understand that it is not an uncommon practice on the other side of the House.

Had the motion that the question be now put not been introduced in the House today, there was every likelihood of the debate winding down and being terminated by the appropriate time this afternoon. There would have been nothing to get excited about. That is what would have happened. With the introduction of this tricky move, other Members, on this side of the House at least, will want to make the same statements as me and insist that we debate adequately the question whether debate should or should not be terminated. I cannot see any rhyme or reason for that move.

I would like to have seen debate on second reading terminate this afternoon and the Bill sent to committee where it could be studied in detail. That is the correct process, the process now being cut off by the Government. I am unable to understand why the Government wants to cut off orderly debate and initiate another debate on the question of putting the question. The result will be a situation exactly the converse of what the Government wanted. The result of cutting off debate will be to prolong the debate. It is not for me to judge the rightness or wrongness of the Government's tactics.

This is a very important issue, one that justifiably should be debated in detail in this House. We should not set aside debate at the whim of the Government. We have before us a whole new system of dealing with security matters in Canada. The Bill addresses the various checks and balances that are needed if we are to have a security service. It is a very important piece of legislation because it deals with the relationship between the state and its citizens. Because it is so important, it deserves careful debate. Although it is important, it is not particularly urgent.

The principles involved in the Bill go back to the time of the Mackenzie Commission in 1969 and the McDonald Commission in 1981. If there was no urgency in 1969 after the Mackenzie Commission to bring in legislation, why is there now? Why can it not wait another few hours for debate to expire?

As I said before, the present security service in Canada is doing a reasonable job. I do not say it cannot be improved, but Canada will not go down the drain in the next three weeks if this legislation is not passed. It really does not matter whether the existing system is replaced in one, three or six months from now. Although the Bill is very important, it is not that urgent. It is important that we make a very careful study of the proposals and make the correct changes rather then rush into something we might regret later.

So far I have confined my comments to the specific case of closing debate on Bill C-9. I wish to take a few minutes to address what I would say is the general case. Why does the Government always want to cut off and limit debate in Parliament? Why did it use closure 16 times during the first session of this Parliament? Is it just on account of arrogance caused by being in office too long? I will be charitable and surmise otherwise.

I think the real reason this is a consistent practice of the Government is that it has forgotten how to work within the parliamentary system. Instead of legislation being initiated or at least developed within Parliament and parliamentary institutions, nearly all of the new legislation that is brought before us is being generated by and initiated from within the bureaucracy in Government Departments. There have been consultations and discussions but these have not taken place within this Chamber or within parliamentary committees and parliamentarians have not really been involved in that process. They take place within the bureaucracy.

What happens then is that legislation is presented to Parliament in finished form and the Government tries to use its docile and subservient majority to push it through Parliament as a mere formality. Government members want to use Parliament as a formality in the same way as Royal Assent is given to Bills as a formality. In my opinion, Parliament ought not to be just a rubber stamp. We must again become the instrument of legislative initiation. Therefore, Sir, I would suggest that Members should not support this motion and that debate ought to be allowed to come to a natural and not a forced conclusion.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have not spoken on this Bill before, and as my colleague has said, thank goodness I have not because if I had, I would hardly be able to speak again. I do not propose to go over what has already been presented by members of my own caucus.

I know you are aware, Sir, that some time ago the Leader of this Party, in presenting a submission to the McDonald Commission, made it quite clear that this Party and the caucus of this Party supported a civilian security service. But he made it quite clear as well that that support would only be forthcoming if the legislation was properly drafted and contained full safeguards both with respect to oversight and the powers of the agency itself. I do not think anyone denies that there is a need for such an agency to protect the country from spying activities or subversion. The question at the moment is whether or not this particular piece of legislation meets this need and whether or not it provides guarantees that there can be no abuses of the powers that are given.

We have heard some of the comments that have been made by Attorneys General and others across the country and we cannot help but think that we in this Party do not stand alone in opposition to the content of the Bill which we now see before us. We know, for example, that the Attorney General of the Province of Ontario, the province I am pleased to represent and in which I have worked all of my adult life, has said that the new Bill mentions threats to Canada's security by foreign-influenced activities. Mr. McMurtry said that that sort of definition could include automobile companies such as Honda and Toyota that compete with domestic firms. Perhaps he may be going a little far in drawing that kind of an analogy but I think the point that he is making is that the Bill is so badly drafted and its provisions so inadequate as to make it virtually impossible for any reasonable person, faced with having to deal with the Bill and the agency itself, to determine themselves or through those representing them when and how one is seen to be in violation of the protection of Canada.

Although I personally cannot verify it as being entirely accurate but can only assume that it may well be accurate since it has not been refuted by anyone; it has been reported that Members of Parliament from Quebec are not entirely happy with this piece of legislation and that those from the Province of Quebec are really quite concerned about the whole idea of the federal spy agency.

Mr. Cosgrove: Is that Mr. Mulroney?

Mr. Deans: The Hon. Member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Cosgrove) asks if I am referring to Mr. Mulroney.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order.

Mr. Deans: I assume he is referring to the Leader of the Official Opposition. The truth of the matter is that no one knows if he feels that way or not since he says so little about anything. It may well be that he feels that way, but the fact of the matter is that Members of Parliament from Quebec are reported to be very concerned about the existence of this agency in the form in which it has been presented by the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan).

One need not be of any great age to remember the actions taken by the Liberal Government in the Province of Quebec which were subsequently proven to have been totally unnecessary and extremely harmful. I can well understand that, on the one hand, the Attorney General for the Province of Ontario says that the Bill is inadequate in its draftsmanship and that, on the other hand, Members of Parliament from the Province of Quebec are saying that the Bill is undesirable in its present form. I can understand that because they too must be able to read, as I am able to read, the comments made by the Solicitor General and by his officials.

The Solicitor General and his officials have said, and again I am quite sure that this is correct, that the special review committee of three to five Privy Councillors, mostly retired Cabinet Ministers, will be able to report any attempted cover-ups to Parliament. However, government officials admit that the committee, bound by a secrecy oath, would only be able to report to Parliament in the vaguest of terms and would certainly not be able to name anyone. What kind of oversight is that? What kind of protection is that? How does the Parliament of Canada respond to the demands of the people of the country? We who are duly elected should at least have some access, if not total access, to information of this type in order to know about the actions of the agency.

The Minister may say that albeit the agency is given power to break the law, that power is to break the law in minimal ways. Incidentally, the Minister has said that and no doubt believes it is true because I know that he is an honourable man. However, he then goes on to say at another time that security agents could enter the offices of doctors and MPs. One must question if that is a minimal breaking of the law. Is that a suitable kind of action that could be condoned by a duly elected and responsible Parliament? Is it reasonable to give members of the security agency the kind of carte blanche that would allow them to enter a doctor's office and rummage through the records and take for their own use those records which they feel would be of help to them in the pursuit of their responsibilities?

Does not that situation open up the whole question of the confidentiality of such records and the protection of individual's rights? Does it not come into conflict with everything that we in Canada have stood for with regard to the right of individuals to maintain the degree of confidentiality necessary to protect themselves from undue or unnecessary harassment?

It seems to me that the legislation, as the Attorney General of Ontario has said, as my colleague from Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) has said and as many of my other colleagues have said, is an inadequate piece of work. It is inadequate because it does not do what is necessary to protect the innocent public from over-zealous or perhaps downright intentional intrusion into their lives.

• (1500)

As I started I end, Mr. Speaker: through our Leader this Party has argued for a civilian security service. We cannot accept a security service established by legislation that does not contain protective mechanisms to guarantee a stop to the kinds of abuses that have been identified as possible by groups ranging all the way from civil liberties associations to attorneys general. For that reason, and that reason alone, Mr. Speaker, we cannot expedite passage of the Bill, nor can we allow the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) to continue with it in its present form.

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for recognizing me so that I can say a very few words on Bill C-9, an Act to establish the Canadian Security Intelligence Service. I must inform the House that this legislation has bothered me for some weeks. I am apprehensive about it; I do not fully understand it; I do not fully understand the need for it; I do not fully understand its purpose, its structure, its powers or its democratic concepts. As a result, I am concerned that the debate, particularly on the principles of the Bill, should be terminated without what I consider to be an extensive debate. I know there has been a good deal of debate so far, but I think the principles of the Bill should be debated extensively, rather than the details. It is the principle of the Bill that we debate on second reading.

I wish to state very briefly, Mr. Speaker, that I am not in favour of the motion to terminate debate on second reading and move this Bill into committee, and it is my intention to vote against the motion before the House.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take a few minutes to deal with the background of Bill C-9 which has evolved from Bill C-157, presented to the House some months ago. I should aso like to discuss some of the rights and freedoms that I think the Bill ignores, and I should like to talk about the lack of parliamentary accountability in the legislation.

As many Members of the House will know but some of my constituents may not remember, in 1976 it was revealed that the RCMP security service had been involved in a number of criminal wrongdoings in the Province of Quebec. In 1977, the McDonald Royal Commission was established to inquire into the activities of the security service of the RCMP. It sat from 1977 until 1980 and issued a report which was very critical of the activities of the security service, particularly some of the activities which took place during the 1970s leading up to what is now popularly known as the FLQ crisis in the Province of Quebec.

The Commission found that there had been widespread institutional lawbreaking by the members of the RCMP security service. So far none of its members have been charged in court for any of the illegalities that occurred outside the Province of Quebec. The Government refuses to prosecute for breaches of federal statutes under its jurisdiction. No disciplinary action has been taken against members of the RCMP security service as a result of wrongdoing within the service although a number of trials are presently under way in the Province of Quebec.

The bottom line is whether the rule of law, which is the foundation of our Canadian judicial system, has been subverted. The law must apply to all Canadians, whether security service members or not. That is the position that is at issue today. Those of us who oppose the Bill going to committee say that Canadians should be treated equally before the law. If there are times when the security service or the police forces have temporarily to take action which is contrary to the law, they must do so only after having received an order from a judge permitting such action.

The McDonald Royal Commission report was made public in August, 1981, when the Minister announced on behalf of the Government that it was accepting the key recommendations of the report that a civilian security service outside the framework of the RCMP would be established. The new agency, with its sweeping powers and lack of accountability will be a step backwards, in our view. The Minister appointed a task force to draft legislation flowing from the McDonald Commission report. The Bill which resulted was tabled in May, 1983, as Bill C-157. It rejected many of the key recommendations of the McDonald Commission and was denounced across the country by provincial attorneys general, civil libertarians, academics and a broad cross-section of the Canadian community.

One of the problems with the Bill is in its definitions, particularly for the protection of the individual rights and liberties of Canadians at the same time as for dealing adequately with genuine threats to national security. As the Senate committee under Senator Pitfield said, this is a very delicate balance to reach. We agree that it is a very delicate and necessary balance and we think that this Bill fails to meet the test.

The major problem of the security service has been, and under this Bill would continue to be, the absence of political accountability, which on occasion has led to a failure to distinguish between dissent and subversion among the groups and individuals being investigated.

This Party suggests that the improved version of the Bill which came from the Senate subcommittee still falls short of the recommendations of the McDonald Commission. An example of this was brought to light by Edward Greenspan, a well-known lawyer from Toronto. He believes that the present version of the Bill would grant the agency that would be created the right to tap telephones not only for one year, which was supposed to be a protection for Canadians, but that an extension of the original warrant would result in the service being able to monitor people's telephones forever. There is no limit to the secondary application that the service is required to make once the application for the first year runs out.

Mr. Kaplan: We think he is wrong about that.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Greenspan has pointed out that he believes that under the Bill Canadians can have their conversations bugged without any suggestion of lawbreaking or foreign control. He believes that there are no guidelines governing how closely judges must scrutinize wiretap applications and that there are no effective controls over the length of the surveillance.

This particular shortcoming of the Bill engaged Mr. Greenspan's interest. He thinks that the evidence would indicate that Canada is becoming a "wiretap happy country" compared to the United States. On a per capita basis, there are 20 wiretaps in Canada for every one in the United States. This would indicate that we have a much higher propensity among our secret service to place wiretaps than is the case across the border, Mr. Speaker.

One of the most serious problems with the Bill is the apparent lack of a watchdog agency to monitor what kinds of activities the secret service is engaged in. There has been an attempt to improve parliamentary accountability with the introduction of a Security Intelligence Review Committee, which would be a very limited committee operating under the auspices of the Privy Council. The members of that Council would be sworn to secrecy and could not report their findings in a general way, so that Members of Parliament, who are not members of the council, would be denied the fundamental information.

It is rather intriguing to look at the name of that particular group. It is called an "oversight agency", providing an oversight mechanism. I went to the dictionary because I was aware of two ways of interpreting the word "oversight". One definition is supervision, which I hope is the meaning which was intended in the reference in the Bill to an oversight mechanism, because the other definition of oversight is "omission to notice" or "a mistake of inadvertence". I hope that the oversight agency does not see its particular mandate as being to overlook and set aside because of inadvertence a lot of the problems and rules under which the security service is being permitted to operate.

In short, Mr. Speaker, I simply say that we in this Party propose to oppose this particular Bill going to committee for some of the reasons I have outlined. There are many more reasons for opposing this Bill, for example, on libertarian grounds and on the question of adequate parliamentary security, but since my time is up, I will resume my place.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, it is no news to Hon. Members of the House that Bill C-9 is an Act to establish a new civilian spy agency to be called the Canadian Security Intelligence Service. This new agency will have special powers to open mail, place wiretaps, make surreptitious entries into people's homes and use government records to obtain confidential information about persons who have committed no illegal act.

While the present Bill has removed some of the injustices which this Party pointed out in the previous Bill C-157, it still does not implement many of the essential recommendations of the 1977 McDonald Commission, which was established as a result of RCMP wrongdoings in the 1970s, and we are still concerned that these wrongdoings went unpunished.

The New Democratic Party cannot support this Bill for a number of reasons which my colleagues have pointed out. However, I would like to put on the record that the most important reasons are the lack of accountability to Parliament, and the broad, sweeping powers to be given to a civilian agency which are unprecedented.

I want to congratulate the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) in particular, Mr. Speaker, for having so strongly opposed Bill C-157 and now opposing Bill C-9. His position reflects in general the views of civil rights groups across Canada and certainly of many Canadians who are convinced that both Bills undermine democracy. As usual, the Conservatives are on both sides of the fence trying to cover up their divisiveness by saying "Let us not rush it". Our Party wants to know if they are for or against Bill C-9 and what they would do if they were the government.

My colleagues have spoken at length about the problems which we find with Bill C-9, and I would like quickly to summarize the problem areas. Highly intrusive special warrants may be used against Canadian residents who have done nothing wrong or disloyal, and are not even suspected of wrongdoing. Intrusive techniques such as special warrants may be used against subversive, as distinct from foreign-influenced, activity. This is something which concerns us in that there are the same provisions for domestic activities as for foreign spy suspects. Advocates, protesters and dissenters are included in the security mandate if they transgress some law, however minor. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, having picketed in many demonstrations, as have many of my colleagues, that we will probably be out there lined up with the first group of suspects.

The "anti-judge shopping" clause makes it easy for the service to avoid having to tell the judge, to whom a warrant application is made, that an early application has been denied. Judicial warrants or authorization from senior officials need not be obtained prior to infiltrating an organization. Confidential solicitor-client communications, tax returns, health records and the confessional, are still fair game. Contrary to the recommendations of both the Pitfield committee and the McDonald Commission, the judge will not have the power to refuse a special warrant where the invasion of privacy proposed far outweighs the value of any evidence.

There is no parliamentary review, contrary to the recommendations of the McDonald Commission. Therefore, there is no ultimate political accountability. Perhaps the most important criticism we have is that the review committee, the only real control in the whole scheme—or supposed control—before it pursues a complaint or conducts an audit, must let the service know that it is coming and what it is looking for. The review committee is not given access to any file anywhere, at any-time. In all three of these major areas, mandate, powers and controls, I feel it is shocking that the Minister and the Government are unrepentant.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that in preparing to speak to this Bill, a lot of memories were brought back to those of us who were activists during the late 1960s and 1970s and who were involved many times in the front lines of protests and work for social change. I am most concerned that this Bill will still allow intrusion into the lives of innocent people, people who are social activists, reformers and who wish to demonstrate and sometimes resort to civil disobedience. They will be suspects. We know that the RCMP had over 800,000 files on Canadians, many of whom have committed no illegal act. We do not even know what has happened to these files. Is this to continue under the new civilian security service?

I recall being very much involved with welfare rights groups during the 1970s, Mr. Speaker, militant, anti-poverty groups. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that no one would have listened to the poor during those days if there had not been some militant activists who were ready to go out on the front lines. Most people were so beaten down with lack of income that it was difficult for them to organize. I am sure that the names and photographs of those people, myself included, were recorded by the RCMP and probably are still on file. I know of one leader who was harassed by the police, and I do believe him when he claims that a gun was planted in his room deliberately by the RCMP. This was used to intimidate him to the point where he had to give up all of his activities and go underground.

I know Canadian citizens of Japanese descent who were condemned as spies because of their racial characteristics. They are still living in my riding of Vancouver East. Activists have been particularly suspect. I think particularly of a woman named Kay MacPherson from Toronto who has been a leader in the peace movement in the New Democratic Party and is a very active person on the National Action Committee for the Status of Women. Is she going to be suspect here in Canada, as she was when she tried to cross the United States border to go to a peace rally in Washington? Is this the kind of McCarthyism we are going to have in Canada? Labour groups certainly will be suspect, especially if they protest against any right wing foreign governments. Is a wildcat striker who refuses to handle South African imports really a threat to Canada? Will he be suspect?

● (1520)

In my remaining time, Mr. Speaker, I want to refer to the specific example of a member of the Prime Minister's Office who was once a target of the Canadian secret service. I refer to a column in the Ottawa Citizen of February 17 which refers to David Crenna, a former employee of CMHC who joined the PMO after the 1980 election. He was one of 21 government employees appearing on the notorious EPO list circulated to Cabinet Ministers in June, 1971. Apparently EPO stands for Extra-Parliamentary Opposition. The PMO press office confirmed that Crenna, whose title is social policy adviser, was on the list. Of late, he has figured prominently in press stories as the covert agent sent to Washington to get the dirt on the Leader of the official Opposition. Apparently what he got from the SEC were some prospectuses and salaries, and we know about that. The article says:

> Back in 1971, the shoe was on the other foot. This graduate of the London School of Economics was identified by secret service analysts as one of several sources of subversion burrowing into the Canadian bureaucracy.

Here are a few extracts from Mr. Goyer's letter of June 15, 1971, the Minister who was investigating him:

> I have recently received a report containing information which the Security Service has accumulated about the concept of "Extra-Parliamentary Opposition" . . . as interpreted by advocates of the New Left in Canada.

Those vicious New Lefters, Mr. Speaker. It goes on:

> The report also draws attention to the activities of various persons and groups, some of them employees of the Federal Government, who support the EPO concept and who appear to have as their aim the destruction of the existing political and social structure in Canada.
> The EPO concept, in the context of the New Left, does not mean legitimate pressure group activity but rather the creation of counter or parallel institutions within society—

Imagine, Mr. Speaker, a counter-culture within Canada being established by an activist now in the PMO. It continues:

> Through such institutions the New Left seeks to organize and radicalize the "underclasses" of society and mould them into a revolutionary force capable of overthrowing the socio-political system . . .

He might even have been against the Liberals in those days, who knows. I use this example because I think it shows how easy it is for our society and people in power to abuse the freedom of individuals. Certainly this new force will add to that risk, not solve the problem.

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I have one of those difficult ridings to remember. It is difficult for many people to understand where exactly it is. Do I represent the entire province or not? I always like to point out that I represent an area between Toronto and the place where the NDP members enter into Parliament. They are very proud of me in my riding because I am there to defend them against the socialists to my left.

I was shocked and dismayed this afternoon by the Deputy Whip, who I always felt was a gentleman. I do not believe he came up with this idea on his own. I believe it was the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Evans) who did, because that gentleman is evil, Mr. Speaker.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fennell: He is evil. He is the kind of person who destroys the image of the House of Commons. The people in the gallery have been here today to see what that Party is trying to shove down the throats of Canadians. I do not believe the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) was involved as much as the Parliamentary Secretary. However, I am delighted to be speaking on this Bill because there is very little in it that I can commend. I sincerely believe that the Solicitor General does not understand the Bill.

Mr. Kaplan: Get serious.

Mr. Evans: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. I know the people watching on television can understand the Hon. Member was calling me evil in a jocular way, but it certainly will not show up that way in Hansard. I wonder if he would mind clarifying that, because I know he was doing it in a joking fashion.

Mr. Dick: It is a legitimate point of debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): I would have to check the "blues" to see if there is really a point of order, but perhaps the Hon. Member can consider what he has said.

Mr. Fennell: I do not have Roget's Thesaurus in front of me, but if I did I would call him mischievous.

Mr. Evans: I will agree with that.

Mr. Fennell: I will withdraw the word "evil". Yet I think he understands the point I was making.

As I was saying, before I was so rudely interrupted by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council, I do not believe the Solicitor General really understands this Bill. In a speech, the Attorney General of Ontario quoted the Minister of Justice of France who said that freedom cannot defend itself by taking measures which kill liberties. That is what we are talking about, Mr. Speaker. We are talking about the fear of Canadians that this Bill will remove their liberties.

The reason I really want to speak on this Bill, Mr. Speaker, is that I as a Canadian am very proud of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. It is one of our great traditions and part of our heritage. It is criminal to take the responsibilities they have handled so well out of their hands, yet leave it to them to implement any prosecutions which must be made. There is a secret force to collect the information, yet its members will have to depend on that very fine organization, the RCMP, to implement any action which must be taken. I strongly believe this responsibility should remain with the RCMP.

There is a great danger of our rights being eroded, Mr. Speaker. So many have been in the five years I have been here that I am ashamed of not having been able to stop it. The rights of Members of Parliament have been eroded.

Mr. Kaplan: How?

Mr. Fennell: The Solicitor General knows that we spend hours in committee and no one listens to us.

Mr. Kaplan: I know we passed a Charter of Rights and Freedoms and a Freedom of Information Act.

Mr. Fennell: That is great. I am glad he brought out the Freedom of Information Act.

Mr. Kaplan: It is your ten minutes.

Mr. Fennell: Yes, and I would just like to talk about that. Under the Freedom of Information Act we are supposed to have access to all information. A report was made by an independent agency called the Shielding Corporation, yet the Minister responsible for social development cut 35 pages from the report which he did not want us to see. What good is freedom of information if the Government can select what you are going to see and what you are not going to see? I am glad the Solicitor General brought that out.

What I object to about this Bill, Mr. Speaker, is the power given to this agency which is not responsible to the House of Commons. It can open our mail. If can open a letter from my daughter to myself, from my son, from anyone, and that is infringing upon my right and the rights of 150,000 people who live in my riding. It can go through my medical records. There are many people who go to a psychiatrist, sometimes during their lifetime, in order to get help. This agency will have the right to seek information from doctors and psychiatrists in this country.

This agency will be permitted to go through tax files. In light of the inefficient and corrupt practices of Revenue Canada, it is possible that the information this agency obtains will be inaccurate.

This Bill permits the taping of telephone conversations. Russia has a ship stationed off the Cape of Good Hope that is equipped with a computer to monitor conversations throughout the world through the use of a satellite. Whenever a trigger word, such as "agent" is heard, the computer automatically records that information so that it can be assessed. The same thing takes place in our country.

I also discovered that it is not necessary to bug our phones, our homes or offices. It is possible, through the use of laser beams, to cut into a private conversation which I may be having in my office. Although this agency is to be given those rights, they are not spelled out in the Bill. New technology has changed everything, but we must remember that those practices infringe upon our liberties.

Today many people have personal computers in their homes. The security service will be able to intercept the use of personal computers. This is another infringement on our rights. The interconnecting of computers into main frames to seek information is a whole new subject that must be dealt with. No one should have the right to do that, but this service will.

I suggest that this Bill represents a total invasion of privacy. No one trusts the Government any longer because it has acted so immorally. The actions it has taken have been ill-conceived and have had a serious effect on the economy of this country. No one believes that the Government would bring in legislation for a security service that would do anything but erode the civil liberties of Canadians.

Small business people in this country are having enough trouble without this service being able to listen in on them and then, in some contrived fashion, bring an action against them. That would destroy investment in Canada which creates jobs.

Our Party has taken a strong stand against this Bill, and we will continue to do so. We must remember that this Bill was not conceived in the Justice Committee but was born in the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) Office. The Government even attempted to sneak it through a Senate committee, but even its own colleagues in the Senate spoke against the Bill. I appreciate the opportunity to speak, and we will hear a great deal more from my colleagues.

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to take a few moments to intervene on this motion that was put by the Government. I will not dwell on the fact that this motion, in effect, is an attempt to muzzle debate in the House of Commons since no further amendments can be put. The argument against the motion is not so much that other amendments cannot be put, but simply that the Government has shown its complete ineptness by moving such a motion. It does not have a sense of what is happening in this Chamber. If the Government had attempted to co-operate, there would have been a very good chance for this bill to have been passed today. When it deliberately antagonizes the Opposition, the Opposition will take the opportunity to debate this matter.

When I had the opportunity to speak on this Bill last week, I said that the only reason our Party was anxious to continue debate and not have the Bill go to committee was that we wanted the Government to give the committee the right to travel. However, the Government indicated its fear of being brought down if its members were away travelling. I think the Government would have received some co-operation from us. For instance, if the committee that was travelling was comprised of six government Members, three of our Members and perhaps an NDP Member, we would ensure that two other people in addition to the four who are travelling would not vote in order to ensure that an equal number is away from the Chamber. I put that proposition to the Government last week so that it would not have any fear of being defeated while the committee was travelling. The government Party would not need to be afraid of being defeated during this time when they are seeking a leader. I do not know if they will find any leadership within their corps, perhaps only a few retreads.

The difficulty is that the Government does not want the committee to travel. What is annoying about that is that only the wealthy people in this country will be able to attend the committee hearings as witnesses because they can afford to pay for hotels and air fare. There are average citizens and community organizations from areas like Esquimalt, Vancouver, Edmonton, Winnipeg or Yarmouth in Nova Scotia that might wish and might be able to contribute something if a hearing were held in areas near them. However, they might not be able to afford to come to Ottawa to make their presentations before the committee here, so that it will be only the well-heeled and well-established organizations from which we will hear when the committee sits to discuss this Bill.

The fact that the Government has taken 17 years to bring this Bill forward is no reason for having to rush through it in a day or two or on four Friday afternoons in a row. If the Government wanted to be responsible, democratic and listen to what Canadians felt about this Bill, it would go out of its way to ensure that concerned average Canadians of modest means are able to give their evidence before the committee. In order to do that, it should allow the committee to travel.

I believe the committee should have the right to travel, and even during the dying hours of debate at second reading I hope the Government will reconsider its strident and arrogant position of insisting that everyone must come to Ottawa to give evidence to the committee. I believe this would significantly increase the input into a Bill which gives the potential right to delve into the most minute areas of private life and political activity.

This is a Bill seeking to establish a Security Intelligence Service that can potentially spy on citizens and inquire into the political activities of organizations throughout the country. Since it has the potential for intruding into the civil liberties of the average Canadian, I believe it to be prudent to permit the committee to travel and to hear from Canadians from all over the country.

The fact that the Government has moved a foolish little motion—which it certainly has the right to do—just shows that it certainly does not read the pulse of this Chamber or understand what is going on. But that is not new. The Government has not understood what has been happening for at least four years. Of course, the polls indicate that.

Mr. Pepin: For twenty years.

Mr. Dick: The Hon. Minister of State for External Relations (Mr. Pepin) understands that they have been misjudging the people for many years as well.

Mr. Pepin: Twenty.

Mr. Dick: I don't know. I have not been involved for that long. I am not as old hat as that, but maybe you are.

Mr. Evans: You have not been involved for the last four years.

Mr. Dick: I think I have a pretty good pulse on the people, and I can say that I have a much higher percentage of popular vote in my riding than you have in yours.

Mr. Evans: Do you want to bet?

Mr. Dick: Yes, gladly. However, those are only a couple of comments from that mischievous, sometimes referred to as evil, rather arrogant and boisterous Parliamentary Secretary who wants to try to muzzle the House. Common sense would tell him to travel and learn what the people want. Do not insist on putting those people of modest means to great expense. You would strike a deal with opposition Parties. They do not want to try to bring down the Government when it is searching for a leader—

• (1540)

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Dick: —unless the Liberals show continued absolute ineptitude. Their only worry is that they do not have pairs for a committee of six people. I say, "Come and we will strike a deal. We will make sure that because this committee is travelling your Government will not be defeated". If, however, you are incompetent in other areas, then that is another kettle of fish and, of course, if you do prove to be incompetent in other areas, you will not be able to point your finger at this committee having travelled.

I encourage the Government to reflect, to think and to stop its arrogant approach to things. I encourage it to be more democratic, to ask the people and to listen to the people especially, because this Bill can invade the privacy of individuals, it can invade political organizations and it can invade civil liberties and civil rights in that it is a Bill that deals with the Security and Intelligence Service. It is so important that all Canadians from all walks of life and of various means should have an opportunity to make representations. I encourage this Government to reflect and to try, through co-operation rather than the usual confrontational approach, to get along and see if it cannot do things a little more democratically.

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Mr. Speaker, like other speakers on this side of the House this afternoon, I am somewhat disappointed by the Government for the trick it has pulled today. I will not call anyone on the other side any nasty names, unlike other Members, but I do not think respect is shown for the House of Commons when one tries to close off debate on a Bill that is clearly controversial and clearly unpopular among most Canadians.

This is evidence of the hypocrisy of this Government that can bring in a Charter of Rights and Freedoms, to which most of us in this House assented and which most of us find to be a good piece of legislation, while in the same Parliament it can bring in a piece of legislation which will take away or limit some of those rights and freedoms.

In the few minutes available to me this afternoon, I want to relate a personal experience which shows how this Bill would threaten the right of Members of the House of Commons to conduct themselves freely in representing their constituents. This experience took place in the fall of 1979. I had been a Member of the House for a matter of three or four months then. Indeed, the House had been sitting only a few days when circumstances started that led to the whole business that I am going to relate. The first chance I had to ask questions in the House of Commons occurred on October 12, 1979. I raised a couple of questions concerning the new fighter program. At the time they related to both the F-18 and the F-16. I directed these questions to the then Minister of National Defence, the Hon. Member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon). In one of the questions I raised I referred to a report from a Government Department which indicated that one of the two companies that was the finalist in the competition for the new fighter aircraft had not been dealing in good faith in the opinion of bureaucrats in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In referring to that report I pointed out that it had never been officially released by the Government. I asked the Minister of National Defence to release it. I mentioned that I had a copy of the report in my possession. In answering my question in the House, the Minister of National Defence said:

> Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the philosophy of the defence critic for the NDP that this is going to be something that will not be absolutely necessary. We do not enter into these purchases lightly.
> As far as the report is concerned alleging that the competition was a sham, I believe the report was not quite the one that it is purported to be. It was leaked some time ago. I did not find it worth while commenting on at the time. It was turned down at the first level of review. I am sorry the hon. member has taken it so seriously. The leaking of reports on a serious matter like this makes it more difficult to carry on negotiations, but negotiations have been carried on in a fair and competitive manner despite the leaking of that report.

That can be found in Hansard at page 123. I quoted from Hansard to indicate that the Minister said rather clearly that the report was really inconsequential, that it was peanuts as far as the government of the day was concerned.

After this exchange had occurred and about a month and a half later, the home of an Ottawa journalist, the journalist who had been researching material relating to that leaked report, was raided by the RCMP. I rose in the House on November 26, 1979, to question the then Prime Minister about this raid. I asked him to release guidelines which had been promised that would outline the powers of the RCMP in matters such as this. The then Prime Minister told me that this search and seizure of the reporter's papers had taken place under the authority of what he called "informal documents". He told me that these documents were about to be replaced. He also admitted that day that these informal documents:

> —had not been approved by the Government of Canada—the predecessor Government or our own—and, indeed, of whose existence until this affair I did not know.

What we had, Mr. Speaker, was a case where the Mounties at this time were operating without clear guidelines, at least none of which the Prime Minister was aware. I should hasten to point out that they were not acting on their own in this case but under the direction of a very uneasy and clearly embarrassed deputy minister of defence. A day or two later I learned that the RCMP had obtained a warrant to search my office in this building for the leaked material to which I had referred in the House a couple of months earlier, that leaked material being material which the Minister of National Defence had told me was inconsequential. As it turned out it was only as a result of a refusal by the Speaker of the day that the RCMP was not allowed to search my office.

On November 30, 1979 I raised a question of privilege, a part of which I shall read into the record as follows:

> I do not believe that a member of Parliament is above the law, but as you, sir, pointed out to the RCMP when they contacted you, I am not guilty of any wrongdoing and, therefore, there should be no need for such a search. For your support and the support of the House leaders, I offer my thanks . . .
> I believe that my rights and privileges will be affected by any search of my office for information it is not unlawful for me to have. Should any search be allowed, my relationship with my constituents will be adversely affected and so, too, will the rights and privileges of all members of this House . . .
> Is it the policy of this government, without prima facie evidence, to authorize RCMP officers to set out on fishing expeditions in the offices of members of Parliament?

The question then, of course, was rhetorical for I surely believed that my privileges as a Member of this House could not be so easily violated. Mr. Speaker Jerome upheld my belief.

I would like to believe, Mr. Speaker, that those privileges are still held sacred, but it appears on looking at Bill C-9, that this is not the case. Early in February, 1984 I read in The Globe and Mail a report emanating from Ottawa which confirmed my fears. It seems that our current Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) has admitted he has no qualms about this new civilian intelligence agency breaking into the offices of Members of Parliament.

Mr. Kaplan: A warrant authorized by a judge.

Mr. Sargeant: If the piece of legislation we are currently debating had been in effect in 1979 and if the Solicitor General who sits across the House from us in 1984 has his way, my office could have been raided, simply on the approval of a judge.

Mr. Kaplan: With a warrant and an affidavit.

• (1550)

Mr. Sargeant: "With a warrant", the Minister says. We are talking about a state of affairs or a historical fact which has been in place since the days of Cromwell when the King invaded the House of Commons in Westminster and shut down Parliament.

Some Hon. Members: What do you have to hide?

Mr. Sargeant: I hear Hon. Members asking what I have to hide. If Members of the House of Commons are not allowed to act in the best interests of their constituents, if they are not allowed to act freely, and if their offices can be raided by whatever agency a government sets up and gives authority to, clearly the privileges of Members are being violated. Clearly it is violating the historical fact that the House of Commons and the offices of Members who, by extension and the precedent of the Jerome ruling in 1979, are part of the House of Commons. They are taking away a historical right. They are violating a democracy which has been in place for hundreds and hundreds of years.

Sadly, under this particular piece of legislation a very basic tenet of our democracy could be violated or lost. They sit over there today rather smugly, asking what we have to hide, to what we are objecting, and saying that it is all right with a warrant.

Some Hon. Members: What are you afraid of?

Mr. Sargeant: I am afraid of Parliament being violated. They sit there rather smugly, saying that there is nothing wrong with taking away the historical privileges of Parliament.

Mr. Evans: Why don't you send it to committee where that can be investigated?

Mr. Sargeant: I see Mr. Speaker signalling that my time is almost up. I will ignore the rabble across the aisle because I may not be so charitable; I may use some of the unkind language which was used earlier in the debate today.

In conclusion, obviously we have to object to this piece of legislation. It threatens rights in the country. It threatens our democracy. We will oppose it as much as we can.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I want to take advantage of the last few minutes remaining before four o'clock to speak in this debate on second reading and, especially, to speak to the motion moved by the Hon. Member for La Prairie (Mr. Deniger). First of all, I can give my colleagues opposite the assurance that at four o'clock, we shall proceed with private members business, and that at five o'clock we shall adjourn as usual. I do not intend to take advantage of the absence of Opposition Members today to extend the sitting hours of the House. I therefore ask the Members of the Opposition to listen carefully so that they will understand the nature of the procedure now being debated instead of being unduly concerned about having to sit beyond normal sitting hours.

Mr. Speaker, the legislation now before the House is not new, although it bears the number C-9. It was introduced subsequent to a Bill that was presented during the previous session as Bill C-157, which, after being very substantially amended, was introduced as Bill C-9, the Bill now being considered by the House.

To understand the action taken by the Member for La Prairie, we must realize that the subject matter of the Bill to establish a Canadian Security Intelligence Service was considered by the Senate for two months, and significantly, the Bill was referred to the Senate after the New Democratic Party had systematically obstructed the first reading of Bill C-157, an unusual and very rare occurrence in the House.

Thus, the Government's very first attempt to create this security service met with an entirely negative, irrational and irresponsible reaction on the part of the New Democratic Party, which refused to allow the Government to introduce the Bill. If they had challenged the Bill on second reading, at the time, it would have been clear that they wanted to improve the legislation and make an intelligent contribution. However, it was when the Government first attempted to bring the subject before the House that the New Democratic Party obstructed its attempts systematically, not because it wanted to express its own point of view, but because it simply wanted to create obstruction and prevent the tabling of this Bill. During the previous session, we had to vote on first reading and subsequently refer the subject matter to the Senate. For two months, the Senate heard witnesses and considered the question. The Solicitor General listened, consulted and finally amended, so that the Bill now before the House, Bill C-9, is an improved piece of legislation which takes into account the views of the Canadian people and of those who have an interest in the security of this country.

Therefore, if we understand the nature of the debate and how the Canadian Parliamentary system works, there is no reason to get upset when at this stage, a Government member tries to bring this debate to a logical conclusion, so that the Bill can be referred to Committee, where it can still be amended.

Perhaps Hon. Members will care to recall that before today, twenty-five Members had spoken to Bill C-9 at the second reading stage. That is impressive, considering the fact that on second reading, only the principle of a Bill is to be examined before referring the Bill to Committee, where, after witnesses have been heard, it is examined in detail, clause by clause. The Bill can be amended at this stage. After committee, there is the report stage where once again, amendments may be considered, and finally, there is third reading, before the Bill goes to the other Chamber, to the Senate, for consideration once again at all stages.

What we are seeing here today, is that after twenty-five Members have had an opportunity to express their views, a Member of the Opposition, who is a Member of the New Democratic Party, rises to say that they intend to move an amendment and delay second reading of the Bill for three months. I think this is unreasonable. It does not make sense, because although this is obviously a way to systematically obstruct a piece of legislation, it certainly does not help the House deal with this legislation in a sensible manner, and make sensible improvements. At this point, the Government had to act responsibly. We have a host of legislative measures on the Order Paper and we must also deal with Supply proceedings and the Government's requirement for borrowing certain sums of money which will be needed very shortly. We have all these measures which must be put before the House, and we cannot tolerate that at the preliminary stage of the debate on each Bill, Hon. Members try to cause undue delay and indulge in systematic obstruction.

Therefore, the procedure followed by the Member for La Prairie (Mr. Deniger) is entirely proper. Sir John A. MacDonald used it in the constitutional debate at the very beginning of Confederation. In fact, I referred to it when we used the same procedure in the debate on the Crow.

This procedure quite simply prevents the introduction of amendments on second reading—dilatory amendments, according to the information given by the New Democratic Party—and makes it possible for every Member who chooses to continue to abuse the time of the House to speak for ten additional minutes before the Bill is referred to the committee. I hope that, under the circumstances, Hon. Members will have the decency of not abusing the time of the House and the reasonable procedure we have used. I hope that after hearing 25 Members before today, plus 18 more once I am through, Mr. Speaker, which adds up to some 45 speeches on second reading, as early as Monday we will be able to see the light at the end of the tunnel, so that this very important Bill to establish a Canadian Security Service will be considered in committee by Members on both sides of the House who will hear witnesses, examine every detail of the Bill and introduce amendments if it can be improved. We have already proved that we are reasonable and that we are prepared to accept amendments. We have done that and the door is still open. However, it would be ridiculous at this stage if Members were to prevent the Bill from moving forward and being improved, and that is what we are trying to avoid by using this procedure.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would urge my colleagues to have a constructive debate on this Bill on Canadian security. The best way to do that, in my opinion, would be to have the second reading vote at the end of the day Monday, so that the committee will be able to consider the Bill and leave the House free to study other measures which are required for Canada's economic and social development.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order, please. It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed with Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

IMMIGRATION ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING REFUGEE STATUS

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina) moved that Bill C-219, an Act to amend the Immigration At, 1976 (determination of refugee status), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this Bill if passed will save a great deal of human anguish for people who are claiming refugee status and will save the administration of Canada, particularly in the Immigration Department, a great deal of expense and time. This Bill would alter the present system by which those who come to Canada and claim refugee status within Canada are examined in order to determine whether their claim to refugee status meets Canada's law. At present the system is very slow, as everyone will agree. Everybody concerned is very unhappy with the slowness. This Bill proposes a system which has been shown by experiment to be very effective in overcoming these problems.

The Bill is very simple. Section 45 of the Immigration Act would be amended by adding immediately after subsection 4 the following:

—before advising the Minister pursuant to subsection (4), the Refugee Status Advisory Committee shall, by notice in writing, afford the person who claims that he is a Convention refugee an opportunity to be heard and, at any such hearing, that person or his representative may adduce evidence, documentary or oral, in support of his claim.

That is all I am asking. It would not only benefit many thousands of people who must now wait in uncertainty and difficulty, but it would benefit the Immigration Department by removing one of the very serious hindrances to its present operation.

In brief, our refugee procedure is as follows for inland determination of refugee status. A person comes to a port of entry and declares that he is a refugee, or perhaps he has already entered the country on a visitor's visa or a student's visa. Because of changes in his country, at the expiration of his visa he makes a claim for refugee status. That is within the present law. After he makes that claim his case is then heard before an Immigration officer and a transcript is made of his evidence. The Refugee Status Advisory Committee examines that transcript and any other evidence it may have that bears on the truth or falseness of his claim, evidence which is unknown to the claimant. He does not know what other evidence is being heard before the committee because he is not present at the hearing of the committee which decides his fate. The committee decides on his fate without ever hearing, meeting or seeing the man or woman whose fate they are deciding. I use the word "fate" because when a person is claiming refugee status, he is claiming that if he returns to his home he will be persecuted. Under our law, if he is judged a refugee, he is a person with a well-founded fear of persecution. This means he could well be killed. We are dealing with someone whose life is in danger. Under our present system, that person does not have a chance to stand before the people who are making a life-and-death decision. That person is normally not considered a criminal. There may be a few cases where a refugee applicant is alleged to have done something that places him possibly in a criminal category. I am speaking of the great majority against whom no criminal accusation is made. An innocent person may be judged in such a way as to be sent to his or her death by people who never lay eyes on that person, never hear that person speak, never have a chance to ask that person questions or never give that person a chance to correct any misunderstandings.

That is easy enough when it is all in one language, but some of these people do not speak English and have to work through interpreters. The Refugee Status Advisory Committee does not have a chance to make its own judgment as to whether or not that person is speaking the truth. This puts both the refugee claimant and the advisory committee in a very unjust situation. It is a situation which goes against the principle in our law which is that an accused person, in this case not accused but treated like an accused, has the right to stand before his or her judge and be seen directly. That is fundamental in our court procedure. It should be fundamental in dealing with usually innocent refugees who, if the decision goes against them, may be sent back to persecution, torture or death.

There are some safeguards. There is the Immigration Appeal Board. The refugee claimant who loses his case before the Refugee Status Advisory Committee may appeal to the IAB. If he loses there, he may appeal to the Federal Court of Appeal, or even to the Supreme Court, provided those courts give permission for the appeal to be made. The problem is that even there he will not be able to appear in his own cause. Those courts will examine only the transcript and documentary evidence put before them, usually by those who disagree with the person whose claim has already been judged unfounded.

We have a system which has grown up little by little and has become congealed into law which is not in keeping with the justice of our court system. The system has two main faults. I have described one, that the claimant goes unheard by his or her judges. I can put the word "judges" in quotation marks. They are not formally judges, but they act like judges in this case. He or she has no chance to answer, correct misunderstandings or be directly judged as to truthfulness and untruthfulness. There is a denial of what we consider to be natural justice. That is one fault. The other fault is that the system is amazingly slow. It takes about a year and a half on average from the time the refugee is first examined under oath until the time when the Minister makes the determination on the recommendation of the committee. In the meantime, the refugee claimant is in limbo. He or she does not know what will happen. Refugee claimants may be allowed to work by being given work permits, but their status is very unclear. The status of their spouses and children is very unclear as well. They live for a year and a half in a kind of purgatory or limbo.

On the other hand, there are the cumbersome procedures within our Immigration Department such as the writing of transcripts by contract groups, the distribution and reading of those transcripts and so on. As I said, even with the best will in the world, this process takes an average of a year and a half to resolve.

For several years many requests have been made that this process be speeded up through the use of oral hearings. Amnesty International, a highly respected body with which the Government works closely, has asked for such a procedure. The Inter-Church Committee on Human Rights in Latin America, which is concerned with many, many refugee claimants from Latin American countries, has asked for this procedure. The Inter-Church Committee on Refugees has asked for it as well. In particular, the Government's own report of 1981 has asked for this procedure. I refer to the report entitled The Refugee Status Determination Process, a report of the task force on immigration practices and procedures established by the then Minister of Employment and Immigration in September, 1980. The task force reported 14 months later in November, 1981 under the signature of the chairman, W. G. Robinson, a highly respected lawyer who has the confidence of the Government. I shall quote from page xvi of the introduction. It reads:

> Independent material should not be weighed against the claimant unless it has been expressly brought to his attention either at the examination or at a re-examination and he has had the opportunity to respond to it.

That could be carried out in the course of an oral examination. Otherwise we would not know if that was carried out. Further, and this can happen at a refugee claimant hearing:

> A person whose credibility is being impeached should be put on notice and given the opportunity of explaining.

Again, that follows naturally from an oral hearing and would otherwise be very uncertain. The final recommendation is this:

> A refugee claimant should be entitled to a hearing in every case where the RSAC is not prepared to make a positive recommendation on the basis of the transcript. The claimant who is granted a hearing should be given notice of the substance of the objections to his claim. At the hearing, the transcript of the examination should be taken as having been "read in" to evidence.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, for nearly four years this request for oral hearings has been before the Government. This request has been made by the most responsible citizens in the country who deal with refugee matters.

In response, the Government initiated a pilot project 10 months ago in which some refugee claimants were invited to take part. It was a different kind of examination, namely, one at which a member of the Refugee Status Advisory Committee would be present. This is not required by law but it does not contravene the law. So the pilot project was attempted, and what were the results? The sample is small. Something like only 170 people were considered for the pilot project. However, what is very clear is that one of the objections has been quite remarkably answered by this procedure. Instead of taking 18 months on average from the time of the examination under oath to the time of the Minister's decision, this procedure took not much more than two months. The waiting time was cut to one-sixth of the time. That means that about 15 or 16 months of suffering, anxiety and perhaps poverty on the part of the refugee claimant and family were eliminated by this procedure.

Likewise, an immense amount of paperwork and staffing costs for the Immigration Department were eliminated. I do not know if this would result in unemployment for members of the Immigration Commission. I am sure that if some of them were not needed, the Government would be able to find other more useful work for them. It is clearly in the interests of everyone that this experiment, which after 10 months has been successful, should become the law so that every refugee claimant will have the same opportunity as these 170 refugee claimants who participated in the experiment.

One big problem is that the number of refugee claimants has been growing very fast. About two and a half years ago, about 2,000 people in Canada were claiming refugee status and their cases have not yet been finally disposed of. This was considered to have put an intolerable burden on the administration of the Immigration Department and on the country generally because these people had to live somehow while they waited and waited to find out whether they could stay as refugees or be made to leave. It was considered such an intolerable burden that the Government, two and a half years ago, imposed a visa requirement on East Indians. So many people had come in such a short time from India claiming refugee status and it was felt that their claims were generally not well founded. However, it would take so much time to determine if those claims were not well founded that the Government had to take the other course of action of imposing a visa requirement on all visitors from India.

Now the Government has imposed a visa requirement on Guatemalans who are fleeing a well documented brutal oppression under a murderous Government. These refugees are trying to get away from that situation, but our Government has now slammed the door and said that they cannot come to Canada without a visa. The same has happened to people from Guyana who also live under a brutal and oppressive Government. This week the Government has slammed the door and said that refugees from Guatemala cannot come to Canada without a visa.

While many Guatemalan refugees may be in danger of their lives, they cannot come to Canada. Theoretically they could go to the Canadian Embassy in Georgetown and ask for a visa. They could then go home and wait for an answer, but they would also be waiting for the people who threatened them to come and do exactly what they have threatened to do because they were seen to be asking for refugee status in Canada. If we could speed up the time taken by these refugee hearings from 18 months to two months, there would be no need to slam the door on the people who are fleeing bloody dictatorships. The door was slammed on people from Chile, El Salvador and now Guatemala and Guyana.

As I understand it, the opposition to this Bill is simply that the entire refugee procedure needs to be overhauled. I do not doubt that, but after three or four years I hope we can go ahead with this one suggestion. I hope that it might be moved that the substance of the Bill that I have proposed will go to committee so that we could consider there the merits of making this one small change to the law which would save so much time and so much misery.

Mr. Denis Ethier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, in his very interesting and thought-provoking speech, the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap) has identified some of the concerns about refugee status determination with which the Department of Employment and Immigration deals on a day-to-day basis. In a moment I would like to put some of those problems in perspective for him and for other Members of the House.

First let me say that the issues referred to by the Hon. Member are not new to the Minister or to his departmental staff. Indeed, there is a continuing review of policy in this area and it is no coincidence that this process has developed a refugee program which is so highly regarded internationally. However, there are no easy, quick-fix solutions to what has become over the last few years one of the most bedevilling of immigration problems. I am sure that all interested parties, including the Members opposite, want a workable, humanitarian policy that will provide help to those who are truly in need. That means we have to put in place a program that separates those who might abuse the system from individuals who truly need access to a fair refugee determination system.

• (1620)

There is no denying that our system of refugee determination, while admired by officials at the United Nations and in other countries, encounters some problems. A major, very perplexing problem is that it has become increasingly difficult to identify true refugees quickly while enabling the removal of those whose claims are without merit and who seek, for their own reasons, to take advantage of the system. But the trick is to find answers that are not simplistic, that will not worsen the current situation and put an even heavier burden on the resources that we are able to commit to the worthwhile endeavour of aiding bona fide refugees.

The Geneva Convention on Refugee Status defines a refugee as a person who, by reason of a well-founded fear of persecution for reasons of race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group or political opinion, is (a) outside the country of his nationality and is unable or, by reason of such fear, is unwilling to avail himself of the protection of that country, or, (b) not having a country of nationality, is outside the country of his former habitual residence and is unable or, by reason of fear, is unwilling to return to that country.

Because Canada is not located next to a country from which it was anticipated large numbers of refugees would arrive, decision makers, including Members of the joint parliamentary committee and the Cabinet, decided that this country's principal role in refugee programs would be the resettling of refugees already in countries of first asylum. In this way, Canada plays an essential role in helping countries of first refuge to be more generous in their attitude toward people fleeing their homelands for legitimate reasons. Bearing this in mind, the refugee determination process established in Canada was expected to deal only with small numbers of people. This initial assumption has proven to be somewhat ill-founded.

The determination system written into the Immigration Act of 1976 gave the right to anyone facing removal from Canada to make a claim for refugee status. That applies not only to persons trying to enter the country but also to those who have been in Canada for any period of time as a visitor or immigrant. The 1976 amendments also provided for establishment of the Refugee Status Advisory Committee, which has the authority to examine refugee claims and recommend to the Minister whether they are legitimate or unfounded. The Minister was given decision-making powers over the validity of claims and there could be a second evaluation of rejected claims by the Immigration Appeal Board.

The process does not stop there. Refugee claimants have the right to appeal to the courts to contest the legality of the review process by which their claims were heard. They have appeal rights under Section 28 of the Federal Court Act, and decisions by the Federal Court can be taken to the Supreme Court of Canada.

In the meantime, until their status if finally determined, claimants are able to stay in Canada. Canada does not remove or deport individuals awaiting determination of a refugee claim.

What has happened, in fact, is that most claims for refugee status have not been accepted by the Minister as valid, but few have departed from the country within reasonable time limits. And it has proved impossible administratively to move even obviously unfounded cases through the system very quickly. Advocacy groups which have argued that the review process is not sufficiently fair, have encouraged claimants to exhaust all the permissible legal avenues. This has exacerbated the already lengthy refugee determination backlogs.

As delays in the process lengthened, there were systematic attempts at abuse of the refugee determination system. People who were temporarily residing in Canada soon noticed that a way of remaining here and working was to claim refugee status. It was apparent that even the weakest claims took almost as much time to settle as the most complex. Toward the end of 1980, there was an influx of about 2,000 claimants from India whose primary purpose for coming to Canada was economic; to find a job in Canada with the hope of remaining. Nearly all the claims were unfounded, but they clogged the review system. This made the delays even more protracted as it showed others how to manipulate the system by claiming refugee status and thereby avoiding early removal from Canada.

Other countries have faced this dilemma, with increasing numbers of people claiming refugee status at a time of economic distress in their countries of origin. In fact, these individuals were attempting to change their country of residence for purely economic reasons. Recipient countries, like Germany, Sweden and Switzerland, reacted by tightening their refugee restrictions at a time when Canada was liberalizing hers.

The dramatic rise in the number of people coming to Canada in the last 18 months and claiming refugee status has placed a heavy burden on resources of those who must determine whether that claim is legitimate. Worse, it torments those whom the system is designed to help. It exposes genuine refugees to hardship because of the delay in reaching a decision on their claim and impairs immigration controls because of the inability to remove the unsuccessful claimants from Canada. Bona fide refugees can no longer be identified quickly and effectively.

The refugee determination committee can no longer keep pace with the volume of claims being received. For example, in the 30-month period between April, 1981 and October, 1983, the number of cases in the claims-appeals system increased to 9,100 from 2,500, not including another 1,500 cases awaiting entry into the system because of inadequate staff resources to do the initial documentation. While the acceptance rate of claims has risen to 38 per cent from 20 per cent since 1981, fewer than 3,000 rejected claims have been brought to conclusion. At the same time, organized attempts to enter the system have proliferated.

At the Refugee Status Advisory Committee level, efforts have been made to make the system as fair and open as possible. The capacity of the committee was increased through appointment of new Private Members and greater administrative back-up. An oral interview project was begun in June, 1983 to help identify bona fide refugees more quickly. Yet, despite the changes, the committee's backlog had increased to 2,400 cases from 1,600 cases by the end of last year. Some cases have been expedited, but the backlog continues to mount.

Similar problems have been encountered by the Immigration Appeal Board. Only cases of evident merit go before the board for a full hearing. An average period of one year elapses before a full hearing occurs. At the Federal Court, the average delay is now six months for a hearing. Between last August, 15 and September, 26 at the Federal Court of Appeal of Toronto, 94 per cent of the cases heard were immigration cases.

The result is that with three and four years' delays in processing being now routine, we have what amounts to an immigration movement of substantial proportions that has not been managed or regulated by the Government.

What must be concluded, therefore, is that the Bill does not go far enough. The Hon. Member for Spadina proposes oral hearings as an extra feature of the refugee determination process. But what is he trying to achieve? Is the current system unfair? No. Are refugees being sent away? No. Mr. Speaker, the problem is delay, and my hon. friend's Bill will do nothing to deal with that.

I therefore must oppose his proposal.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I must commend the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap) for raising this important subject which is certainly deserving of continued study and thought by all of us.

● (1630)

The Hon. Member's Bill deals with people in Canada, not those selected abroad for permanent residence in Canada as is the case with some well known refugee movements, for example, from Vietnam, Hungary, Uganda and so on. The Hon. Member's Bill deals with those who come to Canada and then apply for refugee status. We do have an obligation by virtue of our signature to the Geneva Convention on Refugee Status in 1969, to ensure that people are not sent back to their own countries if their fear of persecution is real. It is essential that they receive a fair hearing and, moreover, it must be seen by others that natural justice prevails.

Oral hearings do have a very general appeal. Claimants certainly feel more satisfied if they have direct access to those making recommendations about their future. I am sure that members of the Refugee Status Advisory Committee, as they examine sworn statements, must sometimes encounter doubts which could be resolved by a simple question or brief conversation with the claimant. Our refugee policies and practices are subject to ongoing review and in fact, as has been said, a modified program of oral hearings was introduced last year in May in Montreal and in June in Toronto. In my view, that program should be extended.

However, before guaranteeing all applicants the right to a hearing, it will be necessary to take other steps to ensure that the refugee determination process, which is already very lengthy, does not become more so for refugees who want to get on with establishing their new lives in Canada.

The Geneva Convention on Refugee Status defines a refugee as a person who, by reason of a well founded fear of persecution, for reasons of race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group or political opinion is, first, outside of the country of his nationality and is unable, or by reason of such fear, is unwilling to avail himself of the protection of that country or, second, not having a country of nationality, is outside the country of his former habitual residence and is unable, or by reason of fear, is unwilling to return to that country. This definition has, from time to time, appeared somewhat limiting, and so in Canada we have had on occasion special programs for people who did not meet the definition of the Geneva Convention on Refugee Status but who clearly were in need of special humanitarian and compassionate treatment. The refugee movements from Chile and Lebanon, for instance, are two examples of this kind.

When the new Immigration Act was written in 1976, I was Chairman of the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, and the question of dealing with refugees was one on which a good deal of time and thought were spent. The determination system which was written into the Immigration Act gave the right to anyone facing removal from Canada to make a claim for refugee status. This applies not only to persons trying to enter the country but also to those who have been in Canada for any period of time as visitors. Those 1976 amendments also provided for the establishment of the Refugee Status Advisory Committee which has the authority to examine refugee claims and which is the subject of the Bill before us today.

As has been said, the 1976 amendments also give the Minister decision-making powers over the validity of claims, allow for a second evaluation of rejected claims by the Immigration Appeal Board, and allows refugee claimants the right to appeal to the courts. Until their status is finally determined, refugee claimants are able to stay in Canada. Canada does not remove or deport people waiting for determination of a refugee claim. By the time all of the avenues of appeal are exhausted, in many cases the final decision takes about three years, and in most cases applicants are allowed to work during that time.

Canada's effort in formulating and administering refugee policy is one which is a very essential reflection of Canada's humanitarian interests. Canada, on a per capita basis, has accommodated more refugees than any other country in the world. Canadians have shown the capacity to care, to reach out to those who are suffering persecution for reasons of race, religion and politics, and to give comfort to the homeless and stateless. We have also shown a concern to ensure that our institutions and administrative practices reflect those humanitarian ideals, and that, I gather, is the spirit of the Bill before us today.

However, we also have to exercise our humanitarian instincts and goals in the context of the protection of the best interests of Canada and of ensuring overall fairness in our immigration policies. Unlike other countries, Canada has not in the past faced the spectacle of large numbers of people claiming refugee status arriving at our border. Our geography, the fact that we are surrounded by sea on three sides, has provided a degree of isolation from turbulence in other lands which gives rise to large numbers of refugees. Air travel has changed that, however, and we live in times when strife and civil unrest are common. We are also living in difficult economic times. It is estimated that 70 million or 80 million people are on the move in the world. They move because of war, revolution, poverty, or simply in the hope of creating a better future for themselves and their children. Some of these people are refugees, some are not.

In February, 1982, the Government made some changes in the system of refugee determination in the interests of greater fairness and openness. The new reforms separated the refugee determination process from immigration procedures to ensure that refugee cases were assessed on the basis of human rights considerations. The Refugee Status Advisory Committee operates on two overriding assumptions: first, the applicant is presumed to be telling the truth unless there is clear evidence to the contrary and, second, the benefit of any doubt is resolved in favour of the applicant. Under the present guidelines of the Refugee Status Advisory Committee, a person need not be singled out for persecution to be a convention refugee. Highly visible political activity is not seen as a prerequisite for refugee determination. A person may be a refugee even if there is no evidence of past persecution but there are reasonable grounds to fear future persecution. The possession of a valid passport is not a basis for rejecting a refugee claim. The Refugee Status Advisory Committee now allows five panels to operate weekly. The number of private Members has been increased to ten from seven. Departmental officials who serve on the committee are now freed from all other duties in the Department so they can devote their full time to the work of the committee. The research capability has been upgraded so as to improve the information on conditions in refugee producing countries, and full use is made of information from human rights groups such as Amnesty International and church groups as well as government sources.

In May, 1983, in response to recommendations from various sources, and as part of this ongoing attempt to improve the process, a modified form of oral hearings was introduced. As the Hon. Member for Spadina said, the results are impressive. In my view, this should certainly be extended. At the same time, as we try to improve our refugee determination system, more and more of the world's people have become refugees, either from economic hardship or by virtue of war or persecution. Inevitably, people displaced in this way look to the industrialized nations for help. The channel of last resort is that provided by the asylum structures in developed countries like Canada. Even though people who come to Canada and apply for refugee status may finally be refused, the possibility of being able to work here while their claim is heard must look very attractive to people who are undergoing hardships which we can barely imagine.

The more people who use our system, the greater the backlog, the longer the delays. Since 1980 we have witnessed a very large increase in the number of refugee claimants. Recent refugee claimant arrivals—again I am talking about people who arrive in Canada and make their claim here as distinct from those who have been assessed as refugees overseas and who come to Canada with papers for permanent settlement—now average 500 a month, which is double the number for last year. About 9,500 cases are under review for appeal, yet only about one third of those who claim refugee status have their claim upheld.

It is certainly important to shorten the process, and I agree with the Hon. Member for Spadina that there is evidence that oral hearings have shortened the process. The paper screenings are sometimes cumbersome. It is important to shorten the process, particularly for genuine refugees who are left in limbo, unable to get on with establishing themselves in their profession, their trade, unable to get on with making their new life while waiting for the final decision. It is also important for those whose claims are not genuine and who may be able to find some other solution for themselves if their hopes for remaining in Canada are not to be met. So in so far as oral hearings would shorten the period of waiting and would resultin better decisions, I certainly recommend them, but the entire process needs to be reviewed to ensure that all problems which cause delays are dealt with.

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, regarding the legislation before the House this afternoon, namely, Bill C-219, I have a few comments to add regarding the clause in the explanatory notes, which says that the purpose of this Bill is to give persons claiming refugee status the right to be heard by the Refugee Status Advisory Committee, before it advises the Minister.

Mr. Speaker, as far as the refugee situation is concerned, I think that in Canada a great deal is being done, and I would like to give a few details. If we consider the circumstances of refugees and Canada's role as a place of refuge for the oppressed and the homeless of this world, we recall the programs set up for the Hungarians, Ugandans, Chileans, Czechoslovakians and Vietnamese, which have given Canada an international reputation. Mr. Speaker, so many people of the nationalities I just mentioned are now living in this country and have been able to tell their former fellow citizens how easy and pleasant it was to live in Canada.

However, this is not the subject of today's debate. The Bill introduced by my hon. colleague, the Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap), namely Bill C-219, is aimed at protecting those who claim refugee status in Canada. It does not concern those who are selected abroad but those who, for whatever reason, entered this country either legally or illegally and are afraid to return to their country of origin because of fear of persecution. Although we do not encourage people to give these reasons for remaining in Canada, as signatories of the 1969 Convention on the Status of Refugees we are obliged to see to it that they are not sent back to their country of origin if their fear of persecution is bona fide. Mr. Speaker, we have had examples, and I am thinking of the world of sports, when two famous hockey players came to Canada in 1980-81, the Stastny brothers, who today are playing in the National Hockey League with the Quebec Nordiques. In their case, the Minister had to make a very quick decision to protect their rights and avoid a situation where they might have had problems in connection with their country of origin.

It is therefore essential that such people be given a fair hearing, while the community must also feel they have been treated fairly. First and foremost, the Government has the obligation to offer persons claiming refugee status in Canada under the terms of the Convention, an opportunity to apply for recognition of their refugee status. That is why the Refugee Status Advisory Committee, which represents the first stage, and the Immigration Appeal Board, which is the second stage, were established. Appeal Board decisions may be ratified under Section 28 of the Federal court of Appeal Act. Some of these cases, however require hearings.

Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to claim that the protection offered by Canada to persons claiming refugee status is unequalled anywhere else in the world. Basically, a hearing is a well-established legal procedure which offers the person claiming refugee status an opportunity to be heard, and gives the examiners a chance to assess the person's good faith. Most countries use hearings to determine whether the claim is well-founded. The Canadian system provides for selection interviews of refugees abroad, but the hearing itself is not part of the process of claiming refugee status. Both the Refugee Status advisory Committee and the Immigration Appeal Board review the certified transcripts. The IAB will hold a hearing in the event that a claim is sustained. While this Bill is under consideration, that would slow down the process, contrary to the statement made earlier by my colleague from Spadina who was complaining that it takes too much time as it is. I listened to him when he was referring to authentic refugees and to other who seek to use the system to delay their deportation from Canada. Adding a new stage would only complicate matters and we should continue to study this question.

Under the system, there are two distinct examinations and two levels of appeal, and it can take over three years before completing all stages designed to protect refugees from being forced to return to their country of origin. It is practically impossible for an authentic refugee not to have his case heard. The problem is that all applications legitimate or otherwise, must be considered at all levels. The number of people seeking the status of refugee in Canada increases every year, and it has gone from 500 in 1977 to 2,800 in 1982 and 6,300 in 1983. The system as it is today might be able to process quickly 500-odd applications a year, but it is now overburdened as a result of the ever increasing number of applications, even despite the fact that extra staff have been hired.

It can take up to 200 days before the Refugee Status Advisory Board even begins to consider an application, and that is only the first stage in the process. We now have about 9,500 cases pending, and between 1,500 and 2,000 others are waiting for processing. And yet, all decisions—

[English]

Mr. Nickerson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It is bad enough being neglected by not being recognized, but now I am forced to hear the hon. gentleman reading from a prepared speech.

I would like to bring your attention to what occurred in the House on March 5, this year, as reported at page 1786 of Hansard when the Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault) was in the chair. He, quite properly, brought the Hon. Member for Timiskaming (Mr. MacDougall) to order for reading from a prepared speech. He was adamant that that was contrary to the rules of the House, except in certain specific cases, Cabinet Ministers being one, the Leader of an Opposition Party or somebody speaking in a language which was not his own.

None of these criteria apply to the Member who is now speaking. I would request that you direct that he not read from a prepared speech.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): The Hon. Member is correct. A Member is not supposed to read his speech. Nevertheless, the person making a speech is allowed to quote, at length, from whatever material he may have available to him in order to make his speech. However, the Hon. Member may take note of the complaint and attempt to read a little less.

[Translation]

Mr. Dubois: Mr. Speaker, this point of order was raised because the Hon. Member was not recognized. If he does not rise soon enough to be seen by the Chair, that is not my problem, and as for referring to notes while making speeches, I think that it is essential in the House that we should be able to do so. I shall therefore continue to refer to my notes, Mr. Speaker. If the Hon. Member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson) is agreeable, I can quite easily deliver my speech either way. I find it most pleasing and quite possible to make a speech without any notes. However, in specific instances, such as when refugees are concerned, as is the case of the Bill standing in the name of the Hon. Member for Spadina, a relatively important Bill which we unfortunately cannot support, it is necessary for me to have certain data about the number of refugee claimants and the decisions made in such cases. I find it normal to provide information which is as relevant as possible. This is why I use notes to address this Bill and explain why we are against it. Next time, the Hon. Member will certainly rise more quickly if he wants to be recognized by the Chair.

Mr. Speaker, a claimant who decides today to use all the legal avenues available in Canada could spend well over three years in this country before being returned to his country of origin. It is therefore quite important to make sure that those who are in Canada can express their views as provided by the legislation.

Canada is a most welcoming country. If we were to add a further avenue for appeal to those already in existence, we would only add to the many bottlenecks already slowing down the process without improving in any way on the protection now available to refugee claimants.

The only ones who would stand to gain are those who have a real stake in lengthening the process considering at least 2,000 cases are decided every year, in addition to the number of applications which have increased over the past several years, we realize that the proposal of our hon. friend from Spadina (Mr. Heap) would only bog the system and would not help in any way those who are claiming refugee status.

The fact is that these delays are detrimental to bona fide refugees. The unfounded claims which create this jam are depriving authentic refugees of the priority they are entitled to and causing great distress. Moreover, the support organizations within the community and the various levels of government which are providing financial assistance are called upon to contribute for long periods of time by true refugees and the others, while all of them are waiting for the committee to hand down its decision.

Many initiatives have been taken these past few years to deal with the ever increasing number of claims and shorten the delays without jeopardizing the process itself in terms of equity and fairness. Thus, it is important to note, given the number of claims, that the Department is taking every possible step to process them as fast as possible and to ensure that on behalf of people who really fear to return to their own country, the Canadian Government take the appropriate steps to solve those problems as soon as possible and to bring about justice, equity and fairness for all citizens.

Therefore, a pilot project of hearings has been implemented in May 1983 in Montreal, and in Toronto in June of the same year. It is a pilot project because first of all, the legislation does not provide for that procedure and also because on one knows whether in such a large country as ours, an effective hearing system along those lines could be implemented at a reasonable cost.

There are many reasons for putting to the test this kind of hearing. When a particular claim is to be examined and when the decision is to be based on the very facts of the case, on their consistency with known events and, more important still, on the credibility of the claimant, the best procedure is to submit the claimant to a hearing during which the validity of his claim can be assessed.

The fact that the claimant was not personally heard has always given rise to criticism from the very moment Canada started considering refugee status claims. Unfortunately, this criticism has not subsided during the recent yers. And considering the number of people involved, certainly a great number of Canadians, Mr. Speaker, would like the process to be accelerated even more.

Finally, various interest groups as well as a working group set up by the Minister concluded in 1981 that, within the appropriate framework, some kind of hearing could prove more effective than the present system, which involves a great amount of paperwork.

Mr. Speaker, here are the objectives of the pilot projects commissioned by the former Minister . . . May I point out that it is now five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. It being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday next, at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 5 p.m., the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House resumed from Friday, March 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Kaplan that Bill C-9, an Act to establish the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, to enact an Act respecting enforcement in relation to certain security and related offences and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof or in relation thereto, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs; and the motion of Mr. Deniger (p. 2178).

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I must say it is with considerable surprise that I find myself speaking again on this Bill, having spoken on it last week; but we were faced with a rather unsettling and unusual procedure on Friday afternoon when the Hon. Member for La Prairie (Mr. Deniger) to everyone's surprise brought in the motion that the question should now be put.

The results of this motion were rather clearly defined by the Hon. Member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) when he pointed out that this was simply the most brutal form of closure available to a government to limit debate on second reading of a very controversial Bill. It is rather interesting to make note of what happened shortly thereafter. The House became involved in one of those heated exchanges, where there was a great deal of heat and very little light thrown on the subject.

If we look at page 2184 of Hansard, we find the kinds of things that were being said. Hon. Members were engaged in a free-for-all. I am sure some of them would regret having said the words they said. The Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap) is shown on that page as referring to this group as the "Canadian 'Gestapo' ". He said:

> There will be no independent reporting on the doings of this secret service, this Canadian "Gestapo".

I read Hansard this morning to find out what actually happened, and to my surprise the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) said:

> There is a little difference between the RCMP and the Gestapo.

• (1110)

It is not exactly the adjective I would have chosen; "there is a little difference". I would hope that there is an enormous difference between the RCMP and the Gestapo and that it ever remains that way. This is the kind of half-hearted support the RCMP is accustomed to getting from the Solicitor General.

The debate then went on with the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) explaining the reasons for this motion, which has the effect of closure. It will limit debate quite severely at second reading. If it were not so serious, I would be amused with the Liberal Party. Whatever motion is in front of the House or whatever stage we are at, that is in their minds not a very important stage of the Bill, particularly if they want to impose closure at that time.

One thinks back to 1968 when the Government was defeated on a money Bill. I well recall the Right Hon. Lester Pearson, then Prime Minister, referring to it as a mere defeat on third reading, not of any importance. He very much stressed that it was third reading and did not have the importance of second reading.

A couple of months ago the Government was defeated in committee on a money Bill. Of course, that was of no consequence. That was not important because it was in committee. On Friday the President of the Privy Council said this is not all that important, that after all it is only second reading. He said at page 2917, of Hansard, and I quote:

> Therefore if we understand ... how the Canadian parliamentary system works, there is no reason to get upset when at this stage a Government Member tries to bring this debate to a logical conclusion—

Bringing in closure at this stage is not important. He went on to say:

> —considering the fact that on second reading, only the principle of a Bill is to be examined before referring the Bill to committee—

We find second reading is not important. We now find that report stage is not important, third reading is not important, committee stage is not important and second reading is not important. I wonder when Bills in front of Parliament do become important. I guess they become important when they interfere with the orderly progress the Government imagines it goes through to get legislation through the House before they are called to meet their maker. Is it in June that we will be apprised of the election day, probably an election to be held in August or, failing that, in November?

The Government feels it must get this Bill through before it has to adjourn, prorogue or dissolve. One wonders what is the urgency. As I said last week, I am concerned about the appointments that will be made if this Bill becomes law. There will be people put into such positions as Inspector General; there will be a review committee and a Director. All of these people will be appointed if this Government has its way with this Bill, and it will be for lengthy periods of time. You can bet your bottom dollar that they will be Liberals. They will be in these positions with a certain amount of tenure. The Director will be able to appoint the top 40 men and women in this organization. If they follow the precedent that has been clearly established by this Government, every last one will be a Liberal with some connection, either financial or by service.

Even on the review committee there are to be Privy Councillors. Have you ever thought, Mr. Speaker, what kind of Privy Councillors we have around? For those who are watching, a Privy Councillor is a person who has been a Cabinet Minister. It is supposed to be one who is not in Parliament or in the Senate. They are looking for five. Think of some of the people they might get.

Mr. Friesen: Gillespie.

Mr. McKinnon: Gillespie, yes, indeed. This same Party may well be looking for a sure Liberal seat on June 16 for a very deserving fellow from Bay Street who may want to have a seat, if he has the nerve to face the House and assume the responsibilities of Prime Minister. Among the Members who might be willing to give up their seats is the Privy Councillor, the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East (Mr. Allmand), a former Solicitor General. We all remember his term as Solicitor General. The country will never forget it. Perhaps he would like to do it all over again.

• (1115)

Mr. Friesen: Goyer.

Mr. McKinnon: Yes, there is also Jean-Pierre Goyer. I think that Canadair is about ready to get rid of him, or at least I certainly hope so. I do not know how we can afford to have him run Canadair.

Perhaps the Hon. Member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Cosgrove) is willing to give up his seat and retire to a more dignified life as a member of the review committee. The Hon. Member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen) has been gracing the front benches though not in a role which he relishes, I feel. Perhaps the Hon. Member for York West (Mr. Fleming) would like to give up his seat. As well, so help us, the Hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey) might wish to do so. We must think about him because he has not had a plum for quite some time.

There is as well the Hon. Member for Burin-St. George's (Mr. Simmons). Believe it or not, he is a Privy Councillor.

Mr. McKenzie: He would have all the qualifications.

Mr. McKinnon: He has every imaginable qualification required for him to leave his seat. In fact, he almost has a duty to leave his seat and create a vacancy. There has never actually been a Prime Minister from Burin-St. George's.

What about the Senate? I mean no disrespect by using his British Columbia nickname, but "Senator Foghorn", the Hon. Ray Perrault, might feel that he would be suitable for a review committee seeing that he has recently been relieved of responsibilities which he held up until then.

Mr. Friesen: Iona.

Mr. McKinnon: Iona is not yet a senator but that should not take long to happen. As a matter of fact, she is a Privy Councillor having once been the Minister responsible for amateur sport. She was the one who made the Loto Canada arrangements and provided so much hilarity in the House.

Another thing we have heard from the President of the Privy Council is that the McDonald Commission recommendations have been incorporated in this Bill. This of course is not so. The Senate made several recommendations which the President of the Privy Council would like us to believe have been incorporated in the Bill. The important recommendations of the Senate committee have not been incorporated in this Bill so we are frankly very much in the position of not trusting the Government to be objective or impartial when it appoints the people who will run Canada's security and intelligence agency.

For that reason, as I said the other day, I believe this Bill should be delayed. We should wait for an election when a new government with a new mandate will decide whether this is really the kind of organization Canadians want to have looking after security and intelligence. In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make the point that there is still no sign that anyone on the government side has any idea of the personnel difficulties involved which will affect many employees of the current security and intelligence organization.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pick up where I left off the last time I was involved in this debate and had the opportunity to make a comment after the Hon. Member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle) had spoken. At that time I wanted Members of the House to reflect upon the historical and philosophical context in which we ought to be considering such matters as dissent and subversion. This is especially important now that the Government is committed to imposing upon the Canadian people through the parliamentary procedures it has now invoked a security service that in our view is so very unaccountable and which gives so much power to the state without any parliamentary accountability.

At that time, Mr. Speaker, I began by calling to the attention of Hon. Members the fact that our very civilization, to the extent that it is called the Judeo-Christian civilization, began on the cross with an event which was very much involved with the question of subversion and dissent. It began with Jesus Christ being crucified by the Romans. Crucifixion was something that the Romans used for the punishment of people seen to be enemies of the state. Right at the beginning of our tradition we have that central question being asked about whether the state was right in that circumstance. Of course, our whole civilization is based on the premise that the state was wrong in that instance.

• (1120)

If we look at another stream in our civilization, the Greek civilization, we soon come to the figure of Socrates, who was also executed by the state for subversion. He was charged with corrupting the youth of the time, but Socrates had more respect for the Greek polity than his accusers, refusing to go for the escape plan that some of his friends had set up for him. He said that because he had respect for the laws of Athens he would rather drink the hemlock than bring dishonour on his society.

There in the two mainstreams of western civilization, Mr. Speaker, we find two central events in both of which, I think Hon. Members would agree, the state was wrong. The Romans were wrong in the crucifixion of Jesus Christ and the Greek authorities were wrong in the execution of Socrates.

Let me cite a few more examples, Mr. Speaker. During the time of the American revolution, many revolutionaries were charged with sedition and subversion for their attempt to resist the unjust imposition of taxes by the British Government on the 13 colonies. Americans would say now—although perhaps in Canada this is not a safe thing to say given the United Empire Loyalist tradition—that the British Government was wrong in the things it did to people who dared to express the opinion that there ought to be independence for the 13 colonies or perhaps only that the tax laws of the time were unjust.

Another example in our political life and in the tradition of the New Democratic Party in particular is the Winnipeg general strike of 1919. J. S. Woodsworth, someone I think it is fair to say who all now regard as a leading figure in the political history of Canada and who is generally revered not just by members of the political tradition to which he belonged but by many others, was charged with sedition in 1919. The charge was not based on violence or calling into question the state but because he quoted Isaiah. That is why he was charged with sedition. People at the time did not like that. I guess they would not have liked Isaiah either because he expressed strong and harsh criticism of people in authority, of people with power and what they did to others who did not have power.

That is why we are concerned about the power given to the state through this Bill—power given to it anew because the state has always had that power. What we lament is that we had an opportunity, when reforming our security system, to make that power more accountable, to learn from the mistakes of long past and we have not done so.

• (1125)

I am not just talking of Canada's past and Canada's political life, events like the charging of J. S. Woodsworth with sedition; I am referring right back to Christ and to Socrates. When are we ever going to learn from history, Mr. Speaker, that the state ought to be more accountable than what the present Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) now proposes in this Bill? When are we going to learn to have some self-criticism built into agencies like security services? Are we never going to learn that the world view of any particular state at any particular time is, in view of everything we have ever learned from history, a limited and self-righteous view of itself which has to have built into it elements of accountability? I fault the Solicitor General for having passed up this opportunity to make Canada an example to all other nations in this regard. There could have been this opportunity if the Minister had been willing to follow some of the recommendations of the McDonald Commission, particularly with respect to parliamentary accountability.

We in the New Democratic Party perhaps know better than others, by virtue of the fact that we come out of a tradition which has been more critical of the prevailing views of society, what the power of suspicion is all about and what the power of the state can be vis-à-vis those it regards as potential subversives. We know only too well that over the years legitimate political dissent and ideas—many of which have now become part and parcel of the fabric of Canadian life—when initially advocated were suspected of being the latest advance of Bolshevism into Canadian society. When medicare and pension plans were originally advocated it was thought they were being transplanted into Canadian society by the Bolsheviks.

I listened with interest to the Hon. Member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) when he said recently that we did not have a monopoly on our concern in this area, and we do not. There are many people in other policital parties who have a genuine concern about these issues. We want to hear from them and work together with them to change this Bill. However, it remains a fact that it has been a political policy or strategy on the part of the right in this country to question the loyalty of the people on the left, in the sense of their loyalty to their country, implying that their ideas might be subversive. This has been done decade after decade. I say, therefore, to the Hon. Member for Victoria that although he himself may say that although he might not agree with what I would say, he would defend to the death my right to say it, there are others in his political tradition who have not been so eager to defend the rights of people to say what they feel. That is something we ought to be conscious of when we are debating this particular kind of Bill.

We are living in the kind of situation today, Mr. Speaker, with respect to peace groups, where many people are not only loyal to Canada but they observe a higher loyalty to the future of the planet earth and to the future of human life on this planet. They ought not to be considered by this Government, as I know they are, and will continue to be if this particular Bill goes through, as somehow subversive because they question the shortsighted, limited, and as it will be looked back on 100 years from now, insane policies of this Government.

We failed, Mr. Speaker, and the Minister has failed, by imposing this regime on Parliament and on the country. He has missed a great opportunity finally to have done something good in this area.

● (1130)

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, I listened with care to the speech of the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie) and I have to admit that I agreed with much of what he had to say. It is in the nature of government to be authoritarian.

Mr. Kaplan: He did not say anything about the Bill.

Mr. Friesen: That may be. I still can agree with what he had to say even though he was not talking about the Bill.

Mr. Blaikie: I was talking about the Bill.

Mr. Friesen: Nevertheless, there are a couple of things I would like to point out to the Hon. Member. Toward the end he mentioned the fact that members of the left have historically been subject to intimidation of sorts by members of the right. I think he will understand when I say that I abhor any kind of oppression, whether it be of the right or the left. I think it is wrong. Freedom is the name of the game in our land. We appreciate and thrive on freedom of expression. But he should understand that the right does not have the monopoly on that kind of intimidation.

An example of that is the left-wing of Vancouver City Council. The Council entertained a motion regarding the visit of Mr. Kissinger to Vancouver to the effect that if he were to come to Vancouver, he should not be allowed to speak unless the opposing point of view was presented. Now, that is wrong. It does not matter whether it is the right or the left.

Mr. Blaikie: I agree.

Mr. Friesen: Certainly the right does not enjoy a monopoly on that because I have seen enough left-wing fora where the same kind of oppression, intimidation and shouting down takes place as the Hon. Member ascribes to the right.

Mr. Thacker: And which Party wants more government?

Mr. Friesen: That is right; which Party wants more centralized government and state planning than the Party on the left?

Mr. Sargeant: How about John A. Macdonald?

Mr. Friesen: The second point I would like to make is the Hon. Member's reference to Mr. Woodsworth in the context of the Winnipeg general strike of 1919. I understand where he is coming from on that point. I agree that the paranoia of the day intimidated those who were voicing genuine social concerns about the right of labour unions to demonstrate and speak their mind. It was because of that and knowing the concern the NDP have had historically about that, that I was shocked—and I think that is probably the right word—when I read Hansard of last Friday and saw the comments of the Hon. Member for Kootenay West (Mr. Kristiansen). I think the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill would like to take note of what that Hon. Member had to say. I do not want to do injustice to what he said so I will read it verbatim. At first he quoted from a speech he made in an international forum at the Strasbourg Conference on Parliamentary Democracy last year. He said, as reported at page 2182 of Hansard:

> It may—indeed—be preferable to recognize that, from time to time, law enforcement agencies may, in pursuance of their mandates, circumvent or go beyond the law. At least if the perpetrators of excesses are caught, they risk being penalized or prosecuted. But it may be preferable to go that route rather than to brutalize the law itself, because if previously criminal or illegal acts are made legal, their common use will undoubtedly be extended and become the norm rather than the exception, and we go on from there until 1984 will indeed be with us.
> While electronic surveillance . . . may be necessary from time to time, especially when so much information and currency is transacted electronically—thus eliminating physical evidence of its use or transmission, it may be preferable to ignore investigative excesses from time to time rather than to codify and legitimize them and thus guarantee their use and encourage excesses that go beyond them.

That is the end of his quotation from his speech at the conference. He went on to say on Friday:

> What I am suggesting, Mr. Speaker, and it is my own opinion, is that sometimes it is better to lift the telescope to your blind eye. You cannot make a constant practice of it, but as I said at the conference last year, it is preferable to brutalizing the law and encouraging regular use of mechanisms which up until now have been illegal. It is better to have a silent understanding that from time to time you look the other way, if excessive methods are required in terms of some imminent danger, rather than to brutalize and corrupt the whole process of liberty as we have come to know it.

That is an astounding point of view from the Hon. Member from Kootenay West.

Mr. Sargeant: Why?

Mr. Friesen: Why?

Mr. Blaikie: You would rather brutalize the law, would you?

Mr. Friesen: He says if the law enforcement agencies are going to do their work, then you have to allow them some liberties. Mr. Speaker, that is what brought about the McDonald Commission. He is saying in effect that it was all right in past years for the RCMP to do things that normally would be considered wrong. Given certain exigencies he says it is all right. That is why we had the McDonald Commission and why we had this legislation. We may disagree with certain points of this legislation but that is why we have it. I am curious about that point of view. We have the historical references by that Party to the problems it faced with dissent in the general strike of 1919 and the accusations laid to their former leader, Mr. Woodsworth. I understand that, but the question the Hon. Member raises is: Who decides which laws can be broken?

We have some fairly tense moments in British Columbia now between labour and management. If there were a dispute at Kootenay Forest Products or Cominco, regardless of where the tensions come from, is the Hon. Member saying that there are certain kinds of surveillance of either Party which are going to be okay? What do we do about the protection of our civil rights if the Hon. Member can convince his Party that that is all right? The Hon. Member does not want these laws codified. He is saying that the behaviour should remain in as gray an area as possible so that the intelligence agency has as much latitude as possible to interpret the law as it pleases?

Pray tell, Mr. Speaker, where do we go with that? What happens in any dispute in our country? Is he justifying the break-ins and barn burnings in Quebec ten years ago? Will he endorse wrongdoing in the future? I think the Party to my left deserves to give us an explanation. I suspect not many members of his caucus agree with him. I hope that some time in the debate in the days ahead we get an explanation regarding the points of view expressed by the Hon. Member for Kootenay West.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have an opportunity to raise some points regarding Bill C-9. I am disappointed that we have had the muzzle placed on us by the Government.

Mr. Kaplan: Some muzzle: forty people have spoken.

Mr. Riis: I have been waiting to hear members of the Government speak to Bill C-9. This is an opportunity for Hon. Members to rise and discuss the principle of the Bill. It is a very important Bill to every constituency in this country. If there is a Bill on which we have received the most mail, I suspect most Members would say it is this particular Bill. I have been curious to know what government members have had to say about this Bill, but I believe there have only been two or three government members who have risen to speak about it. So again, we are left in the dark as to why the Government is motivated to bring in a Bill with very serious limitations. When this Bill gets to committee we will certainly be offering recommendations and suggestions on how it may be improved, but I think it is very important that Members be given an opportunity to raise their concerns about the nature of the Bill and its principles.

• (1140)

In a submission to the McDonald Commission the Leader of the New Democratic Party made it very clear that the caucus of this Party supported in principle the idea of a civilian security service. However, there were some very specific limitations on that endorsement. They were that we would support this concept, assuming that it would be properly drafted to ensure proper safeguards with respect to oversight and the powers of the agency itself. With that caveat we were quite prepared to support this concept of a civilian security service.

When one looks closely at this legislation a number of concerns immediately come to mind. One is the obvious problem of the employees of the new agency not being required to obey the rule of law. The agents of the security force will be able to break the law as we know it. This is what led to this whole examination, the McDonald Commission, and the exposure of the RCMP wrongdoings. Presumably that motivated the Government to introduce this Bill to set that behind us in order to get on with dealing with the nation's security, presumably using legitimate and legal methods. However, we find in the Bill that this is not going to be the case.

I have a concern other than that of employees of the agency being allowed to break the law. My concern is what this Bill will mean to the lives of most Canadians. There are already 800,000 files on individual Canadians. What is the status of that set of files today, Mr. Speaker? Are they alive? Are they being expanded? We have yet to receive that information. I suspect there may be Members of the House who would find themselves in those particular files.

That concerns me, Mr. Speaker, particularly when we find in this legislation that the security agency, as a result of this legislation, will have access to all the records of government. They will be able to look at an individual's family allowance records, unemployment documents from over the years, private medical and psychiatric papers which exist, and tax returns from the very beginning to the present day. They can look into confidential legal files which may exist and at journalists' notes of various stories written about individuals or circumstances.

To obtain these materials they can access government documents easily as well as your personal documents. If necessary, they can break into your home to do this. This legislation gives them authority to break into one's home to obtain these documents. They can break into buildings, offices, warehouses, factories and plants as well as one's own home. As the Minister responsible for this Bill has indicated, they would need to have a warrant. A judge would have to indicate that it is okay to break into a home. If past record is any indication, this has simply been a rubber stamp right from the beginning. Last year there were over 800 requests for this type of warrant and not a single one was rejected. It would appear they simply ask a judge and his automatic response is to allow them to break into individual Canadians' homes to look at these confidential documents, if that is what is required and they consider you to be a subversive.

I have some personal concern with this legislation, Mr. Speaker. Not long ago I was told by a number of my friends that the RCMP had been asking about me. They had gone to my employers, my friends and neighbours and asked a variety of things about my behaviour and whether I was a good Canadian citizen. I went to the RCMP. The local inspector was a good friend of mine at the time. I said that I would like to know what was going on because the RCMP undercover agents had been making inquiries about me. He told me there were some documents in customs which I had apparently obtained from the island of Cuba and they were very concerned about these documents, so I suggested we go and look at these documents.

At the time I was teaching school. One of the responsibilities I had was to explain to my students the nature of revolution. I had thought that using some of the posters one finds in the country of Cuba would be useful so I had written to one of the educational institutes in Cuba to obtain a sample of one or two of the major posters found in downtown Havana. That was what was in the package. However, this led to many days of searching by the RCMP, obviously concerned about this very subversive literature which I had written for from the island of Cuba.

That was followed up a few days later by another investigation by the RCMP undercover agents. They were concerned that I was importing what appeared to be opium from China. I asked why they would think that. They said there was another package in customs for me from China and they were very concerned about it because they notice it had something to do with opium. I suggested we go down again and have a look. We went to the customs office and found that I had written to an educational institution in China for some books about the opium wars. They had sent me half a dozen books explaining various interpretations of the opium wars. This again had led the RCMP to do an intensive search on this obvious importing of some peculiar documents.

From a personal point of view, Mr. Speaker, I am very concerned about what this legislation does and does not do. It is certainly going to result in a great deal more electronic eavesdropping. Canada is now somewhat famous for the amount of electronic eavesdropping which goes on, particularly compared to the United States. It will also allow the tapping of telephones to play a major role in surveillance activities. This legislation will give the government agency the right to tap an individual's phone virtually forever if he is on a list of questionable individuals. This is the kind of blanket eavesdropping and intrusion into the lives of individual Canadians which we must speak out against. We must introduce amendments to this Bill to ensure this does not take place in these massive and sweeping dimensions.

We unquestionably oppose the Bill as it is written, but will be doing everything possible to make it a better Bill once it gets to committee. We are looking forward to moving with some haste to an early clause by clause review in committee.

[Translation]

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, Friday morning, the Member for La Prairie (Mr. Deniger) was the first to speak. At the beginning of his speech he said, and I quote:

> With this Bill, we want to give Canadian citizens the assurance that their individual rights and freedoms will be respected.

He said these words at the beginning of his speech. However, at the end of his speech, he moved the following motion, seconded by the Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans):

> That this question be now put.

Mr. Speaker, these two sentences are at odds with each other.

[English]

We have a Member of Parliament who stands in this Chamber and begins his speech by talking about the importance of a law because it respects the rights and liberties of Canadians. He concludes that intervention with a motion for closure in this House, to deny the Members of the House, the elected representatives of the people, the right to express the opinions of their constituents. We have a contradiction in that one speech. That should indicate to all Canadians the continuing concern they should have about the conduct of the Liberal Government and the members of Liberal Party. They stand in this Chamber and tell us we have a piece of legislation which the Liberals thought through carefully and brought through the Senate, a piece of legislation that is important to our rights and liberties. For the Liberals to tell us that we should be prepared to support a motion which denies the elected Members of this Chamber the right to speak to this Bill is to tell us through their actions that one cannot believe what they say.

• (1150)

Canadians remember that this is a Party that said 90 days of wage and price controls was a bad idea. Once Canadians elected the Liberals, they gave us three years of wage and price controls. Canadians remember that the Liberal Party is a Party that said an 18 cents a gallon increase in gasoline was too much and four years later the increase is a dollar or very close to it. Canadians should pay attention to the fact that the Government's primary spokesman started by telling us that this legislation was important to our rights and liberties, and that same Member, the Hon. Member for La Prairie, concluded his remarks with an action designed to deny the Members of this House those rights, to deny Canadians the liberty which flows from freedom of speech.

This is a government that should have called an election a month ago. This is a government whose mandate in terms of all Canadian traditions expired a month ago. It is time to allow the Canadian people to decide who should govern this country for the next four years. The Liberal Party instead has decided to cling to power for as long as possible. This Government will have us believe that it has a leadership contest in place with a bunch of new ideas coming down the pipe. The one declared candidate for that leadership who does not presently sit in this Chamber is the person who, when he did sit in this Chamber, started us on the borrowing path. In good times this man of courage borrowed money to bribe voters. That worked in 1974, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Kaplan: What has that got to do with the security service?

Mr. Hawkes: We pay the price in 1984. The Minister asks what that has got to do with the security legislation. It has a great deal to do with the security legislation because the biggest difficulty with this piece of legislation is that it is sponsored by a government that nobody trusts.

Mr. Stewart: Exactly.

Mr. Hawkes: This legislation is sponsored by a government that has no mandate. It is sponsored by a government that is dealing with our rights and freedoms and nobody trusts it to do it with fairness, justice or equity. The record shows that this is the Government and the Party that attempted to alter the fundamental law of this land, the Constitution of this country, without prior consultation, with a new assertion. Within two weeks of debate we faced closure. After three days of debate on the security legislation we are facing closure again.

This is a government that consistently attempts to deny Canadians the right to speak freely, to speak assertively and to speak at length when necessary. In that kind of an atmosphere, there is no public will to believe. There is nothing out on the street but suspicion. This could be the best piece of legislation ever put forward, but Canadians will not accept it because it is coming from a government whose mandate has expired and which has demonstrated consistently over four years that it is more attuned to the principle of closure and denial of speech than to anything else.

This proposition is coming from a government that has a borrowing Bill before this House. This Government is attempting to borrow 91 per cent of Canadians' savings, leaving nine cents out of every dollar for other people to borrow. This Government is forcing cost of living increases on the pensioners, on everybody with fixed incomes, on everybody with low incomes. And members of the Government would have us trust them to be fair, equitable and concerned? This just will not wash.

We watch Liberals leaping aboard a bandwagon to support a leadership candidate who is denying everything the Party has stood for. We see members of the Cabinet leaping aboard the bandwagon talking about the importance of charisma and not policy. This gives us a very clear indication of the value system of the members who sit in that Cabinet and we get another set of reasons why we should be careful with pieces of legislation that affect our economy and our rights and freedoms.

Mr. Pinard: You sound scared.

Mr. Hawkes: If that legislation is proposed by a Cabinet that aborts and abandons principles so quickly to get behind the person they think will be the likely winner so that their personal careers can be advanced, then we have, through that action, a clear-cut indication of the value system of those who propose legislation to us.

History tells us, the past four years tell us, that the backbenchers of the Party support blindly, unthinkingly and uncaringly propositions put forward to this House by Cabinet. Liberals are interested in closure because there are flaws in the legislation. If we point them out, they may have to change the legislation.

Mr. Kaplan: Do it in committee.

Mr. Hawkes: With closure the Government will not have to do that. That is why it wants closure. This House should deny the Liberals that closure, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this brief debate on Bill C-9. This Bill scares me, not because of the obvious intent at this time on the part of the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan), but looking ahead down the road as this Bill is written, more unscrupulous Solicitors General or more unscrupulous Prime Ministers could use this kind of legislation to subvert the Canadian parliamentary system. In a system where we rely a great deal on precedents as well as on written law, I think it behooves every Member in this Chamber today to think twice before he or she votes to support this kind of legislation.

It is true that every democracy must be vigilant against subversion. We must have a strong security system in the country to maintain our democracy. But we should never subvert democracy in order to maintain democracy. In other words, we should never stoop to use authoritarian methods in order to combat potential authoritarianism.

● (1200)

In Bill C-9 there are three major areas—the proposed mandate for the security service, the powers suggested in the Bill for that civilian security service, and the oversight and accountability section. If we take a look at all three of these areas, we find with respect to the first one, that is the mandate of the security agency, that the language is still too vague, too all-pervasive, and encompasses far too much activity for a secret service in a democracy.

For example, church groups sending funds to the African National Congress or Central American liberation movements could come under subsection (c) and be indicted. Moreover, those who are opposed to the testing of the Cruise missile could be indicted under subsection (b). When we keep in mind that the existing security service within the RCMP presently has over 800,000 files on Canadians, this Bill simply gives the proposed new civilian security service an even greater opportunity to build dossier after dossier on people who are not in fact breaking any law within Canada. I just do not like it. It scares me. It is against all principles of natural justice. It is against all principles of basic democratic rights—the right to dissent, the right to oppose, the right to demonstrate peacefully. Why should we have a secret service hiding behind bushes, shrubs and windows taking pictures of those of us who from time to time feel we should demonstrate peacefully against what we think is wrong in a democracy. I do not like this kind of legislation which we on both sides of the House are expected to accept and pass into law. It is not part of our tradition.

In fact, Bill C-9 and the one before it, Bill C-157, came into being because the old security service within the RCMP was using dirty tricks and was in fact institutionalizing lawbreaking. The McDonald Commission indicated that it had to come to an end. However, that is not what the Bill does. Bill C-9—and the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) knows it—will legitimize or make legal all those dirty tricks and the lawbreaking of which the RCMP was guilty back in the 1970s and for which the government of the day, that is the present Government, refused to accept any political or governmental responsibility. It turned a blind eye to it. On the one hand it let the RCMP do what it wanted to do in the security service. When they were caught, all of a sudden the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said: "I don't know what the hell is going on; they don't report to me". The Solicitor General of the day said: "I don't know what the hell is going on; they don't report to me". The truth of the matter is that the Solicitor General of the day and the present Prime Minister did not want to know what was going on because they would then, in the interests of democracy, have to stand up and say enough is enough. That would mean, of course, that they could not have brought in Bill C-157 legitimizing and making lawful these dirty tricks, and they could not have brought in Bill C-9 which we are presently debating under closure.

Bill C-9 is being forced through the House. Incidentally, the Solicitor General probably has very little respect for the Chamber in terms of this Bill. Not only has the Government brought in closure, but if we read the Bill in effect it indicates that the Solicitor General and the Government do not trust the House of Commons to act as a safeguard against the powers which the new security service would have, because they would not allow a committee of Members of this House to have access to Cabinet documents in relation to activities of the security service. In other words, the Solicitor General, the Prime Minister and the Cabinet say: "Yes, we trust the security service, but we do not trust Parliament; however, we want Parliament to pass this legislation". As a parliamentarian I say no. If I cannot be trusted, then I am damn well not going to support a Bill which will put implicit trust in a secret organization that is virtually answerable to nobody that is not answerable to the democratically elected representatives of the people. I just do not like it.

Let us look at the powers the Bill will give to the secret service. The agency would have access to all records of government and private records. The only exception would be census records, which were included in the original Bill, Bill C-157. Thus the Government would have access to family allowance applications, unemployment insurance documentation, private, medical and psychiatric records, tax returns, confidential legal files, journalists' notes and all other documentary material. They could break into any place to obtain access to these documents, including one's home. The only requirement to obtain these powers would be a warrant from a Federal Court judge.

Let me talk about judges very briefly, because we are down now to ten-minute speeches. I remind the Solicitor General—I am not drawing an analogy here; I am drawing a historical perspective—that in 1933 when the Nazi party seized power as a result of two elections in Germany, Hermann Goering was charged with the responsibility of gaining control of the judiciary in the State of Brandenburg, which in effect was the City of Berlin. He said that if he could get control of the police and get control of the judges, he would have a dictatorship for his leader, the Führer. Within a matter of months, judges had been taken in and called upon to make decisions which they knew were morally wrong and reprehensible, but under the pressure of the Gestapolizei in Brandenburg they were forced to relinquish their independence and their rights on the judiciary. Once they had sold themselves out to the secret service and the secret police of the Nazi party, that was the end of democracy in Germany. It was not done in the ballot box. It was not done by going to the barricades as they had tried in 1923 in Munich, in the infamous Putsch. It was done by very subtly getting control of the machinery of justice.

I am not saying that this is the intent of the Government. I am asking, who knows? In five years' time or in ten years' time that could happen here if it could happen in such a civilized country as Germany which gave the world Bach and Goethe. I will have no part of legislation which gives carte blanche to a secret intelligence service without giving the duly elected representatives of the people or a committee thereof oversight and control of that group. Otherwise Parliament is giving up its right to the security of the nation and the democratic rights and freedoms of the citizens of Canada. That is why I am voting no to Bill C-9.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, indeed I am alarmed today to have to speak on Bill C-9. I spoke on this Bill once before, on February 13, at which time I had an opportunity in a very constructive way to point out some of its shortcomings. Upon returning to the House of Commons after the weekend, I found that the Hon. Member for La Prairie (Mr. Deniger) in his speech on Friday had the following to say:

> Mr. Speaker, Bill C-9 is the result of hard work and sustained efforts, and I support it without reservations. That is why I move, seconded by the Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans):
> That the question now be put.

As I said, I was given an opportunity to take part in the debate in February. I was given approximately ten minutes to outline some of my concerns. I probably covered a quarter of the remarks I intended to make at that time. I can understand a government or a minister bringing in closure on a Bill that is very political. For example, I could understand the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Chrétien) bringing in closure on the National Energy Program. I did not like it, but I can understand it. However, I cannot for the life of me understand why a motion was brought in on Friday to limit debate on a Bill that will affect fundamentally every man, woman and child in this country for generations to come.

• (1210)

Under Bill C-9, we do not have the type of security that exists, for example, in the United States where there is freedom to gain information. All of the points on Bill C-9 that were discussed in the Senate and the Senate committee before the Bill came to the House of Commons have not been addressed. Some very valid points were made. Why is the Liberal Government so worried about open discussions in this House?

Since coming to Ottawa I have learned that when a contentious Bill comes before the House of Commons, it sometimes takes two, three or four weeks of debate before Canadians right across Canada understand what is actually being proposed and they can have some input through their individual Members of Parliament. It takes a long time for the information to be disseminated among the hinterlands, to all constituencies. We have seen this time and again. When this process occurs, the committees are armed with much more material and much more thought goes into their deliberations.

I used to think that debate in the House of Commons was a waste of time. When Members opposite would get up to speak, or Members on this side, other Members engaged in conversations or did work at their desk. I later realized that virtually every Member of this House reads the debate daily at his or her leisure. That is why the debate is printed in Hansard. I mention that to show the importance of having the remarks on the record.

This Bill involves a contentious issue. We will be forced to vote on it through a form of closure. That is fundamentally wrong. We are dealing with a cornerstone and foundation of a democratic society. This Bill will allow a judge to issue warrants for surveillance. The police will be able to intrude into the lives of individuals in such a way as postal surveillance. How is a judge to determine when a warrant for surveillance should be issued? Will it merely be based on the fact that it is requested by the security service? Every time they ask for a surveillance warrant, will it be issued? What kind of criteria are in place to discourage any service violating a person's fundamental right to privacy? That is a concern.

The Senate very clearly called for a balance between the gravity of a threat to security and intrusion into an individual's privacy. It will be up to the Minister to approve or reject the application for a warrant. The Minister moves in secrecy. He has Cabinet secrecy as well as departmental secrecy. When issuing a warrant, he is in no way accountable to the House of Commons. With no reflection on the present Minister, I say that no one in Cabinet or in this House of Commons should have such vast power. There is something wrong if a Member of this House would accept that thesis.

What power will the security service have? Should it have carte blanche mail-opening privileges? Will it have access to confidential medical and psychiatric records? Will the security service have carte blanche access to personal records? We do not know because that is not clear in the Bill. Should there be an annual report on warrant activity, as is the case with the Official Secrets Act? That is not part of Bill C-9. Is it not appropriate for the Government to table in the House of Commons an indication as to how many warrants are issued to the security service and, indeed, in some cases why they were issued?

One point that is very disturbing has been made by the provincial attorneys general. That is the connection between the security service and illegal activities. Canada is a federation of provinces with an attorney general in each province. However, the security service will operate completely independently of the provinces. Provincial attorneys general will not be informed of what takes place under their jurisdiction. There is much that is fundamentally wrong with this Bill, therefore, debate at second reading must continue before the Bill goes to committee.

I see you are signalling that my time is up, Mr. Speaker. I urge all Members to consider very carefully what is being done because it will reflect on the people of this country for generations to come.

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped to speak on this Bill some time ago. However, with the interest of the New Democratic Party in opposition to a number of points in this Bill, it is only today that I have the opportunity to stand in the House and make my personal comments, which, by the way, are the NDP position. I am somewhat concerned and surprised that I am doing this on a motion for closure which was moved last Friday.

The interest shown by the NDP in enunciating very strong reservations about the intent of the Bill warrants a longer debate on second reading than we have had up until now. As well, I think it would have been instructive to have heard some of the back-bench Liberal members indicate their concerns about the Bill, if they have any concerns. It is obvious that they cannot feel a great deal of commitment to the concerns of their constituents. If they did, we might have heard them making some representations to the Minister asking for greater control over the proposed Canadian Security Intelligence Service.

I think that, by and large, my constituents are supportive of a secret intelligence service of some nature within the Canadian Government. Whether that service is the RCMP or a civilian service really does not make a great deal of difference to my constituents. They do feel that there is a need in any country, including Canada, to have the ability to determine whether or not foreign nationals are undermining the autonomy and security of the country. They would in fact support a service with the ability to detect that kind of thing before we find ourselves in a dangerous situation. I think my constituents also feel that the security service would be there to protect them from foreign nationals rather than being involved in the surveillance of Canadian nationals who do not pose any threat to Canadian security.

I would think that if I were to take a survey, my constituents would be somewhat in favour of the intent of Bill C-9 if in fact that Bill offered them some protection. However, in the 1960s and early 1970s, my constituents were quite confident that the RCMP intelligence services did not exist to investigate my constituents themselves and were somewhat complacent about the role played by the RCMP in terms of wiretapping and surveillance activities. At the time of the McDonald Commission, my constituents found out about the RCMP wrongdoings which occurred in 1970 and that the RCMP was found to have files on 800,000 Canadians. I think that that was a surprise to all Canadians.

The fallibility of the present Criminal Code and the intelligence service operated by the RCMP is indicated by the fact that 800,000 Canadians, many of whom had not undertaken any illegal activities, were on file with the RCMP. We have no idea whether those files still exist or have been destroyed as was recommended. We have no idea how those files were used against any individual who was investigated by the RCMP and how that use might have affected 800,000 lives.

I am concerned by the fact that this Bill does not define "threats to the security of Canada" in a way which is specific enough to prevent the RCMP or a civilian security service from investigating groups which are dissenting from government policy. I am thinking particularly of the commitment of the people who live in the riding of Nanaimo-Alberni to disarmament and the activities which those people feel obligated to carry out when protesting the present Government's attitude toward the Cruise missile guidance testing.

Without fully considering and understanding this Bill and the powers proposed to be given to the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) and the secret intelligence service, my constituents would probably think that those powers may be warranted and necessary. However, they would not feel that those powers were warranted or necessary if they in fact thought that they themselves were going to be victims of wiretapping, surveillance, first-class mail openings or security access to family allowance and medical records, as provided for in this Bill.

The Minister has always been critical of Members who talk about the widespread powers granted by this Bill and has indicated that investigations and wiretaps are only allowed under a Federal Court judge's warrant. We have seen many applications under the Criminal Code for such warrants and very few if any of those applications are turned down. This Bill does not provide the kind of protection required by Canadian citizens if in fact the powers in this Bill are warranted at all.

We in the NDP believe that the powers in this Bill remain too broad and ill defined to be acceptable when protecting the civil liberties of all Canadians. While the Bill was based upon the contention of the McDonald Commission that policing and intelligence gathering should be separated, the Government has not accepted suggestions for the careful definition of the mandate for the service. As indicated by Roy McMurtry, the Attorney General of Ontario, the definitions within the Bill are dangerously vague. We in this Party accept that very important criticism.

Canadian citizens may still be subject to the all-intrusive techniques of the security service provided for in this Bill. It must fall upon Parliament to design a security Act which, while protecting the national security as we all desire, will also protect the freedoms of law-abiding Canadian citizens. We must protect against the recurrence of 800,000 court files being collected by the RCMP security service because of inadequate legislation, instruction and surveillance by elected government and ministers.

It is interesting to note that Conservative members are once again sitting on their hands while this Bill works its way to committee and possible enactment without safeguarding Canadian citizens by more narrowly defining the mandate of the service. We do not see the Conservative Party mustering the number of speakers from which we would expect to hear in this debate.

Mr. McDermid: How would you know? You just got here.

Mr. Miller: Members opposite seem to think that this Bill would be quite adequate if it were to be brought in by a Conservative government. I would like to read the comments of the Hon. Member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen) as reported on page 1304 of Hansard:

> As the Hon. Member for Lethbridge-Foothills (Mr. Thacker) said, if this legislation had been introduced verbatim by a previous Government, such as the St. Laurent Government, the Diefenbaker Government or the Pearson Government, it probably would have raised very few eyebrows because there was a sense of confidence in those Governments and the leadership at that time.
> The problem we face today is a crisis of confidence in the leadership of the Government. It is not only incompetence that bothers us, though there are plenty of examples of rank incompetence by the Government. What really bothers the Canadian people is that the Government enjoys the use of power, Since it derives so much pleasure from power, there is no discipline, constraint or self-control in the use of power.

If Conservative members think that this Bill is not good, then it will not be good under a Liberal Government, a Conservative Government or a New Democratic Party Government.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge-Foothills): Mr. Speaker, I now join other Members in rising with some alarm, because I was away on Friday of last week. I was in my riding attending a nomination and indeed my own nomination. To return to the House—

Mr. Riis: How did you make out?

Mr. Thacker: Well, I am sure Hon. Members will be surprised to hear that I won the nomination.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Thacker: The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) is certainly surprised. She will be even more surprised when she finds out that I won by acclamation.

I find that in my absence the government side has been up to its old tricks again. It is trying to deny the House and Canadians sufficient time to discuss this new Bill. While government Members are saying that this Bill has, in a sense, been before the House for a long time, it has not. This Bill originated with Bill C-157 which did not even come before the House. It was shipped off to the Senate when civil libertarians and ordinary citizens across the country began to raise a hue and cry. The Senate committee made over 200 recommendations for changes to Bill C-157. The Bill then went back through the government bureaucratic process and now out has popped Bill C-9. Government Members are saying that that has corrected everything.

• (1230)

That simply is not the case, Mr. Speaker. As Members of the House we know that it takes weeks and weeks for the essence of a Bill to sink in. Ordinary Canadians are busy earning a living and cannot devote their full time to the study of a Bill as we do. While it is quite proper that we are alarmed, I think we need to give ordinary Canadians more time on this.

Here I am, Mr. Speaker, speaking for the second time on this Bill because I find that the Government is not prepared to give Canadians that time. It would appear that their own personal and political party interests are going to take precedence over the national interest. A Bill of this magnitude and importance should be given plenty of time for debate and reflection in the House, in committee and by Canadians at large. Bill C-9 is over 50 pages long, covers two separate Acts and amends a dozen other statutes. It is very complex.

Essentially we have opposing interests here—national security versus individual freedoms. The Bill raises the question of why all this has come up in the last few years. I suppose it is primarily because of the FLQ incident in Quebec and the dramatic over-reaction by the government of the day which became alarmed. It got the RCMP to do all sorts of things that it would never have done and had never done because the Government wanted to get the goods. Now the Government is proposing a new Bill because of the actions of a police force that it encouraged to break the law. I do not believe for one second that the high command of the RCMP or individual officers broke that law without the express or implied consent of high government leaders. I believe that might go right to the office of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who told them to get the goods.

Then there was the invocation of the War Measures Act largely as a result of barn burning and break-ins done by the actual agents, the national police force, under the political influence of the government of the day. It is an absolutely absurd situation and it is very, very dangerous. That is why I said in my first speech on Bill C-157 that the essential problem is that people do not trust the Liberal Government today, nor have they since it came into office in 1968. That is for very good reason, Mr. Speaker. That is why I said that people did have an essential trust of Prime Minister St. Laurent and of John Diefenbaker, because those gentlemen demonstrated that they would never play fast and easy with the deeply held emotions of Canadians.

That is essentially what Manitoba is today—a Premier and Parties that are prepared to play fast and easy with deeply held feelings. That is what Lebanon is. That is what Northern Ireland is. Extremist groups are formed, governments take extreme positions on issues and then oppositions are forced to take extreme positions. You must be very sensitive when playing around with issues that you can say rationally should be A, B or C. Ordinary Canadians feel strongly about some of these things and we have to be sensitive to them.

When it comes to a question of national security versus individual freedoms, Mr. Speaker, no one doubts in these modern times that we must have a national security service. That is not the issue. We have one now in the RCMP. The question is what are the sufficient checks and balances to individual freedoms. We have just entrenched a lovely, well-worded Charter of Rights and Freedoms, but it is not worth the powder to blow it apart if it is not respected in the practice of the Government. From time to time we all use the example of the Soviet Union, which has a fine written charter of human rights but it is not worth anything because of the way the law is administered and abused there. That is what Canadians feel about this Government and that is why they are going to put it out of office. They cannot trust it and with very good reason.

The underlying principle that we need more debate on is: How we can maintain free debate and discussion in society in the face of what the Bill states will occur, which is secret investigations and record-keeping on people? The very fact I am nervous that if I telephone my friend the conversation might be picked up, or that if I go out to a public meeting someone from the security service may be making notes and putting the information on file, restricts my feeling of freedom to discuss the issues frankly. When the issues are not discussed frankly that is when society and democracy as we know it goes down the tube.

Our friends in the NDP say members of this Party are not rising to speak in the debate, but we are rising because we feel strongly about this matter. We want them to rise because we want to know what they feel. Why are members of the Government not rising to answer my question about these investigative measures and the record-keeping that make us feel so uneasy that we do not discuss the issues frankly and fully? That is the question I am anxious to hear government Members address.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak about this legislation which I consider to be very dangerous. That is not because I disagree with the need for a security force to counteract terrorism or the actions of legitimate subversives. However, I believe this legislation grants a blank cheque to a security service which would be able to continue the present practice of infringing the rights of many Canadians.

Although members of the Conservative Party have spoken, they have not done so in proportion to their numbers in this House. For every member of the New Democratic Party who speaks, only one Conservative speaks, yet they have three times as many Members as this Party has in the House. I am not surprised by that attitude. They complain that the Bill is facing closure yet they do not put up many speakers. There is a basic contradiction in that approach.

Speaking about Bill C-157, the previous Bill which was similar to the one before us, Elmer MacKay, the former Member for Central Nova who now occupies a high policy advisory role in the office of the Hon. Member for Central Nova (Mr. Mulroney), said that there are too many civil liberty safeguards in the present legislation. This was the view of someone who now sits in the office of the Leader of the Conservative Party, someone who is advising the Conservative Party on policy. It is no wonder that members of that Party are not getting up to speak and that they are quietly approving the legislation.

I should like to contrast that with the remarks of Alan Borovoy, the general counsel of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, who said about the legislation that the powers of intrusive surveillance are needlessly broad. Under the terms of this Bill as it is now formulated, Canadian citizens could have their conversations bugged, their mail opened, their homes searched and their confidential records invaded, even though there is not the slightest suggestion of any lawbreaking involved.

This legislation is in front of us, Mr. Speaker, for a very good reason. During the 1970s it became very obvious that there was too much surveillance going on, too much lawbreaking going on, within the existing security set-up in this country. We found out through the McDonald Commission that there were files on over 800,000 Canadians. For every 30 citizens, man, woman and child, there is a file on one person. I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that there are that many subversives in this nation. I do not believe there are that many people who even think about committing subversive acts. I do not believe that those average Canadians are a threat to the security of this nation. What this large number of files points out is that we do not have proper supervision of our security services in this nation.

What was suggested in a presentation before the McDonald Commission by our Leader, the Hon. Member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), is that we must have adequate supervision, that there should be an all-Party parliamentary committee which would have a supervisory review role in determining whether or not our security service is acting on behalf of Canada or infringing the rights of Canadians.

This legislation which is now before us was described by one Conservative Member of Parliament as being too interested in the civil liberties of Canadians. This Bill which is before us in an infringement on the very rights of the average Canadian. We in this House have an obligation to speak up for Canadians. We have an obligation to make sure that passage of this very important legislation is not just granted by the quiet acquiescence of the majority who obviously have more votes. These are the same Members who are afraid to get up and speak in this House.

This is a very important piece of legislation. It is a threat to the civil liberties of most Canadians. That does not mean that everyone is going to have a Mountie or a security service person sneaking through their bedroom at night. However, it does create the potential danger to many Canadians of having their files opened by this agency without any adequate review of its actions.

American citizens have a committee in the United States representing different parties which has access to information on the actions of their security service. The West Germans, who are in a much more difficult situation because of the closeness of their border to a nation which is not necessarily friendly, also have that access. Surely if those nations can have all-party review of their security service, then the Canadian Government should be willing to allow that same review by a committee of this House. Obviously, Mr. Speaker, that would be a select committee. It would not be a committee on which, I suspect, every Hon. Member of Parliament would be serving; it would be a committee composed of the best people from all Parties. Government would still be in a position to choose from the persons suggested by the various Parties. It would be a very important committee, it would show the respect of the Government for the House of Commons and it would indicate to Canadians that they could have more faith in their security system.

The legislation which is before us now has been condemned by the Canadian Civil Liberties Association and by the Conservative Attorneys General. It has been criticized by many throughout this land.

Mr. McDermid: What about the New Democratic Party Attorney General?

Mr. Murphy: The New Democratic Party Attorney General in the Province of Manitoba has condemned this legislation as well and has been in the forefront of the fight against unjust attacks on human rights. He is well known as a leading lawyer, teacher and instructor of lawyers and as a leading civil libertarian in this nation.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, with the closure motion before us that I have only a few seconds left to speak. I implore Hon. Members of the other two Parties of this House—we are certainly putting up every member of our caucus—to look at this legislation. Look at what you believe to be right in protecting the rights of Canadians. Do what you believe to be right in protecting the legitimate national interests of Canada. Certainly we need adequate protection from subversion and acts of terrorism, but let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, we can only protect ourselves in a democratic society if we ensure that the policeman is also policed. We can only do that if we have adequate safeguards with respect to actions which can take place, and which have taken place not 80 years, 90 years or 100 years ago, but in the last decade. When those illegal actions take place, those unwarranted actions, Hon. Members of this House of Commons should have access to that information through a select all-Party committee. Through that committee they would be able to inform the Canadian public of actions which were unwarranted. That committee could make sure that steps were taken to ensure that the rights of those 800,000 Canadians are being observed by those who are supposed to protect Canadian rights.

This is an important Bill and I believe we are running the risk of passing this legislation without any due concern for the rights of Canadian citizens. Ten years from now someone is going to ask where the Members of Parliament were when Bill C-9 was passed. Where were the Liberal Members who were in the majority at that time? Where were the Conservative Members when this legislation was passed through the House of Commons?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

• (1250)

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Mr. Deniger, seconded by Mr. Evans, moves that—

Mr. Manly: I wish to speak in the debate, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): As I started to say, the question is as follows: Mr. Deniger, seconded by Mr. Evans, moves that this question be now put.

[English]

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The Hon. Member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly) was on his feet and should have been appropriately recognized.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): I am sorry to correct the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) but I asked twice whether the House was ready for the question. Then I put the question.

[Translation]

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Yes.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Will all those in favour of the motion please say yea.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the Members who were unable to get in yesterday because of the weather are very grateful to their colleagues on both sides of the House for their patience. That is why, this morning, I want to ask the unanimous consent of the House, so that no one will be penalized, for starting today's sitting, the sitting of Tuesday, March 20, 1984, forthwith so that we may consider Bill C-21.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, we have been put into this rarest of phenomena, the parliamentary black hole, because of the negligence of the Government in not having their Members here to vote on legislation.

Some Hon. Members: Shame, shame!

Mr. Nielsen: Surely the Government can organize itself to give priority where it deserves to be, in the House of Commons, and not traipsing around the country on leadership campaigns.

Mr. Speaker: I gather there is not consent from the House Leader of the Opposition.

Security Intelligence Service

Mr. Nielsen: You make assumptions too rapidly, Sir. We will bail them out this time. In the future let them be warned. They must pay attention to their duties here and not be gambolling all over the country.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, we will indeed consent. At three o'clock this afternoon I intend to raise a brief point of order with respect to the regularity of last night's occurrences and the mode that we found ourselves in today.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, with respect, we will also give consent. I would point out that we were ready to vote yesterday all day. It is unfortunate that the Government, having moved closure on the Bill, did not have its Members here to vote.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, our offer to the Opposition to have Question Period today still stands.

Mr. Speaker: It being after eleven o'clock a.m., this House stands adjourned by unanimous consent to later this day.

At 11.30 a.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, March 20, 1984

The House met at 11.30 a.m.

Prayers

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Hon. Member for Rosemont (Mr. Lachance), on a point of order.

Mr. Lachance: I am interested to see, Mr. Speaker, that you have just created a precedent.

I must say I agree with you on this precedent, since the Special Committee on Standing Orders and Procedure previously recommended having prayers in public, so that visitors in the gallery can see their Members pray.

As far as I know, it is the first time we have done so, and I am not sure whether we will be able to make a practice of this precedent. As far as the Standing Orders and the proposal made to the Special Committee on Standing Orders and Procedure are concerned, I hope the example we have given today will be followed.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I have taken note of what the Hon. Member just said, and I may add that I fully agree with his suggestion.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1984-85

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House resumed from Thursday, March 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacLaren that Bill C-21, an Act to provide borrowing authority, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, once again we have a borrowing Bill before us. As usual, C-21 takes the normal form of two pages, one of which is blank. Once again, it is a record-breaking borrowing Bill.

Bill C-21 requests authority to borrow $29.5 billion. It is the largest borrowing Bill that we have ever seen and it is not the first one introduced into this Parliament by any means. In fact, during the first session Parliament approved Bill C-30, Bill C-59, Bill C-111 and Bill C-151, all major borrowing Bills. In addition to those, there were the supplementary borrowing Bills C-125, C-128 and C-143.

The exact size of this Bill does not merely reflect a matter of detail but a matter of perspective. I attempted to bring the huge size of this Bill into some perspective. In doing so, I first referred to the 1983 edition of the taxation statistics which contain the analysis of 1981 individual tax returns. It is the latest one that is available.

If one looks at Summary Table 2 of that book, one will see that the number of individual tax returns filed totalled 15 million and the total federal taxes yielded from all of those individuals was less than $25 billion. Therefore, this Bill seeks to borrow an amount that exceeds the total amount of federal personal taxes paid by Canadians in 1981 by several billion dollars. That is a staggering admission for the Government to make and it is a staggering figure for anyone to absorb.

Another perspective can be found in the Public Accounts of 1983. At page 2-10 of this book, the non-budgetary appropriations for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1983 are shown as $28.5 billion. Once again, this borrowing Bill seeks to borrow more than $29 billion which is over $1 billion more than the total amount appropriated for non-budgetary purposes in the preceding fiscal year.

One other comparison concerns the statements of assets and liabilities which is also found in Volume III of the Public Accounts at page 2-9. One can see at that page the liability for unmatured debt, and in the case of Canada Savings Bonds outstanding at the end of the 1982 fiscal year the liability of the Government of Canada was just under $25 billion. This Bill seeks to borrow an amount exceeding the total of all of Canada Savings Bonds that were outstanding at the end of March, 1982.

It is an amount that is almost equal to the total amount of all Treasury bills which were outstanding at the end of March, 1983. That amount at the end of the 1983 fiscal year was $29 billion, almost the same as the amount the Government is seeking to borrow now.

The reason I am making these comparisons is that we must put borrowing authority into perspective. It should be known that the borrowing sought now exceeds these already enormous amounts.

There is another aspect of borrowing authority which I would like to address for a moment. Why is it necessary to have a borrowing Bill every year and sometimes more than once a year? The Government knows there will be a deficit every year when it brings out a budget. At least we know that is true with the present Government. Each year it projects the amount of the deficit which we know will have to be covered by borrowing. I realize that there is a technical aspect to this that I cannot explore in the time allotted to me today, but I suggest that the House would be much better served if the borrowing authority were included in the approval of the Budget which presents to the House expenditure estimates and the projected amount of the deficits every year. Of course, the House votes on that and approves the estimates and the amount of the projected deficit.

I am not certain if it would require a change in the Financial Administration Act but changes should be made. It would certainly be beneficial to the House and the country. If this were done it would have avoided the introduction of seven borrowing Bills in the first session of this Parliament. The House is aware of how those Bills often tend to drag on. All of these borrowing Bills, approvals and deficits have added up to a huge amount of money being borrowed and therefore owed.

The total debt outstanding at the end of March, 1983 was estimated at $160 billion. That is comprised of $115 billion in unmatured debt as shown in the public accounts and an estimated $45 billion which is owed by Crown corporations and therefore is a contingent liability, if not a direct one, of the Government of Canada. At an average rate of interest which can be gleaned from the public accounts, the $160 billion requires levies of over $17 billion—it was $17.6 billion in 1983—just to pay the interest on the outstanding debt.

To put that amount into perspective, I return to the summary table of the tax book and find that that amount of federal taxes is reached when we take the total federal income taxes paid by the vast majority of the 15 million individual taxpayers. It is not until we collect the income taxes of every Canadian earning $40,000 or less that we collect an amount of $17.6 billion. If we told the 95 per cent of Canadian taxpayers who earn less then $40,000 that their total contributions to the federal coffers would go to cover the interest on the national debt, I think they would come here and have some harsh words with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) or perhaps his Parliamentary Secretary. That is a shocking statistic as well.

Fortunately for the Government opposite, Canadians at this moment are saving money at an alarming rate. It is alarming for a number of reasons, one of which is that it is three times the savings rate at the moment in the United States of America. Also it is alarming because it demonstrates the frame of mind of Canadian taxpayers at the present time. Even with the present high rate of savings, the borrowing Bill will absorb 93 per cent of all projected savings of Canadians in the coming year.

Why is that an alarming statistic from Canada's point of view? The reason is that Canadians are afraid to spend their savings because they know very well that they may need that money if they join their brothers on the unemployment lines, in which case they will be in danger of being unable to feed, house or clothe their families. We know the trouble Canadians have had holding on to their houses in recent years. Fortunately for this borrowing Bill, there is a crisis of confidence today which is forcing Canadians to save at the highest rate possible. However, more importantly, we must have as soon as possible an opportunity through an election for Canadians to state that they want a different force or thrust from their government, a thrust which will restore confidence in Canada and encourage Canadians to spend their money and rejuvenate the ailing economy, and many of those unemployed Canadians will become contributors to society instead of being a drain on it.

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to share a few thoughts today with the House regarding the supplementary borrowing authority the Government is seeking through Bill C-21.

Tradition demands that the Government obtain parliamentary authority in order to borrow new money. This Bill certainly involves that. It involves plenty of new money, in fact $29.5 billion. I think that is enough to boggle the mind, and this year we did not even have a Budget leak which needed plugging.

Can we believe it, the Government is actually coming to Parliament to ask for $29.5 billion. I think we should ask ourselves why it needs this money. Is it because the Department of National Revenue is not working hard enough to collect money from ordinary taxpayers? No, I do not think that is the reason. I believe they are gouging taxpayers more and more, especially those whose incomes are barely enough to see them through. These are the people who cannot take advantage of tax deductions such as the impending $15,000 deduction for RRSPs which benefits those people with incomes of $86,000 or over per year.

Meanwhile, as a Member of Parliament I am faced in my constituency with dozens of cases of small-business people and low-income earners who have literally been hounded for their last dimes. Obviously the revenue end is doing its best. In fact it has been carried to the point of absurdity.

Why, then, is there a need for more money? The answer is government extravagance. With regard to the deficit, we are making the same progress as a man falling down an elevator shaft. There seems to be no shame; the deficit just continues to increase. I know what we will be hearing in the next few days from the gang across the way. We will hear that there are heavy demands on the public purse due to unexpected requirements such as pre-election gimmicks and Budget tricks. We may also hear from government back-benchers justifying the borrowing authority and the embarrassing and frightening deficit on the grounds that it is inevitable spending, that somehow they have done their best and that we over here should accept it. Their best is just not good enough.

Figures abound to confirm the fact that government spending has risen much faster than the Consumer Price Index or the Gross National Product. I think the term "gross national deficit" should be implemented as part of our language. The deficit is gross. It is inexcusable, as are the attempts by the Government to justify the recent increases in interest rates to prop up our sagging dollar. This is happening because investors lack confidence in the Government and in the country. We have a government over there which needs to be defeated.

The Auditor General works for the benefit of Canadians by keeping tabs on the spendthrifts in the Government. Yet now there is talk of reducing this mandate by effectively reducing his powers to control spending and irrational acts of financial suicide. What a shame. If there is criticism, stifle it rather than listen and make appropriate changes: that is the attitude of the Government. That is why it is doomed, doomed, doomed; it is going down to defeat.

Last year it was indicated, supposedly in defence of government spending practices, that Cabinet committees were taking responsibility for expenditure management following the guidelines set out by the Lambert Commission. But then again, the moon is made of green cheese. It is difficult to see any indication of the implementation of any such guidelines. Indeed, I think guidelines is almost a dirty word in the Liberal caucus. After all, if there were guidelines the key players in the Gillespie affair would have had to resign, apologize and repent. That is why they prefer to operate without guidelines.

Speaking of guidelines, the six and five program is supposed to be credited with stopping inflation. I am pleased inflation has been reduced, but the deficit is in the clouds, to the extent that the Government will have to borrow $29.5 billion to cover expenses. Spending is up by 10 per cent, which is double the present five and four program. The Government needs in one year almost as much as all Canadians have saved in their bank accounts, which are losing value each day as the dollar sinks to ever-increasing depths. This Government in its grasping leaves no money for new homes or new jobs. The tremendous borrowing will make banks that much richer and citizens that much poorer. Indeed, the excessive borrowing demands point out the absolute confusion and lack of realism in the Ministry of Finance.

• (1150)

What a legacy to leave to the new, temporary Liberal Prime Minister! Not only will he have to choose new drapes for 24 Sussex Drive but he will have to try to rectify the financial mess left behind by his predecessor. He will have to deal with a wounded, battered and sick economy and a country literally brought to its knees by interest rates that will probably approach 16 per cent as we come to early fall and an election.

Mr. Clarke: He will make it worse.

Mr. Fretz: That is right, he will make it worse. What to do, then, with this borrowing Bill? Why not ask for half as much money, which is all the Government really needs? I am sure Opposition critics would be less critical of a borrowing authority Bill which reflects stability and restraint. Perhaps then the programs which are not absolutely essential will be dropped, especially some of the advertising extravaganzas.

Someone has to bite the bullet. I ask my Liberal colleagues to forget the handouts, to forget the advertising, to forget the slush funds and to remember the needs of the people and the country. Eliminate the costly and frivolous programs which are bringing this country down. Eliminate the costly duplication of services. Another suggestion, a small one, but it is significant: how about turning off lights when they are not needed? When I come into the House of Commons at night and work into the wee hours of the morning, the place is lit up like a theatre stage.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fretz: Members of Parliament may have their faults, but we all know how to turn off light switches. The list goes on and on. I got some laughs just now when I mentioned the lights. If all or many of the lights were turned off in all of the buildings during the night, we could probably save thousands of dollars.

Think of the incredible bailout of Canadair. Think of Maislin. Think of the Crown corporations with their hands out. The waste is incredible. So why do we not take the bull by the horns and stop spending? Then the deficit will drop and totally unreasonable requests for money such as we have here today would become a thing of the past. Bill C-21 gives further proof to the notion that the Government no longer believes in accountability or moderation. Here we have an administration that really needs only $15 billion, yet it comes to Parliament and asks for $29.5 billion. The Bill is yet another reminder that the Liberal philosophy as espoused by this Government is to spend, spend, spend, with no end in sight.

Listen to their spokesman, the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans), who on February 22, 1983 made a statement which was referred to recently by my colleague the Hon. Member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart). The Member for Ottawa Centre said:

> A deficit is no more and no less than an increase in future tax liabilities . . . I believe that the best way to stimulate the economy and maintain the income support programs that are necessary in our economy is to use the deficit.

That is wonderful, Mr. Speaker, but who pays for the deficit? Our children and grandchildren. Future Canadians will be burdened with this deficit long after the Member for Ottawa Centre has ceased to utter such nonsense.

Whatever happened to keeping budgets in the black, even at the expense of cutting some of the extras? By the end of this fiscal year the gross debt will be $190 billion. In 1984-85, the cost of servicing the debt will be $20.4 billion or $800 per capita. Surely something must be done to curb this. The Liberal Party is into a leadership race. The Liberals will probably elect a new conductor. But with the same old orchestra, they will play the same old, worn-out tunes. I recommend that an early replacement of this Government is the first step in the right direction.

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the Hon. Member for Fort Erie (Mr. Fretz) when he spoke about turning off the lights. Perhaps I might suggest that even with the lights on Members opposite seem to be running around in the dark because they come to us constantly for more and more money.

Mr. Roy: Put the lights on.

Mr. Schellenberger: This time the Government is asking for an astonishing amount. I hear Members over there laughing. It is hitting home that they need bright lights.

This Government is asking us to allow it to borrow $29.5 billion. The Liberal Government is even asking us to allow it to borrow $4 billion more than it projects it needs. The Hon. Member who has just spoken said that perhaps the Government requires only half of what it is asking, but the Liberals are trying to convince us to give them an extra amount extending beyond March 31, 1985.

This is the largest borrowing Bill we have ever had in this House, Mr. Speaker. If the Government put forward its program and said it requires for the benefit of Canadians this much more money than it is taking in, and if the program were outlined and we agreed with that program, with some minor doubts, then perhaps we might say all right, we are prepared to grant that kind of money. In all of the eight borrowing Bills that we have had in this Parliament, most of the amounts requested have been reduced because Members fought this kind of undefined request against asking for huge amounts of money, and against this trusting Government to spend that money appropriately, without a plan being put before Members of Parliament. Any other procedure is not acceptable. Should we accept this Government's word and trust it to spend that money properly? Many of my colleagues have announced areas of concern where taxpayer's money has not been spent wisely. No wonder we are reluctant to approve a borrowing Bill which, by and large, is asking for money that we do not know how the Government will spend. That is a concern.

Then we have the concern that is enunciated over and over again. This Government had the audacity in the Budget just presented to project deficits of over $25 billion for the next four years running. The Liberal Government is not embarrassed to spend almost $30 billion more than it has collected this year. What about the Budgets we have had in the past which have been accumulating debt at an alarming rate? The Liberals are projecting deficits in the future of astounding amounts. As already mentioned, future generations will be burdened with this debt. They are the ones who will have to pay back this money.

This rate of annual borrowing will certainly double the deficit by 1990. The deficit we have now is alarming. That situation is not acceptable. Members of Parliament on all sides of this House are elected to spend properly and wisely the money which taxpayers are required by law to send to this institution. We have an obligation to see that those deficits do not increase at such an excessive rate, that money is spent in a wise and proper manner with scrutiny, and that the powers of Parliament are increased so that as we look at the estimates in committee we have the capacity to question those who are spending this money. We should see to it, in areas where we believe the Government is asking for more money than is required, that we are able to reduce those estimates. Under the present authority in this House of Commons we have the ridiculous situation of completely annihilating a whole spending program in order to make the point that a small part of the estimates are not being spent properly. That is not acceptable to me as a Member of Parliament and it should not be acceptable to any Member in this House.

The federal Government will owe more than the total accumulated, direct and guaranteed debt of all ten provinces put together after this new borrowing.

There is an astounding amount of borrowing in the country. As of December 31, 1982 the provinces owed $115 billion. The federal Government directly owed $112 billion without considering what Crown corporations have borrowed, and that is anywhere from $45 billion to $70 billion. If this borrowing authority Bill is passed, we will find that our combined direct debt will climb to well over $130 billion.

Today the federal Government is asking to borrow more than twice what all of the provinces are asking to borrow. This year, the provinces will borrow approximately $12.7 billion. The federal Government has indicated that it requires $29.5 billion. The $4 billion that the Government is requesting which is over and above its projected borrowing needs amounts to 31 per cent of the total projected borrowing of all of the provinces in the country. Add to that the accumulated liabilities Crown corporations which amount to $71 billion. Canadian taxpayers are directly responsible for those liabilities and have been asked to give and give to Canadair and de Havilland in order to keep them operating.

I am astonished by the Crown corporations. If a private corporation were losing money at a rate comparable to Crown corporations, it would surely ask the board of directors, the chairman of the board and the chief executive officers to come before a committee to be run over the coals and asked why they are making those kinds of investments and projecting those kinds of payments. That does not happen in the case of Crown corporations. Canadair is losing money, the Government has the audacity to ask for another billion and a half dollars, yet it appoints the same board of directors again. A committee is unable to question those directors in any way. That is unacceptable. No wonder Canadians are questioning the kind of borrowing that Crown corporations are undertaking without proper scrutiny by the House.

What happens with this kind of federal borrowing pressure on the economy? Certainly it causes concern to the ordinary citizen. The ordinary citizen and the ordinary small businessman is competing with the large borrowing arm of the federal Government. Federal borrowing pressure is having a negative effect on the economy. Interest rates are again increasing. I read in the newspapers yesterday that the interest rate in the United States is rising as well. Large government borrowing in Canada is putting extreme pressure on the dollar which is decreasing in value.

We have two choices to make if we do not control federal borrowing. We either allow the dollar to decrease in value, which is inflationary and we begin to print money, or we allow interest rates to rise. The private sector of the economy simply cannot sustain another increase in interest rates lasting for a long period of time. If that is allowed to happen, small businesses, farms and many people will be thrust immediately into bankruptcy. There has not been sufficient time to recover from the last devastating increase in interest rates.

We have a federal Government which is not able to control its spending and which is asking us to go to market for another $29 billion. An astounding statistic mentioned by my friend, the Hon. Member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke), is that the Government is asking to borrow 93 per cent of the money that Canadians are prepared to save this year. That does not leave very much money for others to borrow. I am very concerned about this situation, Mr. Speaker. I believe that we as Members of Parliament must thoroughly investigate the needs of the Government before we grant it that kind of money, and that is what we intend to do.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to enter into this debate to make it quite clear that my colleagues and I are intending to vote against Bill C-21 which calls for the borrowing of $29.55 billion. Once I have had a few minutes to outline the reasons why we will do so, I believe that even the odd member on the government side will be puzzled that they as individuals would even consider supporting this kind of a borrowing Bill.

Previous speakers have pointed out that one of the most disturbing things about this Bill is the Government's desire to borrow an extra $4 billion as a contingency fund. I think that in an election year that is a particularly stinky request to be made by a government about to go to the polls. In recent years, this entire Government has demonstrated an incapacity to deal effectively with the problems of Canada. I wish to speak briefly about the failures of some of the projects in which the Government has become involved.

I see that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Bussières) is present. I do not think he likes to be reminded too often of failures like Consolidated Computer into which he and his colleagues put $100 million over a period of 24 months. It went on to the chopping block and the Canadian taxpayers got a couple of hundred thousand bucks back. We must look at the cost per job in that situation and in terms of Canadair. We should also look at the loss to the Canadian taxpayers caused by the office building across the street here which is rented by the federal Government but is empty. The Government is paying $1 million a month to rent empty space. One can only wonder what kind of incompetence is loose within the Government and certainly within the Cabinet.

The Government is coming before us, as pointed out by previous speakers, to ask for borrowing authority which will absorb over 90 per cent of Canadian savings during this coming year. By this time next year, that authority will cost $800 for every man, woman and child in Canada simply to service the interest on the debt. It is phenomenal that the debt is escalating at such a rate that, when including the borrowing of Crown corporations, it amounts to at least $160 billion. As others have pointed out, it amounts to a cost to us of $17.6 billion for 1983 simply in order to service the interest on that enormous debt.

I would like to spend a few moments speaking about my own constituency and explaining the problems the Government has created for itself and for all of Canada not only through its borrowing but particularly through its expenditures. My constituency is very large and encompasses over one-third of British Columbia. Over the past two and a half years, it has received more direct federal capital expenditure than any other constituency in the country. One would think that there would be massive job creation and that everyone would be doing just great. One would think that small businesses would be doing fine. However, let me give you two examples, Mr. Speaker, which I think exemplify the kind of shortsightedness with which the Government operates and which exemplify why my constituents, even when receiving the largest direct federal capital expenditure in the country, still suffer from unemployment. In some areas of my constituency the unemployment rate is reaching 90 per cent, and across the constituency it is still running at around 30 per cent.

An example of a major project over which the Government is always crowing is Ridley Island. It seems that the Government is always sending Cabinet Ministers to Prince Rupert in order to cut ribbons and I welcome those Cabinet Ministers. I think that that is just fine. However, I think all of us in the House are somewhat disturbed when we see the Government participating in the purchase of the coal stacker reclaimer from Japan. It is principally Americans who are doing the overseeing of the marine work for the docking facilities. A Swedish company is doing most of the onshore cement work for the grain elevators.

Whereas the people of Prince Rupert had been promised that a large number of permanent, long-term jobs would be created through the Ridley Island development, it now appears that there will be fewer than 150 permanent jobs created by a project that all members of the Cabinet have crowed about all over the country. The benefits simply have not been delivered to the people of my constituency.

Another such example is that one of the largest expenditures on a CN rail line in the whole of Canada for the past 18 months and the coming 12 months is the line from Prince Rupert to Redpass at Smithers. The switching equipment alone is worth over $125 million. Again, because of a Government with almost no ability to look ahead and to plan, all of that switching equipment is being constructed in the United States. If the Government is trying to tell Canadians who are out of work that, having one of the largest railway systems in the world, we cannot construct, provide and instal switching equipment for railways in Canada, something is terribly wrong with the system.

Hundreds of millions of dollars are being spent on Ridley Island and to upgrade the CN rail line but there is still 30 per cent unemployment in the communities where the development is occurring. This ridiculous situation demonstrates the Government's lack of foresight and ability to plan.

The level of incompetence on the Cabinet benches is so high that it would be irresponsible for members of the Opposition to endorse this kind of borrowing. The Government simply has not demonstrated good accounting practices. The Auditor General of Canada continues to take the Government to task but it has not come forward with proper accounting procedures.

All this has dire consequences for the forest industry in my riding. It provides an enormous volume of wood for direct export to Pacific rim countries. The Watson Island pulp mill and Eurocan are among the largest suppliers of world price pulp in Canada.

Northern British Columbia is now in the early years of what is called the "fall-down effect". The federal and provincial Governments have allowed the forest companies to do what Professor Walters of the University of British Columbia Forestry School describes as the gang raping of the forest resource. According to provincial government cabinet documents, there will be a more severe and earlier fall-down effect than was previously expected. That means that in less than five years we will have to reduce by one-third the amount of wood being cut on forest lands. The federal Government has been negotiating with the Province of British Columbia for a five-year reforestation plan directed at northern British Columbia, the interior and the Kootenays, all of which have been badly managed, overcut and underinvested.

Federal Government advisers in the Canadian Forest Service say that it should be putting at least $130 million per year into reforesting back-log lands. British Columbia was promised at least 40 per cent of that money and that would mean between $50 million and $60 million per year from the federal Government if the Province of British Columbia would advance the same amount of money. But the Premier and his Minister of Finance have put forward false figures and have lied to the people of British Columbia about the size of the deficit. They say that over three years it is $2.48 billion, but the Department of Economics at the University of British Columbia has confirmed that the real deficit for the province is less than $100 million. The Premier and the Socred Party who are associated with the Tories nationally have simply cooked the books. That is the nicest way of putting it. In northern British Columbia that means that when the provincial government says it has to practise restraint, it fires provincial forest employees and gets rid of public servants. At the same time the provincial ombudsman is pointing out that as high as 10 per cent of the wood cut in British Columbia does not draw stumpage charges because it is not being properly scaled by the government. We are losing on that as well.

Let me finish by saying that in terms of the reforestation agreement, the Government's officials say that it should put in between $50 million and $60 million of federal money. The province will not put up any money so the federal Government says it will not play either. That is not good enough, Mr. Speaker. Last year the federal Government took almost $700 million so it must put forward that $50 million which will create 2,000 jobs at $25,000 per year in northern British Columbia.

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-21 would give the Government authority to borrow $29.6 billion. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) have indicated that they believe Canadian agriculture is not in serious difficulty at the present time. I would dispute that. Regardless of whether agriculture is doing well or not, I should like to present to the House some calculations which relate the $29.6 billion debt to agriculture.

The average income of a Canadian farmer is $9,000. It would take a farmer 3,288,888 years to repay $29.6 billion. I think it is beyond the physical capacity of most farmers to achieve that goal. Even if it were spread over all farmers in Canada, it would mean 10.5 years. That is to say that all 320,000 Canadian farmers would have to work full-time, using all of their earned net income against the debt, to pay off this single borrowing Bill. They would have no funds left over for clothes, additional food or recreation and they would have to work full-time for the Government for 10.5 years.

The Government is not just any borrower but a special borrower. It has the right to tax people, to tax things that move and things that do not move. It has the right to tax things that keep us warm, things that feed us, things that clothe us. In some cases taxes are imposed on things that would raise questions with you and me, Mr. Speaker.

There have been many questions raised in the House recently about the activities of Revenue Canada. A good example of the extremes to which the Government or its tax collectors might go is the recent effort by Revenue Canada to tax a dead man's clothes by trying to exhume the body and take his jacket off. That situation actually occurred, Mr. Speaker. It is an example of the difficulty and the pressure the Government is under because of past borrowing and of the extremes to which it will go to collect taxes.

What happens to the money that is collected? After using it and putting a very significant administrative cost on it, the Government puts it back into the country using means which it hopes will persuade people to re-elect it. The Government has been very successful in a number of ways. In fairness, I know that the Government at least intends to provide social measures for the benefit of all Canadians. It has been very successful in providing one particular social program which is not discussed very much, and that is spreading the debt.

On the basis of this single borrowing Bill, in 1984 the Government can claim to have achieved a goal never achieved by any other government. It has spread the national debt so that every Canadian, man, woman and child, owes $6,026. That is a very significant social accomplishment. We should not forget that the debt is also carried by senior citizens, the unemployed and the handicapped. Indeed, anyone who might feel that they might have been neglected by society until now will know that they are treated equally and that they share in carrying over $6,000 in debt. Next year they will carry $7,210 and on the basis of past performance you can expect the debt to increase year by year.

The Canadian public is getting some pretty sophisticated explanations about why this borrowing is necessary, where the money goes and what the problems are. When the Minister projected the amount of borrowing or deficit financing that would be required this year, he did so on the basis of an interest rate calculated by the Department of Finance. It should be pointed out that with interest rates climbing as they have in the past two weeks, an additional one-half of 1 per cent interest means that our debt increases by $750 million. It is clear that we do not need the $29.6 billion in total that has been applied for by the Government. However, if interest rates keep climbing, as they may very well, those additional dollars the Government is asking for now could quickly be used up.

The Liberal Party has criticized members of the Conservative Party over the months and years particularly for not having any solid solutions or plans. I have one, Mr. Speaker, which I would like to offer to the House for its consideration. It is a very specific proposal to try to deal with this national debt. I would propose, Mr. Speaker, that we have a user fee, not one which most people talk about, but a political user fee. What that would mean, Mr. Speaker, is that any government could borrow as much money as it wanted. At the end of the year it would have to account for the money. It could do that on the basis of, for instance, zero balancing on its accounting, if it likes. At the end of its term of office—although at the end of each year would be better—the government which has borrowed this money so it can buy votes would then have to make an accounting. The political party that formed the Government—the Liberal Party of Canada in this case—would then be responsible for the interest rate which was charged on the national debt at the time.

That is a very interesting proposition, Mr. Speaker, because it would mean that the Liberal Party, if it chose, could spend another $10 billion. However, if it did not take in enough revenue to cover what it spent, that Party would have to pay the interest rate on the money. That Party could use the money as often and as much as it wanted as long as it would take the responsibility at least for paying the interest on that money as time went on.

That is an idea which may not gain immediate popularity with the Liberal Party, in particular, because if that proposition is used as a basis of the responsibility of the Liberal Party of Canada to the Canadian people, I am afraid it would be a very long time before it would be able to meet its obligation and fulfil that responsibility.

I would like to suggest that on the basis of its record, both past and present, the Liberal Party has established a record of performance which, if continued, will in fact bury this country. However, seeing what we are being presented with now in terms of leadership candidates for the Liberal Party, I believe the Liberal Party in fact will be well represented by John Turner ad infinitum.

Borrowing Authority Act

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak briefly this morning in the debate on Bill C-21, an Act to provide the Government with borrowing authority. This Bill, as it is written, allows the Government to borrow $29.55 billion for the fiscal year 1984-1985. Out of this amount, $25.6 billion is for actual expenditures in 1984, plus another $4 billion for emergency spending such as to shore up the Canadian dollar in foreign exchange markets. As we all know, the Canadian dollar at the present time vis-à-vis the United States dollar is slipping. That borrowing authority is also to be used to cover up government mistakes in planning its expenditures.

In total, we are talking about $30 billion. When I first came to this House some 13 years ago, that amount was a lot of money. It still is a lot of money when you consider from where we have to borrow it. I do not believe the Canadian public is fully aware of the reasons why the Government is asking for so much money in borrowing authority. I would just like to give a very brief rundown on some of the major reasons we are debating $30 billion in borrowing authority this morning.

First on the list, of course, has to be the Canadair debâcle. Canadair had the largest single loss in one year of a Canadian company. It was in excess of $1 billion. Another debâcle, in this Party's opinion, is the Petroleum Incentive Program, the PIP grants which were given to the large oil companies. In one year that has cost the Government in revenue approximately $1.6 billion. The Liberal slush fund, the great porkbarrel of the 1980s, cost $350 million. There are the deferred corporate taxes. The latest figures we have are $22 billion in deferred corporate taxes for 1980. That is going back almost four years.

In addition to that, there was the lowering of taxes for high-income earners, such as doctors, lawyers, accountants and other professional people, which was in the 1984 Budget. If you put that all together, we have lost additional revenue of some $25 billion. That would almost close the gap in our borrowing. We would then be talking possibly in terms of borrowing only $5 billion, using simple arithmetic figures. It is, of course, not quite that simple, but nonetheless it does serve to illustrate the reasons this Government deserves to be defeated at the next election.

This Government has been in power too long. It has become insensitive. Government expenditures are made for the wrong reasons, as far as this Party is concerned, and at the same time it is borrowing to pay for its past mistakes. But what has the Government done with such essential services and worth-while investments as post-secondary education? It has cut back on post-secondary education. It is also cutting back on the rate of financial assistance to the provinces for medicare. We could have one of the best medicare systems in the world. In fact, we did have a very fine medicare system until the late 1970s when the federal Government and the provinces went to block funding and the provinces were no longer accountable dollar for dollar to the federal Government as to how that funding would be spent. Now medicare itself is in jeopardy.

The Government is constantly talking about hundreds of millions of dollars in job creation. Yet the unemployment figures are sliding up as each month goes by. The Government does not effectively have a handle on the job-creation program principally because it is not investing enough money in job training and retraining for permanent and meaningful jobs. It is simply sticking its finger in the dike, hoping to hold back the flood waters, hoping to hold down the total figure of unemployment until it can get the next election out of the way.

We are not training our young people, in particular, for high technology jobs. Obviously, there will not be enough high technology jobs for everyone who is unemployed, but certainly the Government is not making the same effort which is being made, for example, in countries like Japan, West Germany, France and even the United Kingdom. The Government says let the private sector do it. The private sector, which is the engine of recovery, is now holding back on investments and on job creation because it is very frightened of what lurks around the next corner as far as the economy is concerned.

One area which my colleague, the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton), mentioned a few moments ago is renewable resources such as reforestation. It is a tragedy that in this country, where we depend so heavily on forestry as a major industry, the Government is doing virtually nothing itself, or to force the provinces, for that matter, to reforest our country. We are destroying our forests and apparently the Government cares very little about husbanding those resources for the future. We could be investing hundreds of millions of dollars, even billions of dollars, for a future return instead of simply throwing money away and seeing it disappear.

A lot of us, Mr. Speaker, and I am including myself, have to be reminded from time to time of why things have got out of whack in the western world, particularly in North America. Massive deficit spending has become the order of the day. My Conservative friends say that is not Conservatism; Conservatives would have balanced budgets eventually. It is the Liberal-Social Democratic philosophy in North America which has led to these massive deficits; it believes in irresponsible spending, spending our way out of recessions and depressions and so on. But it is interesting to note that the only provincial government in this country which consistently balanced its budget in the 1970s was turfed out by the people. That was the NDP Government in Saskatchewan. When the Tories came in, for the first time in seven years, I believe it was, Saskatchewan went into deficit financing. For the last two years they have been running a deficit of about $250 million, which is a lot of money for a small province like that.

However, what got us started first of all was the Vietnam War. The United States had no business getting involved in that country in the first place, for a variety of reasons which I will not go into now with hindsight. But at the time my Party at least stood up against that intervention when many other Parties in this House refused to. That war cost a lot of money. Wars are never successful financially regardless of what the short term might bring. They are devastating to economies, whether you win or lose. In fact, World War II proved that if you lost you were a heck of a lot better off than if you won. The cost of that war was inestimable, but instead of putting on post-war controls, Lyndon Johnson said we could have guns and butter. But we could not, and what followed was the great inflation. That was followed by the great recession.

Another great Conservative then came into office in the White House saying he would bring down the deficit and balance the books as a true Conservative should. Then President Reagan turned around and ran the deficit up to $180 billion in the U.S. That great Conservative, that man who wants to practise fiscal responsibility, the man who our Conservative Party worships, is the one who drove the U.S. treasury almost into bankruptcy. We are paying for it in this country as well as the ordinary American in the U.S. Let us not forget that when you practise monetarism and you have only a limited pool of financial resources, then interest rates are going to start flying high again. That is what is beginning to happen in the U.S. and that is what is happening now in Canada.

Mrs. Jennifer Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Mr. Speaker, since this debate was initiated by the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. MacLaren) on March 7, some ten working days have passed. Ten working days—another $1 billion in borrowed money added to our national debt. That is the rate at which we are spending more than we earn in this country. Yet the Minister is asking us to approve in Bill C-21 not just the outragious and unprecedented sum of $25.5 billion, but an additional $4 billion. At $100 million a day that is another 40 days in the wilderness.

I have followed this debate closely, both in the House and in Hansard. Hon. Members opposite have put a brave face on it as they have sought to defend yet another page added to the volumes of mismanagement and incompetence which are the written record of this Government—written in ink as red as the ties of the candidates for leadership of their once proud Party. But their defence is in vain. There can be no defence of this Government's policies. Yet speaker after speaker has trotted out the same incredible statements of how well they have responded to the recession they created. They have trotted out a catalogue of good deeds and progress towards economic recovery. The Minister declared in his speech:

> The Budget of last month gives Canadians every good reason to expect that economic recovery will be followed by solid expansion.

The only expansion I can see, Mr. Speaker, is our national debt, an expansion of over $114 billion in the next five years. That is the sum of the Government's projected financial requirements, $114 billion. Yet we are told economic recovery is assured. Private enterprise will lead the way in creating new jobs. Private enterprise will introduce new world-competitive products that will win us exports and fuel an expansion of the domestic market.

"A principal point in our strategy to facilitate a sustained expansion is policies to promote business investment": so said the Minister just 12 days ago. I wonder if he realizes that as long as the Government keeps drawing huge sums from the investment pool there will be no promotion of business investment. Already, as several of my colleagues on this side of the House have stated, the Government's borrowing is monopolizing personal individual savings. It amounts to 93 per cent of the available $32 billion from that source. Perhaps that is why the Minister suddenly seems so interested in pension reform. Not for the purpose of providing Canadians with adequate financial security in their later years, Mr. Speaker, no. I think the reason the Minister calls the pension reform proposals "imaginative and far reaching", the reason they inspire him so, is that they will increase the savings rate, providing a larger pool from which to finance private investment. The Government has already exhausted the personal savings source.

Has the Government not already squandered enough of our future resources with the $151 billion in debt it has already accumulated? Does it really need to covet our pensions as well?

Of course, according to the Government everything is really under control. We are on the way to recovery. Oh, interest on the debt may be slated to increase from $18 billion in the current year to over $24 billion by 1988, an increase of 36 per cent in four years, but the Government is taking care of it. What about the falling Canadian dollar and the slow but steady climb of interest rates, unemployment rates and the inflation rate? Yes, the Government is taking care of them. But I ask just how is the Government going to take care of this debt and these ever climbing interest charges? Well, according to the fiscal plan of the Budget, our growing economy will take care of it all. Direct personal taxes alone will more than cover the increase. They will rise 53 per cent by 1988, from $37 billion to $57 billion. Of course, how the taxpayers are to find this extra $20 billion is anyone's guess.

The same Budget documents state that disposable income will grow only 2.7 per cent annually between now and 1988. Even compounded that does not come close to 53 per cent. If the tax man takes it, what will that do to consumer spending and the manufacturing sector? Inflation could account for it but we have been promised only modest inflation up until 1988. To reach 53 per cent we would have to have 12 per cent, 13 per cent or even 14 per cent inflation again. Perhaps the 3.6 per cent of unemployed who have been promised work by 1988, given the estimated reduction of the current unemployment rate to 7.7 per cent by 1988, will be able to make up the difference.

I only hope the voters of Canada remember that projection of $20 billion in extra taxes in 1988 when all the possible leaders of the Liberal Party are promising a land of milk and honey if only we will vote for them. But we on this side of the House know Liberal promises. My colleagues have read the list of promises made over the last 16 years by one Liberal Minister of Finance after another. That is why and how we are where we are today.

● (1240)

Were their records different and the extravagances of Mr. Turner, Mr. Macdonald, the present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Chrétien), the present Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) and the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) not so painfully obvious to all of us, I, for one, might be able to give my support to the idea of a $4 billion contingency fund. Were the management of the Canadian economy over the past 16 years a shining example of thoughtful, sound and responsible leadership, one might agree that the Government be given such leeway as this $4 billion. However, that is not the case. To give an additional $4 billion to the Government, or even the $25.5 billion, the fiscal requirement specified in the Budget, when at most they face only one-half to two-thirds of the budget year in office, is almost an act of folly in itself.

I am no economist, Mr. Speaker. I have no pretensions to be one. Since entering the House I have learnt enough to know that the Ministers charged with the financial management of our country are no economists either. Unfortunately for all of us, they do have pretensions.

The Government will continue the same old formula; pork-barrel and waste, extravagance and mismanagement. That is why they need the $4 billion contingency fund, to sweeten the election pot and to continue to bail out the likes of Canadair, de Havilland and Canada Post. It may be an acceptable policy to the Members opposite year after year to live beyond their means in the expectation that somehow, something, someone will bail them out.

In the world of the 1980s, Mr. Speaker, regardless of our alliance and close relationship with our neighbour to the south, we are on our own. It is up to us to heed the hard lesson learned of extravagance. It is up to us to put our own house in order. No one else will do it for us. Tacking on an unnecessary $4 billion to the borrowing authority, which is already too high, is not the way to go about it. As soon as the Government realizes this and begins to govern accordingly, we may begin to talk about the roads to recovery and not before.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge-Foothills): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for Finance (Mr. MacLaren) should appreciate that this Bill is not going to go through. We are going to debate this Bill until hell freezes over because it is wrong. I have stood up every time a borrowing Bill is tabled and I will stand again and again until ordinary Canadians begin to see the fraudulent nature of the Government.

The amount of $29.55 billion is obscene and it is not going to go through. That is more than all of the income taxes paid by all of the citizens of the country in 1981. It is a row of one dollar bills which goes around the world several times. It is like taking 29,000 millionaires and stripping them to their shorts. That is over 2,000 a month. We barely have 5,000 millionaires in the country and yet we would need to strip 29,000 of them.

That is another way of saying that the money is coming out of the pockets of ordinary Canadians. It is the seniors of the country who are paying the debt through inflation. Our youth are paying the debt. There are now 10 people for every job as compared to when I graduated from university, when there were 10 jobs for every graduate. The youth, the businessmen and the farmers are paying. This Bill is simply not going to go through. The Government had better invoke closure and force Canadians to swallow a bitter pill again.

I will give the best example I can think of to explain to Canadians that it is they individually who are paying this debt. In this country individuals do have profit. I know that is an evil word for the NDP. However, Canadians had a profit of about $32 billion. That is their savings, Mr. Speaker. As tough as things are, by being very careful and thrifty, ordinary Canadians were able to put a few dollars in the bank. That savings totals $32 billion. The Government is borrowing almost the entire savings of Canadians. The effect is to force provincial governments, municipal governments and small businessmen who need to borrow a few bucks into the offshore markets. More and more money has to flow out to service that debt. The Canadian dollar then has to drop. The inflation rate then goes up. That drives up interest rates. That automatically means that the inflation tax spreads.

You know as well as I, Mr. Speaker, that inflation as a tax does not affect people equally. It certainly is not progressive, causing people with wealth to pay more. Indeed, quite the opposite. Inflation attacks people on fixed incomes. Those are our seniors. Inflation affects people who want to get into business but cannot afford to because the value of land has gone up. Inflation helps certain people. It helps those of us who own our own homes. It helps those of us who own apartments and land. Inflation does not affect us, Mr. Speaker. It benefits us to an enormous extent at the cost of seniors and their peaceful old age. It affects the youth and their chance of a future in the country. That is why this Bill has to be defeated, Mr. Speaker.

If one were to compare Members of Parliament, one would find that members of the Progressive Conservative Party tend to be business people. They own land and farms. There are more active farmers in this Party than on the Government side, even though it has half again as many members. In a sense, inflation can benefit people with property. Yet it is members of the Progressive Conservative Party who are speaking against this Bill because it is not fair. It is not in the Canadian and Conservative context of fairness. It is quite an irony, but nonetheless there it is.

It was not always so, Mr. Speaker. Canadians must understand this. In 1968 the national debt was just a drop in the bucket even though we had come through a major depression and World War II. By 1968 the yearly budget was balanced. There was no $30 billion deficit. At the same time we had Old Age Security, the Canada Pension Plan, post-secondary education and health insurance. The country was building. There were 10 jobs for every person coming into the labour force. Now, a mere 16 years later, we have a national debt which requires over 35 per cent of the tax revenues to pay the interest on it. This does not reduce the debt, Mr. Speaker; it merely pays interest on it.

We have a post-secondary education system which is in a state of collapse. Our seniors have no sense of security in their old age. Inflation of 10, 12 or 14 per cent reduces a pension of $1,000 a month, which may be satisfactory today, to $500 a month within five years. In 1968 there was inflation of 3 to 4 per cent. The seniors can handle that because at that rate it takes 20 years for their money to be halved and by that time most of us are gone. That type of inflation can be handled, but inflation of 10, 12 or 14 per cent destroys them. It destroys the future of our young people.

We have a whole class of young people, Mr. Speaker, who are coming through the system being fretful. They do not have a sense of future or a sense that the country is building as it was when we graduated. The effect on their psychological sense of well-being is devastating.

This country was youthful, dynamic and building into a great nation. This country should be a power in the world rather than a second-rate banana republic, which is what the Government is turning it into. Canada should be climbing the mountain. Instead we are wallowing around in the depths of despair. That is what a Liberal Government has done to us. It honestly believes that it can remake the nation in its radical left-wing, socialist view. It believes it can remake mankind in one giant quantum legislative leap. We can see this in all of its programs. We can see this in forced metric which could have been done in one generation if it had been put on a voluntary basis. If it had started in the schools within one generation everyone would have been on metric and it would be no problem. Instead, in spite of the fact that millions of acres in western Canada were surveyed on the basis of one mile east and west and two miles north and south, it is now suddenly 1.6 kilometres. That mileage in western Canada was part of the cultural heritage of western Canada, just as much as the French language is part of the cultural heritage of Quebec.

• (1250)

Our Party stood up to protect the cultural heritage of Quebec. We voted for official bilingualism in this country and would implement that program in a way that is much more fair. But did the ordinary members from Quebec stand up to protect the cultural heritage of western Canada? Not a bit. They sold out western Canada. That is why the 27 seats they held in 1968 are gone and they will never get them back.

Mr. Tousignant: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like the Hon. Member to explain what he just said about people from Quebec selling out—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order, please. There are no questions allowed at this point of debate.

Mr. Tousignant: He is misleading the House.

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, the Liberal Party voted to impose on all of western Canada a forced march to metric in spite of the fact that millions of acres of land were surveyed on the basis of miles rather than kilometres.

Mr. Evans: It is the same everywhere in the country.

Mr. Thacker: No, it is not. Kilometres might seem quite appropriate for Ontario and Quebec and other—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order. I would like to remind the Hon. Member that he must relate his remarks to the subject which is before the House. I fail to see how metric and what he is discussing now has any bearing on the borrowing authority.

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, it relates to an attitude, because this deficit is just as obscene as what the Liberals did with the metric system.

In summary, any senior citizen in this country who votes for the Liberal Party is voting for personal bankruptcy and a future that will see them living in single rooms and grovelling in poverty. That is what would happen to a senior. Any youth who would vote for the Liberal Party is voting to put his or her head in a noose and deny himself or herself a future. Any business person who votes Liberal is voting for state enterprise and the death of small business. Any farmer who votes for the Liberal Party is voting for the 1971 promise to update the V-day to 1974. It is a promise that was broken because truly the Liberal Party is VD.

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question that was attempted to be asked by the gentleman across the way, I would say that one of the first things the Liberals did to affect the west was to implement the National Energy Program.

It is interesting that the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. MacLaren) is supporting one of the candidates who I believe would probably relegate the NEP to the trash heap, or at least has indicated as much.

This Bill is one for three governments; the present Government, the interim government when the Liberals elect a new leader, and the Conservative Government after the next election. I strongly object to the Government's borrowing money at this time since this deficit will be our responsibility when we are elected the Government. I want to deny them that opportunity.

This Bill can be broken down into three parts. First, it is a borrowing Bill for the period from now until June 17. After June 17, the Government could ask for further borrowing authority when it has a new Leader. They might want to call it a new government but I see it as the same government, the same gang with a new leader. They should bring in a second borrowing Bill as soon as Parliament reconvenes after the leadership convention.

The final borrowing requirement should be left until the next election since there must be one between now and the end of the year. I hope we will not have to go through another winter election, for the sake of all the candidates who will be running.

I believe the Government currently has $4 billion to $5 billion. It is seeking to put more into its treasury. I do not believe we should give the Government that right because it is absolutely wrong for it to be given so much on a broad basis. We have not been given an opportunity to review the estimates. The estimates are a disgrace. I had the opportunity to review the estimates for Japan for this current year. The comparison is quite unbelievable. The priorities in Japan are for productivity, jobs and training. The Government has missed these areas in its priorities.

An example of this can be seen in the Government's Budget. In the area of science and technology it will spend approximately eight-tenths of 1 per cent of our gross expenditures, while in the same year Japan will spend 1.2 per cent of its gross expenditures. That explains why Japan spends close to 2.5 per cent of GNP for research and development and we spend less than 1.5 per cent. The Government has not addressed this problem for 15 years.

As our leader has stated many times, 100,000 new jobs will be created for every $1 billion of expenditure. While that may sound expensive, it guarantees future growth in this country and future jobs for Canadians. That is why we cannot endorse this Bill purely on a blanket basis. A new program must be built in that will make Canada move ahead. There are 1.5 million Canadians who are unemployed and, according to the Canadian Medical Association, it is costing us $50 billion a year.

Another effect of the deficit contained in this Bill is that it will consume 92 per cent of all private savings. That does not leave 8 per cent for the private sector because there is no confidence to invest in anything in this country. The private sector has been given tax incentives, some of which are good, but some go too far. The Government is removing funds from the economic framework of Canada that could have been reinvested into the job-making market.

This is the eighth time that I have spoken on a borrowing Bill. It is hard to be original when one speaks for the eighth time on the same subject. Nothing has changed since 1980. The Government is bankrupt. I agree with my Leader when he says that the Liberals are not looking for a new leader, they are looking for a trustee in bankruptcy. We believe this is a serious problem for Canadians because we cannot afford a deficit such as this.

Another example of the Government's spending plans is Canadair. When it asked for $310 million within this borrowing requirement, it did not face the truth. It requires additional funding in case the engines of the 600 are returned by the present customers. It has not faced the necessity of developing a 602 because it cannot sell the 601 until it admits that another plane is required.

Its plans in this regard are short term, as is everything else it has done. Not only does it not make long-term plans, it does not give us all the facts when it places the estimates before us. How do we know that these funds will be sufficient? The Government should be damned for bringing this Bill to the House and I will speak against it. May I call it one o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

TABLING OF 1983 ANNUAL REPORT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to lay upon the table the annual report of the Commissioner of Official Languages for calendar year 1983. May I remind Hon. Members that, pursuant to Standing Order 46(4), this report is deemed permanently referred to the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S.O. 21

TRANSPORT

TOLL ON AUTOROUTES IN LAVAL RIDING

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, my statement concerns the toll on highways in Ville de Laval. The situation is unique in Canada. Users are paying a tax which in 1975 I already said was unfair.

It imposes on the people of Ville de Laval who have to use the highway daily a cost for which there is no justification. At rush hour, the lineups at the toll booths create traffic jams, which mean that people are using more gas.

Mr. Speaker, in 1975 I had no intention of getting involved in a matter that falls under provincial jurisdiction, that of the Government of Quebec. Moreover, when Highway 13 was built at Chomedey, the Government set up two toll booths in the western part of Ville de Laval. With the help of the anti-toll committee, CAP 13, I objected, as Member for Laval, not only for the reasons I mentioned earlier, but also because the Government of Canada had contributed long-term financing amounting to $100 million at a preferential rate, plus a $30 million grant, for the construction of Highway 13.

Today, I am proud to join 120,000 people of Ville de Laval who have signed a petition, as well as a group of federal Members from the Laval-Laurentians area, a group of mayors from the Laurentians, and the Quebec Liberal Party, in demanding that the tolls which have already cost people in this area several thousands of dollars be removed from Ville de Laval.

AGRICULTURE

FARM INPUT COST INCREASES—EXPENSIVE CHEMICAL PRODUCT ADVERTISEMENTS

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, recently I arrived at my constituency residence at 2 a.m. from yet another meeting. For a few moments I watched television. That night my mind kept being drawn back to the fact that on one broadcast was an advertisement for farm weed spray under the brand name "Hoe Grass". It struck me as unusual and wrong that such an advertisement would be broadcast through an expensive medium when farmers were very unlikely to be watching. I reasoned that the only advantage of such an ad was to the chemical company which could claim an operational expense.

This past weekend three farmers on separate occasions complained about full-page colour advertisements of farm chemical products in their newspapers. The farmers knew that ultimately they paid for these expensive ads. Two of the farmers advised me that they may try farming without application of fertilizers or weed sprays in an attempt to reduce operating expenses. I therefore appeal to private sector industries to trim their costs to give farmers a better economic advantage.

Farm input costs increased 115 per cent between 1976 and 1982. Agriculture Canada has estimated that production costs will increase another 110 per cent between 1981 and 1986. The farm fertilizer bill of $661 million in 1978 grew to $1,040 million by 1982, an increase of 57 per cent.

With farm bankruptcies up 19 per cent since 1982, it is important that the House urge all sectors of the agricultural economy to decrease farm input costs. A more modest approach to advertising would be one step—

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

AUTHORIZATIONS SOUGHT TO SECURE CREDIT INFORMATION

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, I have with me three applications for credit cards, all of which were chosen at random, which violate the spirit of the letter of the law regarding privacy. The first one is from Canadian Tire and it reads:

> I authorize Canadian Tire Acceptance Limited to obtain credit information concerning myself and to exchange such information with any credit reporting agency or any person or corporation with whom I have or plan to have financial relations.

The second one is from Esso, and it reads:

> —and I authorize the receipt and exchange of credit information.

The third one is from Visa, by way of Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, and it reads:

—and may disclose (automatically or upon request) credit information about the applicant to credit bureaus and persons with whom the applicant has or proposes to have financial dealings or if the bank believes disclosure is required by law.

I am presenting this now to inform the public that it is giving information which will not necessarily remain with the company, and to request of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mrs. Erola) that she look into the matter to see whether the law is not being violated.

I object to it because there is no dimension or boundary to which this information can be used. It does not matter if I choose not to deal with the company in the future. The company still maintains that information. It does not matter—

Mr. Speaker: I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member but his time has expired.

DISARMAMENT

VOICE OF WOMEN—PROPOSAL TO HOLD INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S CONFERENCE

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, on March 5 I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) to involve women in the Government's arms control and disarmament efforts. I suggested that a woman be appointed to the task force of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I asked that a woman be appointed to the long vacant office of Ambassador for Disarmament.

It is not only in Canada that women are excluded from critical efforts for arms control and disarmament. Even though women around the world make up the largest, strongest component of groups and movements calling for a nuclear weapons freeze, an end to militarism, and drastic arms reductions, women are almost completely excluded from international negotiations. This was strikingly apparent at Stockholm.

The Canadian Voice of Women has an excellent proposal for bringing the experience of millions of women to the negotiating table. Voice of Women is proposing an international women's conference entitled "The Urgency for True Security: Women's Alternatives for Negotiating Peace", to be held in Canada. The Voice of Women has made funding applications for this conference to the Department of External Affairs and to the women's division of the Secretary of State's Department. I urge the Government to give these applications the highest priority.

Just this past weekend the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Blais) was promising millions of dollars to involve Canada in the American space-based navigational satellite system which doubles as a guidance system for nuclear missiles. Such moneys would be far better spent on arms control and disarmament measures, with women fully involved. Government financial help for the Voice of Women conference would be an excellent alternative investment—

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

FRAUDULENT SOLICITATION THROUGH THE MAILS

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Mr. Speaker, last Friday Mr. Ralph Devine and his company, Intra-canada Telecommunications Ltd., were convicted under the Combines Investigation Act of misleading solicitation through the mails. The mailings, on forms which looked like invoices for yellow pages telephone book ads, were actually solicitations for advertising in an independent business directory. Despite repeated public warnings by the Better Business Bureau of the misleading nature of the solicitations, 5,343 businesses sent half a million dollars to Mr. Devine over a six-month period.

One of those solicitations was supplied to me by Mr. Jack Garner of Garner's Sporting Goods, a leading business in the city of Barrie. It was mailed from Buffalo, New York, and the Better Business Bureau informs me that a large number of the mailings originated there.

I urge all businesses to be aware of these types of advertising and soliciting schemes before sending in their money. I urge the Government to post warnings in post offices and to investigate further the matter of Canadian outfits using the American postal service with its much cheaper rates for mass mailings into Canada. As long as our postal rates are nearly twice those in the United States, the Government must ensure that this procedure does not become widespread.

METRIC CONVERSION

NEED FOR DUAL MEASUREMENT LABELLING

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, our National Capital Commission roads are now considered posted in miles per hour since our National Capital Act refers to speed in miles per hours only.

The Ontario Provincial Review Report entitled "The Effect on Elementary Pupils of the Teaching of Metric Measurement" concluded that the student will find the world outside is, and for some years will be, concerned with imperial units. The pound of butter will be with us for some time. Adults will not automatically express their height in centimetres, or their mass in kilograms. Public education will take time. Favourite recipes will not always be replaced willingly. Typewriters will continue to space letters by the inch, and walls with four-foot panels will last for years. The imperial system will not be phased out in a single, magical, metric M-Day.

In fact, 60 per cent of the teachers stated that they mention imperial units in their classroom, while only 45 per cent of the principals claimed that only metric units are used in the classrooms.

This study further justifies the need for a continuation of dual labelling in measurement sensitive areas such as agriculture, for the application of fertilizers and the use of chemical spray guidelines.

Rail transportation, owing to our membership in the Association of American Railroads, will continue to use tons and feet.

ABORTION

CALL FOR REPEAL OF LEGISLATION

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, one of the major concerns of Canadian women is the inequity which exists in abortion legislation. Canada's outmoded and unworkable 1969 abortion law does not permit freedom of conscience. This weekend the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, which represents over 3 million Canadian women, reaffirmed its position that Section 251 of the Criminal Code must be repealed. The National Action Committee also endorsed the establishment of free-standing clinics throughout Canada to provide medically insured abortion in safe and supportive surroundings.

The issue, Mr. Speaker, is choice, not pro or anti abortion. The only way for Parliament to respect differing beliefs on this sensitive moral question is to provide for freedom of conscience. On International Women's Day the New Democrats asked the Government to repeal the abortion legislation. The Acting Minister of Justice refused to answer this question.

The majority of women in Canada are not satisfied with the policy of this Government which refuses women the right to make their own decision concerning this private medical matter. Over the past 20 years many countries, regardless of political system or religious ideology, have legalized abortion.

New Democrats call on the Government to increase funding for planned parenthood and youth clinics to provide birth control education and counselling, and reduce the need for abortion. On behalf of the women of Canada we again call on the Government to repeal—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Hon. Member's time has expired.

RIGHT TO LIFE

LEGAL STATUS OF UNBORN CHILDREN

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, recent scientific advances have raised a host of legal questions in the field of modern birth technologies, including artificial insemination, womb leasing, test tube babies, cloning and other experimental human breeding techniques. At present there are serious deficiencies in the field of criminal, civil liability and family law as regards the unborn. Among the unresolved medical-legal issues are the disposal of spare concepti in in vitro fertilization, the problems surrounding the gift of concepti in embryo transfers, the freezing of fertilized eggs, and the conflict between the rights of the mother and the unborn.

I strongly urge the federal and provincial Governments to enlist the services of their respective law reform commissions to initiate an in-depth and on-going study in order to determine the legal status of the unborn child and to ensure that all ethical requirements are being considered in dealing with the increasingly complex moral and sociological aspects of the birth technologies that are facing the public.

HORTICULTURE

REGIONAL AND SEASONAL TARIFF PROTECTION ADVOCATED

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, today, exceptionally, March 20, is the first day of spring. This year, again exceptionally, I am offering no daffodils from my riding of Esquimalt-Saanich to Members of the House. Well, you may ask why. Why have I refrained this year, exceptionally, from making my annual presentation of daffodils to the House on this first day of Spring? My reason is simple. The Government has failed to listen.

In the past the presentation of daffodils has been coupled with a plea that the Government provide for Canada's home-grown agricultural and horticultural products, as they come to market maturity, greater tariff protection against off-shore competition. It is my belief that the Government has been dazzled by daffodils, and in consequence has failed to read the message those daffodils were seeking to convey. This year the Government will get the message without the daffodils.

What is needed is regional and seasonal tariff protection for our fruits and vegetables as they come to marketable maturity because, at that time, fruits and vegetables from warmer climes to the South are often in excess production and can be exported to Canada at cut-rate bargain prices. Dumping? Maybe. That is worth investigating.

What is also needed is relief for our farmers from onerous federal tax levies on fuels and farm machinery.

Only with this sort of help can our food and flower producers survive.

FINANCE

EXCHANGE VALUE OF DOLLAR—POSITION OF BANK OF CANADA GOVERNOR

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance who had his chain jerked by the Governor of the Bank of Canada last Friday. On March 6 the Minister encouraged a depreciating Canadian dollar by saying that a declining dollar makes Canadian goods cheaper on world markets and that means jobs for Canadians in the forest industry and so on, that he would not spend his nights up worrying that the dollar was not worth 81 cents U.S. Last Friday the Governor of the Bank of Canada said a sharp depreciation of the dollar would bring more troubles than benefits. He would simply not agree to a deliberate depreciation and, if ordered to do so, he would probably be down south playing golf.

Does the Minister agree with these statements made by the Governor of the Bank of Canada? Presumably he does, because he was allowed to act on them. Is the Government committed to support the present level of the Canadian dollar? Is the Government opposed to any policy of deliberate depreciation of the Canadian dollar?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member, as usual, is distorting the facts. What I have indicated is that when there is a lowering in the value of the Canadian dollar, obviously that helps exports. I also indicated that it has an impact on inflation. This is why the Governor of the Bank, as well as myself, have indicated that our policy was to moderate large movements in either direction, either a large decline in the value of the dollar or large increases in interest rates.

The Hon. Member knows that I meet regularly with the Governor of the Bank. We are reviewing the situation on a systematic basis. I have no quarrel at all with what the Governor of the Bank has said. As a matter of fact it corresponds exactly with what I said in the House a few days before the press conference by the Governor.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see the Minister is applauding a public rebuke that was delivered to the Minister by the Governor of the Bank. It was a public rebuke.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: For the first time in Canadian history the Governor of the Bank had to publicly rebuke the Minister, as was done.

POLICY RESPONSIBILITY

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. The Governor of the Bank said on Friday that the central bank had little choice but to let interest rates go up, that if it had taken any other action to keep interest rates down, I quote:

> The exchange rate would have fallen off the clock.

Who is telling the truth about the situation? Is it the Minister who says there is no preferred value for the dollar and that its value floats freely? Or is it the Governor of the Bank who says that if he had not taken action to put interest rates up, the Canadian dollar would have fallen off the clock? Who is telling the truth and who is deciding a policy in this direction?

An Hon. Member: The Governor. You are not.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am amazed that the Hon. Member would say what he said without even smiling. I am sure that the Governor of the Bank at least would likely be smiling at his statement.

• (1420)

In effect the Governor of the Bank has said exactly what I have said repeatedly in the House and elsewhere, which is that our policy is to moderate movements and that we are not favouring sharp declines in the value of the Canadian dollar or sharp increases in interest rates. That is the policy that has been consistently followed by the Government over the years, particularly since my appointment as Minister of Finance.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I am not smiling, nor are Canadians who are suffering from higher interest rates and more unemployment.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Instead of the Governor getting the golf clubs, the Minister had better take his and depart.

STATEMENT ATTRIBUTED TO GOVERNOR OF BANK

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, the Governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Bouey, has said that he does not want higher interest rates nor does he want to see the dollar depreciate, but the latter problem would be worse. Does the Minister agree that the Government's policy is that a depreciated dollar would be a worse problem for Canada than higher interest rates? Is the Government's policy that of the Governor, yes or no?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, rather than quickly quoting from short press excerpts I think that the Hon. Member would be greatly advantaged by reading the transcript of the press conference given by the Bank of Canada Governor, Gerald K. Bouey, following the release of the 1983 annual report on March 16, 1984. On 15 pages the Governor has answered questions on issues such as the ones raised by the Hon. Member. The answers to these questions correspond with the government policy in this regard and there is nothing that the Governor said with which I disagree. It does indeed represent the position of the Government as I stated it in the House a few days before the Governor.

EFFECT OF INCREASE IN INTEREST RATES

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance as well. On a number of previous occasions I pointed out in the House that the economic performance in Canada has been significantly weaker than that in the United States since this Government came into power. The current policy of increasing interest rates in Canada will widen the gap between the countries even further, particularly in the areas of unemployment and job creation. What is the Minister doing to offset the effect of high interest rates, particularly on the million and a half people who are unemployed today?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I may point out to the Hon. Member that up to now, only one bank has increased its prime rate from 11 to 11.5 per cent, and that the other banks have not yet done so. The Toronto-Dominion Bank has raised its mortgage rates, but I do not think it has raised its prime rate.

I may also remind him that U.S. banks have raised their prime rate to 11.5 per cent in the last few days, and if my colleague has a formula for keeping interest rates in Canada substantially lower than those in the United States, perhaps he would care to tell the House how he would proceed.

[English]

Mr. Wilson: Mr. Speaker, I am not asking the Minister to ask a question of me. I am asking him a question on behalf of the million and a half people who are unemployed and on behalf of the small businessmen who will be adversely affected by high interest rates.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REPORTED DECLINE IN VALUE OF DOLLAR

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Friday Governor Bouey indicated that he would resign if the Canadian dollar were allowed to slide in a significant way because of the inflationary effect that that would have on our economy here in Canada. Are we to take it that government policy no longer will be to allow the dollar to find its own level? Will the Minister, on the strength of his convictions, stand up and offer his resignation if the Government's policies do not stem the slide in the Canadian dollar which today hit an 18-month low of 78.06 and was only stopped by massive intervention on the part of the Government?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, once again I am happy to note that the Tories have no answers to some of the questions which they themselves are asking.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: They refuse to address those questions. I will answer the Hon. Member by referring him to page 10 of the transcript of the Governor's remarks. He said: "In these conditions we moderate the increase in interest rates but not so as to cause the exchange rate to really go into a free fall." Again, another question was asked of the Governor and he said our policy "is to moderate and we have moderated both ways". The policy of the Governor of the Bank is the policy that is being followed by the Government.

INCREASE IN MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, once again, and I am sure not deliberately, the Minister has misinformed the House. I would point out to him that not only one bank has raised its rates but four banks in Canada have now done so.

When I asked the Minister about the Governor of the Bank of Canada's decision to increase the rate last week, the Minister said that he was confident that the increase in rates we are seeing at the present time was not going to be substantial. I say to the Minister that that increase in rates, which has been followed up by increases in mortgage rates, will mean that, over the term of a $50,000 mortgage, the mortgage will cost a home owner $10,000 more. That amount may not mean very much to the Minister, but it means an awful lot to an ordinary family.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I would like to ask the Minister when is he going to realize that the disastrous, high interest rate policy of this Government and the preceding Conservative Government is causing harm to the Canadian economy. If he realizes that it is causing harm, why does he not tell Governor Bouey to go take a walk?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my friend may have information which I do not have. At 1.45 this afternoon my information was that of the five major Canadian banks only one had increased its prime rate to 11.5 per cent. The other four banks have held the rate to 11 per cent. If my colleague has other information, I would be happy to receive it.

Regarding the specific question asked by the Hon. Member, I would like to tell him again that, indeed, no one likes to see interest rates rising. However, one must look at the alternative, and I invite my friend to reflect upon what the alternative would be. If the prime interest rate in the United States is at 11.5 per cent, how can we keep lower rates in Canada over an extended period of time? As far as I know, no one has found a sensible and responsible way of doing this as yet. Perhaps members of the NDP have the solution. We would be very happy to hear what the solution is. However, I am afraid that again my friend is living in a fairyland as members of the NDP like to do. I invite him to face the real world. If interest rates are going up in the United States, it is very difficult to keep Canadian rates at a lower level for any extended period of time. I am sure that the Hon. Member knows that.

ELECTION CAMPAIGN PROMISE

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, since high interest rates do not help consumers, small businessmen, or farmers, and since high interest rates are particularly disastrous for the 1.5 million unemployed, will the Government be consistent in implementing its own promises made in 1980 when it said it would take action against high interest rates? Will the Government be consistent in the commitment it made as an election promise to take action on behalf of the ordinary Canadian? Particularly, will the Government take action so that the slight recovery that is under way will not be stopped in its tracks by a disastrous high interest rate policy, and bring down interest rates?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Government has taken action in that regard. I remind my friend of the situation which existed for a while in which Canadian interest rates were 4 per cent to 5 per cent higher than those in the United States. Thanks to our fight against inflation, and thanks to the support the Canadian people have given to reducing inflation in the country and to increasing productivity and exports, we now find ourselves in a situation in which our interest rates are equivalent to those in the United States. We have brought interest rates down more than the United States, relatively, during the last few years, thanks to the collective efforts of Canadians.

• (1430)

The fact is, and I have to repeat it, that if interest rates are going up in the United States I do not think there is any sensible and responsible way of preventing similar increases in Canada over time. We are trying to moderate those increases as much as we can. We are doing everything we can in that regard. Again, I invite my friend to face the real world.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I say to the Minister that the real world in Canada right now is the 1.5 million unemployed.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT REDUCE INTEREST RATES

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, a slight drop in the Canadian dollar would be advantageous to men and women in British Columbia who want jobs, to farmers on the Prairies who would be able to get their grain products to export more easily, and to industrial workers in Ontario and Quebec who would have lower priced manufactured goods. I am in the real world; it is the Minister and Governor Bouey who are not.

Just for once will the Government deliver on its promise to do something about the real needs of ordinary people? Will it bring down interest rates and tell Governor Bouey to take that course of action? If he will not, will it send him his retirement cheque and wish him well?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member talks about a slight drop in the exchange rate. That has taken place. I know that this will help our exports, the forest industry, and all the people the Hon. Member has mentioned. This has taken place. The Hon. Member also knows that it has not brought down interest rates. As a matter of fact we are facing a situation where interest rates have edged up recently.

The solution is not that by somehow devaluing the Canadian dollar we would necessarily get lower interest rates. As a matter of fact experience has shown that we could have a decline in the dollar, and higher inflation and higher interest rates as well. The solution my friend proposes is not a very realistic one.

HOUSING

EFFECT OF MORTGAGE RATES ON BUILDERS' PLANS

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, my question is also addressed to the Minister of Finance. He will know that this is the time of year when builders plan their building starts for the Spring and Summer. Mortgage interest rates have a severe impact on those plans. The Government is allowing mortgage interest rates to rise once again. The prime rate at the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce and the Toronto-Dominion Bank has gone up, as it has at the Mercantile Bank and the Bank of British Columbia. That will reduce housing starts. Each lost housing start means a loss of two jobs.

What plans does the Government have to hold down mortgage interest rates? This would enable Canadians to buy homes, and thus create jobs.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have to remind my hon. friend that housing starts picked up substantially in the first few months of this year. As a matter of fact we foresee a very good year for housing starts.

As for steps being taken to help potential and current home owners, I would remind my friend that in the Budget I announced a Mortgage Interest Rate Protection Plan. I intend to introduce legislation in this regard within the next few weeks. The legislation will protect home owners against excessive increases in interest rates. I hope the opposition Parties will support this legislation which will be helpful to all home owners with mortgages.

COMPARISON WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, in the United States housing starts increased by 15 per cent for January, 1984, over January, 1983. In Canada housing starts decreased by 8,000 from 1983 to 1984. That means fewer jobs and a higher deficit. How does the Minister account for the fact that housing starts are decreasing in Canada and increasing in the United States?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will have to check the Hon. Member's statistics and where he got them. The latest figures I have show that housing starts in January and February, according to the most cumulative statistics this year, picked up quite substantially from where they were in the latter part of 1983.

SMALL BUSINESS

EFFECT OF INCREASED INTEREST RATES

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance. As the Minister knows, most new jobs are created in the small business sector, yet we have witnessed the demise of small businesses as a result of high interest rates and ineffective government policies. Those businesses that survive are barely hanging on by the skin of their teeth. Any further increase in interest rates will kill what remains of this very important community.

Can the Minister tell the small business person what steps he is taking to protect this vital sector from further interest rate increases, or is he telling them to accept the Government's ineffectiveness, to accept higher interest rates, and go bankrupt? Is that what he is telling the small business community?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on the contrary, we have supported the small business sector quite actively in the Budgets of April, 1983, and February, 1984. For us the small business sector is the most important element in terms of job creation. We have shown our determination to support it with the measures in the Budgets of last April and last February.

I would remind my friend that in terms of investment tax credits and support for research and development, we have privileged our support to small business in that regard by giving them additional incentives compared to the rest of the industrial sector.

As far as the last Budget is concerned, we proposed a great simplification of small business taxation which will do away with two-thirds of the income tax legislation affecting small business. It will add another $150 million to that sector in tax savings.

The Government has indicated that it is a strong supporter of small business, and it has taken a lot of measures to confirm that support.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, the Minister is trying to pull the wool over the eyes of small businessmen. He knows very well that what he says is meaningless when interest rates are being allowed to rise in the small business community. He knows that very well.

GROWTH RATES IN CANADA AND UNITED STATES

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): My supplementary question to the Minister approaches the problem from a different angle. When Canada was experiencing the depths of the recession the Minister repeatedly pointed to the poor performance south of the border as a cause of the bad performance in this country. Now that the United States has pulled well past the recovery stage and has experienced almost four quarters of post recovery growth, can the Minister justify the widening gap between the Canadian and the U.S. economic performance in such key indicators as unemployment, real output, real income growth, consumer spending, new business investment, productivity and unemployment?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is quite a supplementary in one go. The Hon. Minister of Finance.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as far as small businesses are concerned, I would like to point out to the Hon. Member that the measures I announced in my last Budget, and the one before that, had the unanimous support of the small business sector. In fact, at a meeting I had recently with small business representatives, they said they hoped the measures contained in the last Budget with respect to small businesses would be implemented as soon as possible. Again, I hope that the Opposition Parties will realize where the interests of small businesses lie and support the measures proposed by this Government when the legislation is introduced in the House very shortly.

As far as the Hon. Member's statements are concerned, I agree that in some cases, the American economy has been more vigorous in its recovery. Perhaps I may remind him, since he mentioned productivity, that the last figures I saw indicated that in Canada last year, the increase in productivity was greater than it was in the United States. This means we were able to do better than the U.S. in various sectors and at various times. I may also remind him that in the first three quarters of 1983, the Canadian economy experienced much faster growth than did the United States. These are all factors my hon. friend should remember. The same applies to job creation. If he would care to look at the number of jobs we have created here in Canada, compared to the United States, he will see that Canada's record is quite remarkable.

EMPLOYMENT

FUNDING OF DAYCARE SERVICES

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Affordable daycare is essential if women are to have equal access to training and jobs, yet the Minister has refused to include daycare services for job-creation programs. Will he reconsider this decision and now give priority to funding daycare jobs as an essential component in government job creation? Will he also extend training grants to include child care costs?

● (1440)

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do indeed believe strongly that it is important to provide daycare facilities. Indeed, when I was Minister of the Environment we established in Environment Canada, I believe, the first daycare centre in a government installation which existed within the Government of Canada. I do believe strongly in doing this. It is a subject which I hope we may be able to deal with effectively in the context and in the use of Section 38 funds, in co-operation with the voluntary sector, as we outlined we wanted to do in the Speech from the Throne. We are carrying on discussions with the voluntary sector on how we might make that approach to funding a feasible and desirable one to follow.

Ms. Mitchell: That is not what you were asked.

Mr. Roberts: I hope that within that context we will be able to meet the kinds of concerns expressed by the Hon. Member.

Ms. Mitchell: The Minister did not answer the question, Mr. Speaker, so I will ask my supplementary question of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

RECOMMENDATION MADE BY NATIONAL ACTION COMMITTEE ON THE STATUS OF WOMEN

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, daycare is available only to the rich who can pay, and to the poor who qualify under the Canada Assistance Plan. Will the Minister now take federal initiatives, as recommended by the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, to help fund daycare on a nonrestrictive and universal basis so that it is not restricted just to people on welfare? Will the Minister also introduce a new method of shared funding with direct federal grants for licensed spaces, as has been recommended?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will always do everything to support daycare, as will this Government. That black and white simple image of the poor and the rich is a bit simplistic. The Hon. Member knows that we have literally stretched the guidelines to the maximum and we are providing $70 million this year to the Provinces for daycare, which is, of course, for those in need and most likely to be in need.

However, the Hon. Member is forgetting all the tax avenues which we have offered to Canadian families—mothers in most of the cases—also to take advantage of the various services for their children. It remains that daycare is basically provincial, and if the Provinces do not want to move on this, we will exercise the maximum leadership we can. For example, my colleague, the minister responsible for the status of women, as part of her next agenda for the federal-provincial conference of her own counterparts, will try to speed up the development of provincial daycare services.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION FROM MEXICO

Mr. Speaker: May I call the attention of the House to the presence in our gallery of a delegation from Mexico led by Senator Celso Humberto Delgado Ramirez.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NATIONAL REVENUE

PROVISION OF INFORMATION BY OFFICIALS TO MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. Can the Minister tell the House if he has, in fact, issued instructions to his officials that they are not to give information to Members of Parliament other than what they can obtain under the Access to Information Act? Has he given that directive to his officials because, if he has, that flies in the face of every parliamentary convention and tradition which give us the responsibility to hold the Government accountable?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): No, Mr. Speaker, I did not give such instructions, and I believe the Hon. Member's question is based on an erroneous interpretation by his colleague of a reply I gave here in the House. The House will recall that last week, the Hon. Member's colleague asked me a question about a guideline I gave my officials with respect to—

An Hon. Member: He is not interested in the answer either!

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Speaker, do you see why they always repeat the same question, and why those questions misrepresent the facts? They do not even have the common decency to listen to the answer, Mr. Speaker.

An Hon. Member: He does not understand!

Mr. Bussières: So if the Hon. Member is interested in the answer, as far as the first part is concerned, the answer is no. Secondly, I can say that his question is based on a distortion of facts taken by his colleague from an answer I gave last week. I would therefore invite him to read Hansard, where he will see a very clear answer to the question put by his colleague.

NEWSPAPER REPORT

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I will quote from a newspaper dispatch by Mr. Ian Hunter, a well respected journalist, in which he says:

A taxation official confirmed that it is policy now to require MPs, like other citizens, to apply under the Access to Information Act—

That is the story. The Minister, I hope, is denying the accuracy of that story, because otherwise he is denying us, as Members of Parliament, to hold him responsible for his administrative incompetency.

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I already answered the question of the Hon. Member. I said, no, and I told him to read the Hansard—

[Translation]

Mr. Mulroney: Answer the question!

Mr. Bussières: —Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Official Opposition is always the first one to talk about civility in the House, and he does not even have enough authority over his Members to ask them to at least have the decency to listen to the answers.

Let the Leader of the Official Opposition show a little more leadership and impose some discipline on the Members of his Party!

TRANSPORT

AUTOMOBILE EMISSIONS—REQUEST FOR STRICTER CONTROLS

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. He is well aware that a group of Ministers of the Environment from Europe are meeting at the present time, hosted by his seatmate. I am wondering if the Minister could announce—and this would be a good day for it—when the Government is going to bring in stricter automobile emission controls for Canadian cars, and on what model that will be.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I answered a question, I believe last week in the House, on the same topic and indicated at the time that before any decision will be taken we must quite carefully review the series of studies which were commissioned through the Department of the Environment, with the co-operation of three or four other Departments. Four of those studies are available to us now, and the Minister of the Environment and I have invited the industry which will be affected, as well as environmental organizations, to comment upon these studies and to consult with us so we can get their full view before making a decision. That invitation has already gone forward.

TIMETABLE FOR INTRODUCTION OF STRICTER CONTROLS

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, rumour has it that a government decision has been made and the controls will be on the 1990 models. That is at least six years down the road. Since approximately 86 per cent of all the automobiles manufactured in Canada are shipped to the United States with the proper emission controls on them, why can the Minister not up that and have the controls on at least the 1987 models? You do not need a long cabinet harangue to know that it is very necessary to do that if we expect the Americans to help us reduce acid rain. Why not put controls on the 1987 models, and at once?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I believe the Hon. Member is far too experienced and knowledgeable a Member of this House to base either his questions or judgments upon rumour. I believe what he should try to do is deal with facts, and the fact we are dealing with is that we have commissioned some studies which are designed to determine what the actual impact will be in relation to the cost. Before we take action on those studies, I feel it would be both prudent and necessary to ensure we have the full range of opinions from all the interested groups. That particular process, which I think is the responsible way to proceed, is under way.

HUMAN RIGHTS

APPEAL IN SEXUAL HARASSMENT CASE

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice as the Minister responsible for the Canadian Human Rights Commission and the Minister responsible for giving legal advice to other government Departments. It concerns a sexual harassment case, the Robichaud case, which was the first sexual harassment case to go to a review tribunal of the Canadian Human Rights Commission, and which was won by the woman complainant. Would the Minister explain why this is being appealed and why his Department gave the advice to appeal this decision? How can the Minister encourage women to come forward in sexual harassment cases when his Department will, as soon as the woman wins the case, appeal it and try to get the decision overturned?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I will have to refresh my mind on that case before giving a full answer to the Hon. Member. However, I would certainly like to indicate to her that we do not proceed entirely on the basis of results. We have also to be concerned about the reasoning in cases. We certainly were not proceeding with a view to denying the successful party her victory. Our concerns have to be much broader than that, and include the whole texture of the law.

● (1450)

FUNDING OF APPEAL

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I will direct my supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board. His Department is, of course, funding the appeal, and has issued guidelines on sexual harassment. Can the Minister justify the use of taxpayers' money, on the one hand to fund the Canadian Human Rights Commission through the Department of Justice and, on the other hand, try to undermine the whole procedure by appealing the case as soon as the woman won it?

Hon. Herb Gray (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the new policy on sexual harassment announced by myself and the Minister responsible for the status of women last December came after this particular case arose. Perhaps had this procedure been in place earlier it might have been a simpler way to resolve the matter. Having said that, the complainant availed herself of her rights under the law to go to the Canadian Human Rights Commission. A review tribunal upheld her complaint, but the matter was appealed on the advice of the Department of Justice. The funding of the appeal was a decision by the Department of National Defence. I will say, Mr. Speaker, that the right of appeal on either side of the case, it seems to me, is fundamental to our system of justice. It is not a reflection on the fact that the complainant is a woman that this fundamental right of appeal has been used. I am sure the hon. lady would not argue that if the matter had gone otherwise the complainant should not have used her right of appeal.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

MINISTER'S STATEMENT

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister responsible for energy I will direct my question to the Minister of State for Economic Development, who is quoted in the media as saying that the national energy policy, like any other program in a pragmatic Party, should be put on the table and examined. In view of the fact that he is chairman of his Party's economic development committee, and in view of the fact that this policy is viewed as a vindictive, malicious, and destructive program which hurt western Canada severely, could he tell us what changes he now proposes and why he has not proposed them before?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, obviously I take issue with the rather curious rhetoric of the Hon. Member. This Party is known for its capacity to re-examine its programs to meet changing conditions and new challenges. The National Energy Program, for example, was updated by my colleague in 1982. I expect that, as circumstances change, it, like all other government programs, will be reviewed, reconsidered, and improved. That has always been the way with this Party, and I am sure it will continue to be that way in the future.

MINISTER'S POSITION

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the same Minister, and may I say that the curious rhetoric is his.

In view of the fact that since he has told us he is now considering these changes, and he has avoided answering the question of why he has now proposed reconsideration of a program which has caused such destruction in western Canada and hurt the Canadian consumer as a whole, what is his hidden agenda?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear the quotation again. I thought the quotation, which probably was accurate, is to the effect that the National Energy Program, like other Government programs, should be subject to review. There is no suggestion even in the quotation that there are changes in mind. The fact is that, if there are changes required, they should be made. As I said, that has always been the case, so I do not quite understand the question as it arises out of the quotation.

NATIONAL REVENUE

REGISTERED CHARITIES—DEPARTMENT'S INTERPRETATION

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. There is a lot of disquiet among registered charitable and non-profit organizations arising from the interpretation his Department is placing on the activities of these organizations. I am restricting my question to churches. I have a letter from a branch of his Department concerning what is legitimate activity for a registered charity, specifically a church. The Department argues that it is acceptable for a religious organization to take a public stand on a moral issue but that a campaign designed to implement legislative changes would not be acceptable. The divorce legislation is an example of that. Why the interpretation from the Department?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): I think that the Hon. Member has had many opportunities to consider that matter. He knows full well that the Income Tax Act provisions concerning the definition of "charity" and

"religious activities" have been confirmed and restricted to a certain extent by the decision of Canadian courts. The interpretation bulletins prepared for organizations which want to avail themselves of legislative provisions regarding charitable organizations are based on the act itself, of course, and on court decisions which restrict the meaning to be given to the word "charity". That is the basis of our interpretation bulletins.

[English]

CHURCHES' OPPOSITION TO DIVORCE LEGISLATION

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, does the Minister regard churches which are bringing forward strong pressure in opposition to divorce legislation as legitimate in trying to implement or change legislation, or does he read that as a violation of the terms under which they were registered as charities?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I would rather not make an overall judgment since I am not aware of this case. I would urge the Hon. Member—

An Hon. Member: He is not listening, he is not interested!

Mr. Bussières: Indeed, Mr. Speaker, Members opposite never seem to be interested in the answers. The Hon. Member ought to re-examine the interpretation bulletin, as I said, so as to understand better and make his own judgment. I will be pleased to consider any specific case he wants to bring to my attention. If he does not agree with the interpretation bulletin, he should admit it openly and say that, in his opinion, the Government should disregard the Income Tax Act and the interpretations of the courts, and apply the law blindly according to circumstances and as it sees fit.

HUMAN RIGHTS

DISMISSAL OF WOMAN AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLER—WITHHOLDING OF DEPARTMENTAL FINDINGS

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport and concerns a case widely reported on the weekend, where the Public Service Commission Appeal Board ruled that Ginette Roncali was unjustly dismissed from her job in non-traditional employment as an air traffic controller. Why did the Minister's Department withhold from the Appeal Board the findings of its own internal inquiry which indicated this woman had been made a scapegoat for the errors of others in the Department?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think the case itself is a matter of some concern. On the specific issue of the Appeal Board, there is a clause in the Air Traffic Controllers' collective agreement which specifically prohibits that kind of evidence being passed on to appeal hearings. Unfortunately, at the same time the supervisor was ill and so could not present the evidence personally. In this case Mrs. Roncali has been reinstated and assigned to the Waterloo area to go through a retraining period so she can resume duties.

• (1500)

DEMOTION OF EMPLOYEE

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, what concerns me about cases such as this is that a woman has to go through the whole process of an appeal board before she can be reinstated to a job which is considered to be in a non traditional employment area. Though Mrs. Roncali has now been reinstated, why was she demoted at the outset from her job as air traffic controller, to that of a clerk?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in this particular case the matter was not one of male versus female. There was a question of the performance of duties, and that is why the action was taken. Mrs. Roncali then followed the proper procedure, which was to go to an appeal board which found in her favour. This demonstrates there are procedures there to ensure there are not injustices committed. If there are further aspects of the case which would reflect any form of discrimination, I would be quite prepared to undertake to look into them to make sure they did not happen again.

PETITION

MR. OGLE—TESTING OF U.S. NUCLEAR DEVICES

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the petition presented by the Hon. Member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle) on Friday, March 16, 1984 meets the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We are just about to lose a lottery, a $33 million 1979 agreement between the federal Government and the provinces. The Minister has been trying to indicate—

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member could possibly bring this to the attention of the House by a statement pursuant to Standing Order 21. In terms of the Standing Orders of the House, he is hardly raising a point of order.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. NIELSEN—SUSPENSION OF DAY'S SITTING

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

An Hon. Member: Leader!

Mr. Nielsen: It is a little late for that! Mr. Speaker, I indicated to you this morning that I intended to raise a brief point of order at three o'clock having to do with the proceedings last night, this being the first opportunity to do so.

By way of a preliminary I would like to refer to today's Order Paper and Notices for Tuesday, March 20, 1984. As you know, Sir, at six o'clock last night we were in a mode where tomorrow never came. Yet overnight we had the Notice Paper printed as though we were in fact going to see tomorrow, which is today. In the meantime, we have the hour of meeting printed on the Order Paper as being 11 a.m. Today did not occur, in a parliamentary sense, until considerably after 11 a.m. I did not take note of the precise time the Chair moved into prayers, but it was around 11.30. I think that should be corrected.

Shortly after six o'clock last night, Mr. Speaker, you rose in your place to say that you were suspending the sitting until 9 a.m. this morning. The suspending of a sitting overnight in the midst of a division is almost without precedent, Mr. Speaker. The suspension of a sitting under such circumstances without the full agreement of Government and Opposition House officials is entirely unprecedented and is a practice about which I have very serious reservations.

The last and only time in my recollection that the Speaker decided to suspend a sitting overnight in the course of a division occurred on May 9, 1983. At that time Hansard records that the question before the House was a motion for leave to introduce Bill C-155. The question was put and the Speaker is recorded at page 25288 of Hansard as declaring that the Yeas had it. More than five Members having then risen, Madam Speaker called in the Members for a recorded division. Hansard next records that at 10.40 p.m. the Speaker rose and said the following:

> MADAM SPEAKER: I have been advised that the Members are prepared to vote tomorrow morning. I now suspend the sitting until nine o'clock tomorrow morning, at which time the bells will start ringing again. They will be interrupted tonight.
> MR. PRUD'HOMME: At what time?
>
> MADAM SPEAKER: At nine o'clock the bells will begin to ring.
> At 10.40 p.m. the sitting of the House was suspended.

You will note, Mr. Speaker, that Madam Speaker Sauvé only took the action of suspending the sitting once she had been advised that Members would only be prepared to vote the next morning. In my submission, it is only upon the advice of the representatives of the Government and Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition that the Speaker may justifiably suspend the sitting of the House.

I base my contention on the fact that nowhere in the various procedural texts which relate to our proceedings can reference be found to any authority possessed by the Speaker which would permit the occupant of the chair to suspend a sitting at whim. Indeed, taken at face value, there would seem to be no provision in either the Standing Orders or Beauchesne's which would permit the Speaker unilaterally to suspend the sitting under any circumstances. However, the Standing Orders do state that in unprovided cases the rules should be interpreted in light of relevant practices at Westminster.

With that in mind, one can look at the Twentieth Edition of Erskine May and discover that in certain instances the Speaker does have the authority to suspend the sitting. What are those cases, Mr. Speaker? The answer to that question can be found at page 317 of the Twentieth Edition of Erskine May under the heading of "Adjournment in case of grave disorder". That entry reads as follows:

> Adjournment in case of grave disorder. In the event of grave disorder arising in the House, the Speaker may adjourn the House without question put if he thinks it necessary to do so or he may suspend the sitting for a time to be named by him.

I am not suggesting, Sir, that a grave disorder is a Member passing between a Member on his feet speaking in debate and the Chair, although that occurs frequently. Nor am I suggesting that it is a grave disorder, though it be a disorder, for Members to rise and leave this Chamber while the Mace is on the shoulder of the Sergeant-at-Arms and while the Speaker is on his way of the Chamber. The proper conduct, of course, is for Members to stay in their places until Mr. Speaker departs. Those are not examples of grave disorder, but they are disorders. Some examples, as I have said, are given in May.

However, May does not outline any other set of circumstances under which the Speaker is permitted unilaterally to suspend the sitting of the House. To use this entry in Erskine May as authority for the action undertaken by the Chair last evening would, I think, stretch the credulity of Members of the House. Fortunately, Mr. Speaker, earlier editions of Beauchesne's include the same reference to the Speaker's authority to suspend the sitting in the event of a grave disorder.

Therefore, on balance, Sir, it would appear that the action undertaken by the Chair last evening has at least some procedural standing in the Canadian House of Commons. Certainly, based on the May, 1983 precedent, one cannot argue that similar actions have never been undertaken before.

However, there are two issues which remain to be resolved. I re-emphasize that in the May, 1983, instance where was a prior agreement which was communicated to the Speaker with respect to the time of the taking of the vote. As I say, two issues remain to be resolved. Is this case in fact similar to the May, 1983 precedent? And even if it is, did the Speaker make the correct decision at the time?

It is not for me to question the past actions of the House nor to impugn any decision of the Chair. But using the May, 1983 decision as a stepping stone, I believe I can draw a distinction between the decision made by Madam Speaker Sauvé and the one made last evening. At the time Madam Sauvé made her decision, she did so on the basis of the advice of representatives of the Government and the Opposition who had informed her that a vote would not take place before the next morning. On that basis, where it was clear that the bells would be left to ring all night, it might reasonably be argued that the situation was akin to disorder, although my personal view is that that somewhat stretches the credulity of Members as well. Furthermore, if the practice of allowing the bells to ring all night were to become a standard practice, there might be some doubt arise in some Members' minds that that would be akin to grave disorder. However, such is not my submission because in my view it is irrelevant to this particular caveat I am drawing to the attention of the House with respect to our proceedings yesterday.

The motion moved by the Government which was before the House yesterday was the previous question. This motion was moved as means of closing down debate on second reading of Bill C-9. If it was carried in the affirmative, which it was yesterday—today—the motion would have the effect of bringing on an immediate vote on the second reading, which it did yesterday—or this morning. The argument does get a little ridiculous as we proceed with it!

Standing Order 12(1) is quite explicit as to how the division is demanded and how it is taken. The key word in the Standing Order is the word "demanded", in my view. The holding of a recorded division is not something which is to be taken lightly. It is a right which can be insisted upon by any five members who choose to rise in their places. The division is only completed once the actual recorded vote has been taken and the result has been announced by the Chair, as outlined in Citation 216 of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition. Indeed, that is the only way that the proceedings of yesterday could have been brought to a close yesterday, in which mode we found ourselves this morning. That was by those two votes being taken. The division was not complete until that time.

As well, Citation 217 states that "the signal for taking the division is the return of the Government Whip and the Opposition Whip". In other words, the timing of the vote rests entirely with the Whips. This is appropriate because a division is an expression of the will of the House and not of the Chair.

It is therefore a matter of deep concern for me, to believe that this process can be arrested part way through by the Speaker or anyone else. The practice which has grown up around the lapsing of dilatory motions, for example, has the effect not only of relieving Members of their right to express themselves once a recorded division has been called, but also has the effect of potentially reversing the decision reached by the initial voice vote. This takes place not at the initiative of Members but as a result of a decision by the Chair. Needless to say, this practice might some day lead to grave consequences which occupants of the Chair might live to regret. What would happen, for example, if a procedural motion in support of a decision by the Chair were allowed to lapse?

By tinkering with the established practices governing divisions, the House is entering very dangerous territory. Certainly, attributing a decision to the House when no vote has been taken is fraught with danger; but so, too, is arbitrarily delaying the taking of a division. Such a delay may very well cause numbers of members on either or both sides of a question to change, either because the Opposition or, more importantly, the Government has had the opportunity to round up more of its Members or dissuade Members from taking an independent line. The Speaker, by making the decision to delay the holding of a recorded division, opens himself or herself to the charge that the decision was made on a partisan basis. As you will appreciate, Mr. Speaker, such a change in role of the Speaker would seriously undermine the stature of the office and would undermine the confidence that the House has in the impartiality and independence of the Speaker.

While no one would suggest that this is what happened in this instance—I the first among them—I felt that it was important to put these remarks on the record and ask the Chair to consider the direction being taken in recent rulings in order to determine whether or not they are truly in accord with the spirit of our rules in this place.

I raise this matter because of the concern that I had when it first occurred in May of 1983, and that circumstance was during the disposition of a dilatory motion. But last evening we were dealing with a substantive motion, so the matter becomes even more important down the procedural road as to whether or not we are following a wise course in embarking upon what I conceive to be an entirely different direction from established practices set by the rules and by the precedents of this place.

• (1520)

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to make a distinction between the power of the Speaker to delay a vote and his power to order that a vote be taken.

Regarding the authority of the Speaker to order that a vote be taken at a given time, I think such cases are defined either by the Standing Orders or by Parliamentary practice as it has evolved in recent years. S.O. 12(2) indicates clearly that when the Speaker interrupts the proceedings, the bells shall be sounded for not more than fifteen minutes.

I feel, within reason, of course, that in such circumstances the Speaker must be stricter than if the debate ends spontaneously, as was the case yesterday.

I remember that Speaker Jerome made this distinction when he interpreted former S.O. 9, now S.O. 12. He said that S.O. 9(2), which is now S.O. 15(2), allowed him to demand that the vote be taken after fifteen minutes, provided he had interrupted the proceedings and the Members had received reasonable notice that the proceedings would be interrupted, thus safeguarding the principle that basically, Members should not be taken unaware, and I think his interpretation was a wise one. However, in certain cases, although S.O. 9(2) or 15(2) said that a vote had to be taken after fifteen minutes, Speaker Jerome was often more patient than that before demanding that a vote be taken, since he first wanted to make sure that Members on both sides of the House had received reasonable notice, since it was not the intention of the Standing Orders to take them unaware. That is not the kind of circumstance we are dealing with now.

Another situation where the Speaker can demand a vote is in the case of dilatory motions. This is the result of a recent practice that has evolved, where your predecessor, and, if I am not mistaken, you yourself have, in the case of a purely dilatory motion, decided that at the normal time of adjournment it was no longer necessary to call a vote, since in any case the motion had achieved its purpose. Since things were getting out of hand, I feel this was a very sensible and logical decision. Again, however, does not this apply to today's situation.

We are now dealing with a very unusual situation in which the debate ended spontaneously, not because it was interrupted by the Speaker but because there were no more Members to speak to the motion. This eventuality is not covered by Standing Order 15(2). Therefore, the Standing Orders do not limit the time for division bells. That is clear. In cases, Mr. Speaker, where the Standing Orders do not specify how long the division bells are to ring, what is the Speaker's role? That is not so clear, and here we need to have a body of jurisprudence and parliamentary practice. I think the Speaker should take into account precedents established in other countries, and especially, as provided by the Standing Orders when a case is not clear, the precedents established in the United Kingdom. However, we must also take into account the specifics of each case and the procedure peculiar to these other parliaments. Now, the voting procedure in the United Kingdom, I must say, with respect, to my learned colleague from Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), is totally different from ours, and cannot be considered or be allowed to influence the debate at this point.

We have a very special voting system in Canada, and we have Standing Orders that do not specify how long the division bells are to ring. The Standing Orders also fail to provide any direction as to the Speaker's role in cases where there is an unusually long delay before a vote is taken.

I therefore say, with respect, that I think it is reasonable that, for the sake of the order he is supposed to maintain and also in the interests of common sense, the Speaker should consider the circumstances. I think it is both reasonable and sensible that the Speaker, if he decides it is appropriate, should consult with the Leader of the Official Opposition or his Whip, or the Government House Leader or the Government Whip. I believe it is wise for the Speaker to analyze the facts in the light of such consultations, if such was his decision, and in the light of the Standing Orders—where there is no provision for this case—since he has certain discretionary powers to maintain order in the House and ensure that the right of Members to speak to a question is not infringed upon.

Mr. Speaker, what you did yesterday was eminently sensible, and you are to be congratulated. I think that under the Standing Orders, you had no choice, with respect, but to stop the division bells before the two Whips entered the House, unless you had found that in the circumstances, it was a purely dilatory manoeuvre on the part of the Government or one of the Opposition Parties. However, yesterday there was no evidence that one of the Parties was acting deliberately to delay unduly the taking of a vote. On the contrary, I believe the Government advised the Clerks at the Table or at least one of the Clerk Assistants, that exceptional circumstances prevailed and kept Hon. Members from exercising their right to vote, as a result of adverse weather conditions. Anyone who knows what the situation was like last night will agree.

[English]

Mr. McKnight: Liberal leadership.

Mr. Pinard: It is sufficient to check on the climatic situation which was prevailing yesterday in eastern Quebec, for example—

Mr. McKnight: Where were they? Were they in their ridings? Name two.

Mr. Pinard: —and in the Maritimes.

[Translation]

The fact is that many Members were held up by bad weather conditions.

Indeed, I would suggest that the Speaker does not have the right to conclude that Members are not telling the truth, and he has to give the benefit of the doubt to a whip who tells the table officers that certain situations are occurring. It could have been a plane crash that would have sent about ten Members to hospital, or a case of food poisoning after Members had eaten in the parliamentary restaurant, or any number of things. There are circumstances when the Speaker, after consultations, shows common sense and decides to delay the vote because it is not all that important. That is what happened yesterday, and I think the Speaker used sound judgment when he did not force a vote at 6 o'clock and simply interrupted the bells for the night.

You acted in a very humane manner, Mr. Speaker. I think that the House officials and all the staff are very grateful to you. From a humane standpoint, you did not force those people to waste a whole night looking after the fort because you knew full well that the Government whip was not going to show up for the vote before 10.30 the following morning, as he had made it clear to your officers, for the reasons I mentioned earlier. You prevented the staff from staying up all night, for which there would have been no justification under the circumstances. You know, you have saved public money and energy, but above all, I think, you have shown the Canadian people that although some Members of the House do behave like children now and then, yesterday we proved that we could, or at least the Speaker of the House could assume his responsibilities and show that we can act as adults when circumstances so require.

For all those reasons, Mr. Speaker, I think that the decision you took last night was quite sound, intelligent and sensible. Besides, you did not suspend the sitting indefinitely, but you did indicate shortly after six o'clock that the bells would start ringing again at 9 a.m., because you knew there was no point in having the vote in the middle of the night, something which is not humane and which, to my knowledge, has never happened under the new rules of the House.

Given those circumstances, Mr. Speaker, we support this intelligent and humane decision. Did it go against the Standing Orders or the parliamentary practice? The answer is no! Your decision did not go against any Standing Order nor any practice. Mr. Speaker, one can set precedents without necessarily going against the rules; indeed, no rule was broken and it was not necessarily contrary to precedents or previous practices. We have been innovating since the new Standing Orders have been in force, and I think that you can appeal to common sense for guidance in the kind of decision you made last night. As a matter of fact, when you decided to suspend the call of the bells for the night, you did not breach the only Standing Order which refers to the division bells. You did not go against Standing Order 12 in any way. I know of no precedent either which you might have disregarded. My learned colleague referred you to what he himself called a precedent, although it was not quite the same situation. I am talking about the incidents of May 9, 1983 when Madam Speaker, your predecessor, had indicated that, after consultations, she had decided to interrupt the division bells. I suggest that it was a specific case where, under the circumstances, she had decided to have consultations and say so publicly. Even if she had not consulted anyone, she was just as free to act as you did last night. Yesterday, you were free to consult and, whichever way you did, we respect your authority, Mr. Speaker. However, the fact that, when you interrupted the bells, you did not say in so many words that you had consulted the parties in the House does not mean that you were wrong. And I would suggest that this is one of the grey areas of the Standing Orders, but that the circumstances require that you make decisions which are logical and take into consideration the spirit of the parliamentary reform as well as the human aspect. Mr. Speaker, the major aspect of the parliamentary reform with which we have been experimenting for nearly two years is indeed that we wanted to make Parliament more humane. We no longer sit in the evening; we sit during the day, like other human beings who normally work during the daytime. Committees may sit during the evening and we may work in our offices, but the House sits during the day. On Fridays, we have deferred votes. There have been many changes which have done much to humanize this institution. It seems to me that it was also with this in mind that the bells were prevented from ringing during the night as we knew quite well that there was a very good reason for the vote not to be registered during the night and as one of the two senior clerks of the House who are part of the voting procedure, had been told by the Government whip that it was physically impossible to have the vote registered before the next day. The Chair was told of this by the clerks of the House.

Because of these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I think that there is no doubt that we support your ruling and hope that, in the future, if this situation ever reoccurs, you will continue to act with compassion and intelligence, as you have always done in the past. I shall conclude by saying that, in view of the circumstances, we must distinguish between delaying a vote and insisting that it be taken. What we are discussing here is a situation where there are no rules forcing us to have a vote registered within a specified period of time. In such cases the Chair is allowed a lot of discretion. If, as suggested by the Hon. Member for Yukon, you deem it appropriate to have further consultations, we are always at your disposal to explain why a vote cannot be registered at a given time. However, Mr. Speaker, there was no reason yesterday to rush things and I am sure that my learned colleague from Yukon would not go so far as to make such a request because, after all, we had not been through sixteen days of bell ringing. The bells had rung for six hours and a half at the most and while we once considered that having to listen to the bells for sixteen days was quite trying, and believed that consultations would have shown that such a delay was due to purely dilatory action on the part of one specific party in the House, this is all in the past. But now letting the bells ring for six and a half hours cannot be compared with letting them ring for sixteen days, and I doubt that it could be said that either one of our parties is using purely dilatory tactics to prevent a vote from taking place.

In this case, the Government was not ready to vote. Sure enough the Government is not interested in delaying passage of its own legislation, and it seems to me that any intelligent person would realize in such cases that there had to be a major reason for it. The non-attendance of Members when it is due to serious, objective and non partisan reasons, as was the case yesterday, seems to me something which ought to be taken into consideration by the Chair.

I therefore do not see how the point of order raised by the Hon. Member for Yukon could be founded, notwithstanding his comments. If he wants to ask the Speaker to have further consultations in the future if ever the bells are ringing for too long, I would find this suggestion intelligent and reasonable and would approve of it wholeheartedly. However, there is certainly nothing to prevent you, Mr. Speaker, if you have valid reasons, from doing so in the future, to interrupt the ringing of the bells when a vote cannot be registered especially after the normal sitting hours or between two regular sittings. I therefore see nothing which would indicate that you did anything wrong last night. On the contrary, at the risk of repeating myself, I find this a useful precedent which complements the one set on May 9, 1983, and I hope that we shall not have to let the bells ring for too long too often in the future. I can assure you that, for our part, instructions will be given so that this will not reoccur unless, of course, reasons beyond our control justify or explain why certain Members are delayed from exercising their basic right of voting in the House.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I am going to be brief, but I do think it important to put some things on the record. I suspected some time ago when the bells rang for 15 days that the repercussions of that would be severe and they have, indeed, been severe. We have seen rulings, as you know, Sir, with which I have not been entirely satisfied. As a result of the fear that has grown that bells could ring forever, I think at some point the House of Commons has to come to grips with it as a potential disaster for the parliamentary system.

I want to say something about last night, Mr. Speaker. The vote that was supposed to take place last night was entirely at the behest of the Government. It was the Government that moved the previous question. It was the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) who, on Friday last, asked the House of Commons to complete the deliberations by Monday in order that the vote could take place. The deliberations were completed. One would have thought, given it was the Government's hope that the Bill could be completed by Monday, it might have had its Members here to vote. Not having them here reflects a lackadaisical attitude on the part of members of the Government who are not prepared to come to Ottawa at eleven o'clock in the morning on Mondays. We sit on Mondays at eleven o'clock and we sit all week until five o'clock on Friday afternoon. There are far too many members of the Government who do not show up on Mondays until late in the day. Had Government members been interested in carrying the legislation yesterday, they could have come here on Sunday night as many of the rest of us had to do.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: I suggest that the excuse being used that somehow or other a storm blew up and Members of the Government could not get here so therefore the vote had to be delayed and that was justification for the action of the Speaker is absolute balderdash.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: I find it offensive, quite frankly, that anyone would attempt to use such an argument in the House of Commons.

Mr. Pinard: Do not be so sensitive.

Mr. Deans: I am being honest about it. It was the Government that wanted the Bill, it was the Government that moved closure on the Bill to limit the debate, and it was the Government that failed to have its members present. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, given a similar set of circumstances on another day when the Government was sitting, benches full, and I were to rise and suggest that because three, four or five of my Members from northern British Columbia were unable to get here in time for a vote because of plane connections and that we would like the vote held over until the following morning, would you, Sir, then rise and intervene?

Mr. Pinard: No, you are a third Party.

Mr. Deans: I put it to you that the rules of the House of Commons are intended to protect each and every Member.

Mr. Pinard: No, the two Whips.

Mr. Deans: If the President of the Privy Council is quietly saying they only protect two Parties—

Mr. Pinard: Two Whips.

Mr. Deans: —I say to him that the rules of the House are there to protect the rights of every single Member, and if a member of the government side is to be given additional rights to those given to Members on this side of the House from this Party, then the rules are not worth the paper they are written on.

I want to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that there is a dangerous precedent here and I beg you not to allow what happened yesterday to become a precedent. It is vitally important that the Government not be permitted, for whatever reason, to decide that on its initiative it can go to the Table, whisper in someone's ear that perhaps it would not be advisable to have the vote since the Government cannot win it, and that therefore, it would be good, maybe, if the vote could be held over until another day, because that is exactly what happened yesterday. That vote was not taken yesterday because the Government could not win the vote yesterday. The Speaker unwittingly, unknowingly I say to you, Sir, without any knowledge of that, was put in the position of taking a decision which supported the Government's right to win every vote. I am not suggesting that it was done with any thought in mind to achieve that end, but that is what happened.

The vote before the House should have been taken yesterday. The vote before the House, had it been lost, would have made absolutely no difference to the Bill itself. It would have meant that the debate could have continued and the Bill dealt with. The end result would have been the same. When Government Members took it into their heads to show up suddenly from their constituencies or from out on the leadership campaign trail to vote, they would still have won the vote in any event.

The result of yesterday's vote was to create a situation which resulted in Members on one side of the House having less rights than Members on the other side of the House.

Mr. Evans: Nonsense.

Point of Order—Mr. Nielsen

Mr. Deans: I ask you in future circumstances, Mr. Speaker, that that be taken into consideration and yesterday not be considered a precedent for any future action. I did consider yesterday to be most unusual, and frankly I believe it to be wrong.

I do think that in the circumstances referred to which took place in May—I remember them quite well—Madam Speaker Sauvé consulted with Members of the House who represent the various Parties. Madam Speaker Sauvé consulted, I believe, with the President of the Privy Council; I know she did with the House Leader for the Opposition and I know she consulted with me. She asked if in fact it were true that we would not be prepared to vote until the following day. I affirmed that it was true, as I believe did the House Leader for the Official Opposition and I assume the President of the Privy Council on behalf of the Government. Having ascertained that there was agreement among the Parties that the vote would not take place until the following day, she then decided to suspend the sitting until a time which the Members themselves had indicated would be a suitable time for the vote to take place. Such was not the case yesterday, Sir.

● (1540)

Mr. Pinard: You are wrong.

Mr. Deans: I am not wrong on my facts.

Mr. Pinard: That is not what we agreed to. We were ready to vote and you were not.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chair will have some remarks to make at the end of the Hon. Member's remarks.

Mr. Deans: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am being interrupted by the President of the Privy Council. He is obviously very nervous about this situation because he very rarely interrupts. I can tell that he is not on very firm ground today.

I do not know what the outcome might have been, but I suggest that yesterday, upon ascertaining that the Government was not prepared to vote, it might have been appropriate to have spoken to the representative of each of the two other Parties. I recognize that there is no requirement to do so, but it may have been done in the interests of seeing that the sort of situation in which we find ourselves does not arise. That kind of procedure would be very helpful in the future and would make it easier for us to support measures of the type which were taken.

In my judgment, what happened yesterday was wrong for two reasons. The first reason, which I stated quite clearly, is that it creates a situation which is unfair because the same kind of rights cannot be claimed by other Members as those that were claimed on behalf of the members of the Government who did not rather than could not show up in time for work yesterday. The other reason is that it does or could create a precedent which would allow the Government to not have to answer publicly for its failure to govern properly and provide sufficient numbers of Members in their places at any point in time to sustain the Government with confidence.

This kind of situation could provide the Government with the opportunity to shift the onus of political responsibility from itself to the Speaker when answering why bells continue to ring in the House of Commons. The outcome of it could be that the Government no longer must answer for why the bells rang all night because the bells did not ring all night. The Government no longer has to answer to the public of Canada for why the business of the House of Commons was ground to a halt yesterday because the Speaker has been put in the position of answering for the Government. I think that that is a bad practice.

Therefore, Sir, I say this without reflecting in any way on the decision itself. Nothing can be done about what happened yesterday. My only concern is for what might happen tomorrow or another day. I really do feel that the outcome of the precedent of May 9, 1983, regarding Bill C-155 which has been cited, though similar and I concede the similarity, was arrived at in quite a different way.

The situation yesterday was simply that the Speaker was put in the position of saving the Government from being embarrassed. The Speaker did not do that purposely, but that is what happened. The Government failed to do what it had been warned it must do during the leadership contest. Government Members were warned that if they wanted to continue to enjoy the confidence of the House of Commons, they would have to keep their Members present and they would have to be available to vote if, as and when votes came up.

Yesterday's vote was not a snap vote or a quick decision made by the House. It was clear that the Government wanted the vote yesterday and it was clear that the vote was going to be taken yesterday. However, government back-benchers and supporters of the Government simply shirked their responsibilities and did not come to work on time. The end result of that was to establish what could well be a very bad precedent. I ask you, Sir, if you do nothing else, to make it clear that what happened yesterday was a once in a lifetime occurrence not ever to happen again.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has already recognized the Hon. Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) at some length.

Mr. Nielsen: No, Mr. Speaker, I have a correction to make. While listening to the government House Leader, I reflected upon the remarks I made toward the close of my original submission. At that time, I believe I referred to the motion of May 9, 1983, as being a dilatory motion. That was not the case; it was a substantive motion. And, indeed, the only other substantive motion that gave rise to last night's practice was the motion that we dealt with today.

I do not ask the Chair to make a decision, Mr. Speaker. As a matter of fact, I think it would be unwise to do so. I am only asking that the Chair reflect upon what happened in May, 1983, and what happened last night. Those are the only two instances of substantive motions to my knowledge that have been dealt with in that fashion. Dilatory motions have given rise to another practice. Here we are dealing with something far different. I think that the two must be kept very separate.

I do not think we should expect you, Sir, to return to us with any definitive reflection upon what you have heard today. I think we should all treat it as a situation of a caveat having been raised. It has now been drawn to the attention of the Chair and the Chair may well want to follow the suggestion of the government House Leader that you call us together for a meeting with you.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I agree with the Hon. Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). It is certainly up to you, Mr. Speaker, but I do not mind having you reflect upon all of this. We are not expecting any decision to be made on a short term. However, if two years ago it was fair for the Chair to allow 16 days for the Official Opposition to decide if it was ready to vote, then today in 1984, a couple of days should not be indecent. We will take into account very seriously, if this situation occurs again, the precedent of waiting 16 rather than 2 days.

Mr. Nielsen: The motions are different. One is dilatory, one is substantive.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Yukon invites the Chair to reflect. I can assure him that the Chair will give the matter a great deal of reflection. I can also assure the Hon. Member that the Chair will have something to say at an appropriate time after reflecting upon the record.

The Chair would like to put only one item of information before the House. Reference has been made many times to the Chair's communicating with the Parties involved. The channels of communication are informal and imperfect. Whatever communication took place last night was on the initiative of the Chair.

Until five minutes to six o'clock, the Chair had the firm understanding that there would be a vote at six o'clock. This was a communication which had been received by the Chair. The Chair then received a fairly substantial indication indirectly to the effect that a vote would not take place until the following morning, on the basis of which the Chair began to consider its position seriously.

The Chair attempted to negotiate with the Hon. House Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Nielsen) through the Hon. Member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) who conveyed a message to him. The Chair observed that after the message was conveyed, the Hon. House Leader of the Official Opposition and a number of people near him left the House.

Mr. Nielsen: Because we thought there was going to be a vote.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair took that to be an indication that the Hon. Member was accepting the position that there should not be a vote. Surely the Hon. Member for Yukon did not anticipate having the bells ring all night and repeating an experience which did nothing but wear out bells. I think that 80 bells were worn out during the course of the famous bell ringing episode of 1982—

Mr. Evans: And energy.

Mr. Speaker: Not to mention energy wasted. The Chair did attempt communications. However imperfect, the message received by the Chair was that there was no prospect of a vote taking place before the following morning. In this respect, the Chair's decision was on all fours with the decision of Madam Speaker on May, 1983. That is one observation, and the Chair will have a number of other observations to make after mature reflection and careful examination of everything which has been said today.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, since you and not I have raised the matter of last night's communications specifically with respect to myself, I can tell you, Sir, that the message that I received, which caused me to leave the Chamber, was that you were going to cause a vote to be taken at six o'clock without the Whips. That was the message that I received, and I am sure that that practice would be repugnant even to the government House Leader. That is why we left.

Mr. Speaker: The message that the Chair attempted to convey was to indicate the position with regard to the circumstances that were indicated by the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans), fully bearing in mind the implication as exposed by the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain and its possible reflection on the Chair. With this in mind, the Chair was fully cognizant of the possible charges that could be raised against it, but the Chair attempted to act by giving everyone an indication of what the objections were. The Chair, however imperfectly, received back a message from the Leader of the Opposition that the Leader of the Opposition, in the circumstances, did not feel that a vote should take place at that time. However imperfect the communication, that was the message received by the Chair.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, that opens up another area. Nothing could be further from the truth. We were prepared to vote all day yesterday and we were prepared to vote at any time last night, whether before six o'clock or after six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair, of course, takes the Hon. Member at his word.

PETITIONS

MR. WADDELL—INCREASE IN NUCLEAR WEAPONS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition on behalf of 250 residents, most of whom live in my federal riding of Vancouver-Kingsway. In signing the petition, which originally was a petition against the Cruise missile, the petitioners say that they support the statement endorsed by the United Nations in 1982, which was as follows:

The increase in nuclear weapons, far from strengthening international security, on the contrary, weakens it. Enduring peace cannot be built on the accumulation of weaponry.

I should like to submit that petition and file it with the House of Commons on behalf of the petitioners.

MR. DARLING—ACID RAIN CONTROL

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, to the honourable House of Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled. The petition of the undersigned residents of Parry Sound-Muskoka who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your petitioners in the certain assurance that your honourable House will therefore provide a remedy, humbly sheweth that, whereas acid precipitation is the most serious environmental issue facing us, especially in Muskoka, in this century; whereas the technology does exist to reduce the amounts of acid causing pollution from smokestacks and car emissions; and whereas the cost of not taking action would be detrimental and far more expensive in the long run, wherefore the undersigned, your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to encourage the Government to continue its efforts toward greater emission control. And as in duty bound your petitioners will ever pray.

This petition was signed by 166 petitioners from the United Church in Huntsville.

CATERING CONTRACTS FOR FEDERAL BUILDINGS

Question No. 179—Mr. Jelinek:

1. Are all food catering contracts for federal public buildings held by one company, Cater Plan and, if so (a) for what reason (b) were other catering companies given an opportunity to submit tenders for provision of this service?

2. Are there any food service contracts outstanding and, if so (a) how many (b) what is the duration of each contract (c) by what method will the contract be renewed?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Public Works): 1. All food catering contracts for federal public buildings under the administration of Public Works Canada are not held by one company, CaterPlan. (a) Not applicable, (b) Yes.

In accordance with Treasury Board policy, the Ottawa Civil Service Recreational Association operates the cafeterias established for public servants in Ottawa and must call public tenders for caterers to provide this service.

Outside of Ottawa, Treasury Board has given the Canadian National Institute for the Blind the first opportunity to accept catering contracts which are for the use of public servants only. CaterPlan is the food service division of the Canadian National Institute for the Blind.

The decision with respect to the Canadian National Institute for the Blind was made by Treasury Board to provide employment for many blind Canadians and to yield revenue to assist CaterPlan in their work with the blind. CaterPlan Services continue to be the largest single employer of blind Canadians.

In cases where a Crown-owned building incorporates a commercial facility, i.e. one not for the use of public servants only, Public Works Canada advertises publicly.

Although not now in Quebec, Canadian National Institute for the Blind (CaterPlan Services) still maintains a working relationship with Servibec owned by blind former employees of Canadian National Institute for the Blind (CaterPlan Services). Servibec continues to maintain an objective similar to Canadian National Institute for the Blind (CaterPlan Services) in its employment of blind persons.

2. Outstanding food service contracts exclusive of the Civil Service Recreational Association, Canadian National Institute for the Blind and Servibec: (a) Eight.

(b) The duration of each contract is as follows:

1. Ottawa, Ontario: Federal Study Centre; a continuing contract with a 90-day cancellation clause.

2. Arnprior, Ontario: Federal Study Centre; a one-year contract. Expiry date July 31 1984.

3. Hull, Québec: Place du Portage, Phase 3; a five-year contract with an option of yearly renewal. Expiry date May 31 1988.

4. Hull, Québec: Asticou Language School; a contract with a 90-day cancellation clause.

5. Ottawa, Ontario: Carson Road Language School and Aselford Martin Bldg. Language School; Hull, Québec: Bisson Centre Language School; 1 contract for the 3 schools with a 90-day cancellation clause.

6. Calgary, Alberta: The Harry Hays Building; Contract has 90-day cancellation clause. Contract to be reviewed every two years. Next review date November 18, 1984.

7. Goose Bay, Labrador: A two-year contract with a one-year renewal option. Expiry date October 30, 1985.

8. Winnipeg, Manitoba: Board of Grain Commissioners Building; A five-year contract. Expiry date November 30, 1987.

(c) Public Tender.

"THE CAR ECONOMY BOOK"

Question No. 351—Mr. St. Germain:

Did the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources publish "The Car Economy Book", and, if so at what cost for (a) concept and research (b) production (c) printing (d) distribution and what was the total cost of the publication?

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, EM&R published "The Car Economy Book" in October, 1981.

(a) The publication was developed and written within EM&R in consultation with Transport Canada. No outside costs were incurred.

(b) Artwork was designed and produced within EM&R. Typesetting costs amounted to $1,300.

(c) Total printing costs were $180,000 for 600,000 English and 300,000 French copies.

(d) The publication was distributed through the EM&R exhibit program and through the Department's publication distribution facilities at headquarters and in the regions. No special distribution costs were incurred.

Total cost of the publication was $181,300.

Does the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation plan to establish a full-service television station in New Brunswick?

Order Paper Questions

Hon. Francis Fox (Minister of Communications): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

REVENUE FROM LOTTERIES

Question No. 608—Mr. Reid (St. Catharines):

1. As at January 31, 1984, how much revenue did the government receive pursuant to the 1979 federal-provincial agreement on lotteries?

3. What monies were received in net revenue from Loto Canada on an annual basis?

4. Was $80 million in net revenue received in any one fiscal year and, if so, in which year?

Hon. Jacques Olivier (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): 1. Pursuant to the 1979 federal-provincial agreement on lotteries and, as of January 31, 1984, the revenue received is as follows:

Year	Payments	Received	Cumulative
1980	4	$25,576,884.43	$ 25,576,884.43
1981	4	28,938,693.45	54,515,537.88

1984	—	—	—

2. Pursuant to the 1979 federal-provincial agreement on lotteries, the annual payment of $24 million is indexed to the 1979 CPI. Therefore, the amount anticipated in 1984 is approximately $35,300,000.

3. The net revenues received from Loto Canada Inc. were as follows:

Fiscal Year	Net Revenue

1979-1980	$46,323,728

Note: In fiscal year 1979-1980, Loto Canada Inc. was in operation for only nine months.

4. No. The greatest net revenue received from Loto Canada Inc. in one fiscal year was $74,315,402 (in fiscal year 1977-1980).

ROYAL CANADIAN MINT

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of Supply and Services): I am informed by the Royal Canadian Mint as follows: Yes.

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1984-85

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacLaren that Bill C-21, an Act to provide borrowing authority, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on Bill C-21, which calls for federal authority to borrow $29.5 billion. The Bill places a very heavy responsibility on those of us who serve in Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition. I say this because the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has announced that he will be stepping down and following a leadership convention in June, the Liberal Party will have a new leader and the country will have a new, though temporary, Prime Minister.

This metamorphosis is not too dissimilar from that which occurs when a lobster sheds its shell. He leaves the old shell behind and takes on a new shell which is soft and fragile, so he cannot fill it with his limited body weight. The lobster cannot move for some time, and when he does he lacks direction and co-ordination. It takes a long time for the lobster to fill out his new shell, which is why dealers have a very difficult time selling soft shell lobsters to Canadians. I will stop right there, Mr. Speaker, because, as you will realize, I am speaking about the Liberal Party.

I say this Bill causes us problems in the Official Opposition because the Government's Budget and this borrowing Bill are not likely to be repeated by the new leader of the Liberal Party. Already leadership candidates and potential leaders in the Liberal ranks are making strong statements about government waste and government extravagance.

For example, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro), who has not peaked yet, when speaking at the Liberal biennial policy conference in Ottawa on November 7, 1982, is reported as saying: "The government is wasting millions of dollars by sending monthly pension cheques to wealthy senior citizens and baby bonuses to families who do not need the money. Such funds should be redirected to help the most needy". The Minister does not say what yardstick he would use to define the most needy, nor does he say when, if he became Prime Minister, he would cut out the baby bonus. I think it is important that we get this Liberal Minister on the record, however.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) is reported in The Toronto Star of November 3, 1982, as saying: "The current crisis we are living in makes people think much more deeply than they used to about a number of issues and to realize that there are no free lunches and that we cannot plan on the basis that there is a kind of growing federal pie from which everybody can get an increased share. When you see a financial situation where the Government is not getting the revenue that it used to—where the economy is not growing—where public funds have been used extremely sparingly and targeted better than ever before, then you have to ask yourselves questions like this". The Minister did not say where he is going to cut down nor why the economy is not growing, but he makes a mockery of his Party and his Government when he says that public funds have been used extremely sparingly and then earmarks $1.35 billion to prop up the Government's leading loss maker, namely, Canadair.

Canadair has already shocked taxpayers by its bad management record which has been concealed from Parliament as long as possible. There is no reason to believe that this recent move will do little more than delay the executioner's axe while eating up more tax dollars. If the original owners, General Dynamics, could not run this company despite a substantial military business in the United States, then there was no reason to suppose that the federal Government in particular could find a genius capable of reversing reality. By throwing a hundred million here and a billion there, the Government has not solved the problem; it has simply compounded it with taxpayers' money, thereby adding to our inflationary spiral, our increased interest rates and our rate of unemployment.

What does another aspiring leader, the Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development (Mr. Johnston), have to say about his Party and the Government? On page 5 of Fiscalamity in 1974 he stated:

● (1600)

This book is dedicated to all Canadians who share my belief that Canada, with its beauty, its resources, its people, and its legal-political heritage, could be a country of unequalled opportunity and happiness, were it not for too much taxation, too strong a bureaucracy, too much government, too much welfare, too many politicians, and too few statesmen.

To all of these criticisms we simply have to ask, who has been governing Canada since 1963? What Party has been in power?

Mr. Nystrom: The Liberals and the Tories.

Mr. Crouse: The Tories were in for a brief period, yes. We did have nine months in office. But I submit that our Party could never create all the mayhem which has happened under the ruling Liberals since 1963. These are criticisms by Liberals, some of whom seek to lead, not by the Tories. This is the joke of the 20th century, these criticisms of the Government and its overall mismanagement of the economy. This same Minister is also on the record as supporting the sale of Canadair.

What about the so-called crown prince, John Turner?

Mr. Evans: Now, now!

Mr. Crouse: "Now, now", someone says. I will be as fair as I can.

Mr. Turner: Are you talking about me?

Mr. Crouse: No, I am not talking about Charlie. I am talking about John, Mr. Speaker. I am only quoting from what I found on the front page of our newspapers just in the last few days. John Turner simply promised no miracles if he is elected Prime Minister. In fact, when interviewed he seemed to have no answers to anything on anything, aside from pointing out that our deficit in Canada is now 50 per cent higher on a relative basis than the deficit in the United States. He can only say, when asked at whose expense the deficit would be cut, that it would have to be at the expense of someone. Well, that is a profound statement. I watched his interview on CBC by Barbara Frum. At the end of the interview, she became so frustrated that she said, "Mr. Turner, you are giving answers to questions with questions. You have been out of office, free to think about these matters for a long time. The economy has been in trouble for some time. You ask Canadians for their confidence. Should you not, in fact, give them some answers now to justify that confidence?" The answer to that was only a continuation of the original waffling.

I say to the Liberal Party through you, Mr. Speaker, that this is simply not good enough for the Canadian people. As a long-time Hon. Member of this House, I well remember the "Turner" years and the effect of his budgetary policies. Inflation, for example, as of January, 1972 was 4.9 per cent. By September of 1975, the inflation rate had more than doubled to 10.6 per cent. In the same period our unemployment rate jumped from 6.3 per cent to 10.6 per cent, an increase of 26.9 per cent. This same man, when asked if he had policy disputes with Mr. Trudeau, replied that whatever it was, it would remain between them. He was not going to resurrect the past but only deal with the future. In my view, Mr. Turner left Parliament Hill because he had failed to carry out the tasks assigned to him, and while he and the Liberal Party may like to forget about the past and only deal with the future, the record of the government's policies and its mismanagement of our economy is clear and plain enough for everyone to see. It will be remembered by all Canadians whenever the next federal election is called, and I feel certain they will render an honest and just verdict on the Liberal Party and its period in office.

I say to the Liberal Party, let us end this charade. Let us call a federal election as soon as possible and let the people decide the issues at the ballot box.

I stated earlier, Mr. Speaker, that this Bill places a very heavy responsibility on Hon. Members of the Opposition because of the excessive borrowing and spending programs of the Government which are slowly but surely pushing up interest rates. The pressure upon us is showing no signs of diminishing in spite of the hopeful dreams of the Minister of Finance. Last week one-year Treasury bills again moved upward. All of the present net federal debt matures within approximately two and a half years. The effect of last week's increase alone increases the cost of carrying our $150 billion net debt by some $750 million. The size of this increase totally shatters all of the Budget figures of the Minister of Finance.

Another important point is that this Bill makes no reference whatsoever to borrowing by Crown corporations, or to guarantees given by the Government of Canada in the open market for private companies. All of this uncertainty is having its effect on the value of the Canadian dollar, which has been moving up and down recently like a yoyo. The blame for this situation must be placed squarely on our Minister of Finance who is on the record as saying he was not losing any sleep over the fall in the purchasing power of our dollar. Here, of course, he is in direct conflict with the Governor of the Bank of Canada who is on the record as stating that letting the dollar slide still further would lead to almost immediate increases in inflation. Mr. Bouey said last week that he had no choice but to raise interest rates in order to maintain the fight against inflation, and he hinted that if the Government changed its policy, opting to let the dollar fall still further in order to promote sales abroad of Canadian goods, he would resign as Governor of Canada's central bank. Is it any wonder that our dollar is down to little more than 78 cents officially, when those who deal in international finance see our two leading Canadians in the finance field openly feuding on the front pages of our newspapers?

This type of situation destroys confidence in our currency, in our country, and in our entire economy. As confidence in Canada is eroded by this Government, we see the effects in higher unemployment, in lost opportunities, in broken homes and in the despair evident among our young people.

If this Government would agree today to cut the amount required by this borrowing Bill in half to $15 billion instead of $29.5 bilion, the effect would be miraculous on our entire economy. It may well mean the paring of some programs, but this is the course being promised by some would-be leaders, in any case. I say, why wait for summer, let us do it now.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words today in opposition to the borrowing authority Bill which is before the House today. I do so because I have the impression that the Government across the way has been borrowing a lot of money and running up a tremendous deficit without any real plan or vision as to where it wants to take this country of ours in the next number of years.

[Translation]

Now, Mr. Speaker, the House must deal with Bill C-21 whereby the government is seeking again to borrow $29.5 billion for the fiscal year 1984-85. But Canada is already saddled with a huge deficit. Its total indebtedness is already reaching $151 billion, which is an enormous amount of money to owe for a country like Canada. It represents a debt of nearly $6,000 for every man, woman and child in this country. Another way of putting it is to say that some 21 cents out of very tax dollar are used by the federal government to pay the interest on its debt: it is a lot of money indeed for a country the size of ours. As Members of the House, as I said, we have to deal with another bill whereby the government is seeking the authority to borrow again $30 billion, which is certainly unwarranted without a national plan or vision for the future of our country.

[English]

I believe if we are going to be borrowing this kind of money, we will have to be very precise as to where we want to go as a country. I have no objection whatsoever to borrowing money or building up a deficit if that money is going to be spent on specific projects which will create long-term job creation and economic security for the people of Canada. That would be the same thing as a farmer in my riding going out and borrowing a few thousand dollars to buy a quarter section of land in order to expand his farm operation, or a small businessman borrowing to improve his business in order to be more efficient and productive and to create more jobs in the community. In other words, it is an investment in the future of the business or farm. The farmer or businessman will reap a return on that investment. However, what I object to is borrowing money to take a holiday, to buy a very expensive car, or to blow it on parties and booze. That is very destructive borrowing in this country, whether it is at the individual or national and provincial levels. That is my main concern with the Government across the way.

• (1610)

I want to bring this home to my own Province of Saskatchewan, Mr. Speaker. In the 1930s and 1940s Saskatchewan was a very poor province. We had the tremendous depression and a drought. Because of that an old Liberal Government, run by a fellow named Patterson, was going into massive debt in Saskatchewan. When the CCF won the election in 1944, they were able, under the leadership of Tommy Douglas, to get the province out of debt and bring in many services that we did not have in other parts of the country. In doing so, they often had to go out and borrow money. One very good example was the borrowing of money to establish the Saskatchewan Power Corporation. It was to build a power utility owned by the people of Saskatchewan. After the debt was paid off, the people of Saskatchewan owned, and still own, that facility. It was like paying off a mortgage on a house.

Another example, of course, was the Saskatchewan Government Telephone Company. Money was borrowed to build that company and make it into one of the best and most efficient telephone companies, public or private. That debt is now paid off and as well the company is owned by the people of Saskatchewan.

What has happened since, Mr. Speaker? We have seen a Government that was pretty well able to balance the books and not put the people of Saskatchewan into debt. In this House we often hear charges that we are the Party of the big spenders. We like to spend a lot of money and we are not responsible or efficient managers. We are absolutely irresponsible. We hear that charge often, not just from the Government across the way but from the Conservative Party at the other end of the Chamber.

I see my good friend is here, the Hon. Member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight). I am sure he would agree when I say that we have never seen an example of greater mismanagement of public funds in our province than we have in the last two years in office of Premier Grant Devine. After less than two years of Conservative Government we now have in that province a deficit of around $550 million. There are one million people in that province, which means $550 for every single man, woman and child. All this after only 20 months. We never had that kind of irresponsibility during the Douglas years, the Blakeney years, or indeed under Liberal Premier Ross Thatcher between 1964 and 1967. The interest on that debt of $550 million is already the astonishing figure of $1 million a week. I understand Grant Devine wants again to emulate the Government across the way tomorrow night because there is going to be another budget.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I invite the Hon. Member to address his comments to Bill C-21, which is the federal Bill.

Mr. Nystrom: Well, in trying to persuade Members of the House, Mr. Speaker, I wanted to give you a very good example of something happening locally, where a very bad example set by the federal Government is now being followed by one of the soul sisters of that Government, namely, the Premier of Saskatchewan. That debt is driving oridnary farmers, workers and pensioners in my province, into debt in the future. It is that kind of lack of planning, vision and imagination which is really driving this country into debt. When you look at the debt of countries around the world you will see it is generally right-wing, conservative governments which have the largest debts. Look at the United States and Ronald Reagan. That is a very right-wing, very conservative government, and it has the largest debt in the history of the U.S.A. You can look at the Government of Great Britain with Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher and the tremendous deficits there. This debt situation allows the banks and financial institutions so much power over the lives of ordinary citizens because we become beholden to these large private concerns. My argument is that if we are going to borrow money, we should be borrowing money for investment purposes to build a strong, productive and competitive industrial sector where we produce long-term jobs and security for the people. That should be the objective.

I believe we should also be using the tax system to reduce the deficit in the long run. It is about time that we started taxing corporations their fair share. Right now so many of those corporations which dominate the economy are getting away without paying their fair share of taxes. Another group that does that is the rich. I suggest it is about time we started taxing the rich, making the rich pay their fair share. If we did that, we would not have this massive deficit and we would not have to borrow such a massive amount of money which the ordinary citizens of this country must pay off. My concern is that the irresponsibility of the Government across the way is contagious. It certainly has been in my province where we now have a Government trying to emulate the federal Government by running up huge debts. Therefore, I appeal to this House to defeat this Bill.

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacLaren that Bill C-21, an Act to provide borrowing authority, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate on Bill C-21, the borrowing Bill. I have not been in this House that long but I can go back over a lot of borrowing Bills presented by this Government. This one, asking for $29.55 billion, is not the largest. The Hon. Member for Outremont (Mr. Lalonde) presented a borrowing Bill in which he really gave it a good shot. He got it up to $31.5 billion. Then there was another one by the Hon. Member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso (Mr. MacEachen) who came up with only $25 billion. That seems quite small then we had the one from the Hon. Member for Saint-Maurice (Mr. Chrétien) whose best effort was $12 billion. Then we had the prime minister from the Canadian Pacific, Mr. Turner, and the best he could do was $5 billion. Therefore, all in all, this is not a record borrowing Bill.

The one thing you have to look at in borrowing Bills, Mr. Speaker, is what use the money is put to. My friend, the Hon. Member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), spoke about the Province of Saskatchewan. To draw an analogy, Mr. Speaker, there are times when Crown corporations, which are not even discussed in this Bill, carry tremendous debts on behalf of the people of Canada over which this Parliament has absolutely no control. The same thing occurred in the Province of Saskatchewan. There were huge debts built up in the Sask. Power Corporation and Sask Tel. A lot of money was borrowed by the past administration in the Province of Saskatchewan and spent on the uranium mine at Key Lake. They are full 51 per cent partners in the Key Lake Mining Corporation. The NDP says we really should not continue with this.

● (1620)

If we are going to borrow money, let us borrow money for things that are good. Let us borrow money to start young farmers on the land. Let us put money forward so that young men and women can borrow to own their own land rather than be tenants of a government, such as they were in the Province of Saskatchewan until the new administration came in.

The total borrowing of the Government, Mr. Speaker, is about 91 per cent of the total personal savings forecast for Canadians this year. The Government wants to borrow almost as much as the people of Canada are going to save this year. In the first quarter of the fiscal year there is a large drain on the federal Treasury. There is need for new funds. One reason for this is tax refunds, which will probably amount to about $3.8 billion this year. The Government now wants to borrow to pay the money to the taxpayers of Canada who have been paying in for 12 or 15 months. They have been paying that money to the Government of Canada, trusting that the Government will have the money to pay it back. It does not have it. It has spent it. The Government has blown it on things like Canadair and de Havilland.

In 1968, our debt was about 2 per cent of the Gross National Product. Now it is about 4.7 per cent. In 1968, when you and I were paying taxes, Mr. Speaker, it took $1 out of $9 to pay the interest on the debt which the Government had incurred on behalf of Canadians. Now it takes $1 out of every $3 for which Canadian men and women work to pay the interest on the debt which has been incurred.

I would like to look at promises which have been made in the past, Mr. Speaker. I recall that in campaigning the Government said it would keep its 1980 election promise to hold spending growth below the rate of GNP and to reduce steadily the size of the deficit. The Government made that promise in 1980 along with a lot of other promises.

Let us look at how well this promise has been kept. In the 1980-81 national accounts spending was 15.4 per cent. Public accounts spending was 15.2 per cent. The nominal GNP was 13.9 and the inflation rate on the CPI was 10.2 per cent. In 1981-82, the spending increase on national accounts was 19.6 per cent, public accounts spending was 16.7 per cent. The nominal GNP was 14.3 per cent and the inflation rate on the CIP was 12.5 per cent. In 1982-83, there was an 18 per cent increase in national accounts and a 17.9 per cent increase on public accounts. The nominal GNP was 5.2 per cent and the inflation rate on the CPI was 10.8 per cent. It goes on and on, Mr. Speaker.

The Government said it was not going to spend beyond the GNP or increase spending. We just had a Throne Speech, Mr. Speaker. At the longest this Parliament will last 12 months. It may last six or seven months. In the Throne Speech there were 24 promises for new spending. There were 28 promises for new legislation, which I am sure will incur spending. There were 26 promises to set up task forces and engage in consultation or create new bodies or boards, which are going to cost money, Mr. Speaker. There were 20 other promises of Government action. These are all direct initiatives which the Government is going to put forward in six to eight months. This is more legislation than the Government has put forward since 1980.

The Government is asking for $29.55 billion. The amount of $15 billion would carry the Government through until the end of August. Parliament will be sitting at that time. If the Government needs more money, then it could come before Parliament to say it has spent its money and what it has spent it on. If it feels that some deserving programs should be funded and it does not have the capital to do it, it could ask to borrow more money. Part of the more than $29 billion is contingency. It is a $4 billion slush fund, according to the Government's own accounts. It can run the next fiscal year with $25 billion, but it wants $4 billion to play with. Maybe the Minister of Finance likes to have some change in his pocket. That is a lot of change to leave at the discretion of these people.

If the money were going to be used to re-establish VIA Rail, it may be acceptable. However, it is not. We have heard the Minister of Transport (Mr. Axworthy) talking about new cars servicing certain parts of Canada under the VIA Rail Act. He tells us they will be there in 1986 or 1987. However, the President of VIA Rail says it may be by 1989 and more likely in 1990. So this money is not going to go to that.

The whole point of the matter is that the borrowing authority for which the Government is asking is beyond reason in the minds of all Canadians. It wants $4 billion for discretionary spending but the balance of the money is not being spent to employ Canadians, return investment, build growth in our country, lower our inflation rate or put 1.5 million Canadians back to work.

I certainly hope, Mr. Speaker, that other Members will speak against this Bill and vote against it when the time comes.

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, it would appear that Bill C-21 is intended to put Canada's economic remains in the vault. We are going to take the whole $29 billion that we are going to need now. We are not going to take a second bit of this cherry. We do not want to remind Canada again how much we are borrowing. We will take it all now and put Canada's economic remains in the vault. We do not want to exhume the body for any purpose whatsoever, not even for its proper burial.

I like some of the things which were said about this Budget. Of course, the Budget is the cause for Bill C-21. I like particularly some of the sources from which they came. I like the idea that was expressed on CBC TV that if the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) is correct in his economic predictions, then a lot of other economic seers would have to be wrong. I think the Minister of Finance is wrong. I also like what Barbara Frum said. She said that the Budget appears to be speaking directly to the NDP constituencies. I know the NDP members would contradict that statement. They would have gone even further and the vault would have had to be bigger. Nevertheless, that came from just a casual observer who has been somewhat more than favourable to the NDP over the years. I also like what Peter Newman said about the Budget. He said it is a mugwump Budget, meaning someone who sits firmly on the fence.

Let me be more serious. I am concerned about what Premier Lee from P.E.I. had to say about it. The Island Premier says that even though the federal Budget contains a few tidbits of good news, like pension increases and tax adjustments for farmers and small business, he is disappointed that there was not more substance in the federal financial projection. He stated that until the investment community itself has a little more confidence in the overall economic conditions in Canada and until we get the unemployment rate down and get people working, we are in a serious situation and these band-aid approaches in some areas and some programs in others are not really the solution.

Let me refer to the Hon. John Baxter, Finance Minister for the Province of New Brunswick, who says that the Budget reads more like social planning than like a budget. He says that it is hard to tell which programs are new and which are old. He gives the $150 million youth employment program as an example. He also said, "It looks as if New Brunswick will lose out in federal transfers because of changes in cost-sharing agreements". All these examples do not give one much heart in being part of the parliamentary system in Canada. Another comment on the Budget was that it has no imagery, no direction and little, if any, substance. It is promisory Budget which the Government may or may not intend to honour.

Although the Government has made certain proposals for 1985, it is unlikely that it will have anything to do with the commitment it is making for 1985. I think we must be concerned that the Government is making many commitments for the future but doing very little at present.

As usual, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce has essentially approved most of what is in the Budget, but it ends up its initial remarks by saying, "We have serious reservations about the Budget deficit". Of course, these reservations arise in light of what business can expect as a consequence of this Budget and this deficit. That is the primary subject of conversation as we consider this huge borrowing Bill.

The Budget did not address the cost of energy for the primary industries in Canada and therefore gave little hope to those who need assistance more directly. The Budget did not address this situation in any other industrial aspect, yet nothing has contributed more to inflationary tendencies than the energy policy of the Government and the cost of production in all spheres of Canadian business. Most seriously, it did not address this issue with respect to the farming or fishing community where bankruptcies have reached incredible and totally unacceptable levels as a result of the Government's policies.

Another area which is of concern to me and many others, and probably has been repeated, is that the Government's demand for over $29 billion in government financing will not allow enough money for other types of financing. There will not be enough to make a money market that will bring about lower interest rates for others who want to borrow. The Government has cornered the market in the borrowing sphere. This is a great threat to our total economy due to the fact that all the other window dressing proposals in the Budget only hide the fact that it is only investors, small and large, fishermen, farmers and small businessmen who can provide employment. The Budget does not provide adequate relief to stimulate those people to make money and to spend money to improve the basic economy of this nation. This necessity has been utterly overlooked in the Budget.

I must ask whether the Government has considered if it can afford to borrow the savings of all Canadians at this level and have a prosperous Canada. How much consideration has the Government given in its Budget to the fact that it is increasing provincial borrowings by the amount of the cost savings and cost sharing programs it is transferring to the provincial Treasuries through other government policies? The Government's financial policy is totally irresponsible in a country which must have money if it wishes to expand and if it wishes to consume.

It disturbs me that the Department of National Revenue has become so desperate to collect money that it has initiated quotas in the tax collection system, whether it is by way of revenue collected by the income tax collector or by way of financial or employment rewards to customs officers. I am concerned that the Government, in desperation, leans on the small Canadian taxpayers to make demands for amounts that are too small to defend but which the small taxpayer virtually must pay because he finds himself helpless against the system which tries to collect the money.

I am concerned about the method of promotions in the customs division of National Revenue. Those employees are in the position where their performance as tax collectors is criticized if they do not meet a specified number of seizures within a year or a month. I am also critical of the fact that these employees receive pay increases or higher classifications that correspond to the number of seizures they make. That seems to be the purpose of their jobs.

It seems that the Government will borrow more money than Canadians will save. At the same time it will ignore the borrowing at all other levels of Government. The Government is leaning on average Canadians to collect taxes and is pressuring departmental employees with the threat of no promotion for not meeting certain quotas.

We have seen a deterioration in fiscal policy ever since the Budget which was introduced by the aspirant for the Liberal leadership. He set the pattern for the downgrading of the Canadian economy when he introduced his Budget. At that time I predicted that if the following budgets continued the same trend, we would eventually see an 80-cent dollar. Our dollar has continued to drop to the point where it has reached 78 cents after successive Liberal Budgets. The first Budget I am talking about which set this pattern was the Turner Budget. Since the Government followed his philosophy we have finally reached this point. Some of us will be going home during the Easter break to see our grandchildren. When I do so, I must say that I will face them with a very guilty conscience, because it is they who will have to pay this bill for the Government's financing. For the first time in my life I have reservations about being a Member of Parliament and part of a Parliament of Canada which would do this to our children and the generations to follow. It is very close to heresy and very close to a sabotage of our economy when the Government takes this persistent approach without any consideration for the long-term well-being of Canadian citizens.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Mr. Speaker, like my colleague from Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain), I speak to this Bill today with mixed feelings. While I am pleased to participate in the debate, the subject matter is not something which makes one happy. We are discussing a Bill to give the Government borrowing authority of $29.5 billion. That amount is astronomical and almost incomprehensible to the average person, let alone to the average Member of Parliament. It is even more bewildering when one realizes that Bill C-21 seeking to borrow $29.5 billion is actually the eighth borrowing Bill that the Government has introduced since this Parliament was resurrected after the last election. The total of those borrowing Bills is over $102 billion. As I say, billions are almost incomprehensible and are difficult to register in terms of why we are so concerned about this borrowing authority for $29.5 billion.

I have been informed that the $29.5 billion is more than the accumulated deficits of the Government of Canada, whichever Party was in power—and unfortunately the Liberal Party has been in power far too long—from 1867 to 1975-76. That is a sad commentary on what the present Government is asking the Parliament of Canada to do.

If we use the base of 25 million Canadians, every billion dollars means $40 per capita. If we take the $29.5 billion, which in effect is $30 billion, then we are talking about $1,200 for every man, woman and child in Canada. In effect that will be the future debt with which they will be saddled as a result of just this one Bill, not the previous seven I mentioned. Of course, for a family of four that means $4,800 of extra debt as a result of the actions of the Government of Canada. Debt has to be paid for. Debt has to be serviced by interest. In effect, the interest on the debt of Canada is now one of the largest items in the Budget. It is over $20 billion, which amounts to $800 per person and, for a family of four, to $3,200.

Those are just a few graphic figures which indicate why Canadian taxpayers feel a bit under the weather, especially when they start to appreciate the wanton spending of this Government since 1980. Since we are recognizing changes in positions at the post—new Leaders come and go—I would like to go back to those halcyon days of June 1968 when the just society was supposed to have burst on to the Canadian horizon like a comet in the air and with starlight vision. One of the best ways to typify what has happened to the psyche of Canada or to the economy of Canada is to refer to the first Budget of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in 1968. It included an amount of a little over $12 billion as the total spending program. I was a Member of the House when that Budget came down. The first Budget was for about $8 billion or $9 billion but with supplementaries, as the public accounts will show, the actual Budget of that year was $12.4 billion or $12.5 billion. The total Budget of 1968, the year of the supposed just society, is now equal to the present payout of the unemployment insurance fund of $12 billion for 1983-84. That is a graphic, horrible statistic. It capsulizes what has happened with government spending at the federal level since the days of yore of 1968 when the total spending program was $12 billion plus, let alone the fact that this Bill asks for a borrowing authority of $29.5 billion.

We in Atlantic Canada still try to be a little frugal. We recognize that a dollar is worth a dollar even in an inflationary world and with the debts of governments. I would like to describe in another way this amount of $29.5 billion. It is more than the total Gross Domestic Product—they do not call it Gross National Product—of the four Atlantic provinces combined. The Conference Board forecasts for calendar year 1984 that the Gross Domestic Product for Nova Scotia will be $9.2 billion; for New Brunswick, $7.4 billion; for Prince Edward Island, $1.1 billion; and for Newfoundland, $5.3 billion, for a total of $23 billion. The Gross Domestic Product is the product of provincial governments and of the peoples of those four provinces in the goods and services they produce. The borrowing authority in this Bill is more than those figures combined. That is another way of putting this amount into perspective. This is why, perhaps, Hon. Members on this side of the House have been using the time of the House of Commons to repeat and perhaps to belabour the fact that the Auditor General has said that the spending programs of the Government are out of control.

It is a tremendous Bill to have on the floor of the House when we talk about the legacy of the present Prime Minister, when we talk about his 1968 Budget of $12 billion, which is now equal to the payout of the unemployment insurance fund, and when we look at the present incumbents or contenders for succession to the office of the Prime Minister. It is interesting to look at how four Ministers of Finance of the present Government have fared. At the moment only two of them are in the race; perhaps the other two will not join in. As other speakers have indicated, the spending programs of Government started to go out of control in the seventies when the then Minister of Finance, John Turner, brought in a Budget which ended up with a deficit of $5.4 billion. Then the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Chrétien) came along as Minister of Finance with a deficit of $12.2 billion in his Budget. The succeeding Minister of Finance, the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen), came in with a budget of $25.2 billion. If the leadership of the Liberal Party is to be determined by the deficits racked up by Ministers of Finance, not their Budgets, then the present Minister of Finance and his deficit of $31.5 billion would certainly give him the titular crown.

The figures are too vast for any human being to comprehend. I have tried to reduce them to terms with which people could identify, be it provincial budgets, provincial Gross Domestic Product, the deficits in previous Budgets or the unemployment insurance fund. With only ten minutes in this debate, I am extremely limited. I hardly had time to hiccup before I got going. I see Mr. Speaker indicating that I must wind up. I find that very difficult in ten minutes. It takes me about ten minutes to warm up, and then I like to really move. The only thing which is moving quicker than I am at the moment is the dollar. It is going down. The reason it is going down is that government programs have been going up. Interest rates have started to go up, and now I am supposed to sit down.

In conclusion, I say that it will take a change in government to correct the situation. If the Governor of the Bank of Canada wants to go out and play golf because interest rates will have to rise to protect the dollar and to help it find its own float, then we should send him out to play golf with the Government. They should be sent out to pasture.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order, please. The Hon. Member's time has expired.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, indeed the ten and a half minutes or the ten and three-quarter minutes of the Hon. Member were very entertaining. However, if he were to be informative, the hiccup he proposed would have been a much more intelligent contribution than the speech we heard on the topic at hand.

● (1650)

We have been hearing, it seems to me, an awful lot of political nonsense about this Bill and about the Budget that was brought down. We have heard Conservatives opposite comparing the deficit position today versus the circumstances in 1968. They are taking federal numbers and data isolated from comparative figures for provincial deficit spending, municipal deficit positions and deficits currently being incurred by other nations in the world. If they had a comparative look at numbers, not isolated from reality, they would see the position of the federal government stands it in very good stead indeed relative to other nations in the western world and relative to the position of provincial Governments.

I find it somewat presumptuous on the part of Members opposite to stand and say that there has to be a reduction in the deficit, that we have to cut this deficit greatly. But they do not tell us which programs they have earmarked should be cut.

Mr. Nowlan: Your salary.

Mr. Tobin: God forbid they form a government. It seems, as I said, somewhat presumptuous to see that kind of approach being taken. I had intended to stand and debate in very technical ways and rationalize the current Bill before the House. But seeing there is no sensible, logical, well-prepared and documented serious argument opposite, there is no point.

Let me say to Members opposite that when I look at the kind of examples of Conservative administration in action—the examples we have of provincial governments—I shudder to think that there is a possibility this crew across the way could form a national government in Canada.

Mr. Nowlan: Give us a chance.

Mr. Tobin: We have a spectacle in British Columbia of brutal Bill Bennett and his minions attempting to balance the budget on the backs of those who can least afford it. The sad part is that his Government is not even balancing the budget. His Government is merely picking on those who can least defend themselves and is taking the proverbial axe to their necks.

We have the example of great Conservative philosophy in action in Newfoundland in the person of Premier Brian Peckford. He announced to his employees after years of 4 per cent, 3 per cent, 3 per cent and 2 per cent that for the next two years they will get zero and zero. His Government is giving no increases. He is announcing to his public servants that if they so much as dare expect that collective bargaining should have a place in the Province of Newfoundland it will simply not be a zero and zero increase, it may well be no jobs.

Only in Benito's Italy and the other fellow's Germany was that kind of dictatorial approach taken, that kind of swipe at the fundamental rights of citizens of a province exercised by governments. We look at this great panic across the way by those who profess to be the disciples, the apostles, of Ronnie and the apostles of Margaret. What do we see in the United States? We see a President elected on a commitment to balance the budget in four years, now giving the U.S.A., that great bastion of free enterprise and capitalism, the largest deficit ever incurred by that nation. It is the largest by far, Mr. Speaker. There is not even a close second. These are the apostles of Ronnie across the way.

In Britain, we see Margaret Thatcher elected during a period of emotional war fever—war fever, Mr. Speaker, not economic policy. Where does she stand now in the opinion polls just a few months later? Where does she stand now when thousands are on the streets in that nation? She stands where she properly belongs as far as economic policy is concerned, and that is at the bottom of the opinion polls.

It is not at all unusual to have a contingency fund. Much has been made about a $4 billion contingency fund. The Government is acting in a responsible manner to make that kind of money available. A contingency fund has traditionally been included in the request for borrowing authority. It means the money is there if and when it is needed. It also means that should funds be spent, the funds have to be approved by this Parliament, by the peoples' representatives. It also means that if the money is not spent it lapses from year to year. It is absolute nonsense to try to describe as an election porkbarrel or to try to ascribe some devious motive to what is quite accepted by many nations of the world as the proper procedure to follow.

Talking about the prospect of this crowd opposite forming a government, I find it frightening, when I look at the statements of the five major candidates for the Conservative leadership campaign. What do I see? Isee the Hon. Member for Central Nova (Mr. Mulroney) who so brazenly gave the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) a backhand on the question of universality. When I look through my notes going back to the leadership campaign, I find that it was he himself who proposed that there be a means test, that the notion of universality was not sacrosanct and that it had to be looked at. I see the Hon. Member for St. John's West proposing the same thing. I see the Hon. Member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr.

Wilson) proposing exactly the same. The only candidate who said, "We have to be careful" was the Rt. Hon. Member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark), the former Leader of the Conservative Party who is now as loyal to the Hon. Member for Central Nova as the Member for Central Nova was loyal to him when he shook his hand in Montreal previous to the pin-cushion exercise of a convention the Tories had in western Canada.

As frightening as that is, I look at the question of Crown corporations. These people, the Tories, are going to reduce the deficit. The Hon. Member for Etobicoke Centre wants to sell all Crown corporations. The Hon. Member for St. John's West wants to eliminate CDIC. The Rt. Hon. Member for Yellowhead, when told of this, said, "Frankly, I find that position dangerous". Then I looked at the Hon. Member for Central Nova, the current Leader, and what he said about Crown corporations. When told that the Hon. Member for Etobicoke Centre wanted to sell off Air Canada, he asked why does he say such things? Who is going to pay for it? I do not know. What bank is going to finance it? On a fundamental question, Mr. Speaker, five different front-benchers, presumably five different Cabinet ministers, cannot agree. And what do they say about free trade with the United States? The current Leader says, "Free trade with the U.S. is like sleeping with an elephant". The Hon. Member for St. John's West says, "We have to open the borders and study the possibility of a common market". The Rt. Hon. Member for Yellowhead said, again, "Frankly, I find the proposals of the Hon. Member for St. John's West dangerous". And what about the Hon. Member for Etobicoke Centre? He says, "Talks of free trade strike me as unrealistic and naive".

We have been making a mistake on this side. We have been saying that the Tories will not tell us where they stand because they have no policy. But that is not true, Mr. Speaker. The Tories on the front bench have five different policies for any question you name, including the Manitoba language question. The Tories have not been very successful in keeping their differences on that one quiet either. I think that until these gentlemen make up their minds—

Mr. Forrestall: That was about Turner and Trudeau.

Mr. Tobin: —that they stand for something rather than just against the honest attempts of this Government to provide good management of our economy during a difficult time, they had better go back and do their homework.

Mr. Forrestall: Tell us about the anointed and the about-to-be anointed.

Mr. Tobin: The people of Canada simply will not be fooled by rhetoric and lust for power.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, because of the time, may I call it five o'clock?

GOVERNMENT AFFAIRS CONTROL ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West) moved that Bill C-208, an Act to provide for the control of conflicts of interest in Government affairs, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in presenting to the House of Commons legislation respecting conflicts of interest in government affairs, my purpose is to draw attention not only to the specific provisions of this Bill but to the spirit that it represents. Bill C-210 is entitled the Government Affairs Control Act. It is an attempt to codify in a sensible way some of the rules with respect to conflicts of interest that ought to be imposed upon Cabinet Ministers in the Government of Canada and those who work in the employ of the Government of Canada and its various agencies.

I do not suggest for one moment that this Bill is a complete answer to the conflict of interest situation or that indeed it provides a code of conduct for Members of the federal Cabinet or the officers of the Government of Canada. However, it at least offers an indication that some legislative action can be taken in order to provide not only for the protection of the public but for the preservation of the high degree of honesty and integrity which the public expects of the elected people who assume the offices of Cabinet Ministers in the Government of Canada and those who also assume various other offices within the Government of Canada.

What I really mean by the spirit of Bill C-210 is that we recognize that we must impose upon those who hold the high offices of Cabinet Ministers some restrictions regarding their activities and we must establish some method by which they are held accountable for their actions even though, by comparison, those in the private sector would not be held responsible in the same way. Simply stated, we want to impose a higher degree of responsibility upon members of the Cabinet and upon those who assume office within the Government.

I am reminded of a survey that was referred to on a television program. In that survey, people were asked what qualities they were most concerned with in elected representatives. That is to say, it asked what qualities the people felt were most important in those seeking public office. It was very clear from the survey that what people expected from candidates for public office was, first and foremost, honesty. Second, they expected intelligence, and third, they expected an element of compassion. It is important to note, Mr. Speaker, that the quality which everyone desires in those elected and seeking public office is that of honesty. That is really what Bill C-210 and its provisions are all about.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Just a moment, please. I hate to interrupt the Hon. Member. He should know his Bill better than I do, but I had read a Bill C-208 standing in the name of the Hon. Member. This is the third time the Hon. Member has mentioned a Bill C-210. Just to avoid any confusion, perhaps it would be possible for a correction to be made.

Mr. Crosby: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. The number of the Bill is indeed C-208. I might explain that it was introduced in the House of Commons during an earlier session. I am guilty of experiencing some confusion with the numbers. However, for the record, the number of the Bill is C-208. It is, as I have said, an Act to control conflicts of interest in government affairs, and the short title, for the record, is the Government Affairs Control Act.

I indicated that my purpose is to advance what I believe to be the interest of the public in terms of the responsibilities of elected officials, and particularly members of the Cabinet, and that is, the preservation of honesty and the assurance that they will deal honestly with public matters that are brought to their attention. There are other Bills before the House that relate to conflicts of interest and provide codes of conduct. I am reminded of a Bill introduced at the first session of this Thirty-second Parliament by the former Member for Nepean-Carleton, the Hon. Walter Baker. He introduced a Bill numbered C-679 which is entitled the Public Officers Standards of Conduct Act. That Bill contains much more extensive provisions that would affect a much larger group of public officials including, as I understand, Members of Parliament. For the moment, the Bill that I propose simply applies, as I have said, to members of the Cabinet and to those who hold public office.

I would like to review briefly the provisions of Bill C-208 in order to indicate how the Act would apply. First and foremost, the Act defines the persons who would be included by the term government officer and official. As I have indicated, that would include members of the Cabinet and all employees and officers of the Crown including officers of Crown agencies. In Clause 3, the Bill specifically sets out all of those circumstances which constitute conflicts of interest. That is to say, it sets out in some detail the circumstances under which a Cabinet Minister or government officer would be considered to be involved in a conflict of interest. That includes, for example, a situation in which a government officer or Cabinet Minister becomes involved in a contract or in bestowing any kind of benefit on another person.

The importance of setting out in clear terms conflict of interest situations is that when these situations arise, some action can be taken. The action proposed by Clause 4 of the Bill is that the Deputy Registrar General, having been made aware of a conflict of interest situation, presents the facts and circumstances to a judge of the Federal Court of Canada. The judge of the Federal Court of Canada can then conduct a judicial review and determine what action ought to be taken in order to protect the public interest with respect to that conflict of interest. The action that could be taken by the Federal Court judge in the case of a Cabinet Minister who involves himself or herself in a conflict of interest situation is that the appointment could be terminated. That is relatively drastic action but certainly action totally justified when a Cabinet Minister becomes involved in a conflict of interest.

The administration of the Act would fall under the Deputy Registrar General, and that is the officer who now administers the so-called voluntary code of conduct or guidelines that applies to members of the Cabinet and employees within offices of Cabinet Ministers. Provision is made for the administration of the Act in that way.

One problem that exists, and I think one of the reasons why we do not have clear conflict of interest legislation in Canada or a code of conduct applicable to Members of the House of Commons, Cabinet Ministers and other government officers and officials, is that it is a very difficult subject with which to deal. It is very difficult to define specifically the things that constitute breaches of a code of proper behaviour or indeed a conflict of interest. I want to illustrate the effect of this Act in clear terms so that we all know what we are talking about when we seek to present to the House of Commons conflict of interest legislation or legislation establishing a code of conduct.

By way of example, Mr. Speaker, Clause 3(1)(f) of the Bill would declare a conflict of interest situation as being one in which an employee or an official of the Government of Canada including a Cabinet Minister gives preferential treatment or privileged access to others and particularly to former employees or officials of the Government of Canada. Very simply, that means that if a Cabinet Minister gives preferential treatment to a former employee of the Government, a conflict of interest situation arises.

I have before me a newspaper report which makes it very clear that that is exactly what happened in the case of Jim Coutts. As all of us know, he was principal secretary to the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) and resigned from that post to seek a seat in Parliament. He was unsuccessful for reasons known to the voters of Spadina. If anyone wants to ask me what the reasons were I would be glad to contribute my view. I will not even mention his arrogance or his career in the Public Service in which he assumed authority beyond the scope ever intended to be assumed by any public servant. He was defeated in the election, and that verdict has my complete endorsement. Did Mr. Coutts quit and go off into so-called honest employment? No, Mr. Coutts could not give up the kind of activities he had pursued while he was in government on the public payroll. Instead, he established himself in the riding of Spadina in Toronto as a sort of super-parliamentarian or extracurricular parliamentarian. He was defeated, but he continues to reside in Spadina notwithstanding the fact that he claims to be a former resident of Alberta and to have lived in other parts of Canada, including Ottawa.

According to this public report by Lawrence Martin which appeared in our so-called national newspaper, Mr. Coutts is the man to contact if you need some help in Ottawa, where he still maintains an apartment. A Mr. Chen wanted to get his father to Toronto from Hong Kong and got hung up in red tape. The article reads:

> Call Jim and he'll call Immigration Minister Lloyd Axworthy. When Jim calls, people such as Mr. Axworthy still listen.

The article goes on to say exactly how that immigration case was settled and how the subject of it got into Canada—just because Jimmy Coutts called Lloyd Axworthy. apparently there is no law on record that says to Jimmy Coutts and the former Minister of Employment and Immigration, now the Minister of Transport, that they simply cannot get together on the telephone and decide who shall come into Canada and who shall not according to their own ideas and attitudes.

Clause 3 of Bill C-208 would make it a conflict of interest when a Cabinet Minister gives preferential treatment and privileged access to a former employee and officer of the Government. It is a shame that there is no legislation on the books that would prohibit that kind of action on the part of a Cabinet Minister and a former government official. If we only pass this one provision of Bill C-208 it would stop Mr. Jim Coutts from calling a Cabinet Minister, as reported in this article and in other places, and getting preferential treatment. Is it too much to ask the Parliament of Canada to pass a law to stop that kind of activity forever so that no person in the country will get special treatment simply because of a relationship that existed in the past and is projected into the future?

I will not even give advice to Liberals—perhaps they do not want it—but I would ask them if they want a man like James Coutts as the leader of their Party, a man who goes to Toronto and sets himself up in the constituency of Spadina as a kind of super-parliamentarian. It is not enough that he calls Cabinet Ministers and gets immigration cases fixed, now he wants to become leader of the Liberal Party. I hope they make him leader of the Liberal Party because then all Canadians will see what kind of person he is. I will not have to stand up in the House of Commons and list the mischief he has performed in the country and the arrogance he has shown for the governmental process over the years. If the Bill stops that preferential treatment then it will serve the interests of Parliament and of Canada.

There are many other cases that have come to light that demand this kind of legislation, Mr. Speaker. I want to refer to the travesty that took place in February or March of 1983 and which was evident in the House of Commons by the "Coalgate" affair. It involved a former Minister of the Crown, Alastair Gillespie, who, notwithstanding so-called guidelines issued by the Prime Minister, set out to obtain a very special kind of contract with the Crown. He did this with the full knowledge of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) who was at that time Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and with the full knowledge of other Members of the Government. When the case was brought to light they said that the guidelines were just voluntary and that he did not have to observe them. They clearly prohibit the kind of arrangement made by Mr. Gillespie, but apparently they are only voluntary guidelines and if Mr. Gillespie does not see fit to observe them there is nothing the Government can do.

There was a hue and cry from Members of the Progressive Conservative Party and of the New Democratic Party, and together we brought a resolution to the House demanding that a parliamentary committee inquire into the subject and set guidelines. It was defeated by the Liberal Government. Instead, it appointed a task force to establish conflict of interest guidelines and a code of conduct. It is supposed to report by the end of 1984. It will be interesting to see what it says, but if it does not bring forward recommendations to stop the Coutts type special treatment or the Gillespie type nibbling at the public purse, then its work will have been useless.

There are provisions in the Senate and House of Commons Act and in the Canada Elections Act governing the qualifications of Members of Parliament and the Senate. I can give you a horrible example of that, Mr. Speaker. In the Constitution Act it is set out very clearly that if a Senator is convicted of a felony, a serious offence, he or she must vacate the seat. We have such a case in the Senate of Canada. We have a Senator who was convicted under the Criminal Code of Canada who still sits in the Senate, who was fined $25,000, who could pay that fine two or three times over from the amount he has received in Senate compensation since he was convicted, but nobody is the least concerned about it. I can tell you that the people of Canada are worried about that kind of mischief, Mr. Speaker. They recognize that there ought to be a law that Members of Parliament, Senators, Cabinet officers and all government officials should not be allowed to get away with a standard of conduct lower than the standards that prevail in the private sector among ordinary people. Quite the contrary, Mr. Speaker; the public insists upon parliamentarians and members of Government having a standard higher than normal.

I have presented Bill C-208 which deals with one aspect of the problem, Mr. Speaker. I am not asking the Parliament of Canada to pass that measure; all I want is that it be referred to a committee so that we will at least recognize that we know a problem exists. We know that the public demands high standards and we should be prepared, at least, to look into the imposition of standards on ourselves to govern our conduct and our position with respect to matters of personal interest. At least, then, we will have relieved ourselves of the burden which is places on us to provide a code of conduct with which we can all live and from which the people of Canada will benefit.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased with this opportunity to speak to the issue of conflicts of interest, and more specifically to Bill C-208, an Act to provide for the control of conflicts of interests in Government affairs, introduced by the Member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby).

Mr. Speaker, it is a subject that is very close to us and that requires reflection. In fact, for over twenty years a great deal of reflection, effort and initiative has been expended on this matter by the Government. The concept that official duties, public or otherwise, should be performed in an entirely objective and disinterested manner—which is the principle of integrity—is the cornerstone of all good Government, and I am pleased to see that the Member for Halifax West also recognizes the importance of this issue and has put it before the House for consideration.

Bill C-208 which the Hon. Member is presenting today gives a list of personal activities that constitute circumstances where a conflict of interest arises for a Minister or public servant; it authorizes the Deputy Registrar General to inquire into cases of conflict of interest and to put the results before a judge of the Federal Court of Canada. The judge would then take the necessary steps or measures. If there is a conflict of interest, he may terminate the employee's employment and, in the case of an official who is not an employee, suspend or revoke the appointment of the official. Interestingly, although the Bill before the House is aimed at maintaining a standard of ethical conduct, it tends to stress the control aspect, and I would refer Hon. Members to the explanatory note on page 1a):

> The purpose of this bill is to ameliorate the control of conflicts of interest by Cabinet ministers and officers and employees of the Government of Canada by defining the circumstances under which a conflict of interest is deemed to arise and by providing a method of enforcement through the Deputy Registrar General and the Federal Court of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, before going any further, I would like to remind the Members of this House that in our system of Government, the issue of ethical conduct is still relatively recent. I said earlier that the Government has been considering this question for twenty years, and I am referring to the matter of establishing a set of ethical guidelines for members of Cabinet and Government employees. Mr. Speaker, I believe that any new initiatives in this field should be put in perspective and be considered within the general context of the Canadian situation. If we go back to the sixties, which is not so long ago, we find there were no conflict of interest guidelines. It was then up to one's own standards of moral behaviour and one's personal conscience. Employees did not have to be told what to do. When they entered the Public Service, they did whatever was necessary so as not to be in a conflict of interest situation. Guidelines and regulations were not necessary.

I realize that times have changed, but to what extent? What do we have to do now to make sure that public servants observe high standards of ethical conduct? I believe this is a question that the present Members of this House will have to consider very carefully.

Times have changed, and the Government realized this early on. In 1964, the then Prime Minister, the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson, wrote to his Cabinet Ministers, stressing the importance of maintaining a high standard of ethical conduct and emphasizing that the same standards should apply to their staff. In the same letter, he formulated what was to become the basis and the essence of the standard of conduct to which all public servants would have to conform for many years to come. I shall, if I may, quote some extracts from this letter, Mr. Speaker:

> It is by no means sufficient for a person in a position of responsibility in the public service to act within the law. There is an obligation not simply to obey the law but to act in a manner so scrupulous that it will bear the closest public scrutiny. The conduct of public affairs must be above all suspicion, in terms of standards of conduct, objectivity and equal treatment.

Another aspect of Prime Minister Pearson's philosophy in this field was that Ministers must refrain from giving preferential treatment to their friends and acquaintances, that Ministers of the Crown and their excluded staff must act in such a way that no one would consider it possible to have privileged access to staff or services, that they should not have a pecuniary interest that would conflict with their official duties and that they should not use information acquired in the performance of their official duties for their personal benefit. Mr. Speaker, these points, as you may have noticed are still relevant.

In the late sixties, the Public Service of Canada underwent many changes. The number of employees increased, the duties and specializations became more diversified, more technical and, of course, more complex. Many Government organizations were decentralized. The situation had to be reviewed because it had become important that Government employees be better informed about what was expected of them in their particular field. The Government acknowledged the situation and, in June 1973, the Prime Minister told the House, and I quote:

> An effort will be made by the Government to reconcile the very real desire of the people of Canada to have people of eminence in their service . . . with the important principle of avoiding a conflict of interest situation where such a person would serve his own personal interest in serving the public.

That was when the Government began drafting conflict of interest guidelines. As you recall, Mr. Speaker, guidelines for Ministers of the Crown and public servants were issued in December 1973, guidelines for people appointed by the Governor in Council were issued in November 1974, guidelines similar to those applicable to people appointed by the Governor in Council were issued in November 1975 for Lieutenant Governors and, finally, those guidelines were extended in 1978 to cover ambassadors, high commissioners and heads of missions. In November 1975, guidelines were issued for so-called excluded personnel, namely people working in a Minister's office who are not necessarily public servants. Finally, in January 1978, guidelines for any Government employee—Minister or public servant—were issued to avoid conflict of interest situations after their employment with the Government.

The purpose has always been the same, Mr. Speaker: to maintain the impartiality and the integrity of the Government. I am talking about the initiative of the Government in that field, and that leads me to mention a project which was begun not so long ago. I am referring, of course, to the task force on conflicts of interest set up last July at the request of the Prime Minister. Their mandate, Mr. Speaker, is to review the policies and rules which now govern the conduct of people who hold or have held public office. The mandate emphasizes that the study must take into consideration, first, the fact that those people must discharge their official duties so as to maintain public confidence towards the Government and, second—an important point raised by the Hon. Member for Halifax West, I am sure—the fact that the Government has to recruit highly qualified people with wide-ranging career profiles to look after public affairs and the administration of the country.

We all know, Mr. Speaker, that the problem of conflicts of interests is a complex one. What is important, and that is the difficulty, when faced with the task of developing standards of ethics for such a large body as the Public Service, is to strike a fair balance between, on the one hand, a set of rules that are strict enough to ensure integrity and public confidence and, on the other hand, a system which is reasonable enough so as not to discourage Canadians from entering the Public Service and which does not preclude the Government from hiring the qualified employees it needs to administer the nation's business and offer to the public high quality services which the public not only expects but, I add, which Canadians are also entitled to.

Mr. Speaker, I said earlier that conflicts of interests are a complex matter. One point to consider is the field of application. Is it more appropriate and more equitable to have only one set of rules for all employees, whatever their rank and function, or several for different groups?

I note that the proposal introduced by my colleague from Halifax West, and I refer to the definitions that are included in the measure, applies to any member of the Cabinet who holds a portfolio in the Government or who is a Minister of State, to any official of the Government or of any government agency, as well as to any person, other than an employee, who is a member of the governing board, council or body or who holds some office or official appointment in the Government or a Government agency.

In some cases, similarity of responsibilities could justify a single wide ranging system. However, in other cases, more particularized systems could be more effective in meeting our objectives.

Another thing I would like to mention, Mr. Speaker, is the method or means to be used to ensure that employees adhere to the standards of ethics advocated by the Government and to avoid that they be tempted to serve their personal interests before the interests of the public they are supposed to serve. While I recognize that there is some need to exercise control, I must admit that I have reservations as to the means to do so. In my view, an excessively rigid system would interfere with the obvious requirement for the Government to hire the qualified personnel that is needed, and indeed, it might possibly affect motivation and morale among existing staff. I repeat that we must aim for a system or mechanisms which provide a balance between the need to guarantee the integrity of the Government system and the necessity to attract and retain qualified and able people within our organization.

I believe that the whole issue of control and of the proper mechanisms to ensure this control must be reviewed. I am speaking about both the administrative mechanisms and the legal provisions which can be implemented. I regognize that it is not easy to determine what is the best way to protect the Government against disreputable practices used by employees, for instance. But still we must aim for a balanced position between legal provisions and administrative mechanisms, in other words, acts and regulations on the one hand, and procedures and guidelines on the other. If I had enough time, Mr. Speaker, I would explain the difference between an act and a regulation. However, I am running out of time and I would like to conclude my comments.

Mr. Speaker, a system should reflect the balance between rigidity and flexibility and between the general and the specific. If we look at the present system, we find that Government employees are already subject to several acts which dictate their behaviour and provide penalties for possible offences. I am thinking for instance about the provisions dealing with fraud and corruption in the Criminal Code and in other acts such as the Customs Act, the Financial Administration Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act, the Income Tax Act, the Public Service Employment Act, especially Section 33, as well as many other acts which for lack of time I cannot mention here. All of them provide guidelines and prescribe a certain behaviour for the public servants to whom they apply.

Mr. Speaker, I admit that these laws are useful because they undoubtedly discourage temptation and dishonesty and clarify possible penalties for certain offences. However, some of these laws are sometimes needlessly restrictive and do not always provide an effective answer to cover the various activities of an employee. We must look closely at practices generally viewed as disreputable and determine the most appropriate system to define prohibitions and penalties. Experience and research show that if penalties are too severe, people have a tendency to overlook reprehensible actions. However, if the system is too flexible, it may invite abuses. We must not forget that cut and dried situations are very scarce in our system. The difference between a serious offence and what is simply an act which calls for a reprimand is often difficult to determine. Any government must have at its disposal, based on the nature of the misbehaviour or the seriousness of the offence, several means for settling the issue, such as a reprimand, disciplinary action, suspension and even dismissal. These mechanisms are already provided for in our legislation. I am thinking about the Public Service Employment Act, which contains a clear and specific provision about conflicts of interest for public servants, and I have already mentioned others. I would like to thank the Hon. Member for having called the attention of the House to this question. At the end of his comments, he moved that the subject matter of the Bill be referred to a committee. I believe that, in due time, as parliamentarians, we should seriously consider this very important issue, and I thank the Hon. Member for having given me the opportunity to make these few comments.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate my friend and colleague, the Hon. Member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby) for introducing Bill C-208, an Act to provide for the control of conflicts of interest in government affairs. This is long overdue with regard to some of the examples of conflicts of interest we have witnessed on the government side over the years. When they are caught, they have no shame whatsoever and they carry on. They do not have the decency to resign.

I will give an example of a conflict. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Axworthy), the Member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry, recently transferred the auditing of Canada Ports Corporation from the Auditor General to a friend of his in Winnipeg, a Liberal hack. Of course we in Winnipeg have a great knowledge of ports so that is a great place for it to go. The Minister of Transport had no shame in transferring this nice little plum to a friend of his in Winnipeg who has been a Liberal official agent responsible for collecting funds donated to the Party and forwarding them to Ottawa since 1978.

That is an example of a conflict of interest. We should not be using our powers as Members of Parliament or Members of the Cabinet to look after our friends back home in this manner. This was of great concern to the Auditor General. The Auditor General said that such appointments should be perceived to be independent by all Canadians. There is nothing independent about giving the auditing work in the Canada Ports Corporation to a Liberal hack in Winnipeg, Mr. Speaker. That is a definite conflict.

Mr. Evans: Why do you not say those things out of the House?

Mr. Fisher: Go outside and say that.

Mr. Evans: I will sue you right up to your neck.

Mr. McKenzie: I hear a lot of yelling and shouting from Liberals in the House, Mr. Speaker. It is something along the lines that I am afraid to attack Liberals outside of the House. I have been attacking Liberals outside and inside the House for 20 years and I will continue to expose them at every opportunity.

Mr. Evans: You just attack individuals in the House.

Mr. McKenzie: I would also like to mention our former colleague in the House, the late Hon. Walter Baker. This was a matter of great concern to him.

Mr. Evans: You do not have the right to mention Walter Baker's name.

Mr. McKenzie: He introduced a Private Member's Bill to deal with conflict of interest. Mr. Baker stated that ex-Ministers and former public officials covered by the conduct code would face fines of up to $10,000 for each standard breach in a conflict of interest situation. Mr. Baker's Bill was a result of Opposition MPs' frustration over their inability to force the resignation of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) when he was involved in a special arrangement with another former Liberal Cabinet Minister. He was caught but did not have the honour and decency to resign. That is why we need this type of legislation as outlined by my friend from Halifax West and the late Walter Baker.

Mr. Baker said that there have to be legal sanctions governing the conduct of public officials because the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) voluntary conflict of interest guidelines were not working. We have seen ample evidence over the years that these voluntary guidelines simply were not working. We now need laws to deal with this.

Mr. Baker went on to point out that public life in Canada has been degraded by the revelations in the Coalgate deal. Another example, of course, is the Minister of Transport giving a contract to his friend in Winnipeg. That is why many Canadians are disgusted with Parliament and Members of Parliament and this type of conduct.

On March 15 I was proud and also saddened to see my friend and former colleague, the former Member for Scarborough East (Mr. Gilchrist), handing in his resignation because he was involved in a tax trial. He did the honourable thing in the parliamentary tradition, he resigned. I would like to read part of his statement. He stated: "It is my unshakeable belief that my constituents are entitled to the best possible representation without any shadow of doubt cast on the integrity of their Member of Parliament." That is an honourable statement and he did the honourable thing. We have the example of another Liberal Member who is involved in a tax trial, the Member for Burin-St. Georges (Mr. Simmons). We do not see him resigning his seat.

If you are involved in a tax trial, Mr. Speaker, you could be guilty. It is time consuming. You are going to have to spend time in court, with your lawyers and so forth. You are certainly not going to be able to fulfill your duties properly as a Member of Parliament. It was certainly refreshing to see someone with that sense of honour in the House setting an example for other Members. I was very pleased to see that a number of the media editorialized on this saying that it was an honourable day when we finally saw a Member resigning when he had a conflict of interest rather than hanging on as a person who has no shame whatsoever would do.

I hope that Government Members do not intend to talk this Bill out. It has a lot of merit. There have certainly been enough examples over the years to show why we need stricter guidelines and laws to deal with conflicts of interest after what we have observed many Members on the Liberal side doing over the past years.

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise very briefly to speak and give general support to Bill C-208, an Act to provide for the control of conflicts of interests in Government affairs. The explanatory notes states:

> The purpose of this bill is to ameliorate the control of conflicts of interest by Cabinet ministers and officers and employees of the Government of Canada by defining the circumstances under which a conflict of interest is deemed to arise and by providing a method of enforcement through the Deputy Registrar General and the Federal Court of Canada.

I do not intend to discuss this at length, but we have had a number of examples during the last year which have been referred to by the author of the Bill, which have demonstrated at least some inadequacies with the current informal guidelines as to the code of behaviour. I do not want to say anything more than that. However, I believe that there has been, amongst the public and many of the media, as well as Members on both sides of the House, some feeling that those informal guidelines are, at best, rather inadequate.

In earlier months some reference has been made by Members on the other side to the fact that after all these are only guidelines. At least one of the debates we had in the House on one of the subjects referred to, I believe it was the Coalgate affair, was enough to cause many of us to think we needed something that codified the area of conflict of interest a little more carefully and succinctly.

There may be some problems with the definition as proposed in Bill C-208 itself. My colleagues and I have no objection to the Bill and are interested in seeing it receive consideration in the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. We are pleased to give our support to take it at least that far.

There is one possible problem which I can see. We should take some care, for example, with respect to some new concepts of management which have been referred to even in the Throne Speech. For example, these involve labour representation on boards of directors and the concept of worker directors, which has been explored and experimented with in some jurisdictions across the country, particularly with regard to Crown corporations. This idea is in its infancy. I would be careful about Clause 3 which states:

> (1) For purposes of this Act, a conflict of interest in relation to Government affairs shall be deemed to occur when any of the following circumstances exists:
> (a) when an employee or official of the Government or of a Government agency seeks, holds, enjoys, undertakes or executes any contract, agreement or arrangement of any kind with the Government, any Government agency or Government officer for valuable consideration, or supplies or provides any goods, services, work or matter of any kind to the Government or a Government agency or a Government officer for valuable consideration.

It may be that such a clause, if presented without some caveat elsewhere in the Bill, might prevent us from exploring some of the new concepts in industrial relations which are being given some consideration. With that consideration, and there may certainly be others, I would like to see the Bill go to committee now so we could give some attention to that area just to ensure that we do not kill the possibility of an idea before it has been further explored.

With that comment, I am pleased to support the thrust of the Bill and I congratulate the Member for introducing it. I hope that by speaking briefly I can assist in seeing that it does get some further consideration.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am extremely interested in rising to speak to this particular Bill. I had a good deal of material that I wanted to go through.

The Hon. Member for Kootenay West (Mr. Kristiansen) just raised a rather interesting point. I think the Bill is so seriously flawed that there is no way we should send it to committee until it has been reconsidered by its author.

Let me give some examples. I am a Member who represents a large number of public servants. Probably 50 per cent of the people in my riding are public servants and a higher proportion are the families of public servants. The Hon. Member for Kootenay West just referred to Clause 3 of the Bill which states:

> For purposes of this Act, a conflict of interest in relation to Government affairs shall be deemed to occur when any of the following circumstances exist:

The Hon. Member just read Clause 3(1)(a). Let me read Clause 3(1)(b), which reads:

> (b) when an employee or official of the Government or of a Government agency sells, transfers, conveys, leases or otherwise disposes of any property or interest in property to the Government or a Government agency or a Government officer;

I can think of some situations where this would arise, especially in Ottawa where we have increased the presence of the federal Government. Let us suppose that a public servant owns some land in Ottawa or on the outskirts of Ottawa and the federal Government indicates its desire to build a federal office building there. It indicates to the individual that it wants to purchase that land. If the federal public servant sells the land, immediately a conflict of interest in relation to government affairs shall be deemed to have occurred.

What happens when this conflict of interest is deemed to occur? Let us move on to find out what heinous things can happen to the individual. Clause 4 of the Bill states:

Where a conflict of interest is deemed by Section 3 to occur, the Deputy Registrar General shall apply—

—not may apply—

—to a judge of the Federal Court of Canada seeking a declaration that a conflict of interest has occurred and an order directing the action to be taken by each person involved in the conflict of interest.

In situations where individuals in Ottawa who happen to work for the federal Government, whether they are secretaries, clerks or deputy ministers, were involved in a land transaction, a conflict of interest is deemed to have occurred and action shall be taken.

This is the kind of nonsensical overkill that does not make for good law in the country. It seems to me that we cannot deal with conflict of interest with laws and laws alone. We now have laws on the books that deal with conflict of interest. I believe we also have a very good set of conflict of interest guidelines that set general principles that should guide Members of Parliament and members of the Public Service in their behaviour in situations where the possibility of conflict of interest arises.

I would like to go through precisely what those guidelines are. They were brought down by a person whom I considered to be a great Canadian, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in 1973. Let me quote from these guidelines as follows:

1. These Guidelines may be cited as the Public Servants Conflict of Interest Guidelines.

They are currently in force and have been since they were brought in by this Government in 1973.

2. It is by no means sufficient for a person in a position of responsibility in the public service to act within the law. There is an obligation not simply to obey the law but to act in a manner so scrupulous that it will bear the closest public scrutiny.

Laws dealing with conflict of interest situations exist right now. These guidelines set general principles above that law. Guideline 2 continues:

In order that honesty and impartiality may be beyond doubt, public servants should not place themselves in a position where they are under obligation to any person who might benefit from special consideration or favour on their part or seek in any way to gain special treatment from them. Equally, a public servant should not have a pecuniary interest that could conflict in any manner with the discharge of his official duties.

That guideline is quite clear. I do not believe there is any need to make additions to it. The guidelines continue:

3. No conflict should exist or appear to exist between the private interests of public servants and their official duties. Upon appointment to office, public servants are expected to arrange their private affairs in a manner that will prevent conflicts of interest from arising.

4. Public servants should exercise care in the management of their private affairs so as not to benefit, or appear to benefit, from the use of information acquired during the course of their official duties, which information is not generally available to the public.

5. Public servants should not place themselves in a position where they could derive any direct or indirect benefit or interest from any government contracts over which they can influence decisions.

6. All public servants are expected to disclose to their superiors, in a manner to be notified, all business, commercial or financial interests where such interests might conceivably be construed as being in actual or potential conflict with their official duties.

7. Public servants should hold no outside office or employment that could place on them demands inconsistent with their official duties or call into question their capacity to perform those duties in an objective manner.

8. Public servants should not accord, in the performance of their official duties, preferential treatment to relatives or friends or to organizations in which they or their relatives of friends have an interest, financial or otherwise.

The key to this is that this is a set of guidelines that guide behaviour. They are a set of principles against which behaviour can be evaluated and measured. However, I suggest that measurement is, by definition, subjective. It will be a matter of degree and it will have to be evaluated within that context. I suggest that to try to codify the moral behaviour in a statute such as this is an impossible task. To bring such a law into being would make it extremely difficult to operate at all because this net is cast so broadly that it goes beyond a matter of whether a public servant could benefit from becoming involved in the decision-making about a certain situation. It deals with public servants involving themselves in any relationship with the Government whether or not they have an interest or the ability to affect the decisions that are being made. If the NCC, being a government agency, leased or purchased land held by a current public servant for a new park—and this could be a high probability in the City of Ottawa—the public servant would be in direct conflict of interest according to this law. The extent of the ludicrous nature of this particular law when we have adequate conflict of interest guidelines—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order, please.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 45 deemed to have been moved.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION—NON-PROFIT HOUSING—ALLOCATION SOUGHT FOR TORONTO AREA

Mr. Douglas Fisher (Mississauga North): Mr. Speaker, the other day I rose to ask the Minister responsible for housing his reactions to the recent Ontario decision to omit both the City of Toronto and Metropolitan Toronto from the 1984 allocations for public non-profit housing. I believe the Ontario Minister of Housing, Mr. Claude Bennett, is ignoring the traditional partnership which exists in the social housing area. He is attacking the most vulnerable people living in the Toronto region because of his actions. Furthermore, he is attacking the smooth operation of federal-provincial affairs in housing matters.

Let me look at those three areas and explain my charges to the House. First, social housing projects are a partnership. There are three main streams under this marvellous federal program: the co-operative stream handled by private citizens; the private non-profit stream handled by churches, associations and other private groups; and the one about which I am concerned, the public non-profit stream which is a partnership among federal, provincial and municipal governments.

The federal Government allocates a budget annually for public non-profit social housing. In Ontario this year that budget allows for the construction of 1,400 units. The provincial Government then takes those funds and divides them, presumably equally, across each province to each municipality. The municipalities then receive the funds and the unit allocations. The build the projects and they supervise and manage them into the future.

By and large this system has been successful. It is one of which we in Ottawa can be very proud. We have seen over 100,000 units built from coast to coast in the past four years under the General Social Housing Program. Regretfully Ontario under Claude Bennett has attacked the system financially in the past. By now ignoring the needs of the Metropolitan Toronto region he is attacking the people themselves.

Metro Toronto, together with the City of Toronto have over 5,000 applications on file from people who need to live in social housing projects. Canada's biggest urban area faces the prospect that it will not get one unit allocation to meet the needs of these 5,000 applications. This abuse by the Government of Ontario has hurt both the people and the facilities at the municipal level designed to serve them.

● (1805)

What kind of people am I talking about? They are single parents, disabled, pensioners, and low income families. Let me take an example from my own region. In Peel we have excellent facilities managed and built by the Peel Non-Profit Housing Corporation. One thousand seven hundred units have been built in this area between 1979 and 1983. Seven hundred and seventy-three of those units are within my own riding of Mississauga North. Two hundred and thirty units are specifically rent geared to income. Of the other 543, families generally must have incomes annually below $29,000 to be eligible to live there. We know today that in a city like Mississauga $29,000 annually is not a rich man's income. There are another 400 units currently under construction. One hundred will be specifically geared to income and 300 will be at market rents for moderate income people. These are the people the Government of Ontario is attacking by its neglect.

The other day when I asked my question, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. LeBlanc) who replied said:

—we recognize in the area of social housing that we must make a special effort to direct housing units to those most in need and who have been waiting the longest.

These are the people who are being overlooked by this gesture from Ontario. It is unconscionable.

Further, this action attacks the basic partnership between the federal and provincial governments which I described a moment ago. This attack had already taken place financially. In Peel's budget for 1984 $16 million is being allocated to this area. The Ontario Government is paying only 4 per cent of that figure. The federal government is paying 51 per cent. The tenants are paying 44 per cent. Now we have a new strain put on this partnership, the strain of ignoring the most populated city with the largest number of applications and with the greatest proven need.

I ask the Minister or his Parliamentary Secretary to object most strenuously and to point out the basic negligence and abuse that this move by Ontario represents.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I feel first of all that the Hon. Member should be praised for his dedication to the cause of social housing especially for medium and low income families.

I wish to reply to the question which the Hon. Member raised on March 15 concerning the allocation of funds for the construction of public non-profit housing units within Metro Toronto municipalities.

The Hon. Member is certainly aware that under federal-provincial agreements, the federal government allocates funds for social housing to the provinces which in turn are responsible for sharing these funds between their respective municipalities. To meet the criteria of the program, the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation allocates these funds to the provinces on the basis of their respective requirements for proper and affordable housing.

On this basis, the share of the funds earmarked for Metro Toronto municipalities should have been considerable. Unfortunately, the Ontario government seems to apply its own rules for setting up priorities and has decided to ignore the needs of that metropolitan area.

Mr. Speaker, the federal minister responsible for housing has asked CMHC officials to examine all 1984 proposals to determine priorities. He has also invited provincial representatives to carry out a similar study of the housing quotas allocated to them. As the minister himself indicated in reply to this question, the province of Ontario has ignored the needs of medium and low income families living in the Toronto area in not providing this urban centre with unit allocations.

Mr. Speaker, it is hard to believe that the province of Ontario is using this pressure tactics to force the federal Government to increase its housing unit allocations to meet the needs of that area. The province knows fully well that it takes quite some time to put together public non-profit social housing development packages within the various municipalities, and it is unfortunate that it ignored the housing needs of families and senior citizens when it decided two months ago to distribute the funds allocated by the federal Government.

EMPLOYMENT—ALLOCATION OF FUNDS TO NOVA SCOTIA RIDINGS. (B) AFFIRMATIVE ACTION PROGRAM FUNDING

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, a couple of months ago I raised a question in the Chamber with respect to the cutting off of funds which were allocated to a program which happened to be occurring in Dartmouth, though it was a metropolitan area program. It dealt with and related to affirmative action designed to assist women entering the work force and women desirous of re-entering the work force, once they had left it for one reason or another. The funding was cut off quite unilaterally, arbitrarily and suddenly.

Perhaps the funding of projects of this nature should be dealt with at arm's length but this program has particular significance because it dealt almost entirely with members of the black community. I am rather curious about why this would have happened at a particular point in time when funds were privately and secretly being made available to Liberal Members of Parliament for whatever projects they wanted.

At the same time, I was very curious and will continue to be curious in the weeks ahead about the decision process behind the decision of the Hon. Member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso (Mr. MacEachen), the distinguished senior Minister from Nova Scotia, to cause massive disruption in the lives of students attending the Nova Scotia Nautical Institute. He decided unilaterally that he wanted that institute to be located within his constituency in a place called Port Hawkesbury. I suspect he wanted it there because he will not receive the pipeline activity for his constituency which he thought he might receive this election year. Let us not deal with that but with the Nautical Institute.

The Nautical Institute has been located in Halifax for 112 years. Four thousand students pass through its doors annually. It is the principal and indeed only nautical institute of its kind for the private sector in Atlantic Canada. It is the place to which seamen, engineers, mates, mates seeking master's papers and all of those seamen who must have emergency training must go. It is located in Halifax because Halifax is the centre of marine activity in Atlantic Canada.

Halifax is the most active port in Atlantic Canada and it is the university centre for Atlantic Canada. To become a master seaman today, one must have an extraordinarily high level of knowledge of marine law. Dalhousie University is located in Halifax. To move the marine institute from Halifax to Port Hawkesbury would be to deny students access to that institution which offers the help they need.

Perhaps the Parliamentary Secretary can tell me why it was that the universities were not consulted, the shipping companies were not consulted and the officers of Bedford Institute of Oceanology which has exchange services were not consulted? Why were Fisheries and Oceans and other government Departments closely associated with the Nova Scotia Nautical Institute not consulted? Above all, why were the 4,000 students, 90 per cent of whom live within a half-hour's commuting distance of the school, not consulted? Does it not matter that a man spends two months at sea, comes home for the purpose of upgrading his certificate and is forced to move 200 miles away from his family, when in fact his livelihood keeps him away from his family? Why were the students not consulted? The students at the Nova Scotia Nautical Institute want answers to questions like that. Was there a quick fix?

• (1815)

Where was the Hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Regan)? Did he give up an $18 million project for a $5 million federal contribution toward a $50 million white elephant in the heart of an area already congested with traffic in the City of Halifax? Did he even know about it? Did he enter into a deal, a quid pro quo, so to speak? Talk about conflict of interest, Mr. Speaker.

Will the Parliamentary Secretary tell us why this matter cannot be suspended; why any further movement should not be taken until such time as the students, the teaching staff, the institution, the shipping community, and government departments are all consulted so a rational, sensible decision can be made? The institute must be replaced and renewed and it should be renewed in the metropolitan area of Halifax-Dartmouth somewhere, not on the Strait of Canso at Port Hawkesbury, depriving 90 per cent of the students daily access to their homes and families.

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it would be a pleasure to answer the question put by the Hon. Member but I am afraid there is some misunderstanding about it. The answer I have in front of me is to a question that the Hon. Member put to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Roberts) on February 23. That is not the question he put just now. I am afraid I do not have an answer for the question he just posed. The question listed for the late show, and which was submitted to the Department, was about a problem on February 23, not about the school and the students that the Hon. Member referred to. I will be very pleased to answer the question the Hon. Member just put by letter, but right now I will give the floor to another Member who has a question on the late show. Perhaps I can discuss this with my colleague.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): For the purpose of clarification, I should say that the question announced for discussion tonight by the Hon. Member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) was Allocation of funds to Nova Scotia ridings, Affirmative action program funding, and the reference is Hansard, February 23, 1984, pages 1669 to 1670.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Unfortunately there can be no point of order during the adjournment debate. I just put that on the record so that the matter might be clarified.

FORESTRY—NEGOTIATION OF FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL AGREEMENTS. (B) EXPENDITURE OF FUNDS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, on February 10 I put two questions to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) in the absence of the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Caccia) who is responsible for forestry. I asked:

> Can we have the commitment now from the Minister of Finance that the $5 million out of the $130 million that had been allocated will in fact be available—

That referred to the negotiations for a renewal of the Canada-B.C. forest subsidiary agreement. Initially, the federal Government had supposedly allocated some $52 million, to be matched by funds from the Province of British Columbia, for a $100 million plus campaign to begin to restock some of the 640,000 hectare backlog of non-satisfactorily restocked forest land in the Province. There has been a renewal of the existing agreement which, instead of providing for $52 million plus $52 million, provides for a total of $11 million being spent on that grave problem in the Province.

• (1820)

This is a missed opportunity, Mr. Speaker, which simply cries out for attention because, according to the federal Government's own reports, more than 30,000 direct jobs and 30,000 indirect jobs will be lost between the next 5 to 20 years in British Columbia alone. This will necessitate the probability of a massive financial bail-out of the entire Province of British Columbia, if we do not get started now on a massive reforestation project. It will be a disaster which is almost beyond comprehension to people like myself, the people I work with and the communities who depend on the forest industry for their very existence.

Another question I asked on that date of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde), in the absence of the Minister responsible for forestry, was whether he would give us some assurance that the moneys not spent from this year's allocation, because of the failure of the Province and the federal Government to reach agreements, will be added to whatever moneys might be planned for this coming fiscal year in order that we can save whatever little is left of the most important industry in this country. The Minister of Finance at that time answered that it would be given consideration.

Shortly thereafter, Mr. Speaker, we had the government estimates which showed that expenditures forecast for 1984-1985 for forestry, as compared to the expenditures forecast for 1983-1984, fell in total by some 61 per cent, from $115 million to almost $45 million. This is at a time when not only British Columbia, but almost every major forestry province across Canada, is crying out in anguish because the fall-down effect is going to begin hitting very soon. We will see community after community go the same way as the former British Columbia community of Ocean Falls. It was totally obliterated from the map because we simply have not done the job.

My colleagues and I realize, Mr. Speaker, that under our Constitution—and this Party played a part in strengthening that section—the prime responsibility and jurisdiction is with the Province. However, the fact is, by the Government's own report, that unless we begin now to expend that money, whether or not it is matched, we are going to have to bail out the Province of British Columbia and communities in other Provinces anyway. While I can understand the problems of the Government, we cannot afford to wait any longer.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the action of the Minister of the Environment in not attending the founding meeting of the Canadian Council of Forest Industries just a few days ago, which was held just a couple of blocks away from Parliament Hill, was absolutely abominable. The Minister said in a recent meeting in Vancouver with the professional forestries association that he would do anything possible to ensure the forestry industry's survival. Shortly after making that commitment in British Columbia—and he made the same commitment to my leader on February 13 in the House of Commons—he did not attend that very important meeting. We have been trying for 10 or 20 years to get representatives of the Canadian forestry industry into one group which could speak with one united voice to the federal Government yet the Minister could not even go that few blocks to the conference. I do not know if he was visiting with royalty or what he was doing, but he should have at least accorded that industry the recognition of its rightful place in Canada.

That industry, in terms of dollars coming into this country, is the most important industry we have. Some Members on that side of the House, Mr. Speaker, must get that message sunk in to their heads or we are all in for trouble in a few short years.

Mr. Denis Ethier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, having regard to the charge concerning the absence of the Minister at that conference, I wish to tell the Hon. Member that when the Minister is here he will reply to that, I am sure.

In answer to the Hon. Member's question with respect to forest renewal, the framework for forest renewal approved by the federal cabinet in 1982 spoke of increasing the federal contribution to forest renewal in Canada to $130 million annually by 1987, through a new generation of five-year federal-provincial forestry agreements. It was understood, however, that the $130 million figure represented a notional amount for which funding for each agreement would be sought on a case by case basis through submissions to cabinet. Although only notional amounts, some Provinces, including British Columbia, took it for granted that the figures mentioned in the framework paper had been approved. Such is not the case.

● (1825)

The Minister intends to put before his Cabinet colleagues federal-provincial agreements which would implement the forest renewal policy. Indeed, officials of the Canadian Forestry Service began negotiating such a deal with officials of the B.C. Ministry of Forests close to a year ago. As of January, 1984, it became obvious that it would not be possible to conclude any new agreement with B.C. which would allow us to launch a major forest renewal program before March 31. Since both the current intensive forest management agreement and the general development agreement expire on that date, the Minister agreed with provincial officials that an extension of the current agreement was the best course of action for now, thus avoiding a costly interruption of the federal-provincial co-operative forest management programs in British Columbia.

Earlier today the Minister tabled before Cabinet a proposal to obtain the $5.5 million required to carry the current agreement for one more year. A decision is expected momentarily and I do not foresee any difficulty in obtaining approval. This extension does not in any way preclude our reaching an agreement with British Columbia which would involve substantial levels of funding over a five-year period.

The proposal I just mentioned would see both Governments spend $11 million jointly this year, mainly on reforestation and silvicultural prescriptions as well as research and development. This would lay the groundwork for further initiatives to be undertaken with the Province and industry of British Columbia, within the framework of a new forest renewal agreement that could be implemented as of 1985-86.

I take this opportunity to remind the Hon. Member that this Government has steadily increased its financial support to forestry in B.C. over the past years. Through the ongoing research and development work of the Pacific Forest Research Centre, the current intensive forest management agreement, the UI/JC-Forest Sector Program and Co-operative Overseas Market Development Program, unique to B.C., we have brought federal expenditures in B.C. from $10 million in 1979-80 to $35 million in 1983-84, totalling over $112 million over the last five years. A few examples of this are, increased funding to the Faculty of Forestry at UBC, the upgrading of the Pacific Forest Research Centre in Victoria, and a current innovative study to develop an economic timber supply model for B.C.

Let me conclude by assuring Members of the House that this Government will maintain its commitment to the forest sector, in B.C. as well as in the rest of the country, as expressed in our policy on forest renewal.

VACANCY

SCARBOROUGH EAST—GORDON GILCHRIST BY RESIGNATION

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have the honour to inform the House that I have received a communication notifying me that a vacancy has occurred in the representation, namely, Gordon Gilchrist, Member for the electoral district of Scarborough East, by resignation. Accordingly, I have addressed my warrant to the Chief Electoral Officer for the issue of a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

INCOME TAX ACT

RELIEF SOUGHT FOR PARENTS SUPPORTING UNEMPLOYED OFFSPRING

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, we are all fully aware that we are living in very difficult times now, with the number of unemployed approaching the two million mark. The greatest percentage of unemployment is found among young men and women under the age of 25, many of whom have not even had the opportunity to find their first job. These young people are becoming more and more disillusioned with their lot in life and have practically lost hope of any future for themselves.

Because they cannot find work to support themselves, many of these young people who are over the age of 18 have no other choice but to live at home with and be fully supported by their parents. However, according to the Income Tax Act parents cannot claim these young people as dependants for income tax purposes. I believe that the Income Tax Act should be changed in order to accommodate this very important problem. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I call upon the Government to take the steps which are necessary to change the Income Tax Act in order to offer tax relief to those parents who are fully supporting their children who are 18 years of age and over and are unable to find employment in these very difficult economic times.

INDUSTRY

REFUSAL OF LAND GRANT TO BELL HELICOPTER BY QUEBEC GOVERNMENT

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, my statement is about the refusal on the part of the Commission de protection du territoire agricole to cede to Bell Helicopter at Mirabel a portion of land zoned as farm land.

Municipal authorities at Mirabel and federal Members from the Laval and Laurentian areas are becoming increasingly concerned that Bell Helicopter may decide not to locate at Mirabel. We are aware that the decision to have Bell Helicopter locate at Mirabel has led to numerous meetings and representations by local Members to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) and the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox).

We are convinced there is no justification for further delay in establishing Bell Helicopter at Mirabel, which would provide 3,000 jobs for the region in the high-tech field. We urge the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, Mr. Jean Garon, who was never in favour of the Mirabel project and has always oppposed plans for developing Mirabel, to make representations to Mr. René Lévesque so that we can ensure Bell Helicopter will be able to locate at Mirabel.

SPORTS

CALL FOR EXTENSION OF ASSISTANCE TO DEVELOPING ATHLETES

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Mr. Speaker, as a former Olympian I would like to take this opportunity to welcome to the nation's capital participants from nearly 30 countries in the World Figure Skating Championships. I am sure that the House joins me in wishing them good fortune and good sport. It is in this spirit of sportsmanship that I call upon the Government, and specifically upon the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport (Mr. Olivier), to extend athletic development fees, such as the ones provided to hockey, to other sports.

Using an example to explain this, Mr. Speaker, figure skaters in Canada are presently assisted financially through Sport Canada during their developing years, only to be plucked by foreign professional ice shows which in turn are not obligated to contribute toward that development.

This innovative system could be applied to numerous other sports, which in turn would help support amateur athletics in Canada while at the same time reducing the financial burden on the taxpayer.

INSOLVENCY ACT

DEMAND FOR EARLY PASSAGE

Mr. David Berger (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, recent events surrounding the Maislin bankruptcy settlement of unpaid employees' back salaries poignantly illustrate the immediate urgency for a new Bankruptcy Act providing wage protection for workers. When Parliament prorogued in December, 1983, the Finance Committee had started its hearings and there was an understanding that all Parties would move the Bill expeditiously to committee stage in the new Session. The Insolvency Act, now Bill C-17, has been ready and waiting for second reading, and the Finance Committee impatiently awaits its work.

Attempts have been made to accommodate our colleagues on the other side, and we have urged their continued co-operation. In response to their request, proposed amendments were submitted to them for study some four weeks ago. Ironically, it has been the New Democratic Party which has been obstructing all constructive efforts to move the Bill forward. In view of the vital significance of this Bill, and in view of its long and tortuous legislative history, I call upon members of the New Democratic Party and members of the Official Opposition to exert all possible efforts to bring the Bill to immediate second reading with speedy passage to committee stage.

RAILWAYS

FUTURE OF WINNIPEGOSIS SUBDIVISION

Mr. Laverne Lewycky (Dauphin-Swan River): Mr. Speaker, all those concerned with the importance of retaining the Winnipegosis subdivision welcomed the January 11, 1984, announcement made by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Axworthy), which indicated that he was recommending to Cabinet the retention of 10 miles of CN track between Sifton and Fork River, Manitoba. As the Minister stated: "Producers delivering to this point would face unreasonable extra hauls if their point was abandoned."

• (1410)

I welcome the Minister's letter of February 28 which stated that he was seeking to have this portion rehabilitated and added to the basic network. There is concern, however, over the fact that two months have elapsed and no Cabinet decision has been announced, possibly due to the present leadership race.

I would therefore urge the Government to act immediately to add the Winnipegosis subdivision to the permanent rail network. I also call upon the Minister of Transport to review the Oakland and Inwood subdivisions, for in those cases also there exists an urgent need for retention. The Amaranth Rail Retention Committee has documented the negative impact that rail line abandonment on the Oakland subdivision would have on that area. It is important that the Oakland subdivision be added to the permanent network. Similarly, the Inwood subdivision must be retained.

BUDGET

PROVISIONS CONCERNING ELDERLY

Mr. Carlo Rossi (Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, Canadians across this beautiful country of ours were very interested in what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) had to say in his Budget on February 15 of this year.

Pensioners were particularly well served by the Minister's announcement that the guaranteed income supplement will be increased by $25 as of July 1 and by another $25 on December 25 of this year. This $50 increase in the guaranteed income supplement means that the Government will be paying an additional $460 million to help pensioners.

Mr. Speaker, although the Opposition has preferred to ignore the attractive provisions of the last Budget, I can assure you that all Canadians, and especially the people in my riding of Bourassa, applaud these new measures which are a way of expressing the gratitude we owe our elders.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ATTITUDE OF CIDA REGARDING SUCO FUNDS

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of SUCO representatives, I got in touch with the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) to get answers to certain questions, including this one: How does he explain that the Canadian Organization for Solidarity and Development already receives funds from CIDA, although it has been in existence for only a few months and several of its administrators are directly responsible for SUCO's huge deficit of the last fiscal year?

Why does CIDA reject the position of the Canadian Council for International Cooperation, the Quebec Association of International Cooperation Organizations and many other non-government organizations in favour of negotiated solutions? And why does CIDA refuse to accept in the case of SUCO certain solutions which in the past were acceptable in the case of other non-government organizations?

Since funds will no longer be allocated to SUCO as of April 1, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of Quebecers directly involved, I am asking the Minister to give me precise answers to precise questions.

Mr. Gimaïel: If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw attention to the presence in the gallery of several young Canadians who are members of the Youth Forum—

VETERANS AFFAIRS

DELAYS IN DELIVERY OF PENSION AND ALLOWANCE CHEQUES

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, in World War I, World War II, and during the Korean conflict, hundreds of thousands of Canadians came forward to serve their country and were prepared to give their lives to ensure that future generations of Canadians would live in freedom and peace in a democratic country. Today, many veterans, many veterans' widows, and many veterans' families depend solely on the pensions and allowances provided by the Department of Veterans Affairs. These pensions and allowances are inadequate to meet their financial needs satisfactorily, and in parts of British Columbia these inadequate cheques often arrive many days late. For many individuals and their families this results in their not having sufficient funds to purchase food. It also forces veterans to stand in line-ups at local food banks, and to use welfare food vouchers.

These humiliating experiences are inexcusable. Our war veterans, their widows and their families, deserve much better. I urge the Minister for Veterans Affairs to take steps immediately so that those who were prepared to die for their country are able to live out their lives in dignity. They should be provided with a pension adequate to meet their needs, and the Minister should ensure that their cheques are mailed to arrive on time.

MARINE TRANSPORT

CALL FOR IMPROVED ARCTIC NAVIGATION SYSTEMS

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, yearly the volume of shipping in Canadian Arctic waters increases, to the extent that it has now become commonplace. Merchant vessels and specialized offshore oil and gas explanatory equipment ply the waters, and we can look forward to the day when the Northwest Passage will be a well established and viable international trade route. To encourage these developments and ensure safety to mariners, the Government of Canada should continue to promote more detailed hydrographic surveys, improved weather forecasting and ice reconnaissance, together with better electronic navigation systems.

The Canadian Coast Guard is to be complimented on its desire to increase Arctic ship safety, and on its plan to acquire icebreakers designed to Arctic specifications. The administration of the Coast Guard should be changed in due course to establish a northern region with headquarters in the North, in order to eliminate the problems caused by the present fractionalization of jurisdiction in the Arctic by the existing regional offices.

Furthermore, we need improved international co-operation between Canada, the United States, and Denmark, the states which border the Arctic Ocean and Northwest Passage.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

SMALL BUSINESS

EFFECT OF INCREASED INTEREST RATES ON JOB-CREATION POTENTIAL

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Yesterday in the House the Minister said in reply to my colleague, the Hon. Member for Halton, and I quote from page 2240 of Hansard:

> For us the small business sector is the most important element in terms of job creation. We have shown our determination to support it with the measures in the Budgets of last April and last February.

I can agree with the Minister on that, Mr. Speaker. Two-thirds of the jobs in this country are created by the small business sector. But how does the Minister expect the small business sector to expand and create new jobs when, in the Minister's own estimation, interest rates will continue to go up?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if my friend checks what I said in the House yesterday, he will see that I have not indicated that interest rates will continue to go up. I have indicated that, if interest rates in the United States increase, it will be very difficult for Canada to keep interest rates lower than those in the United States for any extended period.

I have not forecast continuing increases in interest rates. The evolution of the situation will very much depend also on what will happen in the United States over the next few weeks and months.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER ACT TO OFFSET POSSIBLE INTEREST RATE INCREASES

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, if interest rates continue to expand—and this is not strictly hypothetical—this will more than offset what little there was in the last two Budgets to provide incentives to the small business sector to expand. In view of the fact that unemployment in this country continues to increase, whereas in the United States it continues to go down, what steps does the Minister propose to take, what leadership does he intend to provide, to offset high interest rates and to allow the small business sector to expand to provide jobs for the million and a half people in this country who are in danger of being left behind?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my friend starts his question by saying "if" interest rates continue to increase. That is obviously a hypothetical question, and we will have to see whether or not it is verified over the next few weeks and months. Interest rates have gone up half a point—

Mr. Blenkarn: They have gone up a whole point in the last three weeks.

Mr. Lalonde: If they had gone down half a point I do not think my friend would have said that this was a fantastic factor for growth and that all our problems will be resolved. On the other hand, because interest rates have gone up half a point, there is no reason to believe the recovery has come to a halt or that we will know a recession.

There are movements in interest rates, and we are trying to keep those movements to the minimum on the upward side. I hope that the situation in the United States will stabilize without generating further increases in interest rates in that country. If that were to be the case, we would be in a position to have no further increases in our country either.

As far as the Hon. Member's reference to unemployment is concerned, obviously we are very concerned about the number of unemployed in our country. However, I want to remind my friend again that employment has also increased quite significantly in our country. As of last month we have created 54,000 new jobs. I hope we will continue to do so over the next several months.

COMPARISON WITH UNITED STATES ECONOMIC TRENDS

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, the dollar continues to hover around 78 cents. The Minister knows in that kind of scenario interest rates have to go up.

● (1420)

Since the Minister continues to compare our situation with that of the U.S., can he explain how it is in the last three months unemployment in Canada continued to increase, whereas in the U.S. it continues to decline? It is now below 8 per cent. The U.S. employment rate is about 2.8 per cent ahead of where it was when the recession started, and we are 1.3 per cent behind. Can the Minister explain why we continue to fall behind and the U.S. continues to move ahead?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, again my friend forgets to mention that employment has also increased quite significantly in Canada in the last several months, particularly in the last month. As I said, it has increased by 54,000 new jobs. As far as industrial production is concerned, my friend makes a very selective choice of statistics. For example, in The Economist of March 17 there is reference to changes in the annual rate of industrial production. In Canada it is plus 13 per cent; in the United States it is plus 9.9 per cent. There are statistics which show there is faster growth in the U.S. than in Canada and in other areas there is faster growth in Canada than in the U.S., as in industrial production.

FINANCE

INTEREST RATES—OPTIONS INQUIRY

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, with all the data out today there is no question that the Canadian economy is growing less quickly than that of the U.S. Some 50,000 jobs have been created in Canada as against 2.7 million in the U.S.—not a very good performance.

This morning Mr. Feldstein, chairman of the U.S. Council of Economic Advisers, said that higher interest rates are a natural consequence of the much stronger U.S. economy. Last week Governor Bouey said there is no domestic reason for higher interest rates in Canada. Yesterday the Minister said if interest rates go up in the U.S. we are going to follow in lock-step. Since the Minister's Budget in no way anticipated the higher interest rates, would he let the Canadian people know the options open to us if in fact interest rates in the U.S. continue upwards the way they have over the past few weeks?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member refers to what Governor Bouey said, that there are no domestic reasons for the rate increases we have known. He went on to explain the external reasons for the increases we have known. If my friend can explain to me how we can have a situation in Canada where people who are saving will get, let us say, 9 per cent, but 11 per cent in the U.S., and why they would keep their savings in Canada rather than the U.S., then he will have the answer to his own question.

As long as we have a situation where our economies are so interdependent, and where there is freedom of movement in capital markets, he will realize we must have competitive interest rates in Canada if we want to keep investment and growth in this country. Even the Conservatives would be the first ones to ship their money to the U.S. if they could get a higher return.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: I am sure he knows that.

SIZE OF DEFICIT—EFFECT ON POLICY FLEXIBILITY

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Minister has indicated by his response that his hands are tied. He has no other option, no independence of action.

If the deficit in Canada were much lower than it is today, would he have more flexibility and independence of action? In other words, interest rates would be lower than they are today and he would have room within his Budget either to decrease taxes or direct specific funding toward those people who are being hurt by higher interest rates. Would he have that increased flexibility?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have no trouble answering the Hon. Member. The answer is no. There is no indication that if our deficit were lower than it is at the present time, interest rates would be lower as well, for the simple reason, and I repeat, that our interest rates are very closely linked to those prevailing in the United States. Again, we must keep our interest rates competitive if we are to keep investment and money in Canada. This has no connection with the present level of the deficit in Canada. The Hon. Member knows that in spite of the deficit we have now, there is no pressure on financial markets inside Canada, or, as the Governor of the Bank of Canada said, there are no domestic reasons that would justify an increase in the interest rates. The reasons are external, and they are particularly linked to what is happening in the United States.

GOVERNMENT'S INTEREST RATE POLICY

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance and it is on the same subject as the previous question. A minute ago the Minister was once again linking growth in the Canadian economy with his high interest rate policy. This is the same argument which the Government made a couple of years ago for its high interest rate policy then. Instead of having growth we had a record number of business bankruptcies, a record number of Canadians losing their homes, and the highest debt load for farmers in any period since the Great Depression. That is the kind of growth we had with his high interest rate policy.

Since we had all these negative effects in the past few years from a high interest rate policy which was undertaken not that long ago, why does the Minister think things will be any different now? Why does he think things will get better instead of worse with this high interest rate policy? Everyone in the country, except the Minister, knows very well that this will not be the case.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Government does not have a high interest rate policy. The Government's policy is to keep interest rates in Canada as low as possible. In fact, during the last two years, we succeeded in eliminating the gap between interest rates in Canada and the United States. The Hon. Member will recall that there was a difference of up to 5 per cent, when interest rates in Canada were 4 to 5 per cent higher than they were in the United States. We have succeeded in eliminating this gap. We have been able to bring about a substantial decrease in interest rates in Canada, but I am sure my hon. colleague will admit that if interest rates in Canada are lower than they are in the United States, even the most dogmatic members of the New Democratic Party will be the first to move their funds to the United States where they can get a better rate and a better return on their investment. We are in a situation where we remain competitive with the American market, and I am referring to both the financial and other markets. That is the Government's policy. We are not out to have high interest rates. Our policy is to bring down inflation, to increase growth, to reduce unemployment and to have the lowest possible interest rates compatible with our North American context.

[English]

EFFECT OF HIGH INTEREST RATES ON FARMERS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister himself said just over a week ago, the reality is that if we let our dollar assume a more realistic level instead of imposing high interest rates on Canadians who cannot afford it, we would have increases in the number of jobs in Canada because we would increase our exports. That is the reality.

Apart from the job implication itself, in the past couple of weeks, because of the Government's high interest rate policy, farmers on typical farms have experienced increases of $3,000 in their costs this year. These increased costs to the farmer will result in increased profits for the banks. Why is the Government continuing to favour a high interest rate policy, which means more profits for the banks and more bankruptcies for Canadian farmers?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is rather difficult to answer the Hon. Member's question because it is based on a false premise, namely that the Government has a high interest rate policy. I spent several minutes after the Hon. Member's first question explaining that this was not the Government's policy—anything but. Our policy in Canada is to have the lowest possible interest rates in this country. However, we are also interested in a degree of stability in prices and in our economy, and we do not want a resurgence of the inflation we experienced at the beginning of the eighties, which brought us into our recent recession.

Therefore, the Government's policy is not aimed at keeping interest rates high, as the Hon. Member is alleging. As far as his allegation regarding bank profits is concerned, again I would say he is mistaken, because there is no guarantee that increased interest rates will necessarily be reflected in increased profits, since the banks will have to pay more on their own deposits. Everything depends on the margin between the two.

[English]

MINISTER'S POSITION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, the Minister knows that the spreads have been at record levels. The amount that the banks are charging for loans, compared to what they are paying depositors, cause them to reap record level profits in Canada. For example, the Toronto Dominion Bank profits are up 33.6 per cent; Canadian Imperial Bank, 59.8 per cent; the Bank of Nova Scotia had a profit increase of 66 per cent last year, and then there is the poor Royal Bank with a profit increase of 130 per cent in Canada last year.

Why is the Minister favouring a high interest rate policy that can only mean fewer jobs in the Canadian economy, increased pressure on mortgage holders, and can only increase the debt burden of the farmers? Why does he continue a policy that does what Governor Bouey and the banks want, instead of what the ordinary people of this country would like?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, again my hon. friend seems to be selective. He might have added to his list the profits made by the credit unions, co-ops and caisses populaires in the last year. He might have mentioned that indeed these have known increases in profits, and for a very good reason. The increase in profits must be looked at in terms of from where you start. My friend knows that in the last few years financial institutions have been in serious difficulty in this country and that they are recovering from a period when they have known serious difficulty.

The Member says again that the Government is favouring a high interest rate policy. I told him twice in French that this is not the policy of the Government. I said that in English in response to the Conservative question before, I have to give him the same answer in English, that the Government does not have a high interest rate policy.

AIRPORTS

MIRABEL INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT OPERATING LOSSES

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In a recent interview with The New York Times, the Minister complained about the extravagance of Canada's airport system resulting in the continuing heavy losses in the Airport Revolving Fund. Since the system is plagued by the continuing heavy losses in the operation of Mirabel International Airport, for which the current estimates indicate $48 million in this particular year, what plans, if any, is he contemplating or prepared to undertake to reduce this loss at Mirabel which impairs the total Airport Revolving Fund?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, first I would remind the Member for Vegreville that, as he knows, we are presently engaged in a major review of airline policy. The purpose of that is to generate a much broader range of competitive forces in the airline industry, and from that acquire a stronger sense of growth. I think that would have a very important and beneficial effect for an airport like Mirabel and other airports that are underutilized.

The answer to many of our economic problems is to generate more growth and activity, and to give a greater opportunity for the airline industry to provide consumer choices and options. That is a very clear message.

In addition, we have specific initiatives prescribed for Mirabel. We have a report that promotes the development of a new corporation that would undertake marketing for the area. We are selling off certain of the lands, and we are looking at other options for Mirabel and other airports that would give an incentive and added attraction to provide more airport activity. I think we are trying to make a better and much more effective use of the facilities that we now have.

Mr. Mazankowski: The Minister is saying that he is going to propose another series of studies.

REQUEST FOR MINISTERIAL ACTION

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, given the fact that the burden of those costs of the operation and maintenance of Canada's airport system, which the Minister referred to in his interview as containing many Taj Mahals, falls directly upon the consumer, and since the Minister is engaged in a campaign to deregulate, with the expectation that air fares will come down, what specific action will he take to reduce the burden of costs which would provide cheaper air fares to the consuming public? He has to do more than simply another study.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the Hon. Member. Of course more studies will not be the answer. But what we are engaged in at the present time is a responsible series of public hearings so that a wide variety of Canadians from industry and consumer groups can present their points of view. Second, we are also engaged in working internally on how we can reduce costs throughout our system. I would remind the Hon. Member that the primary and critical ingredient to provide for the better utilization of our airports is to get more growth, activity, and action in our airline industry. That means giving the consumers a better choice. That is what we intend to do.

PENITENTIARIES

ARCHAMBAULT RIOT AFTERMATH—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Solicitor General. I believe that Canadians have had a feeling of shock, almost revulsion, caused by disclosure of the Amnesty International report with respect to the Archambault riot, which concluded that there exists at least a reasonable ground to believe that there was torture, or other cruel and inhuman or degrading treatment of prisoners after the July 25, 1982, incident.

Canadians have been under the impression that this only occurs in countries where tyranny reigns, or in some banana republic. How can the Minister say that there has been no torture, no other cruel and inhuman or degrading treatment within the federal institution, Archambault, when he is still waiting for his own in-house report? If he has nothing to hide, why does he not proceed with an open inquiry, a judicial inquiry which will be open to the public, so that they can see precisely what is going on in our federal institutions?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I indicated that, with the evidence that I had, and I, of course, followed the matter very closely and examined every shred of possible evidence of extreme incidents of torture which were alleged, I was not convinced by them.

I also took account of the fact, and I would ask the Hon. Member to take account of this as well, that the inmates in Canada's federal penitentiaries are not like the inmates in some tyrannical country or banana republic as he mentioned. They have very strong available recourses. They have the right to sue the Solicitor General and the Correctional Service of Canada. I encouraged them, week after week, if they had allegations of the sort they were making, to take that course. After all, there are a number of lawsuits outstanding right now against the Correctional Service of Canada, against the Solicitor General, that prove that the inmates do have that available recourse.

The fact is that they have not done so. The fact is that these allegations have become retroactively more and more serious. At the beginning, shortly after the incidents when lawyers first began making statements on behalf of their client inmates, no suggestion at all was made of the kinds of serious incidents that were alleged to the investigators of Amnesty International.

These are all the reasons why I prefer to encourage the inmates to proceed as I have indicated, and why I continue to believe that a public, open judicial inquiry would not be appropriate.

Amnesty International asked for a "full, independent, and impartial investigation". The correctional investigator is an officer who is qualified to undertake such an investigation, and he is doing so.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: That will come as news to Amnesty International.

INMATES' ACCESS TO DRUGS

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Today the coroner for eastern Ontario disclosed a recent report in which he said security in the prisons is so loose and correctional employees feel so impotent that they cannot prevent drug abuse within the prison system, and that this has led to a substantial increased degree of murders and assaults within the institutions.

What is going on within the institutions when inmates apparently have unlimited access to marijuana, hashish, valium, home made booze, and a number of other drugs? Are these institutions out of control? What does the Minister propose to do to stem this tide of illicit drugs within, of all places, federal penal institutions?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, we live in a drug-infested society. It should not be surprising to Members to find that an institution like a correctional institution, a federal penitentiary, has very serious limitations on the degree to which entry of drugs can be prevented. Hundreds of people visit these institutions every week. Dozens of the inmates are out in the street for periods of time during the week. In spite of that, a high degree of control is maintained, and the drug problems which I can see do exist in the institutions are controlled as much as possible.

I read the report with a lot of interest. It is worth reading. I think a broader perspective needs to be taken before changes in policy can really be adopted. To move to a system that would have the amount of repression, investigation, and inspection that is called for in that report would raise its own problems. I think I would want to give a lot of account to the kinds of problems that would result from extreme measures of search and isolation of inmates, which are the recommendations in that report, and what the consequences would be before moving from a more balanced position than the one we presently have.

I am interested to have the Amnesty International report on the one hand, which finds repression in our institution, or allegations of it, and then this report on the other hand which says we are too soft on inmates. The policy that we try to follow is somewhere between the two.

PENITENTIARIES

ARCHAMBAULT INSTITUTION—AMNESTY INTERNATIONAL'S CALL FOR INDEPENDENT INVESTIGATION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. The report issued yesterday by Amnesty International showing that there are reasonable grounds to believe that prison inmates in Archambault had tear gas sprayed into their mouths, were burned on their flesh with lighted cigarettes, were severely beaten, and were the victims of water torture, surely represents the kind of activity which is condoned in repressive banana republics and not here in Canada.

Given the fact that the Amnesty International report calls for a full, independent, impartial inquiry, not a perceived whitewash by a government employee, paid by the Government of Canada, reporting to the Solicitor General directly, when will the Minister finally live up to his obligations and accept this essential recommendation of Amnesty International and order a full, public, judicial inquiry into these shocking allegations?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the qualifications of a public inquiry and a judicial inquiry do not appear in the Amnesty International recommendations. They were omitted. What appears here is a "full, independent, and impartial investigation".

Mr. Nielsen: How can the investigator be independent?

Mr. Kaplan: This House knows well the mandate of the correctional investigator. He was established pursuant to a recommendation of a parliamentary committee, and it was a unanimous recommendation of all Parties that that individual be given those authorities. He was given those authorities. He is exercising those authorities. The Hon. Member is criticizing the report and undermining it before it is even written.

I have undertaken to make that report public as soon as I get it. I will honour that commitment and make the report public when I get it. I think if the Member is wanting now to lay a foundation for attacking the credibility of the report, he should at least, in fairness to the correctional investigator, wait to see it.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, if the Minister fails to act on this unprecedented Amnesty report, he will certainly bring international shame to Canada, and in particular to his Government.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, considering the outright rejection of the response to those very serious accusations, why did the Minister refuse to make a clear and unequivocal statement, as recommended by Amnesty International, against any kind of torture and inhuman treatment in prisons throughout Canada?

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, it is because, in that respect, our laws, our Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and the guidelines issued by the Commissioner of the Correctional Service are already clear enough to warn Canadians and establish the position of the Government and Canadians against this kind of behaviour. There is no need to tell a group of professionals such as correctional officers in our institutions that they must not resort to torture.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR DETAILS REGARDING RETAIL OUTLETS

Mr. Henri Tousignant (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for the Canada Post Corporation. Could he tell the House just what the intentions of the Canada Post Corporation are with respect to its grand project to turn itself into retail outlets, thus competing unfairly with small businesses and merchants that must keep inventories? In addition, could the Minister tell us as well whether Canada Post has given him the names of the shareholders of that company, which I refrain from naming to avoid publicity, but which is now on a honeymoon with the Canada Post Corporation?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Labour): Obviously, Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is mistaken if he thinks that the Canada Post Corporation has become retail outlets. The fact is that Canada Post is responsible for delivering both letters and parcels, and the project mentioned by the Hon. Member is a pilot project launched in a few regions of Canada to give better service to the clients of certain companies. That is part of the general responsibilities of Canada Post to deliver mail rapidly.

However, I can tell the Hon. Member that, as a result of representations made by him and some of his colleagues on the Government benches, the President of the Canada Post Corporation has assured me that he would reconsider the question and discuss with Canada Post customers the best way to correct the situation.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

MINISTER'S POSITION

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, if I could take his attention away from his running mate, the Minister of Justice.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Carney: My question deals with the Minister's statement that he has no problems with the national energy policy which his Government introduced. Could the Minister tell this House what elements of the National Energy Program cause him no problem? Is it the loss of 35,000 jobs, or the increase in oil imports, which his own Department estimates? Or possibly is it the $8.1 billion in PIP grants that he is paying oil companies to drill dry holes? Could he tell us why he is so satisfied with these accomplishments?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think the energy policy that was put in place had some goals that are being met. The Canadian content of the industry is increasing every day. Of course we have become self-sufficient. We produce more oil than we consume now. The policy is on target. There was a big increase last year in the completion of wells, new wells being drilled and so on. I am amazed after being the critic of my Department for a year and now I am in the race that the Hon. Member dares to get up to ask some questions. The Conservatives have not produced anything. Their Leader gave a speech in Calgary. Two days after that—

Mr. Nielsen: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Hon. Member for Vancouver Centre is recognized for a supplementary question.

PETRO-CANADA

OIL RIG EXPENDITURES

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. He will find, if he checks Hansard, that the last three times I raised energy issues in this House he was not in the House.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Carney: The Minister should be aware that Canadian taxpayers—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An Hon. Member: More.

Miss Carney: Mr. Speaker, do I have the floor?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Carney: The Minister should be aware that Canadian taxpayers are paying about $300,000 a day, for a total of an estimated $61 million, for an offshore rig half owned by Petro-Canada. It is sitting in port for repairs. Considering that we have such high unemployment in this country, can the Minister explain why Canadian taxpayers should pay for a rig that is not working?

• (1450)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member just said that the rig needs repair. There is nothing mechanical that does not sometimes need repair.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: When I think about the energy policy of the Opposition, I see that it has been under repair for years.

I can tell the Hon. Member that there was an increase in Saskatchewan of 127 per cent of wells completed in the last year. There was an increase in Alberta as well of the number of wells. Everything is much better than a year ago. We are making progress in the field of energy, but I know that the Opposition cannot make up its mind. The Opposition wants to abolish the back-in in our policy. The Premier of Nova Scotia, Mr. Buchanan, wants me to introduce a Bill right now because he wants the back-in, and he does not trust the Opposition should they become the Government.

COSTS OF CANADA LANDS EXPLORATION

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I would point out that it is the national energy policy that needs repair. How does the Minister justify spending taxpayers' dollars, approximately $12 billion by 1986, on high-risk exploration on Canada Lands when the results to date are poor? The same $12 billion directed to oil sands mining would create thousands of jobs. The technology is in place. The oil is there. We know it is there.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it looks like the Hon. Member is ready to take over from the first critic who asked me a few questions. Helping industries carry out exploration in Canada's North and off the coasts of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia is of fundamental importance to Canada because we must know what our resources are and how much our petroleum and natural gas reserves are worth, if we are to ensure self-sufficiency and security of supply. Under our system, we are providing exploration incentives rather than tax incentives, for the simple reason that we want to encourage our Canadian industry to participate in the development of our resources. If the opposition were to form the Government, Canada's entire oil industry would be given back to the Americans. Our policy is to provide for Canadian participation in Canada's oil and gas industry.

[English]

OIL SANDS POTENTIAL

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, surely the Minister recognizes that it is not prudent to be spending billions of dollars of taxpayers' money on high-risk exploration when in Canada we have the oil sands, with known quantities of oil, the largest single reserve in the world.

The Minister avoided my question. How does he justify spending billions on inefficient exploration, high-risk exploration at high cost, when the same amount of dollars invested in the oil sands would create thousands of jobs across this country?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, if the Hon. Member were aware of the facts, he would know that in the last few months I have made agreements with the provinces and with industry for heavy oil projects in western Canada, and upgrading in Saskatchewan. For example, the Cold Lake project in the Hon. Member's riding is going ahead with Imperial Oil. There is the BP and Petro-Canada project at Wolf Lake. Another project by Amoco was announced a few weeks ago. Many programs are going ahead in the development of heavy oil and tar sands in western Canada. I am consulting and collaborating with the provincial Governments. We are making a lot of progress. It is possible to develop that kind of resource in western Canada and, at the same time, ensure that there is development in northern Canada, and in the eastern provinces where more activity is needed than anywhere else in the country.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

HONDURAS—REFUSAL TO SIGN UNITED NATIONS AGREEMENT ON REFUGEES

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I would like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. Honduras, which the Secretary of State for External Affairs will visit next month, has refused to sign the United Nations Agreement on Refugees. It has detained 7,000 or 8,000 El Salvadoran refugees in a detention camp in Colmoncagua, where they are entirely supported by the United Nations and relief agencies, but harassed by the Honduran military.

Remembering that the U.S. and Honduran armies are poised to invade El Salvador through that same area, will the Prime Minister ask his Minister to request the Honduran Government to sign the UN agreement for the protection of refugees, and to give the El Salvadoran refugees the same freedom as it gives Nicaraguan refugees in Honduras, and forbid the use of Honduras as a base for the U.S. lead invasion of El Salvador?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has requested an intervention with a foreign Government in relation to a matter that is within its jurisdiction. Canada's position in relation to the encouragement of proper treatment for refugees is well known. No country has been more open and generous in receiving political refugees than has Canada. That continues to be our position.

PLAN TO RELOCATE REFUGEES

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Prime Minister is with regard to an international obligation of Honduras to sign the agreement on refugees. It is an international obligation to give good treatment to them and not to promote war with its neighbour. Considering that the Roman Catholic Church has supported the refugees in refusing to be relocated out of their camp, will the Prime Minister ask his Minister to ask the Honduran Government not to go ahead with its plan of forced relocation, and to consult with the church and the United Nations about the refugees' request to be relocated, if necessary, to a third country, or to be repatriated to El Salvador under United Nations protection?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member will be aware that persons become political refugees eligible to apply for acceptance into Canada and many other countries when they have left their country of origin and are located in refugee status in another country. People who are in that position in Honduras, who have come from Nicaragua or El Salvador, are in a position to make application to Canada or to other countries for consideration of their case. With reference to decisions taken by the Honduras Government within its own jurisdiction, the Hon. Member will realize that the Government of Canada cannot interfere in those domestic decisions.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

ALLEGED TRANSFORMATION TO RETAIL OUTLETS

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for the Canada Post Corporation.

The Minister seems to be well aware of the objections to which have given rise the Department of Labour's plans to transform post offices into something like general stores. I have seen, for instance, postal employees busy filling out orders while people who wanted to buy stamps had to wait in line.

In view of these circumstances, as the Minister is well aware of the main purpose of the Canada Post Corporation, which is to provide the best service possible, I would like to ask him, first, whether he was serious when he said that the Corporation would reassess its plans, and second whether he has received any representations with regard to this brand of competition which, at least in our opinion, cannot but shock the private sector?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, the President of the Corporation has assured me that he would reconsider these plans because of the representations he has received. The Canada Post Corporation has signed a contract with one of its customers to be able to serve it better.

What the Canada Post Corporation did was to carry out a pilot project in about ten Canadian municipalities for a limited period of time to see how it could, first, better serve the public, second, provide a better service to one of its regular users, and third, determine whether such an operation could increase its profits.

However, the President has assured me that, in the light of the representations he has received, he is willing to reconsider this plan and take whatever action is necessary.

REQUEST FOR MINISTER TO MAKE A COMMITMENT

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, the Minister has just admitted that the Canada Post Corporation is anxious to provide better services to one of its users when everyone is well aware that it has, in fact, millions of users.

In view of the circumstances, since the Minister is aware of the main purpose of the Canada Post Corporation and also of the objections such action will create as the Minister himself has said in the House that Opposition Members have already made representations to him, concerning this unacceptable project of the Canada Post Corporation, I simply want to ask the Minister whether he will undertake on behalf of this House to recommend to the Corporation that it confine itself to its primary job and forget about competing with the private sector in the marketplace.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, what the Hon. Member seems to be forgetting is that the thousands of Canadians who use the Canada Post Corporation to order merchandise are all customers of the Corporation and users of the postal service.

The Hon. Member is therefore quite wrong when he suggests that this new service provided by the Canada Post Corporation is offered to just one customer. In co-operation with a private business, the Corporation offers this service to the thousands of Canadians who will want to use it.

However, quite apart from this question, I can assure the Hon. Member that the other issue he has raised as to whether the Corporation is entering into unfair competition with small businesses by extending its services is something that the President of the Corporation has accepted to reconsider, and I expect a report from him in the very near future.

PENITENTIARIES

KINGSTON AREA INSTITUTIONS—REQUEST THAT TASK FORCE MAKE REPORT PUBLIC

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief question which is addressed to the Solicitor General and is supplementary to questions which were posed to him earlier today. As the Minister will be aware, there has been another murder of an inmate and a stabbing of two guards in the Millhaven penitentiary in recent days. This is causing great concern within the community and great concern to people who work in the penitentiary, as well as to the inmates.

Could the Minister give the House his assurance that the investigation team he has set up under the leadership of Dr. Vantour will report publicly to Members of the House and to the Commissioner of Penitentiaries on its findings regarding the escalating violence in the penitentiaries in the Kingston area?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has reminded the House that I have indeed established a task force and asked it to examine the situation in Kingston area institutions relating to the violence which has occurred lately, including the tragic incident to which the Hon. Member referred. That task force is composed of three officials, and Mr. Vantour is the chairman. It includes, as well, one non-official, a former RCMP investigator, who I expect will make a very good contribution. I undertake that the report of the committee will be made public and it will be made public as soon as I receive it.

TABLING OF REPORTS OF CLERK OF PETITIONS

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have the honour to inform the House that the petition presented by the Hon. Member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) on Tuesday, March 20, 1984, meets the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form. The petition presented by the Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) on Tuesday, March 20, 1984, does not meet the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

Point of Order—Mr. Nielsen

POINT OF ORDER

MR. NIELSEN—SUGGESTED IRREGULARITY IN SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C)

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a brief point of order with respect to the validity of one of the Estimates in Supplementary Estimates (C). As you know, Sir, tomorrow has been set down as being the final allotted day in the current supply period and the House will be asked to pass Supplementary Estimates (C) before the end of the sitting tomorrow. This gives some urgency to the need for a ruling on the point of order which I am submitting before the close of business today so that if the Chair does not find itself in agreement with my submissions, we do have the option of filing an Notice of Objection. However, I hope that my argument will appeal to the Chair.

As a result of this, I would like to ask the Chair to consider the procedural acceptability of Vote 1c under the Department of National Revenue, Customs and Excise. The explanation of the requirement for this Vote outlines the fact that the Department is requesting some $209,000 for a personal alarm security system and a further $225,000 for the "Offshore extension of Customs and Excise jurisdiction". I am not entirely certain about what the personal alarm security system is but that is not the part of the Vote which concerns me. Rather, I am concerned about the fact that the Department of National Revenue, through the Vote, has requested $225,000 for the extension of its jurisdiction before legislation has been passed by the House authorizing such an extension of jurisdiction.

I am sure that all of the important aspects of this issue will be touched upon at such time as the legislation to authorize this extension is brought before the House for debate. What does concern me is the fact that the Department, prior to any debate having taken place on Bill C-16 which purports to authorize the extension of customs jurisdiction, has asked that $225,000 be voted to the Department to allow it to extend its jurisdiction. By any definition, Mr. Speaker, such an Estimate anticipates the decision of the House with respect to Bill C-16.

It might be claimed, specious as the argument may be, that it is common practice for the Government to implement tax changes as soon as a Ways and Means motion has been passed by the House and that on this basis, the mere introduction of a Bill based on a Ways and Means motion is sufficient to permit the Department to proceed. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I am not enamoured of that practice at the best of times, but using that argument in this case would clearly be a rationalization by the Government of an unparliamentary procedure.

If the passage of a Ways and Means motion is sufficient to authorize government expenditures, then we have no need at all to waste the time of committees or the time of the House as a whole when dealing with the Business of Supply. We could consolidate Supply with Ways and Means proceedings and save ourselves a lot of time and effort. The passage of a Ways and Means motion may be sufficient to permit the immediate implementation or levying of a tax, but I submit to you, Sir, that it is not sufficient to authorize expenditures.

It has already been well established by your predecessors, Mr. Speaker, that Estimates should not be used to legislate by creating new regulations or altering existing statutes. Surely any Vote which is explained in part as being for the offshore extension of customs and excise jurisdiction is one which seeks to authorize the Government to take action in the absence of enabling legislation.

For the reasons that I have just outlined, Mr. Speaker, I would hope that you might subject Vote 1c to some close scrutiny and rule it out of order on the grounds that it anticipates a decision of the House on Bill C-16. This is a decision which, I might point out, has been delayed by the Government's own failure to bring the Bill forward for debate.

• (1510)

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will take the point raised by the Hon. Member under advisement and, recognizing the courtesy he has extended by giving notice, will attempt to bring a decision on it to his attention as soon as possible.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I hope—

Mr. Speaker: I am aware that the Hon. Member may want to file a notice of objection in the event that the decision of the Chair is a certain way. The Chair is fully cognizant of his position and will attempt to meet that request.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I thank you kindly for that. I simply want to re-emphasize that tomorrow is the last day of Supply in this Supply period.

Mr. Tousignant: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It has become evident in the House that Members on this side and even on the other side are worried about the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) not being in the House—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is not the practice of the House to refer to the absence or presence of Hon. Members.

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SOCIAL AFFAIRS

PRESENTATION OF FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. David Weatherhead (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the first report of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs in both official languages.

RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

INTERNATIONAL DAY FOR THE ELIMINATION OF ALL FORMS OF RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Hon. D. M. Collenette (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, 18 years ago, the United Nations Generaly Assembly declared this day the International Day for the Elimination of all Forms of Racial Discrimination. It is appropriate that we in Canada take note of this important day. While our record in this area is better than that of most countries, we cannot afford to be complacent and we must sustain our efforts to eliminate all forms of racial discrimination.

[Translation]

Canada's multiracial profile has become more noticeable during the last ten years, but that is not to say it is a recent phenomenon. It goes back to the very origins of this country, when European settlers and native peoples met. The first groups of Chinese, Japanese and Africans arrived more than a century ago. As for Canadians of other than European or native descent, in many cases they have been in Canada for four or five generations. They feel truly Canadian and share the hopes, dreams and expectations of other Canadians.

[English]

It is my firm conviction that the vast majority of Canadians share our determination to make this society one in which all of us, whatever our racial background, whatever the colour of our skin, can participate and contribute fully to building a Canada of which we can all be proud. Although our record has blemishes, we have nevertheless established within this nation the capacity to deal with racial discrimination in a forthright and public manner. The strengthening of this capacity can ensure that we will remain in the forefront of nations whose actions and deeds clearly communicate to the world that racial prejudice and discrimination are not tolerated in Canada.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the statement of the Hon. Minister and I should like to put a question to him. As he is so strong on discrimination, could he announce when the Government might introduce legislation to remove discrimination from the Indian Act which discriminates against Indian women in this country?

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, as you know, this matter is under discussion now and a constitutional conference has dealt with it. I think the question should rather be addressed to my colleague, the Secretary of State (Mr. Joyal), in another forum perhaps, or to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro).

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to reply to the Minister's statement on behalf of this Party. With the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Collenette) I welcome the opportunity to speak briefly on this International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination. This is of particular importance in Canada and this Parliament must give it absolutely the highest priority. Racism still exists in Canada directly or, in many cases indirectly. I do not think any Canadian of good conscience, and certainly not Parliament, can rest until racism at all levels, in all sectors and with all people has been eradicated.

This country is a multiracial, multicultural society made up of Canadians—Canadians first and foremost, but with different backgrounds and different languages—coming from all parts of the world. We must obviously work toward a society in which race, colour, religion and even clothing make absolutely no difference to the kind of lifestyle and the goals that we want to set.

This can be achieved in two ways, Mr. Speaker. The first is by education. The federal Government could take the lead, but it has not up to this point, in educating all levels of our society in the eradication of discrimination and in raising the consciousness level of people who are different from what we perceive to be the norm.

The second area in which Parliament can work toward the eradication of racism is in the area of legislation. We must strengthen the Criminal Code, for example, and strengthen the Human Rights Commission. These are areas with which Parliament has not dealt with adequately.

We have a long way to go in this country and I believe Parliament can achieve its goals, provided that we give this matter the kind of priority that this Party thinks it should have and that I know all Canadians think it should have.

Mr. Laverne Lewycky (Dauphin-Swan River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to respond on behalf of the New Democrats to the Minister's statement on this International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination. I do not want to say too much regarding the inception of this day or the decade for action to combat racism and racial discrimination which was inaugurated in the United Nations in 1973 and continued until 1983. In 1979, the United Nations proclaimed a week of solidarity with peoples struggling against racism and racial discrimination. Since then, annually on March 21 we have been asked to observe this day.

I had hoped that the Minister might have made a positive statement regarding some of the representations made by this Party recently. He pointed out very correctly some aspects of our Canadian history which show a sad lack of action in the area of eliminating discrimination. For the benefit of the House I would like to underline one or two such representations that this Party has made or will make.

The Hon. Member for Broadview-Greenwood (Ms. McDonald) our justice critic, has obtained caucus approval for an all-Party resolution regarding the injustices that were perpetrated upon Japanese Canadians in World War II. We will be seeking all-Party support for this resolution and our justice critic will be approaching the other caucuses and the independent Member to my right here to seek their support for the acknowledgment of the wrongfulness of measures taken at that time. I had hoped that the Minister would have indicated that he was favourably disposed toward such action. I trust we will be able to work together on the representations that will be put forward.

We have not heard anything from the Government regarding some aspects of the War Measures Acts, which had implications for Japanese during World War II. Some action should be taken in that regard.

The Hon. Member for Vancouver East (Ms. Mitchell) has raised the whole question of the Chinese head tax in this House. To date she has received well over 600 representations, some including receipts for the head tax paid by Chinese Canadians. I had hoped that the Minister might have responded to some of those representations. I know that various organizations, as a result of this matter having been raised in the House by my hon. friend, have also been writing to the Government making representations. The Chinese-Canadian National Council has talked about this head tax compensation request which was made by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Vancouver East. It views the head tax as among the most blatantly racist and shameful acts in the history of our country. I was hoping that perhaps on this particular day the Minister would respond to the representations made by my colleague. The Human Rights Commission also has issued a statement in support of the requests which have been made with regard to compensation for Chinese Canadians. I hope that the Minister will see that some action—

Mr. Speaker: The Chair hesitates to interrupt the Hon. Member, but the practice of the House has been that comments should not exceed the length of time of the original statement by the Minister. The Hon. Member has now exceeded the time of the original statement. Therefore, I hesitate, but I feel I should interrupt the Hon. Member.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to point out that we did have a short debate on this subject several years ago in the House when Ministers adopted the habit of making extremely short presentations, thereby cutting off any real discussion on the matter. The Minister's presentation was very short today.

Mr. Speaker: Nevertheless, the Chair is bound by practices of the House. The Chair has not stopped questions. The Chair has simply called to the attention of the Hon. Member speaking that he has already gone beyond, something like two minutes beyond, the length of the original statement. The Chair is trying to be reasonable, but I would ask him to bring his remarks to a close.

Mr. Nielsen: On the same point or order, Mr. Speaker, I believe it is only fair to say that the Minister did speak with me prior to following the procedure we are now following with respect to making a brief statement. He expressed the hope that, after the same privilege had been extended to the spokesperson for the Conservative and New Democratic Parties to make a similarly brief statement, in this exceptional instance, because of the nature of the statement and the occasion, we would even refrain from asking any questions in the hope that perhaps more statements will be made by Ministers in this slot in the future.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair is trying to be fair, and the hon. spokesman for the Official Opposition, the Hon. Member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta), did observe roughly the same limits as the Minister. I am inviting the Hon. Member for Dauphin-Swan River (Mr. Lewycky) to do likewise.

Mr. Lewycky: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to conclude by saying that we each have a ministry of reconciliation which we can bring about in this country. I hope that the Minister will take it upon himself to act upon these representations I have mentioned. When the report of the Special Committee on Visible Minorities is brought forward, I hope he would act immediately on these representations, as well as incorporate them in the Multiculturalism Act at the time it is brought forward.

Mr. Yurko: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I may have a chance to say a few words on this matter?

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko).

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief, but I would like to say a few words on this very important matter before the House because today is the International Day for the Eradication of Racism. This matter has been rather close to my heart. I have constantly asked myself what racism is. It is a most despicable form of hate and discrimination among mankind. Some of us have repeatedly indicated the need for the equality of man in the eyes of man.

All I want to say, Mr. Speaker, is that I was in Brunei recently to recognize the independence of that country. One of the people there made the most profound statement to me in terms of this question of discrimination between peoples of different colour, different race or different sex. He said, "I want you always to remember, Mr. Yurko, that we all have the same colour of blood".

PETITIONS

MS. MITCHELL—TESTING OF CRUISE MISSILE ON CANADIAN SOIL

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present petitions from over 4,000 people who live in Vancouver East, including many that are written in Chinese. The attached petition states: that whereas residents of Canada are alarmed by the threat to the survival of humanity posed by the existence of nuclear weapons and the continuing arms race; and that whereas the Government of Canada permitted the testing of the Cruise missile over the soil of Canada on March 6, 1984, thus contributing to the nuclear arms race; and that whereas the following statement was endorsed unanimously by the United Nations in 1982:

The increase in... nuclear weapons, far from strengthening international security, on the contrary, weakens it. Enduring peace cannot be built on the accumulation of weaponry.

And that whereas the testing of weapons of war, such as the Cruise missile, contribute to the escalation of the arms race and weaken international security; therefore your petitioners humbly pray that the House of Commons will make every effort to prevent future testing of the Cruise missile in Canada.

MR. NYSTROM—SOCIAL MEASURES FOR SENIOR CITIZENS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of approximately 1,000 Saskatchewan residents. The petition states:

That, in the opinion of your petitioners, of Canada's senior citizens, and more specifically the members of Saskatchewan Senior Citizens "Action Now" Association favourable consideration should be given by your Honourable House to the proposals set out herein.

They mention several proposals such as federal pensions being substantially increased so that there is parity not charity for pensioners; that the basic income tax exemption be raised above the poverty level; that there be established in this country a department of senior citizens' affairs—

Mr. Speaker: Would the Hon. Member give a brief explanation of the purpose of the petition?

Mr. Nystrom: That pretty well summarizes it, Mr. Speaker, except to add that they ask as well that the original health Bill supported by federal conditional grants be reinstated. I cannot read the rest of it, but that is the general thrust of the petition on behalf of around a thousand senior citizens in Saskatchewan.

DPW—CONTRACTUAL COMMITMENTS FOR LEASES

Question No. 498—Mr. Howie:

Does the Government maintain records showing the extent to which it is contractually committed for each fiscal year beyond 1983-84 for leases and other goods and services and (a) if not, for what reason (b) if so, for each year, what is the dollar value of those contractual commitments?

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Public Works and Supply and Services as follows: For leases, yes; for goods and services, no.

(a) The Department of Supply and Services, as the main contractor of government goods and services, does not keep records of the global amount of long-term commitments. In order to provide a global amount, each department would have to look to individual transactions which in time and money would be prohibitive.

April, 2028—March, 2029	18.00
April, 2029—March, 2030	18.00

The foregoing amounts include short term crown-lease contracts and long term lease-purchase contracts the latter normally covering a period of up to 35 years. This explains the abrupt reduction of commitments in the year 2014. Moreover, the amounts exclude operating and other costs which can only be committed on an annual basis at the start of each fiscal year. A further point to recognize is that commitment values change from month to month due to new leases entered into and old lease terminations.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1984-85

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House resumed from Tuesday, March 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacLaren that Bill C-21, an Act to provide borrowing authority, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to say a few words on Bill C-21. However, before I do so I would like to present an amendment to the motion for second reading of Bill C-21 as follows:

That all of the words after the word "That" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"this House holds the opinion that the granting of an authority for the borrowing of a sum greater than the amount required to meet the Government's needs to the end of the fiscal year is objectionable in principle and this House therefore declines to give second reading to Bill C-21, an Act to provide borrowing authority."

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think it is incumbent upon me to take the matter under advisement. I will attempt to render a decision on the acceptability of the motion presented by the Hon. Member later this day. In the meantime, we will carry on with debate.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, we have had a good many of these Bills presented to us in this Parliament. It is rather staggering to go over some of them. We have had presented to us Bill C-30 for $12 billion; Bill C-59 for $14 billion; Bill C-111 for $6.6 billion; Bill C-125 for $7 billion; Bill C-151 for $10.7 billion. Now we have a Bill before us, Bill C-21, for the highest amount, some $29.55 billion. This brings the total to $102 billion all in one Parliament, and we are still going.

This Bill, as we are all aware, is to pay for past borrowing. One third of tax dollars are used to service our national debt. Our national debt could be as high as $180 billion, most of it because of this Government. All Canadians should realize that governments borrow money just like individuals. However, when the Government goes to market and asks for $29 billion, it has the effect of driving up interest rates for everyone else. This is precisely what is happening today.

I am well aware, Mr. Speaker, that the Government needs money to operate. It needs money just to pay interest on its debt. However, I believe the Canadian people have already made up their minds as to what they are going to do with this Government when the next election comes along. They are going to say we have had enough of them, we are going to give them their walking papers. Kick the rascals out.

A lot of us are interested in how this money being sought is going to be spent, Mr. Speaker. Rather than just saying it should not be passed, some of us might like to make some suggestions as to what could be done. Certainly it has been a profligate Government. It has been handing out money like a drunken sailor to various pet charities, shall we say. I refer to such programs as the Winter Works Program and others in ridings throughout the country. Coincidentally, the lion's share of this money seems to fall in Liberal ridings, primarily those of Cabinet Ministers.

I suggest that the Government could use a considerable amount of money this year and in succeeding years to combat one of the greatest and most serious problems we have, that of acid rain. The Minister of the Environment (Mr. Caccia) is meeting with his counterparts from nine European countries as well as from the ten provinces. I hope they are going to come to some conclusions and that the federal and provincial Governments will put their money where their mouth is. They should enact legislation to reduce nitric oxide emissions from automobiles and sulphur dioxide emissions from these huge smelters.

Canada is certainly a fairly substantial polluter, emitting some five million tons a year. This compares to our American friends' emissions of 25 million tons a year. Comparing that on a population basis it should be more or less ten to one, so we are certainly not lily white by any manner or means. I therefore hope this Government will take positive steps in this area this year, because it will only have the power to do so for this year.

The Government also spends a good deal of money advertising itself. We see these full-page ads extolling the Ministers and their Departments, and that runs into many millions of dollars. Despite the high powered advertising by the soap companies and various others, the biggest advertiser, the biggest spender, is the federal Government. It is about time it looked to cutting down on advertising considerably. Another particular interest of mine is the tourist industry, the second most important industry in Canada. It generates $18 billion a year. There will be some comments about that tomorrow because I believe the Opposition Day motion will be on the tourist industry, and the Government should be doing more to help this industry which employs 1.1 million people. The name of the game is to get more people back to work, which will turn the economy around. I am hoping some things can be done in that area.

We have some real prizes when it comes to subsidizing various Departments. I am thinking particularly of Crown corporations. I think of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation which has been referred to by many people as the "crazy broadcasting corporation" and it is costing the taxpayers about $900 million a year.

Mr. Masters: About the same as public broadcasting in the U.S.

Mr. Darling: I am well aware of that. However, it is a $900 million expenditure. When a great event takes place here in the House of Commons, the Budget or the Prime Minister's resignation, when you go out front you see the whole place is cluttered up with CBC trucks. CTV and Global, which manage to put out pretty good programs, do not need all that paraphernalia. It makes you wonder how much of this $900 million touch could be cut considerably. Canada Post is a Crown corporation which is supposed to deliver the mail within a reasonable time at reasonable expense. We do not expect Canada Post to operate as a self-sufficient entity right now. A lot of Members are taking a very dim view of Canada Post going into the general store business to try to raise money which will put small business people out of business. That is another area into which the Government should check.

There is also the $4 billion slush fund, which is a reserve fund for whatever the Government is going to do. There is a Bill for $25 billion as well as the $4 billion. Maybe this is to be held as a special election fund to bring out additional goodies to try to save the Government as it slides downward into oblivion. I see you are signalling to me, Mr. Speaker, that my time is up.

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have a few minutes to make some remarks this afternoon on Bill C-21, which is an Act to provide borrowing authority to the Government for $29.55 billion for the fiscal year 1984-85. This is made up of $25.6 billion for financial requirements and an extra $4 billion for unseen contingencies. Individual people in the House of Commons are going to be asked to vote to put the country into almost $30 billion worth of debt.

The word "debt" is a word we do not hear too often in the House I am afraid. It is a word I heard very clearly when I was growing up. Like many other people of my age in the House, I grew up when times were tough. It was a time of depression. One word that I can remember being taught was a bad word is the word "debt". It meant that we were not able to pay for what we were doing. The budget at our home was nothing compared to what we are talking about today.I would like all Members in the House to consider what debt does and what it means to borrow and put people into debt. Even though debt is now talked about in billions of dollars, it is not unlike the debt which was in people's homes during the depression. In homes and communities it meant that people were going to go broke. They were not going to be able to continue living the way they had been prior to the depression. It is important that Houses of parliament and governments do not forget the word "debt". When times became good again people took for granted that they could always get credit. The word debt became credit. I suspect the Government is looking upon this Bill today as if it were raising credit. It in fact remains debt, which is something that has to be paid off.

We must be aware that the problem of debt has brought governments, people and countries down. In the last few years some of the countries in Latin America which were taking off and beginning to become developed countries, suddenly got into the debt trap. This means they can no longer pay their debts. When that happens, the country goes down. It may come up or it may not come up. This is a new phenomenon in world international economic life.

I brought those points to the forefront in beginning my remarks because I believe that we do not frequently talk about debt. We do not talk about what debt does. We do not talk about the fact that if debt gets out of hand it can be totally destructive to a person, a family, a community or a country. I believe that is a serious situation which we have to keep in mind.

Several years ago the Government was elected under the phrase "a just society". I have no quarrel with that phrase. I believe it is a good phrase. I am sure there is not anyone in the House of Commons or in Canada who would not want to see a just society. I understand a just society to mean that every person within that society is treated in a way that is human and equal so as to make it possible for them to live a full life. I do not think anyone challenges that notion. However, did that happen? Was there a just society? Did that come about simply because it was said? Or, on the other hand, has it not been a just society? Is it a society which is not being just to great sectors of the population? I believe it is not being just. I do not believe that simply because we are going to borrow $30 billion, society will become just. I would like to say a few things about that.

To bring about justice in a society it is extremely important to remember the side which is weak, the side which has no power, the poor, those who do not have political connections. Remember them before you remember the side which is powerful, the side that does have political connections, the side that has wealth. To bring that just society about, those on the weak side must be looked after in a special way in order for them to live as human beings. I believe that is not the way the decisions are made.

Earlier today in Question Period my Leader made a simple statement about who became rich during the past year and who will get richer in the future. He used the Canadian banks as an example. The profits of the Toronto-Dominion were up 33.6 per cent last year. The profits of the Canadian Imperial Bank were up 59.8 per cent. The profits of the Bank of Nova Scotia were up 66 per cent. The profits of the Royal Bank of Canada were up 130.3 per cent. Profit is not a bad word. However, millions of young Canadians cannot get a job. Universities are not getting funding to allow young Canadians to go to school and become educated so they can go out and make their own living. As a senior citizen who is visiting from Saskatoon told me today, people cannot possibly live on $550 a month when their rent is $325 a month. How can they possibly live like human beings?

When we talk about borrowing money to bring about justice in a society, let us be very careful to see what is happening in the society. I believe that for the powerful, rich and those who have connections things have been good and are getting better. The example of the banks is a case in point. On the other hand, the odds of those who are poor, weak and do not have connections are poor and getting poorer. The weak are the young, unemployed, senior citizens and people in the middle who can no longer get a job. I do not believe that what is taking place in our country now is balancing that off so that there will and can be a just society, one to which we are all looking forward and which we want.

Who got the tax breaks in the recent Budget? Was it those who do not have anything, the poor? Did they benefit? No. The people in the upper income brackets were able to put money away in RRSPs. A person with a $50,000 income is able to save $1,600 on his taxes. Those who happen to be in a higher bracket, those who make over $86,000, were able to save $5,000 on their taxes. But will they be the ones who will pay the money? It is not the people in those brackets but the low income Canadians who will still be forced to pay at least another $9.2 billion in personal income tax as it was announced in the Budget last year.

• (1550)

That is what is happening to Canadians. I believe that when there is power on one side and weakness on the other, connections on one side and no connections on the other, the burden should go to those who have the power, strength and economic backing rather than upon those who do not.

We oppose this borrowing Bill on the grounds that it does not set out the correct priorities. Our experience in the House shows that the priorities are not being directed toward those who need the help most; they are being directed toward those who already have economic power. I believe that is wrong. For that reason we are opposing the Bill.

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, when Bills come to the House of Commons we often look at them with a good deal of curiosity and sometimes with skepticism because the appearance of the Bills themselves are somewhat deceptive. I would say that this particular qualification applies to Bill C-21, the Bill requesting borrowing authority.

The Bill appears to be very simplistic because it is a two-page document with printing on one side only. One would not think that it amounted to much, yet what this Bill asks Parliament to do is to give the Government the authority to borrow almost $30 billion. The real effect of this Bill is to emphasize the lack of control that Parliament has over the spending of the Government. With its present majority, the Government can come to the House and force through a borrowing Bill for any amount of money while believing that it will get the acquiescence from this side of the House and be able to spend that money as it pleases.

During this debate and other debates, such as the Budget debate, my colleagues and I have been emphasizing the frightening size of the Government's deficit and the tremendous impact that it is having on the Canadian economy. When one considers the deficit, more than $30 billion now, it is the most significant road block to a sustained economic recovery in this country. It prevents the opportunity for 1.5 million Canadians to return to the paid labour force. It is a millstone around our necks and more so around the necks of those who are unemployed.

Whenever the Government ends its fiscal year with a deficit, as it did last year, the year before and as it will this year, the shortfall that it creates does not suddenly disappear or go away. Instead, it is added to the long-term national debt, a national debt which we know is increasing by leaps and bounds and on which we must pay mounting interest year after year. In turn, that interest payment increases the deficit. It is on a merry-go-round that we cannot seem to get off. The Government brings in additional moneys in borrowing to increase that deficit and, in turn, the interest charges go up as the national debt increases.

This year alone the interest charges will be $20 billion. That is some $800 for every man, woman and child in this country. Just last week those interest charges increased by some $750 million in one week alone. That was due to the fact that the Government's high interest policy allowed the prime rate to climb another notch higher.

The Bill before us today—this innocuous looking little Bill—illustrates most clearly that the Government has yet to come to grips with the roller coaster impact that its fiscal and monetary policies are having on the Canadian economy. Bill C-21 seeks authority to borrow some $29.5 billion, $4 billion of which is in a contingency fund.

That $4 billion calls for more than passing interest. I would say that the $4 billion which the Government says it will put aside as a contingency fund is really the Government's equivalent of mad money. It is that sort of fund that one tucks away to be there in case one feels the urge to go on a spree. All too often in recent years we have seen the Government go on a spree of wasteful spending of taxpayers' dollars. Those funds that it spends so foolishly and inefficiently on a continuous basis do not come from the pockets of government Members opposite, they come from the hard earned income of millions of Canadians who are already having enough trouble making ends meet.

The fiscal mismanagement that has been disclaimed time and again by this Government is nowhere more evident than in the way the Government allows Crown corporations to be run. This has been pointed out by many of my colleagues. Most of these Crown corporations should be, but are not, covered by this borrowing authority statute.

It is interesting to think of Crown corporations and how they operate. Crown corporations may borrow funds using the Government of Canada as a guarantor but without seeking any prior approval from Parliament. In fact, Members of Parliament are simply presented with a bill for Crown corporations without ever having had a chance to examine the expenditure plans of those corporations.

Nowhere is that more evident than in what we have seen in the last month with Canadair. Canadair came back to Parliament earlier this month to get additional funding. The Minister simply told us it would have additional funds. He did not come to Parliament to tell us that. We were told that Canadair lost $330 million in 1983. In the previous year it lost $1.4 billion. That is the largest annual loss in Canadian corporate history. Before that corporation is finally sold off, it will have cost the Canadian taxpayers some $3 billion, without any accountability for what has been done with that money.

Let us not forget that Canadair is only one out of some 300 Crown corporations that have been established in this country, all of which operate outside of borrowing Bills, such as the one that is before us today. Other examples include de Havilland which lost $226 million last year, with almost the same amount projected as a loss in the next 12 months; VIA Rail which lost $440 million in 1982-83, and Canada Post which was down by some $300 million.

Yet each of these Crown corporations, regardless of the magnitude of its losses, is allowed to continue to operate as though nothing were wrong. They need not seek additional credit at inflated interest rates. They do not have to face bank managers who are worried about repayment. They do not have to deal with the investigators and the auditors from Revenue Canada who might come along to threaten them or force them into bankruptcy for not being able to pay their taxes. No, indeed, Sir, that is not the way these Crown corporations operate. They simply spend as much as they want, usually more than they need, and then they forward the Bill to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde). The Minister then covers these debts without, as he told us, losing any sleep over the whole matter.

Who in the private sector would enjoy that kind of luxury? How many small business people can go to their local bank, refuse to pay off their past debts, and still borrow additional funds? What company can tell its stockholders that it has lost millions of dollars once again, yet continue to exist or at least not change some executives? How many farmers can hold off their bankers indefinitely while running up deficits? These things can be done by Crown corporations, but not by individuals and companies in the private sector, Mr. Speaker. Every time the Government comes before the House asking for borrowing authority, what it refuses to do is to bring Crown corporations under these borrowing authority Bills.

If there is one thing the Government should be addressing and could be addressing when it is considering asking the House for borrowing authority, it is means and mechanisms to bring Crown corporations under borrowing authority control. The newly introduced Bill C-24 does not address that, Mr. Speaker. If nothing else, in considering what the Government is doing here in asking the House today for borrowing authority, it should think of means and mechanisms to bring Crown corporations within the borrowing authority of this Parliament.

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Mr. Speaker, it is with distressing frequency that I have found myself rising in this House to speak on Bills which seek to provide this Government with more money. Bill C-21 marks the eighth time since the election of 1980 that Parliament is being forced to provide this Government with more borrowing authority. Each time I have been shocked by the sky-rocketing deficit and the rising debt burden on Canadians. Each time I have been appalled at the colossal economic mismanagement underlying the Government's necessity thus to go into debt. And each time I have seen no end in sight, for nowhere are there signs of government restraint nor efforts to curb the kind of waste graphically described in every annual report by the Auditor General.

But the Borrowing Authority Act, 1984-85 is not like other borrowing Bills that we have seen and criticized in this Chamber for two reasons. The first is its magnitude; the second is its timing.

In terms of magnitude, Bill C-21 goes far beyond its predecessors. Members will recall that last year around this time the Government extracted $19 billion in borrowing authority—at that time the largest borrowing Bill in Canadian history. This year, the Government not only matches that already astronomical $19 billion, it antes up an additional $10.55 billion, over 50 percent more. By demanding $29.5 billion, Bill C-21 now has the dubious distinction of being the largest borrowing Bill ever to come before Parliament. Like a desperate gambler, this Government is taking enormous risks in order to keep playing its unfortunate game, and the stakes in this Government's gamble are nothing less than the economic well-being and indeed the solvency of the Canadian people.

As one indicator, the borrowing requirements in Bill C-21 are equal to 91 per cent of forecast personal savings in Canada for this year. If this borrowing Bill goes through, by the end of this fiscal year Canada's net debt will be $180 billion, as compared to $17.7 billion in March 1968. That represents $7,000 to $8,000 for every man, woman, and child in Canada. And the future looks even more grim. The Government's budgetary projections are that net debt will have risen to $261.5 billion by March, 1988, which represents almost a quadrupling in the net national debt in eight years.

Of the annual Government expenditure of $100 billion, over 30 per cent is to be financed by going into debt. Imagine if you tried to run your household accounts and you, Sir, had to borrow one-third of your expenditures? How long would you last personally? The Government can last because the Government, as opposed to Hon. Members here, can print its own money and demand money, whereas individuals cannot do that. It is absolutely unrealistic and unfair to treat Canadians that way. Interest on the debt in 1984-85 will equal 4.7 per cent of Canada's GNP as compared to 2 per cent when the Government of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) first took office. For every $3 that the Government spends it must borrow $1. In 1984-85, servicing that ever escalating debt burden will cost an estimated $20.4 billion, the equivalent of $800 for every man woman and child in Canada or $1,900 per taxpayer. The enormity of these figures is appalling. I do not know why Canadians are not rising in revolt and marching on the Government on Parliament Hill to demand that the financial enslavement they are being put into along with their children and generations yet unborn is stopped. However, they will have their opportunity to revolt. That day is coming, and coming soon.

That $20 billion required to service government debt in 1984-85 is equal to total government spending as recently as 1972-73, the very year I entered this Chamber. I am ashamed to have been part of a process, I even opposed it, for all but nine months, that has enslaved the Canadian people in this way.

The Government has a tendency to forget the speed and scale of increases in its spending and in the deficits underpinning them. Government spending has increased from $12.3 billion in 1968-69 to $96.9 billion in 1984-85, a jump of 668 percent. In the four years since the Liberals returned to office, government spending has almost doubled; spending in 1984-85 will be up by a further 9 per cent. Spending on a national accounts basis is now equal to 25 per cent of Canada's GNP; it was only 21 per cent four years ago.

Other Members of my Party have ably addressed the horrific consequences of this mess of red ink spilling all over the Government's accounts. This ever-growing interest burden, the loss of fiscal flexibility, comes at a time when we need it to fight the recession and to help its victims, and we are losing control over all sense of judgment and proportion in running our economy. We are crowding out private sector borrowing. As a consequence, unbearable interest rates are being charged all sectors of the Canadian economy and home owners in particular. Loss of confidence in a government that so brazenly lives beyond its means is what we now face.

In brief, Bill C-21 both manifests and advances this Government along its road to economic destruction. No wonder Members on this side of the House are so vigorously opposing this Bill and will continue to do so until we are absolutely forced by the continued heavy-handed methods of this fiscally irresponsible Government to shut up. This comes at a time when it is at best inopportune and at worst inconscionable.

• (1610)

That brings me to my second point in the moment I have remaining, the timing of Bill C-21. Given that Bill C-21 makes such historically monstrous demands, one would have expected at the very least that it would be coming from a Government with a firm sense of direction along with a solid and lengthy mandate. Instead, the government's historic action comes at a time when its leadership is up for grabs and its mandate is about to expire. Why are the Members opposite seeking to borrow such a huge amount for a full year when they can claim to need it for only about half a year?

Next fall the country will be getting a new Budget and a revised borrowing requirement. That Budget will be the obligation of either the new but short-lived Liberal Prime Minister or, if an election is called, as the country fervently hopes and prays, a new Progressive Conservative administration. Either way, why is Parliament now being locked into a borrowing authorization beyond that which it must necessarily and can legitimately make? In short, $15 billion, half the amount demanded, would be enough to see this Government and this country through. At that time, and only at that time, new circumstances will suggest future borrowing requirements.

In conclusion, I cannot support Bill C-21 because of its thrust in general and because of the moment when it is appearing before us in particular. Every responsible Member of Parliament must oppose this Bill, and I congratulate my colleague from Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) in helping us to bring before the House in this repeated form the sincere protests that Members of Parliament on this side have against such fiscal irresponsibility.

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, the Bill before us seeks to authorize the federal Government to borrow up to an additional $29.55 billion in new money. I want to address the Bill in relation to the Government's waste of the money it already has the authority to spend.

Yesterday, The New York Times, the United States' most prestigious newspaper, carried an extensive interview with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Axworthy). Blazened across the top of the page, in large bold letters, was the headline: "Canada Betrays a weakness for White Elephants". The article detailed one horror story after another concerning federal Government expenditures of hundreds of millions of dollars of taxpayers' money on projects that were neither wanted, needed, nor even used once completed.

I have a particular interest in the article in question because it mentioned the proposed new Charlottetown airport in my riding of Hillsborough in the same context as genuine white elephants such as Mirabel Airport, the ill-fated hydrofoil Bras D'Or, the Candu reactor and Canadair. Indeed the Minister of Transport himself raised the matter of the Charlottetown airport right in the Times interview to which I have made reference.

We in Prince Edward Island should be flattered and proud that the Minister of Transport saw fit to mention our fair isle in the middle of an interview with such a prestigious newspaper as The New York Times. But listen to what the Minister had to say in that interview.

To begin with, the Minister of Transport tried to explain how the federal Government could spend some $430 million building an airport like Mirabel, which the Times describe as "a national symbol of disastrous planning", representative of "extravagant Government projects that stand out in sharp contrast to the frugality of the Canadian people themselves." What was the Minister's explanation for such waste, such profligacy, such extravagance? He said, and I quote:

> With so much reliance on the federal Government (for airport construction), there are no constraints to limit design or planning from an economic point of view. Unlike the U.S., airports (in Canada) are a federal concern with no provincial or metropolitan oversight. So, who is going to complain that we are building Taj Mahals? As a result, we have a lot of Taj Mahals.

There you have it, Mr. Speaker, the Minister's explanation for federal Government waste of hundreds of millions of dollars of taxpayers' money. He says there are no constraints on the federal Government from the provinces and the municipalities. He says the federal Government can go on spending millions of dollars at will because there is no one to stop it from building Taj Mahals.

I want to bring to the attention of the House the Minister's primary example of the kind of waste to which he was making reference. It was not Mirabel, which has cost the taxpayers $800 million since it was built nine years ago, including the $430 million in initial construction costs. He did not refer to Canadair, Bras D'Or or any of these multimillion dollar projects that in most cases were a complete and utter waste of taxpayers' money. He cited, for all the world to see and to read in The New York Times, the Charlottetown airport. The Minister said the following to The New York Times:

> Only three airports in the country make any money, and right now we are spending $25 million on a new terminal building for Charlottetown.

I want to take issue not with The New York Times but rather with the Minister himself. How could he possibly imply that Charlottetown's new airport can be associated with Mirabel or with other such profligate wastes of taxpayers' money? He calls the Charlottetown airport a Taj Mahal. Let me set the facts straight.

First, the Government is not spending $25 million on a new terminal building for Charlottetown. The building itself will cost $7.1 million. The total redevelopment of the airport—including control tower, runway, land acquisition, water and sewage, vehicle parking and access roads, maintenance, garage and firehall—is $27 million. By any reasonable standard, that amount is not extravagant for the complete modernization of an airport that is nearly half a century old and that the Minister's predecessor described in the House of Commons as antiquated and a disgrace, not only to his Department but to the entire country.

Second, whatever might be the amount being spent on the Charlottetown airport, construction of the new terminal building has not even begun. The project was announced seven years ago, in 1977, with great fanfare by the then Premier of the province, Alex Campbell, and the then Minister of Transport, Otto Lang. Ever since that time construction of the new terminal building has been delayed time after time. Indeed, the present P.E.I. Minister in the federal Cabinet—whom I am very fond of and whom I see in the House today, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Campbell)—has announced tenders for construction not once but several times in the last four years. Yet I have been told by officials within the Department of Transport that construction of the new airport terminal will not begin this summer, next fall or next winter. It is not even likely that tenders will be invited by July 1. This means that the construction of the airport is not likely to happen in 1985 and perhaps not even in 1986. This is almost a full decade, Sir, after the facility was announced with great ballyhoo by Messrs. Campbell and Lang.

The new Charlottetown airport is not a Taj Mahal as described by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Axworthy). It is not even a fishing shack. In fact, it is nothing, because no construction has begun and no tenders have been issued. Islanders are wondering, quite rightly, Mr. Speaker, whether they will ever see a new terminal building constructed.

Tourism is the second largest industry on Prince Edward Island. The federal Government, the provincial Government, the City of Charlottetown and the private sector have combined to build a magnificent $32 million Convention Centre. We are soon to receive one of only four veterinary colleges in the country, thus rendering Prince Edward Island a major educational centre. In conclusion, we need a modern and efficient airport to get people and goods to and from the Province of Prince Edward Island and to help us become more self-sufficient and self-sustaining.

An airport is not a luxury and will not be a Taj Mahal. It is a vital part of the economic base of the province. I urge the Minister of Transport to view this important project in that light. I urge him to consider it as a vital economic tool for regional development. If he is not prepared to accelerate this project and particularly to issue tenders soon, I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that after the next election a new Progressive Conservative Government will be prepared to do so.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before recognizing the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans), I would like to inform the House at this time that I am prepared to rule on the amendment proposed earlier in the debate by the Hon. Member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling). The Chair finds the amendment acceptable.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few comments with regard to the Bill which is before us. I do not propose to take a great deal of time. I am delighted that you have chosen to accept the amendment proposed by the Hon. Member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) inasmuch as I do believe that it is inappropriate for the Government to ask permission of the House of Commons to borrow more money than it can demonstrate it needs to meet the current obligations for the present fiscal year.

As usual, the Government has asked for more dollars by way of borrowing authority than it can actually demonstrate that it requires. I therefore would put it to you, Sir, that if the Government really wants to receive approval for some borrowing, it would be advisable for it to come forward with an alternative piece of legislation. Whether one does or does not favour the concept of borrowing, there is no doubt in my mind that given the obligations of the Government to date and given what we know its obligations will be during the balance of this year, borrowing in some amount will be required in order to meet the on-going financial requirements of the nation.

I have pondered for some time whether government borrowing in itself is the reason for the economic chaos in the country or the consequence of the economic chaos in the country. There is an argument being advanced by members of the Official Opposition that borrowing is the reason for the economic chaos. I am not at all sure that that argument can be sustained in whole. I think that there is a certain element of truth to it but I do not believe that it is in fact accurate to say that all of the problems we now face are the result of the Government's borrowing during the last two to three years.

I think it would be more accurate to say that the reason why we face such difficult economic times is because the Government has mismanaged the economy. It has allowed interest rates to reach levels unprecedented in Canadian history. As a result of that action, hundreds of thousands of people have been driven out of business. There have been more bankruptcies in Canada than we have seen since the depression of the 1930s. Farmers in numbers far exceeding those which faced bankruptcy in the 1930s are now facing bankruptcy and losing their business. Individuals were faced with the inability to meet mortgage commitments on their family homes and were forced to lose all of their investments. I suspect that rather than being the reason for our economic chaos, borrowing is the consequence of our economic chaos.

I wish to look at this situation for a moment in light of what has happened since 1980. In addition to the things which I have already mentioned as being unacceptable consequences of actions on the part of the Government, we have also seen the cost to Government rise dramatically since 1980. The cost that must be borne by the taxpayer either through current taxes or the future burden of the cost of borrowing that we have undertaken as a nation in the last four or five years has risen dramatically. We have seen an economy which operated at 65 per cent of its capacity with a consumer market place reduced considerably as a result of tremendous dislocation in the work place. Up to two million people were unemployed and unable to enter the consumer market place to buy the things they themselves, their neighbours and their friends all across the country were in the process or should have been in the process of manufacturing.

There are two consequences as a result of having two million people unemployed. The first consequence is that the day-to-day needs of the unemployed must be met either through unemployment insurance or welfare payments. That, therefore, adds a considerable sum to the cost side on top of the already large sums of money spent by the Government. Concurrently, it reduces on the tax side the amounts of money which normally would have been collected from those people who, had they been working, would have been earning money and paying taxes. By pursuing a policy which allowed two million people to become unemployed, the Government created a situation which inevitably resulted in the Government having to borrow more money. The Government reduced the tax base while at the same time taking on additional responsibilities on the expenditure side. It makes sense, does it not? I see that there is a lady in the gallery who is nodding her head. Yes, it does make sense and I agree.

An Hon. Member: She is probably your mother.

Mr. Deans: No, she is not my mother. She is obviously someone's mother but she is not mine.

Because of decreased productivity, there was a decrease across the board in the numbers of items sold which in turn decreased the amount of sales tax collectable, the amount of corporate tax chargeable and which further decreased the numbers of tax dollars that normally would flow to the Government. You can see the dilemma if you take into account those factors together with any number of factors including that the Government had to spend large sums in order to try to create employment in areas where unemployment levels had gone out of sight.

• (1630)

The Government's economic policy brought forward by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) created the unemployment, the economic downturn, the situation where the tax base was eroded, the situation where the costs of doing business increased for most people, the situation where the Government required people to spend more money than they would otherwise have to spend, the end result of which was that it was forced to borrow more than it would otherwise have had to borrow.

If one were to level an indictment at the Government it would be that it pursued a policy which completely undermined the economy of Canada. I therefore say that the consequence is that because the Government is not now in a position to improve economic conditions given that it will not alter its headlong dash toward economic meanness, more people will be unemployed year after year, of course, there will be the need for even more borrowing. Either that or for those people still employed we will have to raise the level of taxation. The New Democratic Party would fight that because we know who would have to bear the additional burden. It would not be the Bank of Montreal or the corporate structure; it would be the average taxpayer.

For those reasons I should like to move an amendment to the amendment moved by the Hon. Member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling). Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

That the word "fiscal" in the fourth line of the amendment be struck out and replaced with the word "calendar".

The consequence of such action would be that the Government should not be authorized to borrow more today than it requires for its expenditures in this calendar year. It would have to return to the House of Commons at the end of the calendar year for approval for additional borrowing and to allow for further scrutiny of its economic policies. That would necessitate the Government's reducing the amount it is seeking from about $25 billion—I leave it to the Government to make that calculation although I could do it—to an amount in the order of $18 billion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before putting the motion to the House the Chair would like to reserve its decision and take the matter under advisement and come back to the House at the earliest opportunity with a ruling on the acceptability of the motion.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I like the motion submitted by the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) to the effect that the Government might have to come back to Parliament to ask for the funds it needs and that its borrowing under this Bill would be limited to its needs in this calendar year. If only we could persuade the Government that it should come back on its knees, in abject submission, because it has bungled the economy of Canada in a manner which should make every Member who sits in this Chamber—at least those on this side—feel ashamed.

It is in shame that I stand here to castigate the Government on the record it has built for itself on economic and fiscal matters in this country. It is not just for this generation that I feel shame, Mr. Speaker, but also for the younger generation. Every child born today or any day this year will start life burdened with a debt of $7,000 which is the debt that each of us bears right now.

Yesterday I had a letter from a constituent who was being harassed by the Department of National Revenue. He has a mortgage of something like $7,000, which is a lot of money for many people. Because of the Government's bungling, each child starting life as of now will have a $7,000 debt on his or her back. That is a shameful admission to have to make, Mr. Speaker.

This morning the Canadian dollar stood at 78.20 cents compared to the U.S. dollar. It has climbed a little bit. Treasury bills were quoted at 10.45 per cent earlier today which suggests to me that when the Bank of Canada rate is announced tomorrow at one o'clock it will be in the order of 10.70 per cent. This is a sign that the Government does not know what it is doing in the fiscal sphere. It has squandered money. Profligacy is not the right word. There must be a stronger one but it does not come to mind, Mr. Speaker. If the bank rate is 10.70 per cent tomorrow, then what will mortgage rates be on Friday or next Monday? Where will people be who have to renegotiate a mortgage? In the last 10 days or so interest rates have gone up and there are signs that this will continue.

I do not quite know how to direct the attention of Members on the government side of the House to the reality of this Bill. I notice they are not contributing to the debate. Perhaps there is some shame over there. Perhaps they find it difficult to defend a Bill which seeks authority to borrow $29.5 billion, $4 billion of which is to be kept in reserve over and above what is currently needed. I suspect many Members opposite do not know just how much $29.5 billion is. I must admit, Mr. Speaker, that I am at a bit of a loss myself to know how much it is.

I will refer to the documents which were presented with the Budget. One of the documents which was presented at that time is entitled The Fiscal Plan. It is worth reading. It reveals and awful lot of things. Between 1973 and 1974 the national debt was pretty close to the amount of the borrowing authority we are debating today. In 1974-75 the expenditures of government climbed from $24.1 billion to $31.3 billion. So in that year the full expenditures of government were of the order of this particular borrowing. The deficit foreseen by this Government for this borrowing authority is of this order as well, give or take $1 billion or $2 billion.

I suppose we have become so used to talking in billions of dollars that we can easily give or take $1 billion or $2 billion. But it is a staggering thought, Mr. Speaker, that expenditures ten years ago equalled what is today the deficit. I looked at some of the tables on page 62 of the booklet The Fiscal Plan, which was presented with the Budget on February 15. At the time when we had to face our debt around the end of the war in 1946 and 1947, it is surprising to note that the net public debt—which, of course, does not include the Crown corporation borrowing, grants and so on—was $13 billion, which represented at that time 110 per cent of the Gross National Product. In other words, there was more national debt than there was Gross National Product. The net public debt was $13 billion after a war which lasted five years.

I mentioned that the net public debt for 1975-76 was $28 billion. In 1976-77 it was $34 billion. The preliminary estimate of the Government of the net public debt for 1983-84 is $150 billion, which represents 38 per cent of the Gross National Product. This percentage has been growing out of control. We now have 38 per cent of the Gross National Product represented by debt in this country. This is our gift to our young people. This is what makes me so ashamed, Mr. Speaker. We are loading on to the pages in this House, the children of the people in the galleries and on our own children a debt of this enormity, and that is shameful.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair is now prepared to rule on the amendment presented by the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans). The Chair finds that the amendment is acceptable.

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put my comments on Bill C-21 on the record today. I know it is the general practice of Hon. Members to say, when they rise to speak in debate, that it is a pleasure or an honour to participate. I cannot use those words today, Mr. Speaker. We have had many debates in this House on Bills which have been put forward by this Government asking for borrowing authority. I feel that what we should do is recycle our speeches because what my colleagues and I have said on previous occasions applies on this occasion as well.

I said to the Government at an earlier time with respect to other borrowing bills: "Do not come back and ask for more". But once again this advice was rejected. However, if those other requests for borrowing authority were extreme in terms of the amount of borrowing authority requested, they pale in comparison to Bill C-21. The Government is asking this Parliament to give authority to borrow an additional $29.5 billion.

If one says that quickly enough and does not analyze what is behind that statement, one might say that is just another typical statement made in the House of Commons. But let us analyze just what the situation is. The Government is saying that it needs this kind of borrowing in order to tide itself over for a specific period of time. There is no knowledge in this House at the moment that this amount of borrowing will be sufficient to take the Government through to the end of the fiscal year in March, 1985. There is no evidence of that whatsoever.

What the Government wants, by its own admission in this House, is a certain amount of money which it can prove it needs to carry on the functions of government. Then additionally it wants a slush fund, a contingency fund, a fund which it can have in its back pocket, so to speak, so that it does not have to come back and have the onerous task of asking Parliament for more borrowing authority. The greater tragedy though, Mr. Speaker, is that this Government has such a legacy of borrowing, and Canada now has such a large structural debt, that long after we are gone from this place and this earth, and long after those who are younger than we are are gone, that debt will still remain. In fact, today we do not pay for our debt. All we do is take a major portion of our revenue and pay the servicing of the debt, the interest.

Government really should be no different from any other household. When one has mortgaged a house, one cannot get a second mortgage to pay for the groceries. That is what the Government is asking this House to do again today. It is a shame what this Liberal Government has done to the Canadian people. It is a shame that today, other than health care costs and post-secondary education, the largest expenditure on the Public Accounts of Canada is debt servicing. It is a shame that Canadians yet unborn will have to pay for this debt. It is a shame for Canadians who want to maintain social security safety nets, pensions, health care and post-secondary education. Those very programs, valid in each and every case, are today jeopardized because of the profligate spending and economic mismanagement of this Government.

The legacy of this Liberal Government, Mr. Speaker, should not be forgotten. Every Hon. Member of this House should take it upon himself or herself to remind Canadians that that legacy will be the long-term legacy of this Government, and the people who will pay for it are those who have not even had an opportunity to vote against this Government. It is absolutely inexcusable that we are looking at expenditures of some $90 billion, some $30 billion of which must be financed with money we do not have. Then, when interest rates are starting to climb, what does the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) say? "Oh, I do not think we have any trend; no, I do not see any great problem". Well, Mr. Speaker, Canadians have a tremendous problem. All you have to do is look at the headlines in today's papers. We are seeing the spectre of rising interest rates.

• (1650)

That is the tragedy of this Government's profligate spending. In some cases people lost their businesses and homes in the interest rate crunch of 22 per cent or 23 per cent. Others survive through various means, such as restraint or personal adjustment. But if interest rates begin to rise again, and I suggest they do not have to go to 22 per cent or 23 per cent, merely to 15 per cent or 17 per cent, what do Canadians do?

Mr. Young: Throw these guys out, obviously.

Mr. Epp: That is one thing that should happen. But what do they do to survive? They have made all kinds of adjustments, rationalized expenditures, and what do they do on the second go-round? Do Members opposite know the percentage of total borrowing by Government in this country today? I understand it is 90 per cent.

Mr. Blenkarn: It is 93 per cent.

Mr. Epp: It is 93 per cent. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, how can this Government come shamelessly to this House and the Canadian people and say: "Give us another $29 billion and it will not have any effect on you. Do not worry, Canadians; governments do not have to pay debts". You have heard that argument, Mr. Speaker. But yes, they do, and you know how they pay for it. It is we who pay, through higher interest rates, when people cannot afford their homes and lose their businesses. We pay for it when people lose their farms. That is why you have farm survival groups breaking out in western Canada. They are trying to survive.

The greatest tragedy of all, Mr. Speaker, is that this Government has mortgaged away the future of Canada. When you take away the right to dream and the possibility that that dream will be fulfilled, when you remove that vision from people, then the country is desperate in the extreme. Members of this House have gone through the west door in this House of Commons. They have looked at the Peace Tower to their left as they have walked out. Over the arch there are biblical words to the effect that where there is no vision, the people perish. What has happened across the country today is that Canadians are losing their dreams and visions.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mortgaging them.

Mr. Epp: Their future is being mortgaged because this Government decides it knows best how to spend the people's money.

I look forward to the next election, Mr. Speaker, because I want to place the record of this Liberal Government before the Canadian people. I will dig out every one of my speeches on every one of the borrowing Bills the Government has brought forward and I will repeat those speeches in the small towns of my riding. I have found when you talk to the people, when you are square with them, they say that we must get back to economic management. The potential of this country is so great, but this Liberal Government has betrayed the heritage of Canadians. The best thing we can do is defeat this Bill and then go to an election and defeat this Government.

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Mr. Speaker, in joining in this debate I felt it might be helpful if we tried to put what we are talking about into better perspective. We can talk in terms of $20 billion or $29 billion of borrowing authority, and most of us, including me, have no way of relating to that amount of money. But I think it is important to remember that if you accept the budgetary projections of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) as tabled on February 15 in this House, it means that for every dollar of revenue the Government anticipates collecting, it is spending $1.50. In short, the Government is out of whack as far as income and expenditures are concerned by 50 per cent.

The reason I say that is that often you will hear people say that the interest on the debt alone in Canada is responsible for 20 cents of every dollar of expenditure. True, but the more significant point is that when you consider every dollar of income the Government is actually receiving, whether the revenue and expenditures are matched or not, the Government has to earmark over 30 cents of that dollar to pay interest on existing debt. We are facing a situation where the debt of this nation by 1990 will have doubled once again from its current level. That is why I agree with my colleagues when they reflect their concern in this debate over this borrowing authority Bill. The fact is, if we go on with this type of irresponsible Government spending, the world will set us straight eventually. The world will only accept so much of our debt and then they start asking questions.

That has already begun. A few months ago, for the first time in many years, we found that an issue of the Government of Canada did not sell well on international markets. The result was that the current issue announced only yesterday, maturing in the year 2004, was sold to yield 13.6 per cent. Imagine, the Canadian covenant is now such that to raise money we have to pay the lender over 13.5 per cent. In a little over five years the cumulative effect of that interest rate doubles the debt. Just divide 13.6 into 72 and you get the number of years it takes to double the debt.

• (1700)

In short, if this nation persists with the type of gang which has been running the country to date, with its irresponsible handling of our finances, we are headed for the bankruptcy world courts. This is completely inevitable. The IMF is what we call the bankruptcy world court. It is the one that calls you in. It tells you that until you sober up there are certain terms and conditions which you must live by in order to get bailout credit. That is not a nice experience for any people to have to live through.

The forerunner to this may be a questioning of our current credit rating. We have a high credit rating now but the first step will be to move it downwards. That makes it more difficult and costly to raise money. If you do not correct the outflow and arrest the demand for the borrowed funds, eventually some outside group such as the International Monetary Fund has to come in. You are a basket case and they have to bail you out.

Why did we get into this position, Mr. Speaker? Why are we in a position where an irresponsible government now feels there is nothing it can do to correct the matter? Most of the Members who were in the House from 1972 on will recall where this began. It began when we had a Minister of Finance who is sometimes referred to as "blue eyes", John Turner. He introduced the country to the concept of peacetime deficit financing. Up until 1972 we had a relatively balanced position at the federal Government level. We were even in surplus some years prior to 1972. He took that record of a relatively balanced position and plunged us into deep deficit financing to the point that when he left in 1975 the deficit was $5.5 billion. Before he left he also indexed income taxes. However, he forgot to put the other side of the equation in place. He forgot to listen to our then Leader, Mr. Stanfield, who said that indexing of income taxes would cut off the tax dividends which they had been relying on, but would also ensure some type of restraint on the part of government. No government would responsibly bring in an indexed income tax system without having a corresponding program to keep costs under control.

By cutting off our revenue, Mr. Turner cut off the revenue that was then mounting every year, but he did not cut off the expenditure growth. From 1972 to 1975 there was a systematic putting into place of spending programs which was aided and abetted by the socialists to our left. No costing in a five-year sense was ever made of those programs. As a net result costs have soared, there is no revenue to cover them and we have the scenario which I indicated at the beginning of my speech where we are now spending $1.50 for every $1 of income. This means we have to borrow and ask future generations to pay for our irresponsibility in the late 1970s and 1980s.

This gang must be swept out of office. It does not matter what Leader they choose, they have all had their hand in this mess. None of them knows how to get us out of this and it is time they are all swept out of power.

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak on Bill C-21, the Borrowing Authority Act, 1984-85. I am also pleased to have been able to second the amendment to this Bill before us which was moved by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans). This amendment would effectively reduce the amount of money the Government is asking for from $29.5 billion to $18 billion. We feel that the total amount being requested by the Government is outrageous, but if it were reduced by the sum of $11 billion it would be brought into manageable proportions at least.

In our view the Government is asking the House to buy a pig in a poke. It has given no indication of how it intends to spend this $29.5 billion. I was particularly interested in the rather disparaging remarks made by the previous speaker, the Hon. Member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens). He stands and complains about the spending of the Liberal Government. He uses the old saw of trying to blame the NDP for that. I would like to hear the Hon. Member for York-Peel tell us which social programs he would be prepared to cut in order to reduce government spending limits.

Mr. Stevens: How about your salary?

Mr. Young: It is all very well to blame the NDP for all that is owed in the country. If I were a millionaire like the Hon. Member for York-Peel, I might be prepared to consider salary cuts all around. However, I am not.

We would be particularly interested in having the Government come into the House and tell us specifically how it intends to spend this money. We would like to know whether it intends to spend the money for socially productive uses or whether, as the Member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) indicated, it is going to use part of that $29.5 billion as a slush fund for the Liberal Party to re-elect some of its own Members. If the Government were to indicate that it intended to spend some of that money to alleviate the tremendous problems in the country with providing adequate, reasonable and affordable housing to the many Canadians who are in such desperate need of it, that would be acceptable.

The Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto has recently released a report entitled "A New Housing Agenda for Metropolitan Toronto". In that report it is pointed out that there are some 70,000 households which already require some form of rent geared to income housing or will require it within 15 years. The report advocates an assisted housing target of some 4,500 units per year to address this need. Through CMHC in the past year the Government has actually reduced the amount of funding that would be available to municipalities to provide adequate, affordable housing. It is having a terrible effect on areas like Metropolitan Toronto and other major urban centres across the country.

If the Government were to look at providing a real stimulus to housing construction in this country, even as a job-creation measure, it would go a long way toward alleviating the terrible unemployment that exists. It has been proven by government figures which are available that for every one job that is created in housing construction, another four jobs are created in spin-off industries, such as electrical manufacturing, the plumbing industry and the oil industry. Any industry one could think of would be affected by a substantial increase in the amount of subsidies that we would be prepared to give for housing construction. If the Government were going to put the money it is asking for to that type of use, I think we would be less reluctant to provide it.

Another area to which we believe the Government should pay more attention is the needs of senior citizens in this country. The Government consistently tells us that it recognizes the problems facing the seniors of this country and has studied them. In fact, it has studied the problem to death. However, it says that until the economy improves it cannot do anything for the senior citizens of the country. In its last Budget it provided pensioners with $25 in June and $25 in December in the hopes that the problem would go away. The problem will only go away to a small degree for single elderly persons who are already living below the poverty line.

There is absolutely no reason why the Government could not have increased their pensions immediately by $50 a month as of January 1, 1984. Instead of doing that, its Budget increased the tax giveaways to those who do not need it, the large corporations and the wealthy in this country. If the Government could do that for that segment of the population, there is absolutely no reason why it could not have done so for single elderly women over the age of 65 who have incomes that are well below the poverty line. They are the ones most in need in this country.

The Government could use some of the $29.5 billion it is seeking to do something about the thousands of disabled and handicapped people across the country who are unable to work because of their disability or discrimination in the work-place, and provide them with decent incomes on a monthly basis. However, it chooses not to do that because the economy is in difficulty and the Government says it does not have the tax revenue to provide those people with the means to follow a decent lifestyle in the mainstream of Canadian society.

The other area in which the Government could have taken serious action if it had been well intentioned is the unemployed in this country. The problem of unemployment was hardly dealt with in the Budget. In fact, it did not even make a dent in that massive problem which faces our country. In my opinion it is a national disgrace that the over-all unemployment rate in this country is in excess of 11 per cent. It is a further disgrace that the Government refuses to do anything meaningful about it.

Youth unemployment in Canada is in excess of 18 per cent. These are the very people in our country who are our most valuable resource. The Government is allowing them to waste away without providing them with any meaningful employment programs. It goes even one step further by attacking the post-secondary system in the country through further reductions in funding to support these educational facilities. This affects research and development capability in Canada and the accessibility of young people to these institutions. If the Government seriously considered putting the amount of money for which it is asking into meaningful, useful, productive and socially beneficial programs, then we may have a change of heart and perhaps would be willing to consider providing that amount of money.

[Translation]

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I cannot resist making a few comments on this borrowing authority the Government wants to shove down our throats and down the throats of all Canadians. Considering the deplorable performance of this Government's administration, Mr. Speaker, once again, it is very difficult for us to approve, on behalf of the Canadian people, what the Government is proposing to do, especially in view of the shocking circumstance that the Government is asking for a borrowing authority which exceeds its needs by four billion dollars. I think it would be in order to ask the Government very seriously why it wants the House to support this request for four additional billion dollars.

It is really very difficult to give a positive response. It would seem that the Government—and of course it is not going to say this to Canadians—first has to correct its mistakes, the results of its administrative incompetence. That is one of the reasons why it is coming back to the House for the seventh or eighth time with a Borrowing Authority Bill.

Mr. Speaker, they are adding insult to injury by asking for more than they need. Are we to understand that this Government is incapable of telling us exactly what its needs are? It is true that its previous forecasts were so erroneous that today they are downright embarrassing, and the Government is certainly doing its best not to emphasize this request for borrowing authority, even if it does involve four billion dollars it will not be needing at first. But this is very serious! I wonder how long they think the Canadian public will trust them when they are incapable of telling us exactly why they need this borrowing authority.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker. We all know that an election campaign is imminent. Why does the Government want a borrowing authority of $29 billion, when according to assessments that are not necessarily reliable, its needs do not exceed $25 billion? Four billion dollars for the Government, give or take a few dollars, I know that may seem insignificant to our administrators. Canadians listening to us, however, know perfectly well that in this day and age, considering the interest rate and debt costs, four billion dollars is a lot of money!

What is the Government hiding in its request to the House today? Is it perhaps preparing for the next election campaign and planning to make promises without end to win the support of Canadian voters once again? Does the Government want to use these billions of dollars to deceive Canadians or buy their votes with all kinds of projects, in a manner that is most irresponsible, Mr. Speaker? These are questions we must ask ourselves. We must bear in mind the financial situation of the Government and its commitments concerning a whole range of projects, because it will probably not act responsibly in the next six months, as we know very well that there is indeed a good chance that this Government will be defeated in the next election. Besides showing disrespect for the Canadian people, the Government does not hesitate to increase its spending, but it even refuses to rationalize them. These $4 billion in additional borrowing, about which we intend to move an amendment to force the Government not to borrow more than it needs, could be used by the Government to make electoral promises, and since it knows that it is very unlikely to continue governing the country, it could not care less about proposing such huge expenditures.

• (1720)

Mr. Speaker, Canadians are not taken in, they see their Government sinking deeper every day, they realize it has no intention of controlling the expenses of its own corporations, they are aware of all that and have to pay for the waste of public funds as a result of mismanagement. Instead of taking corrective measures and making drastic changes in the management of some of those corporations, the Government looks the other way. And, of course, Canadians will pick up the pieces and pay for the deficits of those corporations as though it was the normal thing to do. But the men and women appointed to run those corporations are not going to be replaced, although they are almost as incompetent as the Government.

Under such circumstances, Mr. Speaker, how can we have a positive response while our colleagues opposite remain silent? On behalf of the Canadian people, we are still asking this Government to be more reasonable and to cut down our national debt.

We know quite well that this Government is acting rather irresponsibly, as though the capacity to pay of individual Canadians were an unlimited source of funds. They operate as though there were no limit to the capacity to pay of Canadians; this is why the Government is running up its debt. We cannot overemphasize the fact that this is getting the upcoming generations into debt and mortgaging their future.

In view of these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, we must ask this Government to assume its responsibilities to the Canadian people and the nation. It must act responsibly when the boards of Crown corporations make certain decisions. Here is a small example which may help the Hon. Members and the Canadian public to better understand the situation.

Recently, a former Minister and Member of the Senate was appointed Chairman of the Transport Commission. What kind of comfort is this to Canadians since, in 1967-68, this same Minister was responsible for the white elephant called Mirabel in Quebec? Of course, Quebec had to have an airport which could provide the necessary services. That was obvious. However, and the Members opposite know this as well as I do, we now realize the tremendous extent of this expropriation operation. This was all done under the new Chairman of the Transport Commission.

What comfort can this be to Canadians? At his age, what is he going to do in the Transport Commission? I doubt that he wil be able to stay in office for long. Whatever anyone may think, Mr. Speaker, this will not restore the confidence of Canadians in a Government which is unable to make better choices. Having an unqualified person replaced by another one is not a solution.

In these circumstances, it is easily understood why we simply refuse to trust this Government when we are asked to get the country deeper into debt and to increase the feeling of despair which exists not only among young people, but in the population at large. This is asking too much, Mr. Speaker, and I hope that we shall have the opportunity to pass judgement on the incompetence which this Government has demonstrated for too long already.

[English]

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Mr. Speaker, this is an important Bill. It is important, I would submit, because it asks that we pass borrowing authority that really is a tax on future generations. It is one thing to have a taxation Bill in front of the House for Members to consider so we know precisely what we are asking the people to do, but when you have literally a piece of paper, which is not very substantive in any form, containing basically three clauses, which asks for authority to borrow nearly $30 billion, it becomes a very serious matter.

An amount of $30 billion is almost impossible to relate to. One of the ways people can relate to an amount like that is to talk about what a billion dollars means. It means $40 per capita. In other words, for every person in the nation we are being asked to approve $1,200 in borrowing. To go on a bit further, if you relate that to an average family of four, if four is an average, each family's share of this Bill, in the form of one piece of paper, is $4,800.

I want to impress the meaning of this borrowing on Members opposite so that when they vote—and eventually we will get to a vote—they will know exactly what they are doing. This is one borrowing Bill in one year, Mr. Speaker. We know the Government has had many borrowing Bills before this House in the past, but it would be very irresponsible on the part of the Opposition if we blindly went ahead and approved this Bill without question.

Most people when they go to a bank to borrow money have to do it on the basis of some kind of equity, reputation, or some kind of plan of action that will return the money borrowed. But if you look at this Government and its record, its record certainly would not instil confidence in any banker that I know to lend it money in view of the way it has managed money in the past. One can go through many things as far as the record of this Government's spending is concerned. There is really not much room for much confidence that the Government will manage this new borrowing properly.

Let us take a look at some of the Government programs. As far as I can see the Government does not have any concrete plan to get us out of the financial mess we are in. The Hon. Member for York Peel (Mr. Stevens) talked about how bankrupt Canada is. In many ways this is true. The more that is the case the sadder it is. If there is one country that should not be bankrupt, it is Canada. Canada has more natural resources per capita than any other country in the world. Surely, when we have the resources we have we should be able to manage our affairs in such a way that we should not have to borrow so much money.

We are not objecting to the Government borrowing money. We all know that in the normal course of events, whether you are a housewife, a businessman or anyone managing an economy, you have to borrow money. There are times in a fiscal year when you simply do not have enough money coming in to meet your current requirements and that necessitates borrowing. We know that. We are not objecting to the fact that the Government is borrowing money. What we are objecting to is that based on this Government's record, on the plan it has to put in front of us and knowing the Government will use this money, it engenders really no room for any kind of confidence or benefit of doubt that the money will be used properly.

Again, when you relate this amount to an average family of four, we are being asked literally blindly to approve almost $5,000 worth of borrowing. I hope Hon. Members know that. It is a massive debt load to put on every family in this country in just one Bill, and we are likely to get another one before this session terminates.

Let me expand on the size of this borrowing. The amount of money this Government will have to pay this year on the accumulated debt of its past spending is $20 billion. This means $800 per capita for an average family of four, or a little over $3,000 per family. If you think about it, Mr. Speaker, of the share of the debt for an average family, which is a little better than $3,000, almost two-thirds will go to service past debt, the total accumulated past debt. That is one way of putting the amount of money involved into perspective. Those of us who deal in much smaller numbers and try to manage our affairs more prudently than this Government want people to understand why we are concerned about the amount of money this Government is borrowing.

● (1730)

I want to make another point. It is important to realize that in many ways money is now like a commodity. It is no longer simply a medium of exchange; it is a commodity with a price on it. The more demand you put on the commodity, the higher you drive up the price. It works in many ways like any other commodity. For example, if there is a shortage of automobiles, the price goes up. This is because there are not enough automobiles to satisfy the needs of everybody.

The same happens with money. Instead of price, it is interest rates that go up. Yesterday the Hon. Member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Clarke) pointed out that the total amount of personal savings in this country is almost equal to the amount of money this Government will run in deficit this year. That shows the magnitude of the amount of money this Government is attempting to borrow.

The more you borrow, the more you drive up the price of money, namely interest rates. Regrettably, we have seen that happen in the last days and weeks. We are seeing a movement in the United States and here. That cannot help but have absolutely horrendous effects on this economy. The more you drive up the price of money, which is interest rates, the more you hurt those in business for themselves. When you hurt them, you take people out of jobs and put them on some sort of social assistance, which again hurts the deficit.

I have a question for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) and the Governor of the Bank of Canada. Where in fact is the balance between using interest rates to protect the value of the Canadian dollar and letting the Canadian dollar go and seeing interest rates stay at a level that keeps people in business? Many businessmen in this country have gone broke as a result of high interest rates. Tell them that you are proud of what you are doing to protect the Canadian dollar. I know of no small businessman who would make that kind of statement. In many ways that is what the Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada are doing when they use interest rates to protect the value of the Canadian dollar.

We have to import fruits and vegetables out of season. Because we live in a northern climate, we must import our citrus fruits. We do not grow them basically. If you let the value of those commodities rise, a consumer will back away from them. That is the way the system is supposed to work. The Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada say they know best. If the value of the Canadian dollar falls and imported fruits and vegetables out of season cost more, they are going to protect the consumer from buying them, even though the price may be up. Surely that should be up to the consumer.

I am not suggesting that I want to see the dollar go to 39 cents, 50 cents or 70 cents. I am saying the Government should stop trying to have it both ways. Stop trying to use interest rates to protect the value of the Canadian dollar and rely a little more on the common sense and good judgment of the average consumer. You could look for the value of the Canadian dollar staying at a level that makes sense as far as productivity in this country is concerned. The Government would not have to intervene in the market. The Bank of Canada would not need to worry about interest rates as much as it does.

When Government spending is out of control and the Government has to borrow to the extend that it does—and the evidence is in this Bill—it causes many problems throughout the whole economy. If we had better control of Government spending, we would have better control of the amount of money this Government has to borrow. This would have tremendously beneficial effects throughout the country.

If we continue the way we are going, more and more people will be out of work, less and less tax will be generated and more and more government spending will be required. It becomes a never-ending circle. We must have more responsibility in terms of government. We have not seen that across the aisle. Unfortunately, I have to vote against this Bill. Hopefully we will have a chance to defeat this Government quickly at the time of the next election.

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Mr. Speaker, I wish to carry on the same rather serious tone set by my colleague from Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer). I want to express my surprise that so few government members are participating in this debate on a Bill of such fundamental importance to the future of our children and their offspring. It is important and fortunate that the Canadian people have the opportunity to witness this debate over national television. It should have a strong bearing on decisions they will reach before entering the ballot booth some time next November.

I want to put in context the magnitude of the amount of money the Government is asking this Parliament and Canadians for authority to borrow. The Government is asking for authority to borrow $30 billion in one year. That is more than $1,000 for every man, woman and child in this country. The deficit already approaches $16,000 for every taxpayer. This Bill will increase that amount by some $3,000 in one year for every taxpayer in Canada.

That does not make too much of an impression on the average viewer or voter. Let us look at it this way. Out of the close to $100 billion that this Government will spend in the coming fiscal year, which incidentally is nine times as large as the Government budget when the outgoing Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) first took office, 40 per cent will be expended under the authority of one Minister, the Minister responsible for the social policy envelope. These programs of social assistance and support in terms of pensions, family allowance, unemployment insurance and other important programs devised as the so-called safety net for Canadians are now in jeopardy.

We have forgotten about the basic dynamo of our economy. That is our industry, the exploitation of technology and the productive work that the majority of Canadians, particularly young Canadians, will have to engage in if in future we are to get rid of this enormous albatross that our Liberal friends are hanging around the necks of future generations. Out of that budget, $40 billion will be spent on social programs. Today we are borrowing $30 billion, three-quarters of what is required to pay for social programs. I doubt that the average Canadian realizes that in this year's budget, $20 billion will be spent on interest to service that debt and only $10 billion on economic development.

Out of a $100 billion budget, $40 billion will go to social policy and programs, $20 billion to debt servicing, $10 billion to economic development, $5 billion to defence and a few other small amounts. The important point that Canadians must realize is that if we were not paying $20 billion worth of interest to carry the debt each year, we would have $30 billion to spend on economic development. We could move into the higher areas of technology and fund the necessary retraining programs. We could pursue international markets with a whole host of attractive and challenging products. This country could be engaged in manufacturing, producing and selling to people around the world. Instead, we are saddled with a deficit which is costing the Government $20 billion this year, half of the amount that will be spent on social programs. The Government wants to add another $30 billion to the gross deficit in order to balance the budget. That is a measure of how serious the problem is.

The Government is asking us through Bill C-21 to authorize the borrowing of that additional $30 billion even though the Budget which was tabled in the House a few weeks ago only projected a requirement for some $25 billion. Why, Mr. Speaker, is the Government asking for $30 billion? Indeed, the budgetary deficit is $30 billion but the Government, in the Budget presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) a few weeks ago, indicated that it did not really need that extra $4 billion.

Do you know why the Government did not need that extra money, Mr. Speaker? It did not need it because most of it is taken out of the hides of the public servants of the country. Most of the non-cash requirements shown as federal revenue come from the pension contributions of Public Service employees, whether they be members of government service generally, the armed forces or the RCMP. The Government is pretending to take those revenues and entrust them to a pension account when in fact it is using them to offset its borrowing requirements to the tune of some $3 billion this year. Essentially, Mr. Speaker, the Government is stealing from its own employees to make up its cash requirements. It then has the gall to come to the House and ask for $5 billion more than the Budget indicates is required. Is that not appalling, Mr. Speaker?

I was watching the person who most recently announced his candidacy for the Liberal Party leadership on television last evening and he was talking about deficits. I cannot speak in his dialect, but he said something to the effect that Canada is structurally a different country from other countries and deficits are a way of life in Canada. He told us why we had deficits, Mr. Speaker. The Hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Chrétien), the latest declared candidate for the Liberal Party leadership, said that we have deficits because Canadians are great savers. He said that if we did not have deficits, there would be no Canada Savings Bonds in which Canadians could invest their money. He said that quite clearly. He was trying to justify the deficit by saying that Canadians needed to have somewhere to put their money.

That Minister said he agreed with what other Members in the House have pointed out, which is that personal savings in Canada amount to some $32 billion. We have a deficit of $30 billion and the Minister who wants to become the Prime Minister said that we need to have high deficits so Canadians can have somewhere to invest their money. That is not a solution to our problem, Mr. Speaker; that is the root of our problem.

If Canadians were not encouraged to invest in short-term savings bonds and long-term government bonds with maturity beyond the beginning of the next century at interest rates of 12 per cent and higher, then future generations would not be carrying debt-servicing charges amounting to $20 billion this year and growing in future years in order to meet the escalating deficits.

The man who pretends that he wants to become the Prime Minister said that the deficit is unimportant because Canadians are great savers and the Government gives them a place to put their money. All they have to do is invest in Canada. Would it not be better if Canadians were investing in themselves, their businesses or even in other parts of the world to earn a return on that investment for Canada? Canadians could invest in resource development and in technology.

What have some of the other famous Liberal leadership candidates been saying, Mr. Speaker? The Hon. Minister who is responsible for economic development and was the first declared candidate said in a public statement on March 9 that he thinks all Canadians understand that governments have to live within their means and that the only way of getting at the deficit is either through more taxation, cutting programs or even inflation—because that is another way governments traditionally have gotten rid of deficits in historic times. By the way, the Liberal leadership candidate from outside this House who wants to become the Prime Minister started inflation. His budget created the concept of a massive and escalating deficit.

The Minister responsible for economic development is running full-page newspaper advertisements in every national newspaper to the tune of thousands of dollars. These advertisements are asking Canadians if they want more information about the Special Recovery Projects which the Government is financing. The programs are to be financed with $2.4 billion of public money and supposedly with $2.4 billion of private money. The advertisements ask the people if they want more information about this. It is absolutely unnecessary to do that kind of advertising.

The advertising budget alone for the Special Recovery Program amounts to some $15 million. What the Minister is not telling Canadians is that the Budget of last April said that the new costs of the Special Recovery Programs will be covered by a special recovery tax. It is a special recovery tax with which all of the Liberal leadership candidates intend to hose Canadians. They intend to introduce in next October and try to sneak it past the Canadian taxpayer in order to cover the expenses of the foolish extravagances in which they are engaging these days.

I wish I could say more, Mr. Speaker, but it is obvious that you wish to hear from someone else as well this evening.

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) said earlier this afternoon, it is not one of my pleasures to have to speak on this Bill. I happen to be one who rather cherishes the institution of Parliament. Earlier this afternoon I had occasion to walk to my office with my colleague, the Hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Jarvis). One of the issues which he raised as we were walking was the image that we as parliamentarians have. As we discussed the issue, it soon became evident to us that there is a cynicism in the country right now which I think is to be deplored. Probably one of the major reasons for the existence of that cynicism is the way the present Government has been handling Parliament and the unreasonable demands it has been putting on Parliament. I think that the people of Canada as well are beginning to realize that these demands are unreasonable and are dangerous to the institution.

At this moment, Mr. Speaker, six Liberal members are present in the House of Commons. There are three or four Liberal members who are behind the curtains sneaking a look. Yet Government members are asking Parliament to grant the Government borrowing authority, for $30 billion. When our constituents go to the Farm Credit Corporation or to the bank in an attempt to borrow money, they are asked to justify in some meaningful way how they are going to spend that money. Our constituents see us here in Ottawa debating the authority to borrow billions of dollars, yet only five men and six women from the government side are present to support that request.

I will not repeat all of the facts and figures which my colleagues have brought to the attention of the House in the course of this long debate. I would certainly like to indicate my support for the subamendment we heard this afternoon and for the amendment put forward by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling). It is obvious that those two motions should be supported. I first wish to refer in general terms to the track record of the Liberal Government.

It is certainly deplorable to realize that it is only in the last 15 years that we have fallen into this rut. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the cynicism which Canadians are harbouring for us and our institution began in the last 15 years with a Prime Minister and a Government prepared to borrow money to this great extent simply to ensure re-election. In my view, that is the shameful part of this whole exercise.

There is one other point which I think must be stressed. It is even more shameful and it is an even greater cause for cynicism on the part of Canadians that they were told this afternoon that each and every Canadian will be responsible for a debt of about $7,000. Every Canadian inherits that debt because of the actions of an irresponsible government. I am not surprised that we see that kind of response from Canadians. However, it bothers me to think that that is happening. The feelings that Canadians have towards this very cherished institution of ours gives me some real cause for concern.

• (1750)

The Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) raised an interesting question about whether this borrowing was the cause of the economic malaise we are suffering or the result of it. While acknowledging that some of it was a cause, he came to the conclusion that largely it was the result of economic mismanagement. In a way he is right, although he missed the crucial question that should be asked when one is assessing the significance of a borrowing.

Some Members mentioned this afternoon—as I have in a previous speech—that there are really two kinds of borrowing. For instance, I can borrow money to finance a trip to Florida or around the world. That would not bring much economic return to me or to the country. On the other hand, I could borrow money in order to establish a farm or a commercial enterprise. In return that would bring economic dividends to the country.

The Hon. Member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon) put on record that we spend $40 billion on social programs, $20 billion to service the debt and only $10 billion on economic development. That shows the problem we have with borrowing. It is not done to advance the economy but to finance social programs. These programs are good in themselves and I can support them. I have no problem with them conceptually or philosophically speaking; the problem is that they are like my trip to Florida—if I have to borrow money for that and keep on doing it for other things, I will run into trouble.

The drop in the dollar and the high interest rates are a reflection of the economic community's assessment of the wisdom of this country and its reasons for borrowing money. There are some good reasons for borrowing money, however. When I came to this House just under 10 years ago, the Minister for Science and Technology at that time, Mr. Drury, had the gall—although perhaps he did not know any better—to say that we did not have to invest money in research and development for science and technology because we could buy it from the United States or Europe. That kind of thinking got us into the difficulties we are experiencing now. We have not recognized the importance of spending adequate funds on science and technology research and development. If we were to borrow money for those purposes we would reap significant returns in the years ahead.

Some of us have had the pleasure of listening to Dr. Larkin Kerwin, the Chairman of the National Research Council, who has pointed out very frankly that a number of years ago we made the choice to spend money on our own enjoyment. We did not take the route taken by the Germans and the Japanese. They borrow money for the advancement of science and technology in their country and they reap the dividends while we sit here with a fair degree of economic distress. We should deplore the Government's asking for this kind of borrowing again when it has not been able to demonstrate that it will put the money to effective use.

There are some interesting concepts in taxation that we should consider seriously, Mr. Speaker. We should get away from the concept of taxing effective and efficient businesses. We tax their profits and discourage them. We should look for a new tax philosophy where people would be taxed more on net cost. This would make them more efficient and less wasteful. We would then have an economy where people would be encouraged to invest in this country rather than being discouraged as they are at the present time.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. NIELSEN—SUGGESTED IRREGULARITY IN SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C)—RULING OF MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: The Chair would like to rule on the point of order raised by the Hon. Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) earlier today concerning the procedural acceptability of vote 1c under National Revenue in the Supplementary Estimates (C) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1984.

The Hon. Member argued that Vote 1c, which would increase the program expenditures for Customs and Excise by an amount of $434,000, seeks to appropriate money for purposes, in part, not authorized by Parliament, namely an amount of $225,000 for the offshore extension of Customs and Excise jurisdiction. The Hon. Member submitted that the Vote anticipates a decision by the House with respect to Bill C-16, an Act to apply the customs and excise jurisdiction of Canada to the continental shelf of Canada and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof, which is still on the Order Paper for second reading.

The Chair has now had the opportunity to examine Vote 1c in relation to Bill C-16 and agrees with the Hon. Member that it would authorize a new program without the appropriate legislative authority. The rulings of the Chair since 1974 clearly emphasize that it is not procedurally correct to use an Appropriation Act to establish a new program.

May I quote Speaker Sauvé to that effect, who said on June 12, 1981 and on March 21, 1983, that "the Appropriation Act should only seek authority to spend the money for a program that has been previously authorized by a statute".

Since the required expenditure for offshore extension of customs and excise jurisdiction has not yet received legislative authorization, I must find that portion of Vote 1c out of order. Accordingly, Vote 1c—Customs and Excise—Program expenditures udner National Revenue, in the Supplementary Estimates (C) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1984, shall be reduced by an amount equal to that required for the offshore extension, namely $225,000, and I so order.

The Hon. Member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence).

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, was I recognized by the Chair or was the Hon. Member recognized before me?

Mr. Speaker: I recognized the Hon. Member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence).

Mr. Pinard: I respect your ruling, Mr. Speaker. Out of deference, I shall let the Hon. Member deliver his speech.

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1984-85

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacLaren that Bill C-21, an Act to provide borrowing authority, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs; and the amendment of Mr. Darling (p. 2292) and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Deans (p. 2299).

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon we are talking about the borrowing Bill. We need a borrowing Bill of such an amount because of the waste and extravagance practised by the Government. I should like to bring to the attention of the House one small example of unnecessary expense in the Supplementary Estimates. We will have to register an objection to it by tomorrow if we want a vote on it. Last night at the Standing Committee of Justice and Legal Affairs, Supplementary Estimates (C) were dealt with. I noted a small item in Vote 1c of those Estimates which just carries the blunt heading "Information". A $45,000 estimate was put down for that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I inquire from the Hon. Member if I understood correctly that he is referring to a matter that is now before a committee of the House?

Mr. Lawrence: No, Sir, it is not before a committee of the House now. I wish it were. This is the only means I have to publicize some of the expense, extravagance and lack of explanation given to Members regarding these things. That is why we have a borrowing Bill and that is my complaint.

After a great deal of heeing and hawing and hooing by civil servants, this turned out to be an expenditure of $32,500. That is not a large amount as far as expenditures are concerned but it turns out that this is a one-tenth share of the Department of Justice in regard to an over-all bill by the Canadian Unity Information Office. When we asked what that referred to, we were told that they really did not know, except that it was a special advertising campaign. They did not know what that covered nor did they know how it was figured out that the Department of Justice should have a one-tenth share of it. That is why we will object tomorrow to Supplementary Estimates Vote 1c, Department of Justice.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being six o'clock p.m., this House stands adjourned until 11 a.m. tomorrow, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 6 p.m., the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 62—TOURIST INDUSTRY

Mr. Speaker: Before putting the motion in the name of the Hon. Member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek), since today is the final allotted day, the House will go through the usual procedures to consider and dispose of Supply Bills. In view of recent practices, do Hon. Members agree that the Supply Bills be distributed now?

I should caution the House that the Supply Bill which is in order for presentation does not reflect the decision of the Chair at six o'clock last night to eliminate one item. Therefore, the Bill which would be distributed would be for the information of Hon. Members. The Bill actually introduced at the appropriate time would be amended accordingly. Is there unanimous consent to have the Bills distributed at this point with the proviso I have indicated?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton) moved:

That this House condemns the Government for having allowed Canada's tourism deficit to reach a staggering $2.1 billion in 1983, and having thus caused over 100,000 Canadian jobs to be lost in that year alone, and for failing to remedy the overtaxation which is the underlying problem which plagues this labour-intensive industry and which pushes prices to non-competitive levels thereby counteracting any positive impact that might be generated by the Government's marketing expenditures.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this Party is presenting this Opposition Day motion today on tourism for a variety of obvious reasons. Less than a year ago, April 14 of last year, the Progressive Conservative Party had an Opposition Day on tourism headed by the Hon. Member for Malpeque (Mr. Gass) to try to impress upon the Government the great importance of this sector to the Canadian economy. It is nearly a full year since that Opposition Day, Mr. Speaker, and the Government has yet to touch the root of the problem. In fact, the deficit, as the motion points out, has skyrocketed to a staggering $2.1 billion, resulting in over 100,000 Canadian jobs being lost in 1983 alone.

I will just very quickly review the importance of the tourist industry and the complete lack of regard by the Liberal administration for the major problems facing that industry today. In dollar terms, Mr. Speaker, tourism and travel are worth $17 billion each year in Canada which accounts for roughly 5 per cent of the GNP. Travel and tourism employs over one million Canadians.

In these days of such high levels of unemployment, surely the Government should be putting a lot more emphasis on the tourist industry if for no other reason than the potential employment which exists in this sector. Jobs are being lost every day in this industry as the Government continues to take no action. Visitors from abroad last year spent as much as $3.9 billion, making tourism one of the biggest earners of foreign exchange in this country. According to the Canadian Government office of tourism, this industry has a higher employment multiplier than any of the 40 leading industries of our nation.

I could expand on the tremendous importance of tourism to this country, but because of time limitations, Mr. Speaker, I will just say very briefly that the travel industry in Canada is not living up to its potential. In fact, tourism in this country is an industry under siege. The Liberal Government cannot blame international conditions in this regard as it has in other matters, because on the international market Canada's share of world tourism fell from 4.6 per cent in 1972 to a dismal 2.7 per cent in 1981. In other words, in that decade we lost half of our share of tourism in the world market.

Why is it that tourism in Canada is decreasing while at the same time it is increasing in other countries? I repeat and underline the fact that the Liberal administration cannot blame international market forces in this regard.

• (1115)

There are nearly 100,000 more Canadians outside Canada every night of the year than there are foreigners in Canada, and the travel account deficit grows at over $3 million per day. This does not include the travel deficit with the U.S., because there are 74,000 more Canadians in the U.S. every night of the year than there are Americans in Canada. The deficit there grows by nearly $2 million a day. That is a total of over $5 million a day, representing a staggering figure of $2.1 billion last year and growing. That is unacceptable yet the Government is not acting.

Some want to blame the problem on our winters. I have news for them, Mr. Speaker. Last July, when the Canadian market should be at its strongest, travel to the U.S. was up by 37.3 per cent over the previous year. That throws that argument out the window because Canadians are travelling abroad in the summer just as much as in the winter. But the winter months can be taken advantage of. Canadians go skiing in Switzerland, Austria, Italy and to Aspen, Colorado. We could be attracting tourists to Canada in the winter months as well as during our beautiful summers.

The main problem affecting the tourist industry in Canada is one of over-taxation, Mr. Speaker. We can throw all the other minor problems out the window, but if we do not deal with the overtaxation of the tourist industry immediately, we are going to find ourselves with a growing deficit which will bankrupt this country even more than it already is. In fact, the Tourist Industry Association of Canada estimates that unless there is a reversal of Government policy, our travel deficit next year is going to reach a staggering $4 billion.

We have over-taxed ourselves in lodging, food, gasoline and alcohol and what does the Minister of State for Small Business and Tourism (Mr. Smith) say when we question him repeatedly in this matter in the House? He says: "Go and talk to the provincial Premiers; they should be dealing with the problems". Shame on you, Mr. Minister. You know it is the federal Government that has to take the initiative to deal with this major problem. When the Conservative Party forms the Government, I can assure you that its first priority in this regard is going to be to call a federal-provincial conference to deal with the problems of over-taxation and to set an example to the provinces by reducing or freezing taxation wherever possible in the tourist industry.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jelinek: We can no longer continue to put the blame on others. We must share the blame in this Parliament, in this House, and deal with it in a straightforward way. I know that may sound partisan to some extent.

Some Hon. Members: Yes!

Mr. Jelinek: I knew the Liberal squeakers in the back-benches would agree with that. That is why I brought a letter addressed to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) by the President of the Tourist Industry Association of Canada, Mr. Garth Campbell, who says:

—tourism is the one area of economic activity—employing over 10 per cent of the Canadian working population and potentially much more—where Canada's price competitiveness or lack of it is clearly exposed. Neither tariffs nor quotas nor clever advertising can hide these facts.

● (1120)

I want the back-bench Liberal squeakers to listen to this.

Mr. Harquail: Can you read what he said?

Mr. Jelinek: The letter went on to say:

Sad to say, the budget of April 19 did virtually nothing to resolve any of the problems we had underlined. Nor did it offer any assurance that the message being advanced by this Industry was understood. Certainly the leadership we had hoped to see from the Federal Government was not forthcoming.

By their comments it appears that the Liberals are very interested in what I am reading. Therefore I will continue:

It is our sad prediction that if travel trends evident even in the first quarter of this year continue, the 1984 deficit will be substantially above $3 billion!

Translated into jobs . . . The figure for 1984 could well exceed 150,000 jobs!

That is 150,000 lost jobs in the tourist industry. The Government is spending hundreds of million of tax dollars on non-productive, costly, make-work projects that are only temporary and which put the Canadian populace back on to the unemployment insurance roll after they have served their purpose.

In Mr. Campbell's letter to the Minister of Finance he went on to say:

We submit . . . that investment in tax relief for tourism could well leave the federal government financial situation in a more favourable position . . . tax reductions would be balanced against reductions in unemployment insurance payments and increased revenues generated by increased economic activity.

Those are some quotes from TIAC which is the most important assembly of tourist people from across the country who are trying to look after the welfare of the tourist industry. I know they have good communication with the Minister of State for Small Business and Tourism. I know they are in constant contact with the Minister of Finance, but the Liberals do not listen. They sit in their ivory towers in Ottawa and have no idea what is going on in the real world of business and tourism. That is why the tourist industry, as well as other industries and sectors of the economy, is suffering, Mr. Speaker.

I know the Minister has just returned from a trip in the United States where he promoted the great advertising budget which he has increased to advertise Canada abroad, particularly in the United States. I wish him well in that, I am glad he has finally increased that budget to match what it was over a decade ago. It is a step in the right direction and we respect that and agree with it. However, it is not going to solve the problem. The problem is over-taxation. I hope the Minister will deal with the taxation problem when he gets up, rather than just show that he has increased Government expenditures using tax dollars to advertise Canada. Tourists are not going to come into Canada if it is 30 per cent more costly to come to Canada than to travel to Europe or in the United States, no matter how many millions of tax dollars are used to advertise Canada. It becomes somewhat suspect that the Government is advertising tourism in an election year, using Liberal agencies to spread that money to perhaps advertise themselves. I will not dwell on that, but it does become suspect.

I believe I have two or three minutes left, Mr. Speaker. A Conservative Government would give greater recognition and consideration to this vital sector. That would become a PC policy thrust. The first thing we would do to recognize the sector, as we are doing now, is to give very serious consideration to establishing a separate ministry for tourism to deal with the problems of that vital sector of our economy. As I said earlier, the first step that ministry would take would be to call a federal-provincial conference to deal with taxation, to set an example and freeze tourist taxes wherever possible, and try to find ways and means of reducing them in certain areas. Federal and provincial taxes for alcoholic beverages, for example, account for 85 per cent of the retail costs in Canada. That is just one example of many and the Minister knows the others.

Since I do not have enough time to dwell on these, my colleagues on this side will dwell on some of the other matters throughout the day. The burden of payroll taxes should be reduced. We will look at ways to seek equitable tax measures that do not penalize labour-intensive industries like tourism. We shall develop a national tourism plan in co-operation with the provinces, utilizing the destination resort areas concept.

We will ensure departmental co-operation so that all federal decisions are arrived at with the complete understanding of their effects on tourism. Further steps will be taken to upgrade the status of tourism within the federal bureaucracy in order to protect the entrepreneur from potentially damaging government programs and legislation. In other words, to establish an advocacy role in the various other government departments. To this end, a Progressive Conservative Government shall establish in each relevant department a tourist co-ordinator to act as that advocate. We will provide incentives to promote the growth and development of a family owned tourism business in all regions to take advantage of Canada's tourist potential.

The list of our specific initiatives in policies which we will be outlining goes on and on. Since I am running out of time, I just want to repeat one major point. An election may not take place until a year from now or it may take place in August or November. We cannot wait for a Progressive Conservative Government which understands tourism and would take the necessary steps to deal with the problem. On behalf of the Conservative Party, I call on the Liberal Government to take action now in respect to cost competitiveness, to take action now to sit down with the provinces and start freezing and reducing, wherever possible, tourism taxes in order to be able to permit that advertising campaign in the United States which the Minister has just launched to become effective.

If it will not be cost competitive for tourists to come to Canada from the United States or elsewhere, I repeat that no matter how many millions of tax dollars the Minister will use in advertising, it will not attract tourists to this country. Not only do I call on the Minister and the Government to act now, but I plead with them because we are talking about jobs, we are talking about the economy as a whole and we are talking about the well-being of Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): There is a ten-minute question period permitted, but it has been our practice for the first round of speakers to speak before questions are put. However, it is the option of the House. If it wishes a ten-minute question period, there can be.

Mr. McCauley: Mr. Speaker, I listened with some interest to what the Hon. Member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek) was saying. I was wondering if he was ever going to get around to suggesting policy alternatives. I thought he spent a lot of time criticizing and very little time offering solutions, but toward the end of his address he did begin to deal with solutions. He outlined a shotgun approach in terms of what his side would do if they ever did form a government. What, in his opinion, are the three main policies that his Party would introduce with regard to tourism?

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, I do not know where the Hon. Member was during the last 10 or 15 minutes of my comments when I outlined the policies that the Conservative Party will take when we form the government. If I could be very brief in answering, it would be to deal with overtaxation, to deal with overtaxation, and to deal with overtaxation of the tourist industry, plus all of the other initiatives which I outlined in my speech.

Mr. Manly: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek) rightly pointed out that the tourist industry is very labour intensive. Many tourist areas are also very low-wage areas. Some of them have right-to-work legislation which undercuts the role of unions in establishing decent wage levels. Our Party is very much opposed to this legislation. Would the Hon. Member for Halton give his opinion on right-to-work legislation and whether he opposes it?

• (1130)

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, if we had to depend on the policies and wishes of the New Democratic Party, the tourist industry deficit in this country would not be $2.1 billion. There would be a $6 billion deficit.

Mr. Manly: Mr. Speaker, I asked a very straight-forward question, whether the Hon. Member for Halton supports or opposes right-to-work legislation. That is very germane to a debate about tourism. We in this Party, the House and the Canadian people would like an answer, not further diatribes about the NDP.

Mr. Jelinek: What a ridiculous statement, Mr. Speaker! I will speak for myself in respect of the right to work. In Canada people should have the right to work whenever they want to work. I believe that people in Canada should have the right to do whatever they want in this free country. I was forced to escape from a country that was run by philosophies of the nature of the New Democratic Party. I escaped from that country to come to a country that has the rights and freedoms that are honoured in this country.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harquail: Mr. Speaker, it is very good that the Canadian people can observe the lead speaker for the Official Opposition, the critic on the subject of tourism, giving what has to be termed a shameful performance this morning. He admits that it has been one year since he last raised this important issue. He did not bother to talk about the fact that this involves $16.5 billion for the economy of this country and over 100,000 businesses. This is very important. The Hon. Member did not say anything about the attractiveness, the resources and the reasons people come to Canada. He offered nothing of a positive nature concerning what this beautiful country has to offer in the sense of the tourism attractions.

What has he said? A couple of times he wanted to talk about an election, but he was not sure when it was going to be.

Mr. Jelinek: Are you? How about tomorrow?

Mr. Harquail: Mr. Speaker, he admitted he does not know. When he said he did not know, he admitted quite a bit. He has obviously proved to us this morning that he knows very little about this subject. He admitted two or three times after quoting from the letter at length that that was the basis of his speech. He did not explain why it was he could not prepare a better speech than he tried to put across to the House this morning, pointing out some of the objectives of his Party and some of the positive things his Party might do. He might explain why he does not travel across Canada. He spends most of his time at ski competitions in Europe.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Before I call for the response, I just want to clarify that this period allows for comments as well as questions.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, I was just going to say what you said. The Member is criticizing my speech. He does not even know how to pose a question because he did not pose one.

Hon. David Smith (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to enter this debate. I am pleased that the Opposition has seen fit to allocate an Opposition Day to this very important topic. It is an exciting topic. Tourism does offer growth potential for the Canadian economy. I find it a challenge to be involved in selling Canada. I agree with much of what the Hon. Member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek) said in terms of the importance of the tourist industry to this country. What I do not agree with are the conclusions that he has reached vis-à-vis what the Government is doing about it.

The motion we are debating deplores the size of the travel account deficit for 1983. I think most people know that the deficit arises because Canadians spend more abroad than we earn from visitors. The Hon. Member has approached this subject from a completely negative point of view. He made no reference to the fact that most Canadians did their travelling at home. In 1983, Canadians spent $14 billion travelling in Canada, three times what they spent abroad. That $14 billion spent by Canadians in Canada was a record high. Just to dwell on the deficit does not present a balanced perspective.

We have to concede that in terms of much of the travel Canadians engage in outside of the country, it is to sun destinations, particularly at this time of the year. I am sure all of us have had a warm winter vacation from time to time. Regrettably Canada does not have a banana belt area. To be fair, this is something we have to bear in mind.

Mr. McKinnon: Have you not heard of Victoria?

Mr. Smith: With regard to those who may be going overseas, Europe in particular, while our dollar has been down a bit vis-à-vis the United States, it has been at a very high level of exchange with Europe. That offers a further incentive to Canadians to go to Europe, where the exchange rate is so much in their favour.

The deficit also reflects the fact that fewer visitors came to Canada in 1983. According to OECD, many countries suffered tourism declines because of the widespread economic recession. Canada was no exception. Our chief loss in the last couple of years has been in the number of visitors from overseas. From 1982 to 1983, the number of visitors from the United States was up 2.4 per cent. As a result of some of the efforts this Government has undertaken, that increase will carry on in 1984.

The Hon. Member for Halton talked about a loss of 100,000 jobs in 1983. That statement is not accurate. Those jobs were not lost. There were not jobs that suddenly disappeared. Statistics Canada data reveals that employment in tourism has increased steadily over the last decade. I suppose he could make the argument that had our slice of the world market continued at a pace with some other countries during the past decade, we could have had 100,000 more jobs. One could argue that. Quite frankly, I would have liked to see that. I hope that in years to come we will see those jobs being created. However, it is important to make it abundantly clear that jobs have not been lost, jobs that actually existed.

The motion speaks of taxation of the industry as a problem. Presumably the Hon. Member meant federal taxation. When Tourism Canada collaborated with the Tourism Industry Association of Canada in a survey of tourist businesses three years ago, the study revealed that the majority of businesses perceived municipal and provincial taxation as their main constraints, not federal taxation.

The motion states that our tourism industry is totally uncompetitive internationally. The retail price of gasoline in Canada is higher than in the United States, but this is due more to provincial taxes than federal. That is a fact. Everything is relative. Vis-à-vis Europe, gasoline prices in Canada are still favourable. Gasoline in this country is at the price it is because of an agreement between the federal Government and the producing provinces, primarily Alberta. For a couple of years this Government fought long and hard to reach the best possible agreement on behalf of Canadian consumers. Does the Hon. Member feel we should now rip up that agreement? That is not the way that this Government operates. When we enter into an agreement with the Province of Alberta and other oil-producing provinces, we honour that agreement. I have not heard of Alberta wanting to rip up that agreement because of the impact it has on tourism.

We also heard reference to the taxation of alcoholic beverages in Canada as compared to the United States. It is important to get the facts straight. In terms of tax revenue, the fact is that the federal Government share is 31 per cent. That means that the provincial government share is 69 per cent. However, the more interesting figure is that ten years ago the federal Government's share of tax revenue from the sale of alcoholic beverages was 40 per cent. During that decade perhaps the price of alcoholic beverages has risen at an uncompetitive rate vis-à-vis the United States, but the federal slice has gone down 9 per cent and the provincial slice has risen 9 per cent.

• (1140)

It is one thing for the Hon. Member to say that he just washes his hands of it and that the ball is in the provinces' court, but if provincial taxes had gone down at a rate comparable with federal taxes, perhaps we would not have this problem. We have to be realistic. We hear many speeches on the other side of the House about the deficit in the country. I do not think most provincial governments, which are all in deficit positions, will be forgoing revenues along the lines suggested here.

We in this country ought to accentuate the positive. This is a tremendous country. People can have a great vacation experience when they visit Canada. We should talk about the things in our favour. Let us look at the price of hotel rooms in large cities. In New York City, the average frist-class hotel room now costs $144 per night. In Montreal, a comparable room costs $77 or almost half. Recently I was in Washington, D.C. on business. Some of the people who attended this meeting with U.S. officials were staying in a Canadian-owned hotel and were paying $165 U.S. per night for a single room. That does not happen in Toronto, Montreal or Vancouver. Let us be fair. Why spread doom and gloom? Let us talk about the good news. The good news is that if Americans want to come to Canada, they can have a cosmopolitan experience. They can attend the theatre, go to museums and good restaurants in our big cities. Compared with New York City, they will get a bargain. We should be talking about that in a positive way.

The Government has recognized tourism as a major industry. In the December Throne Speech there were a number of upfront references to the importance of that industry. Since 1975 some $240 million of federal money has been invested in the development of an improved variety of facilities and services through federal-provincial tourism industry development subagreements, and $100 million of federal funds has been invested in new convention centres in all regions of the country. Tens of millions of dollars are being spent on tourism-related projects through the Special Recovery Capital Projects Program. Since 1975 more than $200 million has been spent on tourism marketing, and so far I have not gone beyond the mandate of the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion. Across the federal Government as a whole, over $100 million is spent annually to the benefit of the tourism industry.

While I am on that subject, the Hon. Member suggested that we should have a separate department. There are many sectors of the economy for which we could say there should be separate departments. Quite frankly, on balance the tourism industry is better off having its interests represented by the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion, which many people still think of as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It is one of the main and most powerful federal departments. An industry is better off being up front and centre with a main department than being an orphan off on its own somewhere.

A year ago when there was a similar debate in the House the Government spokesman indicated goals of incremental funds for tourism marketing and tourism development support for all regions of Canada and the establishment of a Tourism Advisory Council for dialogue with the private sector. I believe all these goals have been met.

Let me illustrate the first point with the development side. Everyone knows that we must have the right product, at the right price, at the right time in the market. When the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion was established last year, the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion (Mr. Lumley) established the new mainline program, the Industrial and Regional Development Program, otherwise known as IRDP, the Government's main delivery system for economic assistance throughout the country. Tourism is a beneficiary of IRDP. This is the first time tourism has ever benefited from a departmental core program. If that does not indicate recognition and support, I do not know what does. All regional offices of that department, which is one of the biggest in the Government, are assigning a high priority to tourism.

Tourism program delivery staff in the regions has been doubled compared with the staff under the former Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. IRDP channels significant financial assistance to companies, that is tourist operations, private sector operations, to assist them to be internationally competitive by stressing the establishment, expansion and modernization of facilities and services to attract international and interprovincial visitors. Increased productivity is a key objective. IRDP is clearly serving tourism. Current data shows that about 20 per cent of the proposals under IRDP are tourism related.

Also we are anxious to carry on agreements with all the provinces whereby we have subagreements under the general development agreements or the new economic and regional development agreements, so as to target tourism activity and identify things on which we and the provinces can work together to promote tourism in Canada.

The real challenge is the whole area of marketing. We have to step up our marketing efforts. In fact we are doing that, and we hope to do it in a way which will help us regain some lost ground. Every businessman knows that when competition increases it is time for increased marketing effort. The Government has accorded $22 million of incremental marketing funds to Tourism Canada for the 1984 calendar year. Offhand, I am not aware of any other department, agency or area of government activity which has had that amount of increase. The prime purpose of this is to make up the lost ground suffered when marketing budgets failed to keep pace with inflation.

Our research indicates that the market potential is there. We are convinced that additional marketing effort will bring positive results and that the moneys will not be wasted. Let us take, for example, the efforts in the United States. Within a few weeks we will be launching a major television campaign in the United States. I have visited New York City and Boston. Yesterday I was in Boston talking to three daily newspapers and four radio stations promoting tourism in Canada. We met with travel agents, people in the travel industry and people in the travel trade magazine industry. We did that in New York as well. That is what we have to do and in fact is what we are doing. In 1984 we will be spending some $15 million in extra effort in the United States. We want to increase the number of American visitors to Canada.

In addition to being on television in the United States, we are currently on radio and are involved in a major magazine and newspaper campaign, all meant to reinforce in the minds of Americans Canada as a tourist destination. We are not just limiting that effort to the United States; we are going after overseas markets as well. For the first time, this year we launched a television campaign in Australia. That is a growing market for us. We are also very active in the United Kingdom and in Germany. I have met with people in the private sector in Great Britain who are interested in bringing tourists to Canada—airlines, tour operators and hotel chains. We are trying to co-ordinate our efforts, all for the purpose of increasing overseas dollars. It would appear that this has become a growth area over the past decade. About 10 years ago, only 3 per cent of tourist expenditures in this country came from overseas visitors. That has now risen to about 8 per cent.

I see that my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) is present. We are going after visitors from the Pacific Rim including Hong Kong, Japan, Singapore and Korea. Last year the number of visitors who came from Hong Kong was up 14 per cent over the previous year. This is not just happening out of the blue but is happening because of the policy of the Government, which is to go after those markets quite aggressively.

The third main thrust of the Government is to improve the regulatory framework and to enhance the business environment for tourism. We are making progress in this area. I would like to commend the efforts of my colleague, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Axworthy), in bringing about hearings to take a hard look at the regulation of air fares in the country. I for one think that we need a little more competition in that industry. I have appeared before that body and made my views known. I hope that we will move in the direction of liberalizing the regulation of air fares in Canada.

I would also like to commend the efforts of my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Bussières), in simplifying port of entry measures for bringing convention material into Canada. I might add that later on this year the largest convention centre in the country will open. It is located in Toronto and will have 200,000 square feet of exhibit space. With that facility and with the over 20,000 hotel rooms in Toronto, we can go after the biggest conventions in the world. That sort of activity will benefit people in all parts of Canada because whenever international visitors come to any part of Canada for a convention, they usually have pre- or post-convention tours to various parts of the country. Of course, that convention centre is being built with the assistance of federal funds, as have a dozen other convention centres throughout the country.

My colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Roberts), has now designated certain of the skilled tourism culinary trades as a priority for his departmental training programs. A culinary school at George Brown College in Toronto was recently opened. A lot of federal funds have gone into that project which is also aimed at improving the quality of the tourist experience of a person who comes to this country.

We are working on development of the product and we are working on marketing. We are trying to improve the business environment. This is being done in consultation with the private sector. Just three months ago, the Tourims Industry Association of Canada and I worked out an arrangement whereby we established a permanent consultative committee with about 30 representatives from all parts of the country on the advisory council to act as liaison with the private sector.

I like to approach tourism from a positive viewpoint. Surely there are things we can do and we are trying to do those things. We have poured additional moneys into the tourist industry. The year 1984 has been called the year of tourism in Canada by the private sector. We in Government believe in that and are trying to co-operate with the private sector to make it true. We are trying to turn the figures around by reducing the tourism deficit. I think that we really should approach the issue in a positive vein and continue to sell what I think is the greatest country in the world to people from all over the world and bring those people here to Canada.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister a couple of questions. First, I would hope that he would ensure that he made no misleading comments respecting the oil pricing agreement with the Province of Alberta. I think he left the impression that the federal Government could not extract a better deal from the Province of Alberta. The fact of the matter, which should not go unnoticed, is that when the deal was signed, the producing provinces were providing oil at a price which was approximately 55 per cent of world price. Yet at the retail level, that price exceeded the world price. That gap was essentially taken up by a federal Government tax. The consumer of gas and oil in the country did not receive the benefit of the low price that was negotiated with the producing provinces. Yes, our prices have been scaled up and international prices have come down, but Canadians in general did not receive the benefits of the low-priced energy agreement which was struck between the producing provinces and the federal Government.

The Minister spoke about being positive. I agree with him that we must be positive and do things that will enhance the tourist industry. If the Minister is interested in a constructive and positive approach, I wonder why the Government saw fit suddenly and unilaterally to dismantle 20 per cent of the VIA Rail passenger service in the country. That move created chaos and havoc in the tourist industry, particularly with the Japanese sector of the tourist industry. I think that some $40 million worth of tourist revenue was lost annually as a result of the dismantlement of that service and one community in particular, Jasper, Alberta, lost $10 million annually. If the Minister is so positive about tourism in the country today, why did the Government unilaterally dismantle the VIA Rail service, not only hurting the tourist industry but undermining confidence in Canada as a viable country to visit?

Mr. Smith: Mr. Speaker, there is no easy answer to the Hon. Member's last question. The fact is that hardly a day goes by that we do not hear complaints from the other side about government spending and the deficit. The fact is that the subsidy to VIA Rail tickets has been at a cost of around $98 a ticket. To be in the railway business is to lose hundreds of millions of dollars. Notwithstanding that, the Government has tried to pay particular attention to those areas which have been adversely affected by the railway cuts.

As the Hon. Member well knows, the service between Winnipeg and Edmonton has in fact been restored. I am going to be in Jasper myself in two or three weeks along with the Minister of Transport. I have been dialoguing with people from Jasper. We appreciate the problem and we are trying to see what we can do to resolve it in a satisfactory way.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, am I to take it from that answer that the Minister is not in support of the reinstatement of the VIA Rail passenger service between Vancouver and Edmonton? Unless he is in support of that, then that issue will remain unresolved.

While I am on my feet, I might say that the Minister may wish to answer the question with respect to airline deregulation. I would remind the House that the current airline structure was established under successive Liberal régimes. What specifically does the Minister propose to do to reduce the burden of cost arising out of our extravagant airport system, our higher labour costs, higher fuel costs and higher operating costs which must inevitably be passed on to the travelling public? What will he do about reducing the losses to the airport revolving fund which this year, in the case of one airport alone, will chalk up a deficit of close to $50 million? Does the Minister have anything positive to suggest which would reduce the burden on the air travelling consumer?

Mr. Smith: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I appeared before the Air Transport Committee about two or three weeks ago and suggested that most Canadians perceive air costs in Canada as being higher than those in the United States. The airlines usually argue that the full fare rate for equal distances, taking into consideration the exchange rate, are comparable. That is true. However, what is misleading about that is that there is more access to discounted fares in the United States, both in terms of destination and in terms of the lead time required to get a discounted ticket. The end result is that about 90 per cent of the consumers in the United States are flying on some type of discounted ticket, whereas in Canada the figure is about 35 per cent to 40 per cent.

I recommended to the Air Transport Committee that there be some relaxation in the regulations so that in fact there can be more destinations and less lead time for discounted tickets. The fact of the matter is that there are not as many airlines in this country as there are in the United States. In the United States it was possible for the industry to cope with a couple of airlines going into receivership. Most of the airlines in the country lost money last year. I think if we have a more liberal approach to the pricing of tickets in this country—I say that in a philosophical and not a partisan sense, as my colleagues know—and if there is some relaxation, then more people would fly.

Mr. Mazankowski: What about the infrastructure?

Mr. Gass: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister. The number of Canadians travelling to the United States has been increasing rather substantially and the reverse has been happening with Americans coming to Canada. In July of last year compared to July, 1982 the number of Canadians travelling to the United States increased by 37 per cent. It is all very well for the Minister to say that Canadians travel to the United States because there is better weather down there. I do not buy that. I wonder if the Minister could tell us why there was an increase of 37 per cent in the number of Canadians going south in July of last year.

Mr. Smith: Mr. Speaker, I think you get a more accurate picture if you take the figures over the year as a whole. There was an increase of 2.4 per cent in the number of Americans coming to Canada from 1982 to 1983. My hon. friend is correct; during the warm summer months the weather in Canada is better than it is anywhere in the United States. We should be promoting that and we are. We have just launched a television campaign to encourage Canadians to vacation in Canada. I hope no one will disagree with that. We want to have Canadians thinking more about vacationing in this country. That is not to say that Canadians should never go to the United States or travel abroad. All we want to do is narrow the gap so we are trying to market this country as best we can. The number one medium these days is television and I have received a lot of positive comments about the television campaign that we have launched to address the very matter that the Hon. Member raises.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of State for Small Business and Tourism (Mr. Smith) said a few moments ago that during the winter Canada had no tourist centres at all. I should like to welcome him to Victoria some time where we have a tourist trade for 12 months of the year. At the present time the daffodils are in full bloom, crocuses have gone but the tulips will soon be out and the flowering trees are in bloom. We could show him many tourist attractions.

I must admit that I might find some difficulty in digging up any Liberals to meet him. To meet an elected Liberal he would have to drive 1,500 miles east, traversing three big provinces before finding one. Outside of that I am sure it would be an eye opener for him to learn that we have a 12-month tourist season in Victoria. We would like him to encourage Canadians and Americans to enjoy it.

Mr. Smith: Mr. Speaker, I think the Hon. Member knows that I was raised in Victoria and lived on the route where the Tallyho went by every day. I am well aware of the many features Victoria has to offer. It is a vacation destination for 12 months of the year.

What I said was that we do not have a banana belt in this country—I believe those were my exact words. With the greatest of respect to my friend from Victoria, I do not think there are too many people lying on the beaches of Victoria these days but I do think they are golfing. I am the first to sing and extol the praises of Victoria.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): That is the end of the 10-minute period for questions and comments.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I may not take up my entire 20 minutes but I should like to put two or three views on the record. I spoke in a debate not unlike this one last April and at that time I expressed some of my concerns. I will restate some of those concerns today; I thought they were valid then, and in many cases I think they are valid today.

This is a difficulty that cannot be solely thrust upon the federal Government. I think provincial governments and the federal Government have not paid sufficient heed to the problems encountered by the tourist industry or, for that matter, have not devoted sufficient time to the development of a policy which would make Canada a more attractive place for those who want to take their vacation in their own country and a more attractive place for people who want to come to Canada on vacation.

At times I wonder why Canadians do not spend their vacation money in their own country. There are a lot of obvious reasons for this. If you get your vacation in January and you do not ski, you would not find it too comfortable to set up a deck chair at the corner of Bronson and Laurier in an attempt to catch a few rays. We all understand that there are certain climatic and environmental considerations that make it unattractive for people to take their vacation right here in the middle of the winter. There are people whose vacation is assigned to them during the months of December, January, February and even March.

For Members of the House of Commons to criticize Canadians who do not spend their vacation time at home is hypocritical. We all know that a significant minority, if not the majority, of Members of Parliament travel to areas with warmer weather during the winter in order to enjoy that kind of vacation. For example, I noted with interest that both the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) spent their Christmas break in Florida. In fact, they attended a party at the home of one of Canada's best known industrialists on New Year's Eve. I do not think it would be proper for us to admonish Canadians for travelling outside the country when we do it ourselves.

Why do people travel, Mr. Speaker? Why do they go away? In many instances it is because they like warm weather. They go away because they believe that to travel and see other parts of the world is beneficial; it broadens their background and improves their education, gives them an insight into lifestyles and the development of other parts of the world. I do not think we want to discourage that. One of the main reasons people travel outside the country is that it is cheaper to do that than it is to travel in Canada. If we look at the weekend newspapers we find the travel sections full of ads for cheap fares to Florida for those who live in eastern Canada, cheap fares to California for those who live in western Canada, or vacation packages of seven, 14 days or longer in the Caribbean. If we calculate the cost of a vacation at home we may find that it costs a lot more to take a holiday in Toronto, Montreal, Halifax or Vancouver than it does for the same length of stay, including transportation costs, hotel costs, extra costs, in the southern parts of the North American Continent or the islands of the Caribbean.

What is the reason for that? One of the reasons is that while it would cost you $75 to $100 a day for a hotel in any one of the places in Canada I mentioned, summer or winter, it would cost $26 to $35 a day for similar accommodation in those other parts of the world. Four weeks ago one could fly from Toronto to Tampa or Orlando, Florida for $199 return. Where can you go in Canada for $199 return? There is more difficulty in finding the kinds of attractive package deals for vacationing in Canada than it is to find them for vacationing in other parts of the world. Whose fault is that?

If one wants to go out for dinner in many of the cities of our own country, it is a fairly expensive proposition. There has not been the development of the family restaurant which takes into account the average income families with two or three kids. These families cannot afford to lay out the big dollars, and neither do they want the exquisite and extravagant restaurants. They would be content with less expensive restaurants which serve plain but wholesome and nourishing food. But there has been no effort to develop that kind of restaurant across our own country.

Those are some of the reasons, I believe, that people who have the financial capacity to travel tend to make their plans in such a way as to take them away from Canada rather than to stay within the country. I believe we simply have to recognize that as a fact. The solutions, I feel, rest in part with the industry and in part with the various levels of government. There are arguments that the tax levels which the tourist industry must pay are overbearing. I suspect that the argument can be made that the levels of taxation in the tourist industry are indeed onerous. However, let us take a look at the consequences of reducing its taxes. Will we automatically receive a reduction in the price which will be charged to the individual who might want to take a vacation in Canada?

I have noted with interest that any time there has been a reduction in tax, the industry involved rarely, if ever, passes it on in the way of benefit to the consumer. In addition to that, if we do reduce the tax—I am not arguing against it; I am just thinking aloud about the potential for benefit—there will still be the requirement on the part of government, I assume, to meet its cost obligations. By reducing the tax on the tourism industry and related industries, we would have to raise the money somewhere else.

Mr. Jelinek: It would come in additional revenue.

Mr. Deans: My friend and colleague, the Hon. Member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek), says that the increased revenue would compensate for lower taxes. I am prepared to concede that that is a possibility. However, I am suggesting that there are no guarantees that the reduction would automatically be passed on. It has not been passed on in most areas in the past. Therefore, taking into account the other factors I mentioned, there is no reason to believe there would be a concurrent increase in revenue as a result of a reduction in the tax. I concede, however, it is an arguable point.

The same argument, incidentally, can be made for any sector of the economy. The chances are—in fact, it is almost guaranteed—that the increase in tax will be levied on the average wage earner. I feel that a reduction in taxes would be desirable and that we should make a careful study of it; but if we are going to reduce the taxes on the tourist industry, the same argument can be made for other industries, and quite legitimately, based on much the same information.

If we are going to do that, it is quite clear to me that we will still have to raise taxes and those taxes will come from those who now pay the overwhelming majority of the tax dollar, the average wage earner, who will not have the additional revenue to take his vacation anyway so he will be no better off. The average wage earner will pay more in taxes because we have reduced taxes somewhere else and will not be in any better position to travel.

Many of those who take advantage of opportunities to travel do so at public expense. I heard someone talking about conventions. I think to myself, how wonderful it is. It is a tremendous boost to the local economy to have a convention in one or another of the many centres in the country. However, the people who go to conventions, in the main, have their expenses paid for by the company for which they work. The company writes off the cost against their taxes as a cost of doing business. So ultimately the poor guy who never gets to take a holiday, who pays the bulk of the taxes, has his taxes raised in order that those people can go to conventions. I cannot help but think that perhaps it is a little bit like a dog chasing its tail. The whole argument begins and ends in the same place.

I believe what we must do is try to catalogue what it is about Canada which is attractive. There is a multitude of things which are attractive about this country. We must try to make people believe that coming to and staying in Canada for vacations, even though it does cost a little more, is desirable because they would enjoy themselves and have fun. We cannot sell the argument that they should do so because of some national interest to be served. They must believe it is better for them individually because it is nice to have a vacation in Canada. We are only going to be able to accomplish that if we can convince the hotel chains that $100 a night for a hotel room is too much, that it is more than an average family can afford. We must convince the airlines that if they are capable of flying people all the way from Toronto to Tampa for $199, they could fly people a similar distance to other parts of Canada for the same price.

We are going to have to suggest to the restaurant operators that the family-style restaurants which grew up in many parts of North America as an attraction to families on vacation should be more developed and in greater numbers here in Canada, with prices held to levels similar to what is charged elsewhere. We must try to convince the tourist industry to advertise good, solid value vacations in Banff, Montreal, Ottawa, the Gatineau, the St. Lawrence River, the East Coast, taking advantage of the beauty and enjoyment of those areas, rather than filling the pages of the travel sections of The Toronto Star, the Ottawa Citizen, the Montreal Gazette, with pictures of Antigua, Barbados, Florida and California. If we could get the tourist industry to put those kinds of ads in the newspapers, rather than selling the idea that a palm tree wafting over your head is better than a pine tree waving beside you, then maybe we would not be fighting a losing battle.

I concede that taxation may well play a part and should be looked at, as should taxation in general. I would support the careful review of that aspect of the tourist business. However, there are other things that should be done to make vacationing in Canada more attractive.

I was musing about this on my way over here and I remember a colleague of mine some years ago, Max Saltsman, saying that if Canadians are going to go south anyway, why do we not have, like the U.S., a Canadian island in the Caribbean? He suggested the Turks and Caicos. I understand the island was not necessarily opposed to that suggestion. In fact, they thought it was not such a bad idea. A lot of people here thought it was kind of humorous; a lot thought it was kind of ridiculous. However, when you think about it, it was no more ridiculous than the U.S. having Hawaii or Puerto Rico. The distances are not all that much different and, given the potential for development of a southern clime vacation spot, with the money spent in Canada, it was not really all that dumb. Maybe it should have been pursued a little more and maybe it would have resulted in our not having to have this kind of debate year after year after year. It is worthy of consideration, although I can appreciate the downside of taking on that kind of responsibility.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, let us look at why the Government cannot or does not or will not reduce the tax burden. That is important. As in all things, we should not collect one penny more in tax than is required. Neither should we tax people who cannot afford to pay. Nor should we make it impossible for business to be successful because of the tax burden they must bear. We stand by those principles. But let us also look at the industry itself, and why its promotional arm continues to promote the need for Canadians to travel to other parts of the world rather than at home. Let us look at what the industry itself has done to try and make low-cost vacationing in Canada a reality.

Is it unreasonable for us to expect that if you can go half way around the world on vacation for $400 inclusive, you ought to be able to stay in your own country and have a similar kind of vacation—albeit in the winter without the sunshine—which does not cost any more? If we were to address that issue, then I think we would probably serve the industry better and help develop the job opportunities in Canada that people are speaking about. We would also help to provide more stability for the country and in the long run we would sell Canada as a good place to spend some time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): There is a ten-minute period for questions or comments. If not, the Hon. Member for Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington (Mr. Vankoughnet).

Mr. Harquail: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I was rising for debate. Perhaps there was an interpretation that I had a question. I did not; I was rising to continue the debate and I am ready to proceed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): I realized that. If the Hon. Member had a question to put, I would have recognized him. It is now the turn of the Hon. Member of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition.

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to enter into this very important debate on tourism. It is big business in Canada and my riding is no exception. My riding is located in southeastern Ontario, midway between Montreal and Toronto, and midway between Ottawa and Toronto. It is very accessible to millions of people in the northern U.S. The area I have the honour to represent is a prime example of the potential we have to attract not only interprovincial tourists but those of our neighbour to the south. The area is known as the Land O'Lakes region because of its vast number of lakes, stretching from Lake Ontario to the Bay of Quinté in the south, to the thousands of lakes of the north, not including the beautiful area of Hastings County which touches on Algonquin Park.

The Land O' Lakes tourist region is a part of the Canadian Shield. In the southern area is the limestone bed of an ancient sea, an area better protected from the industrialized acid rain of urban areas. This gives way to the glacier-scarred ridges of the pre-Cambrian Shield as you travel north. Covered with mixed coniferous and hardwood forests, a land of bold and rugged contours but quiet beauty. This area is composed of the County of Lennox and Addington, part of the County of Hastings and most of the County of Frontenac. It is the home of the United Empire Loyalists who settled in this area in 1784. The year 1984 marks the bicentennial of the arrival of these United Empire Loyalists from the U.S.

The promotional budget for tourism has been increased from $14.5 million to $22 million, but I ask how much is being spent promoting the visit of our Head of State, Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II, to Canada, or that of His Holiness the Pope? This would mean a great deal to all Americans and Canadians across this country. A great deal has been spent to date promoting the explorer Jacques Cartier and the first setting of a white man's foot on the shores of the Gaspé in 1534, and the arrival of the majestic, full-rigged, tall ships in Quebec during this coming summer. But I ask what about the federal support for comparable functions in Ontario such as the arrival of the loyal Americans known as the United Empire Loyalists? This selective approach to advertising is only one further example of why tourism is under siege everywhere in Canada, not just in southeastern Ontario.

Over the past ten years Canada has lost almost half of its share of the international tourism trade, but if this had not happened we would today have at least 150,000 more people of all ages working in Canada. Yearly industry revenues would be $2.2 billion greater. Strangely, because of this and previous Liberal Government policies, we had a $2.1 billion tourism deficit in 1983. Canada's share of the international tourism market is measured by the number of foreigners coming to our country, not by the number of Canadians who travel abroad. This has created another problem adding to the additional problem of Canadians not spending their vacations in Canada. In 1983 alone 17.5 per cent more Canadians travelled outside Canada than in 1982, while only 0.2 per cent more foreigners came to Canada. This means that 17.3 per cent more Canadians contributed to the growth of world tourism, while 0.2 per cent more foreign tourists contributed to our share at home.

It is time Canadians addressed this growing problem and stopped the erosion before our tourist industry is in complete shambles. If this trend continues, it is expected that the deficit in tourism alone by 1987 will be $4 billion. Spending more money on advertising, especially through Liberal ad agencies, will not address the serious problem.

We as politicians must recognize the importance of this industry. There is no question that we in the Progressive Conservative Party understand the importance this industry has, not just in urban centres but in rural constituencies such as Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington. Part of our problem in Canada, from a foreign viewpoint as well as our own, is one of perception. Canada is just too expensive in comparison to alternatives. The price of such items as liquor, tobacco, gasoline, accommodation, wages, property taxes, fishing and hunting licences and income taxes create the problem of comparisons. I realize these taxes and regulations are not all under federal jurisdiction. This underlines the fact that provincial tourism Ministers and the federal Minister of Tourism must work more closely to co-ordinate research and effect tax changes and regulation changes at all levels in the tourism industry.

Canada can become a tourist attraction year round. However, tax incentives, affordable loans and interest rates must be available in order to establish and upgrade facilities which the public expect today. Speaking of our summer tourism trade in Canada, we face a season of less than 100 days with a good summer. Unfortunately, no one can control the weather, but we can control taxation.

Tourism is one of Canada's largest employers and creates over one million jobs in a variety of diversified fields. Presently one out of every ten Canadians, from taxi drivers to resort and marina operators, earns a living from tourism. I believe we in the Bay of Quinté and Land O' Lakes area are a choice destination.

The year 1984 marks a very special occasion for the Canadian tourism industry. Because of the large number of special events, anniversaries and other celebrations, 1984 has been designated the year of tourism in Canada. Unfortunately, one has only to travel to northern New York state to see how economically uncompetitive we are. The Americans do get an advantage with their dollar, but even that is not enough to balance the effect of Canadian taxation policies and over-regulation. The price of high profile products is raised automatically in many cases, which raises the question of taxation without representation. Provincial governments have legislation which automatically raises the tax provincially when federal taxes increase. This type of arithmetic makes no sense and does not assess the negative impact these taxes have on this industry.

Aside from taxation we must also create an attitude in our communities which welcomes tourists, whether they are spending money in our businesses or not. A person asking for directions must be treated with courtesy. If they are not, that is what the travellers will remember about that particular community. A positive attitude must be expanded to include all governments and individuals if we are to regain our share of the tourist market. It costs nothing to be polite and to smile.

The optimism of changing the Government and electing the Progressive Conservatives will certainly help in a major way. Long-term economic prospects will mean jobs for the 1.5 million people officially unemployed today. Only with fair taxation and regulation coupled with competitive prices and good quality service can we hope to regain our lost tourism market. This is not likely to happen in 1984 alone, but our message should be that we as politicians realize we cannot raise taxes without first knowing what effect they will cause. The practice of squeezing every ounce from the business community, only to have it wasted by government, must stop. The investment community and small businessman must have confidence and encouragement that hard work and common sense will pay dividends which they, rather than just government, will benefit from. This confidence can create a rippling effect in Canada which could realistically create thousands of permanent jobs as well as thousands more part-time, seasonal jobs.

Our job is to attract our American friends. The UEL bicentennial and the four hundred and fiftieth anniversary of Jacques Cartier are only two events which could be invaluable in attracting visitors from the northern United States to see Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II and to take part in the many events which have been planned in eastern Ontario. Advertising alone will not do what has to be done, especially when it is tainted with Liberal advertising agencies just before a federal election. We must make commitments to support tourism with a cost-competitive policy which encourages investment as well as a fair return on this investment. After tax it must give encouragement and incentive for others to invest in tourism throughout Canada.

In the past the federal Government has ignored southeastern Ontario under the old DREE Program. Due to past performance, if the Government stayed in power this porkbarrel approach would continue under the new Department of Regional Industrial Expansion. All indications look to a change in government which will not ignore eastern Ontario. The eastern Ontario subsidiary agreement, signed by the Clark Government in 1979, will end its five-year term this year. As yet there is no prospect of replacing it with a new agreement.

One project which would stimulate tourism in the Bay of Quinté area and Napanee is the development of boating facilities on the Napanee River. This could be provided for in an agreement to develop this potential in co-operation with the provincial and federal governments through the Industrial and Regional Development Program. Presently we in Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington have been placed by the Government in tier II for maximum level assistance of 60 per cent. I believe this should be changed to tier III or tier IV in order to encourage investment and a competitive industry with American facilities and also to develop new, viable services. Tier III and tier IV would mean a level of assistance of 75 per cent rather than 60 per cent.

I would also like to touch on the promotion of tourism abroad. It is of great importance as tourism has become one of the major industries of the world and one of the fastest developing. Over the past two decades the volume of activity has increased four-fold. Some increase is due to inflation, but most is due to sheer growth in activity, in terms of both more arrivals and greater per capita expenditure.

Countries from all ends of the economic and political spectrum have, in the past two decades, come to establish and develop overseas networks of tourism offices. These range from one small room in a neighbouring capital to over 20 substantial concerns scattered across the world. Geographically most offices are situated in Europe and North America. Countries in developed regions, including Japan, Australia and South Africa, receive most of the world's tourism income and also account for the source of nearly all the global tourism expenditures.

I am very concerned about the level of overseas representation carried out by Canada. Many nations which are not rich recognize the great importance of tourism to their economies and spend considerable amounts on promotion. The world tourism organization has reported that in a sample of 42 countries over 60 per cent of all overseas representation in the tourism sector was undertaken by national tourism offices. Canada's tourism offices are under the control of the Department of External Affairs. I feel it is impossible for embassies and consulates to adequately fulfil the role of a national tourist office abroad.

There are several reasons why this is so. First, embassies operate in an environment totally different from that of the travel and tourist industry of a country.

Second, diplomatic missions generally lack marketing expertise and are ill-equipped to cope with the organization and implementation of a fully comprehensive marketing plan. Additionally, press or information attachés are unlikely to possess specialist knowledge in tourism and are more likely to be in contact with political and diplomatic people of the host country rather than tourists.

Third, embassies are often physically located far from the travel centres of a nation. In West Germany, Canada, Brazil, Australia and the U.S., for example, embassies are far away from the major market regions for tourism.

● (1240)

Fourth, the travel trade world-wide, now the main commercial partner of a national tourist office, prefers to conduct business with a tourist office staff rather than with diplomats. Tourist office staff speak the same language, technically speaking, and form a direct and effective channel to the tourist industry back home. Evidence also suggests that such representation is regarded by the relevant national tourism administrations as temporary and provide a useful but somewhat crude means of test marketing before the eventual hoped for opening of a fully-fledged, independent tourist office.

In markets which are considered of secondary importance, embassy representation is considered only as better than nothing. Canada must promote tourism as it promotes trade, with separate and independent trade offices abroad which can specialize in a very competitive business.

It is understandable that smaller countries with limited resources cannot invest considerable sums of money into the creation of a network, however small, of national tourism offices overseas. Instead, they rely on alternative means of representation such as departments of external affairs and diplomatic missions, and many conduct promotional campaigns from their home base. Perhaps Canada cannot have separate tourism offices everywhere it would like, but I feel it is imperative that national tourism offices be put in place wherever possible with qualified overseas representation and promotion in order to be competitive in the international tourist industry. It is not good enough to just buy slick TV and media advertising.

Tourism being one of Canada's largest employers, it creates over one million jobs in a variety of diversified fields. One out of every ten Canadians, from taxi drivers to resort and marina operators, earns a living from tourism.

Southeastern Ontario is a choice location with wide open spaces of unspoiled natural beauty complemented by beautiful towns and villages that are on a comfortable human scale and yet full of interest because of our culture and our own diversity.

The year 1984 marks a very special occasion because of the bicentennial of the arrival of the first permanent settlers in 1784. The Government has done little to promote this historical event in or outside of Canada. The slogan "The Year of Tourism" is a good one but again, people want to know why large amounts of money are being spent to promote selective events while other events, such as the arrival of the United Empire Loyalists in the Maritimes and Quebec in 1783, and in what is now Ontario in 1784, are all but ignored.

Lack of recognition for this major event is unfortunate. With all the local activities in southeastern Ontario, needless to say this is very important or could be very important to the number of Americans which could be attracted here this summer. The average American visit of over 24 hours will last for 4.5 days and about $180 will be spent. There is no question that the Bay of Quinté, Land O'Lakes area is a choice destination for our American friends. The number of American visitors between 1972 and 1982 declined by over 6 per cent in Canada, causing our largest tourist deficit of $2.1 billion for 1983.

Eastern Ontario has the best sports fishing, with the widest variety of species in North America and over 40,000 lakes. Tourism is important to us all. All I ask is that the Government treat all major events and promotion of choice destinations on an equal basis across the country in its advertising campaigns.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): There follows a ten-minute period for questions or comments. Debate.

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to participate in the debate today. While I cannot agree with everything the previous speaker said, I want to begin by congratulating him on the manner in which he has participated and for his thoughtful approach in the speech which he just delivered to the House.

I also want to express my appreciation to the Official Opposition for focusing on this topic because I believe it is a very important aspect of our lives in Canada. Since tourism is big business it is very appropriate that we have this opportunity to discuss this topic in the House of Commons.

Let me also take this opportunity to congratulate the Minister of Small Businesses and Tourism (Mr. Smith) who has been devoting his energy to touring the country and co-operating with provincial Ministers of Tourism. I believe he is injecting new life into the entire question of tourism in this country. Recently, he came to visit my constituency in northern New Brunswick. Not only did this give me the opportunity to highlight some of the attractions that we have there, but I could also stress the need for additional funds in that area and ask the Minister to discuss this need with his Cabinet colleagues, the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion (Mr. Lumley), the Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development (Mr. Johnston), the Minister of Transport (Mr. Axworthy), and other Ministers who have a direct effect on the growth of northern New Brunswick.

I am particularly pleased to speak in this debate in this, the year of tourism in Canada. Other Members have referred to a number of special events which will be taking place. We look forward to a number of anniversaries and special events across the country that range from the first Viking landing in Newfoundland to the celebration of the birth of Yellowknife, Northwest Territories, 50 years ago.

Of course, the important celebrations that are now under way for the bicentennial in my Province of New Brunswick are of great interest to Atlantic Canada. One point on which I could not agree with the previous speaker concerns the great deal of planning and organization that has gone into the preparations for the celebration of the bicentennial year in our province. The federal Government is investing $2.5 million to match the provincial contribution toward this celebration. A total of $5 million has been budgeted for 1984 for New Brunswick alone.

We also know that a good deal of planning has gone into the celebration of the four hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the arrival of Jacques Cartier in la belle Province de Québec. We know of the excitement in anticipation of the arrival of the tall ships that will come to Halifax and then to the beautiful city of Quebec. All this preparation certainly gives a positive initiative for all of us to make a special effort in tourism during this year of tourism in Canada. As Members of Parliament, we should make every effort to encourage business people, the Chamber of Commerce, the Junior Chamber of Commerce and all others involved to collaborate to the highest degree in order to sustain this most important industry.

Let me emphasize that the tourist industry is one which involves dynamic people who professionally respond to the opportunities and challenges of the future. These challenges include establishing new facilities and training and developing the skills of personnel to be gainfully employed in the industry. Of course, it is in this respect that the Minister of Small Businesses and Tourism is co-operating with the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Roberts) in bringing forward these programs in preparation for visits by our friends from the United States and Europe. As the previous speaker said, we will not only meet them with a smile but in a competent way in order to look after their every need while in this country.

The figures are quite impressive. This industry generates $17 billion a year in Canada and contributes over 5 per cent of our Gross National Product, which means jobs for over one million Canadians. In addition, tourism income spreads throughout the economy, creating more jobs and income to the tune of more than $28 billion in related generated revenue. Tourism spending represents at least $700 a year for every man, woman and child in Canada. This money is earned by Canadians in all walks of life, from waitresses to welders to tellers and tailors.

As I said earlier, tourism is big business. We welcome 34.4 million visitors per year. Every 100,000 visitors to a community can mean $9 million in revenue, money that makes its way through the economy from the butcher to the baker and from the barber to the banker. From all of these related facts it becomes clear that we must support in every way the development and promotion of tourism in Canada.

In my own Province of New Brunswick, in terms of economic impact tourism in 1981 represented $561 million of income. In Quebec it represented $5,229 million and in Ontario $8,900 million. These very impressive figures substantiate without a doubt the tremendous importance of tourism in terms of revenue in this country, and as being something we must all support in terms of the expenditures referred to by the Minister earlier when he talked about the theme "Canada, what a country!" Some of the ads have appeared over television recently. They are most impressive, timely and needed. One of the ads made reference to Village Acadien in northern New Brunswick. This blend of heritage between French and English is very important in our country. The thrust of the Minister of Tourism in this area will bring the desired positive results we all want, namely more jobs, more opportunities for Canadians to find work in this industry. This is a year of turnaround. With the co-operation between the Tourist Industry Association and Tourism Canada, the Ministry and other departments and various travel associations, and all others directly involved in the industry, we will achieve even greater goals.

I wish to refer to some of the events that will take place in 1984, the New Brunswick bicentennial year. There will be a visit to our province by His Holiness the Pope. He will be visiting the City of Moncton. Various committees are now making ready for his visit. It will indeed be a highlight of the bicentennial celebrations. In addition, Her Majesty the Queen will also visit New Brunswick during the bicentennial celebrations. It is evident that a lot of thought and comprehensive planning has gone into the preparation of bicentennial celebrations. The same is true in the Province of Quebec with the four hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the arrival of Jacques Cartier.

We have many visitors from Germany, France and the United States. Following a tour of the Gaspé coast, they enter New Brunswick through the gateway to the Atlantic area, crossing the interprovincial bridge which leads to Campbellton and on into my constituency. During the summer and autumn, the leaves are very beautiful. People who have travelled throughout many countries of the world state that the banks of the Restigouche are one of the beauty spots of the world. I am pleased to make that public today.

When we talk about tourism, we talk about such beauty spots as the Restigouche in northern New Brunswick. There is a blend of the Acadians and the Loyalists who settled there 200 years ago. Organizations such as the Restigouche Tourist Association have been very active in recent years. They have developed very attractice pamphlets and brochures. They have received co-operation from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, the provincial Ministry of Tourism, other agencies and, indeed, the federal Minister. This positive movement will result in even greater participation than in the past.

Some facilities are now in place. There is a beautiful ski lodge in the County of Restigouche. There is Sugarloaf Park, a provincial park. Millions of dollars have been invested there by the provincial and federal governments, providing a chair lift and other appropriate facilities. In the summer there are trailer facilities, tennis courts and walking trails. A new slide, the first of its type in eastern Canada, will be in operation this summer. As a result of co-operation from the federal Government, completion will be this spring. It will cost between $700,000 and $800,000.

As I mentioned earlier, the Minister of Tourism was in my constituency not long ago. There are a number of other projects that will require his support. Other development required in the region involves marina facilities. These essential attractions must be provided to draw people to our area. The number of people who ski in our area has a very positive impact on our economy. Because of our unemployment problems, we must direct more funds to tourism. We must develop the facilities that are needed. We must not only be ready to attract people to share the beauty of our region, but we must provide attractions so that they will spend some time there.

The annual salmon festival brings thousands of people to the area. I have been privileged to participate in this event. I want publicly to salute those who give of their time, not only those in the business of tourism, but all those willing and ready to lend a positive hand to continue bringing developments to the area, thereby creating more jobs and stimulating the economy to an even greater degree.

May I call it one o'clock?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

CALL FOR STRICTER AUTOMOBILE EMISSION CONTROL

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Caccia) was host to Environment Ministers and their officials from nine European countries and the ten provinces to wrestle with the acid rain problem. At the conclusion a pact was signed to cut sulphur dioxide emissions by at least 30 per cent by 1993. Canada has already gone on record as approving acid rain reductions of 50 per cent by 1994.

Canada's auto emission regulations are three times more lenient than those in the United States. I hope and pray the Canadian Government will move quickly to follow the United States in this respect. Over 80 per cent of cars manufactured in Canada are sold in the United States and are equipped with stricter controls. It is simple logic that new regulations could be approved immediately requiring all models, starting with 1987 cars, to have tighter controls.

I am aware the Minister of Transport (Mr. Axworthy) and other Departments are involved in this decision, but now is the time. This will show the United States that we mean business and help to get it to move in a positive way to reduce its acid rain which is pouring across the border into Canada, especially into my riding of Parry Sound-Muskoka where 70 per cent of all acid rain comes from the United States.

I wish to congratulate the Minister of the Environment for his efforts, for his great concern, and for hosting this important conference—

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member's time has expired.

ACID RAIN

AGREEMENT ON SULPHUR EMISSIONS

Mr. Pierre Gimaïel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Mines)): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join my hon. friend from Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) in applauding the signing of an agreement on sulphur dioxide emissions yesterday here in Ottawa, especially since, during the past four years, we have been working together on a sub-committee on acid rain. The agreement signed yesterday in this country is unique in the world today. Ten countries agreed and have committed themselves to reducing sulphur dioxide emissions by at least 30 per cent over the next ten years.

Mr. Speaker, this is a powerful political gesture, made on Canadian soil and demonstrating above all the will of the Canadian Government to take action against acid rain, this phenomenon of a modern age, and to ensure that present and future generations of Canadians will live in a healthy environment.

Throughout preparations for this agreement, people have been helping us. Groups made representations across Canada and also in foreign countries such as the United States, explaining the problem to politicians and stressing the importance of fighting acid rain. Today, I am just as pleased as they are and I want to thank them all, without singling out anyone one group, for the work they have done. Yesterday, the signing of this agreement marked the beginning of the real fight against acid rain.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

FUNDING OF MIRABEL AIRPORT AND OF BELL HELICOPTER PLANT

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, the current Minister of Transport (Mr. Axworthy) has publicly stated that the Government has erected one Taj Mahal after another because there is no one to complain about these horrendous monuments to the Liberal Party. There have always been complaints. The real problem is that the Government does not listen to them.

I, for one, will speak out against the billions of dollars that the Government has wasted, and intends to waste, sponsoring uneconomic megaprojects. Nine years ago $500 million went to build the great Mirabel airport which was proven unnecessary before it was built. It now operates at less than one-tenth of its capacity.

This morning, newspapers suggested that the $514 million Bell Helicopter Texron project financed by the federal Government would likely cost additional millions of dollars because the Agriculture Lands Protection Commission has refused to reclassify the originally chosen land for industrial purposes. This is something which should have been checked out in the first place. Who knows how much this one will end up costing taxpayers in the long run?

Government spending is simply out of control. It is time to put an end to uneconomic spending for political reasons, and time to begin using logic to get the country back on the track to recovery. My Party will do that after the next election.

HEALTH

LICENSING OF FOREIGN BORN DOCTORS

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Mr. Speaker, last week the Hon. Member for Hamilton West (Mr. Hudecki), who in fact is a medical doctor by profession, drew the attention of the House to the serious and long-standing problem which has developed regarding the licensing of foreign-trained medical doctors to practise in Canada.

For over a year I have been closely monitoring the situation of foreign born doctors who fled hostile environments and have received landed immigrant status. Most of these doctors have successfully completed their training, have acquired important specializations, and have practised medicine prior to coming to Canada.

I have taken the initiative to make representations on behalf of these refugee doctors to federal and provincial authorities so that they may be granted internships on a special basis. To date all I have received from them is a lot of buck-passing between the two levels of government. I am told that, due to the shortage of residency training facilities in Canada, they are unable to complete their internship requirements in order to qualify for licensing examinations.

It is crucial that all provinces begin to address this problem by providing additional openings each year, specifically to refugee doctors. Such exceptions have been made in the past for refugee doctors and dentists from Hungary and Czechoslovakia.

I would also call upon the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) to convene a meeting of federal and provincial health officials to discuss various options which would allow these doctors to practise in Canada. We can no longer accept the argument that Canada is over supplied with doctors when there is a serious shortage of medical personnel in remote areas. I urge the Government—

POLITICAL PARTIES

POSITION OF PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE PARTY ON INTEREST RATES

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, we have been treated to quite a spectacle in the House over the last few days as the Conservatives try to come to grips with their policy on rising interest rates. One day they are concerned about interest rates, and the next day they are concerned about the falling dollar. Perhaps it is the approaching election which is causing such confusion among the Conservatives, so perhaps I can help by reminding them just what their policies have been over the last few years.

When he was Minister of Finance, the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) told the House of Commons that there was no reasonable alternative to high interest rates. When he was back in Opposition in 1981, he told a CTV interviewer:

> Yes, I would continue to back Mr. Bouey. I agree that our interest rates have to track those in the United States.

The Hon. Member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) was even more blunt in 1982. He said, at the height of our interest rate prices, that lowering interest rates was "a quick fix" and that he agreed with the course of the then Minister of Finance, the present Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen).

Perhaps we cannot depend on what the Conservatives say; perhaps we should look at what they do. When they were in power, interest rates began their climb and were at 14 per cent by the time they lost the election. Maybe those facts will help the Conservatives in their confusion, and remind both the Conservatives and the Canadian people of what we could expect from a Tory government.

MISSISSAUGA DOMED STADIUM PROPOSAL

Mr. Douglas Fisher (Mississauga North): Mr. Speaker, I urge Hon. Members to study the proposals for the Trillium Dome sports stadium of Mississauga. These proposals suggest a sports facility for southern Ontario which can be built without excessive demands on the public treasury. The Trillium Stadium would be built in Mississauga, only a half-hour drive away from either Hamilton in the west or Scarborough in the east, and less than one hour from Barrie, Oshawa, Kitchener, Guelph, and Niagara Falls. Our site offers a stadium to serve all southern Ontario, not just Toronto.

Equally important are the financing aspects of this plan. The stadium corporation now owns 2,000 acres of prime land. As land values around the stadium increase, land will be sold to pay for operating costs and to repay loans made for the initial construction.

• (1410)

Other ideas all involve massive public subsidies. Their costs can never be recovered. Taxpayers will never be repaid for initial public investments.

The stadium site in southern Ontario will be decided by the Ontario Government. I urge Members to study the Trillium proposal. If Members agree that a domed stadium should be built by private enterprise, then I ask that they contact Premier Bill Davis.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

EFFECT OF POSTAL DELAYS ON SMALL BUSINESSES

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Mr. Speaker, in my capacity as deputy critic for small business and tourism, I have been requesting businesses in my riding to indicate the most important problems they are facing in their day-to-day operations. Mr. D. R. Dineen, President and General Manager of Canadian Tampax Corporation Ltd. of Barrie, wrote to me as follows:

> Your letter was indicative of one of the problems facing small business today. Your letter was typed on the 16th of January and arrived in my office on February 9th. Small and medium businesses all across this country are spending incredible amounts of money on private courier services, in order to be able to manage their business efficiently and profitably. Waiting for Canada Post would be a disaster.

This is not an isolated incident, and the Minister responsible for Canada Post knows it. Taking 22 days for a parliamentary letter from Ottawa to arrive in Barrie is imbecilic. How then will employees of Canada Post find the time to perform additional duties on behalf of Consumers Distributing?

Canada Post has a mandate to move the mail, and until it manages to do so in a reasonable amount of time it should not be moving in on private enterprise in an unfair way. How much is Consumers Distributing paying for this service? How many more employees will the Post Office have to hire in order to move the merchandise? Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, on what basis does Canada Post presume that it will be any more successful at this venture than it is at trying to move the mail? I urge the Minister to reconsider this shortsighted venture which is discriminatory to business.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

DEMAND FOR CONCENTRATION ON OIL SANDS DEVELOPMENT PROJECTS

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, direct investment by the present Government in high risk oil exploration on Canada Lands is a reckless waste of the taxpayers' money. One of the main goals of the National Energy Program was oil self-sufficiency by 1990. To date not one commercial oil discovery has been made on Canada Lands since the National Energy Program and a system of PIP grants was implemented.

The technology to bring oil to commercial production has yet to be developed. High risk exploration should be left to the major oil companies. Just over 35 years ago, major oil companies were spending millions of dollars on high risk exploration in western Canada, drilling hundreds of dry holes. Oil was finally found at Leduc.

Since that time, Mr. Speaker, many large Canadian companies have been developed because major foreign oil companies accepted the task of high risk exploration. If we are to reach oil self-sufficiency by 1990 or 1995, we should be concentrating on oil sands development. We have the technology, we have the resources, we know where the oil is, and we have the people who are trained to get the job done. Give Canadian companies the incentive to develop what we know we have; put Canadians back to work.

One oil sands mining operation creates thousands of jobs across Canada. Encourage the major oil companies to explore in the high risk areas of the Beaufort, Arctic, and offshore, which will create and sustain much needed economic activity—

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member's time has expired.

BILINGUALISM

GOVERNMENT'S PROPOSAL AFFECTING YUKON AND NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): One of the most sensitive issues in Canada today is the extension of bilingual services. In Quebec and Manitoba court cases are proceeding because of the failure of the Legislatures to protect the rights of the minority. Confusion over this issue has been created by statements made during the Liberal leadership race, and by the lack of a clear signal from the present Government.

While confusion reigns over Liberal intentions on the Manitoba question, the Government is engaging in a process with regard to the Yukon and Northwest Territories that can only be destructive to national unity. In a speech I made last month dealing with Manitoba I appealed for tolerance, and called for passage of a made-in-Manitoba solution to the bilingual problem. The Government of Manitoba made that valiant effort. The Conservative opposition prevented the passage of that legislation. The matter will now go to the Supreme Court.

The federal Government, which urged the passage of Manitoba solution, is not moving in a similar manner in the Territories. The Government refused to wait for an initial court decision there. It acted without consulting the elected Assemblies, without consulting native representatives, and without allowing for a made-in-the-North solution. Those who for their own reasons claim that the federal Government is ramming French down their throats will use the method by which the Government handled this matter to create division within our nation, and to promote hatred.

The federal Government must act where Legislatures fail to protect minority rights. That is its constitutional obligation—

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member's time has expired.

EMPLOYMENT

PROVISION OF SUMMER JOBS FOR STUDENTS ADVOCATED

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, many thousands of students will be entering the job market within days. Those students face a bleak and dismal future when it comes to finding jobs. All governments must do everything possible to provide meaningful summer employment for these students.

All across the nation, municipal, provincial and federal Governments are not sufficiently concerned with efforts to generate these needed jobs. Some of the job-creation programs are excellent. On February 28, 1984, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Blais) unveiled his Department's Youth Training and Employment Program. However, this solution is just tickling the problem. Surely the Minister can find the means at least to triple the size of this worth-while program, creating 15,000 jobs rather than 5,000 jobs.

Canada's ability to be a leader of nations or to be simply a follower is contingent upon our providing youth with all of the education, experience, and opportunity possible. To do less in a country which has so much to offer is unthinkable not only to our citizens but to the world.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FINANCE

INCREASE IN INTEREST RATES—COMPARISON WITH SITUATION IN GERMANY

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. I am sure he is aware that interest rates have again risen today, having gone up 20 bases points on top of the 20 bases point increase this week, and this trend will probably continue over the next little while. My question to the Minister deals with two other countries.

Germany lives side by side with France and has continually experienced interest rates which are three or four percentage points below those in France. There is a tremendous amount of trade as well as great interdependence between the two economies. Would the Minister tell us what we in Canada must do to develop the same degree of independence from high United States interest rates?

An Hon. Member: Go to Germany.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, one member of the New Democratic Party just suggested to me that I should tell the Hon. Member to move to Germany. However, that will not be my answer.

The Hon. Member knows that the sizes of the French and German economies are more similar than are the sizes of the American and Canadian economies. The level of independence between Canada and the United States in terms of size is certainly very significant. The possiblity for Canada to have what would be a totally independent interest rate policy is a possibility which is of an academic nature, I would say. We have discussed this in the House and in parliamentary committees. The issue was also raised with the Governor of the Bank of Canada on numerous occasions.

We can see that the inflation rate is as low as possible, we can increase productivity as much as we can, and we can be as competitive as possible, and perhaps even more competitive than the United States. In that event we would grow faster and might have more room for lower interest rates. However, that obviously implies that we in Canada would be in a situation of lower inflation and higher productivity than the United States on a consistent basis and in many intances, and we would need the readiness to accept a lower standard of living in order to compete. However, that, very shortly, is the answer to the question.

Mr. Wilson: Mr. Speaker, the Minister was obviously groping. I think that he was less convinced by his answer than were we on this side of the House.

IMPACT OF INTEREST RATES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, let me remind the Minister that Switzerland is right next door to France as well, and interest rates in Switzerland are even lower than those in Germany, and have been for a consistent period of time.

I would like to ask the Minister a question for which I have been trying to get an answer for two days. I would remind him that when he is answering his questions he is not just not answering me but he is insulting the many people who are watching and want an answer to this question.

• (1420)

Since the Budget did not anticipate the higher interest rates, and the higher unemployment that will result from them, and since he has said that we have no alternative but to follow the interest rates in the United States which are expected to go higher, what steps is he taking today to offset the impact of these higher interest rates? They are totally inappropriate for the Canadian economy and will cause higher unemployment and more bankruptcies for farmers and small businessmen.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member referred to Switzerland. I wish he were more serious in his comparison. For decades Switzerland has been the banker of the world. The Hon. Member knows that in Switzerland there were situations where people had to pay interest in order to deposit money in Swiss banks, rather then having interest paid on their accounts. How can the Hon. Member make such a comparison and allege that he is seriously asking a question on this subject?

As far as the rise in interest rates is concerned, the allegation that this would necessarily lead to higher unemployment is not correct. We will see what will happen to unemployment figures in the next few months. We have seen interest rates go up by a slight margin, and I believe there is significant movement toward growth in the economy. I would argue with my friend that the next unemployment figures will indicate that we will have continued to create jobs in this country, not diminish the number of jobs.

Mr. Wilson: Mr. Speaker, the Minister displays an incredible ignorance of what goes on in Switzerland. The reason Switzerland is the banker of the world and has low interest rates is because so much money comes into the country in response to its good economic policies. These policies have not been duplicated by the Government of Canada for the past 20 years.

MINISTER'S POSITION

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Minister's answer to my question clearly indicates that he has given no thought to the consequence of these higher interest rates that will affect so many parts of the economy. Is the Minister saying that he thinks the higher interest rates we are facing today are a total aberration and that they are going to be reversed? Is he wearing his rose coloured glasses? Is this situation only temporary, or is the Minister concerned? Can he show that concern to the people who are suffering from high interest rates and who will suffer more if he does not do something about it?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, of course I am concerned about the increase in interest rates, just as I am concerned about the level of unemployment in the country. I am also concerned to ensure that the country will have economic growth and that there will not be a resurgence of the inflation that led to the recession. One has to govern in a responsible way and not resort to the kind of knee-jerk reaction that my friend suggests. He does not suggest any constructive or positive steps that may be taken.

Mr. Wilson: I did that yesterday.

Mr. Lalonde: He comes back to Switzerland. No doubt his Party would support the Swiss policy of shipping out tens of thousands of workers when that country gets into trouble, as it has done. It has migrant workers who can be shipped back to other countries in Europe and the Middle East when they are not needed in Switzerland. We do not have such a policy in this country and it is not one that I would be ready to recommend to the Government, even if the Conservatives were to advocate anything of the kind.

SIZE OF GOVERNMENT'S FINANCIAL RESERVES

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, today in the Finance Committee the Governor of the Bank of Canada was not prepared to tell us why the Government's bank account has increased by over $3 billion since the date of the Budget. He could not tell us whether it was because tax collections were exceptionally good, or whether the Government had ceased spending money and therefore had lots of money on hand and so had increased its bank account by $3 billion.

Is the truth of the matter that the reason the Government's accounts are up by $3 billion is that it has been selling off foreign reserves in unprecedented amounts in order to prop up the Canadian dollar? Is that why we have over $3 billion more in our bank account?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is aware that every month, the Government publishes a statement of its reserves. These figures are published on the third day of each month. I would ask my hon. friend to wait until the figures are published, so that he can see them in detail, and he can then speculate about whatever he wishes. He also knows perfectly well it is not the Government's policy to speculate daily on the state of its reserves.

[English]

EXCHANGE VALUE OF DOLLAR

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, the Minister knows that with the strength of the U.S. economy growing several times faster than ours, and with employment burgeoning in the United States, our dollar is likely to fall. Exchange dealers say it will go down to 75 or 77 cents. Will the Minister have some sense and not waste our foreign exchange reserves by tring to prop up the dollar? Will he stop trying to be the King Canute of the Liberal Party, using all the foreign reserves to prop up the dollar? Will he give that undertaking to the people of the country?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have stated repeatedly what the policy of the Government is, in the House and before parliamentary committees. I stated it quite clearly in the House as recently as 10 days ago when the Conservatives presented an opposition motion. That position was expanded upon by the Governor of the Bank of Canada before a parliamentary committee this morning. I have nothing to add to what we have already said about our policy in that regard.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR INTEREST RATE POLICY

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, the economic foolishness of the Government is only exceeded by the hypocrisy of the Conservatives who raised interest rates four times in about as many weeks when they were in government.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: For once the Tories are a bit concerned about their hypocrisy, and I am glad to hear that.

Yesterday the Minister said that the Government does not have a high interest rate policy. Today, for the fifth week in a row, the Bank of Canada raised interest rates. This means higher costs for farmers, for small businesses, and for home owners. Will the Minister at last acknowledge that constitutional responsibility for interest rate policy rests with the federal Cabinet and with the Minister of Finance? Will he use that authority to reverse this disastrous high interest rate policy for the people of Canada?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I said in the House yesterday that the Government does not have a high interest rate policy. Its policy is to keep interest rates as low as it can possibly keep them.

I would remind my friend that up until 12 noon today, as far as I know, four out of the five major banks in Canada still had a prime rate half a point below the prime rate in the United States, which is 11.5 per cent. One of the major banks has been at the American level for a few days.

I have indicated to the Hon. Member before that it is not realistic to expect that we can keep lower levels of interest in this country than in the United States over an extended period. That is my policy and my point of view. It is a point of view shared by the Governor of the Bank of Canada.

I want to repeat to my friend that we do not have a high interest rate policy; we are doing everything we can to keep interest rates in this country as low as we can.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I ask the Minister to stop trying to snow the people of Canada.

REQUEST FOR CHANGE IN GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, interest rates have gone up five weeks in a row. The Government has Constitutional authority and responsibility for that, but the Minister tries to tell us that it is not his policy. The people of Canada know that it is his policy, we know it, and everyone wants that policy to change.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: The Minister knows that the last time we went through this, a couple of years ago, the result was disastrous for the people of Canada. The economy did not grow, it shrank; the number of unemployed was not reduced, it was increased, and the number of businesses that went broke also increased. Will the Minister quit putting us through this re-run of a bad old movie, and change his policy?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have never asserted that it was not our responsibility. On the contrary, I recognize that monetary and fiscal policy fall under the authority of the Government, and more particularly of the Minister of Finance. I have never tried to pass that responsibility on to anyone, least of all to the Leader of the New Democratic Party. However, I want to repeat to him that our policy is not a high interest rate policy. Our policy is to keep interest rates as low as we can sensibly keep them in this country and still have an economy which will grow.

• (1430)

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the Minister is going to have a hard time trying to explain how we have interest rates going up day after day, week after week, but the Government does not have a policy which sanctions that. The Minister knows if he had a real, low interest rate policy, he could telephone Governor Bouey and tell him to reverse the trend. He has not done that because he accepts high interest rates. That is the truth.

REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT ACTION ON INTEREST RATES

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Would the Minister go back to information of which he was aware and which was brought to his attention today? There are countries side by side in Europe with very different interest rate structures. The countries with low interest rates happen to be growing more rapidly than countries with high interest rates. Why does the Government now follow the low interest rate policy of countries which are, in fact, having better rates of growth and better job opportunities for their people, instead of having our interest rate policy set initially in the United States and then followed in a lock-step way here in Canada by Governor Bouey?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the suggestion made by the Leader of the New Democratic Party is not only naive, it is reckless. The motion that somehow the Government could arbitrarily dictate an interest rate level in this country, and that this would lead to growth and prosperity, while the United States has interest rates significantly higher than in Canada, is a notion which is pure imagination—

Mr. Broadbent: And one you believed a week ago.

Mr. Lalonde: It is fairyland. The Hon. Member knows very well that if we had, in Canada, interest rates at 9 per cent, and they were at 11 per cent in the United Sttes, even Hon. Members of the New Democratic Party would be the first ones to ship their money to the United States. He knows that.

NATIONAL REVENUE

REPORTING OF PERSONAL INCOME

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, at the request of the Minister of National Revenue, I shall put my question to the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance is aware, as are so many other Members of this House, that a number of people who receive gratuities as part of their income and declare that income do not receive commensurate benefits from the Unemployment Insurance Commission. Especially considering the fact that the Government of Quebec has now passed Bill 43 which will oblige all employees receiving gratuities to declare such income, can the Minister of Finance give the House the assurance that unemployment insurance benefits will be commensurate to declared income for all Canadians and especially for Quebecers as a result of Bill 43?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I had a chance to discuss this matter not long ago with the Quebec Minister of Finance. The Hon. Member is also aware that Quebec has a new Minister of Revenue who is looking into the matter at this time. He has read the press reports just as I have. It seems that the Bill introduced by the Government of Quebec is now being revised, so I am going to wait and see how the situation develops. I am following developments very closely, and as soon as we are able to reach a decision, I shall let the Hon. Member know.

TAXATION OF TIPS CALCULATED AS INCOME

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister. Since the Government of Quebec stated before the association of restaurant owners, restaurant employees and hotel workers that it would drop consideration of incomes for 1983 and previous years, could the Minister inform the House, considering the fact that these workers have no fringe benefits for this income, whether the Government is prepared to act in the same spirit as the Government of Quebec in dealing with workers who earn tips?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I said in my previous reply, the matter does not seem to have gelled quite yet at the National Assembly and within the Quebec Government, I am first going to see exactly what transpires from current negotiations, and we shall then be able to review the situation in the light of whatever definitive decision Quebec will make.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

DELAY IN PROCESSING INCAPACITY ALLOWANCE APPLICATIONS

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. The Minister will know that he has a very serious problem in his Department. Veterans who are applying for exceptional incapacity allowance are having to wait an unreasonable length of time for the process to be completed. One example is Mr. Alan Bell of Toronto who had to fight for seven years before he received his allowance. An 84-year-old veteran in Vancouver, Mr. Fred Carter, applied three years ago, and still no decision has been reached. Mr. Carter has a heart problem, arthritis, and a bad hip. What is the Minister going to do to correct this ridiculous situation?

Hon. W. Bennett Campbell (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member raised those two particular cases before the Standing Committee just this week. I did indicate to the Hon. Member, in response to his criticism of the processing time, that we were working diligently to reduce that processing time. As Hon. Members know, I am not at liberty to discuss individual cases on the floor of the House. However, I did indicate to the Hon. Member that I would undertake to look into those two particular cases and report back to him.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER RESIGN

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, we have been listening to that stock answer for years. Obviously the Minister cannot find a solution to the problem. He has been responsible for that portfolio for the last three years. Will he resign, and let someone else take over who can find a solution to this ridiculous situation?

Hon. W. Bennett Campbell (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has been trotting out the same type of statistics for the last three years. I have indicated to him on numerous occasions that not only has the issue of the backlog been addressed, but the processing time on average has been reduced from some 334 days two years ago to less than 120 days on first applications. So, Mr. Speaker, if that is not progress I do not know what it is.

INSOLVENCY ACT

REQUEST FOR REFERRAL TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Prior to the Christmas prorogation the Finance Committee was seized with the Bill dealing with insolvency. We had hearings on this. We realize that there are many important decisions which have to be made, but the committee, after hearing many extensive representations, would be best equipped to deal with these important issues. Can the Minister tell us why Bill C-17, which deals with insolvency, a matter of such importance to so many people in Canada, has not yet been referred back to the committee for further hearings?

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member asks a very good question. I must say that I share his frustration. We tabled the Bill several weeks ago. We have put forward the amendments we intend to put before the committee. I have had indications from the Party opposite that they are anxious to see this Bill proceed to committee. However, I must confess that I have had virtually no co-operation from the New Democratic Party. It would be most helpful if those Hon. Members would agree that the Bill should go back to committee so that those people who are anxious to appear before the committee may be allowed to do so. It is an extremely important Bill to wage earners, small business, to everyone in Canada. Let us get on with it.

IMPACT OF UNEMPLOYMENT ON THE POOR

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. A Statistics Canada study of unemployment shows that government high interest rate policies have put the burden of unemployment on the backs of the poor. Only one-third of poor Canadians worked steadily in 1981. Does the Minister now agree that it is his Government's economic policies which have deprived poor people of jobs? What does the Minister intend to do about this gross unfairness to low-income Canadians?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the statement made by the Hon. Member. The fact is that, indeed, there has been the impact of unemployment in Canada the same as in practically every other industrialized country I know. The impact of unemployment tends to be harder on the workers who are at the lower end of the income scale. That is a factor in every single industrialized country that I know.

New workers, new entrants into the work force, tend to lose their jobs earlier than those who have been in the work force for a long time. The Hon. Member knows that in a lot of collective agreements it is a standard rule that the last in are the first out if there is a decline in employment. The solution is to try to create jobs as fast as we can to reduce unemployment. This is what we have been attempting to do with our policy in fighting the recession this country has known, together with the rest of the industrialized world, where there are still around 30 million unemployed today.

• (1440)

We are doing our very best, but it is not a phenomenon exclusive to Canada, or even more prevalent in Canada than in any other particular country. However, in our actions we have taken care to maintain the social safety net in this country, contrary to a lot of other countries, and contrary to the admonitions of the Conservative Party in particular. We have maintained our social programs to help those most in need.

EFFECT OF INTEREST RATES ON JOB CREATION

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, the two million poor people in Canada do not think the Government is creating jobs as quickly as it can. The best safety net for those people is jobs. They do not want unemployment insurance or welfare, they want work. With interest rates rising again, they are about to take another thrashing. What is the Minister going to do about jobs he is destroying by allowing interest rates once again to go up, and up, and up?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, an increase of one-half of one per cent in the interest rate does not necessarily mean there will be fewer jobs in Canada. The Hon. Member knows perfectly well that if, for instance, we look at recent developments in the United States since the month of January, and I am referring to an increase in their interest rate, this development has not prevented an increase in the number of jobs. The interest rate is not the sole factor that determines the employment rate.

Furthermore, I wish to emphasize that we have no reason to believe there will be a substantial rise in interest rates within the next few weeks. We have every reason to believe that interest rates will experience or will have experienced a slight increase and with the Governor of the Bank of Canada, I am doing everything in my power to prevent interest rates from rising further.

All this will depend a lot on what happens to interest rates in the United States, but here again, there is reason to believe that U.S. interest rates will not experience a substantial increase in the coming days and weeks.

AIRPORTS

CHARLOTTETOWN—TERMINAL BUILDING PROJECT—CALLING OF TENDERS

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Earlier in the week the Minister told The New York Times in a lengthy interview about federal capital projects that, "right now we are spending $25 million on a new terminal building for Charlottetown." Does the Minister realize that the Government of Canada has not even called tenders for that terminal building, much less started construction? In light of that fact, will he assure the House and the people of Prince Edward Island that his Department will get on with the job and invite tenders, which are now many years overdue?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a small correction. The figure should have been $27 million, not $25 million, allocated for improvements to the Charlottetown airport. As far as calling tenders is concerned, I expect that would be some time in early July. We have sent them back to the consultants for some revisions so that they will be in closer concert with the original Treasury Board submission. There is some technical work that needs to be done before the final tenders are called, but it should be in a matter of about two months.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE PROJECT WILL PROCEED

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, the redevelopment of the Charlottetown airport and the building of the terminal in particular were announced with great fanfare some seven years ago. Yet announcements have been made over and over again only to be cancelled or postponed, with excuses made for the delays. Will the Minister assure us that this time he and his Department will honour the commitment to the Island, that tenders will be released, that construction will begin, and that we will finally have a terminal building for Charlottetown which is a credit to the capital city of Prince Edward Island, to his Department and, indeed, to the country as a whole?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to confirm the fact that the federal Government is proceeding to call tenders on the work at the Charlottetown airport. We have obviously been greatly assisted by the Minister of Veterans Affairs, the regional minister for that area, in expediting the work, and we are very pleased to know that the work will go ahead on schedule.

FRANCO-MANITOBAN RIGHTS

REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF GOVERNMENT'S POSITION

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. In answer to a question I put to him about two weeks ago concerning the language issue in Manitoba and, more specifically, the implications of Section 23 of the Manitoba Act, the Prime Minister answered that Cabinet would be considering the possibility of an appeal, or rather a referral, to the Supreme Court in order to obtain an interpretation of Section 23 of the Manitoba Act, and would also be considering a resolution under Section 43(b) of the Constitution Act of 1982. I wonder whether he could inform the House today whether his Government has reached a conclusion on this matter and whether he could let us know and give us further details on the direction he intends to follow.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall certainly try to answer this question. The present situation is that we are having some final consultations with the Government of Manitoba to find out whether they have any preference for a referral or a resolution. I think it is pretty clear that a political approach, in other words, a resolution in the House that would be effective, is now excluded, especially considering the attitude of the Progressive Conservative Opposition in Manitoba. We shall therefore have to go before the Supreme Court. The Hon. Member is aware there already is a case before the Court—the Bilodeau case—in which we would be making a plea for justice for Franco-Manitobans. There is also the possibility of a referral. This morning, Cabinet agreed on the principle of a referral, but first, we want to have some consultations with the Government of Manitoba and we also want to examine the option of being an intervenor in the Bilodeau case, before deciding when the referral would be made and what its terms would be. A decision will probably be made next week.

PETRO-CANADA

PRICE OF GASOLINE—CONTRACTS WITH OTHER OIL COMPANIES

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and deals with an item which probably has the most serious inflationary effect on consumers of anything in Canada today. That is the high cost of energy, namely, home heating oil and, in particular, gasoline for the car. I wonder if the Minister, who is responsible for Canada's own Petro-Canada, would look into the matter of Petro-Canada signing long-term, 15-year contracts with the Seven Sisters fixing the price of gasoline at the refinery gate? According to evidence supplied, it is costing consumers far more for gasoline today than the product is really worth.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Hon. Member asks me if I will look into the question. I will certainly look into the question.

DETERMINATION OF PRICE AT RETAIL LEVEL

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, while the Minister is doing that, would he also look into the fact that Petro-Canada, in the riding of Peterborough, and I am sure in other ridings across Canada, will not give franchises to sell Petro-Canada gasoline unless a dealer agrees to buy only from Petro-Canada? In that way Petro-Canada consigns the product, and fixes the price not only at the wholesale level but at the retail level under the contracts signed by those dealers which our Crown corporation has taken over.

Mr. McKenzie: Just like the Russians.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, in principle Petro-Canada is operating in the marketplace like any other corporation. It signs contracts according to the practice of the trade and it tries to be a fair competitor in the marketplace. That is its mandate. The Hon. Member refers to some specific problem. If there is price fixing and so on, there are laws in Canada which apply to this company like any other company. They cannot have a coalition of companies to fix prices. If there is a specific accusation of price fixing there is a Ministry which is always looking into these operations. The company has to abide by the laws like anyone else.

INCOME TAX

EXEMPTIONS INQUIRY

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. It is very simple, very easy, and only requires a yes or no answer. I would like him to listen very carefully so that we on this side can hear him say yes or no. Did the Minister know it is possible to have an income of $40,088 and pay no income tax? Yes or no?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, obviously it depends on the situation. It is possible, as it is possible to have an income of $10,000 or $100,000 and pay no income tax. It depends how you run your affairs in terms of the income laws of the country. If you had losses last year of $50,000, which you can claim against your income, you will not pay taxes. If you have accumulated tax credits by way of investments you have made, such as research and development credits, you can claim them against your income. This is all spelled out in the income tax laws of the country. The laws operate this way not only in our country but in every democratic industrialized country I know.

Sometimes you can have large losses which you cannot claim in one year but may claim the following year or two years after they have been incurred. This Parliament has passed a law according to which you can claim losses accumulated three years in the past against your current income. You may look at a particular year and say that this individual or company is not paying taxes and that that is terrible because it has $50,000, $100,000, or $200,000 profit. It is forgotten that they have $500,000, $600,000 or maybe $1,000,000 of losses which may be claimed against such profits. That is the way the system operates.

Mr. McDermid: Is that yes or no?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure what the Minister has taken to smoking. I think it is some kind of funny weed that grows south of the border.

REQUEST FOR INSTITUTION OF MINIMUM INCOME TAX LEVEL

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I was quoting that question from Wood-Gundy. They circulated that this week to taxpayers who make lots of money. I would encourage taxpayers across the country who are filling in their income tax forms now, to write the Minister's answer on their tax forms and send it to the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. Speaker: Will the Member please ask his question?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, in the United States where Reaganomics is operating, regardless of what income level people are at they still have to pay a minimum level of income tax. Is the Minister prepared to tell Canadians today that, regardless of what income level they are at, and regardless of all that text tax credit gobbledegook and falderal, everyone in the country, corporations included, is going to start paying a fair minimum share of tax in this country?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I cannot believe my hon. friend wants us to restore to the American taxation system which has a lot more loopholes in favour of corporations than we have in Canada. The same is true as far as individuals are concerned. I am certainly not going to follow the American system, thank you very much.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

PURCHASE OF LIMOUSINE FOR TRANSPORTING PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services, but in his absence I will direct it to the Solicitor General as it does deal with his responsibilities relating to the RCMP. Will the Minister indicate whether the cost of the new Cadillac limousine recently purchased for the Prime Minister was considerably higher than the vehicle could have been obtained for, from another firm? Was it purchased from the same company which supplied the seven vehicles for the Summit, bought a couple of year ago and which are apparently now proving to be defective in a number of areas?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, it was purchased from the same company, General Motors, and it was armourized by the same company that armourized those other vehicles. I am not aware of defects showing up on the other vehicles. I would be very interested to look into that and to have information from the Hon. Member about that.

Miss MacDonald: Does it have a short term lease?

COST OF CONTRACT

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, I would be more than happy to share with the Minister the telegram I have, which indicates that two of those vehicles are defective. There have been four more cars tendered, three of which were awarded again to Hesse-Eisenhardt at a cost of $95,728 U.S. per vehicle. Is it true that another equally capable corporation had a bid in for $65,924 U.S. per vehicle? If so, why was the tender of some $30,000 less not accepted for the vehicles?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the contract was sole source and not put up for tender. The company chosen was, in the opinion of the RCMP, the only firm in North America capable of doing the job to the standard which the RCMP required.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

U.S.S.R.—DOWNING OF KOREAN AIRLINER—CANADIAN DEMAND FOR EXPLANATION

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Relations. It is now over six months since the Korean jetliner was downed. On September 12, 1983, the House unanimously passed a resolution which condemned the unwarranted attack resulting in the destruction of the Korean airliner on the orders of Soviet authorities, and demanded a full and truthful explanation of this brutal act from the Soviet Government. What reply has the Government in fact had from the Soviet Government? Has there been any explanation to date?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, Canada has made its position on this subject eminently clear to the Soviet Union and has repeated it. We feel it is up to the Soviet Union to respond and indicate what action they are going to take by way of compensation. To this date they have not given any indication that they will provide compensation.

GOVERNMENT'S POSITION

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same Minister. On the evening of September 12 the Secretary of State for External Affairs stated in the House that the Soviet leadership must abandon its current stonewalling and come clean about this terrible hit and run tragedy. He then referred to what our ambassador to the United Nations had said, including calling the downing of the—

Mr. Speaker: Will the Hon. Member please ask his question?

Mr. Stevens: —jet murder. What is the position of the Government today? Is the downing of this jet still murder? Has the Government any plans in position to ensure compensation for the relatives of the victims?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is fully aware of the record of the reaction of the Government to the very serious loss of life in the KAL Jetliner. The Government of Canada took a very firm position on the matter. Our position remains the same. Our demand for compensation from the Soviet Union is not only justified but is still in full effect. The Soviet Union is fully aware of our position.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

INCLUSION OF HOMEMAKERS

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance, if I can get his attention. The Montreal Gazette of March 20 quotes the Minister as follows:

> We agree to the inclusion of homemakers in the Canada Pension Plan and to the expansion of the Canada Pension Plan.

I have two questions. Is it now Government policy to include homemakers in the Canada Pension Plan? What does the Minister mean by "expansion of the Canada Pension Plan"?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have indicated that we were going to put on the agenda with the provinces the question of homemakers' pensions under the Canada Pension Plan. I remind the Hon. Member that we have already taken steps with a number of specific measures we want to propose concerning the Canada Pension Plan. One particular measure is the immediate introduction of credit splitting, either at the time of marriage breakup or at age 65. These measures indicate a readiness to consider ways of ensuring that homemakers will have a direct right to pensions under the Canada Pension Plan.

● (1500)

As to further expansions, again we are ready to discuss this with the provinces but, as the Hon. Member knows, we require the agreement of two-thirds of the provinces with two-thirds of the population before we can proceed with an amendment in that regard. This is what we intend to discuss with the provinces at the first opportunity.

With respect to the expansion of the Canada Pension Plan, I have announced in the Budget immediate measures that we would like to see implemented if the provinces, as they are likely to do, will agree. For instance, there is the possibility of improving one measure which I have announced specifically in the Budget, but have forgotten its name. I will check.

We also have discussed enlarging disability benefits, with the provinces, which would also mean an expansion of the plan. We are ready to discuss these issues with the provinces at the first opportunity, and if we can get agreement we will come up with specific additional proposals to the House dealing with both of these issues. Indeed, we are in favour of both aspects.

INCOME TAX ACT

TAKING OF TAXPAYERS' STATEMENTS UNDER OATH—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue who will recognize that one of the administrative provisions of the Income Tax Act that flies in the face of what everyone must probably believe is basic justice, is a provision contained in Section 231(1)(c). That provision permits assessors to obtain from taxpayers statements under oath in the course of their investigations which then may be used in a prosecution that may follow the obtaining of such statement under oath.

Having regard to the concept of nonself incrimination by individuals who are subsequently accused of criminal offences, what view does the Minister have with respect to this specific provision of the Act? Will he take steps to remove the same?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Hon. Member would care to examine various provisions of the Income Tax Act which are very specific and reflect the very nature of this legislation and the kind of tax system we have in Canada. If he does, he will see that these provisions exist because of the nature of the legislation and the tax system we have in Canada.

TABLING OF REPORTS OF CLERK OF PETITIONS

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the petitions presented by Hon. Members on Wednesday, March 21, 1984 meet the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

Standing Orders

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEELKY STATEMENT

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Government House Leader what the business will be for tomorrow and next week? It may help him in his response if I tell him that if he were to call Bill C-3, the Canada Health Act, on Monday, in all likelihood it will get through the entire report stage.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, first of all, consultations have led to an agreement for adopting forthwith, without debate, the motion appearing on the Order Paper in the Government's name, actually in my name, under No. 11 on page 16. If you would call the motion proposing to make the Committee on Official Languages a Standing Committee, I can confirm, since there has been consultation, that you will obtain unanimous consent for adopting the motion without debate or amendment. I would therefore ask the Chair to call motion No. 11, a motion in my name, which is as follows:

"(d) On Official Languages policy and programs to act as members on the part of this House on the Joint Committee of both Houses, to consist of 15 members;"

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The President of the Privy Council has suggested that there might be consent to put motion No. 11 standing on the Order Paper under Government Orders to the House. Is that agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

STANDING ORDERS

AMENDMENT RESPECTING JOINT COMMITTEE ON OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That Standing Order 69(3) be amended by adding the following:

"(d) On Official Languages policy and programs to act as members on the part of this House on the Joint Committee of both Houses, to consist of 15 members;"

And that a message be sent to the Senate requesting that that House do unite with this House for the above purpose and to select, if the Senate deems it to be advisable, certain members to represent that House on the proposed Joint Committee.—

Motion agreed to.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Pinard: As regards the business for coming days, I welcome the suggestion made by the Hon. Member for Yukon that if Bill C-3 was to be called on Monday we might get through the report stage that day. I have sought a firm commitment but have not obtained it. Certainly what he says is not a firm commitment that we would get report stage completed by Monday evening. I do not have that commitment from the NDP either. Therefore, the business for tomorrow will be—

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, may I just interrupt before the President of the Privy Council gets too far along and say that the Government House Leader has that commitment. He will get his report stage on Monday.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, it is very likely that he will get the report stage of the health Bill on Monday.

Mr. McDermid: That sounds like a firm commitment, an NDP commitment.

Mr. Deans: I was not privy to this arrangement. If it is called on Monday, the report stage will be completed by five o'clock.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I thank both Opposition Parties for their firm commitment. We will take it for granted that report stage will be completed by five o'clock on Monday and we will call Bill C-3 only on Monday.

With respect to the business for tomorrow, we will start debating Bill C-24 dealing with Crown corporations. Next Tuesday we will resume debate, if necessary, on Bill C-21 and the back-up Bill in case we come to some arrangement will be Bill C-12, the Fiscal Arrangements Act, which is at report stage.

Next Wednesday will be the first allotted day of the new period of supply. The business for next Thursday will be resuming debate on what was under consideration at the end of the day on the previous Tuesday.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, on several occasions my colleagues and I have been asking the Government House Leader when the Bill which will remove the discriminatory sections of the Indian Act will be introduced. We asked him this last week and at other times. The Prime Minister told us that it would be a priority but what we and many other people, particularly Indian women who have been disenfranchised, want to know is when?

Mr. Pinard: If that important matter had been raised by the House Leader of the Hon. Member's Party, I would have been able to give a firmer answer today.

STATUTES OF CANADA

TABLING OF GOVERNMENT PROPOSALS TO CORRECT CERTAIN ANOMALIES

Mr. Al MacBain (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Justice (Mr. MacGuigan) I am pleased to lay upon the Table of the House, in both official languages, a copy of the Government's proposals to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms and errors and to deal with other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in the Statutes of Canada.

● (1510)

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Justice, I wish to say that there have been consultations among the Justice critics. I believe that if you seek unanimous agreement to refer the draft Bill which I referred to previously to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, you will find that such consent exists.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I was distracted for a moment. I do not know what consent is being sought here. I have not been consulted on this. The Parliamentary Secretary might elaborate by way of explanation on what he is seeking to do.

Mr. Speaker: The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice has tabled documents. I believe he has asked for unanimous consent to refer them to the Justice Committee.

Mr. MacBain: The Justice critics have been consulted.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the documents that have been tabled to be referred to the Justice Committee?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: There is unanimous consent. It is so ordered.

MR. CROSBY—MARITIME COMMAND UNIFORM

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, may I present 500 separate petitions signed by Canadians in the federal constituency of Halifax West and other parts of Canada. It is that the petitioners want the Parliament of Canada to restore the navy blue uniform to Maritime Command, which is Canada's navy.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosby: If these petitions do not prompt action by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Blais), I can assure the House of Commons I will be presenting many more.

MEASURE RESPECTING APPOINTMENT AND TENURE OF SENIOR OFFICERS

The Public Service would thereby be more accountable to the government of the day and to the electorate.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Transport): The management of Air Canada advises as follows:

1. (a) and (b) See below for this answer.

2. In addition to the cities served by Air Canada as listed below, scheduled cargo flights serve Shannon, Ireland, are Brussels, Belgium.

3. Six Boeing 767's currently on order are due for delivery during 1984. No other aircraft are on order.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: The questions enumerated by the Parliamentary Secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Parliamentary secretary to pay attention to Question No. 368 which is on the Order Paper in my name. It was first put down some three years ago. It asks the simple question:

What was the increase in real terms in the Department of National Defence's expenditures, including the statutory costs and expressed in percentages, for each fiscal year 1970-71 to 1979-80?

It is a very simple question. In speeches by a variety of Ministers of National Defence, they are forever telling us what they are getting. I would like them to put it in writing on the Order Paper. If there is anything about the way the question is phrased and it could be changed to make it simpler so that their minds could comprehend what I am after, I would be pleased to do that.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I have taken note of the question and the number and I will look into it. I will try to get an answer to the Hon. Member as soon as possible.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 62—TOURIST INDUSTRY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Jelinek:

That this House condemns the Government for having allowed Canada's tourism deficit to reach a staggering $2.1 billion in 1983, and having thus caused over 100,000 Canadian jobs to be lost in that year alone, and for failing to remedy the overtaxation which is the underlying problem which plagues this labour-intensive industry and which pushes prices to non-competitive levels thereby counteracting any positive impact that might be generated by the government's marketing expenditures.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the House for setting aside this day for a debate on tourism. It is not a subject that gets a lot of attention in this House, certainly not the kind of attention it deserves. I suppose it is because the budgets of other Departments, whether it be Health and Welfare, Energy or any other Department, are so large. It seems that in our country the value system is built entirely on budgets, dollar value and so forth.

There are other reasons why this is an important subject. Tourism is important if for no other reason than that there is a natural desire on the part of our citizens to know, enjoy and understand their country. They deserve to be able to travel throughout the country and enjoy the benefits of their land. I wish to add that it is not right that in many cases the Government, rather than helping our people visit the rest of the country, throws impediments in their path by making it more difficult for them to see their country. It is good for our people because it is good for their health to be able to get around.

Beyond that, it is good for people of other countries to visit us. It is good for our relationship with other countries. All Members will agree that when people from other countries visit our land, they never forget its beauty and grandeur and the hospitality of its people. It is wrong for the Government not to make it as easy as possible for the tourism industry of Canada to survive and prosper. That is the burden of my remarks.

It is ironic that for other industries our geography is their impediment, but for the tourism industry it is a bonus. The very fact that we have large spaces and large sections of country that are mountainous is for every other industry an impediment, but it is an asset for the tourism industry. All of that is free except for the cost of providing access to it. In other industries, travel and transportation are the obstacle. In the tourism industry, travel and transportation are the pleasure. It is an indescribable God-given heritage that is ours but which we are not exploiting properly.

After listening to the remarks of the Minister and other speakers, I wish to say that it is not that the Government is doing nothing for tourism that bothers us. I will concede, as have other Members, that the Minister in charge of tourism is spending megabucks on advertising in the United States, particularly in periodicals in the northern states. That will have a beneficial effect upon the tourism industry in Canada. I think all of us would concede that. As the Minister mentioned this morning, the Government is literally spending hundreds of millions of dollars helping to build and perhaps subsidize convention centres across Canada so that conventioners, particularly from the United States, will find Canada an attractive place in which to hold conventions. That is a given.

The problem is not that the Government does not do some things, but rather that it has a shallow understanding of people dynamics or tourist dynamics. Because the Government does not understand people dynamics, its policies contracdict each other and sometimes cancel each other out, so that one government department is trying to encourage tourism and another department is putting impediments or taxes in the way so that tourism is in fact discouraged.

Let me say as an aside that my home overlooks the United States border, so I understand somewhat the accessibility of the tourism market. It is easy for Canadians to go down to the United States and save 25 per cent to 30 per cent on a tank of gas. American tourists can come up the western coast of the United States, tank up and spend $25 for a tank of gas in the State of Washington, or come to Canada and pay $35 for the same tank of gas. If one is driving a recreational vehicle, that does not encourage tourism. As the Hon. Member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) pointed out this morning, since two-thirds of that extra cost is government taxes, it seems government has some influence on whether or not it encourages tourism in Canada.

I would like to illustrate how these policies contradict each other. On the one hand the Minister advertises in the northern states in order to encourage particularly Americans from those states to come to Canada and spend their dollars here. On the other hand the Government puts a 9 per cent tax on the printing of tourism advertising which sends those dollars to the United States as a result. On the one hand they are trying to encourage; on the other they are trying to discourage.

The Minister may well be right that the Government is subsidizing or at least helping with construction and spending hundreds of millions of dollars on convention centres. Hon. Members will recall that several years ago there was almost a crisis between Canada and the United States regarding that particular policy. At that time Canada took it upon itself not to allow expenses for attending conventions as tax deductible expenses, to the point where the United States threatened retaliation because of our tax policy. U.S. centres were threatening to boycott Canada instead of holding their conventions here because of Canadian tax policies.

If the Government wants to spend hundreds of millions of dollars building convention centres and then it builds a tax structure to discourage people from holding their conventions here, it seems to me there is a very poor understanding of people dynamics. The underlying principle is that people really do not have to come to Canada for their vacations. No one is obligating Americans, Germans, Brits, the French or the Japanese; no one says to them that they have to spend their vacation dollars in Canada. It is the role of government to make them want to come to Canada and to put some kind of encouragement before them so that they will want to spend their dollars here. At present the Government discourages them by putting impediments in their way.

We have the curious spectacle of encouraging on the one hand and discouraging on the other. The most graphic example of this, which hit us hard in western Canada, was that for years tours operators or tour companies in British Columbia, Alberta and other western Canadian provinces spent thousands of dollars advertising in Japan the beauties of western Canada—the Rocky Mountains, the Columbia icefields, salmon fishing, steelhead fishing, skiing and all other great attractions in western Canada. They spent megabucks sending four-colour pictures all over Japan. As a result everyone in Japan understood and instantly knew something about the beauties of western Canada. All one would have to do is ask a Japanese tourist why he came and he would say that he came to see western Canada. The tour industry built that trade to the extent that there were 60,000 Japanese per year visiting western Canada, 25,000 of whom were going by train from Vancouver to Edmonton on VIA Rail, so much so that every train was filled to capacity all summer. There were bookings ahead of time and full capacity for those trains.

What happened in 1981? Suddenly there was the announcement by the Minister of Transport cutting VIA Rail service between Vancouver and Edmonton with not so much as a by your leave. The travel industry had spent thousands of dollars, probably hundreds of thousands, in other countries to advertise the Canadian tourism industry and suddenly, in one fell swoop, because of the policy of the Department of Transport it was cut out. Approximately 2,000 travel agencies across Canada had done a great job of promoting land cruises across the country, and government departments worked against them. That one decision on the part of Transport Canada cost the travel industry, the Jasper industry, something like $40 million. It was estimated that those tourists would spend $2,000 apiece, so a conservative estimate of 25,000 people travelling VIA Rail would be $40 million to $50 million. What kind of impact did that have on Jasper, Edson, Hinton, Edmonton, Tête Jaune, Barrière, Clearwater, Blue River, all those places along the CNR roadbed.

A common denominator in the tourism industry is that many of those businesses are family businesses, small businesses. All the money of the families is invested in those businesses, and all of them are in jeopardy. It is their own money and their own employment. In one fell swoop the Government threatens every family livelihood in that industry. One of ten people in Canada works in tourism. If we extrapolate what that one VIA Rail decision did to British Columbia and Alberta, with absolutely no consideration for the investment the tourism industry had already made in other countries, we must conclude that the Government has absolutely no consideration at all for people dynamics and how decisions are made within each family planning a vacation. It would not so much as consult another Department in order to see what impact such decision would have upon the industry. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that if the Government wants to help the tourism industry which has a $2.3 billion deficit, the first thing it needs to do is to look at the interdepartmental decisions which are made and see what impact a decision of one Department has on another Department.

That leads me to the consideration of the current talks on deregulation. I will not deal with that subject in depth. those hearings are going on right now and none of us are fully informed of the impact that that will have on the country. However, I do wish to say that as long as the Minister keeps making statements like those he made in the House yesterday and those he made on camera throughout the previous week, he will create an atmosphere of insecurity within the entire industry.

Insecurity is something which the business sector cannot stand. It may be that certain areas of the industry may some day have to be deregulated, but I do not know. However, the first thing the Minister ought not to do is to shoot his mouth off all the time so that the travel and tourism industry and the airline industry become nervous. The second thing he needs to do with respect to deregulation is to make certain that whatever decisions are made regarding deregulation will not affect air traffic safety. He must see that passengers will feel secure no matter what happens to the airline industry.

As I said before, it is important that the business community feel a sense of security that allows it to plan. As has already been illustrated by Via Rail, one of the things the Government does best is to give the business community the impression that it does things on impulse. The business community does not know where it stands any longer relative to government decisions.

I say to you, Sir, that if tourism is going to prosper, the Government must first understand how people feel. It must understand that people from other countries are under no obligation at all to spend their hard earned money in Canada. If we want people from Japan, the United States and the United Kingdom to spend their dollars in Canada, we must make them feel as though they were at home and we must make sure that it becomes profitable for businesses to make them feel that way.

As well, Canadians are not obligated to spend their money here in Canada. It is easy enough for Canadians to go to the United States and spend their money there. The fact that our dollar is now worth about 78 cents American does not seem to stop Canadians from going south of the border, particularly when they can save 30 per cent on a tank of gas and when hotel and food bills are cheaper because taxes are lower. We need a Government that understands these kinds of dynamics and does not implement one policy to encourage tourism and then implement another one to discourage it.

Those of us who live in western Canada enjoy the beauties of our area just as those who live in every other sector of the country enjoy the peculiar beauties of their own areas. We in the west do not particularly appreciate the fact that the Government institutes the kind of policies which make ti difficult for people to come and visit us. Tourism is good for the health of the nation and is good for mutual understanding. I trust that the Government will do something to give Canadians and the tourist industry the understanding that we are for them rather than against them.

Mr. Harquail: Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the Hon. Member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen) who, in his usual fashion, has delivered a very eloquent speech on a very important topic. Tourism is a big business in Canada. He talked about some of the elements of tourism which affect western Canada. However, I am wondering if he would be prepared to elaborate further.

Earlier today, we were speaking of some of the celebrations which are going on in Canada. In Newfoundland, there is the re-enactment of the first Viking landing. There are celebrations in Yellowknife, and New Brunswick is celebrating its bicentennial and the visits of His Holiness, the Pope, and Her Majesty, the Queen. In Quebec, there is a celebration called "Tall Ships", and there is a program which the Minister responsible for tourism has implemented called "Canada, What a Country". There will be many celebrations and festivals in my own home province, including the "Bon Ami Week" at Dalhousie.

I wonder if the Hon. Member would be prepared to tell us about his impressions of Expo '86 and the preparation and planning which are going into this major event that will draw many, many people to Canada and certainly to his own constituency.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has overlooked the fact that I did not read my speech. I wish he had complimented me for speaking strictly from notes.

I do welcome the Hon. Member's question. First, I wish to point out to him that I am a westerner and I am not as familiar with Central Canada as I would like to be. However, I believe that the federal Government was not very generous toward the United Empire Loyalist celebrations in Ontario. I recall some of my colleagues making representations on behalf of constituencies in which such celebrations were taking place and getting short shrift from the federal Government.

All of that aside, Sir, I know that these kinds of investments are being made. The Hon. Member did not mention the Jacques Cartier celebrations and a great many others. What I was trying to tell the Hon. Member is that it does not matter how much money is invested in such celebrations if, on the other hand, people are discouraged from coming here. People hear about all of these great things. They want to come here and are encouraged to come here, but when they get here, they find out that they cannot afford to stay. With the one hand we give and with the other we take away.

Let me conclude my remarks by referring to Transpo in Vancouver. I am glad that the Hon. Member reminded me of that. Earlier this afternoon, I heard the Hon. Member for Mississauga North (Mr. Fisher) expounding on the greatness of the Trillium Centre in Mississauga. He wants federal support for that. B.C. Place was built with British Columbia money, not with federal money. B.C. Place is doing a very good job, thank you. The fact is that some federal money is going into Transpo. One of the things this project did was to invest British Columbia and federal money in a transportation system that was developed in Ontario. As a matter of fact, Vancouver is pioneering the use of Ontario transportation technology in Canada. They have not been able to sell that technology anywhere else but British Columbia is taking a chance on a Canadian product. We are spending good provincial and federal dollars to bring that transportation system to Vancouver.

Mr. Harquail: Mr. Speaker, I suppose I should not be surprised to find that it is difficult to get a positive reply from someone to your left. We know of the doom and gloom tactics and the negative positions of most Tory members. However, I was hoping that this particular Member would show me some consideration. Instead, he went off the topic to speak about the time when I gave a speech and was referring to facts and figures. At that time, he was upset about a document to which I was referring. It was my right and indeed my privilege to refer to that document.

I was stressing the point of federal contributions to the provinces. With respect to the bicentennial celebrations in my own province, federal contributions will be $2.5 million this year. The province will contribute an equal amount of money, making a total of $5 million. We know of the millions and millions of dollars that go into facilities such as the ski facilities in our own area.

• (1540)

The Hon. Member talked about the dynamics of the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism (Mr. Smith) who has spent an awful lot of energy touring the country trying to get people to come on side with this promotion of Tourism Year 1984. As a Member from the west, would he join the effort to attract more Americans to our country? Would he comment on the number of Americans who visit his province? I am sure they must come in very great numbers because of the devalued dollar.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, a report entitled "The Last Straw" says that the Sherbrooke Tourist and Convention Bureau indicated that as many as 35,000 tourists and 12,000 convention visitors coming to that area each year arrive on "The Atlantic". That is the VIA Rail train which is being cancelled, which is a tragedy.

I would say to the Hon. Member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) that I am happy about the investment of tourist dollars and I am glad of the celebrations. There will be a large native Indian celebration in Ontario next September and I want it to succeed. All I am saying is that you cannot make things succeed if you make them counterproductive at the same time. If we encourage all these celebrations and then make it difficult for people to enjoy themselves, things will not work. Much as we want to entice them, people do not have to come here.

Even with the devalued dollar Americans do not come to Canada as much as they used to. Those who come generally live within 150 miles of the border. An RV vehicle gets five or six miles to a gallon of gas, at $2.25 per gallon. Those vehicles do not get good mileage through the mountains. The visitor knows that of that $2.25, two-thirds is taxes. That is not a good way to encourage tourists to come and see this country. It is the reason that the number of visitors from other lands is decreasing and also that Canadians keep going south. That is too bad, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I gather that there are no further questions or comments. Before proceeding to debate will Hon. Members allow the Chair to refer to Standing Order 15(1), which provides that the Speaker shall preserve order and decorum, and also to subparagraph (3) which provides that when a Member is speaking, no Member shall pass between that Member and the Chair. I should like to draw to the attention of the House that since the resumption of the debate this afternoon, eight Members, including one Minister, have passed between the Hon. Member who had the floor and the Chair. I have no choice but to apply the rules of the House and I seek the co-operation of all Hon. Members in respecting that particular rule of decorum.

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I agree with you. I think we should do our utmost to preserve the traditions we have respected so long in the House of Commons. I hope no one crosses while I am on my feet.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased with this opportunity to speak to the motion concerning the tourist industry, moved by my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Jelinek), and in the twenty minutes I am allowed, I shall try to explain, in my own words, how we should interpret a deficit of $2.1 billion for 1983.

There are a number of reasons, Mr. Speaker, but there is one very simple reason, for instance, for the loss of about $600 million, and it appears in the report published by Tourism Canada. In the last report, according to the latest figures available which are for 1981, 10,000,968 Americans visited Canada and spent an average of $169, while 10,000,000 Canadians, so not quite as many Canadians, spent a much higher average per person, namely, $230. This works out to a difference of $600 million for 1983. Of course there are other reasons, Mr. Speaker, and I shall try to correct the assumption that these reasons are the cause of the Canadian Government's failure to improve tourism in Canada.

First of all, we see that although, in 1981, international trade dropped by 1 per cent, tourism increased by 1 per cent. Here we already have a difference of 2 per cent, which shows the vitality of the tourist industry, because although all other industries connected with international trade showed a drop of 1 per cent, the tourist industry showed an increase of 1 per cent, and income from international travel increased by 16.2 per cent annually over the last few years.

Mr. Speaker, this proves tourism is alive and well, and how important it is to Canada. In Canada, the tourist industry employs 1.2 million people four times as many as the construction industry. The latter industry is often taken as an example of one of our vital industrial sectors, and so it is, because of the materials it uses and the economic impact on other industries such as furniture and carpet manufacturing, to name only a few. However, tourism employs four times as many employees and twice as many as agriculture ranking second right after the manufacturing sector. It provides jobs for workers at all levels of skill and in all parts of the country. According to Statistics Canada, between 1979 and 1981 tourism had outstripped forestry, manufacturing, construction and trade with the number of new jobs provided, which demonstrates the vitality of this industry.

The amount of foreign currency generated by the tourist industry exceeds that generated by oil exports, which will come as a surprise to many. People used to think that Canada's oil industry, that is, crude oil, was a major industry, but tourism comes first in generating foreign currency. Unfortunately, although it is not the case throughout the country, I must be critical of the present provincial Government, since a large part of the deficit Canada is showing is due especially to poor administration by the Government of the Province of Quebec. While tourism is showing increases, in terms of the number of jobs created and expansion of business in all provinces, ranging from 5 per cent to 10 per cent, the Province of Quebec is on the low end of the scale, although other industries in Quebec showed a drop of only 0.2 per cent and this was 2.1 per cent in other provinces. In the Province of Quebec, compared to all other industries, growth in the tourist industry, was only 5 per cent. In Ontario, for instance, this figure was 6.7 per cent; in British Columbia, 7.9 per cent; and in Alberta, 10.1 per cent. In Quebec, it was only 5 per cent.

• (1550)

Now let us look at some of the reasons why the tourist industry in the Province of Quebec is not doing as well as in the other provinces, despite the fact that Quebec is probably closest to the largest population centres in North America, if we consider Toronto, Ottawa, New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and so forth. One of the major reasons why the tourist industry in Quebec is not doing as well as it should, is that it costs $3,084 to create one job in the tourist industry, while in Ontario, it only costs $2,077. Only Alberta has higher figures for the cost of creating jobs.

Let us we compare now the performance of other provinces to that of the Province of Quebec as far as the tourist industry is concerned. In New Brunswick the industry is growing steadily and represents 5.7 per cent of the province's total industry, while in the Province of Quebec, this figure is only 5.4 per cent.

If we look at what is happening in the other provinces, the Province of Ontario, which certainly does not have twice the population of Quebec, does have more than twice the gross income from tourism, namely, $8.9 billion, while in the Province of Quebec, this figure is approximately $5.2 billion. In Ontario, tourism accounts for 6.3 per cent of the total industry, while in the Province of Quebec, it is only 5.4 per cent. And so it goes across Canada. Although Quebec has so many advantages and natural beauty spots to offer, it happens to be the province where the tourist industry is the weakest.

In the next few minutes, Mr. Speaker, I would like the House to consider the main reasons for this very serious situation. First of all, let us consider the harassing measures introduced by the present Quebec Government in recent years. My colleagues may recall the introduction of Bill 101, Bill 17 and Bill 43, as well as higher taxes—much higher where gas is concerned. The excise tax on liquor is much higher than the Canadian average. Municipal taxes are in many cases higher than all taxes levied by other provinces.

A few years ago, figures showed that the annual tax burden per room and per year for a hotel like the Queen Elizabeth in Montreal was $1,800. The hotel had to pay, per room and per year, a total of $1,800 for all kinds of taxes: municipal taxes, school taxes, property taxes, liquor taxes, taxes on bar licences, dining rooms, etc., while for the competition in the industry—and I am referring to the tourist industry in Boston or Philadelphia or Vermont or Niagara Falls—the total tax burden was from $300 to $800, which in many cases meant much less than half the tax burden on hotels in the Province of Quebec. Bill 101 ... Obviously, people who are going to turn their backs on the Province of Quebec as an interesting place to visit are not going to write to the Quebec Department of Tourism or its Canadian counterpart to explain: "I am sorry, but the last time we went, we had to stop quite often to ask for directions because there were no signs in our language ... And if you think only French Canadians live in the Province of Quebec and those are the only people you care to have, we intend to go elsewhere."

This is probably why, Mr. Speaker, the figures for Ontario, which I gave earlier, show a much better performance in the tourist industry. While in Ontario, as I said earlier, the industry accounted for almost $9 billion, or $8.9 billion, to be exact, in Quebec the figure was barely $5 billion. Almost half!

I hope that the future Liberal Government of Mr. Bourassa will correct the injustices caused by Bill 101 and repair the damage done to the tourist industry in Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, Bill 43 is sheer nonsense because it will force the tourist industry to pay higher salaries to its workers and to those who receive part of their salary in tips. The whole industry will be in turmoil because some employers will have to increase pay rates for their staff, and then turn around and fire some of them, with the ultimate result that tourists will no longer have the first class service to which they are entitled. That is one of the difficulties.

So now we have a new Minister, the MNA for the riding of Prévost which I know is tourist-oriented, because I live there. I hope that the new Minister will heed the representations which will be made to him, to the Government and to his predecessor by the people who work in the tourist industry. I hope that those people who work in the restaurant industry will be able to convince the Minister and the PQ Government that this Bill will create many problems for the tourist industry. And the same thing goes for Bill 17, Mr. Speaker. Under that legislation, restaurants and hotels would have to close their doors if a handful of unionized workers were to decide to go on strike, because even the owner, his wife and their family are prohibited from providing services while employees are out on strike. There is increasing talk about more restaurant employees being forced to join unions, so it is altogether absurd to introduce such a Bill at a time when unemployment is rampant in the Province of Quebec.

Let us talk about other taxes of every kind and every description. A tax has been imposed on clients which come mainly from Montreal and are on their way to the Laurentians. In addition to gas taxes which are much higher than anywhere else in the rest of Canada, they now have to pay on average no less than $4 or $5 every time they use the roads. It is the only region in Canada where people are so harshly penalized and have to pay to drive on highways.

Mind you, if the Laurentian Autoroute was a paying proposition because of the tolls collected, others could be turned into toll roads. Unfortunately, despite its high tolls, the autoroute is always in the red because the accounting and the institution established by the provincial Government have made it impossible to write off the outstanding debts of the Régie des autoroutes. Quite simply, one has to admit that the operating costs take up a major share of revenues.

For several years, in fact from the day our expressways were built, my colleague, the Hon. Member for Laval (Mr. Roy) has been reminding the population, as he did last Monday, that Autoroute 13, for instance, was built with the help of a very low interest loan of $100 million and a grant of $30 million which were provided to assist the Province of Quebec in building this part of the expressway because there was no parallel road. If there were an alternative route,people who do not want to pay a dollar to travel this short distance of thirteen miles or twenty kilometres could use it. However, there is no highway parallel to Autroute 13. There is Autoroute 17 or 117, which is former Highway 11 and which runs along Autoroute 15 between Montreal and Sainte-Agathe. However, there is no road parallel to Autoroute 13, and if you want to get home the fastest way, you will just have to pay the toll. This is totally unacceptable and I hope that the pressures which we have all brought to bear in recent years, especially my colleague from Laval, will convince the Quebec Government of the stupidity of these tolls which impede the development of the Lower Laurentians economy and tourism industry.

Other difficulties, Mr. Speaker, complications and annoyances are created by the Quebec Government whenever agreements are to be signed to help the industry. As I recall, the only business related to the tourist industry receive assistance under a shared cost program with Quebec was the Mont-Tremblant resort. This happened because at that time it belonged to the Caisse d'entraide économique whose management had probably prevailed upon the then Member for Labelle, Jacques Léonard, to get going and take action. However, we were not able to sit down with the provicial government and bring it to signing agreements to promote tourism in my constituency and in the Labelle area. Yet, I believe that there is a very great need for federal-provincial cooperation in Quebec to develop the tourist industry because we already have all the natural resources required for it.

Mr. Speaker, I would not want to create the impression that the Hon. Member for Halton is completely wrong in applying to the Canadian Government and that tourism is purely a matter of provincial jurisdiction. The previous speaker, who is from British Columbia, is well aware that his province has some responsibility. However, it is shared by the Canadian Government. For the last three or four months, I have been trying to urge, first my constituents and then the Municipal Boards, the Chambers of Commerce and various community groups to press the Government to restore the Montreal-Mont-Laurier rail service. This 150-mile corridor is just as important to us in the Laurentian region as is the Windsor-Quebec corridor and for very much the same reasons, as it is the busiest transport corridor in northeastern North America, I do not mean in Canada only, but in the whole northeastern part of North America. You only have to travel on the roads north of Montreal to Mont-Tremblant or Saint-Jovite over the weekend to realize how many thousands of cars travel this road. The thousands of letters I have received and the resolutions by municipalities and Chambers of Commerce, have convinced me more than ever of the importance of a modern, rapid, reliable and comfortable rail service because, people who have been deprived of this service for four years, are now discovering how essential it has been since 1902 to the development of the region and how important it will be in the future. Young people who do not have a car or week-enders who want to travel cheaply must rely on the train to go to the Laurentian skiing resorts. In any case rail travel is faster and safer than cars since bad weather and snowstorms do not affect rail service as much as it does the highways.

There are other areas where the Canadian Government could make a contribution. I am thinking for instance about domestic air travel. Tourists in an increasing number are coming from South-East Asia and Japan and also from the Philippines and Malaysia, but most of them only visit Western Canada, specifically Alberta. Most of them never travel eastward. I suggest that if we made it possible to travel more cheaply to Central Canada or even Eastern Canada where you live, Mr. Speaker, by lowering airfares, people from Western Europe could travel to areas in Western Canada, while people from the Middle East and the Orient could visit areas in Central Canada. This is a matter which comes under federal jurisdiction Mr. Speaker, something we could not therefore blame on provincial governments. The Government of Canada should deal with this serious issue and try to find ways to encourage tourist exchanges between the regions.

There is another problem which is becoming increasing more urgent... Mr. Speaker, I am aware that the time allotted to me is about to expire, but I hope my colleagues will allow me to touch upon it, namely, the problem of acid rains, which undermines our tourist industry by lowering the quality of our water and waterways, as well as destroying our forests. This is very serious, Mr. Speaker. One can see that Western Europe countries are much more aware of the miseries and problems this could bring to Canada. I hope our neighbours south of the border will spend a little less money to wage wars in Central America and a little more to fight and eliminate acid rains originating from the central and Northeastern parts of their country.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Dupras: Could I go on for a few minutes?

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member seeks unanimous consent to continue his remarks. Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that what the Hon. Member is saying is of utmost importance. However, we have a great number of Members who want to contribute to the debate as well and therefore, regretfully, I cannot give unanimous consent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is not unanimous consent so we will proceed with questions or comments. If there are none, we will proceed to debate.

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have this opportunity to speak on what is our second Opposition Day debate on tourism. Less than a year ago this Party, trying to raise the tourism profile in Canada and trying to impress upon Canadians and the Government the importance of tourism, used an Opposition Day to do just that. Since that first day back in April of 1983, the Conservative Party and caucus received many favourable responses to our efforts from the provinces and from many tourists and businesses. In most of those responses people shared the sentiments we expressed. They agreed the Government has neglected tourism over the past few years. They urged that tourism be treated more as a business than as a source of revenue for the federal Government. Most people expressed feelings that the Government does not understand the industry and has paid only lip service to the tourist operators.

In particular, Mr. Speaker, one businessman related tourism to the story of Cinderella. We, the Conservative Party, could be the prince after the next election who finds Cinderella and puts the industry in the perspective it truly deserves. We intend to make the country aware of the importance of this industry to job creation in Canada.

We received many letters congratulating us on our efforts in proposing and debating the Opposition Day motion on tourism, and they suggested ways in which we could improve the industry. I feel that our Opposition Day was a success in that it raised the industry's profile in the eyes of many people. Unfortunately, it did not do so in the eyes of the Government. Today, Mr. Speaker, we are here once again to discuss the importance of the tourism industry to Canada's economy.

As I said, I am very happy to be speaking to the motion which the Hon. Member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek) has put forward, condemning the Government for its inattention to the industry and for allowing Canada's tourism deficit to grow to $2.1 billion, thereby creating a loss of well over 100,000 jobs. The industry employs over 1.14 million people, and one of every ten workers in Canada is employed by the industry, directly or indirectly. The industry is an important employer of people because it provides jobs for both skilled and semi-skilled workers. Tourism is not just an industry found downtown in the middle of large urban areas. The tourist industry employs people in the far-flung corners of the country, out in the rural areas where there are no other types of employment. That is another reason why the industry is so vital to the rural areas of the country.

The tourist industry is very labour-intensive. Due to the fact that this industry is such a major employer of people, I would like to review the industry's travel statistics for 1983. In 1983, the travel deficit for tourism increased by 57 per cent from 1982. It went from $1.3 billion in 1982 to $2.1 billion in 1983. As I said before, Mr. Speaker, this translates into well over 100,000 jobs lost to the people of Canada. At a time when unemployment has reached extremely high proportions, these 100,000 jobs would certainly have been welcome to the unemployed people sitting at home unable to find jobs.

The total number of visitors travelling to Canada from the United States was 30,892,433. This was up only .6 per cent from 1982. In terms of automobile travel, the statistics were the same as for 1982. Plane travel from the United States was down while bus travel was up 8.7 per cent, as were other modes of transportation. The number of visitors from the United States was not up significantly from 1982, even though their dollar is worth much more than the Canadian dollar. There is a real asset in their dollar compared to ours. They have a bonus in coming to Canada and spending their dollars here. However, they are not doing that.

The number of people travelling to Canada from other countries as well was down a whopping percentage from 1982. This drastic decrease in travel from other countries certainly shows the neglect that Canada's advertising is receiving abroad. Foreigners have the perception that Canada is an expensive country to visit. The high costs involved in visiting Canada are driving people to vacation in other areas. This is the fault of over-pricing which has occurred due to the high taxes and prices induced by the federal Government as well as other governments.

The number of Canadians travelling to other countries is a very different story. The percentage of Canadians visiting the United States is up 17.5 per cent from 1982. This increase means that Canadians are not staying in Canada for their vacations, even though they are paying extra money to visit the United States where the exchange rate is 25 per cent to 28 per cent. They have to pay an extra 28 cents on every dollar to visit the United States. One reason for this is that Canadians cannot afford to travel within their own country. Another reason is that many are not aware of the potential for travelling to destinations in Canada. This is the fault of the federal Government. It has increased taxes, raised prices to a level where people cannot travel in Canada, and cut back on the advertising costs over the years. The number of Canadians visiting the U.S. by automobile is up by 20.7 per cent from 1982. Bus travel is up 3.4 per cent. Other forms of transportation are up 13.7 per cent. The reason for this is the low cost of gasoline, accommodation, food and alcohol in the United States as compared with that in Canada. All these factors are taken into consideration by people planning vacations.

The first thing you must do on a vacation is to fill up the car with gas. If it is cheaper in the United States, why not travel there? The next thing is to choose accommodation. Mr. Speaker, if you have travelled in the United States and parts of Canada you will know that accommodation in the United States is somewhat cheaper than in Canada. The next essential item is the cost of meals in restaurants. In Canada the cost of eating in most restaurants is higher than in the United States.

The federal tax heist on meals definitely adds to the cost and takes the enjoyment out of dining out. The cost of entertainment in Canada is much higher due to the federal Government's increase in the cost of alcoholic beverages.

Through the federal tax on gasoline and increases in the cost of alcoholic beverages, food and food production, the Government has increased the overhead for tourist businesses to a level where the operator must charge so much to cover his costs that he is pricing himself out of business. All governments must realize that the tourist industry is not a bottomless well filled with money for governments to do with what they will. Governments must realize that because of their ever increasing demand for taxes and their practice of continually increasing taxes on tourism, they have been dipping too deep into the well and now find that the well has been bailed dry.

Governments have siphoned off billions of dollars of revenue from the industry. In 1982, Mr. Speaker, the revenue from tourism in Canada was $16.5 billion. Governments siphoned $8 billion in taxes off the industry. Almost 50 per cent of the revenue from tourism went directly into the coffers of governments. The industry quite simply cannot stand the excessive drain caused by the over-taxation of the industry. For much too long governments have been looking at the tourist industry as a source of revenue. Every time more money is required by governments for their programs and policies they tax tourism for the dollars they are looking for.

The industry must be allowed to retain more of the revenue it generates. The industry requires money to revitalize itself, to upgrade its facilities, and to provide an ever improving product. In today's society customers are expecting higher standards and better service than ever before. It is about time that governments took steps to rectify the damage they have caused to the industry. I believe it is a lack of government understanding and co-ordination between Departments which has led the tourist industry to the state in which it is today. Government decisions are often made without regard to their implications in the travel industry. Unfortunately we have many examples of this.

I would like to deal with the role of governments in helping the industry and to discuss the obvious lack of co-ordination between government Departments, which has had a negative effect on the industry over the last few years. To do this, Mr. Speaker, I must impress upon you the importance of the industry to Canada and look at the problems which have developed due to the lack of co-ordination between government Departments. I am now speaking specifically about federal government Departments.

This morning we all heard a prime example of a government decision to cut back VIA Rail passenger service between Vancouver and Jasper. From talking with tour operators in British Columbia I know that we lost millions upon millions of dollars of Japanese business because of that one simple decision by the Department of Transport to cut back VIA Rail Service without any thought whatsoever to how it was going to affect tourism. We lost $40 million in the Japanese traffic alone. We lost $10 million in the small community of Jasper, Alberta. We simply cannot continue to have one government Department making decisions which affect the industry of tourism so adversely.

I will give you another example, Mr. Speaker. For years preceding 1982, Prince Edward Island was advertising and promoting itself as the world centre for the giant bluefin tuna. We were getting to the point where people were recognizing us as the world centre for giant bluefin tuna. We were catching bluefin tuna as big as 1,500 pounds. We had a quota of 673 bluefin tuna in the Gulf, I believe. However, there was no specific quota set for the sports fishery. Whenever the 673 tuna had been caught the season was closed. The very day that someone got off an airplane in Charlottetown from South Africa, the quota was reached and the season was closed.

Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, what that did to the hundreds and thousands of people whom we were trying to influence to come to P.E.I. to catch tuna? Can you imagine what that person told his friends when he went back home after spending thousands of dollars to come to P.E.I. to catch the big bluefin tuna and arriving on the day that the season was closed? The Department of Fisheries unilaterally cut off the season. There goes another sector of the industry of tourism on P.E.I.

I will give you another prime example of how a Department of the federal Government can adversely affect a sector of the industry. In 1975 CN Marine decided to raise the price for recreation vehicles. It raised the price to 44 cents a foot. That price, compared to the charge of 14 cents a foot for a commercial vehicle, is definite discrimination against the tourist industry. As a result, 25 per cent of the camping grounds in P.E.I. that were in business in 1975 are closed. No sensible person would pay three times the charge for a recreational vehicle as compared to that paid for a regular commercial vehicle. They would not do it simply as a matter of principle.

• (1620)

All of the camping grounds that are still operating in Prince Edward Island have reduced their staff and most have reduced the hours that the remaining staff works. Hundreds of jobs have gone down the drain because of an isolated decision made in one Department of Government without any consideration at all for the implications it would have on the tourist industry.

We must do something about the conditions in the federal Government and its Departments. There should be co-ordination between the Departments so that they know beforehand whether a decision by one Department will adversely affect the tourism industry.

Our Party believes that a co-ordinated effort of this kind is necessary if the tourist industry is to be brought back to where it should be. We advocate that there be someone in each federal government Department to scrutinize what is happening so that he can warn people who are making a decision that it may affect tourism and costs hundreds of thousands of jobs and therefore should be reconsidered. We believe very strongly in this approach and propose that the Government consider this action. Hopefully we will form the Government after the next election and we will look at that matter very seriously.

Canada has become grossly over-priced as a tourist destination. As of last September first, the federal Government increased the federal excise tax on tobacco by 15.8 per cent and on alcoholic beverages by 13.3 per cent. These increases triggered a number of increases throughout the distribution system, such as provincial taxes and mark-ups, leading to a net increase in the case of alcoholic beverages of about 8 per cent at the retail level.

I am not advocating that the Government should not be taxing alcohol and tobacco or that people should be consuming more alcohol or tobacco, but we must realize that when a tourist is away on a vacation he or she wants to sit down, relax and have a glass of beer or a glass of wine. We must bear in mind that the ever increasing taxes on these items are affecting tourism adversely.

Those increases in the price of alcoholic beverages have also affected Canada's struggling hotel and restaurant business and made them even less competitive than they were. We know that they are not competitive with the same type of business in the United States. Before last September's increase in the excise tax on alcohol, the cost of liquor to restaurants in New York State was equal to only three-quarters of the cost to Ontario restaurants. This is another example of the ramifications that such thoughtless government decisions have on the tourist industry. It certainly proves that there is definitely a lack of attention given to the effect that a decision made in one government Department has on another sector of the industry in Canada.

Through these discussions in the House today we hope to raise the profile of tourism and help Canadians understand it, appreciate its value and demand that the Government pay more attention to tourism to help create the atmosphere in Canada that will allow Canadian businesses to become competitive with their closest neighbour to the south.

We have a gold mine on our southern border. There are 250 million Americans who would love to come to Canada and spend some time here in a relaxed atmosphere. They would like to come to some of our beaches in eastern Canada, do some salmon fishing and so on. I know why they are not coming here as I am sure you do also, Mr. Speaker. I believe you come from a part of New Brunswick where tourism is important. We both know that the underlying problem with tourism in Canada is the over-taxation of the industry. The industry is paying far too much of its revenue to the Government and there is not enough left to keep the industry up to date and competitive with the rest of North America.

I have much more to say but my time is almost up. Again, I want to make the point that the tourist industry in Canada is one of our most important industries. It is labour-intensive and employs millions of people. We must do everything we can on our part to make sure that it receives the attention it deserves.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Questions, comments and answers? Debate.

Mr. Al MacBain (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment the Member from the beautiful Province of Prince Edward Island on his remarks. I would invite all Canadians, as he did indirectly, to visit that province, especially in the spring, summer and fall.

I would like to thank the Hon. Member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek) for his motion. I am sure that he will understand that I cannot agree with the direct thrust of the motion, but it serves an important function in allowing us to bring to the forefront the importance of tourism to such places as the Niagara Falls, the Atlantic Provinces and the City of Toronto, which many Canadians do not realize is a great tourist city. I think the Hon. Member for Halton would agree that many of our American friends are more aware of the advantages of visiting Toronto as tourists than are some of us in Canada, unfortunately.

Of course, it is easy to blame the federal Government for the tourist deficit. As well, it is easy to blame the provincial Government indirectly for reasons that have been expressed by previous speakers. I am not here this afternoon to say that there is no blame to be placed on either the federal Government or the provincial Government of Ontario. I know that problems have arisen in the tourist industry as a result of government taxes on alcoholic beverages at the provincial and federal levels. I agree with many of the previous speakers that we cannot go on increasing the taxes, no matter which government does so, without realizing that it will have a detrimental effect on the tourist industry.

Of course, there is another problem when you come to the deficit in the tourist industry in Canada. We live in a free society, which we are pleased to do. This means that to a great extent we do what we want to do. Many of us are snowbirds, as they call us in North and South Carolina. Many of us like to go, and in fact to go to areas south of the border where the winters, to say the least, are less harsh. Perhaps there is not much that can be done about this situation in a country as affluent as Canada. I do not know whether we should try to do anything about that aspect and its detrimental effect on the tourist industry.

There are similar areas where we can do something. I do not want to go into them in detail. For example, many Canadians go outside of Canada to ski. This is not the same as the snowbirds. Perhaps I can say that because I have reached the age where it is a little difficult for me to go downhill skiing. We have in Canada, in Ontario, British Columbia and Quebec, some fine ski areas.

Mr. Lewycky: Even in Manitoba.

Mr. MacBain: I should have mentioned Manitoba. There are beautiful downhill ski areas in Canada. I must admit that many of us forget that when we see a beautiful coloured photograph of the Alps. We tend to say to our wives and our families that next winter we should possibly go to the Alps to ski. It would be very helpful and just as enjoyable if we went to the world-famous ski areas within our own borders. This would help our tourist industry. I have not given the same caveat to those who, after 10 or 11 months of hard work, find it necessary to have some extra sun, sand and warm water.

Federal and provincial governments and our tourist organizations can and must do a better job of educating Canadians to vacation in Canada, not necessarily in the provinces in which they live. Some of our provinces are so large that one end may be completely different from the opposite end. That difference may be sufficient for most people to enjoy on a vacation.

What is wrong with someone from the Atlantic provinces deciding to visit the beautiful western provinces, or vice versa? Someone from Ontario may want to visit La Belle Province to see beautiful Quebec City, the Plains of Abraham, the St. Lawrence River and to enjoy the food for which Quebec is famous.

This is the kind of educating we have to do. We who have the honour and privilege of travelling from province to province and talking to the people can pass the word that there are many beautiful spots in Canada, most of which many of us have not yet seen. I have conceded that federal and provincial taxes on wines and other spirits have been a detriment to the tourist industry. As the Member of Parliament for Niagara Falls, one of the most famous tourist cities, I have nothing to say further on that other than that it does play a part. Hopefully our Governments will consider reducing taxes or not adding to them each year. You get the same net amount of tax if more tourists come to Canada and more Canadians vacation here.

Tourism is important to all Canadians. Someone who operates a motel in Niagara Falls understands the importance of the tourist industry. Someone whose job it is to get people to come to the theatre in Charlottetown, P.E.I. knows that you require more than a local audience. Therefore, you try to encourage tourists to visit, particularly Canadians. Canadians love to visit the Atlantic provinces.

Tourism is important to Canadians in general. It means one million jobs for the heads of households, wives, sons and daughters. Very often jobs in tourism help students get through college and university. Earnings in the tourist industry amount to $16.5 billion per year, or 5 per cent of our Gross National Product. More than 100,000 businesses, large and small, are involved in Canadian tourism. That is an important segment in a small country of 25 million, more or less.

Tourism has a great potential for growth. Before planning extravagant visits to Europe or portions of the United States far from home, Canadians should decide to see Canada first, something I strongly advise.

The side effects of tourism are extremely limited. It is a renewable resource. There is no, or very little, environmental damage caused by tourism. Unfortunately, tourism is an international industry. The Rockies of Alberta and British Columbia must compete with the mountain ranges of the world. The coastlines of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and P.E.I. must compete with other coastlines in the world for the tourist dollars.

Niagara Falls must compete with the beautiful Victoria Falls in Africa. The tender fruitlands of Niagara-on-the-Lake in my riding must compete with the tender fruitlands of Penticton, Georgia and California, just to mention the North American continent. We can see that tourist attractions of the world are under great pressure to be competitive. We must continue to be competitive if we are to increase our share of this world-wide industry. As I suggested in my opening remarks, the motion of the Hon. Member for Halton gives us an opportunity to explain to our fellow Canadians the importance of the tourist industry.

● (1640)

In the Niagara Falls area we have the beautiful falls and 32,000 acres of parklands maintained by the Niagara Parks Commission. Niagara-on-the-Lake is the home of the first capital of Upper Canada. It is there for Canadians to enjoy. Americans by the thousands are discovering the City of Niagara Falls and Niagara-on-the-Lake. Approximately 12 million visitors or a number equal to about half the population of Canada visit my riding each year. Many of those tourists are Canadians and many are world-wide travellers. When visiting Niagara-on-the-Lake, not only can they enjoy the beauty of this quaint town, but they have the Shaw Theatre which offers productions of world-wide quality.

As I said, this motion gives us an opportunity to reflect upon the importance of tourism even though we are not directly involved in it. What is the use of the federal Government, various provincial governments and tourist associations, spending hundreds of thousands of dollars promoting tourism if Canadians in general are not supporting the industry? I am speaking in support of the hospitality aspect. Whether serving a beverage in a hotel or motel, whether driving a bus, whether clerking in a giftshop or running one of the many amusements which tourists love to visit, such as guiding at Marineland in Niagara Falls, hospitality is very important.

I invite all Canadians to realize the importance of hospitality and friendliness to tourists. We must realize how important they are to Canada. When I was preparing to speak in this debate, I read a small pamphlet published by the Government of Canada. It raised the importance of hospitality, as it should, in the tourist industry directly and on the part of Canadians generally. One suggestion in the pamphlet was for us to reach out a friendly hand to tourists. This is what I have been trying to say this afternoon. This is what the Hon. Member for Halton permitted by his motion.

In closing I should like to say that tourism is good for all Canadians, and I invite all Canadians to see Canada first.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments? Debate.

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Mr. Speaker, I find it quite disturbing that in 1984, the so-called year of tourism, we have to debate a resolution condemning the Government for its approach to one of the most vital sectors of our economy. I congratulate the Hon. Member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek) for bringing forward his motion. However, after thinking about what we have been through in the last 16 years, it is not surprising that the motion is one of condemnation.

We have heard many statistics today, and I am sure we will hear many more. However, the most important and telling one is that the country's largest industry, tourism, has not turned a profit since 1967, the year we celebrated Expo '67 of which we were all so proud. Then began the decline under the present Government. In the last seven years tourism's balance of payments has shown a deficit of nearly $10 billion. In the past decade our share of world tourist trade has withered from 4.9 per cent to 2.7 per cent, almost a 100 per cent decline. We will lose more than $11 billion over the next five years, according to the Government's own estimates. By 1987, the yearly financial drain will have risen to more than $3.5 billion. We are a nation of 25 million people sitting next door to a country with ten times our population, and we have a travel deficit! It is ludicrous. It just does not make sense. It is a pure marketing problem which the Government seems not to have acknowledged, let alone made an effort to address.

Since 1968, our annual deficit has steadily increased, except in 1979 when under a Conservative Government the travel deficit fell from $1.7 billion to slightly over $1 billion. That is an indication that real progress can be made if there is a determination and a willingness on the part of government to do so. We had the commitment, but the present Government does not. The record speaks for itself.

On a global basis, total receipts in 1982 from both domestic and international travel were roughly $1 trillion—that is a figure one with 12 zeroes behind it. The World Tourist Organization estimates that some three billion tourist arrivals were recorded world-wide last year, but fewer and fewer of those arrivals were in Canada. Since 1981, the number of Canadians travelling outside Canada has increased while the number of visitors to Canada has decreased. The daily outflow of Canadians increased from 32,655 in 1982 to 37,610 in 1983, an increase of 4,955 per day, but the daily inflow increased from 34,871 to 35,216, for a daily increase of only 345. The result is a net outflow of a staggering 4,610 per day. Not only are we having trouble attracting tourists to Canada, we are having difficulty encouraging Canadians to travel in their own country. Most Canadians have not seen the various regions of Canada.

It is time to ask why this has happened. It is very simple to stand here and criticize, but we want to suggest ways of addressing the problem. Hopefully this resolution will give the problem the exposure it needs and will prompt the Government to recognize the important role tourism plays in our economy. To put it simply, the policies of the Government have priced the tourism market in Canada out of the reach of an increasing number of travellers, most notably Canadians themselves. Purely and simply, we are non-competitive. The high cost of gas, liquor, accommodation and food top the list.

The Tourism Industry Association of Canada, in a submission to the task force on alcohol and tobacco on February 2, 1984, listed the price of alcoholic beverages as a "key and very upfront critical price perception factor" influencing tourism travel. I could not agree more. This is not a moral issue about which we are talking. It is a fact of life, as was pointed out by the Hon. Member for Malpeque (Mr. Gass). TIAC went on to point out that this came about because of astronomical increases in tax levels by both provincial and federal Governments, but added that these increases were led by "the unbelievable system of calculating and applying federal excise duties".

A tax on tax is indeed unbelievable. It is called an add-on tax or an ad valorem. I raised this matter in the House with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) on a couple of occasions. Liquor, beer and wine have always cost more in Canada than in the United States as a result of the Canadian practice of monopolizing the distribution and sale of these beverages through government outlets—state control—and because Governments see liquor sales as an inexhaustible source of tax revenue, as something we taxpayers will tolerate because of the moral issues at stake. That is not true. Canadians are beginning to balk, particularly shareholders. Tax increases and mark-ups by one level of government prompts more by another level of government, but the federal Government leads the price increase spiral.

● (1650)

When the Minister of State for Tourism (Mr. Smith) spoke a few moments ago, he tried to blame it all on the provinces. That simply does not wash. Ad valorem taxation starts with the federal Government and then provincial taxes are added.

Last September, the firm of Peat, Marwick pointed out these implications in a study which stated:

> Over the next four years, the "ripple" effect of the 1983 index change will increase the price of that $11.45 bottle of liquor another $1.95 to $13.40. The 13.3 per cent increase in excise duties thus ends up raising the retail price in Ontario by approximately 17 per cent . . . It is an illustration of how any increase in tax may take three or four years to work out of the system.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, the increases continue even if the price is not raised at the manufacturer's level. This is because the ad valorem increases to the excise taxes are based on rises in the consumer price index. The increases come into effect automatically, regardless of current conditions.

Since the excise duty leads the retail price, the index begins to feed on itself and actually causes inflation. The effect has been a decline in consumption, which has resulted in the lay-offs of 2,500 distillery workers, not to mention many tobacco workers, at a direct cost to the Government of an estimated $40 million in UIC payments and lost income taxes. Lost sales mean reduced revenues from which to draw tax dollars. By trying to increase its take in this way, the Government is actually putting itself into a losing position. I point out to the Minister of Finance that these revenues will start to decline by next year. What we in effect are doing is killing the goose that lays the golden egg. The same situation exists in the tobacco industry. More important is the impact this has had on the tourism industry and the Canadian economy as a whole. When $17 billion and 1.1 million jobs are at stake, one would expect a little more concern than has been shown by the Government.

A 26-ounce bottle of Canadian whisky, which now costs $13.50 in Ontario, retails for an equivalent of $8.23 in the United States. A hotel operator in Ontario purchases the same bottle for $12.83 after a 5 per cent discount. However, a hotel operator in New York State is able to negotiate a much larger bulk discount depending on the size of his order. That discount is often as high as 20 per cent. The purchaser in New York State pays $6.08 U.S. or 33 cents per shot compared with the 64 cents per shot paid by the Ontario operator. The Ontario operator is at a 100 per cent disadvantage before any profit is made. How can the tourist industry operator compete? How can the convention facility operator compete? It is like coming out of the starting gate after the other horses have completed the first lap.

In the United States, about 40 per cent of all alcoholic beverages are retailed through licensed establishments. Let us think about that for a moment. These licensed establishments are small business concerns in many cases. In Canada, that figure is about 15 per cent, one-third of the American figure. Americans believe in small business, in the free enterprise system and in tourism.

The Canadian Restaurant and Food Association points out that food and beverage sales in accommodation establishments continued to drop in 1983 in tandem with falling occupancy levels. This has made it difficult to invest in upgrading or expansion of facilities to attract more tourists. Such expansion activity would create immediate construction jobs followed by an increase in tourists, thereby generating tourism-related employment.

On August 17, TIAC stated that beer, wine and liquor are already so over-taxed and the impact on tourism so serious that common sense would dictate there be no federal excise tax increase at all this year. Common sense did not prevail, Mr. Speaker, and the increases went ahead as scheduled. I am sorry to say that common sense is in short supply on the far side of the House. The Hon. Member for Niagara Falls (Mr. MacBain) agreed that liquor was over-taxed, but then proceeded to tell us about all the ways of getting tourists to Canada without addressing the problem.

We are over-priced. When I confronted the Minister of Finance with the hard facts, he applauded the present state of the distilling industry and stated that Canadians had decided to moderate their drinking habits. He said that in any case, the provinces were to blame for all the trouble. He did not investigate ad valorem taxation. The Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism (Mr. Smith) said the same thing earlier today.

We have brought this resolution forward for debate today on behalf of thousands of shareholders, the 2,500 distillery workers who have lost their jobs and the 1.1 million Canadians who are employed in the tourism industry and whose jobs are at stake if the decline is allowed to continue. We on this side of the House recognize the importance of tourism and we know what the problems are and how they have come about.

Rather than addressing the problems, the Government reacts in its characteristic way by throwing money at the problem. This time it is throwing money in the form of advertising. Another $7.5 million has been added to this year's tourism advertising budget, bringing it to a total of $31.9 million. However, no amount of advertising will work until the basic underlying problems are addressed.

Let me give you an example of this, Mr. Speaker. If McDonald's spends $1 million advertising its "Big Mac" for $1 and Burger King spends $1 million promoting the "Whopper" for 50 cents, which hamburger do you think that your children and mine will buy? Our children know when they can get two for the price of one. We are trying to advertise something that is over-priced. No amount of advertising will convince people to spend twice as much money as they need to spend on a comparable product.

Ottawa and the provinces spend $80 million a year promoting tourism in Canada, and then siphon off $8 billion in taxes. This is a typical Liberal philosophy. Why should an American travel in Canada when air fares are so steep, when gas is seen as liquid gold and when a drink and a meal are a major item of expenditure? No amount of advertising will convince an American that he should spend from $3.50 to $4.50 for a martini in Toronto when he can get the same thing for $1.75 in Chicago. Those are actual figures, Mr. Speaker. We may get him to do it once but he will not come back again.

We have a major problem in terms of bilateral tourist flow between Canada and the United States. On average, 74,000 more Canadians are in the United States every night of the year than there are Americans in Canada. As a result, the deficit on the travel account grows by $1.7 million per day. In light of these figures, the recent increase in the advertising budget of Tourism Canada is the proverbial "too little, too late".

Major action is required before the beleaguered industry sinks any further. The first thing required is a simple recognition by the Government that about 11 per cent of the Canadian labour force works in various areas of the tourist industry and that the potential for new jobs would be excellent if the federal and provincial Governments would work together to develop a national tourism strategy. That is what we on this side of the House advocate. This has not been possible under the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who has let it be known very publicly that co-operative federalism is dead. To my knowledge, no one on the other side of the House ever rose to deny what the Prime Minister said.

The value of co-operative federalism could be demonstrated in no better way than in the tourism industry. We should get rid of that ad valorem taxation. When I say co-operation, I mean consultation with the industry and the provinces before implementing programs or regulations that affect tourism so adversely. For example, the Via Rail cutbacks, the decision to restrict tuna fishing on the East Coast and the implementation of the ad valorem taxation system on liquor and tobacco have affected the tourist industry. Believe me, I know what I am talking about when I refer to tobacco because I have spent my whole life working in the tobacco industry and saw a product cut to ribbons.

Sam Hughes of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce summed up the present state of affairs by saying:

> Governments are a silent partner of almost all businesses. But in the world of tourism, they are virtually a controlling shareholder. They tell you what services you can offer, and often, the time and locations in which you can offer them. They tell you, in general, the scale of the bottom end of the wages you must pay. They tell you often who should, and who should not, be employed and then . . . when all is said and done . . . they claim a share of your profits.

This is called state control, and it must change. The Government should not be siphoning profits into government coffers only to have those profits mismanaged by the Members on the other side of the House. We will never attract Americans into our country when they have to fill up at our gas pumps and pay taxes to help bail out Dome Petroleum and pay double the market price for a boondoggle called Petrofina. This idiocy surely is ours.

Instead of taxing Canadians out of the country, why not give them tax rebates for travelling within Canada? This would be a simple income tax change. The cost to the Government in forgone revenues would be more than compensated by the increased tourist travel. Instead of spending money advertising in the United States, let us look at the reasons why tourists choose the United States rather than Canada. It is not only the weather, and even the people in Florida will admit that. Florida's approach to tourism begins at the basic level. Its university system develops tourism as do its elementary and high schools. Florida's motto is "Be good to tourists, they are very good to you". Money spent on projects such as these would be much better spent. I am not saying that advertising is ineffective, but its maximum impact will come only when we have something to advertise. We have to get the visitor to Canada first, then to a specific area or region. That is sound advice, Mr. Speaker.

We should get together and offer package tours to visitors to this country at discount rates, not at rates inflated by unnecessary, excessive and inequitable taxation, making us non-competitive.

Why not consider discounts for tourists travelling and spending money in Canada instead of delaying them at our borders? Why not consider a Lotto tourist scheme in conjunction with the provinces by which lottery tickets would be given to those who purchase travel packages in Canada? Money spent on such a scheme would attract many U.S. visitors.

We should offer package tours. From Niagara Falls we could offer a package tour to the Maritimes, for example, or to fly up to see the midnight sun. Why are there no trips on the St. Lawrence or the Great Lakes anymore?

Imagine what American tourists could do if they were told they could fish our Arctic char and see the land of the midnight sun. They should be told about the Agawa Canyon in the fall, Churchill Falls and the Polar Bear Express. These things have hardly been tapped.

Ski resorts just below the border from Banff, Alberta, are now offering "Canada Week" specials to bring Canadians to their slopes for a week of spring skiing for less than $200 and are offering discounts on almost all purchases. Do we have a U.S. week for skiing in Canada? I have not heard about it. Do we have the right air fares that would entice them to come? No, we do not because we have a state controlled airline.

Almost three-quarters of the tourists travelling in Canada are Canadians, but there are fewer and fewer of them every year. Why come to Ottawa and stay at the Holiday Inn for $59 for a weekend when the same hotel in Lake Placid offers a room, dinner and breakfast for $29, or when the Hilton Hotel in Syracuse offers a room for two days for $29.90? These are hard, cold facts that should be explained to the Minister of Finance. Why fly to Vancouver for $349 on Wardair when for an extra $50 you could fly to Britain? These are facts, Mr. Speaker, and nothing is being done about the situation.

We are sitting next door to a potential gold mine in tourist dollars and we are not even tapping it. The problem has wide implications.

People are crossing the border to go south in ever increasing numbers. On the weekend of February 24 to 26, 3,834 vehicles crossed the border into Ogdensburg, New York. All 48 rooms of a local hotel there were filled with Canadians on package deals. While there they bought shampoo for 88 cents a bottle that would have cost them $3 in Canada. They bought bed sheets for one-third of the price they would have paid in Canada, bath towels for less than half the price and designer jeans for a quarter of the Canadian price. Advertising will not bring them back. They have to be offered something good.

At night when they were not shopping, they were enjoying a drink at a reasonable price in a fashionable, licensed establishment. The parking lots in Ogdensburg were filled with cars bearing licence plates proclaiming "Ontario—Yours to Discover". Mr. Speaker, tourists have discovered that they cannot afford a Canadian holiday.

In Ontario, tourism is the second largest industry, and we must do something about the loss of over 100,000 jobs in 1983 and a $2.1 billion outstanding tourist deficit. Tourism can no longer be singled out as a lucrative source of easy tax revenues.

I recognize that this may be the best the Government can come up with at this time. That is all the more reason why it should make room for a government with fresh ideas and a determination to solve the problems.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): The Chair regrets to interrupt the hon. gentleman but his time is up. Questions, comments? Debate.

Mr. Douglas Fisher (Mississauga North): Mr. Speaker, tourism is our topic today and I shall spend only five minutes promoting what I think is a great idea for Canadian tourism. I speak of the prospects of building a dome and sports facility in Mississauga. I believe this kind of facility would bring tourists into southwestern Ontario by the thousands. I am happy to say that in my city and across metro the concept of a domed stadium has received trilateral support from representatives of all political groups.

In Mississauga the domed statium proposal enjoys community support. It has the endorsement and financial backing of the city council and is sparkplugged by the local business community. You will have seen recent newspaper advertising to the effect that the Trillium domed facility offers the kind of sports facility that we need in the metro area without putting a heavy burden on the back of the taxpayer.

Anyone considering a domed stadium has to ask the questions—why, where and who pays? Let me take those questions in order and ask Hon. Members to consider our proposal and also, please, to compare it with the more widely advertised proposals for de Havilland and the Canadian National Exhibition. I believe that the Mississauga proposal comes out way ahead of those.

To deal with the first question of why we need a domed stadium, in the Toronto region apart from the sports services that would be offered, a domed stadium would represent thousands of jobs in its construction and operation. It would represent a major attraction far beyond the sports level. Conventions and trade shows would be drawn to the facility. It would be a major spark-plug for massive development in transportation, service industries and hotel industries. Perhaps it is for that reason that the Metropolitan Toronto Labour Council has said that the Toronto region needs this kind of facility. It recognizes that it is an investment in the future, not just for business or a few sportsmen, but for ordinary working Canadians.

The next question is where such a facility should be built. I say it should be put in a place that services the whole province, a place that is easy to get at. I ask you to compare what we are offering in Mississauga to the facilities in the more crowded centre of the city. We propose to build it at the corner of Highway 10 and Highway 401. To the east, Scarborough is only half an hour away, to the west Hamilton is only half an hour away, and in between there are Toronto, Etobicoke, Brampton, Burlington and Oakville. Millions of people live within that radius of half an hour. If the radius were extended to one hour you would begin to encompass people from Welland, Niagara Falls, St. Catharines, Barrie, Orillia, Kitchener, Guelph, Cambridge and Waterloo. All of these communities would see that domed stadium as part of their area, not as part of the narrow Toronto area.

A domed stadium in the Mississauga area would be a domed stadium for all Ontario and not just for Toronto. We have great highways and we have facilities to handle commuters coming by car. When the Woodbine race track was built, Mr. Speaker, it was thought to be way out in the country and inaccessible. Urban sprawl caught up to it and soon it was seen as a central facility. I predict the same thing will happen with the Mississauga domed stadium site.

Then there is the question of who pays for this. I do not believe taxpayers should pay for it. The taxpayers can help to build it, but they should get the money back. The taxpayer should not be stuck with a permanent debt. In my opinion the Mississauga proposal is a four star project. The user of the stadium would help to pay for it along with private industry which would build and manage it. These people have assembled 2,000 acres of prime land on the corner of Highway 10 and Highway 401. They need about 150 acres for the stadium. The rest of the land would belong to the stadium, and as it increased in value, it would be sold. The presence of the stadium would attract hotels which would buy the land and the proceeds of that sale would bring a return to the Government and to private lenders who helped put it up in the first place.

It would be a long-term repayment plan rather than a long-term burden on the public Treasury. I must say that this would be an ideal partnership between governments and private enterprise. It would use the initiative, the imagination and the profit motive of private enterprise and the short-term financial support of the Government. If the Hon. Members agree with me, I would ask them to look into the proposal a little further. The real key to the success of this proposal is the Government of Ontario. We are asking Premier William Davis to consider the Mississauga site, along with the others which have been proposed. We are asking him to look into the self-financing aspect of it, to look into the private enterprise aspects, the regional service rather than just service to one city. If Hon. Members agree with these principles, we are asking them to contact Premier William Davis and ask him to put us into the running. Just let us have a chance to sell our ideas.

• (1710)

We do not believe that the Ontario Government has to pick us arbitrarily. We believe that if the Ontario Government compares the Mississauga proposal to the Downsview or CNE proposal, then our proposal will win flat out every time. We offer the taxpayer the opportunity to have this facility on a self-financing basis. We offer it to the people of the whole province, not just to the people of one city, and we offer it with all the excitement and imagination of a good private enterprise project.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Questions, or comments? Debate.

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, it has indeed been interesting to hear the comments of the previous speaker. I appreciate his comments on what is a very interesting proposition and we wish him and his riding well. It was also interesting, Mr. Speaker, to hear the comments of my colleagues on the various aspects of the tourist industry in Canada and as it relates to Hon. Members in the various regions and ridings from which they come.

I would like to address a comment which was made by the Minister this morning, which I believe illustrates the insensitivity of this Government and, indeed, the hypocrisy. The Minister said that the Government is seeking the Asian tourist market of Japan, Taiwan, and Korea. That is fine. I appreciate the fact that he is doing that. The hypocrisy is this, however, Mr. Speaker, that the Liberal Minister of Transport (Mr. Axworthy) removed the VIA train from Edmonton through Jasper to Vancouver. Other Hon. Members have alluded to this in the debate here today, but I want to mention it because my wife and I had the privilege of riding on that train. We flew to Edmonton, stayed there all night, got the train the next morning at seven o'clock, had breakfast on the train and took that beautiful trip up to Jasper. The train stopped there for perhaps an hour. We were able to get out and look at the mountains and do a bit of shopping. We then proceeded on to Vancouver. I acknowledge that the rolling stock was old, and is old, and should be replaced. Perhaps that is part of the reason that the trains are running at a deficit. However, the hypocrisy is that the Minister did that unilaterally without any consultation with the tourist industry. He did it without going to Jasper, sitting down with those people and talking about his plans for the removal of that train. That is why I say that the Liberal Government is insensitive and demonstrates a large degree of hypocrisy.

I would like to discuss the subject with emphasis on some of the environmental problems facing our tourist industry today as it relates to my riding of Erie, and also as it relates to the riding of the Hon. Member for Niagara Falls (Mr. MacBain), who spoke so eloquently here this afternoon. Incidentally, it was in his riding in 1980 that the future Prime Minister of Canada made the statement that he was going to clean up the Niagara Falls problem, the Niagara River situation. He was going to do that, and we would elect a Liberal Member. Sure enough, the Liberal Member was elected, but I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that he will be phased out in the next election.

As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, Canada's reputation as a tourist attraction rests with its beautiful scenery, its sparkling lakes and clean air, but it is becoming increasingly difficult to protect these resources. We have, on the one hand, a gigantic urban sprawl which threatens to destroy much of the picturesque farmland and orchards which attract people to the Niagara Peninsula where I make my home. On the other hand, we have the great industries of the industrial northeastern United States and, indeed, the Golden Triangle, which are contaminating the air which we Canadians have boasted about for many years. It is to the advantage of all Canadians, I feel, to guard our precious heritage.

As I speak, the selection process is being carried out to find a location for an industrial waste disposal facility to serve the industries of southern Ontario. That is a difficult problem, I must confess, which the provincial Government has. No one wants such a facility at his back door. I do not want it in my riding. The Hon. Member for Niagara Falls does not want it in his riding. Yet our ridings are proposed as locations for this facility. Some community will have to bear the ecological consequences of locating this facility in its area. Some day we will have to pay a terrible price for our actions today. In fact, we are paying some of that price right now. The Hon. Member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) will tell us in a few minutes, I am sure, about the acid rain problem. The problem has to be solved at its source, which is the industries which make the waste. Is the technology not available to deal with industrial waste and recycle it into useful products, Mr. Speaker? I am not an expert on the subject, but surely we cannot go on in this manner. We certainly do not wish to develop the reputation in the eyes of potential tourists as a country which is polluting itself to death. It goes without saying that environmental questions are very much linked to the tourist industry. Tourism is the largest single employer in our country. It provides jobs for over one million people, and those jobs are on the line if our clean air and water are lost.

The sports fisherman is deeply concerned about acid rain and the polluting of our streams. When the fish die, a whole chapter of Canadian history dies with them. There are many avid sports fishermen in our country and, indeed, in my riding, who have spoken to me about this many times. Fishermen elsewhere have expressed concern about this lake or that lake and what a shame it is. Whatever we do about this very serious question, we cannot lay the whole blame on the United States. We as well are guilty parties. We have our part to play in eliminating or controlling this very serious problem.

Sports fishing is a subject which deserves, in my opinion, much more attention on the national level. In fact, there are individuals and groups in this country who are lobbying very strongly for more positive ways of enhancing this very important sport. I say, more power to them. I appreciate the work they are doing and I will co-operate with them in every way I can. I am a fisherman myself. I have three sons, all of whom are grown and married. I have enjoyed, and still enjoy, fishing with them. It is a sport which takes us out of doors and into nature. It is a fine sport for a father to enjoy with his sons and daughters. I feel there are certainly many more ways to go about enhancing our sports fishing in this country, thereby directly and indirectly improving our potential for attracting those very elusive tourist dollars which are slipping away into the United States because of the high costs of vacationing in our country. Food prices are much higher, as are hotel rooms. We heard about this from the Hon. Member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart) as he spoke so eloquently just a few minutes ago. Gasoline is substantially higher, in some places twice as high, in Canada than it is in the U.S. Our fishing will have to be pretty good to offset that.

We must make a concerted effort to understand the fact that the Lake Ontario and Lake Erie sport fishery is a resource representing excellent recreational opportunities. We must make sure that appropriate expansion of both onshore and offshore components is undertaken. As to the onshore, provision must be made to accommodate boats, trailers and recreational vehicles in areas close to lakes and rivers with good sports fishing potential. This industry is labour-intensive. There is a high multiplier effect in the sports fishing sector. There are marinas, the fuel being sold, bait suppliers, the sale and rental of boats and motors, the sale of tackle, some of which is made in my riding by William Gold in my town of Fort Erie. They make the famous William's wobbler which is used for catching trout in our northern lakes and streams. Think of the accommodation, the rooms, food and beverages, sightseeing buses, taxis, shops, all of which mean jobs, jobs, jobs to the young people and many of the older people as well. I guess I am amazed, as many Members are, at the middle-aged people who come into my office and who are without jobs. They do not know where to turn and these facilities would provide jobs for many of those people. It is a tremendous industry.

Harbours and breakwaters must be built to protect marinas, and appropriate markings placed for navigation, all of which comes under the purview of the federal Government. Think of the potential for job creation if a serious effort were made to improve the fishery in this province, especially in the Great Lakes; and indeed in the whole of Canada. These onshore facilities are all for nought, however, if a varied and healthy fishery is not present to attract anglers to the improved and expanded facilities I have described. This should include hatchery facilities, equipment and manpower to undertake comprehensive stocking and restocking of our lakes. All this takes money and committed people at all levels of Government. However, the political will to do so is paramount. But that is lacking.

Members will be aware that just last week I posed a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. De Bané), requesting that he identify any new programs which would enhance sports fishing on the Great Lakes. I have as yet to receive an answer. Apparently tourism is not important to the Minister. However, I trust he is giving the idea serious thought. I hope he is, given that we are dealing with a resource of tremendous potential if it is wisely used.

I touched briefly on the environmental aspects of tourism and now I would like to probe the issue from the point of view of the sports fisherman. Have you ever seen the beautiful fish they are pulling from the Great Lakes these days? You probably have not, and I want to tell you they are fun to catch. Many of them are good to eat, but it may be dangerous to eat some of the large ones taken from Lake Ontario because of pollution in the lower Niagara River. This is genuinely sad. It is said that when the white man first came to Canada, he could place a bent needle in a stream and catch a fish almost immediately. Now we find that in some cases we cannot even eat them. The tourism industry and the Minister responsible for tourism must work closely with the environmental Ministry at both federal and provincial levels to ensure that the situation is correctred for my children, my grandchildren and yours. Otherwise, we will be leaving them a sad legacy indeed.

The Niagara River is a case in point. How many honeymooners watching the romantic vista of Niagara Falls have any idea what witches' brew is mixed up in the water beneath the Falls in that great gorge? The trouble is, chemicals from various Love Canal style dumps along the river flow into our precious Great Lakes and end up in the innards of some unsuspecting marine life way downstream. Dioxin, PCBs and a host of other delicacies are finding their way on to people's plates. This indeed must stop. I call upon the Minister responsible for tourism to exhort the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Caccia) whom I find to be a caring individual, one who takes his job seriously, to continue his efforts, indeed step them up, to clean up this mess. He should be aware that he has the support of all politicians. There is not a Member in this House who would not agree that we have to clean up that mess.

How can improved sport fishing enhance the tourist industry? It can provide the incentive for American tourists to set their compasses to due north and put an end to the current trend we have been seeing of fewer and fewer non-residents travelling to our country. In 1980, over 40 million non-residents visited Canada. This dropped to 34 million in 1983. In 1983, 1,201 hotels, motels, restaurants and caterers went under. Is it the recession? The Government blames just about everything on that, and undoubtedly some of it is due to the recession. Is it the dollar? We cannot blame it on that because Americans should be coming up here in droves because of the exchange rate. No, I believe our Government is being just plain inhospitable. Our taxes on many items are preposterous.

Therefore I call upon the Government to consider seriously means to improve the situation for visiting fishermen. Briefly, such measures should include, first, the monitoring and preserving of the quality of our air and water; and Second, tax cuts to ensure prices are reasonable. There should be joint federal-provincial meetings to ensure there are solutions to these problems. The third point is improved conservation and enhancement of our fisheries resource. Again, the Government should work hand in hand with the province on restocking to make sure that our lakes have a good supply of fish.

I believe that by pursuing these goals actively we can improve the quality of life not only for visitors, but for those of us who are fortunate to live in this beautiful country with so much potential. We want to sustain that potential and improve it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Questions or comments? Debate.

Mr. Riis: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. During the flow of debate we have a tradition that Members are allocated 20 minutes with a ten minute question period. There is also some effort to balance the speakers to represent equally the Parties' representation in the House of Commons. It now being 5.30, it seems clear to me that as you turn to the Government benches and recognize a government Member, we are going to end this debate with the NDP having spoken once and with Liberals and Conservatives having spoken five or six times each. Using basic mathematics, that seems to me to be rather unfair.

• (1730)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): The Chair has to recognize Members as they stand up. I have to agree that the Hon. Member's Party has not put up a speaker for a little while. It is very difficult for the Chair to intervene in such a situation because the Chair tries to recognize Members as they stand.

Mr. Garnet M. Bloomfield (London-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, this has been a long but encouraging day. It has been encouraging in that so many Members of all Parties have participated in this debate on tourism. Having listened to the remarks of Members today one thing stands out clearly to me. The Government and the Opposition firmly agree on at least one item, that is, the importance of tourism in Canada to Canadians.

Many people outside this House are not aware that Canada, with its exciting cities, beautiful wilderness, heritage and cultural diversity, is host to so many Canadian, American and overseas visitors each year. It is host to many people from various parts of the world, and we would certainly welcome many more if that were encouraged. Few are aware that this industry accounts for 5 per cent of our GNP, the amount of $18 billion in our economy, and that it has contributed some $32 billion in personal income to Canadians from coast to coast in 1982. The 100,000 businesses which make up the tourist industry are primarily Canadian-owned, many of them small family enterprises. These Canadian businesses employ 1,140,000 Canadians. This includes youth, native people, women and immigrants, many of whom would be without jobs today if it were not for tourism.

Throughout the recession of 1980-82 the tourist industry continued to grow, unlike many other sectors of our economy. According to Statistics Canada figures, as an employer of Canadians, tourism has registered consistent growth in levels of employment over the past several years, outperforming forestry, manufacturing, construction and trade. Wherever you go in Canada, Mr. Speaker, tourism is important and the Government has recognized its importance in regional economic development. It ranks first, second and third as an industry in every province of Canada. Canadians invest in this industry and benefit from it, not only from its employment and profits but, perhaps more important, in having the opportunity to meet each other, experience the diversity of their country and share it with the world.

The Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism (Mr. Smith) spoke eloquently this morning about the industry and the record of the Government in supporting its development over the past decade. As well, he outlined the Government's commitment to the further growth of tourism in Canada. Everything is not rosy. There are problems, but also there are solutions to those problems. The Minister mentioned the efforts of some government Departments in support of the tourist industry. I would like to add to that list for the edification of Hon. Members of the House.

First I would like to commend the role played by the Federal Business Development Bank which has branches across our vast country. Its largest client is the tourist industry. Twenty-nine per cent of its loans are made to tourist businesses in all areas of Canada. Surely this demonstrates a commitment to tourism. Not only does FBDB act as a major lender to the industry, it also counsels entrepreneurs and acts as an equity partner in some major tourism developments.

I would also like to mention Employment and Immigration Canada. I noted earlier that more than one million Canadians are employed in the tourist industry. CEIC plays a major role in ensuring that training programs are available for those looking for jobs in tourism. Recognizing the need for qualified chefs, CEIC has included them in the priority training list under the National Training Act. Recently the Government announced a $3.5 million grant for the expansion of the George Brown College facilities in Toronto to ensure increased training of chefs for the hospitality industry. After all, the tourist, like an army, travels on her or his stomach. I might add that the better the food, the easier they travel, and the quicker they return.

Among our most important domestic tourists are the youth. They should be able to see their country from coast to coast and experience the greatness and diversity of the land. The elderly should be able to use their well-earned free time to see their country and visit friends and relatives. To this end the Minister of Transport (Mr. Axworthy) recently announced major reductions of VIA Rail fares for youth and senior citizens in order to stimulate domestic tourism and support the aspirations of these Canadians to visit Canada.

This morning the Hon. Member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) raised the question of the VIA Rail service from Edmonton to Vancouver. Perhaps the Hon. Member was not aware of the recent actions taken by the Minister of Transport to establish a task force on rail passenger service in northwestern Alberta and British Columbia. Included in the task force are representatives of both provincial Governments, the cities of Edmonton and Vancouver, Transport Canada, VIA Rail, Tourism Canada, the Jasper Chamber of Commerce, and other interested parties. The task force will look at the viability of the passenger rail service between Edmonton, Jasper and Vancouver and report to the Minister of Transport and other Governments involved in the review of its findings. The Government is aware of the problem and is taking action, Mr. Speaker.

The comment was made this morning that one important component of the tourist industry is the attitude toward the visitors. Tourism Canada has worked with provincial Governments, communities and the private sector for several years on an attitude and awareness program designed to impress upon Canadians the importance of tourism, the importance of the visitor, and the importance of a friendly face and a friendly smile. If the Hon. Member for Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington (Mr. Vankoughnet) wants to carry this message to the tourism industry and the constituents in his riding. I am sure that appropriate information can be made available to him.

This is a people-intensive industry. Not only does it make work for many of our people, but we are all involved. Each one of us has the responsibility of making visitors welcome. This applies to the customs officers at the gateway to our country, to the hotel-motel operators, to the courtesy of the waitresses, to the person pumping gas at the local garage, and to each of us as we make visitors feel welcome and want to return with their friends time after time. This is a great, big, beautiful country that each of us needs to promote at every opportunity.

The Opposition has shown unusual wisdom in selecting tourism as a topic for debate in the House today. This is the "year of tourism" in Canada. This was declared by the Tourism Industry Association of Canada and supported by the federal, provincial and territorial Governments as well as the private sector. The year of 1984 is filled with events from coast to coast designed not only to attract visitors from the United States and abroad, but also to encourage Canadians to visit the length and breadth of this great country. The 450th anniversary of the arrival of one of Canada's first tourists, Jacques Cartier, provides the venue for celebrations throughout Quebec. If I remember my history correctly, Jacques Cartier must have enjoyed his visit because he returned in 1535 and again in 1541. I am sure the spectacle of the tall ships sailing through Atlantic Canada and up the St. Lawrence River will be appreciated.

The 200 years of New Brunswick's Loyalist heritage will be celebrated. The 150th anniversary of Toronto will be celebrated with an international festival. Also celebrated will be the 50th anniversary of Yellowknife, the 75th anniversary of the first powered flight in Canada at Baddeck, the Fredericton bicentennial, the 350th anniversary of Trois-Rivières with numerous celebrations, the 150th anniversary of Prescott, the centennial of Calgary, and the international air show in Abbotsford. These are but a couple of the many events taking place in 1984.

Of particular note, and highlighting the anniversary festivities taking place in some centres of Canada, will be the visit of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth and Prince Philip. As some Members have already noted, 1984 also marks the first visit of a Pope to Canada. If Opposition Members doubt the Government's commitment to tourism, 1984 also signals 50 years of federal involvement in tourism promotion and development.

Canada is a big country, Mr. Speaker. I will try to explain just how big it is. I recently had the privilege of travelling to one of our far western points to represent the Government at the opening of a new customs port at Beaver Creek. We who live in central Canada think that Edmonton is in the west, but I was 1,500 miles north and west of Edmonton in the Yukon. I really enjoyed seeing for myself a part of Canada which I had only seen through the eyes of Jack London, the famous writer who wrote so eloquently of our north.

• (1740)

If there ever was a time for the Leaders of this country on both sides of the House to join together to tell Canadians and the world with one voice to see Canada, explore and enjoy it, it is 1984. What better way is there to convey the message than by example? Let each of us in the House commit ourselves today to spend our holidays in Canada. Nineteen eighty-four is here.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Questions or comments? Debate.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted that at least I have five minutes to speak in this debate. As the Member of Parliament for one of the great tourist paradises in the entire country, Parry Sound-Muskoka, let me emphasize how important I think, and in fact know, the tourist industry is.

I want to thank our critic for tourism for introducing his motion today. As the Member for Parry Sound-Muskoka, I have grave concerns about the present condition of the tourist industry, despite the fact that it is the second most important industry for bringing dollars into the Dominion of Canada. It is also a labour-intensive industry that employs over 1,135,000 people. I would also point out that many of those people do not have too many skills and therefore depend on this very important industry.

My colleague for Erie (Mr. Fretz) touched on the sport fishing industry and how important it is to the tourist industry. He is quite right. In Ontario alone, it is estimated that $600 million is generated by sport fishermen and women who are certainly interested in seeing that there is good fishing and will go to where that good fishing exists.

This brings up another grave concern that I have. My riding is one of the most seriously affected by the acid rain problem. It is a serious problem which I know is important to both sides of the House. I commend the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Caccia) for his grave concern and for bringing it to the attention of the Cabinet. However, it is important that we do much more than talk about this issue.

The Minister has stated that the Government is proposing to reduce acid rain by 50 per cent by the year 1984. While I commend that, we certainly must begin sooner in order to start reducing acid rain. My riding is in the unfortunate position of having 70 per cent of all the acid rain that falls in Parry Sound-Muskoka coming from the United States. Regardless of what the federal or provincial Governments do to reduce acid rain, it will certainly not make any great impact until the U.S. Government follows suit. I hope continual pressure will be put on that administration. I also anticipated that the acid rain problem would be a higher priority in the forthcoming U.S. elections, but perhaps it will heat up before November so that the present Government there will take meaningful action on it.

There is no question that it will cost a lot of money to address this problem. Ontario is greatly blessed with over 250,000 lakes, but over 4,000 of those lakes are now seriously damaged by acid rain. Some 140 or more are dead. The fish population and the vegetation in those lakes have gone. While we have beautiful crystal-clear lakes, it takes more than that to attract tourists.

We are fortunate in Ontario and in my riding particularly that we are within a one day's drive for over 100 million Americans. It is a market with tremendous potential. The Minister of Small Businesses and tourism (Mr. Smith) stated today that the Government is spending a considerable amount of money to attract tourists. While I commend the Government for doing that, let me point out that because it spends a lot of money for advertising it must be able to deliver the goods.

We want to be able to have a viable, strong tourist industry. We want to have beautiful lakes and we want to have fish in those lakes. These are all important considerations at the present time. While good fishing still exists in certain lakes, it has diminished considerably in many of them.

I see that you are indicating that my time is up, Mr. Speaker. But I just want to point out that we must do something to protect our environment because it will also help the tourist industry.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order. It being 5.45 p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 62(10), to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of Supplementary Estimates (C) and Interim Supply, and of all stages of the bills based thereon.

And the division bells having been rung:

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, we have several potential votes with which to deal tonight. I have discussed it with my colleagues, the Government House Leader and the House Leader for the New Democratic Party. It will be noted that the division on Motion No. 1 slipped by just prior to 5.45 p.m. We have agreed that when the Chair puts the question on the second motion, that is Vote 1c, in the name of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Gray), that recorded division will apply to item No. 1 and items Nos. 3, 4 and 5, with the recording of the vote appearing in Hansard as though it had been taken. All the remaining items we have agreed will go on division.

Mr. Speaker: Is it unanimously agreed?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, it is true that we held consultations and that is why I did not object to the point of order while a vote is going on, knowing that there was unanimous consent.

We did agree that the vote on item No. 2 should also apply to items Nos. 3, 4, and 5. We would also be ready to allow that vote to dispose of item No. 1. We easily won that vote because the Liberals were in the House.

[English]

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, we agree as well.
