Today we are speaking of the second attempt by this Government to establish a civilian Security Intelligence Service. We are considering the possibility of creating a whole new service, replacing the Royal Canadian Mounted Police security service with one that would have very broad powers indeed to investigate the activities of Canadian citizens.

Let me read the duties and functions of this service in Clause 12 of Bill C-9. This will show how extensive the service is intended to be. Clause 12 reads:

> The Service shall collect, by investigation or otherwise, to the extent that it is strictly necessary, and analyse and retain information and intelligence respecting activities that may on reasonable grounds be suspected of constituting threats to the security of Canada and, in relation thereto, shall report to and advise the Government of Canada.

The previous Bill dealing with this matter introduced in this House was Bill C-157. It received a storm of protest from all across the country and from almost every civil rights organization we have, including provincial attorneys general. As the previous speaker said, the Government really achieved a great thing in that all provincial attorneys general agreed to oppose the legislation. That does not happen very often. Police force spokesmen, media commentators and individuals blew up such a storm of protest over the proposed legislation that Bill C-157 was withdrawn.

Then the Government immediately introduced Bill C-9. One wonders why the tremendous hurry to get this legislation into the House. I could not quite understand that until I looked at The Globe and Mail of today's date and found a copy of a story which the Auditor General first revealed. This was the business of the big new office building in Ottawa, the Centennial Towers and its many floors that have been empty for months. Those floors were designed to house this new security commission which we have not yet got and which we might never get, although the Government has already spent over $2 million on empty floor space. If that is not a political boondoggle, I do not know what is. It is not to the credit of the Government that this kind of waste goes on. One wonders, if it takes a 12-storey building or whatever to house a security force that does not exist, what kind of a mammoth organization of super snoopers the Government is trying to impose on Canadians.

The previous Bill was scrutinized carefully by the Senate committee. Some key changes were made in response to the recommendations of that committee. However, not all of the changes which the Senate committee recommended have been included in this Bill. Today is the first time the House of Commons has had an opportunity to debate this matter thoroughly. This debate is the starting point of public scrutiny of what I consider, and of what the Conservative Party considers, most important legislation. We look forward to the time when this Bill goes to committee and every clause is examined in detail and proposed amendments put.

The name of the Bill itself is imposing, startling and frightening. It reads:

> An Act to establish the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, to enact An Act respecting enforcement in relation to certain security and related offences and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof or in relation thereto.

That is an example of the gobbledegook Bill C-9 is filled with which makes it uncertain and unsure what powers this agency will have. The Solicitor General himself has pointed out that this is peculiar and unusual legislation, that most countries do not have their entire security forces under one particular act but leave some parts to the discretion of the respective government. While discretion itself can be a dangerous thing when a sudden shift is made toward full reliance on statutory instruments, it is essential that the statute in question be concisely drafted to ensure it does no more than this Parliament intends it to. In an age when people are increasingly reliant on written documents for the protection of their rights, it is most important the mandate and the powers given to this future organization are clearly limited and unambiguously defined.

This new Bill purports to redefine the security intelligence system in Canada. Therefore, we have to ensure it does it correctly. I would like to highlight some, not all, of the concerns I feel are inherent in the provisions of Bill C-9.

The new law aims to deal with people and activities that are considered to be a threat to this country. In particular, the Minister has indicated that the Bill will be directed at controlling the following kinds of activities: classic espionage, sabotage activities, foreign-influenced activities and political violence, such as terrorism and domestic subversion. Certainly these categories are not those we would like to encourage in this country. However, close scrutiny of the provisions of Bill C-9 before us that attempt to cover espionage, foreign-influenced activities, terrorism and domestic subversion, raise some important questions relating to the mandate of the agency. Provision for the review of the activity of the service and the accountability of the agency are also of paramount concern.

Threats to the security of Canada are defined in Clause 2 of the Bill. It reads as follows:

(a) espionage or sabotage that is against Canada or is detrimental to the interests of Canada or activities directed toward or in support of such espionage or sabotage,

(b) foreign influenced activities within or relating to Canada that are detrimental to the interests of Canada and are clandestine or deceptive or involve a threat to any person,

● (1140)

(c) activities within or relating to Canada directed toward or in support of the threat or use of acts of violence against persons or property for the purpose of achieving a political objective within Canada or a foreign state, and

(d) activities directed toward undermining by covert unlawful acts, or directed toward or intended ultimately to lead to the destruction or overthrow by violence of, the constitutionally established system of government in Canada,—

On the face of it, it seems right and proper that that is what it should do. However, the importance of definitions cannot be overemphasized. The definitions in the Bill are very loose and vague.

The Senate committee reminded us that that section—and this is most important—will establish for the CSIS, its Director and employees, a fundamental standard for their activities. It will enter crucially into judicial determination of whether a particular intrusive technique can be used, and it will provide a benchmark for assessment of agency activities by review bodies and by the agency's political masters, that is, by Parliament. It is very important that the definitions as to what this group of super snoopers can and cannot do are clear and understandable.

I am prepared to admit, as we all are, that the definitions in the new Bill have been tightened significantly, particularly the final paragraph excluding lawful advocacy and protest from the purview of the security service. That is a major improvement. However, the definitions remain too broad in many respects. For example, what do the words "espionage" and "sabotage" mean in the Bill? Surely it is not too difficult and would not restrict the activities of the service to define those terms. It is absolutely essential to define what those words mean.

Does the inclusion of deceptive activity which is detrimental to the interests of Canada imply that the agency can investigate economic initiatives of foreign countries operating in Canada? On the face of those words, it would certainly seem that those people could investigate, for example, the operations of a Japanese company which is trying to sell its cars. Perhaps this could be construed as being against the interests of Canada. Will our foreign trade now be carried on by a group of super snoopers or secret servicemen? That is a somewhat strange way to run our foreign trade and compete with other countries.

What exactly is contemplated by the phrase "activities within or relating to Canada directed toward or in support of the threat or use of acts of violence against persons or property for the purpose of achieving a political objective within Canada or a foreign state"? A previous speaker mentioned the possibilities which might occur as a result of this clause. We really need to look at these particular sections to ensure that we are not giving this group of secret servicemen, as proposed, too wide a mandate.

Clause 21 of the Bill gives the service extraordinary powers which are to be authorized by a combination of judicial warrant and ministerial approval. Canadians should be aware of what that clause indicates. I would like to repeat part of it because it is very important. In referring to the powers of the agency, Clause 21(3)(a) reads:

—to enter any place or open or obtain access to any thing;

(b) to search for, remove or return, or examine, take extracts from or make copies of or record in any other manner the information, record, document or thing; or

(c) to install, maintain or remove any thing.

Those are very wide powers. They are powers to enter anyone's private property without the person's knowledge. We should be very careful what kind of powers we give this particular group.

The Senate called for a balance between the gravity of the threat to security and personal liberty. That is the key to this whole area. The balance is not here. The Government claims that this balance would be provided by the Minister in accepting or rejecting an application for a warrant, but it does not spell it out specifically. For example, the relationship between the Minister and the Director of the service is not clear. While the Minister plays a direct role in the authorization of warrant applications, the Director is vested with the powers of management and control subject to the direction of the Minister. The key problem with this arrangement is found in Clause 6(2), which provides that the Minister "may" issue written directions. Does this imply that the Minister will have the power to issue oral directions? If he issues oral directions, no record of those directions will come to the attention of the review committee. These are matters on which the Bill is not clear and I say is incomplete.

Finally, let me recite some of my broad concerns about and objections to this Bill. It is my philosophy and view that no legislation should be changed unless there is a demonstrated need and requirement for such legislation; second, unless there is an urgent and compelling reason to enact new laws. Has such a demonstrated need and a compelling reason been shown? Some may say that two royal commissions have looked at the facts and recommended such a service. On the other hand, facts speak differently to different people. I have not heard to my satisfaction the kinds of facts which would necessitate such an overblown secret service as this Bill proposes. Canada is not a world power. We do not have the requirements of superpowers for secret services. That is part of the entire question we should examine in committee: What is the need for this organization and where has it been shown?

This proposed legislation must of necessity detract from the rights and freedoms of individual Canadians. Civil police forces have a very recent history in the world. The first civil police force was set up in the 1820s. It was the metropolitan police of London, the first in the world. Since that time—and that is not that long ago—every democratic government has had to struggle and experiment with the difficulties in defining the role and limiting the powers of the police so as to not encroach unduly upon civil liberties. It is very difficult to attain that balance. In doing this, the benefit of the doubt must always go to the individual. The balance of freedom must be given to the individual Canadian citizen. It has to be that way. However, that is not so with this piece of legislation, which was designed for the super snoopers themselves. The Minister had a group of potential secret servicemen in his office and they designed the proposed Act so that it fitted their needs.

The first draft, in their own words, was the Rolls-Royce model. It would have taken them quickly to their goal. The second draft, the one before us, they now claim is a Chevrolet or a Ford but will do the job very well. That is the wrong principle. These people should be given what I would call a handyman's wreck or a mechanic's delight—something on which they have to work to make it go. That is essential here. If it does not work, let them return and ask for an amendment to the legislation. It should not be the other way around where the rights and freedoms of Canadians are trampled upon and those Canadians have to come to Parliament and ask that the legislation be amended. That process takes too long and too many rights are trampled upon.

A previous speaker mentioned that the United States has a far greater problem but that its legislation is far tighter. It does not allow freedoms to the super snoopers such as the ones proposed in this legislation. I would like to refer to an article which appeared in the February 11, 1984 edition of The Globe and Mail, which reads in part:

> Congressman Donald Edwards, the chairman of the House of Representatives committee which scrutinizes FBI activities, said that the "loose" definitions of threats to national security in the Canadian bill would never be tolerated in the United States.

● (1150)

Mr. Edwards, a liberal democrat from California who once was an FBI agent, said that the Canadian Bill looks like an invitation to trouble. That is exactly what it is. He goes on to say: "We used to let the FBI do these kinds of things, but not any more." Why should we in this country walk into that kind of trap when we have had the experience with the FBI in the United States? Let us close the door before we open it to make sure that we do not have an Act which allows them to abuse the rights of Canadians.

The record of this Government in respecting the freedom of rights of citizens is anything but good. We do not have to recall very far back in the past when the War Measures Act was passed. That tempest in a teapot took away the rights of all Canadians, rights which had been earned over many years. Thousands of people were jailed in Quebec, but not one was found guilty. They were jailed without a trial, and all had to be let go.

More recently this Parliament passed the elections Bill, I believe it was Bill C-169, which restricted the right of free speech in this country. As the Hon. Member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) said in this House last week, he apologized to his constituents for being part of that. I do the same. It is another example of how, unless you really look at legislation, the government can slip through legislation restricting the rights of people. We have had recent revelations about the PMO and its eagerness to get into the super snooper business. It is an indication of why we should look at this Bill very carefully.

Hundreds of thousands of Canadians have lived under the Russian secret police, the KGB. Hundreds of thousands lived in Nazi Germany and had to deal with the SS. Other hundreds of thousands of Canadians have lived under other dictatorial governments which had a secret service. These people are very concerned. They know that the more dictatorial a government becomes, the greater need such a government has for secret service activities. People in Canada are worried about this legislation, and well they might be. I assure Hon. Members that this Party will oppose this legislation until it is changed to protect the rights of Canadians.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a couple of questions to the Hon. Member who has just spoken, particularly given the fact that he is the deputy spokesperson for the Ministry of the Solicitor General for his Party. The McDonald Commission strongly recommended the establishment of a committee of Parliament to oversee the operations, in a policy sense and a budgetary sense, of the new civilian security service. Does the Hon. Member support the important recommendation that we not leave the oversight function to the executive, if you will, but rather that there be a parliamentary committee established which would be responsible for overseeing those operations?

Mr. Dantzer: Mr. Speaker, I certainly agree that the key point with regard to this proposed organization is that it should be under the control of Parliament. I believe that suggestion is a good one and should be examined in committee. There may be others, but in my view it is essential that Parliament have final control over this organization.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, just for clarification, the Hon. Member is supporting the establishment of such a committee to exercise that parliamentary oversight, is he?

Mr. Dantzer: Mr. Speaker, that is a good suggestion. I believe that idea will be reviewed in committee. There may be others. If others are better, perhaps that should be the way to go. I confirm my feeling that Parliament should be the final authority and should have control.

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, following on the answer just given by the Hon. Member, does he feel that Parliament should have access to all material and documents in the possession of the service for the purpose of that review, including all relevant Cabinet documents?

Mr. Dantzer: Mr. Speaker, it was the recommendation of the Senate committee that the review committee should have that. I certainly agree with it. There is no reason why the committee should not have access to Cabinet documents dealing with the activities of the secret security service.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, the Pitfield committee recommended, and the Government has accepted the recommendation, that the new civilian security service should have sweeping, intrusive powers, including in particular the power to open first-class mail. The Member's colleague from Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) has strongly opposed the recommendation that the security service should have the power to open first-class mail. Can the Hon. Member enlighten the House as to his view whether it is an appropriate function for a civilian security service to be able to open first-class mail? Does he agree with his colleagues from Vancouver South?

Mr. Dantzer: Mr. Speaker, my first reaction is no, they should not have the right to open first-class mail; but on the other hand, there may be unusual circumstances which would justify the opening of mail, if there is sufficient evidence. That is a matter that has been left up in the air. There is no evidence before us. Perhaps those who take this position will justify it. Unless they do, I think the position taken by the Hon. Member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) is the right one.

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, is the Hon. Member in agreement with the McDonald Commission, which would require that if a judge is to be asked to issue a warrant to empower the security service to open first-class mail, one consideration he must weigh is whether the invasion of privacy is outweighed by the indication of danger to national security? That provision was recommended by the McDonald Commission. It is excluded from the Solicitor General's Bill. Is the Hon. Member in favour of having such a provision?

Mr. Dantzer: Mr. Speaker, surely the only reason it is taken before a judge is to weigh the balance between private rights and public need. I would approve of the judge doing that. That is all he can do.

Security Intelligence Service

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Mr. Speaker, when I first examined the provisions of Bill C-157, the precursor of Bill C-9, it occurred to me that we had an ideal companion piece to the Government's emergency planning order. That order of May, 1981 permitted the same Minister responsible for Bill C-9 to provide for the incarceration of civilian internees and, in the course of such planning, to arrange for the removal of prisoners from penal institutions and to move into those institutions civilian internees.

I questioned the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in the House as to the occasion when that emergency planning order might come into effect. It will be recalled that the emergency planning order was divided into two parts. The first part related to circumstances where an emergency had arisen; the second part related to those times where in case of war it was necessary to take these steps. My questions of the Prime Minister, and they are a matter of record in this House, indicated that when I asked him if he would be good enough to restrict the meaning of "war" to include only a situation where a state of war existed between Canada and some foreign nation, he sarcastically responded to me that he supposed I would be interested in hearing about a cold war. A cold war is a state of mind. The mind of the Government will determine whether war exists, if we are to believe what the Prime Minister has said.

Therefore, when I tie in the actions of the Solicitor general of Canada (Mr. Kaplan) under the emergency planning order with the original provisions of Bill C-157 and the residual parts thereof which are included in Bill C-9, I think this is alarming to any Canadian concerned with the security of the person and the civil liberties of Canadians.

If we add to that circumstance of linking those two pieces of legislation the new Bill introduced in the House with respect to amendments to the Criminal Code providing, as it does, for both the seizure and freezing of the property of citizens who are accused of crime without having had benefit of trial, we immediately realize that we have a beautiful triumvirate of legislation. One piece provides for the seizure of the property of the individual before he has ever been convicted on information gathered by a civilian security force which has extraordinary powers under the Bill; and the third prong of the attack against Canadians clearly is the position which would result in their incarceration.

It is alarming that we should be confronted with the type of circumstance that confronts us today. All parliamentarians should be concerned about the departure we have taken from normal practice. I know that if we believe the information provided by the Solicitor General with respect to this Bill, it is only for the purpose of gathering information. The security service will gather information and do nothing else. I rather suspect that when the Gestapo was established, it had no other purpose than to gather information and then implement it.

The great problem is that we have removed from an institution in Canada that is well respected by the citizens of the country a service which formerly was conducted by them. I know that the RCMP has said that it is not qualified and does not in fact wish to undertake this function. I sometimes wonder whether that assertion is made with regard to the nature of the functions to be undertaken. The RCMP may prefer not to be involved in this type of activity. Something else bothers me about this assertion, Mr. Speaker. I wonder what the real position of the RCMP with respect to the removal of this function from their customary actions may be, in the event that they are able to speak freely and without the pressure of their political bosses being brought to bear upon them. We will never know that, however, as long as this Government holds office.

What is it about the Bill in specific terms that should alarm Canadians? I make a general practice of consulting with my constituents, Mr. Speaker. When Bill C-157 was introduced I communicated with them by way of my regular house-holder mailing, made comments with respect to Bill C-157 and asked a series of questions. One of those questions is as valid today as when I asked it, because the Bill does not remove all of the defects of Bill C-157. That question was: In any revised Security Intelligence Service Bill should members of that service have access to private census and tax information? I realize that census information was removed but tax information was not. Neither were medical records or information contained in a letter that may be deposited with Canada Post.

I am particularly concerned about the effect upon the tax system in Canada in the event that, contrary to the provisions of the Income Tax Act, this Bill overrides the prohibitions against disclosure by members and employees of Revenue Canada to the security service. One of the fundamental tenets of proper tax disclosure in a self-assessing system is the recognition by the taxpayer that what he or she reports is confidential and will be used only for the purpose of assessing tax. There may well be circumstances where, in obeying the tax laws of Canada, people may have breached other laws. I say quite frankly that if you wish the tax system of self-assessment to be maintained as the cornestone of our taxing arrangements, then it is absolutely vital that that information supplied by taxpayers be confidential and used only for the purpose of assessing tax.

This Bill will go a long way toward shattering the confidence—if any is left—that taxpayers have in the system administered by the Government. I do not know if the general public is fully aware of the implications of the Bill on their tax reporting system, but they certainly will be by the time we are finished with it in the House. We have an obligation to disclose to Canadians exactly what the Government is doing to them. Because we have raised issues in the House which have been elaborated upon and followed very closely by the media, we already know that the general public is aware of the ill deeds perpetrated upon the taxpayers of Canada by the Government. We can only hope that we can rectify the damage done to the system by the Government's actions.

However, if the House, in reckless fashion, passes Bill C-9 without regard to the damage it will do to the tax system, then when this Party forms the Government it will have a very difficult task trying to convince the people of Canada that it is appropriate that they honestly and fairly report all sources of income.

There is one other matter that concerns me about this legislation, Mr. Speaker. While we know that the mails are used for the purpose of transmitting drugs and other contraband products, it is my belief that the sanctity that has attached to letters being part of first-class mail ought to be maintained. A letter is but a written communication, with nothing else in the envelope. Indeed, first-class mail may include not only letters but the contents of an envelope in addition to the written material. That may well include contraband material, drug substances and the like. While it may be appropriate to examine a written communication that has attached or included with it contraband material, I submit it is not appropriate to open letters being part of first class mail. That matter has not been dealt with by the legislation. As a matter of fact, the Bill would entitle those pursuing the duties outlined for them in the Bill to open all mail, including letters in Canada, as it appealed to them.

One of the great defects that existed in Bill C-157 was clearly the lack of responsibility to the House by any minister of government who, whether he believed it or not, was responsible for the actions of this service. Thank heavens that has been remedied. It is a sad reflection upon the attitude of government that it would even contemplate the introduction of a Bill that tried to remove responsibilities from a minister of the Crown who was answerable in the House for the actions of a department of government or agency for which he should have assumed responsibility.

As a matter of fact, as I look at "intention", it worries me, Mr. Speaker, to find that any government would have had the audacity to attack the civil liberties of Canadians in the fashion of this Government when it introduced Bill C-157. To remove part of those offensive provisions does not, to my mind, eliminate the scorn which should be heaped on a Government which is so inclined to attack with reckless abandon the freedoms we enjoy in Canada. It so happens, of course, that it is the same Government which made much ado about a Charter of Rights and Freedoms which it attacks and assaults at every opportunity.

I am concerned about the search warrant provisions. We know that, as a general rule, mechanical functioning of oft changed provisions is left to the Governor in Council. The reason for that is that Parliament surely cannot be responsible on a daily basis for the minute changes which must be made in order to make a piece of legislation function smoothly. However, I am submitting to the House that consequent upon the delegation by Parliament to the Governor in Council under Clause 28 to pass those regulations dealing with such significant matters as warrants, is an unacceptable deletation by Parliament, and I quote from Clause 28—"governing the practice and procedure of, and security requirements applicable to, hearings of applications for such warrants and for renewals of such warrants", we should know, Mr. Speaker, what the requirements ought to be. Is it a simple necessity under the intended plans of the Government that an application without more be submitted? I think not. Parliament should surely be aware of the very strict rules which should apply when the security of Canada is in jeopardy.

I wonder whether, having created a new force outside the ambit of the RCMP—which is not under the control and responsibility of the Solicitor General—we do not need some general principles which should apply with respect to those circumstances which would entitle members of the force to obtain those search warrants, which, as I indicated earlier, extend so far as to permit encroachment on the tax system, medical records and letters dispatched in the mail?

We have been told by the Government that this Bill meets one additional substantial complaint which was raised by the Senate committee which examined Bill C-157. That is that once an application has been made for a search warrant and has been turned down, the applicant cannot shop for a judge who will be more amenable to the desires of the person making the application. This Bill, Mr. Speaker, does not in fact preclude shopping for judges. All it requires is that some note be made of the fact that another judge may have accepted or rejected an application. If, indeed, the Government wishes to put an end to shopping for judges who would be more amenable to the requirements, all it needs to do is provide that once an application has been made to the court, another application may not be made for the same kind of search warrant. If the Government has the courage to do that, and I invite it to do so, we will have evidence of its alleged good intentions. If it, indeed, means what it says, let that change be made so that this Bill will remove that ominious provision which exists.

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Hon. Member if he could comment further on the matter of Revenue Canada and confidentiality. If a person has been contributing to some organizations, perhaps a church organization or a public group which is supporting liberation movements in South Africa or in Central America, and if it were found through this kind of intrusive mail opening that the individual had applied for a tax exemption in the case of an organization which had that exemption available to it, would the Hon. Member feel that that would be an improper use of this kind of intrusion?

Mr. Gamble: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is asking me a question of law as to whether or not, as a consequence of making a donation to a charitable organization so recognized, the status of the charitable organization might be removed for some other purpose. That has nothing to do with this Bill, as I see it. My objection to this legislation is—and I thought I dealt with it rather extensively—that I did not want that information to fall into the hands of persons other than those entitled to receive it for simple tax purposes. I thought the requirement was rather clear that only for the purposes of assessing tax should anyone examine information in a tax return.

This Bill, as the Hon. Member knows, in fact breaches that general provision of the Income Tax Act as it presently exists. I believe I have rather clearly indicated that, to my mind, this has a detrimental effect, not only upon the rights of the citizen who filed the information, but has a further detrimental effect upon the whole self-assessment process.

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Hon. Member for his answer which does succintly clarify his intention on that point. I would ask him as well, apart from the income tax side of it, whether he considers it appropriate that under this Bill, if it is adopted, the security service could choose to investigate by intrusive methods, such as mail opening, people who support, for example, the campaign in Africa against apartheid.

Mr. Gamble: Mr. Speaker, I do not believe it is appropriate, as I have indicated, to examine for any purpose letters sent by any person, including those who might have made a political contribution to sustain the democratic government of El Salvador.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, as is rarely the case, perhaps I should say with respect to the Hon. Member, I certainly share many of the concerns he has expressed this morning and his philosophical approach.

Mr. Turner: John, you are in trouble now.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): On the question of access to information, I certainly agree with the Hon. Member that information should be held in confidence and should be used for the purpose for which it was intended. I would like the Hon. Member to elaborate on this particular point. The Hon. Member indicated clearly that it is his view that the new security intelligence agency should not have the power to open first-class mail in the absence of some suggestion that it contains some contraband, I suppose. I would like to ask the Hon. Member whether, in addition to precluding access by the security intelligence agency to records of the Department of National Revenue, he would extend that to other records which are obtained by other federal Departments, such as family allowance records, records which are obtained as a result of an application for unemployment insurance benefits and records which are obtained by the Federal Business Development Bank. Would he preclude the new security intelligence agency from having access to those records as well?

Mr. Gamble: Mr. Speaker, I identified two areas which I thought were matters of immediate concern. I based my attack upon the opening or gathering of information related to those two issues on the basis of either well established, recognized law in the general domain or statute law. What I am saying is that today it is an offence to disclose information to persons other than those entitled to use that information for the purpose of assessing tax. That would be a change in the statute law.

We recognize in Canada that treating letters in the mail as private communications has been sacrosanct. The Hon. Member asked me whether I would go beyond that and my answer has to be this. I have not compiled, as he probably has, a list of a variety of information which would be available under this Bill but is not now available. I ask him: Is it not available because of the statute law or because of a well recognized principle known to all Canadians which ought not to be changed? If it is because of either of those two circumstances that the information cannot now be made available to the security service, then I would say it should not further be made available.

• (1220)

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): I thank the Hon. Member for his answer. In fact, as the McDonald Commission clearly documented, it is as a result of present statutory prohibitions that this information cannot be made available. I take it that the Hon. Member would continue those statutory prohibitions. He is indicating his agreement.

I would like to ask him to elaborate on the results of the householder questionnaire circulated in his constituency. He touched briefly on that. Given the fact the Hon. Member made the effort to seek the views of his constituents on this important matter, then perhaps he might go into the outcome of that questionnaire at some greater length.

Mr. Gamble: Mr. Speaker, I would be delighted. I should have referred to it when I brought it up initially. The result of my tabulation is that my constituents opposed, by a ratio of two to one, making available to the service tax information and census material. It is true this Bill precludes the service from gaining census information. Accordingly, I suppose the result is somewhat coloured. I did not break it down in the questionnaire and ask if they were opposed to tax information and were they opposed to census information. They simply expressed the view of being opposed to both.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the results because we have not heard from any Liberal Members except the Minister and his Parliamentary Secretary on this legislation. It seems they are not too keen to defend the principle of this Bill.

Does the Hon. Member for York North (Mr. Gamble) believe that the new civilian security service should have the power to place under surveillance—setting aside the question of opening mail and access to Government records—groups in Canada which seek to support the African National Congress campaign in South Africa against apartheid? Does he believe they should be placed under surveillance or that the security service should have the power to place such groups under surveillance in Canada?

Mr. Gamble: Mr. Speaker, it would depend indeed upon the circumstances involved in the activity of any representative of that group in this country. We know there are laws in Canada—I refer to the Immigration Act—which establish a number of prohibited classes of visitors to Canada. If they have come to Canada for the purpose of advocating the overthrow of a foreign government, they indeed would be, in my view, properly subject today to an examination and surveillance process instituted by the RCMP. Very clearly, then, if the RCMP can do it today, I would have no objection, having regard to the specific provisions of the Immigration Act which have some validity, to the security service doing the same kind of work in the future.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, this subject matter has long been under consideration in this country. As far as this House is concerned, I suppose the problems of security were discovered when the McDonald Commission came into being. However, I can recall the decision to establish the security service under the RCMP with a civilian director. First, if I recall, it was General Dare and subsequently John Starnes.

Mr. Lawrence: The other way around.

Mr. Lambert: My colleague says it was the other way around and I stand corrected. But it goes a long way back. I think there is great confusion in the public mind, which is usually the result of a momentary glance at news headlines or some quick report on television; but there is no doubt in my mind that Canada needs a security agency. To say it is an intelligence gathering agency is to immediately stamp it, as those civil libertarians who want utter licence to prevail at all times would do, with the label of a government snoop agency burrowing into the innermost secrets of all Canadians for whatever purpose the active imagination may wish to bring forth.

Our history, Mr. Speaker, since World War II has been a joke in so far as security is concerned. Foreign governments have sent agents into this country to operate not necessarily against Canada but as a convenient base to operate against the United States. We became aware of this through the Gouzenko disclosures. But the country involved in that case, the Soviet Union, is not the only one to carry on nefarious activities in this country.

In every major security contest there has ever been, Canada has come out second simply because we did not have the resources or the determination to do something about it. I find it rather amusing that people are concerned about opening mail to see whether one supports apartheid or not, some church group or this or that. That is a silly froth on the subject. In so far as National Revenue is concerned, it opens mail; of course it does and it has a right to. It does not require a civilian agency to go and get a court order. I can see some people shaking their heads. They have never faced the problem of heroin importation by letter. It can be done and very simply. They have not faced the smuggling of almost pure gold in fine chains in a thick letter. They have not seen the absolute pornographic filth which comes in via the mail. It is not only mail; there are visual demonstrations of some of the most violent filth you can imagine. Perhaps some of the people who object to this privately enjoy viewing these, I do not know. I rather suspect that many of those who protest in print and otherwise protest too much. On the customs side it is not necessary. The authority is there. Under the Post Office Act it is rather stupid. The inspectors of the postal service have the right to examine mail to see if it contains contraband. When they find contraband they write a letter to the addressee telling him there is a parcel for him coming from somewhere and to come and get it. Of course, the addressee is not going to go anywhere near the Post Office. They are then under instruction to return it to the sender. Of all the stupid things to do. I can only categorize that as stupid. That is an attempt to suborn legitimate law in the country. I defy any civil libertarian to say it is wrong to use means such as the censorship of mail by the appropriate officials to prevent the entry into Canada of narcotics and other attempts at smuggling.

In regard to the Income Tax Act, I agree that it has gone too far. I object to the agreement that was signed secretly between the RCMP and the Department of National Revenue and not disclosed until an admission was pulled from the lips of the then Minister, now Senator Guay, some years ago that it was possible for the RCMP to examine income tax files in an investigation of an offence under the Income Tax Act. The Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) knows this. Right away both the RCMP and the Department of National Revenue breached that agreement by doing something quite contrary to it.

This is precisely what many of the critics or potential critics of this Act are saying. In a criminal prosecution the income tax files of certain individuals were examined by the RCMP. The Anderson case is an example of that. That is wrong. The sooner the Solicitor General and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Bussières) come clean as to the exact status of that agreement today and its strict adherence, the better off we will be.

That is why I agree with my colleague from Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn). This Act requires full examination by a committee of the House. We have seen security examined by the other place, by royal commissions and God knows what. The House of Commons, which is deemed by the people of Canada to represent them, must be able to get the views of a lot of people from one end of the country to the other. It is not sufficient for lobby groups and persons concentrated around Ottawa, Montreal and Toronto to give us the benefit of their views. A few of them give their views by way of briefs. Many of them give their views by reports of speeches, which are synthesized versions of what is said depending upon the views of the reporter.

I underline the absolute necessity, Mr. Speaker, when this legislation goes to committee, that the committee, composed of all Members of the House, shall then have an opportunity to go from Victoria to St. John's and hear what the people of Canada have to say about the important issue of a security agency for the country. By that I mean the relationship to government of what has to be a vital agency concerning individuals. We are attempting to protect the security of the country not only from boring in from the outside, but from activities within the country which include violent means, uprisings and a variety of other illegal ways to overthrow government and create national confusion.

Having said that, I do not want to come down hard on either side. I would personally tend to favour a civilian agency with a director with much more responsibility to the Minister than is required under this Act. Mr. Speaker, one of the big problems we have had in the past 20 years is that the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police has not been responsible directly to the Minister; he has been made responsible to a Deputy Minister. I will admit that over the years the history of the Department of the Solicitor General has been somewhat unhappy in that, along with a few other ministries, it was one of the favourite stools in the game of ministerial musical chairs. The net result was that either new boys to Cabinet or people who could not do a job properly in a more senior position were allotted to the position of Solicitor General. Subordination to the Deputy Solicitor General and the nature of leadership did much to affect the morale all the way through the force.

Therefore I disagree with Clause 7 of the Bill which stipulates that the Director should consult the Deputy Minister about the general operational policies of the service. I suggest that that is nonsense. He is responsible to the Minister because there must be proper political direction. That clause merely reflects part of the mandarin desire to control everything here in Ottawa.

I agree with Clause 8 of the Bill. A service that is properly run by a good Director should choose its own people. The service's employees should not necessarily be tall, blonde and 22. They would meet the requirements of the RCMP and make excellent policemen. A security service should be made up of its own full-time employees rather than people who are seconded through a backdoor from another government agency. Those who work with a security agency must possess the best possible qualifications. Their qualifications include intelligence, language and many other factors but have very little to do with being trained for a national police force. The security service should not become an independent force with the power of arrest. I personally believe that that is the purpose of the RCMP and other police forces. Any suggestion that the security agency should be allowed to arrest people or take other police action which people may fear should be set aside at the beginning.

I have some personal knowledge about the attraction of the RCMP as a career for young men and women in this country. All of the offences laid against the RCMP as a result of the McDonald Commission related to security. The besmirching of the RCMP has discouraged many good recruits from joining that force. I will admit that present economic conditions do not allow for many vacancies and we read reports about the emptiness of the Regina police school. However, that is not the whole story.

Since my time is almost up, I would suggest to Hon. Members, even those who believe a central security agency or even the RCMP are inherently bad because they often restrict the aspired licence of some individuals in this country, that I believe the majority of people in this country are in favour of an appropriate security agency. However, since we have not heard what all of the features of that agency should be, I agree with my colleague from Saskatoon that the committee should be given the authority to conduct hearings in all parts of Canada and report back when it has completed its work.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member indicated that he felt the new civilian security service should have certain powers to open first-class mail, particularly when there is a suspicion that there might be contraband in that mail. Does he agree with the Hon. Member for York North (Mr. Gamble) that the security service should not in fact have the power to open first-class mail when there is a suspicion that this mail may contain messages of a subversive nature? Does he believe that a distinction should be made between the suspicion of physical contraband being in a first-class envelope and the passing of messages, as his colleague for North York does, or does he believe that all first-class mail should be subject to opening by the new civilian security service?

Mr. Lambert: First, may I say that the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) must have been looking at something else because I did not say that this agency should have the right to open correspondence or parcels with regard to contraband. There already are ample provisions within the Department of National Revenue, customs and excise and the post office for that purpose.

With respect to the suspicion of subversive messages, I find it difficult to answer that because there are pros and cons to the issue. Let us take a case in which correspondence contains codes and the results of espionage. Let us say that espionage is being carried out in the United States by another country and that a post office box in Canada is being used as a marshalling point for the transmission of such information. Surely if it became known to the security agency that this means was being used, would it not be proper for the agency to apply to a court to allow mail being delivered to a particular address to be subject to scrutiny? I am talking about national security. I can think of dozens of ways in which our country can be seen as the softest touch in the world for those engaged in international espionage.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member also dealt in his remarks with the question of the mandate of the new security service. He went to some length dealing with the powers that it might possess. Would he expand upon his views with respect to the mandate of the new security service? Of course, having read the legislation carefully, he is no doubt aware of what could happen to a group in his constituency under the provisions of this Bill. Take the example of a church group in Edmonton that decides it wants to send funds or other material assistance to a movement in Central America which is engaged in an attempt to overthrow one of the dictatorial, oppressive and violent governments there so as to liberate people from decades of economic and social oppression. A Canadian group or individual who wants to support that particular organization would be subject to intrusive techniques being used against it or him, even though many of us would argue that this poses no threat whatsoever to the security of Canada and Canadians. I hear the Hon. Member from Mississauga suggesting it does. I would welcome the intervention of the Member from Mississauga in this debate on that point.

At this juncture in the debate I would like to ask the Hon. Member from Edmonton whether he shares the view of his colleague from Mississauga that such activities by Canadians in fact constitute a threat to the security of Canada and should subject those Canadians to the full range of intrusive powers available to the nearest new security service under the provisions of this legislation.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, on the simple basis which the Hon. Member puts it forth, there is no threat to Canada within or even without. If a Canadian citizen feels he wants to send money to a particular group in a particular country, it is that person's business. But I will say this much. If he sends it to a church group that enjoys the status of a charitable organization under the Income Tax Act, I would say right away that that organization should be disqualified because it is not carrying on charitable or religious work in the accepted sense. It is carrying on political work in some other country and that is not within the ambit of the Income Tax Act. Therefore, a choice will have to be made. As a matter of fact, some of the so-called charitable organizations front for activities outside the country which are not charitable. The Hon. Member being a man well versed in the law, I would invite him to review the legislation and the court cases with regard to what is the meaning of "charity" in the legal sense. It is not "benevolent" or "useful" but charitable within the meaning of the Act. Then that will follow.

But let us go on and develop the theme beyond what the Hon. Member suggested. He set a simplistic problem. I do not want my answer to be taken as a simplistic approval of a much bigger thesis, because there may be a point of halt. May I say that I would certainly have legislation available—and this may be something we may have to consider here—that in the event hostility should break out involving Canada, or a serious threat of hostility, all of this goes by the board. Many of these safeguards have to go by the board. The Hon. Member is too young to have gone through World War II. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that so many of the things that he and some of his colleagues seem to want and insist upon—I do not know, but I suppose acquired rights—in wartime just do not exist. The national will says that the thing to do is survive, and that has to be understood.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): The period for questions has ended.

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, I would be willing to commence my remarks now or call it one o'clock, depending upon the will of the House.

Mr. Kaplan: No, it is 12.55 p.m.

Mr. Ogle: I am happy to speak to Bill C-9 and to address the three basic questions that are in the Bill. First is a proposed mandate to set up a new civilian service in Canada for the purpose of intelligence operations. Second is to look at the powers that it is suggested the service will have. Third is to look at the oversight and accountability mechanisms that would be established in the Bill or that are established there now to see that the Bill functions and that the service is given limits of operation.

I want to address the Bill from a philosophical point of view. I would also like to use some of my experience, having lived in countries where intelligence services had a very high profile. I felt that instead of bringing security to people, it brought great insecurity.

I do believe this Bill and its notion is one that has grave concerns for many Canadians. I have addressed various audiences on the background notion of what is taking place in the Bill being proposed. I think it is important, to begin with, to look at the word "security". I personally believe its English context has changed in the last 15 years. When I was younger, security, I believe, meant a state of well-being that one experienced because of a whole variety of conditions that were present at that time in the person's life. Today security, I believe, means a process by which you guard something or set up walls against insecurity.

Let me outline a case in point. This House of Commons until recently did not have a security system. People coming to sit and watch in the galleries did not have to pass a screening to come into the galleries. People now have to go through mechanical surveillance similar to those installed at airports. However, I feel no more secure in this House of Commons from some attack against my person. In fact, I feel less secure than before.

The question has been thrown into the minds of many people, are we secure here? We had an incident a few weeks ago. A person came to the door at the end of the morning session. Our caucus was sitting here. The person tried to get in. The guards, the security people, whoever, took the person away. During Question Period the same afternoon the same person appeared at the door upstairs and had in her hand a bundle which she threw into the centre of the House of Commons. The proceedings carried on. I am sure many people watching television did not know anything had happened. It turned out the bundle was not a dangerous weapon or anything of the sort, but if it had been, that person had actually passed through security and had put us all into great insecurity.

I have watched this process grow. I have seen how people put a wall around something to make it secure. Then someone finds a hole in the wall and one then has to erect another wall. A place where this wall building has taken place is the airport at Tel Aviv, Israel. Wall after wall after wall have been put up to accommodate this word security.

I see it is one o'clock, Mr. Speaker. I will continue to address the philosophical notion behind security after the lunch hour.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

OLYMPIC GAMES

TRIBUTE TO SKATER, BRIAN ORSER

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw to the attention of the House the fact that achievements in any walk of life are a result of team effort. No man or woman achieves greatness by himself or herself, especially in an Olympic sport where it takes a complete effort by a dedicated coach who believes in the ability of his athlete, the support and encouragement of team-mates who know the individual has the "right stuff" to conquer the world, the love and encouragement of parents and relatives who know the hard work required to produce an Olympic medal athlete, and the proud support of the community which recognizes one of its own who brings honour to the community.

Those ingredients were all there last week, but they would not have come together without a supreme, championship effort by one individual, a true world champion. I ask the House to recognize the athlete himself, silver medal winner, men's figure skating champion, 1984 Olympics, from the riding of Simcoe North, Brian Orser.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FRANCO-MANITOBANS' RIGHTS

POSITION OF PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE PARTY

Mr. Gaston Gourde (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, during the weekend, the Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party tried once again to obscure the issue of French rights in Manitoba when he stated that his Party's dissenting Members had decided officially to toe the Party line. The Leader of the Opposition forgot to tell the whole truth, however. First, this is not the first time the Members for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie) and Simcoe-South (Mr. Stewart) have spoken out against bilingualism in Canada, and the token statement made by one of the Members sounds like a strategic ploy. Second, only one Member made a public statement last Wednesday, and the Member for Simcoe-South does not seem to have made anything public yet. Third, Canadians would like to know what is happening to the McKenzie-Stewart fund, a subject that concerns all Canadians and which demands clarification.

The Leader of the Opposition should show the same courage and firmness displayed by the Party in power. Once again for the Progressive Conservatives, it was too little, too late.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

RATE OF UNEMPLOYMENT IN NIAGARA REGION

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, it is high time the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) took off his rose-coloured glasses and saw the economic situation of the country as it really is. He has been raving recently about the fact that we are finally emerging from the doom and gloom of the recession, to a new dawn. In his Budget speech he quoted figures which show that inflation is slowing and that interest rates are falling.

Will he now admit that everything is not sweetness and light? Is he aware that the jobless rate in the Niagara region is now at an unbelievable 17 per cent? Even taking into consideration the traditional winter slowdown in the economy, this is too high, and unacceptable.

The human tragedy is enormous. The Liberals have been in power for four years, and today we have 514,000 more jobless than when they took over. I believe that this is, in no small measure, due to the Budgets which have been tabled during that time. The Special Recovery Program is clearly a recovery for the rich and a sham for the poor.

In the Niagara region alone there were 10,499 on welfare last month. That is a lot of mouths to feed. If these people had work, they would be more than happy to take it. Yet there is no work. The Minister of Finance has failed to address the serious issue of job creation.

POLITICAL PARTIES

POSITION OF PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE PARTY ON GOVERNMENT DEFICIT

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, in 1968 the Beatles released a delightful movie entitled The Yellow Submarine. Through song, a story was told about the struggle between the forces of good and evil. The villains in this work of fiction were the Blue Meanies, who were eventually vanquished by the good citizens of Pepperland.

It is now 16 years later, and we hear the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) and the Opposition finance critic, the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), condemning the Government for not immediately reducing the deficit in last Wednesday's Budget. When asked what the Opposition would do about the deficit, the Hon. Member for St. John's West said, "You have to be mean, nasty, and do all sorts of unpleasant things . . . that's why I'm not going to outline what"—Tory policies—"would be now". From this it is clear that the Blue Meanies are back in human form, but now it is the people of Canada who face the insidious nightmare.

The chief Blue Meanie and his corpulent, evil-tempered henchman from St. John's West, are the rampage. They are joined by the "slasher" from York-Peel and the "sour sacker" from Capilano. Together they are Canada's Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse". People of Canada, rally to the defence of the social safety net, and demand that the mean, nasty and unpleasant people across the floor come clean with their plans for the future of our country.

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA

DURATION OF PARLIAMENTS

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to take part in an argument. In fact I am not even trying to predict the date of the federal election, whatever that date may be. However, it seems important to me that newspapers keep the rules straight on how the date plan is decided.

In this connection I draw attention to the fact that in 1930 there was an election whereby the Seventeenth Parliament was elected. That vote took place on July 28, 1930, and it was gazetted on August 15, 1930. Four years later R. B. Bennett decided that he wanted to delay the election, but he accepted the fact that because of the rule Parliament had to be dissolved on August 14, 1935. Then Mr. Bennett set the election date for October 14, 1935. I remember the date very well. Even though I was only 27 years of age, I ran in the general election that day and lost. At any rate, the Seventeenth Parliament lasted five years and two months, from one election to another.

Then in 1940 there was voting for the Nineteenth Parliament. That election was called on Tuesday, March 26, 1940, and it was gazetted on April 15, 1940. The result of that was that in 1945 the Nineteenth Parliament was dissolved on April 16 because it was a Monday, April 15 being a Sunday. Then it was arranged that the voting would take place on June 11, 1945. That was one of the elections I won. So did the Liberal Government.

These are two examples of the Government delaying for the full term of five years and two months. There are no other occasions of this, except in 1917 for the war election during World War I. It is an established fact that Government can wait five years and a bit longer.

Mr. Speaker: I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member, but his allotted time has expired.

Some Hon. Members: Let him continue.

Mr. Speaker: He may continue.

Mr. Knowles: I just want to make the point that the present Government was elected on February 18, 1980, and was gazetted on March 10, 1980. That means, therefore, that it has agreed that Parliament is dissolved on March 10, 1985, and it could set the election two months later, which would make it in May, 1985.

I am not trying to predict the election date. I am just asking the newspapers and those who look at this matter to understand what is the rule. The only other point I would like to make is that perhaps you, Mr. Speaker, would like to predict what will be the date of the next election. Or I wonder if you will guess it.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

EXPENDITURE ON WEATHER PROTECTION AT SPEAKERS' ENTRANCES

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, it is outrageous and unbelievable that the Government has the audacity to spend $275,000 flagrantly to build overhangs which will protect the Speakers of both Chambers from the Canadian weather, while at the same time it allows millions of unemployed and poor Canadians to face high costs, zero job availability and creation—are you listening, John—and the impending harsh reality that the present is bleak, and the future, if under the selfish Liberal Government, holds no hope for improvement.

On behalf of the poor and the unemployed of the country I condemn this irresponsible, insulting Government for its foolish extravagance, when this money could be well used in many ways to assist those who cannot afford food or basic daily essentials. Certainly most cannot afford to build $275,000 porches onto their shelters. Quite bluntly, the Government's priorities are in the wrong order and are disgusting, repulsive, and blatantly insulting to all Canadians.

THE LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Mr. Denis Ethier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) announced the date for the presentation of his Budget, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney), the temporary member for Central Nova, immediately cried foul.

He went so far as to call it a cheap shot on the part of the Government to introduce a budget when the Leader of the Opposition was planning to be in Europe.

We all know the grandstanding of the Hon. Member for Central Nova. He would cancel his trip to Europe because, for him, the Budget and the economy of this country were his main concern, and discussing the Budget and the economy should be a top priority. Well, the Budget was in fact presented on Wednesday, February 15, and the Leader of the Opposition has not been seen in the House since. Would it be fair to assume that he is changing his priorities?

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

DEVELOPMENT OF COMPUTER SOFTWARE

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Mr. Speaker, Canada's fledgling computer software industry is being threatened with extinction, and two recent events have shown that the Cabinet lacks even a basic understanding of the situation.

One of these events is actually a non-event, arising from last week's Budget. It was a non-event because the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) failed to change the income tax definition in order to extend research and development benefits to the development of computer software, this despite a discussion paper and a task force that flowed from the previous Budget.

The other event of importance is the proposal currently before the Japanese Government that would require the compulsory licensing of computer software ideas from outside Japan to any Japanese company. Such a measure could decimate Canada's chances of marketing a universe of unique products, not only in Japan but anywhere in the world. Telidon is a prime example of the kind of Canadian idea that could be lost by this legislation.

When my colleague from Cariboo-Chilcotin raised this matter in the House a few days ago, the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Johnston) appeared not to know anything about it, even though numerous articles have appeared in the popular press, including Business Week, The Economist, and The New York Times. High-level delegations from other countries, including the United States, have visited Japan to make representations over this serious problem, but not a word from our Government. I know—

Mr. Speaker: I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member but his time has expired.

EMPLOYMENT

LACK OF PROSPECTS FOR STUDENTS

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, recently a book entitled "Jobs Canada", published by a non-profit group in Toronto called Bridging the Gap, is being distributed to 2.5 million Canadians. It is a glossy publication. It is supposed to be non-governmental, but it contains a picture of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Roberts), and obviously has government plans for the unemployed.

A reporter has indicated some of the jobs given in the booklet are air traffic controllers, bartenders, and newspaper editors. I would like to say that in general it is "Alice in Wonderland".

I received a letter today, and a telephone call from some students at the University of Saskatchewan in the engineering faculty. Blake Rooks indicates that of 60 mechanical engineers in his class, three have jobs; of approximately 30 civil engineers, none have jobs; there are 17 agricultural engineers, and three have jobs; of 30 geology engineers, none have jobs. That is the reality. The Government has to look to the real world where people are unemployed. There has been no recovery, certainly no recovery for students, and no recovery for those on unemployment insurance. We have to tell our Government to deal with the real world.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

FORESTRY

SITUATION OF INDUSTRY—NEED FOR ACTION

Mr. Gerry St. Germain (Mission-Port Moody): Mr. Speaker, Canada's forest industry is suffering from a decade of neglect. The Government has demonstrated total disregard for our most precious renewable resource and our most important national industry. Only last week it was announced that negotiations between the federal Government and the Government of British Columbia had collapsed and a long-term cost-sharing agreement for forest renewal in B.C. could not be reached. Long-term planning and positive vision have given way completely to short-term patchwork programs and band-aid crisis management.

British Columbia's professional foresters met in Vancouver last week. Their general meeting was entitled "Our Forests in Crisis". They realize that the forest industry has been brought to the brink of disaster in Canada. They realize that Canada's forest industry is quickly dying. They also realize that prompt action, long-term commitments and political will can prevent the total collapse of the forest industry. They talked of standing on the threshold of the opportunity of our lifetime. They know that the social welfare extravaganza has to end and that real action has to be taken to set our priorities and preserve our lifeblood industries.

Canadians can be put back to work in productive industries like forestry. They do not have to rely on government make-work projects to survive. The time is now. We must reverse the trend and set Canada back on the track toward prosperity.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

THE BUDGET—RATIONALE FOR PROPOSED MEASURES

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. At a post-Budget briefing session with the press last Thursday, the Minister said that his Budget is not having any effect on the Canadian economy and that this makes him happy. There are 1,473,000 unemployed Canadians who are not happy. With new signs of a stalling recovery, with orders for durable goods having fallen 1.1 per cent in December, factory production having dropped in November, disappointing sales at Christmas time, and CPI figures now rousing alarm about the dangers of renewed inflation, why did the Minister bring in a do-nothing Budget with the number of unemployed so high and so many signs that the recovery is faltering?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the Hon. Member had bothered to read the press reports carefully, he would have seen that what I indicated was not that the Budget would have no impact on the economy but that there was no immediate large impact on the performance in the market, on interest rates or on the exchange value. I indicated that this is very much what I intended to see happening. I intended to make sure that the growth we had known in 1983 would be pursued in 1984, since what the country needs is stability and continuity in policy. I indicated that I expected that the rate of growth in 1984 would be around 5 per cent, after having been 3 per cent in 1983, and that employment in 1984 would grow by a strong 3.5 per cent. The reaction of the markets to the budget has been the one I hoped for and anticipated. Indeed, in 1984 I expect to see the continuation of a strong recovery and that the economy will grow from the phase of recovery into a phase of strong expansion in 1984.

UNEMPLOYMENT—MINISTER'S POSITION

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, let's see if the Minister will answer a question. In his Budget of April 17 he said his dominant concern was "to help the more than 1.5 million Canadians who want to work but cannot". That Budget did not help them; 1,473,000 are still unemployed. He is forecasting that the unemployed average will remain at 1,336,000 this year, and that in 1988 there will still be over 1,100,000 unemployed. May I ask the Minister with his do-nothing Budget, what is his dominant concern now? It is certainly not jobs for the unemployed. What is his dominant concern with this Budget, with 1,500,000 still unemployed?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has quoted a number of figures. I draw to his attention that, on a year-to-year basis, manufacturers' shipments rose by 17.2 per cent, new orders rose by 20.7 per cent, and unfilled orders rose by 30 per cent between December, 1982, and December, 1983. There was a very strong recovery in the Canadian economy at that time.

The Hon. Member refers to the number of unemployed, and again I have to remind him that in Canada last year we created 400,000 jobs. It is true that unemployment has remained high, although it is declining, but we have the fastest growing labour force of any industrialized country. This is a fact that is there for everyone to see.

The Government is pursuing an active policy of encouraging the creation of jobs by the private sector as fast as it can be done. It is also providing leadership in the public sector by increasing its spending. This year, for instance, the Government will spend over $525 million more than it did last year in creating jobs directly and indirectly, in spite of the fact that it is trying to keep the federal deficit under control and under restraint.

Finally, I have to suggest to my hon. friend that perhaps he could tell the Canadian public what the tough, mean and nasty things are that he would do, and that he refused to tell the Canadian public last week after the Budget.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, the main nasty thing would be to kick out this Government.

ECONOMIC FORECASTS

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, you cannot get blood from a turnip, and you cannot get an answer from one either. The Minister has very optimistic economic forecasts in his Budget. He forecast economic real growth of 3.8 per cent on average in the next five years. Last Thursday when he was asked about those forecasts he said, "Frankly, who knows?" with a famous Gallic shrug. "Frankly, who knows?"

May I ask the Minister if any credence can be put in these forecasts that he is basing the anticipated level of unemployment on, since he has no faith in them? If they are not accurate, what will happen to his unemployment projections which are already horrendous? What will happen to the Canadian economy?

Mr. Nielsen: Who knows?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, perhaps my hon. friend would like to take a look at the forecast given by a number of professionals in the field, both in Canada and in the United States. A few weeks ago, President Reagan tabled in the House of Representatives his own forecasts for the American economy over the next few years. The President's prediction for this year, 1985, 1986, 1987 and 1988 is a growth rate identical to that expected for Canada, namely, 4 per cent.

I may remind my hon. friend that the performance of Canada's economy often runs parallel to that of the U.S. economy, and that the forecasts presented by the Government of Canada are based on studies made by professionals in the field, as they are in the United States, or by international organizations such as the OECD, which did, in fact, predict a growth rate of 4.9 per cent, identical to my own forecast for 1984.

However, if my hon. friend thinks we can guarantee these figures for 1988, he is being less than reasonable. Nevertheless, I would like to point out that these predictions are not necessarily over-optimistic. Last year, I brought down a Budget with a number of forecasts, and the Opposition said my predictions were too optimistic. In fact, the economy performed even better than I had expected.

Consequently, I hope that by continuing the policies we have put in place and with the important measures this Government has taken in the economic sphere, we shall improve on our forecast, as we did in 1983.

JOBS CANADA MAGAZINE—USE OF GOVERNMENT FUNDS

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. At a time when, according to the prognostications in the Budget of the Minister of Finance, the best scenario we can anticipate is 1.1 million unemployed Canadians for at least the next four years, how can the Minister justify funding and putting out the Jobs Canada magazine by a group called Bridging the Gap? This is a good news publication and indicates that anyone in Canada who wants work should be able to find it. And it was vetted by the Minister's officials. How can the Minister justify that expenditure of money on this kind of publication which is going to 2.6 million Canadian households, when the money could be better directed to the interests of the unemployed?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think I can do that quite easily.

Mr. McDermid: It was a bad picture of you.

Mr. Roberts: The hon. gentleman says it was a bad picture of me. That may very well be right, but that is of absolutely no importance in terms of what we are trying to do.

Members on all sides of the House have urged us, and I think quite rightly—

Mr. Crosbie: You should have had the Minister of Finance on there.

Mr. Roberts: —to mount better efforts to communicate the range of programs that we have under the Employment and Immigration Commission so that the clientele we could potentially serve would better know what programs are available to them. In this particular case the publication put out by a voluntary group is one in which we have advertised, it is true, but far from the majority of the costs of the issue are being supported by us. The majority of the costs are being met by others.

The publication brings together very useful information for young people and others who are seeking employment opportunities and seeking to know what services the Government of Canada provides to assist them in their search for jobs. It seems to me to be extremely useful.

I think it would be silly of the hon. gentleman to urge that we should mount programs and then not undertake expenditures to ensure that those programs are communicated effectively to the public they are intended to serve. In this case I hope the Hon. Member has read the publication. I hope his question leads more people to be aware of it and to consult it. I am convinced it is the kind of information which we should provide to Canadians.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, on the basis of the advice given in the magazine with the approbation of the Minister, he could well be prosecuted for violation of truth in advertising.

JUSTIFICATION FOR EXPENDITURE

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister how he can justify another example of lavish and elaborate patronage? How can he justify this thinly transparent Liberal propaganda, indeed, propaganda possibly for the Minister's own run at the leadership of the Liberal Party? How can he justify this in a time of restraint, particularly when there is so much to do in the country for the 1.5 million unemployed? According to the Conference Board of Canada that number will rise in 1985. How can the Minister justify this kind of action?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member's questions are even more absurd than they usually are. What this is, in effect, is a means of communicating to Canadians what programs are available for their use. It has that purpose, and it is effective.

PLIGHT OF UNEMPLOYED IN HAMILTON AREA OF ONTARIO

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The Minister will know, I am sure, that in the Hamilton area 50 per cent of all construction workers are out of work, 70 per cent of electricians are looking for employment, and 20 per cent of all steelworkers are out of work. The unemployment rate in the area is substantially higher than it ought to be. These people do not qualify for the Government's recently announced new RRSP program; they do not qualify for the reduction in income tax that the doctors, lawyers, accountants and consultants qualify for, down to 15 per cent; in fact they do not even qualify for unemployment insurance.

Given that the Minister has previously indicated his concern for those who are unemployed through no fault of their own, who do not qualify for UIC, and for whom no work is currently available, why was there nothing in the Budget to help those people?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member probably made a very short reading of the Budget, because the Budget had something. As I indicated in my answer to the Hon. Member for St. John's West, the federal Government is going to spend over $500 million more in 1984 than it spent in 1983 in direct and indirect job creation. This is a significant addition to the total amount we are providing to help alleviate the problem of unemployment. Our expenditures on training, direct job creation and capital expenditure are going to run into several billions of dollars in 1984. That addition of over $500 million is a significant addition, taking into account the constraints under which we are all operating in terms of availability of funds.

The Hon. Member says that the Budget contained nothing for those people who have exhausted their UIC, but I would remind him that programs already exist for these people. In particular there is the Canada Assistance Plan, to which the federal Government is contributing 50 per cent to the provincial Governments for whatever assistance they are providing. As a matter of fact our expenditures under that program have increased by several hundreds of millions over the last few years. These programs which are being provided by the Provinces are cost shared by the federal Government to the tune of 50 per cent.

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the Minister appears to be saying that the only hope for those who cannot find employment, and who are unable to collect unemployment insurance benefits because they have received unemployment insurance benefits for the last year to a year and a half, is that they go on welfare.

When people have contributed to their own well-being all of their lives, have worked every single day since they were in their teens, and now find themselves in their middle fifties out of work, unable to draw unemployment insurance benefits, with children still in school, and their spouse not earning enough to maintain the family, is it reasonable to expect that these people must lose everything for which they have worked simply because this Government is so blind that it cannot see that they need some assistance now?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is again distorting what I said. I indicated that there are a number of programs and expenditures by the federal Government in terms of direct job creation, and in terms of additional expenditures by the federal Government to the tune of over $525 million more than last year. We are doing everything we can in that regard. However, the Hon. Member also must recognize that the federal Government—any Government—cannot guarantee to every Canadian who is unemployed that he can have a job tomorrow morning, or even next month. No one can guarantee that.

What we are trying to do is to speed up as much as possible the activities taking place in the private sector. The measures I announced in the Budget, in terms of helping small business and medium size business, in particular, and the measures I announced in the last Budget, which are also effective—and many of them are going to have their main effect in 1984 rather than in 1983—all of these measures should lead to a high rate of job creation in the private sector.

In the meantime we have not only direct job-creation programs, but we have programs for the retraining of workers, and programs to help the mobility of people, helping them look for jobs in other areas. We have all those programs which are in operation and for which there are billions of dollars being made available during the course of 1984-85. We are doing everything we can because we share the concern for these people with the Hon. Member. However, the fact is that, unless one is a charlatan, one cannot guarantee that this problem will be resolved tomorrow morning. It will take time, unfortunately, and I regret it every day, but we are doing everything we can.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, the Minister may well be right. Many of those people cannot find employment because there are no jobs. That is the premise upon which I have based the questions I have asked since last December.

BUDGET'S TAX PROPOSALS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Now, what I ask the Minister is this: is it fair to turn around and give to doctors, lawyers, consultants, accountants and oil companies, tax breaks totalling into the billions of dollars, and then to tax average Canadians this year an additional $1 billion, and say to those who are unemployed through no fault of their own and who cannot find work because, as the Minister says, there is no work for them, that they must lose everything they have ever worked for, simply because this Government would rather help its friends than help those who need it most?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is once again indulging in rhetoric and demagoguery. I may remind him that the federal Government's additional expenditures for this year, which are in the Budget I brought down last week, are directed basically to the people who are in greatest need. We have about $450 million in additional expenditures for 1984, if I remember correctly in any case, we can check the exact figures. However, what I want to point out is that the vast majority of these funds are aimed at people in need. Two hundred and fifty million dollars for Canadians over 65 who are alone and who live in poverty. One hundred and fifty million dollars for unemployed youth. Therefore, if we look at the expenditure increase for 1984-85, the Hon. Member will have to admit that practically all additional expenditures for 1984-85 will be used to help the people who are in greatest need in our country. All my hon. friend has to do is to look at the expenditure plan for 1984-85.

As far as the expenditure and fiscal plans for subsequent years are concerned, there again, my hon. friend will have to admit that this Government is trying to put on an equal footing those people who are employed by businesses and whose pensions are covered by their employer, and people who are self-employed, whether they are professionals or farmers, fishermen, small businessmen or workers who are not covered by pension funds at this time. We are trying to achieve the objective of equal sharing of opportunities within our society.

FINANCE

INTEREST RATE PROJECTIONS USED IN PREPARING BUDGET

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. I must say that if the Minister expects the private sector to deliver a sustained recovery, lower, stable interest rates are absolutely essential.

Mr. Crosbie: Right on.

Mr. Huntington: On Friday last, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of State for Finance refused to tell us the interest rate used in the projection of debt service charges in his fiscal plan. He inferred that such information would spook the capital markets. Given the fact that United States Budget projections each year project the 91-day Treasury Bill interest rate ahead three years, and in this past Budget, ahead to 1989, at which time interest rates will be down to 5 per cent, can the Minister tell us why the secrecy here in Canada? Why can we not be trusted with this type of information, particularly when the U.S. is prepared to publish its research and figures for the whole world to see? Is there any substance to the Minister's figures, or are we just facing more flim-flam?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the Hon. Member that it is important to bring interest rates down. The fact is that this Government has done quite a job in that regard over the last few years.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: Not only have we brought interest rates down—

Mr. McDermid: You had a job getting them up to 22 per cent.

Mr. Lalonde: —but we have reduced, and in fact practically eliminated the spread which existed between the U.S. rate and the Canadian rate. The prime rates today at banks in Canada are the same as in the United States. They have been the same since last fall. This is something which we have achieved. For the Conservatives to say that something must be done about interest rates, I would have to remind them about an important statement—

Mr. Nielsen: Answer the question.

Mr. Lalonde: —which was made in this House, which was, "No one wants high interest rates. So it is not the policy of the Government to have high interest rates. It is a condition which the Government cannot do anything about at the monent." That statement was made by the Hon. Member for St. John's West, who is sitting across the aisle, on November 15, 1979.

Mr. Nielsen: Answer the question.

Mr. Lalonde: It is not the policy of this Government that nothing can be done about it.

Mr. Crosbie: You have had four years to do something.

Mr. Nielsen: Answer the question.

Mr. Lalonde: We on this side of the House have done a lot about it, Mr. Speaker. As far as the point raised by the Hon. Member is concerned, I must tell him that we are following the same policy which was followed by the former Minister of Finance, the Hon. Member for St. John's West, when he was in office. These figures have been considered internal to the administration of Government and it is not judged to be in the public interest—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: —to provide speculators in the market with possible information as to what will happen with interest rates. Let them make their own judgment. This is the best way to protect the public interest.

Mr. Nielsen: Call an election.

INTEREST RATES ON LONG-TERM GOVERNMENT BONDS

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact that in the United States interest rates on 91-day Treasury Bills are published each year all the way through to 1989, at which time they project they will be down to 5 per cent, and in light of the fact that the Canadian Government is now selling five-year non-callable bonds to yield 11 per cent, nine-year bonds to yield 11.5 per cent, and 21-year bonds—non-callable, I might remind you, Mr. Speaker—to yield 12 per cent, why does the Minister say that interest rates are expected to decline in his fiscal plan?

Mr. Crosbie: Yes, answer that one.

Mr. Huntington: Why does the Minister keep saying that? Why does he keep heaping this rhetoric on the Canadian public when the facts just do not live up to what he is saying?

Mr. Crosbie: Right on.

Mr. Nielsen: Tell the truth. Come clean.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to hear the Hon. Member quote those American figures indicating that interest rates are going to decline in the United States—

Mr. Crosbie: They are going to go up here.

Mr. Lalonde: —and yet refusing to recognize that if they decline in the United States there is every likelihood that they will decline also in Canada.

Mr. Crosbie: Why are we paying 12 per cent?

Mr. Lalonde: This is what the policy of this Government has been, to try to exploit all the room possible for manœuvring vis-à-vis U.S. interest rates. We have succeeded in reaching a point where our interest rates are at par with or in some cases below the United States. This is thanks to the policy this Government has followed, and we intend to follow that policy. Any decline in the U.S. rates that the Hon. Member has referred to will be followed in Canada, I am sure.

LOSSES SUFFERED BY APPLE GROWERS

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Beauharnois-Salaberry): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Hon. Minister of Finance.

On December 20, 1983, the Minister of Agriculture made payments to apple growers in Eastern Canada to compensate them for 50 per cent of the losses they had suffered as a result of freezing temperatures during the 1980-81 winter, through a special assistance program designed to help Quebec and Ontario apple growers who produce the best tasting apples in Canada if not the whole world.

Mr. Speaker, we had been led to believe that these payments would be non taxable. Apparently, there is now some confusion arising from the replies made by some Revenue Canada officials. I would like the minister to clear this confusion, so that apple growers may know where they stand as they are about to prepare their income tax returns for last year. Mr. Speaker, we hope also that the Quebec government will not try to get its cut.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to inform the Hon. Member that these compensation payments made to apple growers for losses resulting from frost a couple of years ago are not considered as income and are not to be included in the growers' taxable income.

The frost and the ensuing loss of apple trees have had the effect of lowering the value of these properties, so that the base for capital assessment of the said properties is lower. But as far as the compensation payments from the Canadian government are concerned, they are not added to the income of apple growers and are not taxable.

AUDITORS' PERSONNEL REVIEWS—REMOVAL OF REFERENCES TO GOALS

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. When questioned on Friday as to why personnel reviews in Revenue Canada are being amended without prior knowledge of the employees, the Minister passed it off by suggesting that I attend his Estimates Committee meeting. This is too important an issue to be passed to the bureaucracy so the Minister can escape his responsibility. Both I and the Canadian people want to know who gave the order that the personnel files of Revenue Canada auditors be examined and that all references to goals be removed from their work reviews?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to check the details mentioned in the Hon. Member's question. I wanted to do so this morning but unfortunately I did not have time.

AUTHORIZATION FOR ALTERATION OF RECORDS

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Mr. Speaker, I might be able to help the Minister. I have a personnel assessment of an auditor which was completed, signed, and receipted in August of 1983. On January 20, 1984, an amended form was forwarded to the employee, together with a covering memo which stated in part, "basically the change was an improvement over the original wording . . . something to do with an 'erroneous' reference to a set 'standard' rate".

I ask again: who gave the order to have these personnel records altered? Was it the Minister? Was it the Prime Minister? Was it the Deputy Minister? Who gave the order to remove all reference to "quotas" or to "set standard rates" for auditors? Come clean with the Canadian people.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have just indicated to the Hon. Member that I have to check the fact which he has just drawn to my attention. Considering my previous answer, he will understand that I cannot answer his second question.

PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION

OFFICE OF EQUAL OPPORTUNITIES FOR WOMEN

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for the status of women. The NDP is shocked to learn that the Office of Equal Opportunities for Women in the Public Service Commission is to be closed on April 1. This will mean 95,000 women clerks and secretaries in the Public Service will lose the one central office which acts as a watchdog for their concerns within government. Will the Minister confirm that the Government intends to shut down this important service for women on April 1?

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I, too, heard that rumour on Friday and was most alarmed, so I checked with the Public Service Commission and got a report on the situation. The Commission is attempting to add strength to its previous efforts by adopting new special measures and by examining the possibility of transferring the present functions of the Office of Equal Opportunities for Women into the operating branches of the Commission where more direct influence can be exerted on the operational processes such as recruitment, referral, counselling, and training, as well as in the policy-setting functions. However, there is no intention to close that office on April 1. There is a policy under way to re-examine how best the office can be strengthened within the new affirmative action program. I would like to add that the present regional equal opportunities offices functions are not under review at this time, will not be closed, and there will be no jobs lost in the procedure.

EQUAL PAY FOR EQUAL WORK

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, surely the Minister should know that the affirmative action program does not offer the extensive training, educational, counselling and advocacy functions of the present department. I would like to know her personal position on this. It does not seem to me that to put this within existing departments achieves the function it is supposed to achieve.

Does the Minister agree that the Office is particularly important in view of the recent Labour Canada report confirming that the federal Government is not enforcing equal pay for work of equal value guidelines? Will the Minister initiate action immediately to reduce the over $7,000 wage gap which still exists between men and women in the Public Service?

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted that the Member has brought the subject up because it debunks the popular myth that the moment equal pay for work of equal value legislation is brought in, the world will collapse and we cannot afford to do it. It is proof indeed that the legislation must first be in place and that those affected must seek to have the rules applied. I do insist that this kind of legislation be applied throughout the country and that those women most affected make sure that in their next labour contract the equal pay for work of equal value legislation be applied. I want to reiterate that only 10 per cent of the work force is covered by this legislation, 90 per cent comes under provincial jurisdiction, and I urge the women of this country to bring about such legislation within their provincial boundaries.

NATIONAL REVENUE

REPORT OF AUDITORS' CONTEST TO WIN $50 LUNCH

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. For the past three months he has refused to acknowledge that there is a malignant attitude existing in his Department. The most telling and striking example that I can think of was the one printed in The Globe and Mail last Saturday. A senior supervisory official, the Chief of Audit, sponsored a contest. The contestants were 20 groups of auditors comprising eight or nine auditors each. The prize was a $50 lunch. The standards imposed were a maximum recovery of tax dollars, maximum penalization of taxpayers, and how quickly the files could be processed. What this senior supervisor was really doing was putting a bounty on the taxpayers of Canada. Is the story as reported in The Globe and Mail accurate? Did such a memorandum exist? The context was that this was renewable every quarter. Is this $50 lunch still the practice of the Toronto Department?

Who paid for the lunch? Was it going to be the Chief of Audit or the Department? Does the Minister approve of such contests as illustrated in the story in The Globe and Mail?

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member should really ask only one question.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, in his first question, the Hon. Member asked whether the story reported in the press is accurate. It is not entirely accurate. Second, he asked how long the contest between a number of auditors went on. According to my information, it was suggested in August 1983 and it ended in December 1983. The Hon. Member also asked who paid for the prize awarded in the contest. No public funds were used. The Director of this group of auditors spent money out of his own pocket to reward the good work done by the auditing group he had to supervise.

[English]

Mr. Speyer: Mr. Speaker, the Minister has just substantially acknowledged the accuracy of the story. The story is absolutely the most disgraceful thing, because it puts a bounty on the taxpayers of Canada. This is the rule, not the exception, and that is what I want to get through to the Minister.

MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY—REPORTING STATUS OF DEPUTY MINISTER

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question has to do with ministerial responsibility. It has come to my attention that the Minister's predecessor, presently the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, had a conflict with his Deputy Minister. The conflict was in regard to whom the Deputy Minister reported to. Did he report to the Minister or to the Prime Minister of Canada through the Clerk of the Privy Council? I understand there was a memorandum of law composed by a Mr. William Rowe as a result of this dispute. Would the Minister inform me and other Members of the House whether, in matters of operation, the Deputy Minister reports to him or to the Prime Minister's Office? Will he table in the House the legal opinion with respect to the responsibilities of the Deputy Minister in the day-to-day operation of his Department?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, first, I believe the Hon. Member is aware of the practice that legal opinions formulated for a Minister are not tabled in the House. I think that, with his experience in the House of Commons, he should have known that.

Furthermore, I said the story reported in the press was not accurate. I would like to point out that two factors were considered by the Director who set up the contest. First of all, penalty points were given to auditors who kept taxpayers' files for review, in their offices, for more than sixty days. I fail to see how this could harm the interests of the taxpayer. On the contrary, the auditor was motivated to finish his work quickly and to return the file as soon as possible to the businesses concerned who would need the papers themselves.

I will give another example, and I hope the Hon. Member will listen carefully. The auditors were also given penalty points when correspondence sent to taxpayers did not meet the standards of excellence set by the supervisor. Here again, we see the same concern for providing taxpayers with a good and quick service and for treating taxpayers like human beings. This is the exact opposite of the twisted picture the Hon. Member has given of the activity initiated by an audit director.

LIST OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE RECIPIENTS RELEASED TO PETERBOROUGH SCHOOL PRINCIPALS

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, it was brought to my attention on the weekend that a list of the unemployed in the federal riding of Peterborough has been published and circulated to the principals of the eight high schools in my area. This list includes social insurance numbers, age, number of weeks on unemployment, number of weeks insurance was collected, along with addresses and names. The principals of high schools in my area, as a pilot test centre for Canada, have been asked to give back the lists of those people on the unemployment list.

I have here 11 sheets of a computer printout. These people are now being matched with the enrolments in the high schools in the Peterborough federal riding. Is this your policy? Did you, as Minister of Employment and Immigration, instigate this underhanded method of trying to disclose unethically the list of the unemployed in my federal riding of Peterborough?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I heard of these allegations to which the Hon. Member has referred for the first time this morning. The allegations concern me very much if they turn out to be entirely accurate. I have given instructions to my officials to ascertain exactly what the facts of the situation are, and to report to me as quickly as possible. At the moment I am not in a position to confirm, deny, or comment on the allegations to which the Hon. Member has referred. I can tell him that I have instructed my officials to ascertain the facts and report to me as quickly as possible. I can assure the hon. gentleman that I will be in touch with him as soon as I have that information.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Revenue which follows up on the question of the Hon. Member for Cambridge. Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the Opposition House Leader ought to know that the Deputy Minister reports to his Minister.

THE BUDGET—TAX PROVISIONS AFFECTING OIL COMPANIES

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance on behalf of taxpayers who do not earn enough income to pay taxes. My question pertains to the half billion dollar blank cheque he has given to the oil companies in the form of windfall tax relief. PGRT legislation is currently before the House which would give in the order of a one-quarter million dollar return. In the Minister's Budget we are also considering the IORT suspension again which this year is $190 million.

A few minutes ago the Minister said that a person would have to be a charlatan to say that something could be done to help the unemployed. When are we going to stop giving unconditional tax breaks to oil companies when there is no guarantee they will be passed through to consumers or that they will go into investments in Canada, and when the major multinational oil companies are the major beneficiaries and could just as well pass it through as dividends to their parent corporations, or invest it in the South China Sea? In short, when is the Minister going to start looking in the mirror and see that there are fair ways of dealing with people who need help in this economy?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member should realize that we are trying to allocate funds, either in the form of direct support by the Government or as incentives to the private sector to create as many jobs as quickly as we can. Coming from the West as he does, I do not think my friend will conclude that closing down the oil and gas industry in British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan is going to be of great support to the unemployed of the country. I would suggest to him that if we have an active and dynamic oil and gas industry it will have significant beneficial impact, not only in terms of job creation in the West but all over Canada. I am sure my friend, if he reflects upon it, will find that this is the case.

REQUEST THAT CONDITIONS BE ATTACHED TO TAX BREAKS

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, oil company profits went up 38 per cent this year to $1.2 billion. The Minister wants to give them another half billion dollars in order to improve their cash flow. Their cash flow went up 16 per cent to $3.8 billion in the first half of 1983.

The disgusting aspect of this is not that we are shutting it down; we are simply asking that he stop writing blank cheques and begin providing some conditions to any forfeiture to tax revenue, that they either be passed through to consumers or they make an investment in the area that will stimulate the economy, guarantee energy security, and provide some jobs for people in this country.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the industry does not invest and does not spend, it will have higher profits and it will pay taxes. Those taxes will come back to the federal Government and provincial Governments. Those moneys will be used to help Canadian citizens all across the country, and particularly help the unemployed.

PETITIONS

TABLING OF REPORTS OF CLERK OF PETITIONS

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the petition presented by the Hon. Member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Cosgrove) on Friday, February 17, 1984, meets the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

The petition presented by the Hon. Member for Humboldt-Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse) on Friday, February 17, 1984, does not meet the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

AGRICULTURE

BRITISH COLUMBIA APPLES

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The Hon. Member for Beauharnois-Salaberry (Mr. Laniel) perhaps unconsciously misled the House in his earlier submission. He indicated that apples grown in Ontario and Quebec are the best apples in Canada but that can only be true if British Columbia and the Okanagan are no longer in Canada. By last count they are still part of Canada. We all know that they have the best apples in the world.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NIELSEN—REPORTED INVESTIGATION OF LEADER OF OPPOSITION—RULING BY MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: I am now prepared to rule on the question of privilege raised by the Hon. Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) on February 15.

Any attempt to intimidate a Member with a view to influencing his parliamentary conduct is a breach of privilege. It is a fundamental principle of parliamentary law. If a Member is subjected to threats and intimidation, he or she is clearly hindered in the fulfilment of the parliamentary duties for which he or she was elected.

The Hon. Member for Yukon in his lengthy presentation covered a great deal of ground in relation to this principle. One statement which he made at page 1418 of Hansard, with which the Chair fully agrees, was as follows:

> For a breach of privilege to be established, it must be established that the Government attempted to intimidate or obstruct the Leader of the Opposition by threatening to release information about his conduct in his role as a private citizen.

He then went on to say, that "intimidation was the Government's intention". However, this statement reflects the Hon. Member's own judgment and he presumably does not claim it as a proven fact. The Chair has to decide, on the basis of the facts presented, whether there is enough evidence to substantiate a prima facie basis to this assertion.

The presentation of the Hon. Member for Yukon creates certain difficulties for the Chair. On the one hand, he is raising a question of privilege on behalf of his colleague, the Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney). However, in elaborating the case, the Hon. Member for Yukon seemed to be complaining that all members of the Opposition were working under the shadow of threats and intimidation. He alleged that "Members of the House can no longer rise in the House to ask questions of the Ministry without fear of reprisals for their actions". He referred to incidents not directly related to the question of privilege he was raising, such as an incident arising on January 24 involving the Hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde). He claimed that the question of privilege arose out of the exchanges during the Question Period, although the presentation ranged beyond the principal issue which was raised during the Question Period, namely the collection of information concerning the Hon. Leader of the Opposition. A great deal of preparation had clearly gone into the Hon. Member's submission.

The Hon. Member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) stated during his intervention that there was no dispute about the facts. What was in question was the interpretation. I believe that this accurately sums up the situation. The Chair must consider the facts which are before it.

What we do know for certain is that among the files maintained in the Prime Minister's Office is one concerning the Hon. Leader of the Opposition. We know that certain employees of the Prime Minister's Office have collected information concerning the Hon. the Leader of the Opposition which is in the public domain. This information, as far as can be determined, is freely available to anybody prepared to go to the trouble and expense of seeking it. There is no evidence that the file on the Hon. the Leader of the Opposition contains anything other than press clippings and other information available to the public. There is no evidence that anything on the file was illegally obtained or that it was the kind of information to which public access would be restricted.

Another fact before us is a newspaper article published in The Globe and Mail on February 15 which made certain allegations which can be summed up in the opening paragraph:

> The Prime Minister's Office employed two people at taxpayers' expense for covert intelligence gathering aimed at finding embarrassing information on the business background of Conservative Leader Brian Mulroney.

A number of questions were based upon this article and the allegations were unequivocally denied by the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) when answering those questions. Because of the seriousness of this matter I think I should quote from some of these answers.

In answer to a question by the Right Hon. Member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark) alleging that a covert operation had been mounted by officials of the Prime Minister's Office, the Hon. Deputy Prime Minister said as reported at page 1408 of Hansard:

> That is quite untrue, and quite false. There was no such covert intelligence operation conducted by the Prime Minister's Office into the conduct of the Leader of the Opposition and into his background before he entered public life. There was no such covert operation, and I deny it completely.

In answer to a question by the Hon. Member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), the Hon. Deputy Prime Minister said at page 1409 of Hansard:

> There was no investigation into the personal conduct, nor would I condone if it were ever brought to my attention any such investigation into the conduct of the Leader of the Opposition.

Answering a question from the Hon. Member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), he said at page 1410 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, on the first point I want to assure the Leader of the NDP that this particular research exercise had nothing to do with the private life of the Leader of the Opposition.

In answer to a question from the Hon. Member for Rosedale, he said at page 1411 of Hansard:

> I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I would condemn as being totally without justification any such investigation by the Government into the private life of any Member of Parliament. That is for the police if they want to do it, but not for us.

And finally, in answer to the Hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer), he stated at page 1413 of Hansard:

> There is no investigation whatsoever into the personal lives of Members of Parliament.

We therefore have a situation where a newspaper has made certain allegations and a member of the Government has categorically denied them. This is hardly the basis for a question of privilege. We are bound to take the word of the Hon. Deputy Prime Minister that there is no foundation to the allegations made.

I would refer the House to Citation 19(1) in Beauchesne's Fifth Edition:

> A dispute arising between two members, as to allegations of facts, does not fulfill the conditions of parliamentary privilege.

Finally, I would emphasize the the essence of a breach of privilege of the kind alleged by the Hon. Member for Yukon lies in the obstruction or hindrance suffered by a Member of Parliament in the fulfilment of his duties. There has been no evidence of any such impediment in any of the exchanges which have taken place in this House. Members have freely made statements, asked questions, expressed their views and attacked the Government without any inhibitions. As I said in the course of an earlier ruling, we have seen Parliament in the full exercise of its privileges.

On the basis of the evidence before it, the Chair is unable to find that a prima facie case of privilege has been established.

MR. COOPER—ALLEGED INTIMIDATION BY CANADA POST OFFICIAL—RULING BY MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: I am now ready to rule on the question of privilege raised by the Hon. Member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper) on February 6. Before doing so, may I appeal to all Hon. Members, when giving notice of a question of privilege, to assist the Chair by indicating in the notice the nature of the complaint they wish to raise.

I should first like to state a general principle which is a key factor in this case. There is no question that any attempt to threaten, intimidate or bribe a Member with a view to influencing his or her conduct in the House or in one of its committees is a breach of privilege. This is so fundamental that it hardly seems necessary to quote from the authorities. However, in support of this principle I would refer to pages 156 to 158 of Erskine May's Twentieth Edition and to Citations 67 and 74 of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition.

The Hon. Member in his submission stated that an official of Canada Post Corporation telephoned his office and, in a conversation with a member of his staff, attempted to influence his actions in the House of Commons by way of threats and insults. Specifically the Hon. Member asserted that the official threatened to withhold co-operation concerning the operations of the Corporation unless questions to be asked in the House concerning the Corporation were first cleared with the President's office. As reported at page 1103 of Hansard, the Hon. Member said, inter alia:

I was very definitely offered an advantage if I behaved in a manner acceptable to Canada Post and conversely threatened with a disadvantage if my office failed to co-operate.

● (1510)

A threat emanating from any government department or public corporation to withhold information or co-operation from a Member of Parliament would undoubtedly hinder that Member in the fulfilment of his or her parliamentary duties and therefore constitute a breach of privilege. By the same token, an offer of favourable treatment on condition that questions are first cleared with the office concerned would also violate privilege in an equally fundamental way.

The Hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Ouellet) undertook to investigate the incident and on February 9 reported to the House that there was no foundation to the allegations of the Hon. Member for Peace River. He asserted that the Hon. Member's complaint was based on hearsay and stated:

I have personally been in communication with this officer and have been assured that at no time during the conversation were any threats made which could have conceivably inhibited the Hon. Member from performing his role as a spokesman of the Official Opposition or which could deny co-operation from Canada Post.

On February 14 the Hon. Member for Peace River, replying to the statement made by the Hon. Minister of Labour on February 9, reiterated the facts as he had stated them on February 6. We are therefore faced with a conflict of opinion as to what actually happened.

Before dealing further with this conflict as to facts, I should like to deal with the hearsay aspect of this question. On September 4, 1973, the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) complained that police officers had entered her office in her absence and interrogated her staff without her permission. The Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands was not in her office at the time, yet the Chair found that a prima facie case of privilege existed and the matter was referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. The committee concluded in its report of September 21, 1973 that the question of privilege was well founded. It is therefore the view of the Chair that an action which amounts to a form of intimidation does not need to be directed at the Member in person in order to constitute an offence in terms of privilege. As the Hon. Member pointed out in his submission, and as stated at page 158 of Erskine May's Twentieth Edition:

Conduct not amounting to a direct attempt to influence a Member in the discharge of his duties, but having a tendency to impair his independence in the future performance of his duty, will also be treated as a breach of privilege.

We all know that the word of an Hon. Member may not be questioned. Therefore, the Chair accepts that both the Hon. Member for Peace River and the Hon. Minister of Labour are stating the facts as they honestly believe them to be. As the Hon. Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) quite rightly pointed out, it is not for the Chair to pronounce on which of the versions as to what occurred is the correct one. However, in a case where an Hon. Member claims that his ability to function is being undermined, the Chair must take full account of the evidence presented, in this case the categorical assurance of the Hon. Member for Peace River that the events took place as he related them. The circumstances leave the Chair with no choice but to find that a prima facie question of privilege has been established so that the House can determine whether or not the matter should be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for investigation. The Committee would have the opportunity of examining all parties involved in this matter and reporting its findings to the House.

I suggest that this is the only course which would enable the House to determine exactly what happened. I therefore call on the Hon. Member for Peace River to move his motion.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, first may I thank you for your ruling.

I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That the matters raised as a question of privilege on February 6, 1984 by the Hon. Member for Peace River and the responses made thereto by the Minister of Labour on February 9, 1984 be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections and that the committee submit its report not later than June 25, 1984.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has reservations about the condition concerning the time when a report is to be made. The Chair has a motion before it. The Chair has no difficulty accepting the motion, but the condition attached to it to the effect that the Committee submit its report not later than June 25 does raise a question in the mind of the Chair. If the Hon. Member will delete that portion of the motion, the Chair will find it in order.

Mr. Cooper: I am prepared to delete that, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I understand the reservations the Chair has. Perhaps the reference to the date of limitation could be deleted, leaving the requirement to report.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, on the same point, the Hon. Member is free to move the motion he wants. We are free to support it or not. If he wants to withdraw what he has moved, he needs unanimous consent, with respect, Mr. Speaker. Therefore, I would like to know whether it is in order to move in a motion that there is a limit for debate of a report. That I would like to know. Maybe you would want to take this matter under advisement and report tomorrow. If not, Mr. Speaker, we will have no other choice but to vote against the motion.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has not accepted the motion as presented. Therefore, the Hon. Member does not have anything to withdraw. The Chair did not accept the motion in the form in which it was presented. The Chair invited the Hon. Member to present a motion. The form in which it was presented originally was not acceptable to the Chair. Now the Hon. Member is presenting a motion in a form that will be acceptable by a change of wording. The motion will now be as follows:

That the matters raised as a question of privilege on February 5, 1984 by the Hon. Member for Peace River and the responses made thereto by the Minister of Labour on February 9, 1984 be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for report.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the Members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Cooper) which was negatived on the following division:

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Thursday, February 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the Government; and the amendment of Mr. Crosbie p. 1445; and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Riis p. 1448.

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Mr. Speaker, any budget is important and, therefore, any budget debate is important. I believe this Budget is particularly so, Mr. Speaker, because it indicates the Government's intentions in a pre-election period. One would have thought that with the kind of country we have, the opportunities, the natural resources, and the kind of people, the Budget would be a chance for the Government to show some direction, leadership and hope for the future of this country. We did not really see any of that in this Budget.

It is interesting to note, and rather sad, that the lack of response to the new Budget sits well with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde). I quote from an article in The Globe and Mail of February 17:

> Finance Minister Marc Lalonde says his new budget is not having any effect on the Canadian economy—and that that makes him happy.

I find that an incredible statement. What it indicates, Mr. Speaker, is that it does not bother him that there is a million and a half people unemployed and that the unemployment rate for young people is 20 per cent. When we have this kind of economy, it is sad for a Finance Minister to come forward with a Budget which shows no response to the plight of the economic community in this country, and to say that suits him fine has to be literally a disgrace, Mr. Speaker.

I see the former Minister of Transport is in the House. He is a very fine gentleman for whom I have a lot of respect. I am sure he has the respect of all Hon. Members. I see him shaking his head, but I am sure, as an economist, he would have to agree with me when I ask the question: Given the kind of situation we have in the country today, if the Minister of Finance must come forward with a Budget which actually does nothing, why would he come forward with a Budget at all? I suppose it is politics. It is almost axiomatic that you must put the best light on everything. Had the Minister of Finance been responsible for the sinking of the Titanic, I wonder if he would have responded by saying: "I am glad to see that the law of gravity still works". I feel that is the kind of attitude of this Government.

I do not like being critical all the time, Mr. Speaker, but I will make one other point which concerns me and the farming community. That is the way Section 31 of the Income Tax Act is applied, the so-called hobby farmers section. This affects the people who work off the farm and use the income earned against expenses incurred on the farm. They are allowed to deduct $5,000 of their income against expenses incurred on the farm. That has been causing a lot of problems in the farming community. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has been concerned about this. He spoke recently at the annual meeting of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture in Edmonton and this is what he is quoted as saying regarding Section 31. He said: "It should either be drastically changed or preferably wiped off the books. I think the law is obsolete". A lot of us would agree with that. However, this man happens to be in Cabinet and we wonder, if he agrees with us that this section needs to be changed and says it is obsolete, why can he not do something about it? He happens to be in the Cabinet. He said: "I would rather see part-time farmers than absentee landlords". I agree with him totally, no question about that. But what does he do? Nothing. He reminds me, Mr. Speaker, of an old gomer bull in a pasture. There is a lot of ranting and raring and roaring and pawing the ground, but when it comes to getting the job done he is absolutely useless. That is what a lot of us realize when we look at what is in the Budget for agriculture, and it makes us sad.

Let me point out a few things I think were useful in the Budget and try to put them in context. There are some good things relating to simplifying paper work for small business. No question that that needs to be done. Unfortunately, we need more than simply a study. What are we getting here? More paper work. Surely we are entitled to have some action rather than just 75 or 80 pages of additional paper. We are not so much unhappy with some of the things in the Budget; it is the fact that they are all going to be studied.

However, a step in the right direction is the fact that the Government recognized the problems with capital gains taxes on farm land. Unfortunately, I am not so sure it goes far enough, but it is something worthwhile. There are some useful things on pension reform in the Budget, but again it is simply going to be studied.

For the rest of my time, Mr. Speaker, I want to talk a little bit about Canadian agriculture, a very important sector of the Canadian economy. I will give you some figures which will hopefully point out the validity of what I just said. If you include all the various sectors of agriculture, it accounts for one-sixth of all the economic activity in the country and 18 per cent of the work force. If you break it down further, a little over 4 per cent of Canada's population is engaged directly in farming. That gives you an idea of how efficient Canadian agriculture has become over the past number of years.

In nine of the ten provinces agriculture ranks in the top three contributors to gross provincial product. In 1982, the last year for which figures are complete and available, agricultural exports were approximately $9.5 billion, including over $6 billion from the sale of grain. At least 50 cents out of each dollar of Canadian farm income comes from exports. If you break out the prairie provinces, something like 60 per cent of grains produced on the Prairies are exported.

To break it down further, in Saskatchewan almost 80 per cent of the farm income is from cash crops, most of which are exported. If you understand simple figures, Mr. Speaker, that should tell you agriculture is a very important part of the economy. Yet there is hardly anything of any substance in the Budget with regard to agriculture. I have to wonder why. Is it because our present Minister of Agriculture does not understand, care or have any clout in Cabinet? The simple fact is that nothing is happening as far as agriculture in the Budget is concerned. That does not mean there are no problems in agriculture. Agriculture is facing basically the same kind of problems as far as economic activity is concerned as any other part of the economy.

I would like to point out another example which disturbs a lot of us. Over the past summer there was a major economic initiative as far as agriculture is concerned in Bill C-155, commonly known as the Crow Bill. Yet it was largely carried by the Department of Transport. The Department of Agriculture had very little input into what went on. I find that incredible in terms of the importance the Bill had with regard to Canadian agriculture.

I see the former Minister of Transport shaking his head. I have to disagree with him. I sat on the committee all summer. I think I missed two or three out of 66 committee meetings. The evidence presented by the Department of Agriculture was very minimal as far as I could see. I find that very sad because Bill C-155 is going to have major effects on agriculture. It was in fact an agricultural initiative. A case could be made, Mr. Speaker, that it could almost have been a Bill shepherded through the House by the Minister of Agriculture. Yet as far as we who attended the committee meetings could see, there was very little input from the Department of Agriculture. It is a sad state of affairs.

Mr. Pepin: There is a difference between the preparation of a Bill and its passage through the House and committee.

Mr. Mayer: I would like to make some points about some of the things the Government could have put in the Budget which would not have cost a lot of dollars. The Government likes to berate the Opposition, saying that we want to have increased Government programs and at the same time cut down on the deficit. That is sometimes the case. However, I would like to point out some areas in which the Government could have moved which would not have cost the Treasury very many dollars, and in some cases no dollars at all.

Before I do that, I would like to make one brief point. The Government berates the Opposition, saying that the cutting we would do would be in the area of social programming. That is not the case at all. One of the best social programs you can have in the country is simply a job. People that have jobs are not in need of a lot of social programs. From my experience with people who have been unfortunate enough not to have jobs, I believe they would much sooner have a job than rely on government for social assistance. Anything that this Government can do to create jobs in the country by implication negates the need for social programs. If we are ever given a chance to form the Government of the country, Mr. Speaker, one of our first emphases will be on jobs. One of the best ways to attack the need for social assistance in the country is to provide people with jobs.

I would like to return to what the Government could have done with regard to agriculture. I pointed out that a large portion of Canadian farm income is earned through exports. That means that if we are going to become competitive we have to have input prices very similar to the United States, which is our biggest competitor. The U.S. is our very close neighbour and ally, but it is also our competitor when it comes to world markets for agricultural products. For almost six years the border has been closed to the importation of farm chemicals. It is my understanding that there is still quite a difference in price between farm chemicals available across the line in the United States and the ones in Canada.

The Government could have considered opening the borders to give Canadian farmers access to less expensive chemicals. This cannot be done now in the spring of the year when a lot of people in the farm chemical business have laid in supplies which are more expensive than similar American products. However, there is a time of the year—I suggest the fall or the early new year—when the Government could consider opening up the border and it would not cost it anything as far as expenditures are concerned. I am told that the reason the border was closed in the first place was to allow Canadian manufacturers and suppliers to gear up production so they could compete with suppliers from other parts of the world. Surely six years is long enough. I had the opportunity to talk to some people in the farm chemical business. They agree that it would help everyone if there was an open border to farm chemicals.

Let me talk about farm fuel because we have heard several concerns raised about its high cost. Although it is difficult to determine the exact figure, approximately 25 per cent to 30 per cent of the cost of farm fuel in this country is associated with federal tax. This is a high cost to farmers. When one considers the overall amount of fuel used in a farming operation, approximately 25 per cent of total farm costs are associated with energy. This shows how significant energy costs are to such an operation. This is an area where the federal Government takes an excessive amount of tax.

Government members opposite will say that if the taxation is reduced the deficit will increase. Let me point out that farmers and fishermen are allowed a seven cents per gallon or one and a half cents per litre rebate. They pay the tax and then apply for the rebate. If the Minister of Finance was serious about doing something, he could have implemented a system whereby, instead of applying for the rebate, farmers and fishermen could swear a type of affidavit indicating that the fuel they purchased would be used only for those purposes that would permit a refund. While this would not have amounted to a net reduction in the amount of tax that farmers pay, it would have removed that seven cents a gallon tax when they bought their fuel initially.

Farmers and fishermen find it very annoying and cumbersome to apply for refunds. This procedure is typical of how the Revenue Department is operating currently. I have had occasion in our farming operation to have conversations with auditors and others in the Revenue Department. They want all kinds of invoices and additional information that I do not believe is necessary. Many people simply give up and do not apply for the refund, which means that there is taxation by default.

If the Government had taken its Budget seriously it could have considered not collecting the seven cents a gallon initially and doing away with the refund. It would save the Government money in administration and save farmers some initial costs. When there are problems with bankruptcies and fuel dealers having to collect their bills, this would be seven cents a gallon less that they would have to worry about collecting. This would have been beneficial to everyone but it makes too much common sense to the Government to consider it.

The Hon. Member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson) is shouting something at me from the back row. If he would listen I think he would agree that what I say makes common sense. I hope he would talk to his Minister of Finance and his Parliamentary Secretary, who are not here, unfortunately, to see if they would consider some of these ideas. If they did so perhaps people would have more respect for the Government. It makes common sense in terms of how the Government administers its affairs and would cut down on the amount of paper work for the Revenue Department. It would decrease the amount of the contact between the Department of Revenue and taxpayers. It would help farmers and fishermen in terms of their initial outlay.

Let me talk about the agri-bond concept. Financing is a very important part of agriculture today. I believe there is room for the Farm Credit Corporation to operate similar to how CMHC used to operate. It could act as a re-insurer, as a go between the buyer and the seller, take 1 per cent or 2 per cent as a mark-up, and guarantee the loan. That would significantly help in finding capital to put new farmers on the land.

I could also talk about advance payments legislation. We have encouraged the Government for some time to increase the amount of advanced payments available under legislation. In many ways it costs the Government a minimal amount of money. It is a program that has worked well and it would put cash into the farmers' hands sooner than normal.

In conclusion, I would simply urge the Government to proceed as quickly as possible with the red meat stabilization program in this country. Four provinces have agreed to it in principle. In fact, many people are saying that the federal Government has lost its leadership in this area. If the Government were to show some interest and pursue this program, I believe the balkanization that is taking place in the red meat industry in this country could be stopped by having a national, uniform program for stabilization from coast to coast. Unfortunately, as a result of the lack of direction shown by the Government, its Budget does not take that into account. The Budget is very unfortunate for a country that has so much potential and a promising future. I will have no trouble at all in not supporting the Budget and voting against it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): A ten-minute period is now allowed for comments or questions relating to the Hon. Member's speech. Debate. The Hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin).

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, job creation was a major concern of the Hon. Members who spoke previously, as it was in the Budget, and rightly so, since it is the main concern of all Canadians.

[English]

Besides job creation and in parallel, I think it is very urgent for Canadians to start addressing, not just debating, the question of pensions. We do so as well in the Budget.

Let me explain, if I may. First, public pensions. I think it is important for everyone in Canada to know once and for all, although some other improvements are possible, that the basis for public pensions in Canada is now established to my great pleasure by the Government in this Budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde). It means single pensioners, three-quarters of them being women, who receive the supplement, even if they receive a small part of the supplement, are people in need. We do not like to say it and we do not even like to admit it, but they are really people in need. That replaces the much smaller, wealthier group which the provinces would be paying for. When a person reaches 65 years of age one becomes a pensioner. If that person is in need, he or she gets help through the federal Government and through what is called the supplement.

All single pensioners under the supplement will now receive $50 more per month from now until Christmas on top of the three cost of living increases which they will receive every three months as usual. That boost will bring pensioners up over a decent line of income in order to protect them once and for all. In other words, we will have two increases of $25 more a month. The first one will be in July and the other one in December, on top of the usual indexation to the cost of living. That money will go to roughly 750,000 Canadian pensioners, single, alone, most of whom are women. Since it will lift the level of income over which people qualify for help, it will bring in about 25,000 new pensioners who will start to qualify for some modest supplement to help them fill the gap in their other income. I think this is extremely good news.

On top of that, I will introduce in the House in the spring this year, in the same Bill probably, something to help immigrant seniors. We changed pensions for immigrants in 1977 to make things more equitable. Before it was all or nothing for them. We observed that we may face some disparities in the future. We now have a fair system. By this new amendment we will make it not only fair but practical. All immigrant seniors, even if they are in Canada for a short period of time only, can be assured by this Budget that now they will be on the same basis as all Canadian pensioners. That is what this Bill I will be introducing will do. I think it is very good news and is why I was able to state at the beginning of my speech that I think public pensions will be okay in Canada for a long time to come. They are indexed to the cost of living and will continue to keep their real value. That is very good news as well.

Also we announced in the Budget and in summary booklets, as well as in the technical explanation, that we want to see pension reform started in Canada. What do we mean by that? I think it is the key dossier. We are now talking about medicare. I do not want to presume but we will pass—and the Parties have promised it—the new Canada Health Act. Therefore Canadians will not be required to pay extras when they are sick, must go to a doctor or to hospital. That will be so for years to come, for decades to come.

But what is the next important issue which we in Canada will have to discuss, to address and to solve in the area of social affairs? I would submit that it would be the dossier on private pension plans. There are people in the galleries who are from Ottawa and perhaps other parts of Canada. There are people listening to the debate in the House of Commons. They hear what the politicians are discussing. Some of these people are employed by companies, be they public or private, municipal governments, small private companies or large multinationals. They are people either with or without pension plans. They may be people with good pension plans or bad ones.

The reality in Canada today which we have to face is that 55 per cent of Canadian workers or the majority—and I am just talking about workers on payrolls—do not have company pension plans; they do not have private pension plans. If they were unable—and I guess that includes the majority of Canadians—to build little private pension plans for themselves, to put some savings aside or to buy homes, at age 65 they will experience a sudden drop in income of at least $10,000 on average. They have been paid better wages, they reach the age of retirement and their income will drop very abruptly to that of the public pension.

We are lucky to have a universal public pension. Only two countries in the world have it—Sweden and Canada. Once public pensions are fixed and are good for everyone, it is important to ensure that the vast majority of Canadians, the middle class, do not lose through a sudden disruption in income the good standard of living which they have been able to build for themselves over the years. That is what the Government is addressing in the Budget which the Minister of Finance presented on Wednesday of last week.

We are addressing pension reform. We have only started. We could have been bolder, but as Canadians agree we should try to develop jobs first and then slowly build in good pensions for the future. We have started first with the Canada Pension Plan because it is our direct responsibility. At the same time we will negotiate with the provinces in order that they confirm their agreement. I understand they have given indications to that effect. We propose that better pension rights should be given to homemakers or survivors at home. This means that we propose compulsory credit sharing on marriage breakdown, unless both spouses agree to forgo that right. Otherwise it will become the rule of the game. When both people have reached age 65, the credits will be automatically split between them and those who remarry will not lose their survivor's benefits. That is excellent news for women in particular as well as for many Canadians.

Then we will propose a series of amendments—and I think this will be done by the Minister of Finance later this spring—to a federal piece of legislation called the Pension Benefit Standards Act. This is not the time to get into the technicalities; they will be discussed with all Hon. Members in due time, when the Bill is presented. However, in a nutshell the amendments to this federal legislation will make ideal, if I may say, the pensions of Canadians whose jobs fall under the federal Government. For example, I am referring to people in banks, in transportation companies, in broadcasting and communications companies, et cetera.

These pensions will be ideal because we will make it mandatory that they have perfect portability when people change jobs. They will have survivor's benefit pensions at 60 per cent of the pension of the working spouse and they will have a measure of protection against inflation, vesting after two years of work. It belongs to the worker and follows the worker through various jobs in his working life.

Then there will be the division of pension credits on marriage breakdown in order to be more fair to the two spouses who, after all, helped build the pension. And, at long last, we will eliminate the infamous sex discrimination in the actuarial tables. In other words, we will have unisex tables to calculate the benefits of women so that they will be identical to those offered to working men.

I admit that this is both very good and very limited. It gives to people working under federal jurisdiction ideal pensions. This is our job and our responsibility as the federal Government. We will honour it and do it. But how can we equip millions of other Canadian workers who do not have private pensions in the first place with pensions? That is the biggest challenge of the eighties. I think it is fair to say—and I see Hon. Members on both sides of the House nodding in approval—that this will be the major challenge in the social welfare field for years to come. It will not be done overnight.

We have offered all people of Canada a course of action. We will make—and again it is directly under our jurisdiction—the federal tax system the best possible and most attractive one for Canadians to have opportunity to build for themselves private pension plans. They usually do this through RRSPs. We are now heating about them all over the place because everyone is advertising that they should be purchased before the end of February. We will make them even more attractive, and the Minister of Finance will table a Bill later this spring which will create another possible plan, RPAs. These plans will be locked in. This means that the funds cannot be withdrawn before retirement. They are locked-in bank accounts which produce interest and give tax benefits—let us call it by its name—to attract people into building their own pension plans.

Will that be enough? I do not think it will but we have to start on that route. It will probably not be enough because we will have to see—and I cannot prejudge the future—if the backbone of the Canadian economy, namely small businesses, pick it up. One feature which will make it very attractive is that another person will be able to contribute in the name of a worker. This means a small private company can choose to open RRSP-RPAS in the names of its employees. We will have to see if it works and if it is picked up by Canadians. Then we will judge how to proceed for all other Canadians workers who do not have a pension.

How do we have a company pension for everybody? How did it happen in other countries? It is difficult to use the United States as a comparison because the situation there is a bit like Canada with the majority of workers not having a pension in the first place. At age 65 they receive a public pension from the state, which is a bit unsatisfactory. People are not ready for a major disruption in their income, nor do they want it. How do we ensure that we get to the situation where the Europeans are, for example?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, since 1979 I have asked a lot of questions about pensions, a subject I deal with constantly as Minister of National Health and Welfare. It is a fact that European countries have had proper pension funds since the last World War. After experiencing the horrors of two world wars, the unions—Europeans being more extensively unionized than Canadian workers—immediately decided that pensions would be their first priority in negotiations with employers. Pension funds were set up for all workers in all European countries. Once this had become general practice and 90 per cent of the workers, as was the case in France, had company pensions, the Government decided to make pensions compulsory by law. As a result, the 10 per cent who did not have a pension fund got one right away, so that everyone was covered by private pension plans. I do not think we can take the same approach in Canada, since in this country, the majority of workers are not unionized and because—and I am not saying this to criticize, because the unions fully support the development of pension plans—our unions did not see pension plans as their first priority in the bargaining process. I think it is fair to say they worked hard to get very good cost-of-living indexing. In other words, they opted for immediate returns instead of longer term gain. We have now reached the point that, as a country, we have to ask ourselves what we are going to do. The issue must be discussed with the provinces who play a key role, and together we must decide what the best approach is and how many years it will take to provide all Canadian workers with a good pension.

[English]

How are we going to do that? I think it is fair to say that people usually talk only about two avenues, even though there are more than two. There are groups that say they are all for the private sector, let the private sector do it. We will see. The private sector is getting one more chance with these good tax offers. They can start developing plans for their employees, particularly those in small business. Otherwise, it will have to be mandatory for all Canadians, of course with the agreement of the provinces which have the jurisdiction.

We could go the route of the CPP or anything else around the CPP. Over the years we could double or enormously increase the CPP. The great advantage is that it will provide benefits a few years after the law is passed. If you go the private sector route, you have to wait for the plans to mature, which involves a time frame of 25 to 30 years. Canadians must know that. There is nothing good or bad about one over the other. However, people need good private pension plans.

There is another route I would offer Canadians for consideration. Where a company has a good pension, that company could get the approval of government and carry on with it. Only those who do not have a private pension plan would have to go the route of an enlarged CPP or whatever.

I see that my time is up. I would simply like to bring the pension reform in the Budget to the attention of Canadians because we cannot do like l'autruche, la tête dans le sable. We must face that challenge and find and answer à la Canadienne for all of us.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin). It concerns the measures that she has been speaking about on pension reform. I have in my hand the Throne Speech of April 14, 1980, four years ago. It says this at page 5 of Hansard for that year:

> Work must begin immediately to design better methods of providing flexible, portable, and secure pensions both in the private and public sectors. To start this process, my Government will soon release a major study on the Canadian pension system.

That was four years ago; four years in which people have not seen that system come forward; four years in which the Minister and her colleagues promised to begin that work immediately. Why have we had to wait until this time in the life of a government to see even the most modest, as the Minister admitted, restrictive and limited measures with regard to pension reform? Why after four years of neglect is the Minister able to stand there and say this is what we are going to do? Why the four-year wait?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, the answer is extremely simple. Let me rapidly explain to the Hon. Member. There are two main reasons. First, I again assumed this portfolio on March 3, 1980 after we once more formed the Government. In March, 1981 we had the first national conference on pension reform. That was organized with all the parties, including all governments, the private sector, volunteers, seniors and the academes. That was a fantastic realization. It brought into the open the problem which experts had been studying behind the scenes.

In December, 1982 we brought forward the green paper, co-signed by the Minister of Finance and myself, launching a parliamentary task force to make a study and recommendations. The report was received just a few months ago, two months ago, I believe, and the first measure appeared in the Budget. That is the first concrete measure that will change people's lives.

There are two things the Hon. Member does not understand. I do not think there is anything wrong with my saying that there is massive private interest in that dossier, in the vicinity of $60 billion. That is what we are talking about. I do not know if the Hon. Member, who was not long in government, knows what that means. How do you move an elephant of $60 billion and more with private interests when we want to provide equitable coverage for everyone? That is part of the problem—it is as simple as that—with the huge lobby that ordinary Canadians workers do not easily have to countermatch.

The other problem is the recession. How can the Hon. Member ask us to jump on the pension bandwagon when Canadians need jobs first? The answer is very easy. We are working without interruption and at the same time at a wise pace doing the work to achieve pension reform and the work that is needed to pick it up faster when the recession is fully behind us.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, the Minister mentioned the proposal in the Throne Speech for vesting a pension plan after two years. I assume that the Government has done actuarial studies to show the viability of that proposal and, if so, I hope she will table them at the earliest possible time so that we can understand how sound the proposal is. Attractive as it may be, let us see how financially sound it is.

The Minister also mentioned pensions for immigrants. I take it they will be paid for out of the Consolidated Revenue Account. There is a group of immigrants who have been waiting for reform in their pension scheme under the agreement with the United Kingdom, and those Canadian citizens who have been pensioned in the U.K. but whose pensions have not kept up because of the inflationary difference between the U.K. and Canada. Those people are suffering as a result.

If it is the intention of the Government to pay pensions out of general revenue for a group of people in Canada who have not qualified previously, and since there does not seem to be the possibility for an early agreement with the United Kingdom on this matter, if the Government can do this for one group of people, why can it not update the pension agreement and pay for it out of general revenue?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I think the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) who spoke earlier should see in the comments of her colleague, the Hon. Member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen), exactly the kind of representation we receive on pension reform. I feel like saying to the Hon. Member, just let me ask him one question in return: Is he for or against pension reform?

When people start asking is it sound, and have we done the actuarial work, we all know what that means; it means that they do not believe in it. They want all the tables to prove that it is sound to give a pension to every Canadian worker. We are not sure that it is sound. Of course, we have a good pension. For the others, however, we are not sure it is sound because if it were sound it would have been done. With reasoning like that, 55 per cent of Canadian workers still do not have a pension.

I have not said it is an insurance, as the Hon. Member remarked. I said that we are going to open up even more tax opportunities for Canadians to pick it up. That is the last chance of the private sector to do its homework and take its responsibilities. It probably went with all the good big pension plans and made good profits. It is a business and that is fine, but it should do its job and be more inventive and show a bit of imagination for Canadians in other kinds of companies, such as small business which is the backbone of our economy.

The Hon. Member referred to pensions for immigrants but from the way he spoke I think he is not familiar with the way this works. He should know that immigrants to Canada get a pension according to the number of years they have been here, with a basic 10 years. That goes to British or any other immigrants. The only thing that will be improved is that those who would be below the poverty line because they do not have enough years will be assured of the minimum that any Canadian receives. In other words, although that has nothing to do with the British pension, it will go to British pensioners if they are very, very poor.

The British pension system is a dossier on which I have been working for six years without much success yet. Both the Labour government and Conservative government in Great Britain up to now have not agreed to index their pensions. I think they owe it to the British pensioners wherever they are in life or geographically because they have already paid for it through income taxes. Every chance that I have or that Hon. Members have—and I must say that has been done very well in Canada—to press upon Great Britain the urgency of giving their own pensioners indexation of their own pensions is appreciated and much needed. I am confident that we will succeed and that some unblocking of the dossier will take place.

I think pressure is needed to make the British Government understand that this is not a privilege but a right, in the sense that these British pensioners living in Canada have paid for an indexed pension. Therefore where is the indexation of their pension?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order! The Hon. Member for Laval.

I must point out that there is only about one minute left for questions and comments.

Mr. Roy: Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief. I am particularly concerned about the portability of pension plans within the private sector. I would like to ask the Minister how the portability of pension plans within the private sector was received by employers at the hearings conducted by the Committee throughout the province. What was the attitude towards the portability of pension plans in the private sector?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, although I do not have a summary of the hearings before me, I can inform the Member for Laval that generally speaking, this is the point the private sector has the least trouble with, namely, portability when a person changes jobs and has vested interests, because the two go together. In English this is called portability investing, and according to our model, it would be after about two years. Right now, the rule in the private sector is that after ten years if the person is 45 years old or over, that person will recover what he paid into a pension fund. Now we want this to be the rule after two years.

[English]

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, in discussing the Budget I cannot help but go back to the Budget afternoon when I thought, as I listened to the presentation, how disappointing the document was. Over the course of the last year I had identified in my mind where the serious problems of Canada's economy lay. You will recall that on numerous occasions my colleagues and I raised the questions of unemployment, the difficulties of people whose incomes were not sufficient to meet their needs, the problems of those who had been on unemployment insurance but who no longer qualified for it. We tried to put before the House the bleak and dismal future that many of those people faced. It did not matter whether they were workers who had devoted 10, 15, 20 and sometimes 30 or more years to a job; they were facing the loss of it and, in the process, found themselves without income because they had exhausted their unemployment insurance benefits. They found themselves without income because they had exhausted their unemployment insurance benefits. They found themselves in the situation where, even if the spouse was working, it was often a part-time job at the minimum wage. The amount earned was insufficient to allow them to maintain their residence and provide for their family in the way they had not only become accustomed to but which would allow them to meet their obligations.

We expected that the Government would recognize that problem, which is a very serious one. In bringing forward its proposals for the fiscal management of the country and in its response to the serious problems of the country, we expected that the Government would at least have come to grips with the difficulties that those people face. It was not so. It was not there. There was nothing to give those people any hope.

On two or three occasions, the latest one yesterday afternoon, the Minister admitted that there was no likelihood of the economy being able to produce the number of jobs necessary for the 1.5 million people who are now unemployed. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) made it quite clear yesterday and last week, and in the weeks preceding the Budget, that he did not expect that the public or private economy would be able to create in sufficient numbers the job opportunities to meet the needs of the youth who were coming out of the educational system with high hopes. There will be no opportunity for these young people to utilize the education that they worked so hard to attain.

We in this Party thought that perhaps there would be some suggestion in the Budget which would address the shortfall, those people who stand between the number of jobs which can legitimately be created and the number of people who are unemployed, and that shortfall would undoubtedly be up in the hundreds of thousands. But there was nothing for them. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I was very disappointed on Budget day; then I became angry, and by the time I raised my question with the Minister of Finance yesterday. I was back to the point of feeling total frustration in trying to get through to the Government what its responsibilities really are.

I pointed out yesterday that some 50 per cent to 60 per cent of all construction workers in the Hamilton area are now unemployed. The unemployment rate among electrical workers is 70 per cent. The unemployment rate for steelworkers, the backbone of the community I represent and of the surrounding communities, is 20 per cent. These people do not have the money for additional payments into RRSPs. They do not have an income which allows them to sock away some money for their old age. They do not have a job which will enable them to meet their day-to-day commitments, let alone to put away some money for the future in some kind of tax relief scheme.

These people do not qualify for a reduction in their federal income tax—from the 45 per cent level to a 15 per cent level—which was given to doctors, lawyers, accountants and consultants. These people expect to pay their tax, whether or not they have an income. Their spouses, perhaps earning $80 to $100 a week, will be taxed at the personal income tax rate for that particular class of individual. Yet the Government, failing to recognize the tremendous problems which those people face, has the audacity to come into the House of Commons and propose that those who already have sufficient income, those who already live high off the hog, those who can afford to pay their mortgages and provide for their families, should be given further tax breaks. But those who are unemployed, who no longer qualify for unemployment insurance benefits, those who find themselves, faced with an inadequate income base, not able to meet their commitments, will be expected to continue to pay their tax. For them there was absolutely nothing in this Budget which will ease the burden of pain which they carry around with them on a daily basis.

There was a pittance in the Budget for youth employment. It was an amount which would provide jobs—if the jobs can be provided—for 10,000 young people. That is 10,000 people out of the 400,000 people who fall into that category, who are looking for work. One cannot help but feel a sense of frustration and anger when one sees the Government's reactions to the legitimate problems of people. It has money for the oil companies; they received $190 million immediately in tax relief. But there was no money for those with no income who still had commitments. There was money in the way of tax relief for the professional class, but there was no money for those who have used up their unemployment insurance benefits, who can no longer pay their mortgage commitments and who have no future to look forward to. There was money in tax relief for those whose incomes were in the $50,000, $60,000 and $70,000 a year bracket by way of more openings for RRSPs, but there was no money for the people who were unemployed through no fault of their own, who are unemployed primarily as a result of this Government's economic policies in the past two or three years. There is no money for the unemployed, those who are without the prospect of a job, who no longer qualify for unemployment insurance benefits and who find themselves losing everything they have worked for.

This Government is out of touch. One cannot help but ask, if the Government is going to allow hundreds of millions of tax dollars, perhaps billions of tax dollars, not to be collected as a result of the changes which were made in this Budget, and if the cost of government continues to increase, who then is going to be asked to carry the additional tax burden? When the tax rate for doctors, lawyers, accountants and consultants is reduced from 45 per cent average to 15 per cent average, someone else has to pay the difference, and it will not be the 2,000 people who earned $50,000 or more last year and who did not pay one single, solitary cent in tax. Neither will it be the 287 people who each earned over a quarter of a million dollars last year and did not pay a single, solitary cent in tax.

The people who will be asked to pick up the tax burden so that the already well off can be better off will be the people who go out and punch a clock at seven in the morning, work eight hours every day and have their tax deducted at source. They do not have the opportunity to write off any of these loophole benefits which this Government produces and provides. Those people, Mr. Speaker, who earn the minimum wage will still have to pay their taxes. They will not have the money to buy an RRSP. They will not have the opportunity to take advantage of deductions in their tax rate, as will the professional classes which this Government is cosying up to at the moment. I recognize that farmers and certain fishermen will benefit and that is fine, because in the main those people's earnings are considerably below what one might reasonably expect in a country such as ours.

A doctor in 1982 had a net income of $50,000; his federal tax payable was $12,220, his provincial tax payable was $5,886, for a combined tax burden of $18,086. In 1985, given that he now qualifies, for some unknown reason, as a result of this Budget, for a small business tax rate, and given that in 1985 he is able to put an additional $4,500 into an RRSP, the same doctor earning $50,000 a year will pay a federal tax of $6,825, a provincial tax of $4,550 in the Province of Ontario, for a combined tax of $11,375.

Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that the tax saving for that one doctor is almost equivalent to the total UIC payment for a full year for one unemployed person. That tells you something about the priorities of this Government. If this Government has sufficient revenue to be able to give these kinds of tax breaks to those individuals, then, by God, it has the revenue to give some kind of relief to those who are unemployed.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: This same Government in its Budget, out of the kindness of its heart—should we ever find where its heart is—gives pensioners an additional $600 a year. Doctors get almost $7,000 a year in tax relief and they do not really need it. Lawyers get almost $7,000 a year in tax relief. All these consultants who troop around the Parliament Buildings on a regular basis get tax relief of $7,000 a year. Accountants get tax relief of $7,000 a year on already inflated incomes. But all we can afford for a pensioner is a $600 a year increase. The unemployed, who are hurting the most, get nothing. Not one red cent. That tells you something about this Government.

Mr. Riis: They get a tax increase.

Mr. Deans: As my colleague says, there is a tax increase in store for them. The Government will raise $1 billion more this year through personal income taxes. That is not going to worry the doctors or the lawyers; they are getting a good break.

I often wonder just what the relationship is between that particular tax arrangement worked out carefully behind scenes, in the dead of night, and the Canada Health Act. On my way in this morning I read a billboard which said that your health may be in jeopardy as a result of the Canada Health Act. If that is not a threat, I do not know what is. I cannot help wondering if the doctors took into account the significant pay increase they just got on Wednesday afternoon last.

Mr. Pepin: You answered your own question.

Mr. Deans: Maybe the message did not filter down quickly enough, but that will ease the pain for them. Presumably they will not have to extra-bill; they have already been able to dig into the taxpayers' pocket through this move by the Government. That is wrong and the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) knows it is wrong. That is not the way to provide equity. That is not the way to assure there will be growth from the bottom up, to guarantee that people will be given an opportunity not only to provide for themselves but a chance to work.

What else happens? It is not only the doctors, the lawyers, consultants or accountants; oh no, we have even given Eaton's a break. Eaton's really need a tax break. I could tell they were in dire straits. There they were just limping along from million to million; all of a sudden we decide they need a tax break too. Where the hell is the tax break for people? No tax break for people; another billion or more in taxes this year that the average family will have to pay. Where is the guarantee that the next tax break for Eaton's and others like them will also be passed on to the consumer? No, there are never provisions to guarantee that.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that this is a sad, sad state of affairs we are confronted with now. I feel totally frustrated by the way this Government has gone about its business in trying to do what should be done, if it is trying at all.

I listened to the lead-off speakers for the two Parties, and my colleague who made much the same argument I am making here this afternoon. The Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) rose and told jokes. He and the Hon. Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) continuously say they are not going to tell the public what they would be because, if they did, the public would not vote for them. The Hon. Member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) says that we need more money for jobs, and he is right. Then we have the Hon. Member for St. John's West saying we have got to cut the Budget, and he is wrong. That shows you the conflict that must be going on, and that worries me. That is why we cannot change things or make an impact on the Liberals, because there are two conflicting messages coming from the Conservative Party.

Mr. Mayer: Read the polls; the message is getting out.

Mr. Deans: The polls do not reflect what is happening here.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order. I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member but his time has elapsed. Questions or comments?

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, it is just incredible to listen to the NDP. Everyone knows they brought on the election in 1979 because they felt they were going to get more seats, but all they did was bring the Liberals back in.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fisher: Good guys, those NDPers.

Mr. Thacker: The very people they purport to represent have really been grievously injured since 1980 as a result. We know the trend line of the national debt has been going up. The most critical part is that the percentage of tax revenues just to service the debt, that is the interest, goes only to people with enough wealth to lend to their own Government with no risk or responsibility. Where would the Hon. Member draw the line as to the percentage of tax revenue that goes to service the debt? It started at about 10 per cent and now it is up over 30 per cent. Does he see it going to 50 per cent, 60 per cent, 70 per cent? Where would he draw the line?

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, I think we made it quite clear that a significant part of the debt resulted from the very high interest rates which developed during the early part of the 1980s. We stood here in the House of Commons and demanded legislative action to bring interest rates down while the Conservative Party were saying all across the country that high interest rates were a necessity.

Mr. Mayer: That is not true. Be fair.

Mr. Deans: I am going to be absolutely fair. I am always fair.

Mr. Mayer: Sometimes less than others; that is the problem.

Mr. Deans: The hon. Member from Etobicoke, then the Conservative Party finance critic, was in Montreal at the time interest rates were about 20 per cent.

Mr. Thacker: We are dealing with that now.

Mr. Deans: The Hon. Member stood, I believe, before the Montreal Board of Trade and said that high interest rates were necessary. He supported the Government's high interest rate policy and he was prepared to live with the consequences.

I say to the Hon. Member who asked me the question that if the Conservatives had taken our advice, if we had taken the steps necessary to bring interest rates down, and if they had supported us in our efforts to do just that, we would have had fewer families lose their homes, fewer people lose their businesses, fewer farmers lose their farms, and we would have had a lower cost of servicing the debt than we now have.

• (1220)

For the Member to rise and ask such a question shows he has not done his homework. I suggest he go back to the records of the House of Commons and look with care at what his own Party has been advocating. On the one hand the Hon. Member for St. John's West has been arguing continuously for slashing, cutting and reducing expenditures. He is supported almost without exception by the Hon. Member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), whose sole goal is to reduce the size of the Public Service, notwithstanding that that may cause great hardship.

On the other side of the coin the Hon. Member for St. John's East, whom I respect, is demanding more expenditures to take place on a regular basis. We used to have the Hon. Member for Nepean-Carleton, God rest his soul, continuously defending the value of the Public Service. Anyone listening to the question and my response would realize that the conflicts within the Conservative Party make it virtually impossible for any kind of rational policy development.

The answer to the Hon. Member's question is simply this.

Mr. Mayer: Now we are going to get the answer.

Mr. Deans: If the Hon. Member and his colleagues had supported our attempts to hold interest rates down, we would not be faced with the situation we are now faced with.

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, if the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) had forced interest rates in Canada down artificially, the value of the Canadian dollar would have dropped. The very people the Hon. Member purports to represent suffer when the Canadian dollar drops to 60 cents or 65 cents. The cost of imports goes up enormously when the Canadian dollar drops. So this is just hogwash.

The Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain cannot get around the fact that today over 30 per cent of tax revenue goes to service the debt. This means the wealthy become fabulously wealthy and the middle class is eaten away. I would like him to tell me where he would draw the line. Would it be at 30 per cent, 50 per cent, 60 per cent or 15 per cent?

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, there must be some problem with the acoustics here. We are not far apart geographically. Distance does not seem to be the problem; it must be perception. I would like to suggest again that the reason it costs 30 per cent to service the debt is because of the Liberal-Conservative alliance on fiscal policy.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: If the House of Commons had supported—

Mr. Mayer: Be fair.

Mr. Deans: I am being fair as always.

Mr. Mayer: You did not listen to what I said this morning.

Mr. Deans: No, but I have listened to you often. I only have to hear your speech once. Mr. Speaker, you know as well as I that if the Conservatives had had their Members here to join with us in those numerous occasions when defeating the Government would have been possible, we could have gotten rid of this motley crew. More importantly, if they had decided to vote with us on those important items we might have had an impact on the fiscal and monetary policy of the Government. Even more importantly than that, if they had supported us in our job creation programs, all of which would have been of considerable value to the future growth of the country, we would have had more people working and paying tax and therefore have had more revenue for the Government. It would have had to borrow less. We would therefore would not be in the situation we are now in.

It is because the spokesman for the Conservative Party continuously supported the Liberal thrust at every single turn that we have a deficit today in the order of $29 billion. It is because the Liberals and Tories together did not understand the impact of the high interest rate policy and therefore supported it over many months and drove people into unemployment that we are faced with the deficit. It costs us $1 billion a month to maintain the unemployment insurance program.

If we could have had Conservative support for our measures, such as building homes for people, we could have created 280,000 man-years of work. The Tories said we could not afford it. When we were proposing to go on with the auto task force report and create 80,000 jobs in Canada over the next five years, I heard not one single whisper of support from the Conservative Party. When we were talking about completing the east-west pipeline and creating self-sufficiency in the country, at the same time putting people back to work in the steel and construction industry, there was not one whisper of support from the Conservative Party.

Mr. Riis: Silence, just silence.

Mr. Deans: When we were saying we had to come to grips with the lack of an agricultural implement industry, a forest industry and mining implement industry, we heard not one single word of support from the Conservative Party. The Conservative Party has been one of the major contributing factors to the problems that confront the majority of people in the country. When they suddenly start crying about the state of the economy, it makes us realize they are not telling the truth.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, when one hears the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) espousing his theory of economics, one begins to wonder whether James Laxer was right after all that they are still back in the sixties. I have had occasion to travel to some countries that have socialist governments. It is true they do provide a great deal. In Canada the NDP neglect to mention that they take something like 56 to 60 per cent of the GNP to provide everything everybody in a particular country demands. That would never have made Canada great. We would have been sitting on our duffs not doing anything but saying the Government will provide. That is the difference in the philosophy of the Conservatives and Liberals as opposed to the socialists in the corner. Canadians are a people of the free enterprise intellect. They want to have an opportunity to develop, and this is the greatest country in the world. As the former Minister of Immigration, I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that there are 800,000 to 900,000 people a year clamouring to get into this country. We must be doing something right despite all the socialist rhetoric we have heard this morning.

There is not only $150 million directed to unemployment in Canada, there is $3.5 billion. The Hon. Member wants to ignore previous Budgets and Throne Speech debates and focus on this amount of money which is directed primarily to youth unemployment. The amount of $150 million is hardly piddling.

I think the Hon. Member better read Mr. Laxer again. Frankly, I do not agree with Mr. Laxer either, but I think he is a little closer to the seventies than the present rump of the New Democratic Party which we have here.

The Hon. Member decries the fact that we make funding and tax concessions available to large corporations. Who works for these large corporations? It is the ordinary person who is making a salary, building on a pension and has a steady job which will be more secure as a result of the concessions made to corporations. I welcome the moves made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) rather than decrying the fact that as the Hon. Member would suggest, not as much was done. In fact, much more was done.

When I hear the Hon. Member saying he wants to be fair, I think that is fair, I think that is fair as compared to good and excellent. He may have reached fair, but his speech certainly did not reach good and was a long way from an excellent critique of the Budget. I thought we would have something in more positive vein from the Hon. Member, something that we could listen to and maybe even adopt. We have not been shy about adopting good ideas in the past. We have the Conservatives so worried that they will not come out with any policies. They are afraid that if they find a good one we might take it over, and so we have no policy from them.

The economy in Canada is in recovery, Mr. Speaker. We have come through a great recession. Fortunately, neither the Conservatives nor the Liberals listened to what the socialist hordes were telling us about interest rates. If we had, the Hon. Member for Lethbridge-Foothills (Mr. Thacker) is correct in what he said about the Canadian dollar. Heaven knows where the Canadian dollar would have stopped. He talked about 65 cents or 60 cents. If we had given in and allowed our money to flow out of the country because of higher interest rates in the United States, I suggest we would have seen an increase in the cost of the product and fewer companies able to compete. That would have meant significant layoffs. Canadians would be trying to buy imported goods with a 40-cent, 50-cent or 60-cent dollar. We certainly did not accede to the request of the NDP and I am happy that the Conservatives did not either.

Presently we have an inflation rate that is approximately 5 per cent. Who were we told was being hurt the most when inflation was at 16 per cent? It was the ordinary Canadian. The best thing we did for the ordinary Canadian was to get the inflation rate down to the level it is today. They are the people who are helped the most by this invidious factor of inflation. We have done a great deal for the ordinary Canadian.

The fact that unemployment is rising because fewer people are working is something that is of real concern to every Member of the House. It is encouraging now to see a slight reduction in the unemployment rate and in fact there are 400,000 more people working today than were working last year. I suggest that 1984 will see an even greater increase than 400,000 more jobs. I think it is encouraging to the unemployed person to see that there are jobs available.

There is almost a backhand form of compliment in that there is greater participation in the labour force. People are coming back into the labour force because they have confidence and are building confidence in the economy. As a result of the increased participation rate it is very difficult to get the unemployment rate down overnight. The Minister of Finance was quite correct when he said that no government, whatever the political stripe and the best intentions, can get that unemployment rate down overnight and then try to overheat the economy by throwing money at it, as the New Democrats would have us do. I think we are moving in the right direction at the right time.

I think this Budget is appropriate for the circumstances. We are not in a circumstance in which the recovery is on us and we are moving toward a greater growth in the GNP. We are on the road to an economic recovery in Canada. When we reach that stage more money will be available for social programs, for senior citizens and those on the guaranteed income supplement.

We chose a priority. We said that there will be a raise for those in need. There will be an increase of $50 a month to people who are drawing the guaranteed income supplement. I think that is to be welcomed.

I hear the socialists saying that nothing is being done for the unemployed. With a casual wave of the hand they wipe out $8 billion that was spent last year to help unemployed Canadians. They have talked about Canadians whose unemployment benefits have run out. Let us not forget that many of those people had those benefits at a time when they needed them and are back at work. Unfortunately, there are Canadians whose benefits have expired and we must find training programs and other projects to help them get back into the labour force. Since a great deal is being done there should be confidence among the unemployed. The economy is at a stage where there are 400,000 more jobs than last year and I suspect there will be many more this year.

It is fascinating to watch the Budget process. The Opposition Parties have automatically made up their minds to oppose all or some of the items in the Budget. The Government Party Members place their confidence and faith in the Minister of Finance that he will bring down a budget that they can not only defend but promote. That confidence was not misplaced, either in April or in this particular Budget. The Minister of Finance has been fiscally responsible. The Budget is one designed for a Canadian economy in recovery. It is interesting to see that some critics consider it so good that they are calling it a pre-election Budget. That is what I would call praise.

It is not a stand-pat Budget. The moves in the immediate and short term are geared to the economy as it is today, recognizing that we have come through a difficult recession period.

The Budget provides the action and what we are receiving now is the reaction, some of it of a knee-jerk variety by the Opposition Parties and some of our critics in the media. It was interesting to see how our old antagonist, Diane Cohen, could hardly wait to get her 60 seconds on CBC immediately after the Budget, without really having time to digest all of the documents during the time of the lock-up. We have come to accept that there are certain critics who will appear on television or write articles damning the Budget out of hand. Sure enough, Diane did not let us down this time. There she was, with all the froth that she could muster.

I have already indicated that we have been told we are not doing enough for the unemployed. I pointed out that $3.5 billion directed at that particular target is certainly a significant figure and that the $8 billion that is made available through the unemployment insurance fund is hardly ignoring the unemployed.

One of the greater incentives I have seen in this Budget is the gain-sharing for a stronger economy. I believe that members from both sides of the House have suggested from time to time that there should be more gain-sharing, where the person who is working on the floor or working in the plant can understand the requirements of a business in order for it to succeed. By putting them on the board of directors or being placed in this gain-sharing operation they will have a greater interest in the corporation for which they work.

Let me quote from a segment of the Throne Speech because I think labour and the Canadian public should be aware of this philosophy:

> Labour has been and should continue to be a full partner in the process of economic recovery. Workers deserve a fair share of the recovery benefits and an equal voice in the resolution of issues like technological change and productivity improvement—greater productivity results from a combination of progressive management, ingenious technology and high employee morale. It is the main long-term guarantor of increased real wages for Canadians.

Employees, therefore, sharing in profit-participation plans is a splendid move and I approve of it. I hope that Mr. McDermott would some day bury his NDP bias and serve only one master. Presently he is trying to serve the NDP and the labour movement. He is not an ignorant man but a man with great talent. I suggest, with respect, that he concentrate on the labour movement and focus his talents and abilities on protecting his real constituency, the members of the Canadian Labour Congress and the workers he aspires to represent. He would be doing better. He must deal with Liberal governments from time to time, for which he has apparently little regard. While he has a little more regard for the Tories, he rather damns them with faint praise. I am not sure that I would want to be in that particular bailiwick.

In the section dealing with small business, the proposals for tax simplification will of itself relieve small business of a huge paper burden and I say we should pursue this because unnecessary paper work and record keeping hits at productivity.

The cumulative deduction account has been abolished. There is no question in anyone's mind that it was placed there initially to do a specific job, which was to prevent inappropriate use being made of the small business tax provisions. But I think, in the final analysis, that the Minister of Finance has recognized that it was an inappropriate move and I credit him for removing it. I should point out that this is no small improvement because 300,000 small businesses will be relieved of this particular chore.

These and other proposed changes will allow the Government to reduce two-thirds of the existing legislation dealing specifically with the taxation of small business. It is the right move at the right time.

One of the areas that has been a constant irritant to senior citizens is the necessity to make quarterly payments because income tax is not being deducted at source. It is an irritant because our senior citizens are of a generation which paid their taxes and their debts. Not being aware of this particular requirement has found many of them having to pay not only interest but a penalty. To their chagrin and annoyance, this requirement is placed upon a generation of people who honoured contracts. It is a generation that I suspect has very little in the way of indebtedness today. The increase of the $50 per month is the GIS was, of course, welcome news to everyone.

In the broader international field, the Aid-Trade Fund move is first-class. It is one area where we can combine aid to the Third World countries with the opportunity for Canadian businesses to become involved in worthwhile and yet revenue-producing operations.

The home owner protection plan is a realistic approach to the problems faced by people who may be met with prohibitive costs as a result of high interest rates occurring just when they are about to renew their mortgage. It will also help those who are securing or are about to buy their first home and place their first mortgage. It will give them some indication that they will be protected from any sudden increases in interest rates. It is appropriate in the circumstances and fortunately we are not faced with the prohibitive cost of the ill-fated but not lamented Tory plan.

Can you tell me how much time I have remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): You have until 12.47 p.m. to complete your remarks.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: He has seven more minutes.

Mr. Cullen: I thank my hon. colleague from Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn). He is quick off the mark with those figures. It is the only way I can count that high!

As a former Minister of Revenue I know that the vast majority of people in that Department are proud of the work they do, and are capable and conscientious. Given the fact that the Department is dealing with some 16 million taxpayers and accordingly has to have a large number of employees to do this particular work, mistakes are bound to be made and some overzealous approaches taken by individual members of the Department. But overall, this Department does a splendid job and helps to maintain our system of voluntary compliance and confidentiality.

It is ironic, I suppose, that people who are sending these messages in brown envelopes place the Minister in the position of defending those who are releasing documents to the detriment of the Department and to the detriment of their fellow employees. I welcomed the sensible initiative of the Minister in securing a task force surveillance of the workings of the Department of National Revenue and calling for a report on this particular subject. I know that most people who work for the Department of National Revenue are proud of their position and recognize that they are hardly the most popular people in the world, even going back to biblical times.

In the vast majority of cases you will see approaches made by the Department to a delinquent taxpayer, and only after all of these initial moves, sometimes five or six, are made does the audit section set deadlines and terms, probably in the interest of catching the taxpayer's attention. For my own part, I have had great co-operation from the director in London, Ontario. We have had some difficulties where, if the facts were as indicated in the media, one overzealous employee went too far, and for that reason I have asked the Minister to have the task force examine that kind of an approach. As a lawyer, I find it is often better to listen to both sides of the issue rather than one. I think the task force idea is a correct move in the right direction.

There seemed to be some suggestion, for example, in the particular case I am referring to in Sarnia and London, that it was appropriate to have a demand letter and to indicate the amount of taxes due and owing. I cannot see that as being other than an infringement of a taxpayer's civil rights. In any event, the proper way is to have it examined by the task force to determine what has been done, whether it is appropriate, whether it was done pursuant to the present law, and then to make recommendations about whether the present law should be changed.

I am pleased with the awarding of $1,000 costs against the Department. I think this is a good first step. This is an award in the event the taxpayer is successful in his appeal, and hopefully in future budgets this amount will be increased so that the Department will be on notice that if it does lose a particular lawsuit, it could be in the position of having to pay a significant part, if not all, of the costs of a successful claimant.

Changes made, for example, calling for security rather than cash, again in my view are a giant step forward to equity in dealing with tax appeals.

I commend the Minister for opening up the Budget process, having not only pre-Budget but post-Budget consultations, and then following the post-Budget consultations and before his next Budget is brought in to go back to these groups and to ask them for their recommendations. There are some items, by their very nature, that must be of a secretive nature, but I think there is a good deal to be gained by proper consultation and discussion before Budgets are brought down.

We had Ministers in the past trying various methods. Walter Gordon brought in three people from the business sector. Unhappily, in that case the emphasis was not on the fact he was trying to get from the business sector more information in bringing down a budget that would be more appropriate for the times; the focus at the time and the criticism was on the three people who were brought in. Had they been cleared? Did they have a conflict of interest? Had they taken a particular oath?

Then I sat through the Benson white paper situation where all the suggestions and recommendations that might have been adopted were put into a white paper, not to be in there for adoption but to be looked at and discussed. From that could have been culled what could have been a good budget presentation. Unfortunately, the focus was: "Your Government is going to do this; your Government is going to do that". Nothing could be further from the truth. Both the Minister of Finance in the Conservative Government and Ministers of Finance in Our Government, when they have come out with ideas on deindexing and how that might be applied, unfortunately have been attacked for introducing measures against the ordinary Canadian despite the fact that protections could be built in. I think we lose a lot when we do not have this kind of debate, because then governments are either forced to back off completely from something that may not be appropriate or they will move in such a direction without the benefit of a good and legitimate debate.

As I said at the beginning, there is a wish on the part of Government members, obviously when a budget is brought forward, that it is a budget that we will be able to support, defend and promote. I say in this instance that the Minister of Finance has excelled on all three requirements.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a couple of questions to the Hon. Member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen), who has my respect and the respect of Members in this House for his common sense approach to many of the issues. However, I am afraid in his speech he fell into the trap of being a party to those he accused of pursuing a blind and thoughtless position vis-à-vis the Budget.

In effect, he was saying that the Opposition had a knee-jerk reaction, was totally critical and almost had its speeches ready before the Budget was brought down. On the other hand, the Hon. Member stood in his place and said he is unequivocal in his support for this Budget. I find that hard to believe.

Just to make his life a little more pleasant, I want him to know that I am prepared to be complimentary as far as this Budget is concerned as a member of the Opposition. I found the Budget was good and original. Unfortunately, what was good was not original and what was original was not good. Any ideas that were good were matters brought forward by way of suggestions by our Party's spokespeople.

The Hon. Member for Sarnia-Lambton was Minister of Employment and Immigration at one time and has knowledge of the responsibilities of that Ministry. He knows when he was Minister that I questioned him with respect to the use of social insurance numbers. He talked about attitudes in the Department of National Revenue and in various Departments. What does the Hon. Member think of the recent disclosure with respect to the use and distribution of lists by the Unemployment Insurance Commission to school authorities and school boards? What about the public disclosure of confidential social insurance numbers by officials of the Department of Employment and Immigration? I know when the Hon. Member was Minister he undertook to ensure the confidentiality of the social insurance numbers and of the information on the records of that Department. I assume he will be as distressed as I am with respect to this incident, which shows there are no safeguards.

While the Minister may dismiss this allegation as being an isolated incident, what does he think should be done in that Department to ensure there will be no recurrence of the disclosure of confidential information, particularly as it relates to the young unemployed in communities across this country?

Mr. Cullen: First, Mr. Speaker, I dissociate myself from the Hon. Member's comment that what was original was not good and what was good was not original. I will say to him that there are a lot of good ideas and I am happy to hear that he supports this Budget, at least in principle. He probably will not vote that way on second reading of some of the Bills.

This Government brings forth its ideas for debate. The Toronto Star is not very impressed with the Hon. Member's finance critic. We read "Whom is Crosbie kidding?", and the article suggests all of the things he is going to cut and things he is going to do. People are beginning to wonder when we will have some programs. It is not right for the Hon. Member to say that his finance critics are really putting ideas on the table which the Progressive Conservative Party has. I have not heard too many yet.

The Conservatives are opposed to the size of the deficit, and so am I. I would like to find a way to bring it down as quickly as we can without disrupting the economy. That is something upon which we have to focus.

In so far as social insurance numbers are concerned, I do not think they should be used for anything other than for what they were intended in the first place, which was to identify people under the unemployment insurance scheme and for tax purposes. Whether this is an isolated incident or whether there are 50 or 60 such incidents across the country, it is wrong and should be stopped. To the credit of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Roberts), he indicated that when it was first brought to his attention he told them they were to cease and desist in this particular approach. It is wrong, and he hopes, as I do, that it is an isolated incident. Isolated or not, it should be stopped cold turkey.

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the same question of the Hon. Member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen) as I asked the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans). Today the amount of tax revenue which goes to service the debt is over 30 per cent. I think it is close to 35 per cent of revenue. That is another way of saying that people with enough money to lend to their government can do so without any risk. Therefore the rich become fabulously rich and it chips away at the middle-income class. A few years ago it was as low as 10 per cent and 20 per cent.

Given those facts, could the Hon. Member indicate where he feels that this upward trend has to stop, level off or drop back? There is no doubt that it has been rising over the last few years.

Mr. Cullen: In part the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain indicated that, having come through a recession and the high interest rate cycle, obviously the deficit is much higher now than anyone would like to see it. I consider it at the present time, whether it is $31 billion or $29 billion, to be probably barely manageable. I hope it will not go any higher; however, I think there are some cycles involved. In other words, if 12,000 Inco employees who were drawing unemployment insurance are now gainfully employed and back at work, they will not be drawing upon UI and will be paying income tax. As a result there is an improvement in the economy which will have the impact of bringing down the deficit. I would like to see that happen.

As a former Minister of Employment and Immigration, I conducted a study and endeavoured to get more funding into particular areas which I thought were appropriate. In 1945 the percentage of the GNP related to the deficit was actually higher than it is today. When I say it is barely manageable, I think I am correct in that.

Naturally I would like to see the deficit reduced. Most of us would like to see our mortgages paid off, no money owing on our cars or on the furniture in our homes. Thank God a social economic net was in place over the last four years. Given that fact and weighing it against the size of the present deficit, I can live with it; but we have to make every effort possible to bring down the deficit as quickly as we can without being disruptive.

My problem is how we go about it and where we cut. We are not talking about cutting old age pensions or the guaranteed income supplement. It may be in the area of unemployment insurance where we are now paying 60 per cent rather than 66 and two-thirds. Perhaps that should be dropped a little and we could save a bit in that area. However, I think we all owe it to find some areas where we could make significant cuts in order to bring down the deficit. Of course, a strong economy will work faster than anything because people will be working, paying their way and paying their income tax, and we will be able to afford that which we have in place. Hopefully single women over age 55 will be helped. I think they are the forgotten people. If I had a focus, it would be on single women over 55 years of age. They should be helped the next time we have funding available to make such a social move.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I have a double-barrelled question for the Hon. Member. It concerns his comment that the Budget would certainly assist Canadians and get the recovery under way. Could he explain how, by giving a special tax break to lawyers, he feels the economy or the recovery will be assisted and how the fact that the Government has increased average personal income taxes by $200 to $300 per family will help?

Mr. Cullen: I believe the April Budget indicated where that money would be spent and what kinds of things it would be used for. It was to be used for the benefit of ordinary, average Canadians, by putting into place nets which have to be there to help people when the economy runs into a snag, such as the recession we have experienced over the last three or four years. The people who are hurt most by that are those in the income category about which the Hon. Member talks.

In so far as providing benefits to lawyers, etcetera, perhaps it is appropriate at long last and has not come too soon. We do not have any problem recognizing that a hockey player with talent and brilliant skills can make between $300,000 and $500,000 over the years and that there should be some tax break for him, whether he incorporates himself or whatever he does. I say that is appropriate; I am not knocking it. However, lawyers and accountants are usually not in that particular position, so we made a concession to them.

It seems significant when we talk about the salaries to which the Hon. Member referred that I have a letter on my desk today which indicates that the average lawyer in downtown Regina makes $35,000 a year. It is not as though they are all making vast sums of money, but it does give them an opportunity. The Hon. Member uses the example of a lawyer who makes $200,000 or $300,000. I never made anything like that in the small community in which I live.

Mr. Riis: How does it help the economy?

Mr. Cullen: We have to recognize that just as athletes train and put a lot of time into developing their skills so that they can become professionals, doctors and lawyers require post-secondary education and beyond. Not only that, they are constantly in a position where they are required to upgrade their skills. There should be some recognition of this. Quite often doctors do not graduate until they are 30 years of age. Often they work their way through school. From the time they are 18 years or 19 years of age until they are 30 years to 32 years of age, they are not making money. In fact, they are paying out money. We have to recognize that professionals in this country should also be rewarded for that kind of sacrifice.

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I will call it one o'clock in just a moment, but before I do so I want to indicate briefly that I will be responding to some of the statements made earlier today by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin). One thing she said in dealing with the subject of pension reform was that there were a number of elephants which had held back any progress in this field in the last four years. She cited among other things the business community. I say to her that the major elephant which blocked progress in this vital field of pension reform in the past four years, and once again in this Budget, is the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde).

Also I say to the Hon. Member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen), who has just spoke so eloquently about the need for something to be done for single women over the age of 55 that while he and his Government condone various tax breaks to people in higher income brackets, they had the choice to set the priority as to whether it should be that group who have been so well served by this Budget, people between the ages of 55 years and 65 years, or, as the task force on pension reform recommended, single elderly persons between the ages of 60 years and 65 years who should have had something done for them in this Budget but were completely ignored. That is the tragedy of this Budget.

May I call it one o'clock?

DEPARTMENT'S TREATMENT OF COMMUNITY COLLEGE STUDENT

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, Revenue Canada has just published a nice glossy booklet at taxpayers' expense entitled "Inside Taxation" emphasizing, as it would, the integrity and fairness of that Department. It is still a nickel and dime outfit. Aside from the general harassment of waitresses who are caught in the gratuity squeeze, a Niagara College student took advantage of the inquiry service of that Department and tells this story.

For two years he had tried to earn a living as a commission salesman. The market was slow. He used his own car. He paid for the coffee. He was in effect selling all the time, but finally his money ran out and so he started back to school on student loans and grants. After his first full year as a student, he had questions about his return, so he called the taxation office. You guessed it. He ended up being reassessed for the years 1981 and 1982. They need vouchers, who, where, and what. They want a daily mileage record, and what geographical area he covered.

The Income Tax Department, its assessors and collectors are spending your money in their quest for tax dollars, knowing there is not any there to be found, only to force this community college student into bankruptcy before he even finishes school, and no recovery will be made either for taxes or the student loans. In the interest of treating all taxpayers fairly and equitably, chalk up—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Hon. Member's time has expired.

AEROSPACE INDUSTRY

CONTRACTS SECURED BY MISSISSAUGA AREA FIRMS

Mr. Douglas Fisher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Avro Arrow was destroyed by the Diefenbaker Government 25 years ago. In Mississauga, shock waves of industrial collapse and unemployment followed this incredibly shortsighted policy. Today, thanks to a partnership between business and Liberal Governments, the aerospace industry in Malton and Mississauga has been restored.

At McDonnell-Douglas we have built every set of wings flying on DC-9s and DC-10s across the globe. We have helped with de Havilland's Dash 7s and 8s, world leaders in STOL aircraft. At Spar Aerospace we designed the space arm for the U.S. space shuttle. DAF Indal has just become the first Canadian company to win a prestigious U.S. Navy Award for its top quality work on helicopter equipment. Orenda Engines has a new generation of jet engine repair technology to use on the CF-18s. We helped to put a man on the moon in 1969, and today we have got a brand new industry with LTA ships.

Mississauga's experience is repeated across Canada. Liberal Governments have helped to rebuild an industry where the Tories brought only mindless destruction 25 sad years ago.

BILINGUALISM

SERVICES FOR FRANCOPHONES IN HAMILTON-WENTWORTH REGION

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to your attention a matter that is of great concern to me, as it should be to all Members of this House. I am referring to the elimination of services in French at the Canada Employment Centre on Hamilton Mountain.

I have received several complaints from francophones in the area, which are very valid ones. The authorities have looked into the matter. The problem was that if there was only one bilingual employee in the Mountain office and that person happened to be ill or had to attend a meeting, there would be no one to deal with francophone clients.

It was decided that the best solution would be to designate four or five bilingual positions at the CEC office downtown, on Rebecca Street, and two bilingual positions in Burlington.

Mr. Speaker, I feel this is totally unacceptable. Only 6 or 7 per cent of the population in Hamilton-Wentworth is French-speaking, but at least two-thirds of this group lives on Hamilton Mountain, which means the majority. I would ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration to reinstate bilingual services on Hamilton Mountain.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

RELOCATION OF KILLINIC INUIT

Mr. André Maltais (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, last weekend in Fort Chimo, which is in my riding, I had an opportunity to meet local Inuit leaders as well as the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, who happened to be there on Sunday. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the House, and especially Cabinet, to lend a receptive ear to a request formulated by the Inuit of Fort Chimo, about relocating the people of the village of Killinic as soon as possible. Killinic is about 300 miles north of Fort Chimo. These people speak only Inuktituk, and their village was closed in 1977. They were then relocated in a number of villages along Ungava Bay, and they have practically no rights under the James Bay Agreement, Mr. Speaker. Therefore, even if they are few in number, about sixty, I think the Canadian Government has a duty to be fair, in principle and in practice, to all its citizens, and the Killinic Inuit should be relocated in their former village, with all the usual services their situation requires.

These proposals were submitted to me on the weekend in Fort Chimo, and I promised I would raise the matter in the House. I hope the Ministers will be very receptive when the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development raises the matter in Cabinet.

An Hon. Member: Hear, hear!

SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

FUNDING FOR SOCIAL SCIENCES RESEARCH COUNCIL

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, last week the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) announced a supposed increase in the funding for the Social Sciences Research and Humanities Council. I say supposed increase, because the Minister in fact ended the funding for Canadian studies. Therefore, what the Social Sciences Research and Humanities Council faces is a reduction of more than $1 million in its funding. The Government has been increasing its funding for graduate studies in science and technology. For that it should be commended, but it seems to be doing that by cutting back on assistance for social sciences.

We face a large number of very serious problems which have to be considered and studied, such as aging, unemployment, and the impact of microtechnology on employment. All of these need to be studied by people who have been trained in these fields. The Minister is saying we have to cut back on the number of graduate students who will be assisted in social sciences.

In the 1950s and 1960s when our universities were expanding, we did not have the trained people in Canada so we imported from other countries. By the 1990s many of our professors will retire, we will again have shortages and have to import people because of the shortsighted policies of the Government. I call on the Government to rethink its policy and to increase its funding for the social sciences.

TOURISM

RECEPTION ACCORDED FLORIDA OFFICIAL BY CUSTOMS OFFICERS

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, each year Canada's deficit with other countries in the tourist trade is some $2 billion, causing a massive loss of Canadian jobs and capital. At a time when the Canadian Government is stressing that hospitality is the key to capturing a larger share of tourism, some Canadian customs officials—not all, maybe not most, but some—are undermining the industry by being inhospitable at border crossings.

A case in point concerns Barry Pitegoff, Director of Marketing Research for the Florida Division of Tourism, who entered Canada to address the annual meeting of the Tourism Industry Association of Canada this week in Charlottetown. Mr. Pitegoff was detained, his visiting rights were severely restricted, and he was made to feel unwelcome by customs officials, for no apparent reason.

I urge the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Roberts) and the Minister of State for Tourism (Mr. Smith) to collaborate on a program to sensitize customs officials to their role as goodwill ambassadors for Canada at border crossings. The first impression visitors have of our country should not be that which Mr. Pitegoff received. Instead, it should be one of welcome and eagerness to please, so that those visitors will return to Canada again and again.

EDUCATION

STUDENTS' KNOWLEDGE OF POLITICS

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in a study ten years ago by Magnami of the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, 1,005 first-year university students in eastern Canada were interviewed with the aim of correlating political knowledge with their socio-economic status, their gender, their perceived social class, and their political attitudinal variable.

Some disturbing observations were made. It was found that high socio-economic status males who defined themselves as upper class were more represented in the high political knowledge category, while women in a similar situation had very little political knowledge. Women who considered themselves as revolutionaries demonstrated a higher level of political knowledge than other youths, whereas men who defined themselves as revolutionaries fell into the category of politically uninformed individuals.

Another worrisome observation was that the young people who are expected to be the best educated in the country were very uninformed about the political authorities and organizations that are controlling their everyday life. Only half could answer correctly more than 25 per cent of the questions, and of these only 10 per cent could answer more than 11 of the 25 items—items which had been recently given wide representation in local media.

The suggestion was made that most of the youth in the sample studied would go to the voting booth and vote for the party or individual that impressed them most recently in terms of political propaganda. The study concluded that the outcome of national elections is decided more by political sloganeering and the emotional use of media, than by carefully reasoned solutions to socio-economic problems.

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the Hon. Member, but his time has expired.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

SIGNING OF AGREEMENT ON SUBSIDIES FOR MUNICIPALITIES

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, for the third time I would like to emphasize the importance of signing an agreement between Quebec and Ottawa on grants earmarked for municipalities. Mr. Speaker, we are well aware of the fact, and all my Quebec colleagues regret, that as a result of the absence of such an agreement, the municipalities cannot receive these grants.

It seems that an agreement between Quebec and Ottawa is now possible, and has been since January 23 of this year. The Minister responsible announced last week he was waiting for the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to arrive, to discuss the signing of the agreement.

Mr. Speaker, allow me, on behalf of 1,200 municipalities in Quebec, to ask the Right Hon. Prime Minister of Canada and the Ministers from Quebec to urge the Minister responsible to sign this agreement, which would be in the best interests of the Canadian economy. There are projects involved that would promote job creation, and apparently, this agreement could be signed without prejudice to federal and provincial jurisdictions.

Mr. Speaker, I shall if I may urge my Quebec colleagues once again to recognize the importance of this question and to realize that the 1,200 Quebec municipalities would applaud the signing of this agreement. I therefore trust that Cabinet, which is to examine this question, perhaps today or later this week, will give the affirmative response we have been waiting for in Quebec.

PROVINCIAL AFFAIRS

BRITISH COLUMBIA BUDGET PROPOSALS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the B.C. Social Credit Government announced a vindictive Budget that slashes essential social services, ignores the more than 200,000 jobless British Columbians, and greatly increases income taxes. At the same time as the Government cuts health services and grants to post-secondary education, it is giving a tax bonanza to big business. Mr. Speaker, this is the "tough, mean and nasty" budgetary policy suggested by the federal wing of the B.C. Socreds, the federal Conservative Party.

The Tory Member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) said recently about these Reaganite economic policies that it is something they would be doing if they were in government, something they will do when they are in power again. The Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) said that obviously Bennett is going the right way. B.C. Tory MPs have remained shamefully silent on the Socred attack on economic and human rights.

People of British Columbia, be warned. You have been given a taste of federal Conservative policies by the B.C. Social Credit Government. Never forget the words of the official Tory finance critic, the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), who said that you have to be tough, mean and nasty, and do all kinds of unpleasant things, and that that is why he is not going to outline what their budget measures would be, now.

For the sake of our children, the poor, the elderly, the sick, the unemployed, and the powerless in our society—

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member's time has expired. The Hon. Member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle).

MINES AND MINING

ABSENCE OF ASSISTANCE MEASURES FROM BUDGET

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, in the wake of last week's Budget the prime resource sectors of our economy are heaving a sigh of relief. They did not get any help, but at least there were no unpleasant surprises.

One group that is not happy is Canada's mining sector. Desperate for measures which will help it fight back against lagging markets and increased competition, the mining sector looked forward to the Budget with some hope. Unfortunately, the steps the Government should take to help our mining community are not sexy, like high-cost, high-profile projects in urban areas. They are, instead, adjustments to our tax system to encourage investment, to reduce non-profit taxes which are strangling the industry, and to put in place a northern benefits system and package which will help Canadians cope with the higher costs of working and living in our North.

None of these measures were included in the Budget. In fact, nothing that could be seen as helpful to this massive and vital industry, which operates at 50 per cent capacity, was included in the Budget. This begs serious and painful questions. Can it be that the Government has given up on mining and considers mining a sunset industry? Is it the newly appointed Minister's mandate to help the industry regain its strength, or to preside over its demise?

The mining industry is a vital part of the backbone of our economy. Every region of the country is affected by its present weakness. When the Liberals demonstrate their indifference to it, they are demonstrating their incompetence as economic managers.

ENERGY

CANCELLATION OF JAPANESE PARTICIPATION IN BEAUFORT SEA EXPLORATION

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources I should like to address my question to the Minister of Finance. The Japanese, who loaned Dome Canada and Dome Petroleum $400 million for oil and gas exploration in the Beaufort Sea, are cancelling further participation in the project, according to an announcement in the Japanese Diet.

The Canadian taxpayer has invested $486 million in Dome through PIP grants. In view of the Japanese withdrawal, what steps is the Minister taking to ensure that the Canadian taxpayers' investment in the Beaufort is secure and is not at risk?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources should be in the House very shortly, and his Parliamentary Secretary is in the House, I believe.

Mr. Speaker: Does the Hon. Member for Vancouver Centre want to defer?

Miss Carney: No, Mr. Speaker. I should like to point out that the PIP grants were a subject matter introduced by the Minister of Finance, so he should be able to support his own legislation.

PETROLEUM INCENTIVES PROGRAM GRANTS PAID TO DOME CANADA

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, Dome Canada says it has invested $910 million in the Beaufort in the years 1982-83, but only $35 million was funded by the company. The bulk of the rest of the $910 million was funded by the federal Government and the Canadian taxpayer. If the company will not put up more of its money to explore for oil and gas, how can the Government justify giving Dome more money in PIP payments than any other company in the oil patch?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has arrived in the House and I am sure that the Hon. Member will be happy to ask him questions.

I should like to point out to her, however, that the PIP grants are used for exploration purposes. The money has been spent on research for oil and gas resources in Canada's offshore and northern Territories. The money has been spent in Canada by a Canadian controlled company, to find oil and natural gas in this country. The money has not been wasted; it has been used for that particular purpose.

As to her second point, I remind her that the PIP grants replaced the previous system which was even more generous and in some instances allowed some companies to get extremely large compensation; as a matter of fact, some would argue even more than they were actually putting in. What we have done is institute a system which favours Canadian owned and controlled companies which the Leader of the Opposition wants to do away with, which the Leader of the Opposition has said he would remove in order to treat the multinationals in the same way as Canadian companies. We have said that we are going to favour Canadian companies, and this is what we have done and will continue to do.

Mr. Dick: You lie.

Mr. McDermid: When did he say that?

CANADIAN OWNERSHIP CHARGE

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, although the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is now in the House, I feel that my third supplementary is more properly directed to the Minister of Finance.

Through the Canadian Ownership Charge on gasoline, Canadians have built up a $500 million safety net specifically earmarked for refinancing Dome Petroleum which, as the Minister knows, has not yet signed a deal with its banks. In last week's Budget the Minister of Finance said it was unlikely that Dome would require federal assistance and that the $500 million earmarked for Dome was lumped in with general revenue. How can the Minister justify withdrawing the safety net which was specifically earmarked for Dome's use in an emergency situation, which it may now face?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have provided a fund to help Dome, if it is needed. I said in my Budget that it was unlikely that the company would need it because it has taken steps to refinance itself purely through private arrangements. However, we have an agreement with Dome and with the banks involved in financing Dome, which would provide for a safety net. If it is required, obviously we will live up to that agreement. However, at the present time the Dome corporation has indicated that it was not interested in this particular arrangement which was arrived at and that it was working at arriving at another arrangement, without government support and participation, which we welcome.

TRANSFER OF CANADIAN OWNERSHIP FUND INTO GENERAL REVENUE

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. When the Canadian Ownership Charge was instituted in 1980 in the Budget of that year, the Government said that the Charge would go into a separate fund, the Canadian Ownership Fund, and I quote, "And this would in no way affect the Government's deficit." However, in the Minister's Budget of less than a week ago, the Minister has not only taken $500 million from the fund earmarked for Dome, but he has abolished the fund and put all of the proceeds for this year, $840 million, into general revenue in order to reduce his deficit. How is that justified in view of the purposes of this fund? How can the Minister take the risk?

How can he say, as he said, "It is very unlikely that Dome Petroleum will require federal assistance", when just six days later it is becoming evident that Dome Petroleum will very likely require federal assistance, and the $500 million is gone, taken by the Minister to reduce the deficit artificially?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have just indicated to the previous speaker that in the view of the Dome corporation, it was not going to need the support which had been provided for in a previous agreement arrived at a couple of years ago. We have acted, and we are still acting on that basis. As I stated, it is unlikely that the support provided for will be required and, if it were to be required, obviously the Government would live by the agreement which we arrived at before.

As far as the use of the funds is concerned, the Hon. Member will remember that in the Budget of last year I indicated that the purpose of the Canadian ownership tax would be broadened to cover the general area of energy self-sufficiency. The funds are going to be used for the purpose of ensuring energy self-sufficiency in this country, particularly in the area of oil and gas. We have made tremendous progress in the last three years in that regard, and we want to ensure that we will continue to make progress. This is the purpose for which that tax will be used.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, this is a continuance of a tissue of deception. The Minister has launched a smash and grab raid, unauthorized by this House of Commons, on that fund.

SIZE OF GOVERNMENT DEFICIT

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, the Minister shows in his Budget statement of six days ago that the Budget deficit will be $31.5 billion. To get it down to $31.5 billion, he has taken $500 million which was allocated in that fund for Dome. If the Minister has to pay the $500 million out to Dome, the deficit will go up to $32 billion. Will the Minister tell the House what the deficit is for the year which ends at the end of March? When is he going to stop deceiving, misconstruing, and deluding the people of Canada? When will we get honest counsel and honest accounting?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the deficit for this year is forecast to be $31.5 billion. The Hon. Member asks me what the deficit will be at the end of March. I will be able to give him the exact figure as soon as it is computed at the end of March, or later on. He will remember that the deficit figures last year varied considerably, depending not only on the expenditures which the Government incurred in March, but also on the receipts which came from corporate and personal income tax during the month of March. I do not know exactly what those figures will be—

Mr. Crosbie: There is $500 million.

Mr. Lalonde: —but I will be very happy to provide my friend with the exact figure as soon as it is available. At the present time it is forecast to be $31.5 billion—

Mr. Crosbie: And it could be anything.

Mr. Lalonde: In the meantime I am still waiting for the Hon. Member to tell the Canadian people what the mean, nasty things are he would do—

Mr. Crosbie: You are a mean, nasty thing I would eliminate.

Mr. Lalonde: —to them if that Party were in office.

Mr. Crosbie: Five hundred million dollars you have stolen from that fund.

THE ECONOMY

PLIGHT OF LOW-INCOME FAMILIES

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Figures released today show that in Ontario, the richest province in Canada, 17 per cent of all children, or close to 400,000, are living in poverty. Across the country, we are told, children as young as five are lining up at soup kitchens, sometimes without their parents, just to get enough to eat. Their parents have no hope of getting jobs. Does the Minister think that it is fair or tolerable that children are the main victims of the recession? Why has he ignored their plight, the plight of low-income families? Why, instead, has he chosen to give some $675 million in tax breaks to people who can afford to put $15,000 a year into a savings plan?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, again I refer the Hon. Member to the Budget of last year, as well as to my announcement this year, that all the family allowances and tax credits are going to be fully indexed starting on January 1, 1985. The Hon. Member will remember that last year I appreciably increased the tax credit for families. In addition, I have to remind the hon. lady that the Provinces have a significant responsibility in that regard, as well in terms of Children's Aid and the various programs which are under provincial responsibility, particularly, social assistance.

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, the Minister, who was a former Minister of Health and Welfare, should know what happens to children who are brought up in poverty. He brags about a safety net. These children are not safe; they are at risk. Poverty begets poverty. He should know that. He does know it. He does not want to admit it.

TAX REFORMS RECOMMENDED BY NATIONAL ANTI-POVERTY ORGANIZATION

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Would the Minister tell the House why, when he was preparing his Budget, he did not adopt the family benefit tax reforms which were recommended by the National Anti-Poverty Organization, which would not have cost him another cent, so that the money could be converted to increase family allowances for children? Tax credits at the end of the year are not useful to poor people. It is a monthly family allowance they need. The Minister could have increased this if he had paid any attention to the NAPO recommendations.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that poverty begets poverty. The Government has taken steps. Of all of the industrialized countries, including the socialist Governments which are referred to so often by my socialist friends opposite, the Canadian Government has been the only one which has not cut back on social security and on social programs.

The Hon. Member comes from British Columbia. She can make quite a comparison as well between the behaviour of her provincial Government and the behaviour of the Canadian Government during that period. I would like to remind the Hon. Member that we have not only maintained our support for people in need during this period of recession, but we have increased it, and in the last Budget we used the funds we had available to come to the assistance of those most in need. We did it last April by improving the tax credit for children. We have done it this year by coming to the assistance of single, retired citizens in need, and young people looking for work.

There are still many areas where improvement is possible, and this Government will continue to address these areas in order to ensure that Canada will continue to have one of the best social security systems in the world.

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, that is absolute b. s.—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Ms. Mitchell: There is no way in this Budget—

Mr. Speaker: With all due respect to the Hon. Member, I would invite her to withdraw that expression. It hardly contributes to the dignity of this place.

• (1430)

Ms. Mitchell: I would be glad to say that it is absolute garbage, if that is better.

There is no question at all that this Budget helps the rich, not the poor, especially the poor children of Canada. The Minister knows we have almost one million more people living in poverty in 1983 then we had in 1981. Obviously that is because Canadians do not have jobs. Welfare rolls are going up; he has to pay for half of it, he should know that.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Hon. Member is on her second supplementary. The Chair notes these are far ranging questions for Question Period. Will the Hon. Member ask her question?

REQUEST THAT MINISTER RESCIND TAX BREAK FOR CORPORATIONS

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Will the Minister rescind the $600 million tax break for corporations and put the money into direct job creation for the unemployed, particularly for those with young children?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I was not offended by the reference of the Hon. Member; I was assured that, by using the language she did, she was referring to herself as a "benevolent socialist".

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: The Hon. Member says the last Budget did not help the poor. I would like her to say that to the 750,000 single, retired citizens, three quarters of whom are women living in poverty, who are going to see their GIS increased by $50 a month this year.

CONTEST FOR KITCHENER TAX COLLECTORS—MONTHLY DAY OFF WORK AWARD

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. Yesterday we asked questions concerning the free lunch for auditors in Toronto. I would like to bring to the Minister's attention another contest last November and December. The contestants were the tax collectors in the Kitchener district tax office. The rules were that they received five points for collecting an account in excess of $1,000 plus one point per $1,000, four points if it was under $10,000, and the reward was one day off per month. In November the winners were a Mr. Keith Purves, and in December a Mr. Walter Perreault.

Games are being played here, and the word "games" was used in the memo of Mr. Stinchcombe in the Toronto incident. He called it a game. There is a game being played in Kitchener, a game being played on the plight of Canadian taxpayers who are in a state of distress.

The chief concern I have, Mr. Speaker, is that the Minister does not recognize what is happening in his own Department. Does he approve of games being played, such as the one I illustrated yesterday and the one I just brought to his attention? What disciplinary action was taken with Mr. Stinchcombe and with the supervisors who imposed quotas? What action is the Minister going to take today?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I pointed out to the Hon. Member yesterday that in the matter involving Mr. Stinchcombe in Toronto, I had looked into the situation. I told him when this exercise had taken place and when it was stopped, and I also informed the Hon. Member that he was twisting the facts, as did the newspaper article, incidentally, when he was judging the way this local manager wanted to reward employees for outstanding performance. Today the Hon. Member, and that is what he is supposed to do, has now submitted another item. I would have appreciated being informed beforehand, in order to know the facts. I am wary of his way of changing the facts and especially the way he interprets them. I cannot, therefore, comment on a situation I have not had time to look into, especially when I do not know exactly what happened.

TORONTO SUPERVISOR'S ACTIONS

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister whether or not he approves of the methods used by Mr. Stinchcombe in Toronto? Does he approve of what Mr. Stinchcombe did?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have already pointed out that Mr. Stinchcombe put a stop to this practice. Furthermore, I do not intend to pass judgment on a new case being brought to my attention, because I have not had time to look into the matter. Since as in the first case, the practice has been stopped, I would like to point out to the Hon. Member that we have a group of experts, the Woods Gordon group, that is conducting a study at the present time and looking into departmental practices, even those that have been stopped, including a practice aimed at rewarding people for outstanding performance. The study will cover those occurrences, and the group will then be in a position to submit an objective assessment.

REQUEST FOR REPEAL OF SECTION 31 OF INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance who admitted last week in the Budget speech that the application of Section 31 of the Income Tax Act is causing problems. Since 1978 a Canadian Bar Association joint committee on taxation and the Institute of Canadian Chartered Accountants have advocated repeal of Section 31, saying it is ambiguous, poorly drafted, and that the issue is clearly addressed under Section 248 of the Act. Canadians are suffering because of inconsistent and arbitrary application of Section 31 by Revenue Canada. The Minister often tells this House that he always seeks advice before bringing down a Budget. Why did he not take the advice of Canada's lawyers and chartered accountants on Section 31?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Before tabling my Budget, Mr. Speaker, I did meet with a group of representatives of the two organizations mentioned by the Hon. Member. We discussed this question and it was generally agreed that the implementation and interpretation of Section 31 referred to by the Hon. Member do create difficulties. Everyone agreed that there is a real problem which must be addressed and that we must avoid extending preferential treatment to so-called hobby farmers to the detriment of full-time farmers, in the sense that if too many farms are bought by people whose principal occupation is not farming, this will have a speculative impact on the price of agricultural land and harm full-time farmers. It is a real problem with which we must come to grips, and that is why I said I will establish an advisory committee of farm organizations and other groups to look closely into that situation before making changes which will not be harmful to full-time farmers, namely those whose sole occupation is farming and who want their children to take over their operations.

[English]

Mr. Greenaway: Mr. Speaker, that is the same kind of action we got with the fishermen in Newfoundland two years ago when this Government appointed a one-man commission, a Mr. William Rowe, to report on their problems. His report was never published or acted upon. That is the kind of action we get from over there; nothing but smoke.

REQUEST FOR MORATORIUM ON PROSECUTIONS

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Minister of National Revenue who knows the problems Section 31 is causing. There are cases before the courts, and we now have a consulting group to be appointed. The Minister of Agriculture said just a few weeks ago that the Section should be drastically changed, or preferably wiped off the books. That is what the impotent old bull said to the people of Canada. Will the Minister call a moratorium on these cases until the consulting body has reported, so that when Section 31 is repealed or amended these people who are caught in limbo will not suffer?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. gentleman that we have had a number of consultative groups doing work on the Budgets over the last two years I introduced, which have produced excellent reports and have been put into effect. This has taken place with regard to the taxation of charities and foundations. This has taken place with regard to research and development, investment tax credits, and the Indexed Securities Investment Plan. All of this has taken place in the last year. It has led to action by the Government which has been beneficial to all concerned. I intend to proceed with the process of consultation with and participation of those most involved, and with action which will have the support of all concerned.

MANITOBA CONSERVATIVE PARTY'S AMENDMENT TO CONSTITUTIONAL RESOLUTION

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Last fall all Parties in the House united to pass a resolution encouraging the Manitoba Government in its initiative to protect the rights of the French-speaking minority in that province. The Conservative Party in that province has prevented the Legislature from meeting to pass the necessary legislation and the constitutional amendment necessary to protect those rights. Earlier today the Leader of the Conservative Party in Manitoba proposed a subamendment which would restrict the constitutional amendment to validating the laws which have been passed only in English over the last hundred years. That amendment by the Conservative Party in Manitoba would not protect the existing rights of the French-speaking minority in that Province. What is the Prime Minister's position on that proposal?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the position of the Government, and I believe that of all Members of the House, certainly all Leaders of the Parties in the House, as stated in the resolution of last October, was to affirm our intention to support the spirit of an agreement which had been reached last May with the Government of Manitoba and the Franco-Manitobains. That is still the position of the Government.

I do not know of this latest amendment. If it is like the amendment put forward last December by the Leader of the Conservative Opposition, which would have had the effect of striking out Section 23(1) I believe, giving rights to French-speaking Canadians, then obviously it would not be acceptable to the Government nor, I take it, to the Leader of the Opposition. I will wait to see what new proposal has been made, Mr. Speaker.

We have hesitated to intervene in the Manitoba situation because I believe it was the intention of the parties there to have a made-in-Manitoba solution to their problem. We have to keep in mind that any constitutional amendment would come before this House ultimately. I can say unequivocally that this Party would not support any amendment which went against the spirit of last May's resolution, which was not supported by the Franco-Manitobains.

POSITION OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, the proposal made by the Conservative Party in Manitoba is to take away Section 23(1) which prevents future Manitoba Legislatures from extinguishing already existing rights. We in this Party reject that. Will the Prime Minister say that he, as the Leader of the Government of Canada, also rejects that proposal?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if that is the intent of the amendment it seems to me it is a repetition of the attempt made before Christmas. I repeat that we would reject such an amendment unequivocally. If such an amended resolution were to come before the House, we certainly could not support it. I would like the Government and opposition Parties in Manitoba to know that.

I hate to make a proposal which I am sure will be judged to be a political interference, but I think it might be useful if the Leaders of the three Parties were to meet again to discuss whether we should re-assert our position which very firmly is not backing down from the agreement of last May. If that is helpful to the Government and people of Manitoba, I would certainly be prepared to entertain a repeat of the resolution we had in the last Session. I hope that would be the case with the Leader of the Opposition.

INDUSTRY

PETROCHEMICAL TASK FORCE REPORT

Hon. Bud Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The petrochemical task force under the chairmanship of Mr. Bolger and Mr. Reimer reported to the Minister and his colleague, the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion, a little over a week ago. Will the Ministers be meeting with these particular members of the task force? They have been meeting with the caucuses of the various Parties in the House. Will the Ministers be meeting with the members of the task force? Is the Minister in a position to tell us today how soon he anticipates being able to make a response to that particular task force report?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I do not know when I will be able to make a report on a solution to this very complex problem. The other Minister and myself intend to meet with the members of the task force very soon.

DEPARTMENT'S RELEASE OF NAMES OF PETERBOROUGH UNEMPLOYED

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I drew to the attention of the House the illegal use of the social insurance numbers of the unemployed of Peterborough. Since that time I have had an opportunity to examine the list. I am saddened to report that the Supervisor of Investigations and Controls within the Ministry of Employment and Immigration has published the list of all the legitimate unemployed. This means there is very little protection for the innocent and legitimately unemployed in the federal riding of Peterborough when the social insurance numbers become public information.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration announced to the House that yesterday was the first he had heard of this situation. Would he now stand and confirm that what he said was correct?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am not exactly sure which words the Hon. Member is asking me to confirm. I will stand in the House and say that, as a result of the information brought to my attention yesterday, in consequence and following his question in the House, I have asked for a report from my officials, and have received that report. I am told that these events, which I very much regret, were an isolated incident. They were contrary to the policies of my Department and may very well have been in contravention of the Privacy Act. I regret very much that they happened. It was a result of administrative error. As far as I am able to determine, it was an isolated case. I have ensured that instructions have been issued to try to prevent the recurrence of such an event.

Oral Questions

DISCLOSURE OF SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBERS

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, the Director General of Employment and Immigration confirmed to the media yesterday that he was knowledgeable of the situation and had ordered a stop to it yesterday. Is this no different from the situation within Revenue Canada in which the Minister is not aware of what is going on in his Department in that you, as Minister of Employment and Immigration, are not aware of what is going on in your Department?

On behalf of the unemployed in Canada, whose names are on computer printout lists which indicate that Big Brother is watching them, I ask the Minister to issue a directive immediately to all Ministers on the government side of the House to instruct their officials not to disclose the social insurance numbers of any citizens in Canada.

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is asking me to issue directives and orders to all of my Cabinet colleagues. While I am not temperamentally averse to such an idea, it is not within my area of responsibility to do so. I have acted promptly in relation to my responsibilities. Once this situation was brought to my attention the proper steps were taken to investigate it and ensure that such a matter was not repeated. If, as the Hon. Member asserts, the Director General of the region was already aware of the situation and had taken steps to remedy the situation, that official is to be congratulated and not pilloried.

PROSECUTIONS INQUIRY

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I too have had constituents whose personal confidential information has been published by the Department. That information has been sent to officials of the Board of Education, to principals, teachers, and staff members. Would the Minister ascertain and report back to the House if prosecutions will take place in respect of the publication of this personal and confidential information, which I suggest is not only contrary to the Privacy Act but as well may contravene other statutes of this country?

● (1450)

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly take the Hon. Member's request under advisement.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REJECTION OF EXCEPTIONAL INCAPACITY ALLOWANCE APPLICATIONS

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Is he aware that the Canadian Pension Commission has been taking an extremely hardnosed attitude toward applications for exceptional incapacity allowance? Out of 17 applications by the War Amps of Canada, 17 were turned down by the Entitlement Board. Upon review by the Review Board, 16 of the 17 were accepted.

Has the Minister seen to it that the Review Board will be commended for this and that the Entitlement Board will be made aware that their negative decisions have been overruled entirely by the Review Board, and they should start playing from the same music?

Hon. W. Bennett Campbell (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the concern which has been expressed by the War Amps with respect to the cases before the Entitlement Board for exceptional incapacity allowances. I have consulted with the Executive Director of the War Amps, Mr. Chadderton. He is presently out of town but he will be meeting with me just as soon as he returns, to discuss his concerns in those areas.

Mr. McKinnon: It is a question of how much time gets lost in these needless appeals.

DELAY IN PROCESSING PENSION APPLICATIONS

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, in answer to a question in committee, the Chairman of the Pension Commission gave us some details on the length of time it takes to get a pension these days. Between the time a case is ready and the time a case is heard by the Entitlement Board, there is a delay of 190 days on average. After the Entitlement Board—this was the case with these War Amps—if an appeal is made to the Review Board there is another average delay of 277 days. Seeing that the final decision comes only 619 days after the first request, could the Minister tell us of any steps he has taken to ensure that this unconscionable delay will be stopped?

Hon. W. Bennett Campbell (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it has always been my interest to see the cases of veterans dealt with as quickly as possible. But I am sure the Hon. Member also appreciates that, while we are using average times, there are cases which are lengthy in preparation because of the need to secure the necessary documentation to ensure that the individual veteran has the best possible chance of success when the case is heard.

Of course, there is the question of scheduling Entitlement Boards or Assessment Boards in the area closest to where a veteran lives. Certainly it is my interest and my effort to ensure that all cases are dealt with in the shortest possible period of time while respecting the necessary preparatory work to ensure that a veteran's case, when heard, has the greatest possibility of success.

ENERGY

WITHDRAWAL OF JAPANESE PARTICIPATION IN BEAUFORT SEA EXPLORATION

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It concerns the pullout by the Japanese from the Dome Petroleum project in the Beaufort Sea. In the last two years we, as Canadians, have committed $1.73 billion in PIP grants to the Beaufort, and one-half billion dollars through a bailout contingency fund, bringing the total investment in that company to roughly $2.3 billion. The Japanese withdrew support on the grounds that they were not going to strike oil in the Beaufort. Could the Minister give us the assurance that the Government will not spend one more dime until—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must ask that a display in front of an Hon. Member's desk be removed from the House.

Some Hon. Members: Remove.

Mr. Speaker: If the Hon. Minister proposes to table something, there is an appropriate time to do so. This is not it.

Mr. Skelly: The proposal of the Government to spend $2.3 billion in funding Dome Petroleum to drill dry holes in the Arctic is very questionable. Certainly the Japanese have now left $400 million on the bottom of the Beaufort Sea, and left Dome Petroleum high and dry with the statement that it will not strike oil in the Beaufort. Yet the Government will continue for another two years to pump money down that dry hole.

Can the Minister give us the assurance that the Government will not spend one more dime on Dome Petroleum until it verifies the facts that the Japanese have laid out, that "there ain't any oil down there"?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the Japanese made a deal with Dome Petroleum to invest $400 million in exploration in the Beaufort Sea. Of course, the money has been invested in Dome, and it has drilled with it. They have decided not to proceed with further investment, but there was no such plan. They made an investment of $400 million and decided it was enough for them to invest in the North.

However, there are many other corporations that are anxious to invest in northern Canada. We sign agreements with corporations regularly. Of course, when you drill, no one can tell you ahead of time if you will find oil, gas, or anything. That is the name of the game.

There is oil in the Beaufort Sea. The question now is that we do not know if there is enough to produce commercially. Over the years there have been many finds of oil in the Beaufort Sea but, because of the difficulty of the climate and the region, we need great quantities to make it commercial. We have not arrived at that level yet. In order to achieve self-sufficiency and security of supply, it is very important to look everywhere in Canada where there is the potential for oil and gas.

REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY INTO DOME PETROLEUM CORPORATION

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, the Minister is refusing to come to grips with the fact that the Japanese have assessed the data and said there is no oil. That is why they left. Dome is $4.2 billion in debt. It owns mines, shipyards, and conventional petroleum reserves. If that company collapses it will leave a tremendous black hole in the Canadian economy from which it will be very difficult to recover. It may take a chartered bank with it.

I ask the Minister to stop fooling around and get serious with the House. We need a public inquiry into the operation of Dome Petroleum immediately, as well as a commitment that not one more dime of public money will be spent on that company until there is an assessment of the facts.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think the Hon. Member does not have his facts very straight. Dome is not the only company drilling in the North. There are Imperial, Esso, Gulf Canada, and many other Canadian companies. There are PanArctic Oil, Shell, and Petro-Canada. Many corporations are signing agreements. We have signed many new agreements this year with companies that want to keep drilling in the North.

You cannot find oil and gas if you do not drill. It is exactly on that basis that people are still drilling in the North. If we were to follow the policies of the Tories and the NDP, the drilling would stop in Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. The Hon. Member should talk with the provincial Governments there to see if it is a waste of money to ensure that we find some oil and gas offshore, just like in the North.

FINANCE

FORECASTS OF GOVERNMENT SPENDING

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In the past 16 years there have only been two years under Liberal government when government spending did not rise in excess, and sometimes well in excess, of the rate of growth of the economy. Yet in his Budget last week his projections show spending next year to increase at a rate of 2.7 per cent less than the national income. In the next year it will be 4.0 per cent less; the year after 3.5 per cent less, and the year after that, 2.3 per cent.

Could the Minister tell the House what change in government policy or disciplines have been made to make these spending estimates believable? Can he tell us why we should believe him, particularly when in the last year—the year of six and five and economic growth—government spending increased 3.7 per cent faster than the rate of growth in the economy?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): First, for the very good reason that last year the rate of growth was appreciably lower than it will be this year as an average over the year. Second, the Hon. Member is aware of the policy of restraint which the Government has announced and followed. As the recovery is going to transform itself into a significant expansion of the economy, there will be less need for the large expenditures that we have incurred in order to alleviate the effect of the recession. As the Hon. Member also knows, there will be opportunities for some increase in revenues. As far as the growth of expenditure is concerned, the President of the Treasury Board will be tabling the Estimates today. The Hon. Member will have an opportunity to look at them in detail, and he will have to reach his own conclusion and come to his own judgment.

The Hon. Member will know that last year we performed better than most of the forecasts that I had put forward. As far as our policy is concerned, it has been stated quite clearly and is the one we intend to pursue.

Mr. Wilson: Mr. Speaker, this business about a government restraint or a policy restraint is more and more of a bad joke every day. All we are seeing is more deception and more delusion.

SIZE OF GOVERNMENT DEFICITS

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, last year the Government estimated government spending for next year, 1984-85, to increase by 5.8 per cent. Now, one year later, the estimate has increased 8.3 per cent. Should we expect the same sort of increase in all these future projections of spending? If we do, the increase in the budget deficit on average will be $8 billion a year. If that is not the case, what concrete steps is the Government introducing that will make these projections come true? Otherwise I say the Minister is cooking the books and misleading the Canadian people.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member better make up his mind. On the first question he was arguing that the expenditures for this year were going to be 2.7 per cent lower than the rate of growth of the economy in nominal terms. Now he is complaining that it will be over what we forecast it would grow last year. Either he wants to rejoice or he wants to cry. But let him make up his mind.

In effect, what we have done for 1984-1985 is to ensure that the total growth of government expenditures will be lower than the total growth of the economy, thereby leaving more room for the private sector and for individual citizens. The share of the Gross National Product being taken by Government is not going to expand in 1984 as a result of increasing expenditures by the federal Government above the growth of the economy. We will make sure that our total expenditures will be lower than the growth of the economy.

JOB STIMULUS PROGRAM

TABLING OF LIST OF PROJECTS

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with Standing Order 46(2), I wish to table two copies of a comprehensive list of over 50,000 projects approved for funding under the Government of Canada's Job Stimulus Program, including the list of Special Employment Initiatives Projects.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I would draw to the attention of the Hon. Minister that Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, Citation 333, provides:

> Speakers have consistently ruled that it is improper to produce exhibits of any sort in the Chamber.

With all due respect to the Minister, the Speaker would have been much happier had there been no red ribbons attached to what is not supposed to be an exhibit.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: This is not to be regarded as a precedent.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Paragraph (4) of the same Standing Order which enabled the Minister to launch his showboat requires the Minister, in tabling that document, to designate the standing committee to which the pile of material is to be referred. I would invite the Minister to comply with Standing Order 46(4) and to designate that committee now.

Mr. Speaker: Order! The President of the Privy Council, on the same Point of Order.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, regarding this Point of Order, it certainly takes a fantastic amount of mental gymnastics to reach the conclusion that what we have here is a report, return or other paper laid before the House in accordance with an Act of Parliament.

The Minister tabled these papers pursuant to S.O. 46(2). This has no connection with reports, returns or other papers tabled in accordance with an Act of the Parliament of Canada, and in the circumstances, paragraph (4) cannot possibly apply. I think the Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) has been trying . . . I can see him smiling! He is very clever, but I think we should not be misled by this invitation, because it is pretty obvious that the Minister did not act pursuant to 46(4). He did not table "a report of his department" in accordance with an Act of Parliament. He tabled "papers" dealing with the administrative responsibilities of the Government, as set forth in S.O. 46(2).

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. President of the Privy Council mentioned earlier the number of the Standing Order involved. Could he perhaps repeat it for the Speaker of the House?

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, when the Minister rose in the House, he tabled the papers under S.O. 46(2), and in his point of order, the Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) referred to S.O. 46(4). I shall refrain from repeating the difference between the two Standing Orders by reading the text. As the saying goes in Latin: patet.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The President of the Privy Council has indicated that the tabling was in accordance with Standing Order 46(2) and not Standing Order 46(4). In the circumstances, if it is tabled, as it appears to have been, by the Minister in accordance with Standing Order 46(2), there is no automatic requirement that it be referred to a committee.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I am certain that the Minister would want to see an examination before the standing committee of that load which he dumped in his efforts to launch his leadership campaign. Perhaps he might request unanimous consent now to refer that heap to the relevant standing committee so we can give it the scrutiny it deserves.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) has a political staff, very well paid, that could do the work the Hon. Member is asking a committee to do. That may be a change from inquiring into the Prime Minister's private life.

Mr. Speaker: I take it there is not unanimous consent.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to the display we have had from the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Roberts) in tabling these documents. It is a new point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has dealt with the matter. The Chair accepted it but pointed out that it was not to be a precedent and that the use of red ribbon for the tabling of documents should be avoided in the House. It was a difficult enough decision.

Mr. McDermid: It has a lot to do with the performance of the Government. It is always in the red.

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1984-85

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting Estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1985, was presented by Hon. Herb Gray (President of the Treasury Board) and read by Mr. Speaker to the House.

Main Estimates, 1984-85

Hon. Herb Gray (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to table in support of the Estimates Part I, the Government's expenditure plan, and on behalf of my colleagues Part III, consisting of 65 departmental expenditure plans.

Mr. Speaker: Order! The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard).

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 63, I move, seconded by the Hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mrs. Bégin):

That the Main Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1985, laid on the Table of the House today, be referred to several Standing Committees as follows:

Considering that the allocation of the Main Estimates to the various Committees is detailed and that the list is quite long, if the House agrees, I would ask that it be printed in Hansard as if it had been read, according to common practice.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion (Mr. Pinard) agreed to.

EXPLANATORY STATEMENT BY PRESIDENT OF TREASURY BOARD

Hon. Herb Gray (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the documents I have just tabled provide the details of the Government's expenditure plan for 1984-85. Last Wednesday, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) presented in his Budget the basic outlines of an updated expenditure plan for the next year through 1987-88. The documents tabled today elaborate on this overall plan for 1984-85 and on the policies, programs and activities underlying them. In particular, Part II and the related Part III documents, which together are generally known as the Main Estimates, provide detailed information on the major portion of the plan, that portion for which we are now seeking authorization from Parliament. Along with the Budget presented last week, the documents will provide a framework for conducting the business of government during the next year.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the detailed plans in the Main Estimates for which we are seeking parliamentary authorization are the result of the government's intensive review of departmental programs over the last few months. They take into account the assumptions about economic conditions that were presented last week by my colleague, the minister of Finance.

[English]

Before touching upon some of the highlights of the detailed expenditure plans for next year, I would like to comment briefly on the documents themselves which are presented again this year as a group of volumes—Part I, the Government expenditure plan itself; Part II, the Main Estimates proper or the blue book; and Part III, departmental expenditure plans.

[Translation]

In its fourth annual edition, Part I is becoming firmly established in parliamentary tradition, providing us with an overview of federal government spending. It deals with the broad policy areas to which resources will be allocated by the Government, and is aimed at facilitating an overall understanding of government expenditures.

[English]

While the focus of this overview is on 1984-85, information is provided on the full multi-year expenditure plan through to 1987-88 presented in last week's Budget. This represents a return to the practice of previous years from the single-year focus of last year's Part I, which was in that form because it was presented before the Budget of April, 1983 which contained this multi-year information.

I have tabled on behalf of my colleagues 65 volumes of Part III for 1984-85, adding 18 new plans to the 47 tabled last year. Next year, when Part III will be complete, departmental expenditure plans will be available for all Departments and agencies. These documents are prepared by individual Departments and agencies with guidance from the Office of the Comptroller General. They contain a wealth of information on government programs; most important, they outline what the Government expects to achieve with the money it plans to spend once the Estimates are approved. The blue book, Part II, supports the items which are expected to be included in the Appropriation Act for the Main Estimates.

I would now like to comment upon the details of the Government's expenditure plan contained in the documents just tabled. Members will, of course, be familiar with the basic outlines of the updated multi-year expenditure plan set out in Part I, since they were presented to Parliament only last week by the Minister of Finance. They will recall that he forecast for 1984-85 planned total outlays of $98.2 billion, an increase of 8.3 per cent over his revised forecast of $90.6 billion for 1983-84. I would draw to the attention of the House the fact that this is the lowest rate of growth of total outlays in six years. I would also note that the Minister of Finance has projected in his Budget even lower rates of growth for total outlays for the next three years. These lower rates of growth reflect both our current economic recovery, which is removing pressures from some of our major income support programs, and more optimistic forecasts for inflation.

Within our total outlays, total planned expenditures of $98.2 billion for 1984-85, we are at this time seeking authorization from Parliament to spend amounts totalling $96.5 billion which are detailed in the Main Estimates; that is to say, the blue book and the related Part III documents. This total is 10.4 per cent higher than the 1983-84 Main Estimates total. This represents a substantial decrease compared with last year's 17.9 per cent increase over the 1982-83 Main Estimates.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, beyond the expenditure total for which details are provided in the Main Estimates, our overall Expenditure Plan also includes $3.1 billion in reserves which are allocated across various policy sectors or envelopes, and a special reserve of $800 million to cover any necessary adjustments to current forecasts for statutory programs. The envelope reserves serve two purposes. The first is to cover the costs of planned initiatives that have not been included in the Main Estimates, that is to say the increases to the Youth Opportunity Fund and the Guaranteed Income Supplement for single pensioners announced in the Budget, as well as other initiatives on which final decisions have not yet been taken by Cabinet. The second is to cover cost adjustments to existing programs that could not be anticipated at the time the Main Estimates were being prepared. In either instance, parliamentary approval will, of course, be sought through Supplementary Estimates or other legislation.

[English]

Our planned total outlays of $98.2 billion are exclusive of, are net of, two items which total $2.2 billion. The first of these is to account for forecast repayments on loans issued in previous years. The second is an adjustment to account for the fact that some authorized expenditures will not be made and will lapse since Departments and agencies cannot legally spend more money than Parliament authorizes and in fact always spend less.

I would now like to direct the attention of the House again to the $96.5 billion in expenditures provided for in the Main Estimates. I would first note that $2 billion of this total is for loans, investments and advances. Of the remaining amount, eight items account for two-thirds of the $8.9 billion increase over 1983-84 Main Estimates. National Defence expenditures are up $927 million to meet Canada's commitment to NATO to increase the real growth of defence expenditures by 3 per cent annually. A large part of these funds will be devoted to the re-equipment and modernization of the Canadian Forces, including the CF-18 fighter aircraft and Canadian-built patrol frigate programs. These activities will also provide stimulus to key sectors of the Canadian economy.

Second, there are the transfers to the provinces under the Established Programs Financing arrangements which support the financing of health care and post-secondary education. These are up by $886 million compared to last year's Main Estimates. Of course, apart from and not included in last year's Main Estimates are the special payments of more than $500 million announced by the Government in December, resulting from revisions to the national income and expenditure accounts by Statistics Canada.

Transfers to the provinces under the Canada Assistance Plan are up by $556 million. Payments under the Petroleum Incentives Program, made primarily to Canadian oil companies to support oil and gas exploration and development, show an increase of $450 million. Payments under this program contribute to the overall level of economic activity, particularly in the natural resource sector. Also, the Old Age Security payments, guaranteed income supplement and spouses' allowances are up by a total of $430 million.

In addition to this amount, more funds will be required as a result of the announcement in last week's Budget of the substantial increase in the guaranteed income supplement for single pensioners. Parliament will be asked to approve this increase through legislation soon to be introduced by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin).

There are also transfers to the provinces, primarily in the form of equalization payments, which are up by $339 million. There are two payments to Canada Post, one for $350 million pursuant to the Canada Post Corporation Act to cover operating requirements and one for $170 million to provide for capital costs associated with the mailing of certain Canadian publications. These are included in this year's Main Estimates. The payments have until now been presented in supplementary estimates.

Public debt charges account for $1.8 billion of the increase. This increase will result from higher debt levels that are partially offset by lower average interest rates on the outstanding debt. The Minister of Finance pointed out last week that the deficits leading to higher debt levels have come from additional expenditures to assist individual Canadians and to promote job creation and economic activity generally, through the difficult period of the recession and the beginning stages of recovery. With recovery well under way and investment activity on the increase, the Minister of Finance last week reiterated the Government's commitment to bring the deficit down, but in a phased manner that does not damage our economic prospects.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would remind Hon. Members that the Estimates documents and related press material contain a wealth of information on these and many other changes. Therefore, I now would like to describe how the continuing economic recovery, and this government's initiatives in support of that recovery, have very profoundly affected today's Main Estimates and the government's Expenditure Plan.

[English]

I want to deal briefly with four areas in particular: Special Recovery Capital Projects, unemployment insurance, Established Programs Financing and the guaranteed income supplement.

I mentioned earlier that eight items account for two-thirds of the year-over-year increase in budgetary Main Estimates. Of the remaining $3 billion increase this year, about one-third is for Special Recovery Capital Projects. These are aimed at accelerating federal spending on economic infrastructure projects to facilitate Canada's economic recovery. These are part of the Special Recovery Program announced in the April, 1983 Budget and which the Minister of Finance pointed to again last week as a key link in the Government's efforts toward establishing partnership in the establishing of jobs through a healthy and growing economy. Excluding national defence spending and expenditures on these Special Recovery Capital Projects, the operating and capital expenditures of Departments and agencies are increasing in the order of only 7 per cent.

Last year, as we were just beginning to recover from the recession, we faced a very sharp increase in the Government's contribution to unemployment insurance. I am pleased to note that, based on economic forecasts, this year's Main Estimates figure of $2.7 billion is $227 million less than last year's Main Estimates forecast figure, a reflection of our improving economic circumstances and of improvements in the level of employment in particular.

Under the Established Programs Financing arrangements, the federal Government defrays approximately half the cost of financing hospital insurance and medicare and slightly more than half the cost of financing post-secondary education. This contribution takes the form of cash payments to the provinces and of the value of the potential to exact taxes which is turned over to them by the federal Government. An increase in the value of this tax portion is automatically offset by a decrease in the federal Government's cash contributions under the formula set out in the Act.

The total to which the provinces are entitled for 1984-85 is expected now to increase by 8.4 per cent over the current forecast for 1983-84, exclusive of adjustments for prior years. However, the value of the tax portion is expected to increase by more than 13 per cent, so that the cash portion need only grow by 4 per cent. This is indeed a welcome sign of increasing economic health and is a direct analogue of the healthier growth in budgetary revenues indicated in the fiscal plan tabled last week by the Minister of Finance.

I also wish to review briefly forecast expenditures under major income support programs for the elderly, as reflected in the Main Estimates. Old Age Security payments are made to all Canadians over the age of 65. The guaranteed income supplement is paid to those Canadians receiving Old Age Security who qualify on the basis of an income test. These payments are normally indexed to the growth in the consumer price index. Under our six and five program, however, the indexation of Old Age Security payments was limited to 6 per cent in 1983 and 5 per cent in 1984.

This limitation did not apply to the guaranteed income supplement, which indeed not only continued to be fully indexed but was modified to compensate its recipients should there be any loss of income resulting from the limit placed on the indexation of Old Age Security. Last year's forecast of expenditures for the guaranteed income supplement assumed indexation rates for inflation in excess of the six and five limit and also included a provision to offset the capping of indexation for eligible Old Age Security recipients.

We should all be pleased that the assumptions about inflation turned out to be higher than the rates actually achieved through the efforts of all of us working together to reduce inflation. This means, of course, that all the funds set aside for the reasons I have just explained were not needed; but more importantly, it illustrates in a tangible way the success we have had in reducing inflation through our co-operative efforts. These factors also explain why the 1984-85 Main Estimates forecast of expenditures for the guaranteed income supplement is actually lower than the 1983-84 Main Estimates forecast.

I would also note that for the first time in many years, expenditures related to major transfer programs like unemployment insurance are growing more slowly than total spending this year. Again, this is largely due to improving economic conditions.

[English]

Before completing my remark, I would like to speak briefly about the size of the public service as measured by the number of person-years under the direct control of the Treasury Board. The Main Estimates documents before the House indicate a 1984-85 total of 260,370 person-years for Departments and agencies whose personnel requirements are controlled by the Treasury Board. This represents an increase of only 1 per cent over the comparable 1983-84 Main Estimates level of 257,678. This latter number, I would remind Members, includes the reduction in authorized levels made by the Treasury Board just prior to the tabling of the Main Estimates last February but which, as a result, did not show in last year's blue book.

The limited increases in authorized person-years reflect the commitment of this Government to continuing restraint in the growth of the Public Service, and to ongoing efforts to achieve improved productivity in the delivery of services to the public.

If we analyse the areas where the larger increases occur, the Government's interest in maintaining and increasing services to the public becomes apparent. The person-year level of Revenue Canada Taxation will increase by 1,044 over 1983-84 to provide enhanced services to the public. The additional personnel will be allocated entirely to four activities: about 17 per cent to handling telephone and over-the-counter inquiries from the public for tax information, 53 per cent for processing tax returns, 15 per cent for tax adjustments requested by taxpayers, and 15 per cent for dealing with formal appeals of assessment registered by taxpayers. These additional resources will be allocated to all regions of the country. No additional person-years have been approved for audit, enforcement, collection or administration. As a complement to these increases in human resources, financial resources are being made available to improve telephone and computer facilities so that services can be provided more rapidly and more effectively to the public.

The Correctional Services program has had its authorized level increased by 666, primarily because of growth in the number of penitentiary inmates. The Department of Transport levels are up by 403, largely to provide for regulatory activities related to air safety and to meet staffing requirements for the Canadian Coast Guard fleet. While maintaining and even increasing services to the public generally, it has still been possible to reduce person-year resources in some areas; the number of authorized person-years is down for 22 departments and agencies. For example, authorized levels for the RCMP have been reduced by 175 person-years because of decreased demand for police services from provinces and municipalities. While some of the decrease of 158 person-years shown for the Department of Veterans Affairs reflects the phasing out of temporary requirements related to the relocation to Charlottetown, a part of the reduction is being made possible by the installation of a modern, computerized benefit delivery system.

The documents tabled today reflect some of the ongoing benefits already being gained through programs related to improving the productivity of government operations. I am referring in particular to the IMPAC program, which deals with improving management practices and controls. This program, which is being gradually extended across the Government, is already providing annual recurring savings of $122 million. The documents cannot at this early stage, however, reflect the positive results we expect to flow from the four point plan of new initiatives aimed at further improving productivity in the operation of the federal public sector which I announced a few weeks ago.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the Expenditure Plan documents that I have tabled also illustrate the achievements and efforts related to building a strong and growing economy to which my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde), drew our attention in his Budget statement last week. You will recall that he pointed to the significant reduction in inflation that has been achieved; the measures taken to secure economic recovery; the record on economic growth, employment and inflation over the last ten months, which has been consistently better than forecast in his previous Budget; and the need for a strategy of continued effort aimed at creating jobs through partnership with the private sector.

[English]

On its side of the partnership the Government is making a major contribution through such initiatives as the $1 billion Youth Opportunity Fund, which was announced in the Speech from the Throne and to which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) added $150 million in his Budget of last week. In all, funds already allocated to Special Recovery Capital Projects and to the direct support of employment, including job training, will total over $3.5 billion in 1984-85.

I will conclude by saying that I am pleased to table these documents relating to our detailed expenditure plan for next year. I believe they illustrate graphically our success in managing and planning our expenditures in this still difficult economic period, although it is one of growing economic recovery. They also reflect the well founded optimism this Government shares with the private sector that Canada will continue its progress toward a healthy and growing economy.

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, we have had two major statements of policy from the Government, the budget speech on February 15 and now the tabling of the Main Estimates for 1984-85 by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Gray).

Pray, Mr. Speaker, that the rhetoric in these two documents will deliver 10 per cent of the optimism it expresses about bringing the Canadian economy around to a condition of full employment or at least from 3 per cent to 7 per cent unemployment, and pray that the rhetoric will become fact. I have to say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to others who are listening—

Mr. Frith: Nobody is listening.

Mr. Huntington: That is absolutely true. No one on the government side of the House listens to anything at any time. The House of Commons, both at Westminster and in this country, was born out of violence, debate, sword lengths and so on. The manner in which the President of the Treasury Board handled his Estimates today is a great improvement over what we have had in the last three or four years. At one time our colleague, the Hon. Member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens), almost had to join the Press Gallery in order to get to a briefing session before the Estimates were tabled. Today we were told by the President of the Treasury Board that we have 67 documents that you and I, Mr. Speaker, did a lot to bring about in our days as members of the Public Accounts Committee. There are 67 documents in Part III, the Main Estimates, which are a considerable size, and then we have Part I. All of that is coming to pass as some of us in the thirtieth Parliament had hoped. I congratulate the President of the Treasury Board on the furthering of the effort that started with a parliamentary committee. I congratulate him on the courtesy he extended to the Official Opposition and the other Party in opposition for a briefing which began at 12 noon today on this matter. I do not want to go beyond that in thanks and congratulations, however; that is about as good as I am going to go in the department.

The total estimate of expenditures announced in the speech today is $96.5 billion. The forecast expenditure shows a 10.4 per cent increase in a comparison of the 1984-85 Estimates with the 1983-84 Estimates. The rhetoric will say that this increase has been brought down to 8.3 per cent when the 1983-84 supplements are included. That is correct, after the adjustments are made.

In the 1979 Crosbie Budget there was a prediction that in 1983-84 we would spend $77.7 billion; the Liberal forecast is for the spending of $90.65 billion, which is 16 per cent higher than the projection by the same staff in 1979. We have a forecast to prediction problem in all governments, not just ours. It is a problem we are all going to have to live with. The system is too complicated and the factors of input are so complicated that there is a very high percentage of error in the projections. That is something we must all recognize and wrestle with.

In November, 1981, the spending projections for the 1984-85 year were $93.9 billion; in fact they turned out to be $4.3 billion more. It is interesting that in the rhetoric we have heard from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) and from the President of the Treasury Board, the Government claims that it cannot control most spending because it is non-discretionary.

Mr. Lang: That's right.

Mr. Huntington: That is right, is it? Let us listen to the next line, then. When we compare discretionary spending in these Estimates against non-discretionary spending, we see that the discretionary spending goes up 13.2 per cent and the non-discretionary goes up 8.8 per cent. So there is something wrong with the rhetoric of the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board. The facts show that it is not so.

• (1540)

Mr. Lang: The Special Recovery Program.

Mr. Huntington: The Special Recovery Program? There is always something, Mr. Speaker. These Estimates signal, Sir, a total disregard for the hardship presently faced by Canadians. Let us measure the gap between what the Government says and what it actually does. I suggest that the Government should not be judged in the narrow sense of output, in terms of the services it provides or does not provide. Government should be judged according to the outcome and how well it overcomes the circumstances which shape the results. On the basis of today's Estimates, Sir, last week's Budget and the promises made to entice voters mean little. Government only proposes to throw more and more money at the nation's problems.

Every time we turn a radio on or watch TV we hear something about a make-work program. We heard again today about a $150 million Youth Opportunity Fund. Why would this $150 million be delivered to Canada Works? If it were delivered to Career Access, two and a half times more jobs per dollar would be created than under these Canada Works programs. Why can we not rearrange some of this spending whereby we would get the optimum multiplier in terms of relieving the pressure on the people who are seeking work? Today we find out that in the Economic Development Ministry 33 person-years have been added. This envelope ministry has now taken on the responsibilities of a line department. It has taken on the responsibilities of a line department because it is now operating the Gaspé and the lower St. Lawrence Special Recovery Capital Projects. I am surprised to see that in this set of documents. Why has the responsibility not been left to the line departments? Why must this politically sensitive central agency function beyond and outside of its mandate? I believe we should have a reply to that.

Too little money did not move Canada from sixth place to twenty-second place among industrial nations in one year, Mr. Speaker. Our ailments in efficiency, which have reduced us to fifteenth place among industrialized nations, will not be cured with more money. The productivity performance of Canada is dismal, and we are now going to have another commission or set up another bureau to study our productivity problems when most of us know exactly what the problem is.

On the industrial scene, the pace of improvement is the slowest of that of any major industrialized nation. Those figures come for the Euromoney study, Sir. In 1982, productivity in Canada declined by 2.8 per cent. Yet we find the Minister of State for Economic Development (Mr. Johnston) now moving into highly politicized areas instead of really planning what has to happen down the road in terms of major fundamental corrections to our system. We talk about productivity. We set up a bureau to study it. At the same time we have seen a doubling in the number of notices of objections received by Revenue Canada since 1979. In 1984-85 it expects to process over 56,400 objections. How can one talk about productivity, Sir, when we have a tax collector who is doing all he can to destroy the entrepreneurial private sector with this kind of intervention. If we are going to talk about productivity, we must get the political rhetoric out of it. We must address the fundamental problems which this Government has caused in the private sector, the same private sector on which it is now relying to save us all from a worse recession. Revenue Canada will require 6 per cent more staff in district offices and in its head office just to handle this new workload which it has created for itself. This is going to increase its personnel costs by 10.2 per cent at the same time that the Government talks about productivity.

At page 15290 of Hansard of February, 1982, the then President of the Treasury Board said that the improved presentation of the Estimates to Parliament would help Members of Parliament to ensure that taxes paid by Canadians would be used for the benefit of all Canadians. One cannot object to that kind of rhetoric, Sir. He said that this was a fundamental and democratic responsibility. But the Estimates which have been tabled today are in the shadow of an enormous porkbarrel out of which huge sums of money are flowing to the benefit and advantage of Liberal candidates in the next election. We heard rhetoric back in 1982 and we receive a set of Estimates today in the shadow of behaviour which I do not believe I have seen in my lifetime in this country.

I agree, Sir, with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Axworthy) who indicated last night on The Journal that he had reservations about the priorities and conduct of his colleagues who are preparing to lead the Liberal Party. But the Minister of Transport, who has been headlined in the paper as one certainly able to lasso loot, Sir, while we are talking about austerity and care of public funds hands out chronicles of his achievements. He publishes them. There was $1.3 million that went to the Max Bell Athletic Complex at the University of Manitoba. However, that Minister allowed $31,000 of that money to go to a consultant in the United States when the best consultants in the world on that subject matter are right here in Canada. There was $10.2 million for a maintenance hangar for Air Canada in Winnipeg; a $32 million facelift for the Winnipeg airport; $4 million went for a vocational training centre; $50,000 was spent to avert lay-offs of two individuals at the symphony; $115,000 went to the blind to learn computer programming; $55,000 was given to the Fort Garry Women's Centre; $8 million went to CMHC; $100,000 went to Canada Ports for an audit contract in Winnipeg. The Canada Ports audit is now being conducted out of Winnipeg. There was $90,000 spent for experimental buses for the aged. All that was spent in his constituency.

Mr. Lang: More.

Mr. Huntington: I hear them calling for more over there, Mr. Speaker. I want to tell you, Sir, that that kind of behaviour is irresponsible when one keeps talking about equity and fairness in the Canadian system. It is not equity and fairness; it is grab what you can. The headline says, Sir, "Lloyd lassos federal loot". There never was a guy who could throw a lasso like that Hon. Minister.

At page 23101 of Hansard of last year, the President of the Treasury Board said that the federal Government must be able to adapt to the circumstances and have the flexibility to review and revise its programs so as to promote economic recovery. Where, Sir, in the documents which the President of the Treasury Board tabled today is the inflation rate? The Government brags about the fact that it has gone down to 5.3 per cent. It was under 5 per cent two months ago. It is now up to 5.3 per cent. But where is the inflation rate reflected in reduced government expenditures, Sir? Why is the largest Borrowing Authority Bill presented to Parliament crowding out the availability of capital to private borrowers? The Government wants to borrow $29.5 billion. That Bill just came in the last day of last week. How can the private sector accept the job-creation challenge the Liberal Government has given it before interest rates come down and we have some degree of stability? While we have all this rhetoric, we also have the Minister of Finance advertising non-callable 21 year bonds, that is until the year 2005, at 12 per cent. The projection for interest rates in the United States as a result of their recovery is dropping year by year to the point where 91 day Treasury bills are expected to be 5 per cent in the year 1989. Yet here we are going through to the year 2005 at 12 per cent and sucking all the money we can out of the private sector. At the same time we expect that private sector to deliver the recovery and put Canadians back to work. It is an exercise in conflict, Sir. You can hardly believe what is going on.

As both you and I know, Mr. Speaker, bankruptcies have doubled this year compared with the first seven months of 1979. Some 6,122 businesses went bankrupt in the first seven months of 1983. Yet the Government expects the private sector to invest in new and more modern plants to increase productivity, create jobs and allow us to be competitive once again in world markets. It is not realistic when compared with what is happening in Asia and the U.S. We are completely out of touch.

Since taking office in 1980, Government expenditures have increased 13 per cent in 1980-81, 17.6 per cent in 1981-82, 17.8 per cent in 1982-83, approximately 12 per cent in 1983-84, and now, comparing the Main Estimates, 10.4 per cent between 1983-84 and 1984-85, which can be corrected down to 8.4 per cent. The Government is very proud of its 8.4 per cent but it does not hear the warnings from knowledgeable people.

Through you, Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak as directly as I can to the President of the Treasury Board. I have been told by very responsible researchers in world economics that we will not have a recovery in Canada until we start to see our primary resources, such as zinc, copper, steel, molybdenum and lead, along with wood and food, start moving out to world markets. We have priced ourselves out of world markets, and there are so many political rigidities in our system which we are terrified to touch that we are going to have great trouble getting back on track in the next decade. I hear the rhetoric from the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board, but if we are going to be realistic and face the real problems of the real world instead of this wonderland in Ottawa, Sir, we have to change these attitudes and get down on our knees and address some very fundamental factors. If we cannot put people to work and paying taxes, where is the future? It is not in the rhetoric of the Minister of Finance and of the President of the Treasury Board.

The challenges which lie ahead for whatever Party forms the next government are truly brutal. If we are going to save the social programs and everything else we are so proud of in this country, we will have to become very realistic. People are absolutely aghast at the practices of Revenue Canada, the way they are treating taxpayers and making retroactive reassessments. We all have problems, not just the Government. Private individuals are having real problems, too.

Then we have this matter of Government advertising and the waste involved, which develops a real anger in people. For instance, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. De Bané) is spending $2 million to promote the eating of fish. If he could spend that money promoting the quality of fish harvesting, processing and packaging, it would be of lasting benefit down the road. It is very interesting that in this set of Estimates advertising is no longer shown. Last year it was shown in the Supply and Services revolving fund. But the Government removed it and again started playing this shell game with the figures. Information as an object of expenditure in the 1983-84 Main Estimates was $244.6 million. The 1983-84 update was $269.1 million, a difference of $24.5 million in advertising. The Estimates for 1984-85 show total information expenditures of $266.2 million. On the surface that is a reduction from last year's revised $266 million, but on the basis of a comparison of main estimates, it is up 9 per cent. However, if you include the advertising normally reported in the main estimates and the supplementary estimates, if you include the Crown corporations, I am told unofficially that it is over $1 billion. If the President of the Treasury Board has information to refute that claim, Sir, I would like him to deliver it to us in the House of Commons.

We have a lot of problems, Sir, and I have many other examples.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): I hesitate to interrupt the Hon. Member but he has been given equal time with the Minister. He could be allowed to continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is that agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Minister and my colleagues. I note that under the office of the Co-ordinator for the Status of Women, the scientific and professional personnel authorized person-years have been cut from ten to six. These are the people who put together the real facts and issues, and they have been cut back, but the overall person-years are up by seven. Here they cut an essential element from ten to six, a saving of four person-years, and yet the overall person-years are up by seven. The Estimates indicate that the increase is mainly due to the expansion of the public information functions. This is more advertising for the operations of the Secretary of State's office. If you will refer to fact sheet No. 4 in the documents tabled today, you will find that the information budget rises from $33,000 to $252,000 this year in the sector and the salaries and wages are up 20.9 per cent. In that area, where they get real value for money, they cut.

I cannot conclude without mentioning the condition of Mirabel, that monument to the East, that mecca of productivity and efficiency. Through the Estimates we are told that Mirabel is to lose $48.2 million in the year ahead. This loss will be up from $43.9 million, the actual loss experienced this year. May I remind you, Sir, that in 1982-83 the loss of only $29.2 million on that marvellous installation.

At the beginning of my comments I complimented the President of the Treasury Board on two things. I complimented him on the courtesy he extended to his colleagues in the House of Commons by giving us a briefing period before the tabling of the Estimates. I sincerely thank him for that. The other thing I thank him for is that he has continued to work on the reform of the Estimates with some energy, push and drive in laying the foundation of which the Speaker of the House of Commons, when he was co-chairman of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, along with myself, worked so hard. If we examine the summary tables and the gobal figures in Part I of the Estimates and the Main Estimates we can see that none of this is going to work unless we pay attention to the Special Committee on Standing Orders and Procedure which was struck and worked for 18 to 20 months and brought down a series of 10 reports. We cannot think that the building of bureaucracies is going to remove from us, the elected representatives of the people, the responsibility of holding the federal Government to account. We in the Opposition are responsible for holding the Government to political account for political misdemeanour and misbehaviour. We in the House are also responsible for holding the bureaucracy to account when it is not delivering full value for money in the management of the resources voted to serve the objectives that the Government brings down.

I urge Hon. Members to read and reread Chapter 2 of the Auditor General's report. If we are going to serve the people of the country properly and address the rigidities that we have to address, before we can really turn this country around and have a private sector that can start employing people again we will have to accept report No. 7 and allow the House of Commons the muscle, material and organization to hold the Government to account. I do not care whether the Government is them or us. We have also got to learn to hold the bureaucracy, the managers of the system, to value for money accountability in terms of the way they manage the resource in service of the political objectives and programs laid down by the Government in power.

That is the challenge we have here. There is no political will among Members in the House of Commons to bring it about. We all think we get here by being big spenders. That is all we are. We shovel money, promises and rhetoric out and will not face the essential rigidities that we have built into our system. Until we do, through the committee structure in report No. 7, I think we are in for very serious times indeed. It is time for Members in the House of Commons to show leadership, hold the Government to better account and hold the bureaucracy to account under value for money principles.

I thank my colleagues in the House for having allowed me these few minutes to continue my remarks.

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, in commencing the few words I have to say about the tabling of the Estimates and the documents which were tabled today in the House by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Gray), I would like to agree with the Hon. Member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) that there has been a great deal of change in the Estimates since I arrived here about four years ago. When I first arrived in Ottawa all we had to go through in the Estimates was the blue book. Now we have added other parts to the Estimates. There is a government expenditure plan and departmental expenditure plans which are very helpful. There is still a great deal of difficulty in gleaning the information one actually needs to make comparisons from year to year in the Estimates and tie it to the public accounts of Canada. I will go on to say more about that later.

One of the first things which struck me as I attended the briefing session today, which started at twelve o'clock, was the number of person-years which were increased in some of the departments and agencies. The largest increase in person-years of employment within the federal Government occurred in Revenue Canada Taxation. There are 1,044 increased person-years, supposedly for the benefit of the Canadian taxpayer. I wonder whether there is a direct correlation with one of the other highest increases in person-years of employment. In Correctional Services there is an increase of 662 person-years of employment. I certainly hope there is not a direct correlation and that we will find Revenue Canada being even more strict with the Canadian taxpayers.

As in the Budget, Mr. Speaker, these Estimates do not deal with the unemployment and job security of Canadians. I am a little distressed by that. The Minister is very proud of the fact that the unemployment insurance contributions by the federal Government will decrease from $2.8 billion last year to $2.6 billion this year. The Budget is a more recent document than these Estimates because of the way they are prepared. The Budget says that the decrease is actually down to $2.7 billion.

You must look at this very carefully, Mr. Speaker. This does not mean that unemployment is going down in Canada. In fact it means, as I will try to point out, that the problem of unemployment is being transferred from the federal Government to the provincial governments across the country. If you compare the unemployment insurance contributions by the federal Government to the Canadian Assistance Plan, you will find that the contributions which the federal Government makes to that will go up by 17.7 per cent or, in terms of dollars, a $556 million increase that the federal Government will have to pay in Canada Assistance Plan payments to the provincial governments. It should be remembered that this is a cost shared program. It only reflects half the real cost of people who are unemployed in the country and have gone beyond receiving unemployment to the point of dependency on welfare without much prospect of obtaining jobs in the future.

The Minister is actually saying that the program of unemployment insurance, which is a 100 per cent federal responsibility, is going down. But actually it is not, because when you compare that to the cost-shared program of the Canada Assistance Plan, which goes to welfare payments which the provinces distribute, it actually means that unemployment is much worse in the country. We cannot rely on statistics alone. We have to look at the real unemployment problem in the country. That means that more and more people are not only unemployed, but have lost hope for employment and are reduced to the bleak prospect of having to receive welfare to keep food on their tables and shelter over their heads.

These Estimates refer to the $600 million for job creation for youth. By the Government's own admission, that program would employ about 40,000 young people. The fact remains that there are some 540,000 young people unemployed in the country today. That amount will hardly put a dent in it at all.

When I talked about the Estimates being clearer than I have seen them in the four years I have been here, I must note that it is still quite difficult to determine the actual information in terms of the estimates and expenditures of the Government. Let me give one example. Again, it concerns the pressing problem of job security and unemployment for many Canadians. The Minister seems quite proud of the fact that there is an increase of $134 million for direct job creation, particularly for Canada Works and career access programs. However, these facts require closer study because the Government, in its background papers, has compared the 1983-84 Estimates with the 1984-85 Estimates which have just been tabled in the House. While that comparison shows that there is $134 million more for contributions toward direct job creation, a closer examination reveals otherwise. One year's estimates cannot simply be compared with the next year's estimates, because there are other items such as supplementary estimates and additional money being injected into particular programs. Therefore, in the contributions for direct job creation in this country there is actually a decrease from the forecast expenditure for 1983-84. When the amount is compared to the 1984-85 Estimates, there is actually a decrease of some $219 million in contributions for direct job creation. While the Government says one thing, the actual facts dictate that something else is going on.

What is happening? Is the Government hiding the fact that it had to spend more money in job creation last year? I think not, because I would have applauded it if it had put more into job creation in this country. I rather suspect that the Government is accepting the fact that it is not willing to do anything for the millions of unemployed people in Canada.

The amount forecast to be spent in the 1983-84 Estimates is around $854 million. The Government is not increasing that amount in this Budget but decreasing it. This year's Estimates show only $634 million. It is a shame that the Government will not at least meet the level of spending on job creation that it spent the previous year. It does not speak very highly of the Government, and Canadians will certainly judge it when they go to the polls at the next election.

The Government can create employment in this country by other means than give-aways to big corporate entities in this country, as I think will likely happen. The Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) is more knowledgeable in this area than I am as he is our energy critic. However, the Petroleum Incentives Program is being increased by some $450 million in the 1984-85 Estimates. My concern with this program is that it has no cost control, no job-creation guarantees or performance guarantees. It is another example of the Government's lack of wisdom in offering the larger and sometimes multinational corporations in this country money in the hope that it will trickle down to those who are unemployed and at the bottom of the economic ladder.

I suggest that the Government would be more prudent to use the money that is being given away under the Petroleum Incentives Program for such things as renewable resources and conservation. These two areas are much more labour intensive than the Petroleum Incentives Program which is capital intensive and does not provide any assurance of job creation in this country.

When talking about the money spent on unemployment, the Minister said that it is "a reflection of our improving economic circumstances and the improvement of our level of employment in particular". Nowhere in the Estimates does it show that the economy for the unemployed and those who are in fear of losing their jobs will get any better. As the Leader of the NDP has pointed out, while there is a recovery, it is unfair because those at the upper end of our economic scale, such as the banks and big corporations, have done quite well while those at the lower end of the socio-economic scale must pay the price. These Estimates make that clear and do nothing to reverse that situation.

We see that Established Programs Financing is being increased by 8 per cent. While the Government often says that it is keeping pace with the times in terms of the money it is contributing to medicare and post-secondary education, it is not so. One need only look at the Bill which was recently passed that put the six and five program into effect on funding to post-secondary level education. It really means that there will be a decrease in excess of $100 million to post-secondary education in this country.

The Government has changed revenue guarantees so that there are no longer revenue guarantees in this country. Almost all of the provinces criticized the federal Government for not keeping pace with Established Programs Financing and, based on the facts, I would have to agree with those provinces. The Government is not doing its share in Established Programs Financing.

There are areas to which the Government has paid lip service. A small item in the Estimates but still very important is the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety. It was given a 4 per cent increase when the Government promised great rewards for working Canadians through the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety. In fact, there will even be a loss of nine person-years of employment there.

The Department of Employment and Immigration should be dealing with the overall problem of unemployment and job opportunities in the country. While I applaud the Department and the federal Government for establishing the Ministry of Youth and the Youth Opportunity Fund, I hope further steps will be taken once they are firmly established. We cannot be too critical of a ministry at this time because it does not appear in the 1984-85 Estimates. I assume supplementary estimates will be introduced for the approval of expenditures for the new Youth Ministry.

At the same time that the Government is at least paying lip service to the unemployed youth of this country, it seems to me that it has almost forgotten about natives. The Government does not even survey natives in the unemployment statistics. The 17 reserves in my riding of The Battlefords-Meadow Lake are not reflected in Canada's unemployment statistics. Nothing significant has been done to increase their standard of living in over 100 years since treaties have been signed. Their situation has probably become even worse. I encourage the Government to devise more constructive programs in terms of the settlement of land entitlement and the building of an economic base for native people in Canada.

Another area about which I am somewhat distressed is the unemployment of women. Women and natives seem to be forgotten. While the Government has placed an emphasis on youth employment, it has forgotten about those other two sectors.

I wish to say a few words about the Special Capital Recovery Projects program which has been espoused by the Government for creating jobs and economic opportunities in this country. I believe it is deceiving because the fact is that the Special Capital Recovery Projects program is destroying jobs, as various government departments and agencies now show in these Estimates. Let us take the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, for example. It is receiving an increase of some $75.7 million for higher salaries and for operating capital expenditures. Also under the Special Recovery Capital Projects, it is getting almost $20 million for the purchase of "high technology equipment". As a result, there will be a loss of about 150 person-years of employment resulting from reorganization. I want to ask the President of the Treasury Board whether he is going to assure Canadians that that $20 million is being spent under the Special Recovery Capital Projects in the CBC and whether that money is going to Canadian producers of high technology, and that the CBC will not again take away Canadian jobs by buying foreign high-tech.

I would like to say that when we look at areas that are vitally important to Canadians at present we find some erosion. I understand the Government is limited in terms of what it can do because of the high deficits. In fact, the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) mentioned to me in conversation today that if this Government would stop its corporate give-aways and if it would stop the breaks which large corporations do not really need, we could likely save about $10 billion in these Estimates, money which could be put or redirected into employment creation measures.

Let us look at the Department of the Environment. I think its priority would be in terms of protecting our environment from the ravages of industry and neglect by much of the Canadian population. There is one area that has shown a decrease in the Department of the Environment, a decrease of $2.5 million for the toxic chemicals management program. That is a shame, especially when you think of people who live around the Love Canal and those who have to worry about chemical factories and plants. This is a vitally important program. At a time when the Government should be increasing its watch over the environment because of the way we have allowed the environment to be devastated, why is the Government taking away $2.5 million from this most vital program to Canadians?

There is another area on which I want to comment. We have just had a preliminary look through the Estimates. I looked at the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. That Corporation should be the impetus for building better and more housing right across this land. But what do I see? I see a decrease of $124 million due to the termination of the Canadian Home Ownership Stimulation Plan, a decrease in phasing out neighbourhood improvement programs, community service contributions, loans, investment and advances, including reduced activity in the Canada Rental Supply Plan and a revised cash flow for other plans. If some of the money could be directed into these programs, it would not only help

Canadians to get the housing they require but it would also be a spur to the creation of many jobs from the forest industry to the construction material area. Many more jobs would be created by putting more money into the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation to direct that Corporation to build more houses on the basis of need.

Before my time runs out, I want to speak about the Department of Transport. Through Bill C-155, the statutory Crow rate was abolished. We in the New Democratic Party believe that the Crow rate should be reinstated. That program took away from the grain producers in the prairie provinces in western Canada a potential of about $1 billion a year. In the background papers we find an increase of $11 million for western transportation in industrial development initiatives. Behind that we see in brackets "Crow". It is not a very fair deal, Mr. Speaker, when you take from the producers of the western prairie provinces $1 billion and in return show an increase of $11 million for western transportation. That does not seem to be a very fair deal.

At the same time let us look at air strips, which come under the jurisdiction of the Department of Transport, specifically in northern Quebec and Labrador. There will be money for that purpose under the Special Recovery Capital Projects program channelled through the Department of Transport for some $5 million. That seems unfair, too. Do we take away from the transportation system in western Canada in terms of rail transport and augment air transport in other parts of the country? I applaud the Government for improving transportation services in parts of northern Canada, but I do not think it should be at the cost of transportation to Canadians in other vital sectors of our economy, such as in agriculture and in the prairie provinces.

I hope that the Special Recovery Capital Projects program is not all allocated in these Estimates. I hope there is still some room for negotiation with this Government. However, I do see a great deal of that money already allocated in the 1984-85 Estimates. On much of this I do not think that Members of Parliament have had a chance to give input or opinion. I hope the Government will consult with Members of Parliament in the Opposition because I think we understand at least our own constituencies much better than someone else who does not represent the West. We represent western Canada in this particular case, Mr. Speaker. I would value the chance to give opinions on the development of transportation as well as on other vital sectors of our economy in the West.

I see my time is running out. I understand there will be time for questions. I look forward to the opportunity to ask questions of the President of the Treasury Board along with members of the New Democratic Party. I look forward to receiving an explanation to some of the things that we think are lacking in the 1984-85 Estimates.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The rule of thumb the Chair will follow at this point will be to recognize a question period approximately equal to that of the original statement made by the President of the Treasury Board. The Chair will give priority in questions, in reply to the Hon. Member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish), to Hon. Members who have not had an opportunity to make comments.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Gray). Could he explain why no appropriation had been made in the Estimates for any deficits that might come as a result of the Government's ownership of Canadair and de Havilland? Or is it the view of the Government that we are going to sell sufficient Challenger jets to cover the interest costs on $1.4 billion owed by Canadair and sufficient aircraft to more than carry and pay the requirements of the debt of some $460 million owed by de Havilland?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I believe the Minister responsible for the two companies has already indicated that some additional financial support from the federal Government will be required. It is the intention of the Government to request parliamentary approval for this support in the final Supplementary Estimates (C) which, once they are approved by Cabinet, will be tabled, hopefully, before too long.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, the Minister will know that in his Estimates tabled today there is a provision for Supplementary Estimates (C) in the amount of $2.475 billion. When will they be tabled? Is it the Minister's view that the appropriations in those Supplementary Estimates (C) will handle all the requirements of Canadair and de Havilland so that there will be no requirement for any estimate for Canadair and de Havilland in the 1984-85 Estimates?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I will be able to answer that question once Cabinet finishes its consideration of items to go in the final Supplementary Estimates (C). It is my understanding that there will be a number of items in Supplementary Estimates (C) which will not be devoted only to Canadair and de Havilland. With respect to the degree to which these Supplementary Estimates will cover financial requirements for Canadair and de Havilland, I think we will have to go into that once we have the Supplementary Estimates and the responsible Minister before the relevant committee. I hope and expect, for that matter, that it will be possible to table the final Supplementary Estimates in the next few weeks. As I said, this is being considered at the level of Cabinet at the present time.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, the Estimates reflect spendings on the Petroleum Incentives Program, which ranged in 1982-83 from $1.808 billion to a projected $1.634 billion in 1983-84 and $1.6 billion in 1984-85. The Minister mentioned that those are among some of the largest expenditures in the Estimates. The total value of that program until 1984-85 will be $5.042 billion, about half of which appears to have been invested in the Beaufort Sea area. The Japanese Government has indicated that it was removing itself from this particular operation in the Beaufort Sea because there was no chance of striking oil in the area, and the Estimates indicate that we have invested an enormous amount of money, about $2.2 billion, and will continue to do so. Certainly there are numerous other projects related to that company's involvement, such as the LNG one at Prince Rupert which there is talk about cancelling.

Given the fact that the Japanese, based on data which they have from Dome Petroleum, have reached the conclusion that there is no oil to be found there, will the Government continue to comply with program criteria in order to have authority to spend these enormous amounts of dollars that are now being spent in a manner which does not or should not comply with program criteria?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, this program is not limited to assistance to Dome Petroleum for its exploration and development activities in the Beaufort Sea. It also goes to support exploration and development in the Sable Island area, offshore of Nova Scotia.

Mr. Forrestall: And, you hope, to ship building.

Mr. Gray: It goes to support exploration and development activities offshore of Newfoundland. It goes to support exploration and development activities throughout Canada, to companies which meet the criteria. By the way, these are primarily Canadian companies.

As my hon. friend on the other side of the House points out, money spent under this program for exploration and development goes indirectly toward supporting activities by other sectors such as the Canadian shipbuilding sector for supply vessels, rigs and those sorts of things. Even with respect to the Beaufort Sea, we are not talking only about Dome. We are talking about other companies like Esso, Gulf and Petro-Canada. Therefore, I do not think it would be fair to suggest that, whatever is the situation with respect to Dome, this particular program is not as valuable and useful as I think it is for the Canadian economy. Certainly, as I understand the program, money is spent as exploration and development work is carried out. If there are companies which do less exploration and development work, obviously they receive less funds from the program. This is something which I am sure the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Chrétien) would be very pleased to explore in detail with my hon. friend when he appears before the relevant parliamentary committee which will be studying the Estimates.

I would say that the program has proven itself and will continue to prove itself to be a very valuable way of assisting the overall development of the Canadian economy, particularly the resource sectors, by encouraging exploration and development primarily of Canadian companies. I do not know why my hon. friend has become so conservative that he seems to be opposing exploration activities by Canadian companies.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I believe the Minister mentioned that it was one of the eight largest expenditures in the Budget. I wish my colleague in the Conservative Party would recognize that it is his Party which is holding up legislation that might in fact improve shipbuilding.

Mr. Blenkarn: Nonsense, absolute nonsense.

Mr. Skelly: We all know that an enormous amount of shipbuilding has gone offshore. I challenge the Minister to name a rig working in the Beaufort Sea which was built in Canada. Be that as it may, I return to the fact that there is no time to explore this with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Chrétien). There is barely enough time for the House to explore the question. I believe, as do many other people, that the country will be damaged if in fact the company with which we are dealing today and which is taking roughly half these expenditures goes down the drain.

With the announcement of the Japanese today, and in view of the fact that Dome owes roughly $4.2 billion to the Canadian and American consortium of banks and that Citicorp which is owed $1.4 billion is demanding payment now, it could easily be that the company would fold up before the House or the committee has had a chance to consider it. It is important for many aspects of the Canadian economy, for many industries and suppliers, that we should deal with it now. It would be very helpful if the Minister could indicate whether or not the Government intends to continue spending those horrendous amounts of PIP dollars. Does the Government intend to put up the $500 million to bail out Dome? Just exactly what are we bailing it out for, when the Japanese say that there is no oil at the bottom of the Beaufort Sea, when they are prepared to walk away and leave a half billion dollar investment and to shut down an LNG project on the West Coast because they do not believe Dome has the financial strength to invest in the program and bring it to completion? What is going through the minds of the other creditors of Dome, the Canadian and American banks? If they call Dome and it goes into insolvency, what happens to Canada? What happens to the Davie shipyard? What happens to the mines and the conventional activities of Dome? The question is so serious that it is the time to deal with it now. It is time the Minister told the House whether they are complying with program requirements to take up additional billions of dollars. If they are not, perhaps we should look hard at ways of spending those additional dollars in ways which would be more helpful to Canadians, perhaps along the lines of the Japanese. It is a cut bait and run situation.

Mr. Gray: I am delighted to note the calls of the Hon. Member for a massive rescue operation for Dome. His hon. friend, in responding to my statement on the Estimates, complained about alleged excessive support for big companies. My hon. friend seems to be calling for a massive move to rescue a big company. I would be happy to bring his representations to the attention of the Minister of Finance and to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Of course we hope there will be consideration, if necessary, of such a step for which my hon. friend is calling. He is an unusual friend of big business, nevertheless we have to take his comments seriously as an Hon. Member of the House and bring them to the attention of the appropriate Ministers. However, I want to stress that the Petroleum Incentives Program grants are not limited to Dome. They are available to companies operating offshore in the Atlantic, in other frontier areas and throughout Canada. The expenditure of money by the Government will have to be based upon the approval of these Estimates by Parliament and, more than that, following upon the terms and conditions of legislation adopted by the House. As far as I am aware, the Department has a considerable staff whose job it is to ensure that the terms and conditions are being met. If my hon. friend has any facts to indicate the opposite, certainly the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and I would be very happy to have that information.

In any event, if the firms in question are not meeting the eligibility requirements for this money, then, even if it is provided for in the Estimates, it will not be spent, and there will be a lapse in these funds and this will be reflected in the financial situation at the end of the fiscal year. In conclusion, even though it comes from a most unlikely source, this anguished plea for the immediate rescue of a very large business, I will bring it promptly to the attention of the Minister of Finance and of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The Minister should stop misleading the House. He knows that we called for not one more—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Hon. Member is engaging in debate, and a fairly lengthy one. The Chair will recognize the Hon. Member for Mississauga South and the Hon. Member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, last year the Minister had a central reserve in the Estimates of $900 million. This year he has reduced the central reserve to $800 million, even though he has dramatically increased the estimated expenditure by over 10.4 per cent. Why is the central reserve reduced when the total amount proposed to be spent is dramatically higher? The normal practice was to have a central reserve in excess of 1 per cent of the spending. This is now down to .8 per cent of anticipated spending. Is this just to pretend that budget figures will not be as much in the hole as they will in fact turn out to be?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, the proposal for the size of the central reserve is based on a careful assessment by officials of its possible use to fund programs pending the necessity of dealing with them in supplementary estimates and the other usual purposes. I thought my hon. friend would welcome this type of effort at restraint. I will check this with my officials in the light of his comments. Certainly if there are grounds for having a higher central reserve, I will be happy to bring this proposal to the attention of the Minister of Finance and Cabinet.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, the Minister will know that including the central reserve last year, he had a reserve against program envelopes of $2.4 billion, for a total reserve including the central reserve of $3.3 billion. He has thus far broken out $5.763 billion in his Estimates. In other words, he did not have enough reserves last year by $2.4 billion, yet this year he reduces his reserves and pretends that he will not have any supps and that he will not break those reserve limits. Why will the Minister not come clean with the House right now? Realizing that supplementary estimates have invariably spent $5 billion to $6 billion, why will he not make those kinds of reserves in this budget and in his estimates when he prepares them in the first place? Let's not keep kidding people.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, as far as I am aware, the envelope figures in question have been sufficient to accommodate supplementary estimates. Obviously if the Minister of Finance provides a revised fiscal framework and adjusts the envelopes, that is something that has to be considered subsequent to the tabling of main estimates. Unlike last year when the Main Estimates preceded the Budget, in this case we have a return to the more traditional approach where the Budget presented by the Minister of Finance has preceded the tabling of Main Estimates. I am glad my hon. friend has noted that obviously our total outlay and the framework it represents has to have room in it for supplementary estimates. That is why we have a figure for envelope reserves. As far as I am aware, we have not presented to the House in the past since setting up this envelope system, and it is an action which has been shared with the preceding government, offered supplementary estimates in excess of the fiscal framework stipulated by the Minister of Finance. I will certainly note his point. As far as I am aware, we have been consistent with the concept of the envelope system, including having supplementary estimates presented to the House when required which fit in within the envelope reserve figure.

I want to add, with respect to the Hon. Member's interesting question about the central reserve, that it does reflect a point I made in my statement, that is, that the Main Estimates do reflect a more optimistic view which the Government shares with the private sector about the state of the economy. The size of the central reserve as a result reflects that, anticipating there will not be some of the same kinds of demands on it as was the case last year when the economy was just beginning to enter into the phase of recovery.

Mr. Speaker: At this point the Chair has certain difficulties. The Hon. Member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake seeks to be recognized, but he did have 23 minutes of comment. There are other Hon. Members who have not had an opportunity. If the Hon. Member wants to ask a question at this time, will he please be brief.

Mr. Anguish: Mr. Speaker, yes, I will be brief. I have always viewed comments and questions as two different matters. My question to the President of the Treasury Board concerns job creation. It is a very unfair comparison in the papers accompanying the Estimates to compare the 1983-84 Estimates to the 1984-85 Estimates. As we are well aware that there are no public accounts yet for the 1983-84 fiscal year, but there are forecast expenditures, what the Government expects to spend in 1983-84. Will the Minister please tell us in terms of percentage and actual dollars how much more money is estimated to be spent in the 1984-85 fiscal year than the actual forecast of expenditures for 1983-84?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure I understand my hon. friend's question. I gather he is talking about the issue of job creation. He is raising a very useful point. I might say in passing that when he suggests it is unfair to compare main estimates to main estimates, I recall the Hon. Member for Mississauga South making a very big point last year that we were allegedly not basing our comparison on main estimates to main estimates. I suppose it all depends on what approach one thinks will make a certain point. It is certainly valid to compare main estimates to main estimates. It is also valid as part of the overall study of the issue to compare total forecast expenditure with what is in these estimates. I am sorry I am not able to calculate a percentage in my head on the spot, but if one takes the figures in the Estimates that I just tabled for job creation and add to that $150 million additional from the Budget for the Youth Opportunity Fund and the close to $1 billion to be spent this coming fiscal year for the Special Recovery Capital Projects, one will certainly have a figure for assistance for the creation of jobs through fairly direct activity by the federal Government which will exceed by a respectable amount, to say the least, what is forecast with respect to 1983-84.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, a short while ago the Minister alluded to the fact that the PIP grants, the structure and the system, encourage and lend support to the Canadian shipbuilding industry. The Minister might want to correct that. Recently a Newfoundland company ordered two fairly large and quite expensive offshore anchor and supply rigs from a company in Korea. It did so because it becomes a cost, and cost is part of the formula under which PIP picks it up. In the preparation of the Estimates, did the President of the Treasury Board consider the impact of the PIP grants as presently constituted on the Canadian shipbuilding industry? Did he consider their impact on temporary input of foreign vessels for offshore work, particularly on the East Coast? Was that impact fully considered by his officials and officials in the Ministry of Finance and the Ministry of Energy? On reflection, the Minister might want to agree that PIP grants, as constituted with respect to construction of offshore vessels and rigs with respect to temporary import duties or full duties that are paid on foreign registered ships operating in Canadian waters, are in fact detrimental and not as he suggested?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has raised a useful point. One of the reasons I made the comment in answer to a question raised by a colleague earlier was that I thought he was encouraging me to link the operation of the PIP grants to the Canadian shipbuilding industry in a favourable way. In fact he is saying that I misunderstood his comment whispered across the floor of the House. If that is so, I will be happy to look into the matter further.

It is my impression that there is more money being spent in Canada for goods, materials and equipment than would otherwise be the case if there were no PIP grants and the resulting encouragement of exploration and development by oil companies. I think that could certainly be demonstrated.

With respect to the vessels that my hon. friend has said would be constructed in Korea, I would be interested in knowing what degree of Canadian content there is in these vessels, machinery, equipment and so on. I would not be surprised if, even though the vessels are built in Korea and the hulls are made there, there would not be some respectable degree of Canadian equipment.

I think I am right in my overall assertion that a lot more is being spent in Canada, not only for salaries and wages for Canadian workers, but also for machinery, equipment and other things than would be the case if we did not have the PIP program with the resulting favourable effect on exploration and development of oil and gas in Canadian territorial waters and on land in Canada.

I will be happy to examine my hon. friend's question further because he raises an interesting point. I should like to observe, however, that if there is a problem, it would seem to me that the solution lies not so much in the structure of the PIP program but in the operation of our temporary duty system, rules for coasting vessels and that sort of thing.

Mr. Speaker: At this point the Chair has a certain difficulty. The initial statement of the Minister was 23 minutes, the Official Opposition commentary took 30 minutes, and the New Democratic Party took 23 minutes. Then we had 24 minutes of questions and answers.

The Chair is in the hands of the House. This is the normal time limit that the Chair has observed on statements by Ministers, which, incidentally, are becoming more and more rare in the House and I am pleased to see the Hon. Minister use this route to reveal information to the House. The Chair would like at this point to terminate the question and answer period according to the rule of thumb that has been observed to this point, and proceed to other items of routine business.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 86, 352, 394, 447, 492 and 526.

REGIONAL INDUSTRIAL EXPANSION—PUBLIC RELATIONS

Question No. 86—Mr. Howie:

How many persons engaged in public relations, media relations or publicity are employed by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion is as follows:

A total of 162 persons are engaged in public relations, media relations or publicity. This figure encompasses officers and support personnel from both our headquarters and regional offices providing information on departmental programs and services as they relate to regional industrial assistance and tourism.

EXPENDITURE FOR MONTREAL SPECIAL AREA

Question No. 352—Mr. St. Germain:

Since April 1980, under the Industrial Incentives Program for the Montreal Special Area, what was the total expenditure by the government?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion from April 1, 1980 to December 31, 1983 is as follows: $112,407,107.

FEDERAL COURT ACT

Question No. 394—Mr. Howie:

What was the cost of providing additional staff and refurbishing offices for the six new judges provided by the amendment to the Federal Court Act?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Minister of Justice): Since no accommodations have been found to date to locate the six new judges, the actual cost incurred up to the present time is $20,141.70, representing $18,600 for secretaries' salaries and $1,541.70 to locate judges in temporary offices in the library of the Supreme Court.

On the other hand, the total costs approved by Treasury Board for secretaries' salaries, telephones, rental, stationery and supplies, furniture and fixtures amounts to in 1983-84, $347,000; 1984-85, $166,104.

The total cost approved for the fit-up and rental cost of six new judges' chambers and work area, storage, secretarial and law clerks offices, reception area and small library amounts to in 1983-84, $380,500; 1984-85, $259,500.

It is to be noted that these costs are decreasing between 1983-84 and 1984-85 since there will be no capital investments after the first year.

CANADIAN PAVILION, DISNEY WORLD

Question No. 447—Mr. Howie:

To the knowledge of the Government are the Maritime Provinces overlooked in the national description of foods displayed and served in restaurants at the Canadian Pavilion in the Epcot Centre at Disney World, Florida and, if so, for what reason?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): The "Canadian Pavilion" at Epcot Centre, Disney World, is solely and totally a creation of Disney World. This matter therefore does not fall within the administrative responsibility of the Government of Canada.

Order Paper Questions

To the knowledge of the Government, what total amount was spent, to date, by Canada for development of the Canadian Pavilion in the Epcot Centre at Disney World, Florida?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): No moneys were spent by the Canadian Government for the development of the Canadian Pavilion in the Epcot Centre at Disney World, Florida. The Canadian Pavilion is solely and totally a creation of Disney World. See reply to question No. 447 answered this day.

CANADA COUNCIL ADVERTISEMENT IN "CINEMA CANADA"

Question No. 526—Mr. Huntington:

1. Did the Canada Council place two advertisements, one in French and one in English, in the January issue of Cinema Canada and, if so (a) for what reason (b) how much did each 125 x 18mm advertisement cost?

2. Is it a Council policy to place French language advertisements in English language publications?

3. How much will Canada Council spend on advertising this fiscal year?

Hon. Francis Fox (Minister of Communications): I am advised by the Canada Council as follows:

1. Yes, indirectly, through the Academy of Canadian Cinema (a) to invite applications in the Council's "Short Film Showcase" program, which is administered through the Academy, (b) $265.

2. The policy is to advertise in both languages, and to use the publication or publications most likely to reach the target audience. In this instance, Cinema Canada is the only regular monthly publication reaching the target audience which accepts advertisements.

3. Estimated approximately $135,000 for all advertisements for competitions, exhibitions, staff recruitment and all other purposes.

[English]

Mr. Evans: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, could the Parliamentary Secretary tell us when question No. 480 will be answered, which was placed on the Order Paper on January 24. It concerned the breakdown by constituency of moneys spent under the Special Employment Initiatives Program.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I will certainly look into it. It was my understanding that today the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Roberts) tabled the entire list of all job-creation programs in response not only to this question but to others. I will check with the Minister and see if it was his intention that that was to act as a reply to the Hon. Member. Certainly, if it was not, I will check with the Minister and see if we cannot get that specific information for him.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, for the information of the Parliamentary Secretary, I examined the returns tabled today by the Minister of Employment and Immigration. There is a breakdown for the Special Employment Initiatives Program by province, town, village, hamlet and city but not by constituency. It is going to take weeks and weeks to figure it out by constituency. We cannot really get a true picture of whether the program was impartially and objectively administered or whether it was used as a politically partisan porkbarrel. That question cannot be answered precisely until we have a constituency breakdown, and we did not get it today.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I shall certainly check into that. I should alert the Hon. Member that according to Beauchesne's and the Standing Orders, any information that is publicly available in any other place is not appropriate for a question on the Order Paper.

Mr. Speaker: The questions enumerated by the Parliamentary Secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the Government and the amendment of Mr. Crosbie, (page 1445) and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Riis (page 1448).

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, we have seen the Government raise the art of deception to new levels in recent days but I do not suppose it ever surpassed its efforts as it did the other day when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) brought down his Budget. He called this document a program of action. As far as most Canadians are concerned, I can tell him that it is a non-event, a non-starter that is going nowhere, a vehicle that ran out of steam before it ever got started.

How can one consider that the Budget is anything but a non-event? Does it do anything at all for the unemployed? The answer is no. Does it do anything for the national debt? Again the answer is no. Does it do anything for the deficit, for research and development or for investment? To all of these vital questions which lie at the very heart of any endeavour to achieve economic recovery in the country, the answer again and again is no.

I believe that this so-called Budget is little more than an apology to the people of Canada by the Government for the admission of failure, which it surely is. It is an apology for the Government's inability to exercise either fiscal responsibility or moral authority at a critical time in the country's history.

If you read it you will see that it apologizes to small business for the hopeless mess it made of the tax system. It apologizes to taxpayers for the abuses it has permitted in the Department of National Revenue. It continues to apologize to the oil and gas industry for the massive damage the National Energy Program has done to that industry. That program was introduced by the Minister of Finance in a previous existence. This morning the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) stood in her place and apologized because the supposed pension reforms were so very limited, as well she might. However, as with many apologies, the Minister's Budget presentation is also self-serving. Mitigating circumstances are presented as virtues and promises to do better in the future and heralded as if they were already a fait accompli. "We will have 5 per cent growth this year," the Minister declares. "We will reduce unemployment to 7.5 per cent by 1988. The deficit will fall next year or perhaps the year after or the year after that". However, Sir, what I would like to ask the Minister is, what do all these brave forecasts and future expectations give Canadians today? What good does talking about tomorrow do for someone who has lost his or her job more than a year ago and has no more hope of finding a job today than he or she did then? What good is $150 million in youth employment funds when it works out to $5 per person per week? What good is mortgage insurance to those thousands who have already lost their homes?

For our part, we welcome mortgage insurance. It was, after all, the cornerstone of the Budget which was introduced by my colleague, the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), back in 1979. That, Mr. Speaker, was the only innovative, responsive and responsible Budget to be presented to this House in a good many years, and what happened to it? It was rejected by the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party combined. This Party offered mortgage insurance more than four years ago when it would really have helped thousands of Canadians to keep their homes through the recession. This Government has had four years since then in which to introduce such insurance, but it only brings it out now when, according to the Minister of Finance the danger is over. Why that lengthy wait?

This non-budget, this non-event, must be judged a failure by any standard. The Minister had the opportunity to take decisive action, to give Canadians concrete proposals, and he fluffed it, he blew it, and nowhere is his failure more apparent than in his response to the question of pension reform. Four years ago, Mr. Speaker, this Government announced that pension reform was to be one of its key priorities. For three years we waited and waited. Finally, we received the green paper which was released by the Minister of National Health and Welfare and subsequently this House authorized a parliamentary task force to hold hearings and make recommendations on pension reform. Now, in the last weeks and months of a Parliament which has already surpassed the normal time period of any legitimate Parliament, in the final weeks and months of the term of this body, the Minister of Finance has taken the first faltering steps toward the implementation of reform and, as usual, he has missed the mark once again. He declared in the House last Wednesday when he was presenting his Budget measure, "The Government will never turn its back on those who spend their working lives helping to build this country and who now need help themselves". Never turn its back on that group of people? Never, Mr. Speaker? Then why is it that we have right now in this country more than 600,000 Canadians over the age of 65 who are living in poverty? The $50 a month increase in the guaranteed income supplement will be welcome, make no mistake, even if its recipients have to wait another 10 months before they get the total amount. Why do they have to wait 10 months? That has not been explained, and was not explained this morning by the Minister of National Health and Welfare when she spoke. However, I would say to you, Sir, that a $50 increase is not a solution to the problem of poverty or of pension reform.

The parliamentary task force recommended an immediate increase—not an increase 10 months down the road—of $102 a month for those most in need. The $50 proposed increase will still leave single pensioners who rely entirely on the old age pension and the guaranteed income supplement almost $2,000 below the poverty line in any medium-sized city across this country.

Certainly, anyone in this House would agree with the proposals to amend the Pension Benefits Standards Act to ensure that survivor benefits will no longer be cut off if the recipient remarries. We all agree with having pension credits split equally between spouses on marriage breakdown and at age 65. Those proposals are not contentious. They have been around for a long time. Hon. Members on all sides of the House have been advocating that something be done about them. They could have been introduced many budgets ago if the Minister of Finance had wanted to do so, but he did not. However, he has finally come forward with them now. His only claim to merit in bringing in these proposals is that he has seen fit not to overlook them once again. But where the Minister cannot lay any claim to merit of any kind, Sir, is in virtually all of the other proposals with regard to pension reform. These proposals fly in the face of not only the task force recommendation but particularly the recommendations by the many women's groups and organizations which appeared before the parliamentary task force.

One of the witnesses before that parliamentary task force was, of course, the Minister of National Health and Welfare. She came before the task force on March 17, 1983, almost a year ago, Mr. Speaker. The evidence which she gave presumably reflected not only her own opinion, but surely that of her Department, the Government, and the Cabinet of which she is a member. Last March she said, and I quote:

> I believe coverage is the key issue of pension reform. I really mean extension of coverage to all workers, and that is on a universal basis. That is what I mean.

She went on:

> You see, the majority of working Canadians do not belong to private pension plans. Only 54 per cent of men and 38 per cent of women in paid employment are protected by a private pension plan. These are cold, hard facts.

Those are the words of the Minister, Mr. Speaker, "Cold, hard facts". I would say to her that they are made all the colder by her colleague, the Minister of Finance. This Budget does nothing, absolutely nothing, to further the key issue which the Minister declared, which, as we all know, is the issue of coverage. The Minister may well schedule discussions with her provincial counterparts at a later date—who knows when—to explore the introduction of the homemaker's pension under the Canada-Quebec Pension Plan. I am very aware that it is an item which needs to have the approval of two-thirds of the provinces with two-thirds of the population. However, it is not enough, Sir, for the federal Government to simply put it on the agenda. The federal Government has to become the advocate of that plan. A commitment to discussion, Sir? Discussions on this issue have been going on since 1970 when it was a recommendation of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. A commitment to discussion surely is not enough for the millions of Canadian women who work in the home and contribute as much as those in the paid labour force to the wellbeing of our society. They want to be sure that the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and her colleague, the Minister of Finance, will be fighting on their behalf to have the Canada-Quebec Pension Plan extended to homemakers. But there is absolutely nothing which gives that guarantee.

The insistence of women on this particular issue was very well documented by the National Action Committee on the Status of Women. On January 16 of this year, prior to the Budget proposals, they wrote to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) and sent me and other members of the Parliamentary Task Force a copy of the letter. In it they said:

> Thousands of women have expressed to us their dislike of the present treatment of homemakers in the Canada-Quebec Pension Plan, and of the inadequacy of the green paper recommendations in that regard. Most women are full or part-time homemakers want to be recognized as workers and be entitled to pensions in their own right. They do not trust widows pensions that are based on their husband's income and that disappear if the marriage ends in divorce. Therefore, we strongly urge you to support the task force's proposals which will grant homemakers direct coverage under the Canada Quebec Pension Plan.

That, Sir, came from the largest umbrella organization covering women's groups in this country. The right to pension coverage for the people of whom they are speaking, the homemakers, was not addressed. A few simple words in the Budget was all it would have taken to give encouragement to these people that the Government recognizes their work and their achievements in their own right. Let me suggest to the Minister of Finance what those words might have been. He might have said: We fully support the full concept of homemakers pensions and we want to do all we can to introduce them. That is all it would have taken, but it was not done.

There is another major part of the pension proposals I want to address, Mr. Speaker. I know my time is limited, but it concerns the way in which the Government has gone about addressing RRSPs. Increasing the limits of RRSPs will surely not help the 46 per cent of male and 62 per cent of female workers in the paid labour force who presently have no private coverage. It may help those who can afford to put $10,000 a year in such plans and I am sure it will be welcomed by those who are earning in excess of $55,000 a year. But what about the 94 per cent of Canadian wage earners who do not earn $55,000? In particular, what about the great majority of Canadians who earn less than $30,500 a year and who will not benefit by one penny from this $300 million exercise in largesse by the Minister? They are ignored and forgotten, Sir. There is not even an indication of a concept in this Budget to provide the means of private pension coverage to the many Canadians who earn between $10,000 and $30,000 a year. But that is an issue which the parliamentary task force did address. It put forward a very simple proposal for a straightforward 40 per cent tax credit which would have allowed many of these workers, particularly women, to achieve private pension plans.

This Budget and the pension proposals in it show that the Government has its priorities all wrong. It provides an extra $300 million in benefits for those who already have pension coverage, while at the same time completely ignoring homemakers as well as low and middle income workers who have no pension coverage other than the Canada Pension Plan. It particularly ignores the plight of the many thousands, mostly women, who find themselves in the lost age bracket between 60 and 65 who have little or no income, have lost their spouses, yet are ineligible for pension. The $300 million the Minister is giving to those with incomes in excess of $55,000 a year would more than provide pensions for that group of persons. But the Minister would not turn his attention to those people and neither would the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), who always has a very strident voice and is very self-righteous when it comes to pensions, and keeps making very serious mistakes, the cause for which I do not understand. Does she know that all of the big new expenditure in the Budget goes to single pensioners, most of them women, and that it will not be taxed back at 100 per cent as the task force of which the Hon. Member was a member wanted to do, and with which I must say I have to disagree? Does she know that when she very loudly recommends that single pensioners get an additional $102 or something around there, as recommended by the task force on which she sat, she would give a little more to a very small number of pensioners on GIS provided they are in total, absolute poverty and do not have an additional penny other than the OAS and the supplement? Through her proposal, which she is pushing again despite all the explanations I have given to her and other members of the committee, every recipient of the GIS will lose $1 for any dollar of other income. Some of them are facing the ridiculous situation where, because of all the provincial top-up programs, they will lose $1.50 for every dollar they have managed to put aside from other sources of revenue.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I have never felt it necessary to comment on the Minister's voice or any other personal characteristic. I do not consider that to be parliamentary.

Miss Bégin: Would you answer the question?

Miss MacDonald: Yes, I know what the parliamentary task force recommended. It was $102 for those who were most in need. I say to the Minister that until she and her Government are prepared to address the issue of pension reform for those who have no opportunity to enter pension programs—and I am talking about 2.7 million women who are now full-time homemakers—until she is prepared to make plans so that low income people in the work force are provided with the incentive and tax credit to get into private pension plans, we are going to have a continuing number of people over the age of 65 who will be living in poverty. That is the issue she and her colleagues ducked.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I did not get an answer to my question, which was very simple. Why did the Member just now recommend once more that all pensioners—we are talking about today, not about some ideal future we are trying to get to—who receive partial GIS be penalized dollar for dollar? I do not understand that and I would like an answer.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, obviously the Minister can only think of the future as being ideal.

Miss Bégin: No, the present.

Miss MacDonald: Some of us want to see steps taken right now, today, so that people do not live in poverty in the future. Can the Minister get that through her head?

Miss Bégin: Why not answer the question?

Miss MacDonald: On the question of those who would have received $102 a month under the parliamentary task force proposal, that would have benefited the people who are living today in the worst poverty in this country, and benefited them most. What she will not do is to recognize that what her plan does is to leave so many, many pensioners in this country today almost $2,000 below the poverty line. That is what her plan does. That is what she seems to be prepared to do rather than correct it.

• (1720)

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) was muttering something about unparliamentary language. I must tell you she is the quickest one off the mark to make personal comments.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order, order. We had better stay away from the personal remarks and stick to questions and answers.

Mr. Mayer: Poor little fellow.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, we have a problem here—

Mr. Mayer: Yes, we are looking at it.

Mr. Fisher: —with policy priorities and credibility from the Tories. I would like to ask the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands about her policies and priorities and where they fit in the general credibility of the Tory Party.

As I look across the aisle today, and as Canadians look at the Tory Party, we see the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) in the ascendancy. We see the Hon. Member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) is still a very strong voice. The Member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) is a strong voice. All of them are arguing cut, cut, cut. They are saying the deficit is terrible, the Canadian people cannot carry these heavy burdens, etc. They know the expenditures which are vulnerable are the expenditures on people. The services we provide to people are the things they are going to cut.

What services and priorities would a "mean, nasty, tough-minded" Minister of Finance in the Tory Party cut? I would like to hear some priorities among people rather than the usual propaganda we get from the other side.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I am so pleased to be asked this question. I can tell the Hon. Member that there are three priorities in the social field that this Party and its Leader have stated. We only wish the Government would wake up to them.

One happens to be jobs for people who are unemployed so they can begin to get back their self dignity and begin to be contributing and productive members in the economy and pay revenues into the Government.

Another social program which we have said would receive much more attention than the limited Bill which the Minister has put forward, is the reform of the health care system in the country. This is vitally needed by people who cannot get into hospitals and by hospitals for which there is no capital funding.

The third issue, which we have been addressing continually, is in the field of pension reform. We have been asking for it for the last four years throughout the life of the Government. We raised questions three years ago, two years ago and a year ago with the Minister of Finance. We asked where the funding was for the people over the age of 65 living below the poverty line. Every time that question was raised, the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Health and Welfare got up in the House, and said, "We will do it when the resources permit". Two years ago they told the elderly of the country they could not have any increase. They could put it into Canadair, Petro-Canada or Petrofina or any other thing, but could not give it to the elderly people of the country. Now, just before an election, they have suddenly discovered they can do something. The elderly people know that the priorities of this Party have long been to improve their position.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): That is the end of the period for questions and comments. The Hon. Member for Sudbury (Mr. Frith) on debate.

Mr. Doug Frith (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, before I begin I will say that I am going to turn some of my remarks in the latter part of my speech to the issues raised by the Member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) vis-à-vis the Government's commitment to pension reform, and I would like to answer some of the questions she has raised.

First, I would like to begin where the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands left off. She said that the priority of her Party is today's elderly. The only way in which I can determine what kind of commitment the Conservative Party actually has to the elderly in the country is to go back to the 1979 Budget for which it was responsible. At the time, the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands said that that was one of the better budgets introduced in the country in years. Looking back at that 1979 Budget to discover what moneys were allocated for the guaranteed income supplement, I see the answer is, zero. The only year in which we can judge the treatment of the elderly people in this nation by the Conservative Party is 1979. Not one extra dollar in that Budget was allocated for the guaranteed income supplement.

The Member for Kingston and the Islands knows that part of the election platform of the Liberal Party in 1980 was a commitment to increase the guaranteed income supplement by $35. I would like to remind the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands that that commitment was met within the first six months of the Government's taking office. Since that time, through this Budget, we have allocated a further $460 million to the poorest in our society. I am not sure the Member for Kingston and the Islands has any idea what her colleague, the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), has in mind for the elderly in the country.

The Hon. Member for St. John's West has consistently asked what the priorities of the Government are. A budget is a number of things, but in essence it is a blueprint which outlines the government's commitment to certain sectors of our population and economy. When one looks at the Budget which was tabled last week we see that the Government wants to increase the moneys being made available for today's elderly by $460 million. We recognize that we have a tremendous unemployment problem in the country, largely with the youth. We have allocated $150 million in addition to the $500 million that was allocated in the 1983-84 Budget. This was specifically designed to alleviate the problems of the unemployed youth in the country.

Yet when the Hon. Member for St. John's West commented on behalf of his Party about the priorities of the Government, he focused on the fact that we had done nothing to alleviate the problem of the federal deficit. All his remarks were based on reducing the size of the deficit. If in fact 75 per cent of our moneys go out in transfer payments and on the public debt, that leaves only 25 per cent on which I assume he is going to do some drastic cutting. I do not know what the Hon. Member for St. John's West means when he says he wants to have a substantial reduction in the size of the federal deficit. I assume it must mean $5 billion to $7 billion. Let us examine some ways in which we could reduce the size of the deficit by that amount. Is it going to occur in the $10.4 billion that is spent on pensions for the elderly? I doubt that very much. Is it the position of the Conservative Party that it is going to cut into the pensions of the elderly? Is it going to cut off the $2.3 billion in family allowance? Is that the position of the Conservative Party? Is it going to cut into the equalization payments from the federal Government to the provinces? The Conservatives say they want to put more money into medicare and the care of the elderly. If I understood the Conservative defence critic and foreign affairs critic properly, the Conservatives' position is that they want even more money in the Budget to deal with increased moneys spent on defence. If I am not mistaken, the finance critic for the Conservative Party has said he would favour a removal of the Canadian ownership special charge, which brought in some $700 million in the last fiscal year.

Clearly, when I listen to the Conservative Party, I have difficulty in understanding exactly what their policies are. If the Tories want a reduction in the deficit, they had better start telling the Canadian people where they will make the cuts. I suggest that they should realize that as a Party they are afraid to tell the Canadian people what those cuts would be. They are afraid of the repercussions if they told the elderly that they wanted to cut back on pensions. They are afraid to tell Canadians that there will be less money for medicare. They are afraid to tell the Canadian public that there will be less money for post-secondary education. Those are the answers Canadians are looking for, but not from us because we have clearly stated that we are on theside of the elderly and on the side of the poor and that we intend to maintain our commitments to the provinces.

That is not the position of the Conservative Party. In this year that precedes the next general election, I suggest that Canadians should have an idea of the policies that the Conservative Party will favour before Canadians make a decision.

The Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands asked about the federal commitment to pension reform. She said that evidently our commitment is not as strong as our words and that we are finally getting around to pension reform in our budget document. She suggested that the Conservative Party asked for that type of pension reform two years ago and that in effect there already was a commitment to the need for pension reform in the nation. The Hon. Member must know, having been a member of the special task force on pension reform that there was no consensus. That is precisely why the federal Government led to the formation of a parliamentary task force in order to travel throughout the country to determine where the consensus was before we could act.

I noticed that the Member for Kingston and the Islands suggested that the improvements to the Canada Pension Plan are long overdue. While I agree with her, I would point out to her that federal Conservative policy cannot be separated from provincial Conservative policy. In that respect the party that I would blame the most for blocking some of the needed improvements to the Canada Pension Plan is the Conservative Party. It was not the federal Government. I recall two years ago when the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) attended a joint conference with her provincial counterparts at which she suggested an immediate doubling of Canada Pension Plan disability payments. We were told at the time by the Treasurer of Ontario that he was totally opposed to any increase in the amount of Canada Pension Plan disability payments that were going to be made.

The Member for Kingston and the Islands knows full well that any changes to the Canada Pension Plan require approval of two-thirds of the provinces representing two-thirds of the population. In effect, Ontario has a veto power, because of the size of its population, on changes to the Canada Pension Plan. The Conservative Party of Ontario effectively used that veto power to stop the child drop-out provision in this country which we have been advocating for years. The Tories opposed it. We have been advocating the doubling of the Canada Pension Plan disability payment, and the Tories of Ontario have opposed it.

If we want to find a Party in this country which is inhibiting or blocking pension reform, I suggest that she look to her own Province of Ontario and begin to talk to the Conservatives at Queen's Park to have them come on side with the federal Liberals. We might then get pension reform much quicker.

I want to deal with equality and the fact that the Budget pays a great deal of attention to a comprehensive lifetime limit. I am not sure if the Member for Kingston and the Islands represents the points of view of her Party, but with respect to the increases in the amounts of money that will be allowed for tax deductible purposes, that is the increase in the Registered Retirement Savings Plan which is an integral part of pension reform in this country, that concept of a comprehensive lifetime limit introduces a degree of flexibility in the pension system that was never there before. It introduces a degree of equality in the system which was never there before.

She knows full well that the tax treatment with respect to pension plans for several groups in our society has not been equal. Surely the Member is not suggesting that she will defend on behalf of her Party the exclusion of equality for small business people in this country, and for farmers who desperately need that equality. This provision for equality of tax treatment improves that situation. It improves tax assistance for the self-employed in this country. These are all people for whom she has a great deal of concern.

The comprehensive lifetime limit provides equality to those people who, of their own volition, have no access to a private pension plan in their own name, and it also introduces a degree of equality to those people which has not been in the system until now. Surely she is not turning her back on the farmers of this country who have been pleading for better tax treatment on capital gains for the sales of their farms.

This Budget of the Minister of Finance will, in effect, remove any taxes payable by a farmer on the first $240,000 on the sale of the farm. Surely she is not opposed to that. We on this side of the House recognize that the small business people in this country are the engine for growth in our economy. Why should they not have the same access to tax assistance and the ability to plan for their future retirement years as we have given to people who have defined benefit plans? Surely she is not arguing that point.

What is her view with respect to self-employed professionals in this country? I know members of the NDP questioned that treatment in some of their remarks. Simply because someone is a lawyer, doctor, dentist or pharmacist, why should they be taxed differently from anyone else in the country? For once we have introduced a tax measure in this Budget that deals fairly with those groups, of which there are many. Frankly, I would favour giving even more small breaks to the small business people. We have given $150 million in tax deductions to them in this Budget.

If the Hon. Member recognizes, as we do, that we must give breaks to small business in order to create jobs and make a dent in the high unemployment rates in this country, she will not argue against those tax measures which we have introduced in the Budget.

The comprehensive tax limit introduces for the first time into retirement planning the greatest degree of flexibility possible in any pension system in the western industrialized countries. We are saying that young people in Canada who are raising a family, paying a mortgage but do not have sufficient funds to put aside for retirement purposes will no longer be penalized as they were in the previous system. According to that system, if one could not afford to put money aside for an RRSP, there was no provision for carry-forward. Under the new system, that will be possible for the first time. When a person is finished with his responsibility of caring for a family and paying a mortgage, perhaps when he reaches the age of 50, he will be allowed to have total flexibility in putting aside the carry-forward provision. He can put aside money on his own to better plan for his retirement and put less demand on the state when he hits the age of 65.

If there has been any advocate of pension reform in this country, it has been the Liberal Party. We have established royal commissions on pension reform. We have asked for a national pensions conference, which was not asked for by the Party of the Member for Kingston and the Islands during its short term in office. For them to suggest that there was consensus in this country on the direction of pension reform is doing a disservice to the actual degree of consensus that we did have in the early 1980s on pension reform.

I hope the Member for Kingston and the Islands will support the Budget measures and convince her colleagues not to delay the legislation we are asking for. If we bring in legislation to deal with the Federal Standards Benefits Act, surely there will not be any opposition to the idea of better vesting, a better degree of portability, of two-year vesting or better survivors' benefits. I expect that we should be able to get very quick legislative action with respect to opening the Federal Standards Benefits Act.

I think it is fair to say that the pension issue itself and the report by the parliamentary task force was a very beneficial and unique experience for all members of the committee, regardless of political affiliation. I suggest that the two Opposition Parties should pay compliments for the degree of response that was given by the Minister of Finance in his Budget to the recommendations in our report and, in particular to the swiftness of that response. Clearly he recognized that we had a political consensus in the country. I point out 8 of 9 members of that task force signed that report. The only dissenting opinion was given by the New Democratic Party. I would expect, with that degree of consensus, that we can get on with the job of reforming the pension system. For once rather than waiting for the Province of Ontario and other provinces to act, we have decided as a Government to lead by example. Therefore, the opening up of the Federal Standards Benefits Act and the opening up probably of the Public Service Superannuation Act will be a requirement. Surely when we open up the Income Tax Act to reflect the changes outlined in the Budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) we will not have any blocking tactics by the Progressive Conservative Party. I hope not. With respect to the commitment by the Hon. Member's Party, I hope that, as the spokesman for her Party, she represents her Party's viewpoints and that the Conservative Party is advocating the inclusion of homemakers in the Canada Pension Plan.

Miss MacDonald: More than your Party is.

Mr. Frith: Certainly if you are doing that, you will make it a lot easier for the present Minister of National Health and Welfare to set up negotiations with her provincial counterparts. Let me point out to the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands that we now have another treasurer in the Province of Ontario, unfortunately, still a Conservative treasurer. But he has not learned from the experiences of his predecessor, the Hon. Frank Miller, the Member for Muskoka. In a speech just six days ago to the Pension Plan Management Association, he said he was not in favour of two-year vesting; he wants only five years. He is not in favour of including homemakers in the Canada Pension Plan. I would hope that if anyone is advocating the inclusion of homemakers in the Canada Pension Plan, the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands after this evening's vote will get on the phone and phone Larry Grossman to tell him that it is a policy area which the federal Conservative Party wants implemented and ask him to stop the opposition to it. If that is the position of the federal Party, I hope that she can convince her provincial counterparts of the need for that kind of inclusion. I wish her luck. We did not have much luck, as I mentioned before. The disabled of this country should realize that because of the veto power in Ontario under the Canada Pension Plan the poorest of the poor, the neediest and the disabled, are deprived of disability benefits. This is the case because Frank Miller for five years has flogged a doubling of the Canada Pension Plan disability.

I ask you as Members of Parliament, what is your greatest problem in your constituencies? I expect you to say it is the people between the ages of 45 and 64 who, through misfortune, have found themselves having to rely solely on Canada Pension Plan disability payments to survive. I think we all recognize that the level of CPP disability is so dismally poor that it is one area on which we should be moving rather quickly. What have we ever had from the Province of Ontario? Nothing but blocking of our recommendations to double the Canada Pension Plan disability. I suggested that the federal Government will lead by example—

An Hon. Member: Some example.

Mr. Frith: There are a lot of things that we are going to be doing for Canadian women that will significantly improve their lot. Better survivor benefits will be introduced. For the first time we are going to mandate a minimum degree of inflation protection. That is something not even the Conservative Government of Ontario advocated until three days ago. I suggest that had it not been for the Minister of Finance and his commitment to pension reform in this Budget, we would not even have the degree of debate and consensus that has developed, such as was demonstrated by the Hon. Larry Grossman in the Province of Ontario who, probably by some fluke, decided on Sunday night to give a speech on pension reform, not knowing that pension reform was going to be an integral part of this Budget. At least we forced the Treasurer of Ontario to a commitment and a degree of commitment to pension reform that until now has not existed in the Province of Ontario. I am glad at least he has gone that far.

Last but not least I want to talk about that degree of inflation protection that we will give to Canadian workers in the private pension plan field. Surely, the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands knows that of all the representations we had from across the country the one workers wanted most of all was to have some degree of inflation protection built into the private pension plan system to reflect better the emerging world in which we live and with which we have to cope and deal on a day to day basis.

If the Conservative Party will allow quick passage of all the things we have included in pension reform in this Budget, it will make a much better tomorrow for Canadian workers than we have had until now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order, please. It being 5.45 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 64(6), to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the amendment to the amendment.

[English]

The question is on the amendment to the amendment. Mr. Riis, seconded by Mr. Deans, moves:

That the amendment be amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a comma, and by adding immediately thereafter the following words:

"and this House condemns the government for continuing the Liberal-Conservative policies that have produced record numbers of unemployed, widespread poverty among our elderly, and burdensome taxation for middle and low income Canadians; and this House further condemns the government for failing to introduce in this budget a fair recovery programme that would end unproductive tax concessions to corporations, rescind the $1.4 billion in consumer tax increases announced in the last budget, provide for mechanisms to deal fairly with job displacement resulting from technological change, and increase productive investments in those sectors of the economy which will be the backbone of any future economic prosperity."

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment to the amendment?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): All those in favour of the amendment to the amendment, will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): All those opposed, will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): In my opinion, the nays have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

The House divided on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Riis), which was negatived on the following division:

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S.O. 21

[English]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

YOUTH UNEMPLOYMENT RATE

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to underline the continuing tragedy of unemployment. Inability to find employment to provide for one's own needs and those of one's dependants is a demoralizing experience. It undermines one's self esteem and results in frustration and fear.

Unemployment is of particular concern to the youth in this country in that the rate for this group stands at over 20 per cent. This is a tragedy of unconscionable proportion. Starting out with visions of service, achievement, and financial security, young people are shocked to discover that their services are not wanted. Their expectations are shattered, and their hopes dashed.

Our young people are now suffering a second blow. Unable to find employment, many have decided to return to classrooms rather than remain idle. Recently we debated the lack of funding for post-secondary education. Tuition fees are rising dramatically, and those with limited financial resources are unable to pursue their studies. As well, many educational institutions are raising entrance requirements, and now, suffering a double-whammy, many of our young people are facing a situation which will have a shattering effect on their future.

The Government, Mr. Speaker, has been delinquent in not providing permanent employment opportunities for our youth or the economic stimulation that will enable the private sector to create those opportunities.

HEALTH

STATEMENTS MADE BY QUEBEC MINISTER OF SOCIAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, further to statements made before the Committee yesterday by the Quebec Minister responsible for Health, Mr. Johnson, and also to an article in the newspaper La Presse which said that there were no user fees in Quebec in the health services field, I would like to go back to what Mr. Johnson said on Pierre Pascau's program last week on CKAC, when he admitted there might be 7,000 cases in the Province of Quebec. Now, I do not know when Mr. Johnson was telling the truth, whether it was here or on the radio in Montreal, but I do know that this afternoon, Mr. Johnson's officials came to see officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare and discuss this serious problem. This, in fact, confirms comments made yesterday in Committee to Mr. Johnson, that Bill C-3 has shown that Quebec's supposedly perfect health services system has a number of flaws which have been there since the PQ came to power, because it is a fact that Quebec owes its efficient health services system to the Government of Mr. Robert Bourassa.

MULTICULTURALISM

TRIBUTE TO BALTIC CANADIANS

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, today we are joined by representatives of the Canadian Baltic community. This will mark the twelfth year in which parliamentarians have recognized the contributions of this community towards making Canada a better country in which to live. This occasion also presents an opportunity for all Canadians to reflect on the fragility and importance of our freedom.

The families of the Canadian Baltic communities who still live in Latvia, Estonia, and Lithuania have not experienced the advantages of freedom we are so familiar with in Canada. They have been struck by the tragedy of the loss of their freedoms. Members of this House are all aware of the desire for independence and freedom for which the Baltic people continue to fight. We in Canada can assist them by protecting our freedoms and way of life as diligently as they strive for their freedom and independence.

Canada is a bastion of freedom in a troubled world, a shining example of what many captive peoples strive for. Let us not forget whenever we demonstrate any weakness, be it economic, military or political, we are robbing those people living in Latvia, Lithuania, and Estonia of the hope and inspiration they need to sustain their continuing and sometimes discouraging fight for freedom.

BALTIC EVENING ON PARLIAMENT HILL

Mr. Laverne Lewycky (Dauphin-Swan River): Mr. Speaker, tonight will be our twelfth annual Baltic Evening on Parliament Hill. Over the years the celebrations have heightened our awareness of Latvian, Estonian, and Lithuanian Canadians and their contribution to Canada's multicultural society. One aspect of Canadian multiculturalism is the encouragement we give to cultural and linguistic retention.

In the area of heritage languages the Baltic Canadians have had one of the highest retention rates of all Canadian ethnocultural groups. The community's continuous efforts in preserving and sharing its cultural heritage enriches all Canadians.

Furthermore, they have also pressed hard for basic human rights in conformity with the principles embodied in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in the Charter of the United Nations. Their dedication to the principles of freedom, democracy, and human rights is a constant reminder to us all of the treasures of great value which we possess and which must be shared by all Canadians. These principles must become part of the promised Multiculturalism Act we intend to have in Canada.

HEALTH

ALARMING STATEMENTS MADE BY QUEBEC MINISTER OF SOCIAL AFFAIRS

Mrs. Éva Côté (Rimouski-Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, when he appeared before the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs yesterday, the Minister of Social Affairs for the Province of Quebec stated that Bill C-3, which relates to health and hospital services in Canada, would adversely affect the elderly and young children, especially.

Mr. Speaker, I am truly sorry to see the people of Quebec being brainwashed by false information that is strictly the result of an interpretation of Bill C-3 that is as erroneous as that given by the Provincial Minister. Free medication for the elderly and dental services for children from 0 to 15 years are not the kind of health services covered by Bill C-3 and are not among the services paid for by both levels of government.

Mr. Speaker, with respect, I fail to understand why the Minister of Social Affairs of the Province of Quebec is trying to scare Quebecers with his alarmist statements that have no basis in fact.

PENSIONS

CALL FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF HOMEMAKERS' PENSION SYSTEM

Mrs. Jennifer Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Mr. Speaker, in his presentation of the Budget on February 15 the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) stated that beginning this summer he will discuss with his provincial counterparts the possibility of introducing a homemaker's pension. I would urge the Minister of Finance to do more than simply discuss this important proposal recommended by the parliamentary Task Force on Pension Reform. I urge him to carry into his talks with the Provinces an absolute commitment to the homemaker's pension to be introduced at the earliest opportunity. I urge this in particular on behalf of the wives who are partners in Canada's many thousand family farms, in recognition that the farm wife is an integral and essential component of the family farm, sharing in the duties and labours, usually without financial reward because the farm income will not support it.

This is in contrast to the statements attributed to the Minister responsible for the status of women who said last year, "It is only the more affluent families in our society who allow a woman to stay at home."

I therefore urge the Minister of Finance to commit himself fully to the introduction of a homemaker's pension for all the homemakers who contribute so much to our society, but in particular for the many thousands of farm wives without whom the family farm, as we know it today, would cease to exist.

NATIONAL REVENUE

DEPARTMENT'S TREATMENT OF RETIRED TEACHER

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, a constituent of mine is unhappy with the attitude and course of action taken by Revenue Canada. This gentleman, a retired school teacher, found it necessary to sell his cottage. The cottage was sold by a reputable real estate company. The closing was handled by a respectable law firm, and his tax matters were taken care of by a well known accounting firm.

In May, 1982, he received a refund from Revenue Canada of $365. In July, 1982, he was reassessed for the amount of $950 and was told, "You are required to pay . . . immediately, otherwise legal action, either by way of garnishment or action in the Federal Court, which could result in seizure and sale of assets, may be initiated without further notice".

This gentleman is 81 years old and, along with his wife, supports their grandson. What would Revenue Canada have garnisheed? His Old Age Pension? Would they have seized the assets of a retired couple in their eighties, including their rocking chairs? What has happened to old fashioned fairness, justice, and equity?

Mr. Speaker, this 81 year old man paid the $950, but the attitude and methods of Revenue Canada will surely have to change.

EMPLOYMENT

CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—AMOUNT OF FUNDING

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, in the spending Estimates tabled yesterday the federal Government announced it would be cutting job creation program money which would go to adults. For example, the Canada Works Program will be cut in half by some $440 million. As a result of that cutback many Canadians who have benefited from that program, and similar programs in the past, will be unable to get assistance from the federal Government at a time when there are well over two million unemployed people in the country. As long as there is such a high unemployment rate it is immoral for the federal Government to take this action.

Earlier today it was announced that Sherritt Gordon Mines in northern Manitoba would be shutting down its operations in Leaf Rapids. The people involved will be looking for assistance and jobs. The attitude of the federal Government in cutting money at a time when unemployment is so high does nothing to help those people or the many Canadians who need help at this very difficult time in their lives.

SOCIAL SECURITY

INCLUSION OF WORKERS' COMPENSATION PAYMENTS IN CALCULATION OF INCOME

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate to find that thousands of Canadians living on limited incomes stand to lose money this year as a result of a federal tax change. The loss affects people over 65 who receive pensions from provincial workers' compensation boards. Previously workers' compensation board pensions were never taken into consideration in calculating whether someone over 65 was eligible for the federal Guaranteed Income Supplement. Under the change which takes effect this year, workers' compensation board pensions are now to be counted as part of a person's income.

This means, Mr. Speaker, that many pensioners who in the past qualified for Guaranteed Income Supplement benefits will no longer qualify, or will qualify for less assistance. This tax change will affect some 25,000 needy senior citizens. What it amounts to is a cutback in needed funds for pensioners. People who, last year and the previous year, were entitled to the Guaranteed Income Supplement, are now being denied it. This is an inequity that must be addressed and made right.

• (1415)

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), when she proudly referred to the extra $50 a month in supplement payments for single senior citizens, hastened to add that she hoped the provincial Governments would not increase costs to those seniors receiving benefits because of this increase. I think the shoe is now on the other foot and it is the federal Government which is penalizing needy seniors by this tax change.

Therefore I call upon the federal Government to rescind this obnoxious legislation which will cause untold hardship for a group of seniors who can ill afford a reduction in income.

EMPLOYMENT

SPECIAL EMPLOYMENT INITIATIVES PROGRAM—ALLOCATION OF FUNDS BY CONSTITUENCY

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. He will know that we have been trying to get information on the Special Employment Incentives Program since November of 1982. Yesterday he provided us with a bundle of material which included information on the Special Employment Initiatives Program. We now know that of $184 million spent to date under the Special Employment Initiatives Program, 80 per cent went to Liberal constituencies and less than 12 per cent went to Conservative constituencies.

Given the fact that this program was denied public input and was denied the input of Members of Parliament other than Liberals, how can the Minister responsible for Employment and Immigration stand in his place and justify denying these funds to the unemployed people in those constituencies not held by Liberals?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman asserts that those are the facts about the distribution. I do not know whether those figures which he has cited—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Roberts: —are correct or not. But it would not necessarily be very surprising, since Members on the other side of the House have been saying week in and week out that they have not bothered to apply for funds under the program.

Quite clearly, if one looks at the provincial distribution of the funds, since there are Provinces which do not hold Liberal Members, there are funds which have gone to Provinces where there are no Liberal Members and therefore have clearly gone into constituencies held by Opposition Members.

The hon. gentleman says that Opposition members have not known about the program to be able to apply for it. The fact is that some Opposition members have. I have no difficulty in defending this program.

Mr. Malone: That is because you are a Liberal.

Mr. Roberts: It seems to me to be a little bit of sour grapes on the part of Members on the other side, that they have not cared enough to work as their Liberal colleagues have to find funding available to serve their constituents.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Members on this side of the House did not apply because the Minister told us last November 29 not to apply until we received the criteria, and we did not get the criteria until February 2.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: The Minister will have to try a little harder.

MINISTER'S POSITION

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I will ask the Minister to account for funds spent under this Program by his own Department. Surely he will know something about what was spent by his Department. Under this program his Department spent $86.5 million. Of that amount, 73.5 per cent went to Liberal ridings, 9.1 per cent to Conservative ridings, and 3.2 per cent to NDP ridings. I want to ask—

An Hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: I hear those Liberals shamefully applauding the fact that they have discriminated against the unemployed in this country.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: How does the Minister justify this shameful, partisan misuse of public funds?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): First, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman's citation of what I said to him in committee is not accurate, and if you refer to committee records you will see that that is so.

Second, I think it is appropriate to look at the funds expended on job creation to all of our project directed efforts. If he does that he will see, as I have said repeatedly, that the funds are distributed over-all in a way which largely reflects the distribution of unemployment. It is possible to take one program or another program and show that the impact of that program differs from that basic principle. In every case there are justifiable explanations for it.

The hon. gentleman, having asked repeatedly in the House for the facts, and all the facts, not wanting to see the material massaged, so anxious himself, as he said to the House, that he would prepare the constituency breakdown, now finds that all of the facts do not substantiate what he would like to do. He wants to make a selective use of part of the facts to substantiate a case, which he cannot do.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, the Minister has shamefully tried to hide the facts, wrapped in a red ribbon.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EMPLOYMENT PROGRAMS—CONSTITUENCY ALLOCATION CODE

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I have the record here of what the Minister did say in committee on November 29. He said this to me:

> When you receive the criteria, if you believe there are some useful projects in your area which would meet the criteria, you send me the suggestions and I will consider them.

That is what he said, and I did not get the criteria until February 2.

We have not seen anything like this since the early 1950s when they had horses on the payroll in Petawawa.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An Hon. Member: Now it is only one end of the horse.

Mr. McGrath: And now we are seeing the other end of the horse.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, the Minister said this morning on public television that it was not possible to allocate these moneys by constituency. I was advised, and I have since been supplied with material which indicates that every constituency receiving an allocation under every make-work program in this country is allocated a code. These are the codes.

Can the Minister of Employment and Immigration tell us why he was not able to provide a constituency breakdown since that breakdown exists in his office by virtue of the use of this code? Why did he mislead the people of Canada?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: Resign, John.

Mr. Dick: And you want to be leader?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there are three questions contained in the Hon. Member's over-all question. The first was whether or not I said he should not apply, and clearly the words he himself quoted said that when he had the criteria, I would be happy to consider projects suggested by him. I did not say that he could not send any projects until he received those criteria.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An Hon. Member: Resign, John.

Mr. McDermid: Tell him what to say, Marc.

Mr. Roberts: The second accusation which the hon. gentleman put forward was that he has a list, photocopies, or I do not know what, which contains some constituency allocation code. It is true, Mr. Speaker, as has been well known, that there are some programs on which information is collected by us on a constituency basis, for instance, in Canada Works and in some of the Summer Canada programs. That does not apply to the Special Employment Initiatives Program over all, which the hon. gentleman opposite was inquiring about. The Special Employment Initiatives Program is broken down into three parts—

Mr. Nielsen: Pork barrel; pork barrel; pork barrel.

Mr. Roberts: —first, the funding which applies to ordinary or other government programs; second, to programs which are within the Employment and Immigration Commission, which are there in a regular way. The third element within the Special Employment Initiatives Program is the Employment Creation Grants and Contributions Program.

Mr. Taylor: Your nose is getting bigger all the time.

Mr. Roberts: What I can say to the hon. gentleman, after having made inquiries, is that we do not collect that information in relation to the Special Employment Initiatives Program on a constituency by constituency basis.

The third thing the hon. gentleman has accused me of doing is trying to conceal the facts to the House. That is exactly why I presented—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Roberts: —presented all of the information on all of the projects, which is what the hon. gentleman asked me to do. Back on February 14 he said, "Don't massage it. Don't launder it. Mr. Speaker, would the Minister make available to the House the unexpurgated lists?" Will we—" that is to say, he is saying he—"We will figure out the constituencies."

Mr. Epp: And we did.

Mr. Roberts: I gave them the unexpurgated lists. I have given them all the details. Now they complain they have information that does not substantiate the twisted use they want to make of a partial selection.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SPECIAL EMPLOYMENT INITIATIVES PROGRAM—PROVISION OF INFORMATION

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same Minister and it is on the same topic. As the Minister will know, it is a tradition that all federal job-creation programs are dealt with through a public process. It gives everybody an equal opportunity and an equal chance in all regions of the country. However, in this program to which my colleague referred, there was no public process. There were no application forms publicly available. There was no public information campaign to let Canadians know how the program operated. Indeed, in the Minister's own regional offices there was no public information available. It boils down to this. This Minister and this Government have used millions of dollars of taxpayers' money—

Some Hon. Members: Question. Question!

Mr. Crombie: —in order to convert them to Liberal Party patronage. That is the charge; that is the reality.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crombie: How does the Minister think he can justify that to the House and to the people of this country?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member obviously has a very tendentious association with the facts of the matter. The facts of the matter are that the program was announced and underlined in two Budgets, one presented by my colleague, the Hon. Minister of Finance, and one by the former Minister of Finance, the present Deputy Prime Minister. I cannot understand how there could be a much more public process than the presentation of a program within the context of a budget debate.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Roberts: The explanation for the program has been given to the Hon. Member time and time again. It is not my difficulty if the Hon. Member cannot comprehend it. What we were seeking to do, and what I think the facts now show we did, was establish a fast-track process by which we could create jobs.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Roberts: Members on this side of the House knew of that program and Members on the other side of the House knew of that program. Perhaps they were too preoccupied with their own internal affairs of choosing a new Leader to take advantage of that program, or perhaps they were too preoccupied with getting rid of their old Leader to take advantage of that program. The programs were there. They could have applied. Some of them did. Most of them did not. It is not our fault that they have now found out that we are being active in pursuing the interests of our constituents. Would that they had been just as efficacious in doing the same!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crombie: It surprises me that the Minister has no shame in this matter. It surprises me. The record is clear. There was no public information until February 1 that people in this country could use. That is the fact of the matter; that is the record.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I want the Minister to remember this, as I ask him this question: what the Minister has done—and I ask him to think about it before he gives the answer—is that he has converted public programs for unemployed people from no longer being on the basis of need but to whether they know Ministers of the Crown. That is what the Minister has done. That is the shame of it. How does the Minister think that he can stand in the House and say otherwise? The reality is that job-creation programs by this Government are no longer done on need but on Liberal Party need.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is very agitated, and there was so much noise around him I could not understand the first two-thirds of his question. The last part of his question, the assertion that these grants were given on the basis of some special knowledge or acquaintanceship with Ministers of the Crown, is clearly false.

DISTRIBUTION OF GRANTS IN ONTARIO RIDINGS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It is no wonder that Members are agitated. We have done a breakdown of the grants that were given in the Province of Ontario. Over 90 per cent of all grants under the Special Employment Initiatives Program were given to Liberal ridings.

Some Hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Deans: Out of $56.4 million granted under this program, only $3.5 million was allocated to other than Liberal ridings in the Province of Ontario.

The Minister knows full well that last September, when he was appointed Minister, he issued, along with a press statement, a piece of paper which reads, "Government of Canada Job-Creation Programs". Nowhere on that paper is there any reference to the Special Employment Initiatives Program. Therefore, members of the Opposition were not given access to the program, were not informed of the program. I ask the Minister, is it not reasonable to conclude on all of the evidence that we have before us that this money was allocated on the basis of Liberal patronage and that, in order to gain access, you had to be a Liberal, or know a Liberal?

• (1430)

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that that is a proper conclusion to be drawn. The Hon. Member is in error in saying that these funds were given to Liberal ridings. These funds were given to groups, to people—

Some Hon. Members: To Liberals.

Mr. Roberts: —to citizens of this country who wanted to use those funds to create jobs. They may have been in Liberal ridings, but they were not given to Liberal ridings. They were given to people who wanted to create jobs, and not jobs just in constituencies but all across this country and all across the regions of the country.

PROVISION OF INFORMATION TO MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, is the Minister suggesting that those people in other than Liberal ridings, those citizens who live in other than Liberal ridings were negligent that they did not apply, and that they did not care? Is there some reason to believe that they were aware of the program and did not get access because they did not care about it? The fact is, and the Minister knows it, that the information was never distributed across this land, was never given to members of the Opposition, that only Liberal members were told what they could get, and the reason why the money is so clearly allocated to Liberal ridings is because it was a Liberal patronage fund. Deny it if you can.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not arguing that the citizens of Canada are negligent. The Hon. Member himself just said that he did not know about the program. That program was underlined in two budget statements in this House. The only thing I can conclude is that he did not listen to those budget statements and that, I would think, is negligent.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: So was the Western Canada Development Fund.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ALLOCATION OF MONEYS TO EASTERN AND WESTERN REGIONS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Minister whether it was just by accident that the amounts of money allocated to ridings or to areas of the country in which there are no Liberal members is considerably less than the amounts of money allocated in constituencies, or for that matter in areas of the country, where there are Liberal members? Is it just by accident that where there are Liberal members in the Maritimes, Quebec, and Ontario, the amounts of money allocated per capita are considerably higher than in areas in western Canada where the amounts of money are less than half the amounts made available in areas where there are, in fact, Liberal members?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is not surprising that in the eastern part of the country where unemployment levels are considerably higher that there should be a higher proportion of funding going to those areas. If you look at the—

Mr. McGrath: What about British Columbia?

Mr. Roberts: The Hon. Member says: "What about British Columbia?" The over-all expenditure under the direct programs, the over-all percentage for British Columbia, is 13.7 per cent. The proportion of unemployment in British Columbia is 13.8 per cent. The figures are almost identical. Would the hon. gentleman stand in his place and say: "If you look at the Section 38 program, one of the programs on the list, that 27 per cent of the funds went to British Columbia"? That really shows the Liberals are bending over backwards to hurt the Opposition ridings in the country. That level is almost twice the percentage of the ratio of unemployment in British Columbia to the country as a whole.

COST OF PREPARING EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM LISTS

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I remind the Minister that we are talking about the Special Employment Initiatives Program. I wonder if the Minister would explain, in this very obvious attempt to obscure the truth from the Canadian people, how much money, how many hours, how many persons were employed to produce this far more detailed information on programs that was not asked for, to create the snow job we saw in this House yesterday in an attempt to bury the real information on the Special Employment Initiatives Program that was asked for just after the Budget of 1982.

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, now we see clearly their purpose. Last week they wanted the facts, all the facts, nothing but the facts. They wanted the facts so that they could make the allocation judgment themselves. They wanted to know the whole story. Now they do not want the whole story. Now they want that little piece of the story that they think they can twist to support their point of view which is not justifiable in terms of the facts as a whole.

Members on the other side were saying: "Give us everything. Don't massage it. Don't transform it. Don't order us." That is what we gave to them. In order to do that, it is true we did have translators, we did have special staff working all through the weekend to provide that information for Members opposite. You know, Mr. Speaker, if we had not done that and I would have had to delay even longer, they would have been up on their feet charging me with not respecting the House of Commons because I was not prepared to deliver the information to them when I had promised to do so.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EDUCATION

METROPOLITAN TORONTO SEPARATE SCHOOL BOARD LETTER

Mr. Gordon Gilchrist (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the same Minister. It will not need to be distorted by the wealth of information which he deposited in the House yesterday. How can the Minister justify the issuing of a letter by the Metropolitan Toronto Separate School board, the Catholic School Board, urging all of their trustees to contact only Liberal Members of Parliament on the providing of funds to upgrade educational facilities in Toronto? The list is clear. It is addressed to all the trustees. The list includes only names of Liberal members. Will the Minister please explain how that could come about?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, to the best of my knowledge I have not seen or I am not aware of the letter to which the hon. gentleman has referred. I gather it is not a letter over my signature, but a letter sent by the trustees of the Separate School Board. I am not responsible for the trustees of the Separate School Board. I do not think I have seen the contents of that letter, but if the hon. gentleman's accusation is that the trustees of the school board are urging the citizens of Canada to be in touch with Members of Parliament, Liberal or any other kind, then it seems to me to simply indicate that the trustees believe that Liberal Members will likely do a better job of being responsive to their interests than Members opposite.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

EMPLOYMENT

SPECIAL EMPLOYMENT INITIATIVES PROGRAM—ALLOCATION OF FUNDS TO BRITISH COLUMBIA

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration, who has clearly misled the House when it comes to the Special Employment Initiatives Program. Why won't he admit to this House that B.C., which, as he knows, has an unemployment rate of 13.8 per cent, nearly 14 per cent, which had more mortgage foreclosures, more business bankruptcies in the recovery year of 1983, than in the recession, why won't he admit that it received only 5.5 per cent of the $186 million in this sleazy, slush fund?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member simply should refer to the over-all figures which show that, on direct project programs, the Province of British Columbia and the Yukon have received 13.7 per cent of the funds in comparison to an unemployment rate of 13.8 per cent, so it is roughly equivalent. She should also remember that direct job-creation programs are part of a much larger government effort, and that the economic stimulation brought in by the Budget of my colleague, the Minister of Finance, something like $2.5 billion worth of stimulation, would have a much bigger impact in British Columbia, Ontario, and Alberta than in some of the less advantageous and less rich Provinces in this country.

She should also remember that it is not simply the federal Government which has an obligation to worry about creating jobs, but also provincial Governments. Part of the situation which exists in her Province is because there is a Government in that Province so sympathetic and of such a similar stripe to the Leader of the Opposition and his Party opposite. We require a partnership in job creation and it is not surprising that we should expect the Provinces, those best able to do so, to do more of the work as well.

HEALTH

EFFECTS OF BILL C-3

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, whose Bill is before a Committee of this House.

Could the Hon. Minister give the House the assurance that, unlike what was stated by the Minister of Social Affairs of Quebec, the purpose of the Bill under consideration is not to get rid of the system of agreements and substitute therefor a series of unilateral decisions, or at increasing federal powers to the detriment of the provinces or at preventing Quebec from exercising its jurisdiction and setting its own health priorities, and finally, that its purpose is not to penalize children by taking away dental services, and the elderly, by depriving them of free medication?

An Hon. Member: That doesn't concern you, it concerns Quebec!

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I can give the Hon. Member the formal assurance that the Canada Health Bill is aimed only at prohibiting out-of-pocket charges to patients. In Quebec, patients receive free health services and health care because these have already been paid for through the health insurance plan. Quebec can call it whatever it likes, but extra-billing will not be allowed, and I am sorry to say this is not negotiable. As far as the rest, the agreements and all that sort of things is concerned, it is now time, in Committee, to negotiate and to decide whether one word rather than another should be used. We have no intention of invading areas of jurisdiction, and in any case, we do not have the resources. It is up to the provinces to shoulder their responsibilities. Everything is negotiable, except the principal of free health services and the list of insured health services for Quebecers.

EMPLOYMENT

SPECIAL EMPLOYMENT INITIATIVES PROGRAM—PER CAPITA ALLOCATION OF FUNDS TO BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. People in British Columbia have been betrayed by the Government's unfair allocation of Special Employment Initiatives Projects. Across Canada the Government allocated an average of $150 per unemployed person for these projects. While the Maritimes received projects amounting to $227 per unemployed person, and Quebec $206, British Columbia is right at the bottom of the heap with only $60 for each unemployed person.

Can the Minister explain why special employment funding dropped so dramatically in western Canada where there are no elected Liberals? Could he say what is fair or equitable about a project and program where British Columbians get only 40 per cent of the help given to other Canadians?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman talks about betrayal and bottom of the heap, but 27 per cent of the funding under Section 38 went to British Columbia. Is that betrayal? If you look at the job-creation programs over all, 13.7 per cent of our funding went to British Columbia. That is almost exactly the equivalent of their percentage of unemployment. That is not being at the bottom of the heap.

Mr. Crosbie: Out of the slush fund.

Mr. Roberts: The hon. gentleman should look at all of the figures and not pick and choose selectively from among them.

Mr. Manly: Mr. Speaker, the Minister should know that Section 38 was mainly oriented toward the forest industry and that British Columbia has the majority, or a large percentage, of the forests of Canada and it needs that funding.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT PROVIDE MORE JOB-CREATION MONEY

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question refers to the Special Employment Initiatives Program, or the Liberal slush fund. We have always shared in equalization payments with the rest of Canada. Now when we are in difficulty we are not getting our share. Will the Minister make more money available for job creation and ensure that this is given on an equitable basis right across Canada—on the basis of the needs of unemployed people rather than on the needs of Liberal members to get elected?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as I have pointed out to the hon. gentleman, the money is given on an equitable basis. He may not care about the situation of the forest industry in this country but people on this side of the House do. We want to see reforestation take place, we want to see marketing take place, and we want the forest industry to remain as it is in Canada, the number one employer of people. We want it to maintain its vitality.

PROGRAM EXPENDITURES MADE BY CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Employment and Immigration regarding the money spent by Canada Post under the Special Employment Initiatives Program. The Minister will know that the NDP did not receive any of that money under this program, that the PCs received 4.3 per cent of it, and we are thankful for that, but that the Liberals received 95.7 per cent of the money.

Some Hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Cooper: Can the Minister stand up in this House and say with a straight face that 95.7 per cent of the most urgent needs of Canada Post could only be found in Liberal ridings?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, what I am saying to the House is that, apparently to the dismay of the Opposition, what we have found is that there are over 50,000 projects for direct job creation in this country as a result of these activities. I am not too surprised that they are a little bit embarrassed about that. If they think back to the recent past they will find that in 1979 they tried to cut these job-creation programs out of existence. It may be that they are a little bit embarrassed because the official spokesman for the Conservatives said yesterday, after he had had the chance to look informally through the material, that it looked as if the job funds had been divided equitably. That was the initial impression and statement of the official spokesman of the Opposition Party.

Mr. McGrath: I didn't say that.

Mr. Roberts: I suspect, Mr. Speaker, that between this initial and accurate impression and what is happening in the House today, some of his colleagues have got to him in the belief that they can make political capital out of what is a sound job-creation program benefiting Canadians in every region of the country.

Mr. McDermid: Start telling the truth.

An Hon. Member: You have been sitting beside Lalonde too long.

EXPENDITURES IN NEWFOUNDLAND RIDINGS

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for twisting on behalf of the Government, the Minister of oink, oink, the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Newfoundland has the heaviest unemployment in Canada. I have written to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans on dozens of occasions, listing projects needed. How is it that under the Special Employment Initiatives Program $4.639 million was spent in Newfoundland under Fisheries and Oceans to date, 100 per cent in Liberal ridings—not one cent, not one red cent, not one jot, not one tittle spent in either St. John's East or St. John's West?

When the Minister is explaining that, can he explain why, in his own Department where over $4.2 million was spent on projects so far in Newfoundland, 99.3 per cent was spent in the Liberal districts and .7 per cent in the PC districts? Can he explain that? Can he explain why he is trampling on the unemployed in these two districts? You are a disgrace to this House.

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if you were describing Members in this House on the basis of twist, the hon. gentleman there would be a double convoluted corkscrew.

I put it to the hon. gentleman that over 12 per cent of the money in Canada Works went to Newfoundland—

Mr. Crosbie: I gave you that figure.

Mr. Roberts: —as opposed to their national average of unemployed of 3 per cent.

Mr. Crosbie: Let us deal with the 300 million.

Mr. Roberts: In the NEED program, almost double their average of unemployment went into Newfoundland. The same is true for the summer programs in 1983 and 1982.

Mr. Crosbie: We are dealing with the program for 300 million.

Mr. Roberts: Three times the percentage of the Community Development Projects went into Newfoundland.

Mr. Crosbie: You are a bloody liar.

Mr. Roberts: Over all, more than double the percentage of funding went to Newfoundland in comparison to their percentage of unemployment.

My question to the hon. gentleman is very simple. Which of those projects in Newfoundland would he like us not to have done?

Presence in Gallery

Mr. Crosbie: Just wait until the electors get their hands on you. They are never going to forget. Let us go to the people tomorrow and see what they think. They are going to batter you, you gutless wonders.

DISTRIBUTION OF FUNDS IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RIDINGS

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Under the so-called Special Employment Initiatives Program the two Liberal held ridings in Prince Edward Island received a whopping $2,400,000. By contrast, the two Progressive Conservative held ridings in Prince Edward Island received a paltry $215,000. That is a discrepancy of 11 to one in favour of the Liberal ridings. Does the Minister think that the taxpayers of Canada are gullible enough to believe that such a huge discrepancy can be justified by the comparative jobless figures across the Province in those four ridings? Or will he, instead, admit that the program in question is blatant political corruption on a national scale?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: What about the Veterans Affairs headquarters?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am a little surprised at the Hon. Member's question because, as the figures clearly show, on every one of the programs of direct job-creation, Prince Edward Island has received far more than the percentage which would be equivalent to the percentage of unemployed. If the hon. gentleman is concerned about us somehow not favouring his riding in Prince Edward Island, I would remind him that the federal Government is spending virtually $20 million—$19.5 million—for the establishment of the veterinary college in his own constituency.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Accidents will happen.

Mr. Roberts: Clearly we are out to salvage the Hon. Member.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF HONORARY CONSULS OF ESTONIA, LATVIA, AND LITHUANIA

EMPLOYMENT

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES ON JOB CREATION AND PETROLEUM INCENTIVES PROGRAM GRANTS

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I want to return to the issue of rewarding friends and punishing the unemployed. According to the Estimates tabled just yesterday, the Government will give an increased amount, up to $1,600,000,000 in PIP grants, to its oil company friends, while the unemployed across Canada suffer cuts of some $300 million in total federal grants and contributions for job-creation programs. With respect to the Government's policy of rewarding its friends, which is so evident in its political allocations between Provinces through the Special Employment Initiatives Program—not all the others—does this cut mean that that discrimination also applies across the board as between oil companies on the one hand and unemployed Canadians on the other?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think the Hon. Member's question is a bit convoluted. Since when are the oil companies such great friends of this government? He should try visiting Calgary when he gets away from the British Columbia coast some time.

I believe there is some substantial essence in the Hon. Member's question. I believe it was about the Estimates. I would just like to remind the hon. gentleman that what we have seen now are the Main Estimates, which are added to as the year goes on by Supplementary Estimates. Therefore it would be inappropriate for him to draw conclusions on the basis of the comparison I believe he was making, if I understood his figures correctly.

Mr. Epp: Oh, come on, John.

Mr. Kristiansen: As to friends and enemies, I wish I had the sort of political enemies which gave me the thousands of dollars a year that his so-called enemies in the oil companies give him. Let us get it straight.

FORESTRY EMPLOYMENT PROGRAMS—SIZE OF FUNDING

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): According to those same Estimates, Mr. Speaker, there has been a 40 per cent increase in PIP grants to oil companies for drilling dry holes, while forestry spending is down by 61 per cent to only $45 million.

An Hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Kristiansen: Forestry employment programs which the Minister talked about earlier today, are down from $21.5 million to only $60,000. That is a cut of 99.998 per cent. There will have to be a lot of supplementary estimates to make up that difference. Have the Minister and his Government given up on the forest industry? Have he and his Government given up on the unemployed of Canada? If not, when will they do an about-face and provide some help for the people and the resources in this country which really need help the most?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the two rhetorical questions, to each of them, is no. This Government is considerably concerned about the state of the forest industry. Indeed, if the Hon. Member will think back, he will recall the over-all forest strategy which we have prepared and presented in conjunction with the Provinces, dealing with reforestation, marketing, and the need for highly qualified manpower personnel. However, in answering the question in this way, Mr. Speaker, as his question really demands, I am trespassing on the responsibilities of my colleague, the Minister of the Environment, who is responsible for the forestry service.

SPECIAL EMPLOYMENT INITIATIVES PROGRAM—
NON-ALLOCATION OF FUNDS TO OPPOSITION HELD RIDINGS

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Everyone has been speculating today about the Prime Minister's resignation. I cannot for the life of me understand why the Minister did not resign at least 35 minutes ago, in view of some of the statements we have been getting.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): I would like to ask the Minister about one of his statements this morning. He said: "There is nothing politically partisan about spreading around the Special Employment Initiatives Program." If that is true, how can the Minister explain 10 projects in the four Liberal held ridings of Niagara Falls, Welland, Lincoln and Hamilton East, and in exactly the same area, three Conservative held ridings, Burlington, St. Catharines, and my own riding of Hamilton-Wentworth, get zip. Along with the riding of Hamilton Mountain, represented by the House Leader of the New Democratic Party, these ridings receive not a whisper for job creation. If that is not "operation slush" in action, I do not know what is.

I would like an explanation from the Minister of why the Liberal ridings in an area which is suffering from a high number of unemployed, as well as all of southern Ontario, by staggering coincidence, got all of these millions of dollars for job creation?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member says he cannot understand, and I can understand that he cannot understand. Comprehension was never his strong point.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Roberts: What he should be looking at, as we have reminded him again and again, is the total impact of the program. If he had bothered to do that he would have noticed that in the Erie constituency which, if memory serves me correctly, is represented by a Conservative Member of Parliament, something like $19 million worth of federal funds has gone in to create jobs—

Mr. Crosbie: Not on that program.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Talk about the slush fund, John.

Mr. Roberts: —in the Fleet aircraft industry.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Roberts: The simple fact of the matter is, Mr. Speaker, that what has happened here is that the Hon. Members of the Opposition somehow sensing a conspiracy everywhere—here a plot, there a plot, everywhere a plot, plot—believe that something nefarious is going on.

Mr. McDermid: Everywhere an oink, oink.

Mr. Nielsen: Old McRoberts had a farm.

Mr. Roberts: What they in fact found out is that there are 50,000 job-creation projects all across this country—

An Hon. Member: And they did not do that.

Mr. Roberts: —allocated, on the whole, fairly.

Mr. McDermid: Project Oink, Oink.

Mr. Roberts: There may be I doubt not, that in 50,000 projects there are some which will look, when taken out of context, to be dubious. I cannot argue that in 50,000 cases we always made the right decision. However, what we have in fact done, to that Party's surprise, almost to its dismay, is bring into the open that there is a tremendous amount of effort on the part of this Government to create meaningful jobs all across this country.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roberts: They seem unhappy about that.

Mr. Nielsen: Oink, oink.

Mr. Roberts: Those Hon. Members would rather that the figures showed some kind of political manipulation, because what they are really interested in is not the passion for creating jobs, Mr. Speaker. That is not their passion. Their passion is a lust for power.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Brian. Brian.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the Minister that truth obviously is not the Minister's strong point.

An Hon. Member: Right on.

Oral Questions

EXPENDITURE OF FUNDS BY CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION IN ONTARIO RIDINGS

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): My question is directed to the same Minister. The construction industry has an unemployment rate of 33 per cent. In Ontario it is 29 per cent, and many of the unemployed are young people. Why was 90 per cent of the CMHC funding under the slush fund spent in Liberal ridings? Why was it not distributed fairly across the country? Why did the Minister not address the needs of the unemployed, rather than the needs of the Liberal Party?

• (1500)

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I say to the hon. gentleman, as I said repeatedly, the funds were distributed equitably. I would remind the hon. gentlemen opposite who are so concerned about bias and patronage that it was the Leader of the Opposition who said that if he became Prime Minister it will be 15 years before a Liberal got a job, and if he became leader of the Government, it would be 15 years before a Liberal constituency got a project—

Mr. Mulroney: That is false.

Mr. Roberts: —not us on this side of the House; it was the Leader of the Opposition.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bradley: Mr. Speaker, I think from what we have seen today that it was the Minister's constituents who made the mistake when they gave him a job.

MEMBER'S TELEPHONE CALL TO MINISTER'S OFFICE

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, the Minister said numerous times today, and in the past, that the reason Conservative ridings have not received anything under this program is because we have not worked hard enough and have not applied.

An Hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Bradley: Mr. Speaker, when I did not have the criteria for this program I called the Minister's office in the first week in December. After being referred to six different people in that office we were advised by Mr. Len Westaburg that this program was one being developed by the previous Minister but since this Minister had come into office it had not yet been initiated, but when it was we would receive the information. If the Minister wants us to work hard and get these programs, could he tell me how I can apply for a program which has no criteria, no application forms and, in his own office, does not exist?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I suppose the best advice I could give to the hon. gentleman is that he should have consulted with his colleague, the Hon. Member for Joliette, who said he was aware of the program and believed his colleagues were as well.

Mr. Speaker: Presenting reports from Standing and Special Committees. A point of order, the Hon. Member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath).

POINT OF ORDER

MR. McGRATH—STATEMENT BY MR. ROBERTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the Minister would deliberately mislead the House, but in the course of Question Period he quoted me as saying that at first glance the funds seemed to be equitably distributed. I did not say that. I said that, at first glance, the funds would seem to be disproportionately or inequitably distributed. That is my word, and I hope the Minister will accept it.

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): On the same point of order, Mr. speaker, I was quoting from a Canadian press report which said, and I quote exactly:

But after glancing at the resume of the information provided by Roberts' office, McGrath said it appears the job funds have been divided equitably.

The Hon. Member assures me he did not say that, and of course I accept his word.

PETITIONS

MR. LACHANCE—POLITICAL PRISONERS IN THE PHILIPPINES

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present the following petition:

To the Honourable the House of Commons of Canada, in Parliament assembled, the petition of the undersigned residents of Canada, concerned about justice and brotherhood among nations, who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your petitioners in the certain assurance that your Honourable House will therefore provide a remedy.

Humbly sheweth that:

They urge the Canadian Government to share the concern and sincere anxiety of the 1,400 residents of Montreal Centre West who have sent to political prisoners in the Philippines a message of support in their struggle against poverty and repression;

That the Canadian Government end its economic, trade or other relations with the Philippines unless that country does restore human rights and democratic freedoms;

That the Canadian Government demand, as concrete and real evidence of the will of the Philippine Government to restore human rights and democratic freedoms, that the latter free the aforementioned 27 political prisoners.

And as in duty bound your petitioners will ever pray.

MR. SCOTT (HAMILTON-WENTWORTH)—PEACE CAMP ON PARLIAMENT HILL

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I wish to present two separate petitions dealing with the same subject on which I tabled a petition on December 19, 1983, namely, the unsightly and soggy mess known as the peace camp which desecrates the front lawn of Parliament Hill. One petition which I am tabling today contains 105 names collected in a day and a half during the weekend by an Ottawa man, Mr. David Miner, who says his petitioners are tourists and they are upset by the indefinite presence of this eyesore.

The second petition is signed by a further 60 Canadians who maintain that the continuing presence of the peace camp in front of the most beautiful public buildings in Canada constitutes a public nuisance.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-220, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act (Minister's duty).

Some Hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, at present subsection 220(1) of the Income Tax Act reads as follows:

The Minister shall administer and enforce this Act and control and supervise all persons employed to carry out or enforce this Act, and the Deputy Minister of National Revenue for Taxation may exercise all the powers and perform the duties of the Minister under this Act.

This Bill will delete from this Subsection all references to the powers of the Deputy Minister.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 149, 301, 358, 360 and 369.

Order Paper Questions

CANADA PORTS CORPORATION

Question No. 149—Mr. Crosby:

1. Did the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport state on April 14, 1981 at page 9289 of Hansard that Halterm was subsidized to the extent of $1.8 million a year and, if so, on what basis did he make the statement?

2. Did the subsidization consist of the payment of money and, if not, what form did it take and who paid the money or provided the subsidization?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Transport): The Canada Ports Corporation advises as follows:

1. No. The Parliamentary Secretary is quoted in Hansard as saying "In fact, Halterm enjoys a 50 per cent rebate from the National Harbours Board on wharfage charges, a rebate which amounted to a subsidy of $1.8 million in 1980". The agreement between the National Harbours Board and Halterm provides that the company pay rental on the facilities as well as wharfage but may retain 50 per cent of wharfage charges on containerized cargo shipped through the facilities above a certain amount.

2. No. See 1 above.

DECISION OF COUNTY COURT JUDGE IN CORNWALL

Question No. 301—Mrs. Cossitt:

1. Was the Minister of National Revenue aware of a decision by a County Court Judge in Brockville, Ontario that found Cornwall News Distributors guilty of distributing obscene literature that had been imported into Canada from other countries?

2. Did Customs officials follow the (a) guidelines and general information contained in Customs and Excise Memorandum D9-1-1 in interpreting tariff item 99201-1, concerning the entry of material into Canada, which prohibits the entry of "Books, printed paper, drawings, paintings, prints, photographs or representations of any kind of a treasonable or seditious, or of an immoral or indecent character" (b) provisions of Section 159(8) and 159(9) of the Criminal Code and previous court decisions when making decisions on publications being imported into Canada and, if not, for what reasons?

3. Will the Minister take into consideration the numerous and recent court decisions and formulate a new directive for Customs officials to follow when making their decisions as to whether or not certain publications would be classified as pornographic material and therefore would be prohibited from entry into Canada under Tariff Item 99201-1 and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): 1. Yes. The Minister of National Revenue is aware of a decision handed down by County Court Judge James Newton in Brockville, Ontario, on November 18, 1983. It should be noted that this decision was made under the obscenity provisions of the Criminal Code. The Department of National Revenue is only responsible for administering the prohibitory provisions of the Customs Tariff which, under tariff item 99201-1 in Schedule "C", specifies that "books, printed paper, drawings, paintings, prints, photographs or representations of any kind of a treasonable or seditious, or of an immoral or indecent character" are to be prohibited entry into Canada.

2. (a) In all instances of importations of this nature, which come to the attention of Customs officials, the guidelines and general information contained in Customs and Excise Memorandum D9-1-1 are followed in interpreting and administering the provisions of tariff item 99201-1. However, it should be noted that not all importations of this nature come to the attention of Customs officials. With over 600 points of entry across Canada, it is not always possible to examine thoroughly all goods which enter Canada.

(b) The criteria used by my Department in determining those items which should be classified under tariff item 99201-1 are based on court decisions made under the Customs Act and court decisions made under the comparable sections of the Criminal Code which deal with the sale or distribution of obscene material. Our administration strives to take into account as far as possible what Canadians in general believe to be immoral or indecent.

3. Yes. In the administration of tariff item 99201-1, my Department will continue to take into consideration the numerous and recent court decisions in this area. Also, such decisions will continue to be reflected in relevant departmental directives which are revised on a regular basis as required. In this regard, my Department will also be taking into account the findings of the Fraser Committee on Pornography and Prostitution, recently formed at the direction of my colleague, the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada. This Committee's final report is expected in December, 1984.

CANADIAN FORESTRY SERVICE

Question No. 358—Mr. St. Germain:

1. Since 1978, how many projects were supported, in each province, and for what amount, under the ENFOR Program of the Canadian Forestry Service?

2. Of the original $30 million committed to the ENFOR Program what amount remains for project support?

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of the Environment): 1. The number of ENFOR projects (contracts) since 1978, and the amounts spent in each province, are as follows:

Alta.	11	$ 668,000
B.C.	58	7,095,000
Man.	4	160,000
N.B.	15	854,000
Nfld.	15	1,283,000
N.S.	5	434,000
Ont.	84	8,209,000
P.E.I.	2	17,000
Que.	52	6,411,000
Sask.	9	708,000
Total	255	$25,839,000

The remainder of the $30 million ENFOR allocation has been spent on program management, administration and technology transfer.

2. The original $30 million was for the first six years of the program and none remains for project support. However, part of the work funded by ENFOR is continuing under the same program name; about $2 million will be available for project support in 1984/85.

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL CORPORATION

2. Is there an Industry Advisory Committee advising the Board of Directors of the Canadian Commercial Corporation, and, if so, what is a list of the names of its members and, for each member, what (a) is their background and expertise (b) is the term of their appointment (c) remuneration, including salary or travel expenses, do they receive and, for the length of each appointment to date, what amount was received?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1(a); (b); (c) and (d): See below.

2. Yes (See below).

(a) See below.

(b) Appointed by the Board until revoked by the Board.

MR. WILLIAM ELLIS

Question No. 369—Mr. Siddon:

Did Mr. William Ellis (L. 12973) serve with the South Saskatchewan Regiment during World War II and, if so (a) did he take part in the 1942 Dieppe raid with the regiment (b) is he also a veteran of World War I (c) is he the last former member of the Regiment living who participated in the Dieppe raid having previously served during World War I (d) does he receive a veterans pension or allowance from the Government and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. W. Bennett Campbell (Minister of Veterans Affairs): This question requests information of a personal nature concerning Mr. William Ellis, the disclosure of which is governed by the Privacy Act. See reply to question No. 2,351 answered on May 25, 1981.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 30

[English]

ENERGY

IMPACT OF JAPANESE WITHDRAWAL ON DOME PETROLEUM

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I sent notice the other day of intent to raise a matter concerning the information which became available on the financial situation of Dome Petroleum. It was my hope that this matter would appeal to you and the House as being of such serious consequence that the House would in fact adjourn to debate that motion.

That company faced bankruptcy within one day at the end of March 1982. Based on a file which it developed called the Armageddon file which listed the horrific consequences to Canada if that company collapsed, it was able to phone key officials of the Government of Canada and Ministers in the middle of the night and have them commit $500 million to the restructuring.

I suggest that today, with the information that the Japanese have determined there is no oil at the bottom of the Beaufort Sea and they will not be financial bankers, Dome Petroleum would be unable to obtain continuation through the American Citibank and would hope—

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member cannot put his argument. He has to put a case for priority in this matter. The Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River gave me notice of his intention to seek an emergency debate on the operations of Dome Petroleum Limited. The Chair finds it difficult to reconcile the request for an emergency debate on this issue with the requirements of Standing Order 30(5). These provisions require the Speaker to "have regard to the probability of the matter being brought before the House within reasonable time by other means".

It can hardly be claimed that Dome Petroleum's financial problems, while serious, amount to a sudden emergency. They have been in existence for a long time. We are currently debating the Budget. This is a six day debate which is wide-ranging in its scope and would provide an opportunity for raising this matter. The Estimates were tabled yesterday providing further opportunity of raising the matter in committee or on an allotted day.

The Hon. Member indeed asked questions yesterday in Question Period on the subject of Dome Petroleum. He also raised the matter when commenting on the statement of the Hon. President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Gray). There was an exchange in the House on the subject.

In addition, I find a procedural problem with regard to the motion which the Hon. Member indicated to the Chair he intended to move. If an emergency debate were granted the motion before the House would be "That this House do now adjourn". The Hon. Member in his notice to me proposes to move a completely separate motion recommending the launching of a public inquiry. The purpose of Standing Order 30, to use the words of Citation 285 of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, is that the question to be debated must "be specific and must require urgent consideration". I do not think it was ever the intention of the Standing Order to provide a means of debating a motion for a public inquiry.

For all these reasons the Chair is unable to accede to the Hon. Member's request.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that this House approve in general the budgetary policy of the Government and the amendment of Mr. Crosbie, (p. 1445).

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on the Budget introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) on February 15. On the first page of his Budget in brief it reads:

"Securing growth and jobs depends on our success in four basic areas: reducing and controlling inflation; increasing investment; reducing the government's deficit and increasing our competitiveness and productivity."

This is the promise, Mr. Speaker. Let us look at the performance. Only one day after this speech was delivered, the Dominion Bureau of Statistics indicated that the inflation rate in Canada was again on the rise. Our horrendous deficits are now like a brush fire feeding on the heat they have generated till foreigners and Canadians alike are fearful of investing in Canada. It takes money to provide jobs, and without new capital investment Canadians cannot increase their competitiveness or productivity. If we are to secure jobs in the four basic areas which the Minister stated, I say to him, through you Sir, that the Minister has failed miserably.

Only two days after the presentation of the Budget, the Government asked for $4 billion more than the Budget indicated. The Government said in the Budget that it would need to borrow $25.5 billion, which is $4 billion less than the new legislation seeks to have in its projected deficit of $29.6 billion on total expenditures of $97 billion for the year beginning April 1.

It is this type of time-bomb budgeting that is deeply worrying Canadians. When the Finance Minister is borrowing 31 cents out of every dollar he spends, the close connection between expenditures and taxes becomes a little bit foggy, as we say in Nova Scotia. It is more like a magician's hat trick than honest accounting. This scenario reminds me of the words of that famous poet, Sir Walter Scott, in his poem Marmion in which he said, "Oh, what a tangled web we weave, when first we practise to deceive!"

Today we find ourselves at a rather precarious point. We have been through the worst recession since the years of the Great Depression of the 1930s. Yet while we sense that we are on the threshold of recovery, we cannot be too sure we are going to make it through the door. We are called upon to review another Budget and assess the plans, policies, predictions and programs of the Government. Quite frankly, Sir, we cannot rely on this document to propel us into recovery. At best, we can be thankful that the economic success of the United States and the dedicated persistence of energetic Canadians is keeping us afloat—to use a Maritime expression—despite the perverse policy and the misinformed outlook of the Government.

In his Budget the Minister of Finance stressed the importance of confidence and the stability that confidence can bring to the Canadian economy. On close examination of the facts, we have every reason to doubt even the most basic aspects of the economic dexterity of the Government. How can business, large or small, have confidence in a Government which only a few budgets ago launched an energy policy which virtually expropriated the western petroleum industry at the high cost of jobs lost, exorbitant debts and expenditures and confidence lost in Canada?

How can Government claims be believed when six and five is given credit for effects which simply could not have worked their way through the economy in the time frame permitted? Is it not less than honest to neglect to tell Canadians that the economy of the United States influences ours significantly and that the United States had lower inflation and interest rates long before we did as a result of strict monetary control and responsible fiscal management totally without the gimmickery of a six and five political campaign? If six and five was the answer, what happened to this guideline as it applies to the Government's own spending?

Yesterday the Government tabled its spending Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1985. Did the expenditures increase by only 5 per cent? If the Government had believed in its own doctrine, this is what would have happened. Instead, we have Estimates from the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Gray) showing that next year's spending will jump by 10.5 per cent to $98.2 billion with more than $20 billion set aside just to pay the interest on the public debt. Mr. Speaker, I call the $98.2 billion a sort of springtime sale figure. Speaking from experience, in every year of my more than 26 years in the House I have noted that, following the budget presentation, supplementaries are presented to the House. These supplementaries are to carry the Government through any additional expenditures it may have between now and next March 1.

Let us examine the supplementaries for the past four years. You will find that there was never less than $2.5 billion and sometimes as much as $7 billion. The average for the past four years is something like $5 billion. What we are looking at today is not a budget of $98 billion for the next year but a budget that, I submit, will amount to approximately $103 billion.

This brings another thought to mind. In 1968, when the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) came into office, I recall well that it cost about $12 billion in that year to look after the affairs of all of Canada. We were then a nation of approximately 20 million people. Today we are only 25 million, which means that our population has increased only by 5 milion. I gave that figure just to illustrate the extent to which the Government has mismanaged Canada's economy.

How can we take the predictions of the Minister of Finance seriously when he admits that the predictions in his last Budget were not correct? If growth exceeded his expectations, as he points out, why were his expectations so erroneous? What does that suggest for the forecasts in this Budget? How can anyone have any confidence in the forecasts in this Budget of the present Government? The medium range predictions in the Budget of 1980 are an embarrassment to anyone who has a memory for history. There is absolutely no reason to expect that the Government is any more reliable in this Budget.

In any case, an unemployment rate that is projected to be down to only 8 per cent—and that will not be reached until 1988—is certainly nothing to set the heather afire in any part of Canada, especially in Atlantic Canada.

Co-operation is another theme of the Minister, but again the record speaks for itself. There is hardly a group in the Canadian economy that the Government has not alienated. The Budget is no more than a feeble attempt to undo some of the damage that has been done in the past. No one in the small business sector of our economy needs to be reminded that the tax reform by the Minister in this Budget is simply a reform of previous tax changes by the Government which have left the small Canadian entrepreneur in an incomprehensible and frustrating taxation morass. No one needs to be reminded that our economy has not even returned to the level of prosperity that it enjoyed several years ago. Rosy proclamations announcing big gains in our GNP will simply not wash with the Canadian public.

When our economy has sunk as low as it has under the leadership of the Government, the rebound is certain to be spectacular. There is a theorem which states that for every action there is an equal and opposite reaction. Therefore, when the Minister brags that our economy has grown more quickly in recent months than that of most developed countries, he neglects to state that our recession was worse than that in any of them. While our ship of state may be off the rocks, we are still a long way from home port without a chart, compass or capable captain, while the leaks threathen to sink us before we repair the engine, much less get it started.

With respect to the competitiveness of Canadian industry, the Minister has continued, in the television tradition of the right Hon. Prime Minister, to chastise the nation and tell us that we have to be of world class. It seems to me that the Government has taken a lot of time to convince itself of this position. Yet it can hardly take credit for the growth in our merchandise trade surplus which reached a temporary high because of two factors: one, the relatively better performance of our trading partners, which allowed them to consume more of our goods; two, the demoralizing slump in our economy, which made Canadians unable to afford the goods that they are accustomed to importing from abroad.

As for the competition policy at home, we have waited almost 10 years for action on this issue. There is grave doubt that the Government can act with any effectiveness on this particular promise in the short period of time before its mandate expires. Canadians will wisely place no stock in this promise as well as on other promises, such as pension reforms that will not be completed until 1987.

The Government's actions remind me of a suitor courting a girl whom he has not intention of marrying. He will promise her just about anything if she will only be nice to him. I believe the Canadian electorate will view this Budget and its promises for what it really is, a bunch of paper roses. They will reject the suitor and his false promises at the first opportunity for a Party and a Leader that stand for a more stable future.

Home owners and home buyers have little cause to thank the Government. The dramatic concern directed toward this group of Canadians simply comes several years too late. Where was the Government when mortgage rates were at record levels of anywhere from 20 per cent to 22 per cent? Crisis followed by heartbreak hit Canada's households from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

The Government's economic policy must be assessed against the background of current economic conditions and prospects for the future. Although the Minister, in his Budget, has tried to put these conditions in the best possible light, the actual situation is very, very bleak by every major measure. In fact, the economic recovery has begun to falter even before our economy has recovered the ground that we lost during the recession.

The Minister laid stress on the importance of credibility and feels that it is necessary if his policies are to be effective. I cannot disagree with him in that respect. In my opinion, credibility is earned on the basis of good performance, not flimsy, long-term projected promises. Although the Minister promised much ado about many things, he totally neglected many of the economic difficulties facing our most disadvantaged regions.

For example, the Budget totally ignored the plight of our independent fishermen who are struggling along the coasts of Atlantic Canada to wrest a living from the deep. Nowhere in the Budget are these fishermen and those who run our independent fish processing industries given any consideration. Yet the fragile economy in many communities rests solely on the success of a single processing plant and the success of a group of fishermen around that plant to bring in sufficient catch to make it viable. I know that you are aware of this, Mr. Speaker, because you have such plants in your riding. There is not a word in the Budget about that.

In my Province of Nova Scotia, where our people have been struggling for months to retain control over their industry, many independent processors are facing very severe difficulties today in obtaining bank credit to finance their operations. The bank sector, which so often seems so far detached from Atlantic Canada and the small communities in that area, has reduced the flow of new loans that people need to keep their business afloat by as much as 50 per cent. The risk today is obviously considered too great for the commercial banks.

Some fishermen today face the risk of losing their enterprise as well as their way of life. It is situations such as these that at the very least call for the attention and the compassion of the Government. Yet not a word is addressed to this vital need.

The bright forecasts of better years to come, not in the Alice in Wonderland but in the "Lalonde in Blunderland" era, are of no consolation when time is of the essence.

Fuel costs have increased drastically for our fishermen, not only because of the actions of the Government but because they must roam farther over the ocean than ever before in an effort to get a catch. Some assistance in this area in the form of fuel subsidies or tax rebates not only for the fishermen of Atlantic Canada but for the fishermen of central Canada and British Columbia would have been a welcome and practical gesture. It would have been of greater help to the overall economy than hand-outs in the millions of dollars for the Government's friends, such as Maislin and Canadair. Perhaps I should include the $21 million that is estimated to be spent by the Macdonald Royal Commission on the Economy. I think that is the most expensive royal commission in Canada's history. The shame of it all is that the Macdonald Royal Commission is entirely unnecessary. It is simply duplicating the work that is being done every month by the Economic Council of Canada. People on that side sometimes say, "Okay, where would you cut?" Well there is $21 million that we could cut out immediately without in any way hurting the economic forecasts of this nation.

What about the wharves and harbours in Atlantic Canada? For the most part they are in such a decrepit state that we will have to go a far distance beyond the Special Recovery Program funding of the April Budget to modernize, renew and make serviceable the harbours on which our communities depend. The job is not finished, Sir. It has hardly begun. Yet this Budget ignores this important segment of Canadian society and heritage as if it did not even exist. We need dredging. Some of our harbours need dredging in the worst way. The present Minister of Public Works (Mr. LeBlanc) who was the former Minister of Fisheries, I am glad to see is in his seat. He will be well aware, if he looks at his files as far back as three and four years ago, that I made pleas to him to see that the Lunenburg harbour was dredged so that our ships, our draggers, would not scrape bottom at half tide. I have made pleas that Liverpool harbour be dredged ever since 1968 when it was last dredged by the then Diefenbaker Government. Nothing has been done. This Government looks around for make work programs. I am talking about viable, necessary ones that would provide work and ongoing jobs by improving the infrastructure. None of this has been done and there is nothing in the Budget to say that this Government will do anything about it.

During debate on Bill C-170, the Government, while claiming to restructure the fishing industry, proclaimed loudly its intentions to privatize the industry. We on this side expected some mention in the Budget of the Government's future role in this major industry, some statement as to how this Government was going to get out of its management role. But there is not a word in the Budget on this topic. There is no word as well about a tax shelter for vessel owners in order to improve their ability to replace and maintain their vessels and gear.

One of the weak points in the overall restructuring agreements covering the fishing industry in Atlantic Canada was a decision made by the federal Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. De Bané) to transfer management rights covering 12 Riverport-based scallop draggers from Nova Scotia to Newfoundland. This has caused heartache and headaches to the citizens of Riverport who have said to me, either on the phone or in their letters, "Please, you are a Member of Parliament, what steps can be taken to keep this fleet out of the hands and out of the control of the federal Government?" That, Mr. Speaker, is fear. You can sense it. It is direct fear.

I see you are motioning me to come to the end of my speech, Sir. Two of the fleet have already been transferred out of Riverport. Neither the Newfoundland fisheries agreement nor the September 30 Nova Scotia fisheries agreement give any guarantee that other ships will not be transferred out of Riverport. In addition, not even a hint has been given by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans or the Minister of Finance that any investment will be made in this community to rebuild or improve its position. I must ask why that is so. We seem to have funds for frivolous expenditures but none for those that are worthwhile. I claim it is time that this Government examined its priorities.

I agree that this country has the potential to shape the world with its wealth, its genius, its imagination and its youth. But nowhere has such promise met with such disappointment, and at no time should it have been met with more urgency. For all these reasons, I am happy to state that I will be voting against the Government, because of its policies which are working a hardship on our people, by voting for the amendment moved by the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie).

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Questions and comments. Debate.

The Hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. LeBlanc).

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to take part in this debate to express my support for the budget tabled by the Minister of Finance.

[English]

The Budget, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) stated, puts into action the process of growth, opportunity, security and partnership which was outlined in the Speech from the Throne. It is a courageous Budget, one which will create a strong and growing economy and generate meaningful jobs. I say it is a courageous Budget because it would have been easy to embark upon a crusade to reduce the deficit in a rapid and chaos-producing manner. This approach would simply have created more problems and delayed economic recovery. The Minister of Finance has taken a balanced approach to reduce the deficit in the coming fiscal year. In fact, the deficit will fall by some $2 billion and it will continue to fall in future years.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I said this was a courageous Budget, because the Government is meeting its commitment to help those who are in greatest need, which is borne out by the increase in the Guaranteed Income Supplement for single pensioners. The proposed changes to the pension system are essential to the well-being of those Canadians who have worked all their lives to build this country's prosperity.

Pension reform is of vital importance to most Canadians. I am proud to be a Member of a Government that has not shirked its duties in the field of social policy, a Government that has maintained and, where feasible, expanded its social security system, in particularly difficult times.

Mr. Speaker, during difficult economic times, we must maintain our network of social services because that is when these services become increasingly important. The Minister of Finance has shown this commitment and this attitude by providing more assistance to those who are in need.

[English]

I was struck by the remarks of the Hon. Member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) and by suggestions from Members opposite. They say the deficit should be reduced, but then they suggest a few small expenditures as a magic solution. At the same time they are not really identifying those large reductions which would have to be effected if we were to reduce substantially the deficit. It is really not good enough, Mr. Speaker, for the Opposition to say, "Reduce the deficit, but increase expenditures in particular areas", but not give us the blueprint of how to do it. In fact, the Minister of Finance of that short-lived Government indicated some time ago that if the Tories were to tell us what they might do, perhaps the people of Canada would not vote for them. It is easy to do all things for all people if one only speaks in generalities and if one is unprepared or unwilling to face the difficult choices and to speak clearly. I suspect that Hon. Members across the aisle, especially those from the Atlantic Provinces, remember only too well when the President of the Treasury Board of that ill-fated Government, better known in popular parlance as "Sinc the Slasher", was reducing expenditures when, in fact, he was abolishing job-creation projects. I remember Members opposite, including some Ministers representing certain Provinces, having to run to their Premiers to ask them to intervene and to protect Members and people from the Atlantic region from the reductions being imposed by the then virtuous President of the Treasury Board.

This Government has faced some difficult issues. It has introduced the six and five program and taken leadership in reducing inflation. It has taken a clear stand on medicare. It has acted to create jobs. In my own portfolio, close to $1.5 billion was spent to create much needed construction employment. For those home owners who could have lost their homes because of extraordinary rises in interest rates, we provided assistance and showed that we cared. However, I did not stop there. In the housing area we have actively consulted with the industry associations and with the lending community. We have listened to individual Canadians who said that they wanted more security and confidence when purchasing their homes. The Budget outlines measures which will foster a return of security and confidence to home owners. I am pleased to say that housing industry associations have responded favourably to our initiatives. The measures announced in the Budget were at the top of the priority list of many associations. They know the Government has listened to them and that their advice has been heard.

I should also say that there is another part of the Budget which is very important to the home-building industry. As Hon. Members know, that industry is largely comprised of small businesses, small builders. Proposals announced in the Budget to simplify taxes for small businesses will be very important to them. In fact, HUDAC is meeting right now in Quebec City and agrees with the Minister of Finance that tax simplification can and should free valuable resources for the critical task of running the businesses and making them grow.

I return briefly to the Mortgage Rate Protection Program, an ideal which CMHC officials have developed with other Departments of Government and in close consultation with the housing associations. Home owners should not have to face extraordinary payment increases at mortgage renewal time. Proposals presented in the Budget allow home owners to protect themselves against large payment increases at renewal time or to have the opportunity to take out longer term mortgages. The cost of this will be borne by home owners themselves. Until now there was no readily available way for home owners to protect themselves. The Mortgage Rate Protection Program in many ways offers home owners the best of all possible outcomes. If mortgage rates decline at renewal time, home owners can take full advantage of the lower mortgage interest rate. If mortgage rates increase, home owners will not face large payment increases. Therefore, the home owner is in a "no lose" situation. He is able to take advantage of interest rate declines and is substantially covered if rates rise. In that way stability and confidence should be restored.

Canadians have traditionally looked to home ownership as the way in which they could control the single largest element of their household budget, but over time with income growth and property value growth, home owners were devoting a reduced proportion of income and wealth to housing. For example, on average home owners spent 21 per cent of their income on housing in 1970. Given income growth and no problems with mortgage renewals, these households would have spent about 10 per cent of their income on housing in 1980, ten years later. The experience of the last few years had changed this perception of home ownership. We saw mortgage payments increase dramatically. In many cases it depended upon the luck of the draw or the timing of the mortgage renewal. This created uncertainty and insecurity and, one might be tempted to say, some inequities. For example, someone who renewed his mortgage in June 1980 would have faced monthly payments 24 per cent higher than someone who renewed in April, 1980. The measures announced in the Budget will help overcome some of these uncertainties. Perhaps an example could make this clear.

Assuming a home owner takes out a five-year $70,000 mortgage at 13 per cent and purchases the insurance plan. The cost of the insurance would be about $11 per month when amortized with the mortgage. If the mortgage rate were to be 18 per cent at renewal time, the home owner would receive close to $6,500 over the next five years to reduce the monthly payments. If the rate were to increase to 20 per cent, the benefits would be close to $11,000. Of course, if the rate were to increase to 15 per cent in this example, the home owner would not receive any benefit as the $100 increase in the monthly mortgage payments should be within normal financial capability.

In effect, the program limits monthly payment increases to be borne by home owners to roughly $100 a month and, beyond that, the program would pick up 70 per cent of any increases in monthly mortgage payments. In a very real way this will limit the exposure of home owners at mortgage renewal time. Stated differently, it should contribute toward enhancing dramatically the security and the confidence of those people who are deciding whether or not to purchase homes.

Consultations with industry representatives have already started and will continue in coming weeks. When the time comes and after appropriate discussion and study, I hope the measures can be presented to the House and that Members on all sides will feel that this program will go a long way toward creating a climate of security and confidence among Canadians who want to own homes.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I would like to take advantage of this opportunity to ask the Minister a question which follows on a meeting I had on Saturday with some very responsible officials of the Peel non-profit Housing authority in my city. The Minister will know that these people administer municipally public non-profit allocations from the social housing program in my area. Also he should know that 1,100 units have been built and are being managed by this authority. They house moderate and low-income families and seniors, and the authority does it very well. Of course it is a public non-profit organization which comes under the supervision of the Province of Ontario. The housing authority has asked me to determine when Ontario's allocation will be announced. We understand that there are ongoing discussions between the Minister's office and the Province of Ontario. We would like to see the allocations as soon as possible. I did not want to miss this opportunity to put in a plug and to tell the Minister, as well as Claude Bennett, that Peel needs at least 300 units this year to stay even.

Mr. LeBlanc: Mr. Speaker, I assume the Hon. Member's suggestion could be interpreted as a representation rather than a question. I certainly hope that we arrive very quickly at a proper distribution of the units. I felt it was my responsibility to ask the public bodies which would be utilizing units in the social housing program to indicate their priorities so that we could, where our program was involved, try to make allocations as fairly and as quickly as possible to the groups most in need.

My approach to social housing is to try to target the program gradually. Everyone admits that it has not been perfectly targeted. In fact, I wish I had made the remarks which I had intended to make, as I wanted to address the matter of better targeting. We are trying to move in this direction. We have asked the provinces and associations of all kinds to give us their views on the evaluation that has been done of social housing programs. Some are beginning to trickle in. I hope that very soon we can get those who are interested involved in a process of consultation. What is important to remember is that we want to get as big a bang as possible for the federal buck that is being spent on social housing. That is certainly my philosophy.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Joliette.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, although from a distance, I listened as carefully as I could to what the Minister of Public Works (Mr. LeBlanc) was saying. I would like to know, in the interests of all Canadians, whether he could inform the House, in connection with the Mortgage Rate Protection Plan, when approximately we will be advised of the details of this program, and could the Minister also inform the House at what rates the program will protect home buyers?

Mr. LeBlanc: Mr. Speaker, if I remember correctly, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) indicated in his Budget that the program will be in effect as of March 1, although it may be necessary to make implementation of the program retroactive, and in any case, he expected that consultations would be held very soon and that we would be able to table appropriate legislation in the House very shortly. Personally and I suppose I am sticking my neck out I have the impression that we will be ready to proceed about the end of March, with legislation that will protect those who will have renewed their mortgages or purchased homes since March 1st. What we want to avoid is to have a very long period during which Canadians who would otherwise have benefited under the program would not be eligible.

As for the fee or rate, if I understood the Hon. Member's question correctly, I suppose he would like to know how much the monthly payment would be. Is that correct?

Mr. La Salle: The rate protected under the plan! What rate?

Mr. LeBlanc: The interest rate! Of course, I gave an example, and, if the Hon. Member would care to look at the next of my speech, he will see that my example was a 13 per cent mortgage. I said there was a deductible of 2 per cent, so up to 15 per cent, the home owner would pay. This could be as much as $100 per month, depending on the mortgage. However, assuming that the homeowner has a 13 per cent mortgage, if the rate rises above 15 per cent, increasing a maximum of 10 per cent, which means up to 25 per cent, the homeowner will be compensated for 75 per cent of the increase.

In other words, this is a plan in which the homeowner does carry part of the costs, as is the case in all kinds of car insurance, and similar arrangements, and we are trying to protect the homeowner against dramatic increases in interest rates similar to those we have experienced in this decade.

[English]

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, I commend the Minister for his continued support of co-op and social housing, despite some of the biased evaluations in his Department. I, of course, regret that there were not more units. We hope he will be able to do something about that.

There is a critical situation in British Columbia. As a result, I gather, of CMHC policy, co-ops are being prevented from contracting with unionized labour to build co-ops. In some instances the labour movement, particularly the carpenters, are actually putting their pension funds into the financing of co-ops. There is quite a lot of union money going into the financing of co-ops. I gather this is the result of an exemption that was made to the fair wages section of the Labour Code. Will the Minister look into and reconsider this matter? It is grossly unfair. In many cases the product is not up to standard. It is costing a great deal of unhappiness and concern for co-ops, as well, of course, as for workers who are suffering from the great unemployment in the construction field.

Mr. LeBlanc: Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the Hon. Member if I am not able to give an informed and detailed answer to the technical point that she raises. Obviously I will look into it and inform her as soon as possible. The last thing I want to do is to be unfair to anyone.

On her general comment as to co-op and social housing, I remind the House that co-operatives are but one element of the social housing program. It is a very broadly based program covering rural and native people, senior citizens, non-profit groups and so on. These are all potential clients for our social housing programs. I am not usually looking for quarrels with provincial governments, but I may make the suggestion to the Hon. Member that she suggest to her provincial colleagues that they should try to influence the attitude and the programs of the provincial Government of her province.

In the remarks I made to the HUDAC group yesterday, I deplored the fact that in the area of social housing, some rather well to do provinces are increasingly opting out of social housing programs. I expressed a strong hope that they will go back to helping those who are in need. As generous and as willing as we are, the queue of those who need some assistance and need improved social housing is getting longer all the time.

Perhaps the Hon. Member should consider running in another place and expressing her views very strongly.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House will now proceed to debate. The Hon. Member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling).

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, I suppose I cannot get permission to ask the Minister a question because I have now been recognized for debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Let me put it this way. The Minister did not use all of the speaking time allotted to him. By unanimous consent of the House, we could extend the questioning period. Is it agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. May I get it clear in my own mind, are you asking for unanimous consent to extend the question period only to the end of the Minister's otherwise allocated time?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is a good question. By unanimous agreement we extend the time, or we do not. It is a matter of being reasonable in all circumstances. The Minister had ten more minutes of speaking time which he could have used but did not use. If the House wishes to extend questions and comments for a further ten minutes, I will see if there is unanimous agreement. Is it agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am sorry to be a nit-picker but I have experienced this before and I would like to be clear in my own mind. Are you asking for an extension of ten minutes only? If so, I would be happy to agree.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair always does its utmost to be helpful in circumstances like this. I thought I had asked if there was unanimous consent to extend, if need be, the question period for another ten minutes. Is it agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to see the Minister in the Chamber and also to learn that he addressed the HUDAC Convention in Quebec City yesterday. I, too, commend the courageous Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) on those parts of the Budget that will help housing, such as protecting interest rates and allowing a mortgagor to pay off a mortgage without having to pay an arm and a leg. How were the Minister's remarks to HUDAC received? What did HUDAC think of the items in the Budget? Did they feel they go far enough? In today's Question Period it was mentioned that there is 33 per cent unemployment in the construction industry, which is tragic. That construction industry is very important to the economy of Canada. I think the Minister will recall the time when the Government, and more power to it, had a special incentive grant of $3,000 for new house construction. That was a shot in the arm. I am sure that the Government got its $3,000 back many times in sales of houses, in income tax, sales tax and so on.

• (1600)

I would appreciate the Minister's comments on an incentive grant like that to stir up the economy, and also on what HUDAC would like.

Mr. LeBlanc: Mr. Speaker, I would gladly have given consent for the Hon. Member to continue because I know his interest and knowledge in this subject.

I am somewhat at a disadvantage because I cannot speak for HUDAC; I can only interpret its reception of my speech. While I cannot qualify its reception of it because my modesty obliges me to be restrained, I thought the speech was received with as much good will as it was delivered.

I can say to the Hon. Member that at least two of the ideas, the one for the mortgage rate protection plan and the other of a mortage backed security which should trigger longer term mortgages, were ideas on which HUDAC had been consulted and which it supported very strongly. I think it supported the measure introduced by my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mrs. Erola), on the subject of buying out from a high interest rate mortgage.

I should say that the national association indicated quite clearly in the speech that the incoming President made that it did not favour a $3,000 stimulation at this time. It took a rather strong position on not increasing the deficit, feeling that whatever benefit we might get from a $3,000 incentive of the type we had about a year ago, if it did trigger a dump in the interest rates, then in the long run it would have a negative effect on the housing industry.

Its support for the mortgage rate protection plan is very much inspired by the same preoccupation that we have, I believe, which is for the restoration or establishment in the industry of confidence and a climate of security, especially on the part of potential home buyers.

Some months ago I said that I thought I needed a psychologist to reassure people, more than an economist. I still feel that way. I think that we have to promote the idea that if you do invest in a home or in a major purchase of that type, you should have at least a guarantee that the type of roller-coaster interest rates we saw some time ago and on which I reflected in my speech, would not bring hardship to those purchasing homes.

I hope I have answered the Hon. Member's question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The answer was rather lengthy. The Hon. Member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert).

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Minister could indicate what he feels will be the effect on new housing construction starting later this year when the 1 per cent increase in excise tax on building materials goes into effect.

This is one of those hidden tax proposals included in the Budget of last year. There is a considerable effect on government revenues as a result, supposedly, according to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde), of that 1 per cent increase in sales tax on building materials to 6 per cent.

Mr. LeBlanc: Mr. Speaker, I expect that these are judgment calls which all Ministers of Finance make at one point or another. I feel that if there is a negative effect, certainly it must be reduced by the fact that we are looking at an inflation rate which has been dramatically lowered and we are also looking at stability in wage rates in the building industry. The HUDAC representatives who spoke this week interpreted that as a positive element in their planning process. In fact, the President of HUDAC was rather vigorous in saying that the industry had historically thought that it could learn to live with inflation by simply passing the cost on to consumers. He advocated a program of restraint and measures that would keep inflation under control.

I suspect that those factors are probably quite a bit more important than the 1 per cent the Hon. Member discusses.

Mr. Wenman: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that it takes from five to nine days for a piece of first class mail to reach Ottawa from Vancouver, there are still a series of $3,000 grant appeals before the Minister. Speaking of just those appeals, and not opening anything else up, and because the problem was caused by the mail, would the Minister consider giving special attention to those cases that missed the deadline? The stamp on the envelope could be taken as the reference point.

Mr. LeBlanc: Mr. Speaker, I have tried to take as generous an interpretation of the problem as I could. In a case where documents would indicate that a home owner or home buyer had made a commitment, wherever possible I have interpreted in favour of the home buyer.

I might say that I do not quite understand the Hon. Member's question about nine days. Applications were made to the regional office, and therefore they would have been in contact with CMHC offices within the province. I am not sure, therefore, that this is a valid issue. Certainly, where I have been able to interpret in favour of the applicant, I have tried to do so. I know there are some disappointed people, and I can assure the Hon. Member that I never sign those letters with any sense of satisfaction.

Mr. Young: Mr. Speaker, I want to go back to the question of social housing. In his comments a few minutes ago the Minister reiterated comments of officials in his Department about transferring money from CMHC which had previously been used for co-op housing to the private sector and not to social housing. He spoke about the "biggest bang for the buck! It seems to me that when we talk about the biggest bang for the buck, surely we are talking about providing adequate, good housing at affordable prices to those thousands of people across the country who cannot afford any housing at all.

It seems to me that co-op housing is the route that provides many young married people who cannot afford to get into the private housing market, with an adequate good supply of housing.

I am distressed when I hear the Minister repeat what his officials had been flying kites about a couple of months ago in which there was a clear indication that the Government was going to change its policy in that direction. If I am mistaken and the Minister was not implying that, I would like to hear him say so.

Mr. LeBlanc: Mr. Speaker, I am beginning to regret that I did not read the four extra pages that I had on social housing. I tried to speak to items in the Budget Speech and for that reason I did not use those remarks.

The fact is that, first of all, co-op housing and social housing should not be equated. Co-ops are a form of social housing. There are some good co-ops and there are some less than good ones. The Hon. Member did not touch upon one of the most difficult problems in the area of social housing, particularly co-op housing, and that is the issue of targeting. In other words, Mr. Speaker, the obligation which a group in a co-operative plan has is to have at least 15 per cent of clear assistance. This percentage is obviously too low. We are now working with a co-op group to see how we can increase it. In fact, we have talked about avoiding ghettos, and trying to correct what possibly was a distortion when, perhaps, we had much more money than we have now. The problem is that for co-ops or other forms of social housing—which are comfortable, and I do not deplore this at all—the queue of those who are waiting to get in is getting very long. I am sure the Hon. Member, who represents a Party which is to the left, would want to find a way for the program to help more and more of those who are in real need.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The extended time has elapsed. We will now proceed with debate.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to have the opportunity to speak on the Budget. To begin with, I presume it is in order to say a word to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. LeBlanc) in the form of a question which perhaps he could answer following my remarks, that is, that I hope the Government is continuing two of its very important programs, namely, RRAP and the Rural and Native Housing Program. The Minister and the Cabinet should be given full marks for those very important programs. I believe you will agree, Mr. Speaker, representing as you do a rural riding, that they are job providers and also that you take advantage of those two programs because they certainly help the economy of the country.

With respect to the Budget of the courageous Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde)—I believe that is how the Minister of Public Works addressed him—or was it the courageous Budget? However, he was a courageous Minister to have brought that Budget in. I will concede, as will a good many Hon. Members from all sides of the House, that there were some very good points and positive proposals in it. For instance, the guaranteed income supplement for the estimated three-quarters of a million senior citizens will be increased by $50 a month over the coming year. It will not be all at once as, I suppose, some hoped. However, they will receive $25 a month from July 1 and then $25 a month starting December 1.

However, the sad part about it is that it is restricted to single senior widows or widowers. There could be couples who are finding it hard to get along on the present amount of money because of high rents and, in the case of home owners, the cost of fuel over the severe winter we have just experienced. It does benefit some, that is true, but there are still a lot of senior citizens who are left out in the cold.

I also look favourably on the announcement that low income pensioners, many of them immigrants, who receive partial old age pensions, will be able to qualify for additional guaranteed income supplements so that now they will have the same guaranteed minimum retirement income as do other Canadians.

Another positive step is aid provided to small business by the simplification of tax measures. The corporate tax form will be shorter and simpler, fewer special situations will exist in small business tax laws. Growing small businesses will have increased access to tax savings and their savings in administration and consultation costs will be substantial. Of course, a good many of us who are small businessmen ourselves say amen to that, but why has it taken so long for the Government to wake up and improve this situation?

As the Minister of Public Works himself pointed out, the mortgage interest protection plan is a good idea. He has outlined what a mortgage will cost after a five-year or 10-year term. I believe he mentioned that a $70,000 mortgage would cost about $11 a month to insure. After the tragedies of a few years ago, I presume that most people will consider an extra $11 a month to protect their homes to be certainly well worth it. Of course, they must pay the first 2 per cent of the higher rate, I believe, but I would hope that most of them will be able to look after that increase.

Again, on a positive note, I must comment on the idea of doing something for the farmers. The farm community is probably one of the hardest working sectors of our economy, and the sector which does not get the breaks. I have said before and I will say again, "Farmers buy everything retail and sell their products wholesale". It is said that all farmers live poor but die rich, if they have a big farm. But if farmers wanted to sell their farms, of course, under the previous legislation, the Department of National Revenue would step in and take a substantial amount of the price of the farm. This has been remedied with an annuity plan for farmers in the amount of up to $120,000, and more power to them for that. Finally the Government is waking up and is giving some relief to the farmer who will be handing the farm down to the next generation, the son or daughter.

I will give the Government full marks for these good things, and that may be unusual coming from this side of the House, but I will say that it is about time the Government woke up. The federal sales tax will remain at the manufacturer's level, where it should have been left in the first place. Whoever the idiots were who were twisting the arm of the Minister of Finance to change it, I hope that they are put out to pasture now. One glaring error has been rectified. Most of us are aware that Japanese and Europeans cars received a special break of $200 over domestically manufactured cars. I cannot imagine anything more idiotic. I understand that has been looked after so that cars manufactured in Canada will be able to compete, at least taxwise, with European cars.

The Budget has been described as neither stimulative nor job-creative. It is clearly a political Budget. I would say it is an election Budget. The Minister himself, I believe, stated that there is no other Budget on the horizon at the present time. I am one of those who feels that political as the Budget is, there is no election going to be called in the next two or three months. There is very little in this Budget which addresses the most important concern of Canadians, that is, the unemployment situation. This is the tragic and sad part of it, Mr. Speaker. There are things in the Budget, as I say, which are positive, but there is nothing of a meaningful and lasting nature as far as employment is concerned. The Minister made much of the fact that there was $150 million for youth employment, and $150 million may sound like a heck of a lot of money. However, as far as jobs are concerned, that would only provide jobs for about 10,000 of our youth—and when I say "youth", I mean young people up to the age of 25—and where does that leave the other 400,000 or more unemployed youth? They are still waiting and looking for a job. Something must be done to help all our unemployed, but especially the unemployed youth. After four years of Liberal economic promises, the Finance Minister tells us in the Budget that he is dedicated to building a strong and growing economy, an economy which will generate lasting, meaningful jobs for all Canadians who want to work, an economy which will provide the economic opportunity and security all Canadians seek. Those are wonderful words, Mr. Speaker, but we can say to the Minister of Finance, "Come on, Mr. Minister, where have you been? Canadians have been saying this for a good number of years". How can we believe him now? Rest assured, most Canadians do not believe him, nor will they forget that when the next election comes along.

The 1981-82 recession was the worst since the 1930s. The real GNP fell by 6.5 per cent between the second quarter of 1981 and the fourth quarter of 1982. According to the January, 1984 Conference Board report, the Canadian economy is heading for a disastrous year, possibly another recession in 1985. That certainly is a gloomy forecast. Canadian factories are operating at only 71 per cent of capacity. One worker in nine, almost 1.5 million people, is officially unemployed. These are hardly circumstances which enhance dignity, create opportunity and provide security, Mr. Speaker. According to this Budget, unemployment will exceed 1.1 million people until at least 1988. That is four years down the road. Even with an economy forecast to be on the upswing, it is alarming to think that four years down the road the Government—and I expect it will be as optimistic as possible—is giving a figure of over one million unemployed.

There is nothing in the Budget to address the disastrous state of the federal Government's balance sheet. Indeed, the Budget clearly indicates that between $15 billion and $20 billion of the deficit is a permanent structural deficit. I believe it is one dollar in four which goes to pay interest on the national debt, and within a year or so it will be one dollar in three. There is also nothing in the Budget to address the problems of low income Canadians under the age of 65. As for the economy, the Budget's financial projections hinge on what are overly optimistic assumptions of economic growth. The Government sees continued strong real growth of 4.9 per cent this year and 3.5 per cent next year. However, StatsCan has recently warned that the recovery is losing its vitality and the Conference Board has predicted a growth of only 3.3 per cent this year and .3 per cent next year. That is not too optimistic. This is significant as the consequences of highballing the growth projections are to paint an overly optimistic picture.

Expenditures rise at a slower pace in periods of strong growth while revenues rise at a faster pace. This rosy economic forecast is due in large part to two unrealistic assumptions. The first is that all the available evidence suggesting poor levels of capital investment is wrong. The second is that the savings rate falls to levels unheard of as consumers spend the economy into further growth. The Budget also predicts a 5.2 per cent inflation rate this year. As inflation at the end of 1983 was only 4.5 per cent, the clear projection is that it is going up.

Whether all of this is right or wrong depends on what happens to the economy this year. The Minister of Finance, probably for political reasons, chose to bring this Budget down before he obviously knew what the figures were, so he is guessing. We will not even have the first estimates for the growth of the economy in the last quarter of 1983 until later on, probably at the end of this month. Ignorance may be bliss for a Minister of Finance who is overly optimistic, but it sure hurts the ordinary citizen. In the Minister's case, he based his economic forecasts on stale data, choosing not to notice that things have taken an adverse turn recently. Therefore, who is right, the forecasters or the Government? No one knows for sure, but there is no reason to assume that a Department of Finance which has failed completely to foresee the 1981-82 recession must be right when it sees no slowdown at the present time.

On the most important issue of all, unemployment, there is too little, too late. In the recent Budget the Minister said that none of us can be satisfied with more than 1.4 million unemployed Canadians, our children, relatives, friends and neighbours who cannot find jobs. However, Mr. Speaker, that does not include another 500,000 who are not counted in the overall figures because they are no longer drawing benefits, they are either living on welfare or eking out an existence on their savings and probably some part-time work. This is certainly a tragedy. However, it is obvious he is not disturbed enough to do much about it. His own projections say there will be an average of 1.3 million of our friends and neighbours out of work until 1985, and this is an optimistic assumption about growth. If the Conference Board of Canada staff and other like-minded economists are right, employment will be rising instead of falling.

What was the Government's reaction to this possibility? Make work projects and a great deal of money announced in the Budget by the Minister was money and projects pledged in previous announcements and previous Budgets. As I said before, the only actual new, hard cash is the $150 million earmarked for youth employment.

The Minister of Finance's deficit numbers are worse than he expected last year. Yet he has made no aggressive move to close the gap. In the 1983 Budget he forecast that the deficit would drop by $2.5 billion in the fiscal year starting this April. He then put the 1984-85 deficit at nearly $29 billion. Now he has forecast a deficit to be about $30 billion for the coming year, only $1.8 billion down from the fiscal year ending this March. It becomes obvious that the Minister of Finance had to work very hard with his officials to make a stand-still Budget look as though it were going somewhere. Where it is not going is what really counts.

What about taxes, Mr. Speaker? This Budget contained no major tax increases, but it did not have to; the April, 1983 Budget took care of that. In addition, there are delayed increases in unemployment insurance premiums built into the tax structure through existing legislation. Many of these taxes are hidden taxes, and here are some of them. The federal sales tax would be increased by 1 per cent for the period October 1, 1984 to December 31, 1988. The new rates will be 6 per cent on construction materials, compared with 5 per cent. This was brought up here earlier this afternoon and this is not going to help the building industry. There will be a 13 per cent tax on alcoholic beverages and tobacco instead of 12 per cent, and 10 per cent instead of 9 per cent on other taxable goods. The $100 standard medical deduction is eliminated starting in the 1984 taxation year, and receipts will now be required for all charitable and medical deductions.

Another example is the Child Tax Credit. The income threshold above which the Child Tax Credit is reduced by 5 per cent for every $100 of household income will be de-indexed at the 1982 level of $26,330. As income rises with inflation, it will mean fewer and fewer people will qualify. The Canadian ownership special charge is a bruising tax. It takes money out of the pockets of every Canadian every time he or she pulls into a gas station. The tax is equal to four cents a gallon and it was originally imposed as a temporary measure for the purchase of Petrofina by Petro-Canada. It has been extended as a permanent revenue tax. I suspect this will probably surface again once the election is under way.

How does the Minister help domestic demands in this Budget? He does not help them at all. As far as I can see, this is because he increases the taxes and takes four times the revenue that is given back. He might help demand if he did away with this Canadian ownership tax. He would also help consumer demand if he did away with the 1 per cent increase in the federal sales tax. This is a regressive tax which hurts everyone. This increase in the sales tax will take $365 million which is needed out of the economy.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, the Government is running on borrowed time. One indication of this is the $300 million which was earmarked for job creation. A further breakdown of funds shows that the Province of Ontario, with 421,000 unemployed, received $56.4 million. In comparison Quebec, with 416,000 unemployed, received $85.9 million. Ontario has more unemployed than any other province. It received $26,320,850. Of this, $18,400,000 odd went to Liberal ridings with less than $3 million going to Conservative ridings under the Special Employment Initiatives Program.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member but his time has expired. The Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East (Mr. Allmand) for debate.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, it is no secret that the biggest economic issue throughout Canada and thewestern world is unemployment, especially youth unemployment. For the past four years this has been my major preoccupation. Between 1980 and 1982 I served as the chairman of the task force on employment opportunities for the eighties. Since early 1983 I have served as Chairman of the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration which has been studying a reference dealing with unemployment.

Recently a number of members from that Committee attended an OECD conference on the subject of employment growth in the context of structural change. Having listened to many groups, experts, educators, trade unionists, business people and others involved in the field, I have come to the very strong conclusion that double-digit unemployment is not necessary and not inevitable and, with the right policies, co-operation and political will, we can make great strides in bringing down that high unemployment rate. There are lots of jobs to be done everywhere in this country at all levels. They are not in place because they are not being financed. There are people to be helped, resources to be developed and services to be provided. Where are these jobs and how do we get them?

I will give a few examples from areas in which I have worked. There are many examples of shortages of skilled, committed workers. As a former Solicitor General I saw that in the area of corrections we had and still have parole and probation officers carrying caseloads of 60 to 1 and 70 to 1. Most people suggest such case loads should be about 30 to 1. We have shortages of policemen in this country, especially specialized policemen working in preventive policing and on youth squads. In areas of special education we are lacking people to help educate handicapped people, slow learners and the blind. We are short of people to work in areas of alcohol and drug rehabilitation, recreation and leisure. There is a great shortage of people to work with the aged and with health care, preventive and curative.

In my work with the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs this week I have heard witness after witness indicate that there are shortages of skilled and semi-skilled workers in the health field. There is much work to be done. People are not being taken care of because the trained employees are not there to do that job. With respect to literacy and retraining we hear a lot of talk about the need for retraining during the structural change we are going through. There are lots of jobs there as well.

When the Canadian Council on Social Development appeared before the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration a few months ago, they indicated that there are 300,000 jobs with groups associated with their council which could be done but are not filled because they do not have the financing. These are principally jobs in the area of personal services.

There is a lot to be done in the country and a lot of unemployed people not doing those jobs. There is a mismatch. There are things to be done but unemployed people are doing nothing. How do we change that situation? First of all we make our economy as efficient and competitive as possible. We encourage the rapid introduction of new technology. By doing that it is true that we might lose some jobs in manufacturing. That new technology may replace workers who are doing things with older types of technology. However, by doing that we are keeping those industries in Canada rather than losing them in the long run. If we prop up inefficient industries, sooner or later we will not have those industries at all. Therefore we make them as efficient as possible, keeping the wealth producer in Canada and taxing that wealth producer.

We will have very profitable industries that may not be able to employ as many people as they did in the past, but will produce wealth and profits for the Government to fund the personal services which are in great demand in the health field, the educational field, the correctional field, the crime prevention field and in recreation and labour. I could continue naming areas where things have to be done.

At the OECD conference the representative of the Ontario Federation of Labour referred to the Luddites who destroyed the machines because they felt the machines were taking their jobs. Jobs that are oppressive and boring will be replaced by more interesting jobs with the proper retraining and upgrading.

That brings me to the question of retraining. If we are going to encourage and bring about the introduction of technology to make our industries as efficient and competitive as possible, we need the proper adjustment and retraining policies. This requires a very strong commitment to retraining, upgrading, life-long education, paid educational leave policies, broader and more flexible apprenticeship programs and movement at a much faster pace to the co-operative education model which we see at the University of Waterloo and the University of Sherbrooke and which is becoming more widespread in Canada. We need an expanded right to train while on unemployment insurance and support for part-time and shared work so that those jobs have the pension rights and all the benefits of full-time work. We need support for the people who must take this retraining. For a middle-aged person who has a wife and two children, who is put out of work because of structural change in his field, to go into a retraining program which is good for him and for the economy, he has to have support while he is on that retraining program. We must have good mobility policies so that the people can move to the areas of the country where the new industries are being created.

Mr. Blaikie: You are going to need retraining after the next election.

Mr. Allmand: I am trying to be serious, Mr. Speaker, and I ask Hon. Members to be serious as well.

● (1640)

We must also make a commitment to full employment. I accept that the concept of full employment is hard to define. Certainly it does not mean 100 per cent employment because in any dynamic economy there will be obsolete industries going out of business and new creative industries coming on line. Therefore employees will be leaving the work force, going into training and coming back into the work force. There will be a margin of unemployment because they will be retraining and upgrading. Nevertheless, we need that commitment to full employment, no matter how it is defined.

It is interesting to note that when the Government made the commitment to full employment, we almost achieved full employment on two occasions since World War II. Under a Liberal Government in 1945, with the introduction of the white paper on employment and income, full employment policies were introduced. Between the period 1946 and 1953, there were unemployment rates of about 3 per cent. The second time was in 1964. With the publication of the first annual review of the Economic Council a commitment was made to full employment, and we had unemployment rates of 3.8 per cent between 1964 and 1967.

The commitment to a full employment policy is important. On those occasions in this country when we made that commitment, we almost achieved it.

Other measures which can be combined with those policies are adjustments in our working time schedules. By this I mean the shortening of the work week. In doing so, the aim is to achieve full employment and improve the quality of life. Let me quote from a study in Europe. According to the European Economic Commission, half a reduction in working hours translates into extra jobs and the other half translates into increased productivity. In other words, if the Canadian work week were reduced by 10 per cent, say from 40 hours a week to 36 hours a week, that would produce a 5 per cent increase in jobs which would cut our unemployment rate almost by half.

I should point out to the House that there was a time, which many of us will remember, when we had a 60 hour work week. If that 60-hour work week still existed, we would have an unemployment rate of 40 per cent rather than 11 per cent or 12 per cent.

The reduction in work hours is not something new; it has been a steady trend throughout this century. It does not mean lower productivity. It is combined with the introduction of machinery which is far more productive and thereby releases people to do other things, such as retraining, upgrading and taking part in cultural and leisure time activities.

We should combine our commitment to full employment with adjustments in our work time schedules. We also need an industrial strategy, an industrial strategy that is made in consultation with business, unions and the educational sector. It must be a strategy which would make the best use of our resources, our work force and market potential. It has to be clearly articulated, long term and tied to our Government policies at all levels with respect to financing, training and adjustment policies.

I believe that Government policies introduced over the last three or four years and in the last two Budgets have been moving in this direction. For instance, we have a new National Training Act. We have a commitment to the introduction of high technology. There is a commitment in the latest Budget to mobility policies, job creation, subsidization of internship jobs and so on.

One of the most important measures was the establishment of the Centre for Productivity and Employment which I believe is a great step forward. It is one of the few occasions in many years when organized labour and business have come together to solve problems in this country.

Having said that, I suggest that more is needed. We must have more support for personal, social and health services employment. There should be more help to those established voluntary groups that work in the voluntary services field, such as the John Howard Society, the YMCA and halfway houses which provide needed services to many people. This might also involve the implementation of the give and take policy under the tax system for these voluntary groups which, as I said, would supply jobs and very needed services to Canadians. It might also mean that we would amend our labour codes in order to encourage the shorter work week.

In conclusion, let me sum up the message I want to leave with the House today. First, we must encourage our industries to become very efficient and competitive. This means first-class management and first-class technology.

Second, this must be combined with a commitment to labour that benefits and profits derived from these efficient and profitable industries will be channelled into the creation of new jobs, especially in the area of personal services.

Third, combine this with policies leading to a shorter work week. I emphasize a shorter work week, but with greater production, which is possible.

We must dispel the pessimism which is abroad in this country that we must live with double-digit or high unemployment. We must spread optimism, which I believe is realistic. It is not being Pollyannaish or rose-coloured. Full employment is possible if governments at all levels, the private sector and public sector, management, labour and education co-operate. One government cannot do it alone. The public sector cannot do it alone. We must all agree to move in that direction. If we have the political will to do this, we can bring unemployment down by a country mile.

Mr. St. Germain: Mr. Speaker, I was fortunate to be at the OECD conference with the Hon. Member. I think he forgot to mention a fact that was pointed out at that meeting by those countries that are recovering as being clearly required. It is that investor confidence and the private sector were the keys to recovery. When he cites the jobs that will be made available, he merely cites jobs in the public sector.

Would the Hon. Member explain to the House why he left that particular facet out? Japan and the United States, which have the strongest economies and show the greatest decrease in unemployment and the most stable economic picture, were the countries that clearly stated that the private sector had to be motivated again. Would he comment on that?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, when I referred to policies which would enable industry to be as efficient and competitive as possible, I was referring to the private sector. Well over 90 per cent of our industry is in private sector hands. Of course, there must be confidence to invest in the private sector. I was suggesting that governments—I do not mean just the federal Government—unions and management must co-operate in developing policies which will allow the private sector to move as quickly as possible into new technologies in order to be competitive. I might have used different terminology but when I talk about an efficient and competitive industrial sector, it is the private sector. While there are other sectors in private hands, I was talking principally about that sector.

It is true that there is 2 per cent to 3 per cent unemployment in Japan. However, Japan's social and economic structure is quite different from ours. There are massive conglomerates that are involved in many fields. You may find that there is one company that is involved in transportation, chemicals, construction materials, electronics and so on. When obsolescence in one of those companies comes about, the Japanese redirect or reassign their employees to another part of the company, with retraining given. I must say there seems to be very good co-operation in Japan between government, labour and management.

The Japanese system is not the same as ours. The United States is closer, but while the United States has had some improvement, as we have had, I doubt whether one could claim that the U.S. today has a satisfactory employment or unemployment situation. Unemployment in the U.S. is a few points lower than Canada; but in both countries it is still much too high and we both have a long way to go to reach what the Japanese have achieved in terms of unemployment.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East (Mr. Allmand). He has expressed his support for the idea that we should work to have a full employment economy. He has referred to the period just after World War II when we had full employment. The Liberal Government of that day issued a white paper which promised the people of Canada that we would have full employment. The Hon. Member has referred to the Economic Council's report in the early 1960s that said that we had very low unemployment at that time. Since that time we have had a Liberal Government, of which the Hon. Member has been a part, and our unemployment has gone from about 4.5 per cent to 5 per cent in the early 1960s to over 11 per cent at the present time.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) in his Budget Speech, which we are now debating, has indicated that we will have double-digit unemployment for the next four or five years. Obviously, this Liberal Government is not as committed to a full employment policy as the Hon. Member for NDG and is not doing very much to accomplish that. I would like the Hon. Member to explain why his Government is doing so little to achieve the purpose to which he says he is committed, namely a job for every Canadian who wants to work?

Mr. Allmand: There is no doubt in my mind, Mr. Speaker, that the highest priority of this Liberal Government today and for the last year has been employment and the problem of unemployment. It is true that the Government has not made the commitment to full employment. We can debate that. I personally believe there should be that commitment, the same as the Liberal Government had in 1964 and in 1946. The highest priority has been employment. One need only look at the Budget, the Speech from the Throne and last year's Budget of April, 1983 to see that employment is a very high priority.

On the other hand, I think we are in a situation today which is quite a bit different from 1946 or 1964. My colleague, the Hon. Member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. St. Germain) will confirm—because he was at the same conference—that many countries in western Europe are concerned with the structural change that is taking place. We are into a massive revolution of technology and a lot of displacement is going on. I am still committed to a full employment policy because I think by having it you are more likely to achieve it. There is a lot to be done. It is much more difficult to achieve than to state.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East (Mr. Allmand). How does he expect Canada will be able to cope with the structural changes going on in the global economy if we do not have a Government committed to giving the kind of direction to investment that will be necessary if we are to get through this transition period? Many countries which seem to be handling what is going on in the world economy better than we, are countries where governments take a much more active part in the direction and planning of investment. Here we have on the part of the Liberal Government for all intents and purposes a virtual abdication to international market forces and to the private sector. There is no political will on the part of that Government to direct investment at all so as to make sure Canada does survive the transition.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I think the Hon. Member is exaggerating the situation. He says the Government has no policies whatever. I have in my hand a document which is available to him as well as to myself, put out by the Department of Employment and Immigration, entitled: "An Inventory of Federal Employment and Manpower Measures". Among those measures—if I were to read them it would take another 10 minutes—are many direct job-creation programs in that Department, many programs to assist employment. There are other Departments, such as DRIE, Agriculture and Fisheries, which also have policies to create employment.

That having been said, one of the difficulties in this country, and I suppose a benefit as well, is that we are a federal state. I see situations from time to time where we have governments at one level wanting to go in this direction and governments at another level going in another direction. Britain and France are unitary states. The United States is a federal state but most of the economic power is in the hands of the federal Government, the central Government.

I am not saying that things are perfect here, I admit that. I would like to see us go much further in co-ordinating this employment policy about which I have been speaking. But to say that nothing is being done is not fair, nor is it correct. I know, because I am a member of this caucus, that the highest priority of members of this caucus is the easing of unemployment. We have done quite a bit. We have created a lot of jobs. But for the long term, I am suggesting some measures that could still be taken that would improve the situation.

Mr. St. Germain: Mr. Speaker, I have one question for the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East (Mr. Allmand). I do not doubt the honest intent of the Hon. Member having worked and served with him on standing committees. However, on the question of shortening the work week, I think the Hon. Member will agree that shortening the work week is a very controversial issue in economies in the western world today. The Hon. Member cites extra jobs and improved productivity as part of the shorter work week. First, given any information that has been received, this is one side of the coin, not necessarily the picture from the actual job creators, and on that I think the Hon. Member will agree. Given the state of the economy in Canada and the plight of small business—I am not saying big business that has been propped up by government—in this time of recession and low profits how can he possibly suggest that we go to the small-businessman and ask him how he can shorten the work week and maintain the status quo on wages?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I admit the proposals for a shorter work week are controversial. In West Germany I believe it is the steel workers who have now put on the table their demands for a 35-hour work week. That proposal is being very strongly opposed by the employers and the German government. However, I attended a conference last year at which Swedish representatives from all sectors were present. They made a point that this is essential but it can only be moved forward in an expanding or a recovering economy. I would suggest that we are in a recovering economy, an expanding economy. If you do move to the shorter work week, of course, it has to be done as a trade-off for other benefits. Obviously, if you want higher wages you cannot have—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member but he can only continue at this time if there is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Allmand: If you are going to have the shorter work week, no union will accept a cutback in wages; but some, as in West Germany, are willing to accept a curtailment in the increase of their wages in exchange for the 35-hour week. That can be done by increasing employment in a recovering and expanding economy.

● (1700)

With respect to the Hon. Member's question about the small business sector, I am not suggesting that the shorter work week be imposed. Principally that has to be achieved through collective bargaining. I am trying to put the argument before the House that it has benefits not only in terms of lifestyle but in terms of employment. I recommend strongly to unions, governments and managers that where it is a subject of collective bargaining, they look at it seriously.

In terms of the small-business sector, in many cases they are not unionized. When one has only three, four or ten employees, it is very difficult. Very often those employees work much longer hours; they do not work labour standards hours. I am suggesting that we can achieve it in two ways—principally by collective bargaining, which would not apply in many respects to the small business sector; and, second, through labour standards.

We have a Labour Standards Code in the country. By the way, labour standards have been improved by legislation at the federal level. Whether it is the minimum wage, fair employment practices or whatever, something could be done in terms of amending the labour law to provide labour standards to bring about a shorter work week in our transportation and communication industries, which are large industries.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the Budget we are debating has been described by at least two columnists who write regularly about economic matters as having been produced by the use of smoke and mirrors. We have been told by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) and by other speakers on behalf of the Government that the recession is over; or, if it is not quite over, we are moving away from it. This is despite the fact that there are 1.5 million unemployed people at the present time.

Also we were told that the Budget was designed to help people who needed it most. However, when we analyse the details, we see that 80 per cent of the benefits which will flow from it will go to those in the middle and upper-income brackets and that the needy will receive a few dry crusts of bread.

Particularly ignored in the Budget are Canada's young people. Over 500,000 young people, almost 20 per cent of all young Canadians, are unemployed at the present time. While the Minister of Finance has been able to give large tax breaks and concessions to the wealthy and to corporations, he was only able to find $150 million in new money for job creation for Canada's youth. That will provide jobs for less than 1.5 per cent of the more than 500,000 unemployed young people.

If one wants to see how the federal Government really looks at the problems of young people, one just has to look at some of its major decisions about education and improving the skills of young people. The remedial literacy programs operated through the Department of Employment and Immigration have been reduced over the years so that many young Canadians lack basic educational skills. It has been estimated that almost 30 per cent of Canadians are functionally illiterate. That is a disgrace. Funding for the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council has been cut back this year. This will have a devastating effect upon post-graduate students and upon the ability of Canadian universities and colleges to meet their faculty needs in the 1990s. Bill C-12 was passed recently in the House over the objections of the provinces and Opposition Parties. It limited the increase by the federal Government for post-secondary education for the coming year to 5 per cent, which is much less than needed. The $150 million allocated for job creation for unemployed youth will give temporary jobs to only 1.5 per cent of those unemployed.

The Budget papers of the Minister indicate that he foresees double-digit inflation for the next number of years. In other words, he sees very little decrease in the next four years or five years. We are in danger of losing a whole generation of our youth. Not since the hungry 1930s have the prospects for our young been so dismal. I graduated from high school in the 1930s. Many of the young people who started school with me did not graduate. However, the majority of those who graduated in my year were unable to find jobs. When the former Leader of our Party, Mr. Douglas, who was then a Member of Parliament, suggested a fund to put people to work, he was told that the money could not be found. In 1939 war broke out and suddenly there was no problem about money. All the money needed was suddenly found and every Canadian had a job if he was not in the armed forces.

We believe, as do most Canadians, that for the foreseeable future most jobs will be provided by the private sector. We live and will continue to live, as do nearly all people in the western industrialized world, in a mixed economy in which some people provide services, be they employed by a federal, provincial or municipal government or some agency such as a hospital funded by public funds. However, most people work in the private sector. That will continue as far ahead as anyone can foresee.

Given the world-wide recession we are facing at the present time and with which we have been living for the last few years, it is obvious the private sector cannot provide all the required jobs. As the economy is improving, most companies will be able to manage with less workers than they had before or, at most, will rehire some of their senior employees. That forebodes very serious problems for young people who are now unemployed. If the private sector cannot provide the jobs for those who want jobs, we believe the Government must be able to provide them for every Canadian who wants one. The Government should accept that responsibility, a responsibility which the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East (Mr. Allmand) accepted in principle.

Particularly hard hit at the present time are young people living in the core area of our cities—young native people and new immigrant children. Their education has been proven to be deficient. The only jobs they may be able to obtain if the economy picks up are low-paying, unskilled, boring, dead-end jobs, most at minimum wage or slightly more.

The federal Government played a major role in permitting immigrants to enter Canada. It permitted or encouraged native Canadians who for generations had lived on reserves to move into our cities. Cities such as Winnipeg, Regina, Edmonton and Vancouver now have large native populations. Among that group the unemployment rate is 20 per cent, 30 per cent and 50 per cent, not 10 per cent or 11 per cent. On the reserves the unemployment rate is 80 per cent or 90 per cent. Having been responsible for encouraging people to emigrate to Canada, the federal Government cannot ignore those people and say that they are the responsibility of a province or a city. It has the duty to play a major role in helping these people adjust or integrate into urban life which until now it has refused to do.

We do not need the plethora of individual job-creation programs, many of which are designed for political purposes, as we heard so graphically and clearly during Question Period today. Many of them are changed every year, so people do not know what kinds of job programs are available.

We need also a national youth policy. The year 1985 has been designated as the International Year of Youth. We should use that occasion to focus on the contribution that our young people can make to Canadian society. The federal Government can play an important role in this area.

• (1710)

The most notable changes in Canada in education in recent years have been the increase in the number of young people getting instruction in one of the official languages, French in English-speaking Canada and English in French-speaking Canada, and in vocational education. Both of those programs, which are the most significant changes which have taken place in the educational system in Canada in the last 25 years, came into effect as a result of the initiative of the federal Government, the federal Government putting money into those programs. If the federal Government could do that, it could initiate a national youth policy which would put the young people of Canada back to work.

We have had examples of programs which have worked, some better than others. How can we learn what will work except by doing? We have had federal programs such as Opportunities for Youth, the Local Improvements Program, Canada Works and Summer Canada. Each of these has indicated in a small way what can be done if there is a will.

By a national youth policy, I do not mean a blizzard of individual youth projects, many of which to date have helped mainly middle and upper-income youth. Such a policy is urgent because of the changed position of young people in our society. It is generally agreed that major institutions for youth, our schools, have somehow been unsuccessful in meeting the needs of young people.

I was a member of the parliamentary task force on employment in the eighties. We travelled across the country. At our hearings we heard from employers, service clubs, labour and educators. They told us that young people coming out of our schools have not been trained to do the jobs which are or will be available. To a large extent, their education has been designed in a vacuum, designed in the offices of provincial departments of education or individual school divisions. There has been virtually no consultation with employers, labour and educators. I am talking about the teachers in the classroom. The last to be asked what they need and what they should have are the students.

We need a great deal of decentralization, rethinking and consultation. We need to involve our young people in not only identifying the problems but in helping to work out solutions. We know from experience that our young can take innovative approaches. We need to have them help us design programs that will work so that they can have the work they want and need in the next few years.

How can we apply a national youth policy? I am not talking about a policy designed by Ottawa, the Department of Employment or any other Department. I am talking about a policy worked out in consultation between the federal and provincial governments, labour, management, educators and our young people. If we are going to adopt a national youth policy, and we need one, we should first hold a national conference, bringing together not just representatives from the federal, provincial and municipal governments, but representatives of our young people as well as labour, management and educators to see the situation that exists. We need local participation and decentralization instead of what we have had up until now—single-minded decisions being made from the top down here in Ottawa.

We need to encourage demonstration projects. I talked earlier about programs we have had in the past, such as Opportunities for Youth and the Local Improvement Program. Some did not work but many were a great success. To my knowledge, an analysis was never made of the projects which were funded to see which worked, which did not work and whether those that worked could be used as examples.

In Manitoba, when Governor General Schreyer was Premier, for the first time in any province we had the development of a native teacher training program. It has been a tremendous success. Information as to what occurred in Manitoba was not passed along to the other provinces. Provincial representatives were not asked to come to Manitoba to see if they could establish similar programs. We need a series of demonstration projects, funded by governments, so that young people can decide what are the local issues and work on them. It would show what young people can do and would deepen the public perception of the kinds of programs that are needed.

We need resource centres in Canada. Cities would assist in the collection and dissemination of information on projects, the evaluation of projects, development of the recommendations for legislative and policy changes as experience would demonstrate. Our program for youth should be pluralistic and decentralized. You do not have to be an expert to know the tremendous problems that are not being dealt with and in which our young people could be involved. It would not only create employment for them, but begin to solve some of the major problems which are being ignored.

Let me illustrate with a couple of examples. In recent years a number of very important studies have been done. They indicate that because of inaction and shortage of funds from the federal and provincial governments, our forest industry, one of our major industries in terms of employment and providing foreign exchange, is in tremendous danger. Unless steps are taken immediately, 25 years from now there will probably be 50,000 to 60,000 less people working in this industry. We need a major reforestation program. This is not a wild-eyed dream. Franklin Delano Roosevelt did this in the United States in the 1930s in the midst of the Depression. If he could do it then, we can surely do it in Canada in the 1980s.

We need to clean up the environment. Our environment is being degraded every day in every way. Our water, air and soil are being destroyed. It is easy for the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Caccia) to go to the United States and say that they must do something about acid rain. We have Sudbury, Thompson and Flin Flon. I am sure there are thousands more examples where Canadian industry is creating major problems and is a major factor in the destruction of our lakes, our soil and our air. How better could we tackle this problem than by putting our young people to work.

Those are a couple of ideas that I have, Mr. Speaker, but let me give one more. In the centre or core area of every city in Canada we have homes that are 50, 75 or 100 years old. When they were built people did not know anything about insulation. They use much more irreplaceable energy than they ought to and they need to be upgraded, insulated and retrofitted. Insulating a house is not expensive and it does not take highly trained people to do it. There is not a better project for a major objective than the insulation of our old homes.

There is a great deal to be done in the country and we need the will to do it. Unfortunately, the Budget indicates that the Government has neither the will nor the desire to deal with the major problem of unemployment among our young people with which we are faced at the present time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order! Questions, comments, debate. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Dubois).

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be taking part in the debate on the Budget today and to have this opportunity of making a few comments on the Budget that was brought down last week—last Wednesday, to be exact.

Mr. Speaker, there have been many comments to the effect that the Budget did not do enough for job creation, and that it did absolutely nothing for the low-wage earner. My colleague from Beauce (Mr. Lapointe) does not share that view, and in fact, he was one of those who praised the Budget ever since it was brought down here in the House, and he has done so in his riding and elsewhere.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak to two specific items in the Budget today. I see that my colleague from Manicouagan was listening, and I am sure that all his constituents will benefit from the information I will be giving, which the Hon. Member can include in his parliamentary bulletin, with quotes from other Members here in the House today. Mr. Speaker, the proposal offering improved security for homeowners is the one described in the Budget Papers on page 20 and also in a small brochure published under the title "Improved Security for Homeowners—Proposals for a fairer and more flexible mortgage market."

Mr. Speaker, as far as the job creation situation is concerned, there is an expression in French: "Quand la construction va, tout va", which translates quite well in English: "When the construction industry is OK, everything is OK". The construction industry does provide an extraordinary number of jobs in Canada and Quebec. If we look at what the situation was in 1981 and 1982, the construction industry was affected by fluctuating interest rates. We must not forget this fact, Mr. Speaker, which is also emphasized in the brochure I referred to earlier. The brochure is very informative and is available on request. Hon. Members will recall that, in 1981 and 1982, 20 and even 21 per cent of young couples anxious to build a house would come to us and say: "Listen, is there anything the Canadian Government can do to improve the current situation? Do you think there might be a way so that the high interest rates . . ." That was the only thing we heard about. That is why we launched a program in 1982 to spur new home construction and sales of existing housing units. That amount of $3,000 was seen as a boon by contractors in Quebec and in the rest of Canada, and people who had always been renters before were able to buy a house, even an older one, thanks to that $3,000 grant. Indeed, new home buyers were also eligible for that $3,000 grant.

The program covering existing housing units ended in December 1982, but the other one for new houses was extended. There were a good many applications, to the point that the extension of the program had been announced in the Budget Speech of October 27, 1982 when the House resumed.

Perhaps I should explain why I am describing that situation. At the time, new housing starts increased dramatically and the real estate market was very active. Of course, the Canadian Mortgage and Housing Corporation did its best to process grant applications as quickly as possible. I would suggest that the home building boom had a significant impact on job creation. Now then, why can I say in the House that keeping interest rates in check is a source of new jobs?

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, mortgage rates can vary from 10, 10.5 and even 11 per cent over a one-year term. Slight adjustments can probably be made for three or five-year terms. However, those interest rates—Is it possible to have an increase in interest rates? Could there be ups and downs as we had in 1981, unfortunately, when the Government had to intervene through assistance programs for prospective homeowners, again with $3,000 grants? In the Budget and the budgetary Bills, which will follow, we are telling present homeowners, this is quite important—as well as future homeowners that they will he provided with some sort of mortgage insurance or guarantee and that their mortgage rates will be protected. This means that any individual or young couple who wants to build a house and get a mortgage will be assured of some stability in his mortgage payments on the condition that he pays 1.5 per cent of the mortgage up to a maximum of $1,050 for this protection. Accordingly, contractors can promote new residential construction by telling these future homeowners: "With the program implemented by the Canadian Government, you get protection as you will be sure of the amount of your mortgage payments." Some years ago, Mr. Speaker, you could borrow for 25 or 30 years at 6 per cent. What a security this gave homeowners! There are still some of them around today, although not too many. Of course, the economic situation was not the same and interest rates were not what they are today. There have been many changes and fluctuations in our economic system. What kind of security did these homeowners have, these people who may have been our parents or our friends and who had their homes built in 1965 or in 1968 and who were able to borrow for such long periods?

People who are now provided with this protection will be able to say: "Then, let us build our house!" The construction industry is a great producer of jobs, as it was recognized by the Canadian Government in its June 1982 Budget, as it was recognized in its April 1983 Budget and as it is recognized once again in the Budget brought down last week. This is a job-creating industry. Thanks to the protection given to homeowners, we will be witnessing a remarkable sequence of events. First, the builder gets a contract and he then hires people to build the house. This might seem to be rather simplistic but this is really what happens. The contractor therefore hires five, ten, 15 or 20 people, something he would not do if he did not have a contract. In addition, when he buys building materials, this causes the building supplies retailer to hire more people. There is also the tradesmen involved in the construction itself, such as the people who lay the foundations, as well as the people in the various trades, who are very important. In this industry, especially in Quebec, workers need certification cards. However, many of them are available and willing to work. They are just waiting for such an opportunity.

The document lists the main advantages of this provision. If I may, Mr. Speaker, I would like to enumerate them very briefly. First, there will be protection and security against excessive increases in mortgage rates. Second, borrowers' rights will be strengthened. Third, a wider choice of mortgage instruments. Fourth, a more flexible mortgage market. Fifth, greater stability in mortgage costs, andfinally, fewer risks in taking out a mortgage.

Equally important, these proposals have not been restricted to one type of housing. We have tried to cover the entire industry so that more Canadians can take advantage of this program. Consequently, more construction workers will find jobs in their own field and earn good wages. We know that in the construction area, wages are rather attractive and that workers in that sector can do well.

To what group of individuals would that protection apply? We are told that it would apply to the principal residence including single and semi-detached houses, condominiums, mobile homes, the unit occupied by the owner in a duplex or an appartment building.

Mr. Speaker, we wanted to address the whole housing situation. I think that this series of opportunities is really extraordinary for people who say: "I cannot afford a $45,000 or $50,000 house, but I would like to buy a mobile home. I have just begun to work. I may get satisfactory wages for my one year of experience but I cannot borrow to build such a house." Many Canadians are in that situation or could say: "Well, I would rather buy a duplex or part of a duplex or a mobile home." Mr. Speaker, there is a great deal of mobile home construction in the Beauce area. Companies who make those units are large and thriving. They will benefit from this program and so will the constituency of Bellechasse where a lot of household electrical appliances are manufactured. There have been many programs aimed at taking over appliance firms to keep them in business. They will now reap the spin-off benefits in various ridings. I would like to say a few words about the houses in Schefferville, although it may be a somewhat peculiar problem. As my colleague has said, the federal Government is paying to have those houses move so that they can be used by others.

In fact, what I would like to point out, Mr. Speaker, is that we cover the whole range of possibilities in the construction sector. Hence, we cover the low income earners. Mr. Speaker, one could argue that as far as mobile homes are concerned, some models can be quite sophisticated and command stiff prices. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, if people need or want houses of this type in a wide range of sizes and prices, that's fine. Mobile homes are factory made and are one kind of very decent housing. This means that low income earners can actually buy them and benefit from this guaranteed protection, which does not apply only to new houses. For these reasons, I believe we really help home owners, we help people who are facing tough times and cannot meet increases. This applies to everybody since first mortgages will be eligible. As for second mortgages . . . Of course, lower ranking mortgages and so-called vendor take-back mortgages will not be eligible, except that it will be possible for people renegotiating their mortgage. What it says is how to proceed to secure this mortgage protection; the fee will be 1½ per cent of the amount of the mortgage to be protected up to a maximum of $1,050. And how will the program work? Well, the booklet fully describes the situation. What is important also is that, as mentioned in this very useful booklet, the program will pay three-quarters of any increases in monthly payments resulting from a rise of more than 2 percentage points in the mortgage rate. In effect, there will be a 2 per cent deductible.

Therefore, what is important—some figures are quoted—is the relevant amounts. What is also important in connection with job creation and the homeowners whose situation has changed and who want to make prepayments . . . There existed perhaps some problems resulting from the legislation dealing with interests and some adjustments were needed. And some mortgage contracts had a variety of prepayment penalty provisions which was also a source of problems. It is a well known fact that due to inflationary pressures and the economic crisis, interest rates had increased significantly—

Canadians who, at one time, had taken out a mortgage for a number of years found themselves compelled to renew their mortgage and were faced with increases in interest rates as high as 16, 16½, 17 or even 20 per cent. To some of them, this situation caused real hardship. Now, the interest rate situation has considerably improved, although prepayment problems still exist. If we had not made any change, these homeowners would have been unable to prepay their mortgage without paying exorbitant penalties.

I suggest that what we intend to do about the mortgage guarantee plan is important, Mr. Speaker, for the small wage earner, the worker, and also the builder who will create jobs, as he is a very important source of employment in that industry.

In the little time I have left, Mr. Speaker, I would like to deal with a subject matter of particular interest to my constituency, namely the subject of tax assistance to farmers, the roll-over of farm capital gains. We know that over the years, some farmers have accumulated capital, although they may not have had enough cash each year to contribute to an RRSP, a retirement savings plan. Or if they did, it may have been for smaller amounts than other taxpayers.

Clearly, there have always been farmers which were very well off. As in any other area of economic activity, there are people with smaller assets amounting to the capital accumulated in their farm, which they could, so to speak cash in immediately if they decided to sell. And this is why over the years, they were able to amass capital without contributing to as RRSP because, for the better or for the worse, they were living off their farm. Their financial situation was stable, but in a way they managed to balance their budget thanks to what they could get from their land but did not necessarily have enough cash to contribute to a retirement savings plan.

But when they sold, it became very important for them to be allowed to deduct the $120,000 in capital gains on the sale of their property and to invest it into a retirement savings plan. This deduction is allowed for a ten-year period, from 1972-1983, provided one has ownership on December 31, 1983.

In other words, for that gain to be transferable to a RRSP the farm property must have been held by the taxpayer or his or her spouse on December 31, 1983.

So much for the agricultural sector and since last Wednesday, I have already received many comments, Mr. Speaker, from farmers who welcome this change regarding a RRSP.

Mr. Speaker, for these reasons, I think this is a Budget which, regardless of what some may say, provides for stability, and continuity and that it contains some job-creation proposals that will reassure many people, including farmers and small businessmen, and will allow our economy to sustain its growth and forge ahead so to speak, as it did a few years ago, but in fits and starts since then.

[English]

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the comments of the Hon. Member concerning capital gains. I was also interested in the comments made by the Hon. Member for Sudbury (Mr. Frith) the other day when he stated that farmers would now have $240,000 tax free. I tried to question him on that but was unable to get the floor.

Before asking my question, I might just say that a farmer's farm is his pension. He has no other pension. He works 20, 30, 40 or 50 years building up an asset, pays taxes all through the years, and when he gets to retirement he expects to be able to sell the farm to get enough money to buy a home in the city and live comfortably—not extravagantly—in his usual way for the rest of his life while looking after his wife and family if he has one. The regulations say "up to $120,000", which makes me wonder why the Hon. Member for Sudbury said that every farmer would have $240,000.

I do not expect the Hon. Member to answer for the Hon. Member for Sudbury, but I do want to ask whether this $120,000 is based on the price of the land or the size of the farm. If a quarter section farmer with 160 acres sells it for $200 an acre, that does not come anywhere near $120,000. A half section farmer with 320 acres sells for $200 an acre, which is a pretty good price in most places, which would be $64,000. Leaving aside expenses, $32,000 of that would be subject to capital gains taxes. What proportion of this $120,-000 is he now going to be able to get tax free?

• (1750)

Mr. Dubois: Mr. Speaker, regarding the question about my colleague the Hon. Member for Sudbury (Mr. Frith), I must indicate at the outset I have not read his speech. Therefore, I am obviously not in a position to comment on what he said. All I can say about the situation of that particular person is that he deducted over $60,000 . . . You have to remember the actual amount depends on the number of years he has owned his farm. If he owned his farm between 1972 and 1983 and he really wants to put in $10,000 at that time in order to get the maximum benefit, he will be able to do it. I am aware that he could not claim $120,000 if he sold his farm for $60,000 but according to the notes I have here, he could claim as much as $10,000 multiplied by the number of years he has owned his business. So, according to the document, half of the taxable capital gain in such case would be $10,000 multiplied by the number of years between 1972 and 1983, if he has been a full time farmer during that period. That is the way I understand it and I stand to be corrected, but as far as the special deduction is concerned in the case mentioned by the hon. member, half of the taxable capital gain would be $10,000 multiplied by the number of years which have elapsed between 1972 and 1983. As far as the rates are concerned, there may be other explanations. Now, if my colleague is not fully satisfied with the answer I gave him, perhaps we could check with the Finance Department and obtain an answer. I would gladly send him a letter to that effect. I agree with him when he says that farmers who live and work for several years on a farm . . . My father was a farmer and I know that during several years he worked from dawn to dusk, and this is his only pension! I see that he is nodding his head meaning he agrees with me on that subject . . . and there was an opportunity there to help them.

Now, to answer more specifically, I can assure him that I will get in touch with the Finance Department in order to find out, based on the example he gave us, what these $60,000 will give him as exemptions under this program.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Debate. The Hon. Member for Okanagan North (Mr. Dantzer).

[English]

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Mr. Speaker, usually, as do other Members of this House, I express my pleasure at being able to speak because I still consider it a great honour. But on this particular occasion my feeling is what I may describe as a sense of profound discouragement. I have not been here that long, only about four years, but year after year, Budget after Budget, nothing ever seems to happen. In the last four or five years this country has experienced high interest rates, decreased productivity, high unemployment, and almost every economic ill over the last 30 or 40 years. Every time the Budget has come forth they have said it will clarify and solve our problems. However, Budget after Budget things just get worse.

By way of example, let me point to one item, the deficit. The annual deficit is predicted in this Budget to go to over $30 billion. That figure is so high I really do not understand it. Four years ago I fought an election and my campaign was based on a deficit the Liberal Government had left behind of some $10 billion. That figure was so high I am sure a lot of people did not understand it and could not appreciate how big it was. It is now three times that much.

We are told again this year the Government is going to reduce the Budget. We have been told that every year, and every year the Budget goes up. When we criticize the size of the Budget, the Government says the United States has a predicted deficit of $180 billion this year. Our population is only one-tenth of theirs. In relative terms that would mean if they had a deficit in their Budget the size of ours, their deficit would be close to $300 billion. Therefore you can see how badly off we are in this country.

Canadians are now realizing more and more that no government, business or family can continue year after year to spend annually more than it takes in. At the moment the Government has to borrow a third more—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. May we have order in the House please?

Mr. Dantzer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. How long can this Government survive? Another area which this document fails to discuss satisfactorily is unemployment. It has been said before and will be said again that in most areas this Budget does nothing. It is discouraging, Mr. Speaker. I am discouraged and I am sure the Canadian public is discouraged. At the moment over 11 per cent of the Canadian labour force is unemployed. In my province of British Columbia that figure rises to over 13 per cent. In my constituency of Okanagan North the rate is almost 18 per cent, and those are only the ones who register. Employment officers there tell me the figure is probably far higher than that and from my travels around my constituency I believe them to be correct.

Another serious aspect of this problem is that many of those unemployed are young people aged 16 to 24. That is the really serious problem. It is very hard and discouraging for a young person, who may just have gotten married, to get out of university and find that he cannot find a job for the first, second, third and fourth month, and still cannot find a job after a year. How long is that very fragile marriage going to last? That is the type of thing we are seeing across the country. A whole generation is going to be lost unless we find jobs for our young people.

Nowhere in this Budget is anything but gloom and doom indicated. The Budget indicates that over the next four years this horrendous figure is expected to remain pretty stable and unemployment will not decrease very much, even though the Budget takes a very optimistic view of the economic conditions which the country will face over the next few years. That optimistic view is not supported by many experts. We are dancing on a very thin line here, Mr. Speaker. I hope that the Minister's predictions in this filed are correct and that the economy does continue to grow and expand.

In January of 1980 the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was seeking election. He said in Toronto: "We have an economic program for the eighties which will enhance dignity, create opportunity and provide security". After listening to four years of the Government's dismal programs I say those are some programs, some opportunities and some security. We have deficits rising, unemployment rising, and indeed in this last month we have inflation rising. Nothing in the Budget does anything to solve any of these very severe problems.

I could continue to speak about deficits, unemployment, interest rates, lack of consumer demand or the poor productivity in our country which was not addressed in this Budget. These are all essential issues which have been addressed before in this debate and will be addressed again. It is apparent that the Budget has failed to answer any of these difficult problems in the country. However, I wish to spend some of my time tonight talking about some social issues this Budget attempts to address.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) yesterday spoke of pensions. During her address she said she looked upon pensions as the next important issue which we in Canada will have to discuss, address and solve in the area of social affairs. Mr. Speaker, I hope she means by that the next big social issue is the one after the unemployment issue. I believe she made a Freudian slip and really reflected that the Government thinks unemployment is not very important. Certainly the Budget would indicate that. It only allocated an additional $150 million to solve the problem of unemployment. I think that in her statement she reflected the importance which the Government puts on unemployment.

I will be the first to admit, since I have been deeply involved in the study of pensions over the last four years, that pensions are a very important problem. I would like to remind that Minister and the Government that unemployment is the first key social issue we have to solve. There will be no money for pensions or any social services if we cannot solve the unemployment problem. You cannot split up a pie if there is no pie to split up. The Minister and the Government should recognize that and then go on to the pension issue.

In the Budget the Government did make one small, tentative step toward solving the pension issue which they have debated at length for the last four, five, six or seven years. I would like to be positive. I would like to give the devil his due. These are good steps. They are the beginning of what I hope will be a continuation of policies which will increase and strengthen our pension program.

In 1981 we had the first Canadian pension conference. About 18 months ago we had the green paper. About a year ago a task force on pensions was set up which reported to Parliament just before Christmas. As a result of that I am glad to see the Government has acted in certain specific, limited areas. Under employer-sponsored plans under federal jurisdiction they propose several things which I think are very good and I commend them for it. The Government has indicated it will look seriously at amending that particular federal Pension Benefits Standards Act to make sure pensions under that jurisdiction will have some inflation protection. They have proposed 60 per cent of the increase in the CPI to a maximum of 8 per cent. The task force also proposed inflation protection. They proposed that inflation protection should be the CPI minus 2.5 per cent.

I would like to call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being six o'clock p.m. this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at eleven o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 6 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Wednesday, February 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the Government; and the amendment of Mr. Crosbie (p. 1445).

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to continue my remarks on the Budget which I began yesterday. Yesterday I said the Budget really does not offer any solution to the economic distress we find ourselves in today. After many years of Liberal government we find ourselves in a quagmire of economic uncertainty. If Members opposite do not know what a quagmire is, Concise Oxford defines it as a "quaking bog". We are in a quaking bog of economic despair at the moment. The unemployed in Canada are quaking with fear. The businessmen in Canada are quaking with uncertainty and this Budget has done nothing to solve any of the problems which we find ourselves facing.

I also said yesterday that the Budget has one bright light in it. I am prepared to give the devil his due. This Budget does indicate the first faint steps toward the Government providing a rational pension policy. Hon. Members will recall that the task force on pensions reported to the House last December. Perhaps I am prejudiced because I was on that task force, but I believe it provided a very comprehensive report, an outline of steps which could be taken in the country to provide one of the best pension systems in the world. I am pleased to see that the Government has taken some steps in that direction. First, under the employer-sponsored plans under federal jurisdiction, it proposes to open up the federal pension Benefits Standards Act in order to provide some of the measures we suggested in the task force report.

With respect to inflation protection, it was quite evident in our travels throughout Canada that this was one of the main concerns about most private pensions. The system is inconsistent since some have inflation protection and some do not. We believed there was a great need for this measure because the high inflation which existed in the early 1980s caused some people to end up with pensions that meant absolutely nothing, although they had contributed to them all their lives. Since they had made no other plans they were in very difficult circumstances.

The Government's proposal is to provide the plans under federal jurisdiction with some 60 per cent of any increase in the Consumer Price Index. That is not quite as good as the task force proposed since we proposed full indexing less 2.5 per cent. I suggest it will be shown when inflation reaches approximately 8 per cent that the task force scheme was the better one. However, little is better than nothing and I commend the Government for that.

It also proposes to bring in vesting after two years. Vesting means that a person who owns his pension can carry it with him. This is of particular benefit to women who change jobs frequently and often in their early years. It is important that vesting begin as soon as possible. I commend the Government for taking this step because it took a certain amount of courage. I know from our experience that industry is not yet prepared to accept the two-year vesting period. They would propose five years or a combination of the two.

The Government has also acted on a proposal which was in the green paper; that is, to establish registered pension accounts which will make portability a possibility and not just a dream for many people. It is very important to have portability in this country because people move a great deal. Under this scheme as well the employer can contribute to the employee's pension. With two-year portability, I think that will be very beneficial indeed.

The Government also proposes certain measures that will be of benefit to women. Let me mention them briefly. One is the continuation of survivor benefits on remarriage. This is a most logical step. There is no reason why a woman who is the recipient of a survivor pension should have it taken away from her when she remarries. This should apply to men as well. I am glad that this rational concept has finally been adopted by the Government and I hope it will be implemented. I can assure the Government that at least I will not oppose any legislation in that regard.

The splitting of pension credits upon the breakdown of marriage is a concept which I believe has been generally accepted throughout the country. That will also be put into the Act when it is opened up.

I think it is most interesting to note that the insurance industry is having a hard time accepting the notion of equal annuities without regard to sex; in other words, the acceptance of unisex mortality tables. I suspect that our Bill of Rights makes this a necessity but it will be interesting to see how that is worked out.

There is more talk of greater disclosure for pensioners and more representation on pension boards. All of these are very good concepts.

However, as is usual with the Government, it does not fully implement its programs. It brings in these programs gradually and does not expect them to be fully implemented until 1987. There is no need for that delay. Those concepts are well established and understood. Certainly I would like to see them come in more quickly.

I see that my time is getting short. I would merely conclude by saying that I believe, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, that I was discouraged by the Budget and I believe the people of Canada are discouraged.

This is 1984, the year George Orwell predicted a catastrophe. I would like to remind this House that for the first time in our history we are spending over $100 billion this year; at least, we will be when the Estimates are in. That is $100 billion worth of spending as though we are a bunch of mad, drunken sailors. Government borrowing this year will be $29.2 billion. The total personal savings of Canadians is only $32 billion, which means that the Government will have to demand from Canadians $92 billion. Where is the money that will provide the investment, the engine, to carry this country on to economic activity and success? It surely cannot be from personal savings because the Government will have to take all of that to service its debt and to cover its overspending of past years.

I tell you, Mr. Speaker, any country where governments, including provincial and municipal governments, take $10,306 in taxes from an income of $22,000 is a country that is really in deep trouble. The people of Canada are very, very discouraged with this Government, and this Budget does not do a thing to relieve them of that discouragement.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, it is seldom that we have an opportunity during the Budget debate to get information from the Government on pensions. As the Hon. Member for Okanagan North (Mr. Dantzer) has done a great deal of study on this subject, I would like to put a question to him.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order, please. I think it is clearly understood that questions and comments should be on the speech of the Hon. Member who has just concluded his remarks. I think there is a manner in which the Hon. Member can work his question into that context.

Mr. McKinnon: That is precisely what I was doing, with respect, Mr. Speaker. The Hon. Member was speaking about pensions. Has the Hon. Member been able to determine whether these reforms would permit the continuation of benefits on remarriage? I notice that in the Budget Speech the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) said, under the heading of "Improving Pensions for Canadians", that "these benefits will not end if an individual remarries". But he was speaking of the things he hoped to get into private pension plans. Later on in his speech, under the same heading concerning the Canada Pension Plan, he spoke of the continuation of survivor benefits on remarriage.

Has the Hon. Member been able to find out what the Government intends to do about the existing pensions, such as the civil service and armed forces pensions? Will that be coming about in 1987 or when the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) gives her long-awaited speech under the Canada Pension Plan heading?

Mr. Dantzer: Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the Government's Budget proposes to deal first with those things under its legislative jurisdiction, the Pension Benefits Standards Act. The Government also proposes to talk to the provinces on the Canada Pension Plan to bring in some of the reforms as proposed under the Canada Pension Benefits Standards Act. So far I have not been able to ascertain whether that will apply to civil service pensions, to the military or to the RCMP. I would be very shocked, as I am sure everybody will be on this side of the House, if when the Government brings in that proposed legislation the Government does not also include those particular Bills which cover the civil service, policemen and members of the armed forces. I see the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mrs. Erola) nodding her head as if she is saying yes. I hope that is correct. If it is not, I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, we might have some delay on this side of the House.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for my colleague, the Hon. Member for Okanagan North (Mr. Dantzer). It concerns one of the more serious problems in Canada regarding pensions. It has to do with delays in processing veterans' pensions.

Recently in Ontario a veteran obtained 5,000 names on a petition to be presented to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Campbell) complaining about pension delays. Would the Hon. Member support a Bill to limit the time that the Pension Commission and the Department can take to process the pensions of veterans? I have suggested before that a maximum period of six months should be allowed in which to deal with the three stages. If the Department cannot process a veteran's pension within six months, he should automatically obtain the pension he requested. Has the Hon. Member studied that proposal or given any thought to it?

Mr. Dantzer: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to say that the terms of reference of the task force on pensions did not cover that particular aspect. However, my desk, as well as the Hon. Member's desk, is full of examples of veterans dying before their assessment has been made. The number of veterans is decreasing every year. Obviously the Department is well staffed. One one seems to understand why there is such difficulty in assessing what should be fairly clear according to the norms laid down in terms of whether people are entitled to pensions. I support that kind of suggestion. It could prove to be a solution.

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in the Budget debate, confident that the provisions before us will ensure that more Canadians enjoy a brighter and more secure future. I would like to pay tribute to the Hon. Member for Okanagan North (Mr. Dantzer) for the work he did as a member of the pension committee and the fact that he endorsed many of the measures the Government brought forward in the Budget. That committee sat for the better part of a year and worked diligently to come forward with recommendations, many of which the Government has adopted.

This morning I will address more specifically Canadian women by focusing on those aspects of the Budget of greatest benefit to women. I speak, of course, of the proposed reforms to the retirement income system. It has been said time and time again, and will be said for a long time, that whether a Canadian woman works in the labour force full-time or part-time, whether she stays out of the labour force to raise a family full-time or temporarily, or whether she has never held a job in the labour force, chances are that she can expect to be poor in her later years. She can expect to be poor in what should be the golden years of her life.

As Minister responsible for the status of women, I have consistently refused to accept that this situation must be the standard lot in life for women in the country, women who have made every bit as much a contribution as their male counterparts. A few months ago I appeared before the parliamentary task force on pension reform, at which time I outlined the plight of retired Canadian women. It was clear to me then, as it is clear to me now, that pension reform must take into account the needs of women, just as past legislation has taken into account the needs of men.

Most Canadian women who today are over 65 years of age and single were homemakers for all or part of their adult lives. Others who had never married or were widowed early have been members of the labour force. These women share a lamentable fate in their twilight years. As elderly single women they fare worse under the current pension system than any other group in Canadian society. We on the Government side recognize the problem facing single elderly women. We recognize that 68 out of 100 will end their lives alone. I am confident that the pension reform measures announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) will go a long way toward improving the lives of these women.

Any discussion of reform of the retirement system can only begin with the guaranteed income supplement, the GIS. Good as all the other measures are—and I will go into them—the GIS clearly represents the most single important reform affecting women in both the short term and the long term. Let me explain why. The GIS measures are immediate whereas other pension reforms, even if they are legislated tomorrow, and I agree they cannot come too soon, would take many years to have a full impact on retirement income.

Second, no matter what type of pension reform is implemented, women's pensions will continue to be lower than those of men for the foreseeable future. This unfortunate situation results from the simple fact that, outside of federal jurisdiction, women do not have equal pay for work of equal value legislation. Because the wages women earn tend to be lower than wages earned by men, and because pensions are based on earnings, those pensions will continue to be lower.

Allow me to repeat that the legislation soon to be introduced to reform the GIS will respond immediately to the needs of Canada's least privileged senior citizens. In fact, the increases will benefit about 750,000 pensioners, a full three-quarters of whom, something like 553,000, are women.

Parliament will soon to be asked to raise the GIS rate for single pensioners and one-pensioner couples by $50 a month. This represents an increase of more than 20 per cent, an increase which will be made in two stages: $25 beginning July 1 of this year and a further $25 beginning December 1. When coupled with the universal old age pension, these measures will ensure that no single senior citizen receives less than $600 a month, or $7,200 a year. Indeed, the increases will raise the guaranteed income for elderly single Canadians, mostly women, to more than 60 per cent of the amount paid to couples.

I should point out that this reform of the GIS is based on recommendations made by virtually all women's groups and has also been supported by business and labour organizations. In addition, some 3,000 pensioners receiving partial old age pensions, most of whom are immigrant Canadians, will be assisted in the coming year by increased GIS benefits designed to raise their minimum income to the level of other pensioners.

I think it would be useful at this time to provide Hon. Members with some concrete examples of how increases to the GIS will improve the lives of typical women pensioners. Let us take a couple of test cases.

In the first case, consider a woman who is the survivor of a one-earner couple, who has been a homemaker all her life and whose husband earned the average wage. On December 1 this year when the full increase in the GIS is in effect, she will have an estimated total income of $716 per month, compared to $646 now. The increased income would be made up of $274 in OAS, $232 in CPP survivor's benefit and $212 in GIS. A single woman who had earned a typical female wage all her life would also now receive $716. How? This increase would be made up of her Old Age Security of $274, a CPP employment benefit of $232 because she had been in the work force, and what is really important is that despite the fact that this woman had been in the work force all her life earning an average wage, she would still require the GIS of $210. That is why this pension reform is so important. It means a guarantee to all women in the country, whether they have been in the work force part-time or full-time or whether they have been homemakers all their lives.

Other women now in their late seventies or older who had neither a CPP employment benefit nor a CPP survivor's benefit would receive an income of approximately $600 per month, up from $534 per month.

I would like to turn now to the second most important area of pension reform for women, second only, that is, to the proposed increases to the GIS. The GIS is absolutely the cornerstone. I cannot stress enough how pleased I am that the Government is now going ahead with proposals which were put forward by myself, as well as many women's groups, regarding pension credit splitting. Of course, I am speaking about the splitting of pension entitlements between spouses for pension plans both—and I want to stress the word "both"—in the private and public sector.

The sharing of pension entitlements is essential to be equitable, to reflect the different contributions of each spouse to a marriage, and to reflect the reduced consumption of both partners in a marriage to save for retirement. These benefits must be available equally on retirement, on separation or on divorce.

In so far as proposed amendments to the Canada Pension Plan are concerned, automatic fifty-fifty splitting of pension credits when the younger spouse reaches age 65 has my full support. Similarly, I am sure that the provision for fifty-fifty splitting of CPP credits upon marriage breakdown, unless waived by both parties in writing, will be widely supported by women throughout the country. In fact, virtually all women's groups recommended such pension splitting as did, I am happy to report, a majority of business and labour interests. These improvements await only the concurrence of the provinces, which I am sure, with the widespread support which exists for these measures, will be forthcoming shortly. I believe one Hon. Member just a few moments ago asked when this would happen. It can happen as early as 1985 with the concurrence of the provinces, and I expect that concurrence to take place.

Under private plans, credit splitting on marriage breakdown will provide for a more equitable distribution of accumulated retirement savings. I do believe that credit splitting is without question the best method we have today to recognize the contribution women make to the economic partnership of marriage. In conjunction with survivor benefits, credit splitting will ensure that both wife and husband will benefit from their savings for retirement. What is more, the work which married women do will be recognized, whether they work in the paid labour force or not.

I have just alluded to the important matter of survivor benefits. Permit me to take a moment to look more closely at these benefits as they also will ensure greater security for elderly women. The fact that women tend to outlive men means that survivor benefit reforms are of paramount importance to women. While the Canada Pension Plan currently provides survivor benefits, proposed CPP amendments take it greatly forward by calling for continuation of these benefits upon remarriage. I could not agree more with the Hon. Member for Okanagan North. It was absolutely ridiculous that these benefits would disappear upon remarriage.

Proposed amendments to private pension plans under federal jurisdiction will also assist women by requiring, for the first time, that such plans provide survivor benefits, and ensuring that these benefits will not end if that spouse remarries. Women who survive their husbands—and let us face it, most of us will—will have far greater security in their old age knowing that their pensions will not disappear when their husbands die. I cannot tell you how heartbreaking it is to find a woman in my constituency office who has discovered that when her husband died, contrary to the popular myth, he did take it with him; this situation, under federal jurisdiction, can no longer continue.

As for private pensions under federal jurisdiction, the proposed changes will ensure that employees acquire rights to their pension benefits after two years' service instead of ten; that these benefits will be protected from inflation; that these benefits will be equal for men and women retiring under identical circumstances; and that employees will be allowed to take their pensions with them as they move from job to job. These measures are of particular importance to women who, for a variety of reasons, change jobs more frequently than men.

Proposed legislation will also increase pension coverage for part-time workers. Regular part-time employees who have worked for three years will be required to join their employer's pension plan at age 25, provided they work at least 50 per cent of the normal work period. Part-time employees who now meet these requirements will also be given the opportunity to join the plan.

Why is this so important for women, Mr. Speaker? Of course, it is obvious. Currently, 72 per cent of part-time workers are women, most of whom are combining work with family responsibilities. They rarely have the opportunity to contribute to their employer's pension plan. The provision to increase pension coverage for part-time workers will greatly increase the number of women covered, as well as increase their future pension benefits.

I would like to turn for a moment to the matter of homemakers' pensions. Let me begin by clearing up once and for all the confusion surrounding this issue. Homemakers currently do have pensions under the Canada Pension Plan in the form of survivors' benefits. However, the situation is not the same under private plans where few homemakers receive survivor pensions from their husband's employer, as I mentioned earlier. Under the proposals announced in the Budget, homemakers' pensions will be improved by the combination of credit splitting and survivor benefits in both the Canada Pension Plan and private plans under federal jurisdiction. In essence, homemakers will be guaranteed a pension in their own right under the CPP, as well as a survivor pension from the plan of the husband's employer.

The Government will begin discussions with the provinces to consider a number of other significant changes to the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans, including an increased homemakers' pension. A number of proposals put forward to the parliamentary task force on pension reform called for greater CPP benefits to all one-earner couples, that is, couples where one spouse works in the labour force and one does not. These, of course, will be discussed with the provinces. However, let us be very clear; the significant issue surrounding the debate on homemakers' pensions is that retirement income must be adequate in relation to pre-retirement income and it must be provided fairly among individuals and between partners in both one and two-earner families.

Last but by no means least, Mr. Speaker, let me touch on the proposed tax-assisted registered pension account, another vehicle for improved retirement savings, the RPA. By providing a more flexible way of saving for retirement years, the RPA will allow women to retain their pension benefits when moving from job to job. It is absolutely essential that women have this flexibility. The fact that employers will be able to contribute to an employer's RPA will be of significant benefit to the many women who work for small businesses. And that is another majority: more women work for small businesses.

I regard the RPA as a key link to improving the overall retirement income system for women. It can be used to accumulate retirement income by couples during periods when one spouse is not in the labour force. The revised limits on contributions will provide much greater scope for contributions th "spousal" plans as well. The provisions to base contributions on career earnings will also enable women to contribute more to tax-assisted pension arrangements in later years after their children have grown up. Often women or their husbands are unable to contribute to RRSPs in their children's early years because the money is needed for other vital expenses. With the proposed new system, they will be able to retain previously unused deductions and use them at any time right up to age 65. So there is time for them to catch up when they have the income to do so.

Women particularly will benefit from this change because of its greater flexibility over their lifetimes, both to make their own contributions and for their spouses to make contributions on their behalf. The locking-in provision under which contributions cannot be withdrawn until retirement will ensure that women benefit in retirement from contributions to employer-sponsored plans during their early years in the labour force. All too often, those few women who have been in private pension plans have withdrawn that money, again for all of those important reasons; they needed it to bolster the family income. It is important that they have a pension system into which those funds are locked, to guarantee that they have funds coming forward in retirement years.

I should like to remind the House that women own 30 per cent of unincorporated businesses in this country. That may come as a bit of a shock to many people. It is these women, these self-employed, the sole proprietors, who were at a disadvantage under the former limits on the contribution to RRSPs. A great many women, I might add, are employed by small and medium-sized businesses. With the introduction of gain-sharing plans they will now have the opportunity to participate through their own efforts. I know, too, that these women who own small corporations, both the small unincorporated businesses and incorporated businesses, do the buying, the selling and the bookkeeping. I can assure these women that the changes in the Budget in the area of small business will be of great assistance to them. I am very pleased that we were able to meet their needs and reduce the complexity of corporate taxation for small business.

Let me conclude by stating that we all know that women work hard all their lives. We raise children, we manage households, whether we are in the labour force or not. We contribute to the ability of our husbands to earn higher wages. Many of us are single parents struggling to be mother, father, homemaker and wage earner. When we take home these responsibilities our opportunity to earn a living is reduced.

The difficult issue of women in pension reform is how to recognize this work load within a retirement income system which is largely earnings-related. I believe that the pension reforms announced in the Budget and which I have addressed today go a long way toward overcoming the problems and past inequities in this country's retirement system. Equally important, the proposed reforms can, with the approval of Parliament, be implemented quickly assuming co-operation from all Members of the House. Many of these measures, and I am referring specifically to those affecting the guaranteed income supplement and the splitting of pensions credits, could be in place in a matter of months. I urge Hon. Members to see that it is done.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I should like to say to the Minister that I did not know she was going to speak next when I directed some questions to the Hon. Member for Okanagan North a few minutes ago.

The peculiar thing about the Budget is that with all the changes it is making, most of which I heartily approve in the way of treatment of pensioners, the Government did not seize the opportunity to put in these reforms immediately to pensions that it directly controls. I refer to civil service pensions, armed forces pensions, the pensions of judges and MPs, et cetera.

Mrs. Erola: Mr. Speaker, I think it goes without saying that these will automatically fall under the same jurisdiction and the benefits will flow to these people as well. It would indeed be a curious position if those people were not included in these reforms.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I should like to question the date of their implementation. I have another question. The war veterans' allowance is tied to the sum of the Old Age Security and the guaranteed income supplement. In the case of a married couple it has been $22.02 per month in addition, which is referred to as the WVA top-up. Incidentally, the Minister might wish to put it out on her network to the number of women who are living in poverty, aged 65 and over, that any who are veterans could apply for the war veterans' allowance if they served overseas. In the case of a married couple at the present time, $922.30 is sent to them instead of $900.28, which gives them an increase of $22.02 if they are on war veterans' allowance. The increase in the GIS will leap over that $22 on July 1.

Can the Minister assure us that the war veterans' allowance is going to be increased by at least that amount and preferably by enough to keep them ahead of the sum of the OAS and the GIS?

Could she tell us also when the reforms about the continuing payments on remarriage are going to apply to those people directly controlled by the Government, the civil service, armed forces and MPs.

Mrs. Erola: Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I am in no position to give detailed answers on all of these matters, particularly on war veterans' allowance, but I will look into that and try to provide the Hon. Member with the details of the timing.

In the areas of pensions and credit splitting, as I said earlier, we hope that with the concurrence of the provinces, which could come as early as 1985, we can move forward on pension splitting and survivors' benefits. I will look into the matter and provide the Hon. Member with details of the dates they will be brought into effect.

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, the few things that are being done for older women are very few and seem to be geared mostly toward middle-class women. Does the Minister feel that the Budget is adequate for women who are not yet senior citizens? There was nothing in it about job creation for women at the very time they are being phased out and displaced by high technology. There is no affirmative action at all. For instance, the youth projects that are proposed, minimum though they are, and the previous job-creation program, NEED, the Special Recovery Projects and probably the Liberal slush fund projects as well, were predominantly for areas that provide jobs for men, not for women. Women have not had equal access to the inadequate job-creation programs.

The Budget is also very unfair to women in the Public Service who are notoriously underpaid. The Minister talked about equal pay for equal value and the need for legislation in this area. I should like to know what she is doing about that.

Compensation comparisons with the private sector will mean that women in the Public Service, when the six and five program is removed, will still be capped. Their wage differential is something like $7,000 less than men. There are no training programs targeted especially for women's needs. If the Minister is going to talk about the existing training programs, she had better talk to some women because they do not have equal access to those. They do not have daycare and other supports that are needed to get into them.

I should like to ask the Minister why she did not talk about jobs for women. In my opinion there is nothing in the Budget about job creation for women.

Mrs. Erola: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has just made a hodge-podge of statements that bear no relevance to the subject matter I was discussing. I suggest to her that she is totally ignorant of government programs if she is saying that affirmative action does not exist in government. I do not know where the Hon. Member has been because affirmative action programs are in place in the federal civil service. I suggest to her that equal pay for work of equal value legislation is in place at the federal level. If she were to take her duties seriously, she would be working with women of this country to see that that kind of legislation were in effect throughout the country.

With regard to job creation, if the Hon. Member looked at our NEED projects—and I would be happy to provide her with some statistics that I do not have on hand at the moment—she would see that in Section 38 we tried very hard to see that women get their share.

If she looks at the youth training programs she will see that the record is very high. The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Roberts) is with us this morning and I think he will confirm that youth job-creation projects have a very high rate of paticipation of females. This is especially good and I am particularly pleased about it.

Of course, it is not good enough. I agree with the Hon. Member that work must be done and we must continue to push to see that women get their fair share. But to suggest that the problem has not been addressed by the Government is utter nonsense.

In this Budget we are addressing the needs of the poorest women in the country. The GIS is the cornerstone. It is absolutely necessary that they get $50 increase. I am surprised that the Hon. Member would criticize a measure that does so much to improve the position of the poorest women in our society.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister is also in connection with the GIS. I appreciate the fact that people are going to receive $50 more because it is a lot of money to some. They will be able to do a lot of things they could not do before—perhaps even buy enough to eat when otherwise they could not.

One aspect of this bothers me somewhat. Some women and men who have worked in industry have received injuries—sometimes they lose a finger, a foot, or an eye—and receive what is known in compensation terms as PPD or permanent partial disability. This can amount to $2 or $3, or quite a sum of money up to $200 or more, say, if the back is broken or both eyes were lost. This bothers me. For many years the PPD was considered as compensation for the loss of part of their body in an industrial accident. They left part of their body there so they get a PPD. Now it will be considered in the total sum of money, which means some of these people will get less GIS than they are getting now. The $50 will bring them over the total and this may bring some very sad results.

I wonder if the Minister would look at this problem with the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) to see if the total can be raised, at least for the men and women who have lost part of their bodies in industrial accidents.

Mrs. Erola: Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the problem and I have already initiated discussions with the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and indeed with the Minister of Finance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Debate.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, the opportunity to question the Minister on an extremely important point such as this does not often come up in the House. I wonder whether or not the House might give unanimous consent to extend the question period slightly?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Extension of the question period would require unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I know the concern of the Member in wanting to ask his questions and express his views. Unfortunately I cannot agree because of the number of people on our side who need to speak as well.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, this Budget has been described as a non-Budget. Lyman MacInnis in The Winnipeg Free Press is quoted as saying:

> Most of what we are talking about is in the "if" category. It is a budget that hurts absolutely no one because most of it becomes effective in 1985 when this Government may no longer be in power.

Mr. Speaker, I sometimes wonder why we had a Budget on February 15 if all we were going to get was what the Minister supplied. I suppose the only real reason he spoke is that he wanted to have an hour on television all to himself. He wanted to make sure the news media were able to say some things about him. Sir, the news media and commentators have been saying a number of things about the Minister and we want to discuss those here today.

First of all, there were some "if" things that were worthwhile, I suppose. It is good to have a discussion on profit-sharing and an insurance scheme on mortgage interest. It was good to have a discussion on pensions and changing RRSPs, and so on. But there was really no legislation or concrete proposals. On the question of income tax there were some interesting suggestions with respect to small business taxation and simplification, but even that does not go far enough. These proposals are not something you can grab hold of and say, yes, we have to do that immediately; they all have to be studied. For example, the small business proposal leaves the 12.5 per cent dividend tax in place, which discourages equity investment. Why would you invest in equities if your dividend is going to be taxed? The fact is that this particular provision has to be changed.

The Minister has asked for information by April 15, and surely he will receive those kinds of directions and the matter will have to come before a special committee of this House so we can go over the proposals on tax simplification. There is a great deal that has to be done here. At least we have some effort by the Government to consider tax simplification, but this particular proposal does not go far enough.

Getting into the real guts of the problem with this Budget, Mr. Speaker, the fact is we have a deficit which is literally mind boggling. Experts in The Globe and Mail are quoted today as saying the Budget is likely to bring on a new recession because we cannot go on forever spending $1, taxing 70 cents and borrowing the other 30 cents. What happens is that the Government goes to each Department and asks what they would like to spend. There is no real effort to cut down or economize and cut back. In many cases the Departments just add 3 per cent, 5 per cent, 8 per cent or whatever they think they can get away with and seems reasonable. What does the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Gray) do? He grabs it, puts it all together and wraps it in blue and calls it the Estimates.

These Estimates are well prepared, Mr. Speaker, but spending is 10.4 per cent higher going in than we had at this time last year. When has the Government ever stayed in line with its spending estimates?

When you analyse this Budget you find it deliberately underestimates expenses in certain fields. For example, the central reserve is deliberately cut back by $300 million to show a lesser deficit than it should be. The lapse account is deliberately overestimated. That again minimizes the proposed deficit. On top of all that, we look at the fiscal arrangements transfer envelope and we find it is almost static. Why? Because that envelope depends on economic conditions. So we are able in those three items, together with a misstatement of revenue, to underestimate the proposed Budget deficit for 1984-85 by at least $4 billion and probably much more.

This Minister has presented these figures on the basis that growth will be 5 per cent, and no economic group in Canada, indeed in the world, will say the Canadian economy is going to grow at 5 per cent. The best I saw was Wood Gundy saying 4.5 per cent, but the highly respected Conference Board says 3.3 per cent. The Minister has put on his rose-coloured glasses and said that as far as his reserves are concerned it is a best case scenario. As far as the lapse is concerned, he can lapse more money than is normal. As far as transfers to the provinces are concerned, they will be less than normal. As far as revenue is concerned, it will be significantly higher than forecast by anyone else. It is a best case scenario but it is not realistic and we are looking at disaster down the road if this Government carries on this way.

A great deal has been said about cyclical and structural deficits. The problem here is really structural. Even if we had the best times possible there is no way that revenues would pay the expenses of the Government. Indeed, even if everyone was working and every factory and plant was going at 100 per cent capacity, this Government would come in with a deficit, under present spending arrangements, of at least $18 million.

This Budget is not acceptable because it is not a Budget which the country can live with. Until perhaps November we may be able to borrow the funds required to finance the deficit. When will the tap be turned off? Already brokerage houses are talking about being unable to place the Government debt. At two o'clock today bids for Treasury bills will be opened. I am told that the Government is already interfering in the market-place to keep interest down on the 90-day bill. Last week, on the 180-day bill, the rate was 10.1 per cent. Comparing American and Eurodollar rates today I suspect that on the average on 180 and 365-day bills the Government will have to pay a rate in excess of 10.25 per cent. That situation is only the beginning.

I would like to indicate some of the things I believe should be done. I would like to refer the House to an article by Jeffrey Simpson in this morning's The Globe and Mail. Jeffrey Simpson challenges the Parties in the House not to talk just about porkbarreling by the Government but to get down to the issues I suppose $300 million is only nickels and dimes to a Globe and Mail reporter. I did not know that The Globe and Mail paid people like Simpson that much. That is the kind of waste that we must point out. This is the use of public money to ensure the re-election of the Liberal Party rather than to ensure jobs for Canadians and progress for Canada. Reference was made to affirmative action programs. That is a $300 million affirmative action program for the re-election of a Liberal Government. That is all it is.

Ms. Mitchell: Right. For once a Tory has some sense.

Mr. Blenkarn: I would now like to discuss where we are going and some of the things that may be seriously looked at. Before I do that, I would like to refer the House to some of the things we have said in the past. The Auditor General and Comptroller General have also said this. As a country we have to priorize our national expenses. We have to determine what is absolutely necessary and what is only desirable, in order to determine what we can eliminate or reduce significantly.

The same type of presentation was made by Rowland Frazee in his address to the annual meeting of the Royal Bank. Mr. Frazee said:

> Finally, we know that at present the Canadian deficit is worse than the U.S. version, in relative terms. I repeat: government in both countries should take new initiatives to reduce their structural deficits.
> How? Well, in the United States, a presidentially-appointed task force has spent the last three years identifying possible efficiencies and program improvements. Some are politically controversial—but they add up to something like 60 billion dollars a year. The task force was staffed, directed and run by private sector businessmen, working as volunteers.

He challenges the political parties in the country to do that type of thing. That is the kind of thing a new government formed by the Progressive Conservative Party will be doing. We will be depending on the private sector and the business community to tell us where we can cut back on the waste, sloth and overexpenditure of government and government programs. We have heard a great deal from them.

Looking at the economic development envelope we see there are a number of grant programs. No study has been made on these grant programs with regard to their effectiveness, to see whether they are really creating the jobs we want in the country and the industrial development we should have. A number of those programs could be eliminated or seriously cut back, combined, and in many cases dropped. There is no evidence that programs designed to ameliorate regional disparity in the country by making grants to companies in a depressed part of the country has improved the regional disparity situation, or in the long run created jobs and improved the productivity of the country.

In the field of transport we see it all the time. I did not intend to mention VIA Rail at this point, but we must seriously consider where we are going in transportation. Can we really afford all of the things we might want? For example, can we afford to have Mirabel airport? Maybe Mr. Simpson thinks that is nickels and dimes, but it is $50 million a year, nearly $1 million a week.

Let us study the energy envelope. Our friends from the New Democratic Party have properly criticized the PIP grant system. In many ways that system of directing drilling is best categorized as the dry hole fund. We are spending $1.6 billion on that kind of work. Perhaps the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Chrétien) could explain why we are spending money on a dry hole fund and why the funds are not used for finding reserves instead of subsidizing work in the frontier.

Let us go on to the other programs in the Minister's Department. He is here now and perhaps we can get the Minister of Energy up on his feet in a moment or two. Maybe he can explain why the Government of Canada should be buying people insulation and new furnaces for their homes. Is this an expense which the Government of Canada should pledge the credit of Canada for? Is this the kind of thing we should spend money on?

I would like to speak about Crown corporations at this point. Looking at the Budget we see that transfers to Crown corporations this year is up by 22 per cent, from $3.7 billion to $4.6 billion. That is an enormous transfer to what are supposed to be business corporations, which are supposed to be self-supporting and in most cases are supposed to pay income tax. The Minister of Energy is responsible for the company which advertises on TV saying it is ours. It is so much ours that it is going to cost us $460 million more this year, plus another $60 million on top of that, in order for "ours" to find oil for "ours" off the coast of Jamaica or China. It is time to call a halt, Sir. We are the only country in the world which has a state oil company which we have to continue to feed. Everyone else gets dividends from their oil company; we get a bill.

In September of last year we had a debate with respect to the Export Development Corporation. In that debate Members on this side pointed out things which could be done in export development which would not cost taxpayers a nickel. The taxpayers are putting an additional $287 million into the Export Development Corporation. That Corporation needs amending—new supervision, new management and new direction.

Our postage rate is 32 cents compared to a 20-cent postage rate in the United States. We are paying the post office over $520 billion this year. That would be all right if we got our mail on time and people in new developments could have mail delivered to their homes. In many, many cases they cannot. The corporation is badly managed, badly run and badly organized. It misrepresents the delivery time of mail. To add insult to injury, it is now costing us $520 million more. That is just too much.

I hesitate to talk about entertainment, but this year the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation will receive $895.7 million. When one sees those figures, one begins to wonder why they have to do those things. I left the House of Commons at about ten o'clock the other night. The back of the East Block was lit up with television lights. Who supplied those television lights? It was the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

I came here the other day and saw that the CBC had its television lights all across the front of the building. When the Budget was presented the CBC had truck after truck, pieces and pieces of machinery in places to interview people. It was all organized. What a display of men, women and machinery all over the place! They had at least five times as much equipment as all of the other TV networks in this country put together. It has an $895.7 million subsidy. In addition, it receives $187 million in advertising revenue. However, I suppose that is nickels and dimes.

I could go on and talk about Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. We are unable to sell CANDU reactors. While there are some things we should be doing in atomic energy, surely we can cut down on the amount of money that is being put into that corporation.

I see that you are signalling that my time is up, Mr. Speaker. I could go on and on through this blue book to point out many places where we could make changes and cut-backs. This could be done without affecting social services, without affecting universal pensions or without affecting universal transfers. Right now the cost of government could be cut back by a minimum of $5 billion. The Government could work on it seriously and go through each Department to find where there was overlapping, duplication and waste. For example, every day I get a press clipping from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde). There is also one available from Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the Library of Parliament. There is too much duplication and waste on trivial nickel and dime items. It can be cut and the Government does not need to spend or borrow the kind od money that is involved in this Budget. The Budget should be defeated.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question because I have only answered questions for many years. Did I hear the Hon. Member correctly say that the Tory policy will be that they will only give grants to those who find oil and they will not help the companies that drill dry holes? Is that the policy of his Party, because I heard him say that a few minutes ago?

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the Hon. Minister gave me an opportunity to carry on with the whole energy matter.

Mr. Chrétien: Answer the question.

Mr. Blenkarn: The present program is a grant program that gives grants not on the basis of oil that is found but on the basis of ownership. Whoever heard of telling someone drilling for oil that they first must show their citizenship before determining what kind of grant they will be given, rather than on whether they are finding oil, whether it is the right place to drill for oil or whether oil is being produced. We could end up with corporations that are incorporated just so they could get grants. I challenge the Minister to have an audit of those grants and produce evidence to the House that those grants have really done something for this country in terms of future tax revenue.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has not replied to the question. There are grants for both the Canadian companies and the foreign companies. While they do not receive the same level of grants, they both receive grants.

Did I understand the Hon. Member to say that he will give grants to and only help those companies that find oil? How will he decide if companies that do not find oil should not receive a grant? I presume that if I were to find oil I would not need any grants. When you find oil you do not need any grants. You help the companies when they do not find oil. I would like the Hon. Member to reply to my question. Is he telling us that his Party's policy will be to give grants only to those companies that find oil and not to give grants to those companies that do not find oil? Yes or no.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I am not our energy critic. However, I will say to the Minister that he has already indicated that his policy is to give grants if companies do not find oil because they do not need a grant if they do find oil. The fact is that this is clearly his policy. It is a dry hole policy. It comes from a dry hole Minister.

The answer is that you do not give grants at all if you know the truth of the matter. The oil is put at the world price and the companies use their own money to explore and find oil. That is what they did all along. The write-off of exploration expenses is allowed in the normal course. You do not end up with a Government and his Department down at Dow's Lake determining whether there is oil here or no oil there, or what the regulations will or will not be.

Mr. Parent: Mr. Speaker, I know the Hon. Member is not the energy critic but he is the finance critic. Would he make the same grants available to foreign companies as he would to Canadian companies? I believe this was referred to in an off-hand way in his speech. Would he clarify that for me?

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I believe the grants program should be abolished and we should return to a tax allowance system that would require people to put up their own money, risk their own money and have the advantages of their own returns if they find their product.

Mr. Schellenberger: Mr. Speaker, I think the Hon. Member brought up a very interesting point with regard to the CBC. It concerns the amount of money it spends. It is very obvious to Members of Parliament that when we watch the newscasts of the public broadcasting corporation and the private companies that come to the House, there is very little difference in the quality. Yet the CBC comes here with semi-trailer trucks, vans and four or five cameras.

Mr. Chrétien: Explain about oil. You are from Alberta so explain it to him.

Mr. Schellenberger: Could the Hon. Member tell us if he has looked into the costs of the newscasts by this public corporation and whether he feels there is any savings there, given that there are many private corporations doing an excellent job in this area? I notice there is a lot of comment on the other side. I do not know if they are concerned about this.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I am not an expert on television. However, I did have a constituent in my riding, the late Lord Thomson of Fleet. Lord Thomson said that the right to own a licence to broadcast television was a licence to print money. This licence is costing we taxpayers, who own the licence, nearly $900 million a year. I say that there is something wrong if it is true that it is a licence to print money, because the way the CBC operates, it is a licence to go into our pocketbooks year after year. I wonder if we get our value.

Mr. Kristiansen: Mr. Speaker, the comments by the Conservative member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) intrigued me. I am sure I heard him say just a few moments ago that he is now advocating the Government do away with PIP grants and incentives to oil companies for drilling, no matter whether they drill a dry hole or find oil. My recollection is that about two years ago when the bell-ringing episode went on for two weeks it was largely so that the Hon. Member's Party could divide the legislation and vote in favour of those grants that he is now suggesting ought to be scrapped and those incentives he is now pretending to suggest ought to be scrapped. By splitting the Bill they could also vote against those sections that called for the creation of a Canadian energy company that in time, given decent management, would return some benefits to the people of Canada. At that time the Conservatives wanted to give money to the oil companies and disband Petro-Canada. That is why the Tories rang the bells for two weeks to split the Bill. What is their position now?

Some Hon. Members: Shame!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McDermid: We would do it again to preserve democracy.

Mr. Blenkarn: The Hon. Member for Kootenay West (Mr. Kristiansen) I am afraid has a very poor recollection—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order, please.

An Hon. Member: His time has run out.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order, please. The Chair is finding it extremely difficult to hear the Hon. Member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn). It must be extremely difficult for the Hansard reporter. I would ask the Members please to be quiet so that we might hear the Hon. Member.

Mr. Blenkarn: The Hon. Member for Kootenay West I am afraid did not quite understand what happened during the bell-ringing episode two years ago. He certainly did not understand the Bills that were before us. He does not, I am sure, recall which Bills were which. In any event, the essence of the bell-ringing matter was whether we should have omnibus legislation. This legislation, if the Hon. Member will recall, dealt with eight separate issues where you could not vote in favour or against the Bill as it was presented.

I am pleased to say, Sir, that as a result of that period the Government has changed, and I hope will continue to change, its attitude toward legislation it produces.

Mr. Kristiansen: It is getting more conservative all the time.

Mr. Blenkarn: Legislation has to be produced in a fashion that Members of Parliament are able to consider it issue by issue, then vote for an issue or vote against it.

Mr. Fisher: Next time we will give it to you in big print and pictures.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government; and the amendment of Mr. Crosbie (p. 1445).

Mr. Robert Bockstael (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to add my support to the motion proposed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde), namely that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the Government; and coincidentally to encourage the Members of this House to reject out of hand the negative and unconstructive amendment proposed by the Official Opposition.

Our Minister of Finance brought forth this Budget after extensive consultations with Canadians in all walks of life and in all regions of the country. Consultations were held with more than 30 major groups across Canada representing labour, women, social agencies, co-operatives, financial institutions, small and large business and many others. The information and advice received in these consultations made an important contribution to the Budget.

I suggest that these consultations were one of the factors that caused this Budget to gain such widespread approval right from the start, immediately after it was delivered. In my view, it was a well thought out Budget, appropriately designed to meet the challenges of 1984 while maintaining an equilibrium and balanced approach between restraining the deficit, holding down inflation, and still finding ways and means to stimulate the economy and create jobs.

This Budget is a follow through of the objectives set out in the April, 1983, Budget which built on the momentum generated by our very successful six and five program to move our country forward on the road to economic recovery. That is why the 1983 Budget has often been referred to as the recovery Budget.

This Liberal Government's six and five program of wage and price restraint caused the inflation rate to drop from 12 per cent in June, 1982 to 4.5 per cent in December, 1983, the lowest level in over ten years.

We on this side, and for that matter I am sure all Canadians, want our economic recovery to continue and to grow stronger. This 1984 Budget demonstrates the continuity we must strive for in maintaining the stability that is gained when we manage to keep our inflation rate down. This Budget demonstrates that our Government has a steady hand at the controls and that form of steadiness will generate strong confidence in our economy.

In its broad scope, the Budget addresses the needs of our youth as well as the quality of life of our elderly. I do not want to repeat what the Minister responsible for the status of women had to say about pensions, but retired seniors eligible to receive the guaranteed income supplement will receive a $50 increase in this calendar year in two instalments of $25 each. This increase is being paid to single people, the vast majority of whom are women. The Minister mentioned that some 560,000 women are eligible for the GIS.

I have been asked in my constituency why this increase does not apply to couples. After research had been completed, it was found that a person living alone needs more assistance than a couple sharing accommodation. These 1984 increases will mean a single pensioner eligible for the GIS will receive approximately 60 per cent of the amount allocated to a couple. For future retirees, this Budget provides accessibility to better pensions. Individuals, self-employed and small-business operators will be allowed to increase their tax deductible contributions to pension plans or registered retirement savings plans.

Seniors and some small-business operators will not have to pay income tax in quarterly instalments.

Another very important point, a measure long sought in the west, is the maintenance of the family farm when the original owner retires. Family farm rollovers will be facilitated and farmers will be allowed to invest up to $120,000 of capital gains in an RRSP. In that manner the farm will continue and the founder of the farm will be able to retire in dignity.

There are welcome provisions in this Budget that will boost the private sector. Some 300,000 small businesses in Canada will have their record-keeping simplified. Any Canadian-controlled business will qualify for the lower rate of income tax. There is security provided for home owners and home buyers. They will be able to avail themselves of a type of security against unexpected mortgage increases. Senior citizens will not have to make quarterly payments of income tax. Some 350,000 senior citizens and over 50,000 small businesses and family farm corporations will be exempted from the burden of making instalment payments. This is something which has been requested many times.

The important thing is jobs. We recognize that there is a growth in the work force. That is a reality we have to face. More and more men and women, boys and girls, are entering the work force. On the other hand, some workers will have to undergo retraining as technical developments make their present occupations redundant. We recognize that some of the youth in Canada did not avail themselves of sufficient training skills in their formative years. The Ministry of State for Youth is working on training young people for job opportunities and preparing them to gain entry into or re-enter the work force. These programs take time. We are working on them. We are endeavouring through the youth program to provide the funds necessary to assist the work force by adding to the already well-funded amount.

Canadian businessmen realize that we cannot pull jobs out of thin air. There is no point in producing items which are not marketable. In my previous role as a builder, I frequently experienced the difficulty of keeping my crews working because construction work is often very seasonal. Upon completion of a construction project, if my firm did not come up with a successful tender bid on the next contract, I had to lay off some people because it was impossible to create work for my employees. The Canadian public recognizes that Government alone cannot create jobs. Government programs, Government Departments and Crown corporations can provide jobs. Government Departments can bring "estimate" approved projects onstream to create job opportunities. The commitments in the Budget to special recovery programs will provide a stimulus for job creation, but the federal Government cannot go it alone. The private sector is the main creator of jobs whenever and wherever a market exists. The Government is creating opportunities and competitiveness for productivity and accessibility to export markets.

This Budget takes into account the needs of Canadians at all levels. It addresses the concerns of the private sector and looks ahead to create more export opportunities for Canadian industries. It also stimulates and supports job-creation opportunities. It does not produce any shock waves or disturbing fluctuations. It gives Canadians the confidence and the economic stability they seek.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the Government is proposing a realistic Budget that includes taking care of pensioners, protecting and improving pension funds, simplifying income tax requirements, facilitating the survival of the family farm and helping farmers provide for their retirement, simplifying taxes for small businesses, addressing job creation and stimulating the private sector to do its share, and providing financial assistance to help young people acquire new skills and find jobs. For these reasons and many others which would take too long to mention, I urge my colleagues to vote against the amendment proposed by the Opposition and to support the measures in this Budget. The measures proposed by this Government will enhance Canada's economic expansion and our position in the world. Thank you.

[English]

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, bearing in mind that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) indicated in his Budget that personal savings will be about $32.3 billion this year, does the Hon. Member have some idea as to how we would be able to borrow $29.5 billion to finance the deficit? Also he should bear in mind that that is 92 per cent of personal savings.

Mr. Bockstael: Mr. Speaker, the record of the Government in borrowing indicates that it has never had any difficulty borrowing money and can continue to do so, as it does every week with Treasury bonds and so forth. I do not perceive the Minister having any difficulty in borrowing the necessary money in the projected manner which he devised.

Mr. Blenkarn: If we use 92 per cent of personal savings to finance the debt, and having noted in the Budget papers that personal savings are expected to decline from 11.2 per cent of disposable income to 9.6 per cent of disposable income in 1985, how does the Hon. Member expect to finance the next year's borrowing when at that point the borrowing will be in excess of personal savings?

Mr. Fisher: Revenues will be up.

Mr. Bockstael: The Hon. Member opposite is obviously the finance critic for his Party. Just as he said that he was not an oil expert, I am not one of the financial experts on this side. However, I understand that government will borrow money not necessarily related to the savings of its population. There is the percentage of the Gross National Product which can be applied to borrowing. For example, we tell people in Canada that if they want to purchase a house, they are expected to be able to provide 25 per cent of their salary to pay for that accommodation. At least, it could go up to that percentage and they would be eligible for a mortgage. For that year the borrowing of the Government represents 20 per cent of the GNP. The Government can continue to borrow without putting the country into financial straits or difficulties.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member talked about the Government not having any problems borrowing money with savings at $32 billion and borrowings at $29 billion. If all that money is to be used up by the Government in borrowing, what will happen to the private sector when it goes to the market for funds? From where will it get its money?

Mr. Fisher: That hand-wringing has been going on for years.

Mr. Bockstael: I have not found any banks refusing to lend money to people today.

Mr. Fisher: Good for you.

Mr. Bockstael: The line of credit in Canada for provincial governments—and we can look at all ten provinces—is very high. The rating for borrowing for the federal Government is just as high or higher. This Government can guarantee its borrowings through debentures. The Canadian public is ready to come forward with whatever the Government needs to meet its obligations and to purchase Canadian Government bands.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for St. Boniface (Mr. Bockstael) said that he was not a financial expert and the Hon. Member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) said that he is a financial expert. I want the Hon. Member for St. Boniface to know that he is using more common sense today than we would hear from the Hon. Member for Mississauga South in a hundred years. In fact, I would like to point out to the Hon. Member what was said by the Hon. Member for Mississauga South and ask him to tell me whether he agrees with those cutbacks.

Does he believe, for example, that federal Government transfers to poorer regions in the country should be cut back? The Hon. Member for Mississauga South said that. Does he believe that VIA Rail should be throttled back? The Hon. Member for Mississauga South said that. Does he believe that we should end the exploration incentive grants for oil companies? The Hon. Member for Mississauga South said that. Does he believe that we should end the grants for home insulation and new furnaces? The Hon. Member for Mississauga South said that. Does he believe that we should cut back on Atomic Energy of Canada?

I see you are signalling me, Mr. Speaker. I have one more question. The Atomic Energy of Canada cut-back would hit right in Mississauga South where hundreds of engineers live. Finally, does he believe that since the $520 million deficit for the post office is supposedly too high we should, therefore, increase the price of stamps the way that the member for Mississauga South says.

In short, we have had practical advice from the Hon. Member for St. Boniface so far. We have had screwy advice from the Hon. Member for Mississauga South so far. I wonder if we can have more non-expert advice from the Hon. Member for St. Boniface since it seems to help us all considerably.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): An equally short response from the Hon. Member for St. Boniface.

Mr. Bockstael: Mr. Speaker, I did not note all of the questions the Hon. Member for Mississauga North put forward. I know very well that I am not in favour of cutting transfer payments. That is one of the great things about this country. The Constitution of Canada says that the federal Government shall be instrumental in making sure that transfer payments are made to the provinces that have less and to give a living standard to all Canadians of the same level.

I find it odd that when VIA Rail cuts were made, the Opposition screamed, hollered and said that VIA Rail had to be maintained. Since becoming a Member of Parliament, I have served on the Transport Committee. There was much insistence on maintaining VIA Rail. Now that there is a re-establishment, after realizing that VIA Rail had to continue and be restored in certain areas, I find it odd that the Hon. Member would want to cut back on VIA Rail. I do not believe we should take his advice vis-à-vis the post office, Atomic Energy and everything else he wants to cut back. He is using a shotgun to kill a sparrow.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, this gives me an opportunity to correct the record while I am asking a question. There was no indication of exactly what should be cut. I am saying that these things must be examined, and examined damned closely. I think the Hon. Member will agree that they have to be examined.

As far as transfers to the provinces are concerned, that is part of our system. What I did say, and I think the Hon. Member might agree, was that when the Government provides a reduction in transfers to the provinces in its envelope system, that reduction can take place only if provincial revenues are more buoyant.

I ask the Hon. Member to understand this and to perhaps comment. It is unfair to present a Budget which indicates that transfers to provinces are likely to go down or remain constant when, unless revenues are substantially better, they will have to go up.

Mr. Bockstael: Mr. Speaker, I agree with the Hon. Member that certain expenditures have to be examined very closely and reviewed from time to time to ensure that waste does not take place and that we are not spending money improperly.

With regard to the reduction in the transfer payments envelope, it is well known that our system provides for municipal governments to ask for more when they go to the provinces and the provinces to come to the federal Government to ask for more, wanting to enlarge their programs and so on. If is quite fair for the federal Government to say: "This is what the country can afford at this time. We will manage our affairs. We will help you to the extent that there is a universal or balanced distribution across the country so that you can provide the minimum services to which Canadians are entitled. You do your share to provide what they need in your area."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): We have to continue the debate. The Hon. Member for York-Sunbury.

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I understand there is a propensity to go to the Senate for Royal Assent in one minute. Would you like to call it 12.45?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Unfortunately, we have to continue until we get a knock at the door. We have no idea how long that will be. Sometimes it takes quite a while.

Mr. Howie: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) has placed before the Canadian people a Budget which gives the appearance of action in dealing with the country's grave economic situation, but which in reality does little to spur recovery.

Canadians, have come to expect inaction, or worse yet, disruptive policies from this Government whose policies have destroyed business confidence and crippled individual initiative. Indeed, the most notable legacy of this Government is the 1.5 million Canadians who remain unemployed; Canadians who want to work, support their families and contribute to the building of a strong, healthy nation.

Successive federal budgets and programs have only aggravated the plight of many Canadians who are ill-equipped to shoulder the burden, namely the elderly pensioner, the unemployed and the citizens of Canada's underdeveloped regions. It is to these areas of concern that I will direct my attention today.

With respect to the unemployment situation, it is obvious that the Government views this subject as one unworthy of attention. How else can Canadians interpret the almost complete lack of initiative in the Budget to address this issue? With the exception of $150 million for the Youth Opportunities Fund, the Budget simply evades the foremost problem in our society. If it is not a serious issue for the Government, then I suggest that the Government listen more closely to the people of Canada because it certainly is an important issue in their view.

In sharp contrast to the public's sense of priority we see that the federal Government is more concerned with tax collection, a prospect which is chilling, especially in light of the recent behaviour of the Department of National Revenue. Instead of increasing job-creation programs for Canada's jobless adults, the Government has shifted focus from that group and according to the Estimates plans to add 1,044 person-years for tax collection. At the same time the Canadian Employment and Immigration Commission will have its work force chopped by 649, including a cut in the number of people working on job creation and work sharing. All in all, this is a fine example of misplaced priority.

People are looking for financial security. They want a job. They need a job to look after their financial security. It is something which goes to the very core of their existence, not only young people just starting out, but also older people whose prospects for re-employment get dimmer as they grow older. Behind all the Government's numbers, words, programs and promises, they feel the underlying reality of chronic unemployment. They know that economic development is the key to the future. They know that needed skills and training are necessary to get good jobs and they want the chance to contribute.

The Government should remember that every time a new job is created, a new taxpayer is also created. If the 1.5 million Canadians who are now unemployed were put to work and, over a period of years, paid $10,000 each in income tax, our revenues would swell by $15 billion. As a result, unemployment insurance and social justice payments would diminish radically so that those funds too could be used for the benefit of all Canadians.

However, the Budget before us offers little by way of solutions to the unemployment problem. In my home province of New Brunswick unemployment is currently 14.4 per cent, a totally unacceptable level. That figure represents the seasonally adjusted rate for January. If one looks at the annual average rate for 1983, it is even worse, 14.8 per cent.

With respect to pensions, the Budget again falls short of the mark, although in some areas the Government has at least acknowledged existing problems and offers partial solutions. The Budget proposes to increase the maximum guaranteed income supplement to the old age pension for the single elderly by $25 per month on July 1, 1984 and by a further $25 per month on December 1, 1984. This $50 increase is welcomed and it is a good measure, but I must point out that only the single elderly will receive the increase and they will still be about $1,900 a year below the poverty line.

The parliamentary task force on pension reform recommended an increase of $102 a month for those single elderly Canadians with no other income except the old age pension and the guaranteed income supplement. By targeting the increase in this way, the poorest of the poor would get double the increase proposed by the Government. I do not know why the Government chose to ignore this proposal, but I suggest it would have been more effective than the proposal contained in the present Budget.

For many Canadian pensioners who have already been punished by the Government's ill-conceived six and five program, the suffering will obviously continue. The increase outlined in the Budget will help some pensioners, but not much. Others, such as elderly married couples, can expect no pension increases at all and numerous other excellent pension reforms such as homemaker pensions, improved disability pensions and improvements to increase flexibility in the age for receiving CPP benefits, among others, continue to be delayed by the sluggish pension reform process. This is sad, because it is these areas which offer the hope of improved pension benefits for the disabled and those who work in the home.

A third area of policy where much work remains is that which concerns the economic stimulation of regions in need of development. Government programs to date have had little consistent success in nurturing economic development in the "have-not" provinces, and this latest Budget does not recognize that economic recovery across Canada has been uneven. I would like to suggest that some measures should have been included in the Budget to encourage additional growth and productivity in my Province of New Brunswick, and indeed in all of Atlantic Canada where economies have been lagging behind.

It is a fact that federal transfers of all types to the Atlantic provinces account for over 40 per cent of year-to-year economic growth. The slender tax base underlines the significant need for development of a secondary manufacturing segment in the region. Atlantic Canada is the most identifiable region which suffers from regional disparities. Since the Second World War, the most successful companies have been those which have built on basic strengths having to do with location, human skills and natural resources.

Generally, the economy of the Atlantic provinces concentrates on six sectors, forestry, fisheries, tourism, agriculture, mining and manufacturing. These sectors can grow and develop largely independently of population growth within the provinces; in other words, as a consequence of exports to other provinces or countries. For that reason they are particularly significant. The construction sector on one hand, and most service sectors on the other hand, serve the domestic economy and are largely constrained in their growth by the level of activity in the economy as a whole. In other words, they are dependent on the primary sectors and manufacturing. Consequently, they are not the sectors where one would seek to stimulate growth in the expectation of gaining the largest impact, even though they are very significant sectors.

There seems to be a disturbance at the door, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps you would like to deal with it and I will continue at a later time.

CHARITABLE ORGANIZATIONS

VANCOUVER FOOD BANK—TAX TREATMENT OF DONATING COMPANIES

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, the Vancouver Food Bank is a non-profit, charitable organization. For many of the unemployed in Vancouver it is the last bastion between them and possible starvation. It spends all of its energy and resources in distributing food or groceries free of charge to those who have been hit hardest by the high level of unemployment in British Columbia and who have no resources left.

Since the Food Bank is a non-profit organization it cannot give what it does not receive from others. Much of its energy has to be spent in soliciting help from the wider community in order that it can distribute that help to those who need it. It could well receive more donations of food from food companies if the tax structure of our country were designed in such a way to encourage giving.

Under the present system, for a good company to make a substantial donation to any organization like the Vancouver Food Bank, it must do so without benefit of a charitable donation receipt for income tax purposes. Should it want a receipt—obviously it deserves one since it is giving support of considerable monetary value—it must go through the routine of selling the product to the Food Bank, getting a cheque from the Food Bank, and writing out another cheque as a donation to the Food Bank. The entire process is awkward and a disincentive to giving. Why should it not be possible for the tax department to permit the issuing of a receipt by credible organizations for gifts in kind, such as in the case of donations to the Vancouver Food Bank?

If the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) thinks this is too complicated or risky, I remind him that the United States—

Mr. Speaker: I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member, but his time has expired.

THE BUDGET

ADDITIONAL AID FOR PENSIONERS

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of Canadians to the Government's plan to assist the elderly. A large part of the expenditures in the second Budget brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) is earmarked for senior citizens.

In order to provide supplementary assistance to pensioners, the Canadian Government will pay, in addition to the quarterly cost of living adjustment a total of $50 to single pensioners between now and Christmas. About 750,000 pensioners will benefit, the affected number increasing by 20,000 in 1984. This year, more than $250 million will be added to the Canada Pension Plan fund; for 1985, funding is expected to total $500 million.

In addition to increasing benefits for single pensioners, the Canadian Government intends to reform the pension system so that all Canadian workers under federal jurisdiction will benefit from some degree of income security.

Mr. Speaker, Canadians are aware that pensions are a deferred salary and that is why the Canadian Government wants to focus attention on a social issue that will be the most important one in the years to come, affecting many Canadians, and I am sure that single pensioners, most of whom are women who were is a difficult situation, will be very happy to receive these increased benefits. Thank you.

CHARITABLE ORGANIZATIONS

ROYAL VICTORIA HOSPITAL, BARRIE, ONT.—TAX TREATMENT OF ART GIFT TO DONORS

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Royal Victoria Hospital and Recreation in Barrie, I urge the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Bussières) to rectify a problem created as a result of certain decisions by officials of his Department in the form of a letter denying a charitable organization an opportunity to raise funds.

Well known Canadian artist Ken Danby has offered to assist the hospital with its current fund raising drive. He will autograph 250 limited editions of one of his paintings commissioned for the new Recreation Building, which the hospital will give as tokens of appreciation to those who make donations in excess of $500 to the hospital fund. The hospital will make a minimum of $125,000 through this innovative venture. But now Mr. Robert Young of Revenue Canada has ruled that donors who receive these gifts cannot be issued a tax deductible receipt for their donations.

Revenue Canada will receive tax on the $20,000 that Mr. Danby will be paid for the original painting. Does the Minister think it just that his officials should now try to tax donations to this worth-while cause? The hospital is to be congratulated on coming up with an innovative way to raise money from the private sector at a time when medicare funding is a controversial issue.

Surely the tax department has had enough bad publicity in recent months. Surely it does not need to let a technicality stand in the way of a worthy and charitable cause. On behalf of all the residents of Simcoe South I plead with the Minister for justice, compassion, and a sense of fair play. He should straighten out his bureaucrats once and for all.

AVIATION INDUSTRY

SEVENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF POWERED FLIGHT IN CANADA

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my concern that an outstanding event in our national history might pass without due recognition in the House. I refer to the 75th anniversary of powered flight in Canada.

On February 23, 1909, Canada proudly entered a new era in transportation when Mr. J. A. D. McCurdy flew his aircraft, the Silver Dart, from the ice of the Bras d'Or Lake at Baddeck, Nova Scotia. The airplane was designed and built by the Aerial Experiment Association which, in addition to Mr. McCurdy, included as members Mr. Casey Baldwin, Dr. Alexander Graham Bell, Mr. Glenn Curtiss, and Mr. Thomas Selfridge. The Silver Dart's flight was the first by a heavier-than air machine in Canada, and the first controlled flight of an airplane by a British subject at any point in the British Commonwealth.

From those early days of bamboo struts and piano wire we have progressed to the conquest of space. I am certain I speak for all Canadians when I say we owe a debt of gratitude to our early aviation pioneers, and in particular to Mr. A. D. McCurdy and the men of the Aerial Experiment Association.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

POLICY PROHIBITING ISSUANCE OF CONTRACTS TO UNION FIRMS

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, the federal Government and CMHC are effectively union busting by ignoring the Fair Wages Act. CMHC is forcing non-profit housing societies to take low bid contracts for non-profit and co-op housing, thus excluding many union firms from the competition. Building trades unions and non-profit and co-op housing societies are completely justified in protesting this outrageous practice. Construction trade unions in B.C. have provided generous funding for development of affordable co-op and non-profit housing. Yet, with 66 per cent of union construction carpenters unemployed, building trade members are excluded from working on the very projects they are helping to finance.

The unfair labour practices of the federal Government and CMHC must cease immediately. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Ouellet) must enforce the Fair Wages Act for all CMHC subsidized developments so that workers earn decent wages and union firms can compete. The Minister responsible for CMHC must ensure that CMHC follows the provisions of the Act and changes the low bid policy immediately.

CALL FOR RENEWAL OF TALKS TO RESOLVE NEWFOUNDLAND OFFSHORE DISPUTE

Mr. Brian Tobin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity once again to call for a renewal of talks on resolving the offshore dispute between Ottawa and the Province of Newfoundland-Labrador.

You, and Members of this House should know, Mr. Speaker, that Premier Peckford just yesterday here in Ottawa failed to have the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) put in writing the Conservative Party's position on the offshore. As in all other matters of policy, Mr. Speaker, the Conservatives either have no policy or refuse to state what it is. The Conservative Party has a responsibility to clarify the dramatic difference in the policy of their Party on the offshore as stated by their Leader, which is that they have no position, and the policy as stated by the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), which is that they intend to kow-tow to Mr. Peckford. It is obvious these people cannot make up their minds.

I say once again that Premier Peckford has a responsibility to the people of Newfoundland and Labrador, in particular the unemployed in that Province, to quit his confrontation politics and get back to the bargaining table as soon as possible.

FINANCE

USE OF REVENUE GENERATED BY CANADIAN OWNERSHIP TAX

Mr. Gerry St. Germain (Mission-Port Moody): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Ownership Tax was created to pay for the purchase of Petrofina. Petrofina is now paid for, yet Canadians continue to pay that tax every time they buy gas. It is ironic that the Liberals, the Party elected on the promise of cheaper gas prices, keeps the prices unnecessarily high with a tax which has fulfilled its designated purpose.

• (1410)

What will the Government do with the money it collects from this tax? It will give it to Dome Petroleum, in addition to the $875 million Dome has already received through the PIP grants. What does this do for small business and home owners like those in the Mission-Port Moody area? It watches them fall by the wayside, Mr. Speaker. Those who survive see their tax dollars go out as grants to huge corporations and filter their way through to the chartered banks. It is hard enough to compete today without being taxed to death and then see your tax dollars go to your competitors as grants.

The evidence is overwhelming, Mr. Speaker. The Liberals are the Party of big business and, along with the chartered banks, are the persecutors of small business and the average working man.

EMPLOYMENT

SPECIAL RECOVERY PROJECT IN MISSISSAUGA, ONT.

Mr. Douglas Fisher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in the light of current controversy I must remind the House that Liberal Members of Parliament are the people taking a genuine interest in the problems facing unemployed people. We are the ones who put our energy into solving these problems.

I would like to give you two direct examples, from my own experience, of the lack of interest shown by the Tories. There is a special recovery project in Mississauga South for over $2.5 million. The federal Government is creating badly needed construction and tourism jobs by building a new marina on the Lakeshore. On at least two widely publicized occasions I have personally been involved in supporting and working on this project. The Tory MP has never been seen or heard from, and probably does not know or care about the benefits being provided for Mississauga.

Similarly, Mr. Speaker, I had a chance, over a year ago, to work with the Victorian Order of Nurses on a home nursing project. In this case the project was too big to be funded by one riding, and the nurses asked for co-sponsorship with the Tory MP from York-Peel (Mr. Stevens). The answer was a resounding no. He did not care about either the jobs or the sick people.

Do not let the current debate mislead you, Mr. Speaker. Tory MPs know what is happening because they can see the need and the activity by the Government. They just do not care.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member's time has expired.

NATIONAL PARKS

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF THREE NORTHERN PARKS

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, it has come to my attention that the Minister of the Environment has issued his election command to the Parks Canada people. He wants them to crank out three national parks in northern Canada before the next federal election. This means they have less than a year to fulfil satisfactorily the criteria set out by Parks Canada policy regarding the creation of national parks.

There are three essential stages to be completed. The first is identification and selection of potential national parks. The second is consultation, feasibility studies, and negotiations. The last step is the legislative process for the establishment of a national park.

Yet there have not been any public hearings "to determine the degree of interest, opposition and support for the new park proposal" or "to ensure all necessary information on competing resource use interests is collected, to aid in decision making . . ." among other concerns.

This phase of the new park assessment and negotiation stage "can mean a commitment of time to a process that can stretch over five to ten years, or more, as was the case in the recent agreement to establish Grasslands National Park". "While public involvement may complicate and lengthen the new park establishment process, it is vital".

Those are not my words, Mr. Speaker; they are the recommendations of the Chief of National Parks Systems Division, and I agree with them. The Minister of the Environment (Mr. Caccia) may want to put pressure on Parks Canada to crank out three national parks before the election, but I have some observations to make. Parks Canada has just begun the new parks public feasibility assessment and negotiation stage. Nowhere in the criteria set out by Parks Canada is it stated that the objectives of the new parks feasibility—

EMPLOYMENT

REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL JOB-CREATION FUNDS

Mr. André Maltais (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I was very sorry to hear the Opposition Party complaining about this allocating of sums of money to the ridings who need it most. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Roberts) of the Government of Canada, in public, to give more funds to Manicouagan, because all over the riding people are calling me about very specific projects such as building a presbytery in Aguanish, the community centre in Schefferville which got more than $100,000 last year, a platform for the village of Kégaska which needs one in order to receive the CBC station. I have more projects, Mr. Speaker, including harbour repairs which involves the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. We are going to carry out all kinds of projects, Mr. Speaker. Parks Canada in the Mingan Islands, Havre-St-Piere and Mingan, is waiting for substantial funding to help promote tourism in the area. Anticosti needs projects for people in isolated areas; I would also like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that the people in northern towns and the Inuit in the Fort-Chimo area are calling me about projects as well. Mr. Speaker, I think it is absolutely shameful that the Opposition parties should want to deprive ridings where the unemployment rate is very high, of special funds for direct job creation.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NATIONAL REVENUE

REPORTED STATEMENTS BY PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY ON ATTITUDE OF BUREAUCRATS

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister, if I could have his attention. This morning in a series of interviews to the Kitchener-Waterloo Record and to the CP the Member for Kitchener, the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board, made a number of serious allegations. He said he had deep concerns about the attitudinal problems which exist within Revenue Canada and has had these concerns for some period of time. He said the problems exist as a result of the attitude of top bureaucrats in the Department. He said: "Politics is democracy and democracy is accountability to the people, but the Deputy Minister is not accountable". Finally he said that the Prime Minister had assured him something was going to be done about his concerns.

My question to the Prime Minister is two-fold. What assurances did the Prime Minister give to the Member for Kitchener? Does he agree with the attack by the Member for Kitchener on the senior bureaucrats as being responsible for the problems within Revenue Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Member is purporting to allude to something which went on in our caucus. It is not my practice to comment on what went on in caucus.

Mr. Speyer: Mr. Speaker, on the contrary. The allegations which I have made, and the charges made by the Member for Kitchener, are reported in today's press as a result of statements that he made to the press this morning. Those are direct comments.

ACCOUNTABILITY OF DEPARTMENT'S SENIOR MANAGEMENT

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, does the Prime Minister agree with the assertion made by the Member for Kitchener that accountability is with the top bureaucrats for the problems within Revenue Canada, which is a very serious charge? What assurances has the Prime Minister given to Members on the Liberal side of the House that the attitudinal problems which have been spoken about by the Member for Kitchener, quite rightly, are going to be dealt with?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have the approval of the Hon. Member when he says, quite rightly, I gave assurances that the attitudinal problems would be dealt with. They are problems which have been raised particularly by Members on the other side. It is true that the Member for Kitchener and other Members on this side have been discussing matters with the Minister of Revenue, and in caucus, about the need to improve certain practices in the Department of Revenue.

Although I do not like to comment on things I said in caucus, I did give the Member the assurance that the Government was aware of the situation and that it had begun dealing with it by establishing the Farlinger Commission. Therefore, I gave him the kind of assurances that the Hon. Member suggests I quite rightly should have.

With regard to the comments of the Hon. Member himself, I do not know exactly what he said to the media. I take it his comments speak for themselves.

MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, the Member for Kitchener was saying that he was fastening responsibility, not on the Minister, but on the senior bureaucrats. The Prime Minister knows better than anyone else in the House that the buck stops with the Minister, or at least he ought to know that.

Over the last three months the Minister has demonstrated a sense of incompetence which is very difficult to exaggerate. I do not blame the Minister. I blame the Prime Minister, for appointing a 15 watt bulb to such a responsible Department. Is the Prime Minister convinced, as a result of representations that have been made on this side of the House, that the Minister of National Revenue is not doing his job, and will he replace him?

• (1420)

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I usually take such representations as advice to be considered, but when they come from a one candlepower brain, I do not consider them.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FARLINGER STUDY—PROTECTION OF WITNESSES' PRIVACY

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, in this age of enlightenment I would like to direct my question to the Minister of National Revenue. The Minister knows that there are many people, including departmental personnel, who would like to contribute to a clean-up of his Department's operation but may be reluctant to speak in public because of fear of promotions, their jobs, or compelling personal reasons. The terms of reference for the Farlinger study do not speak on this matter, and Mr. Farlinger, on Tuesday last, was not then able to give the assurance that anyone wishing to testify privately could be heard and guaranteed anonymity.

Will the Minister amend the terms of reference of the Farlinger study to state clearly that Mr. Farlinger and his associates can, for good reason, agree with anyone to hear testimony in private, or receive confidential communications, and keep secret that person's name and identity from everyone, including the Minister and departmental staff?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the terms of reference of Mr. Farlinger's study are very broad. Furthermore, Mr. Farlinger and his associates are professionals who have been sworn and will therefore preserve the anonymity of information they receive privately. I am sure that anyone in the Department or among the general public who wishes to testify privately may rest assured that his testimony will be protected by the rules of professional ethics and by the oath sworn by the people working with Mr. Farlinger on this study.

[English]

IDENTIFICATION OF WITNESSES

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the Minister for his answer, and I indicate that Mr. Farlinger is an employee of the Department. This is not a commission; it is an investigation and study. There is no mention whatsoever in the terms of reference of his ability to hear anyone in private. When he briefed the Opposition on Tuesday last and was specifically asked, he could not give us the assurance that he could hear people in private.

The Minister must realize the difficulty of appointing people to investigate their own departmental operations. If he insists on such a course, surely he should see the importance and the desirability of isolating himself and his officials from the study in order to promote a full and impartial search for the truth, without fear on the part of those who can lend great information to the study. Will the Minister formally express his intent that witnesses can testify before the study officials, and that such officials can keep secret the names and identities of any such persons? Would he do that simple thing?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I think my answer to the Hon. Member's first question adequately covers what he just said. I explained that Mr. Farlinger and the people working with him have been sworn to preserve the anonymity of the information they receive and the people giving that information. I believe this guarantee covers any concerns the Hon. Member may have in this respect.

EMPLOYMENT

SPECIAL EMPLOYMENT INITIATIVES PROGRAM—INSTRUCTIONS ON DEALING WITH MPS' INQUIRIES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Last Friday I asked a question based on information I received from a source in the Minister's department that 91 per cent of the Ontario Special Employment Initiatives Program funds was spent in Liberal ridings. Of course that was confirmed when the list was tabled.

Yet another source in the Minister's Department tells me that on Monday, February 20, of this week, a directive went out to all regional offices saying that all inquiries from Members of Parliament about the program should be routed to the Minister's office to a Mary Jamieson. Why the gag order? What is the Minister afraid of? Does he no longer have any confidence in his own officials?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not afraid of anything, particularly the questions of the Hon. Member. He asks about a directive that went out to civil servants suggesting that calls be directed to my office, he said, I think, on Monday of this week. I believe that probably such a directive was sent out before that, and its purpose was to ensure that queries about this program, which was obviously a matter of great interest and also political controversy, came to my office rather than be responded to directly by civil servants. The reason for that is that if civil servants began to respond directly on these matters it would be very easy for their comments to be taken out of context and used as part of the political battle, which is not their responsibility.

Indeed, I have seen on some occasions, in questions posed by Members on the other side of the House, that they have raised questions based on discussions that they have had with officials and which, when I investigated, did not seem to correspond entirely to the facts as the officials described them to me.

It is a natural part of the political process that the programs of the Government are advocated and defended by the Members of the Government, and the function of civil servants is not to take part in that controversy, nor should their words be used as part of that controversy. That is why that directive was given.

DISTRIBUTION OF FUNDS TO SASKATCHEWAN RIDINGS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, the Minister has said several times that he spends money from his Department on the basis of the unemployment rate in order to try to create jobs for Canadians. Could he explain why, in my Province of Saskatchewan, the riding of Assiniboia with a 2.4 per cent unemployment rate received $736,000, while the riding of Prince Albert with a 7.5 per cent unemployment rate received only $50,000? Why did Prince Albert, with three times more unemployed, receive only one fifteenth of the money that went into the Assiniboia riding?

An Hon. Member: Tell us about Ralph Goodale.

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, to be precise, I never said that the allocations were based strictly on the unemployment levels. I said that if you look at the proportion of expenditure, they correspond pretty well.

As a matter of fact, in the Hon. Member's home Province, where we have no Members of Parliament at all to the best of my recollection, 2.6 per cent of the funds have been spent in Saskatchewan, and the percentage of Canadian unemployed that is to be found in Saskatchewan is 2.6 per cent, exactly the same.

The reason why one cannot look simply at the figures of expenditure and look at those proportions in relation to unemployment insurance is that there are many other programs of the Government over-all which deal with unemployment problems, apart from these. For instance, there are the incentives given in the last Budget which stimulate economic activity through private sector activity in our economy. Naturally those have a greater impact on some Provinces than on others. There are some Provinces that are wealthier than others, indeed including the Province of Saskatchewan, where one would expect that the provincial Governments would be able to do more in combating unemployment than in some of the Provinces that are not so well off. One should not look for an exact parallel in the percentages. I said that if you look at the unemployment percentages and the proportions of expenditure you will find that there is a rough comparison which makes sense.

Mr. Nystrom: That is a pretty rough comparison.

FUNDS ALLOCATED TO ASSINIBOIA RIDING

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Assiniboia has one-third the unemployment rate of Prince Albert, yet it is given fifteen times as much money as Prince Albert. Mr. Speaker, we are lucky enough not to have any Liberal MPs, but could the Minister tell us if the reason Assiniboia got so much money is due to the fact that Senator Argue, better known as "Senator Slushfund" in our Province, comes from the Assiniboia constituency, and that the former Member of Parliament from that riding, Ralph Goodale, who is now the Leader of the Liberal Party in Saskatchewan, is running for election to the provincial Legislature in the riding of Assiniboia?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, obviously the hon. gentleman does not listen to me, or does not care to hear. Two point six per cent of the funds have gone to Saskatchewan, and 2.6 per cent of the unemployment in Canada is to be found in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Nystrom: Answer the question.

Mr. Roberts: The hon. gentleman is concerned about Assiniboia. I will pass on to Senator Argue his comments that the New Democratic Party does not want funds spent in Assiniboia to create jobs.

PROVISION OF PROGRAM CRITERIA TO MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Yesterday outside the House the Minister was quoted as saying, in reply to a question from the press as to why the $300 million Special Initiatives Employment fund had not been advertised:

If we had we would have raised expectations and been flooded with applications we couldn't deal with.

Yet that is precisely what the Minister did in the case of the Canada Works Program which had half of what the Special Employment Initiatives Program had, currently $164,144,000. Yet each Member of Parliament received an information kit. Advertisements went out across the country to all the daily newspapers, encouraging applications. The private sector was encouraged to get involved, to the extent that millions and millions of dollars worth of applications that could not possibly be dealt with came in from all constituencies. Why the different standard? Why could this program not be advertised? Why could Members of Parliament not be given details on criteria and how to deal with them?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has referred to the Canada Works Program. The funding for the Canada Works Program is far more extensive than the funding which is available under the Special Employment Initiatives Program. Part of that Canada Works funding goes on the basis of constituency allocations to Hon. Members, as the Hon. Member knows. I think I would stand by the statement which he has cited which, more or less, I think corresponds to what I said, that if an extensive advertising publicity campaign had been undertaken the only result would have been to generate expectations which could not possibly have been fulfilled.

There is lots of evidence that members of the public, municipalities, and mayors of towns and cities across the country were fully aware of the program, because they stimulated a whole variety of applications for it. There is not a need for the kind of publicity and information program which the Hon. Member now seems to be urging us to carry through.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, there is a basic contradiction here. On the one hand the Minister is encouraging applications for the Canada Works Program, thereby generating expectations that cannot possibly be fulfilled. On the other hand he is suppressing and hiding a program that is worth twice the value. How do you explain that?

AMOUNT OF UNUSED FUNDS

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have another question for the Minister. There is a discrepancy in the total number of applications that were tabled in the House a few days ago and what the Minister claims was the total. The total, according to the Minister, was $207 billion, but according to what was tabled in the House it only added up to $184 million. Can the Minister tell us where is the other $27 million in applications?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have not done the adding procedure which I gather the Hon. Member and his staff have done. To the best of my knowledge we have provided the list of projects to the funding of $207 million. There may be some discrepancy as a result of unallocated funds, or on the basis of administrative costs. I suppose it is also possible that in trying to prepare the material as quickly as possible for Members of the House something may have gone wrong. I will try to check the figures and see what the explanation is, if there is one.

ALLOCATION OF FUNDS TO NOVA SCOTIA RIDINGS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It is interesting to note that in Nova Scotia there are no unemployed in the six Conservative ridings, apparently. They are all in the Liberal ridings.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Forrestall: On what grounds can the Minister stand in this House and charge Members of the Opposition with disinterest in the welfare of their constituents when, in fact, 95 per cent of the $28.4 million that went into Nova Scotia went into Liberal ridings? On the basis of that, can the Minister rise in his place to tell us that we were not interested, or will he not now admit that we were not told?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: You were asleep, Mike.

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I suppose I have to say that the hon. gentleman at least cared because there was funding that went into his constituency, something over $3 million under the Special Capital Recovery Program.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Roberts: I think the situation is fairly clear. One after another, and again and again, Members on the opposition side of the House have said: "Why didn't we get our share?" "Why didn't we get our share?" Then they answer the question themselves by saying: "We didn't put forward applications." "We didn't put forward applications." They then say: "Well why didn't we put forward applications?" "Because we did not know about it. "Because we didn't know about it". But then they say they are not negligent, that they are diligent Members of Parliament.

Mr. Nowlan: Allan MacEachen took all the money.

Mr. Roberts: They studied the budget statements when they came forward. They looked at the program. They knew it was there. They were aquiver with expectation. They were energetic. They were anxious to bring forward projects, but they waited for the criteria to come down. They would come down for breakfast and say: "Are the criteria out?" "No, not today. We will wait until tomorrow." The next day they would come down and say: "Are the criteria out yet? We have projects. No, not today." The next day they said: "Are the criteria there? No, not today." It went on for days. It stretched into weeks, then months, then years, before they got the criteria. What did they do? They sat there for two years until last week to say: "We really want to have those criteria". Is that what they call a diligent exercise of their responsibilities on behalf of their constituents?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I might point out to the Minister—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Forrestall: As Donald MacInnis would have said, we will wait for the snake pit to quiet down.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Forrestall: I have lots of time. I would like to point out a couple of things to the Minister. I am talking about the Special Employment Initiatives Program, not the Special Recovery, the rapid recovery and all. You want to know about the $3 million I got. I got that in exchange for an $18 million nautical institute stolen from me, stolen from the people of Dartmouth, by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

AFFIRMATIVE ACTION PROGRAM FUNDING

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of Employment and Immigration tell me why the Government in all of the secretiveness, quietness, and hidden procedures—I do not mind not getting any money particularly, but I tell you what I do object to, I object, in the middle of all that is going on, secretly, behind people's backs, to the Government taking away funding from an affirmative action program that was designed to help young black women enter the labour force or re-enter it if they had had to leave it—why the government cut out that funding to give to Cape Breton Members funds that could be used to help these people?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in every single one of these Special Projects direct job-creation functions, whether it is winter works, NEED, Summer Canada, the Community Development Program, Special Employment Initiatives, or Section 38, the proportion of funding flowing to Nova Scotia is well above that which it would be theoretically entitled to on the basis of its level of unemployment in Canada—well above it. I am surprised that the Hon. Member, as a Member of Parliament, with the interests of Nova Scotia at heart, should really object to that situation. He has mentioned a specific project—and I have to say to him that I am not aware of that project.

Mr. McDermid: You are too busy with Cape Breton.

Mr. Roberts: I would be very happy to look into that project. There is still a considerable amount of funding available under the Special Employment Initiatives Program. If he wishes to recommend that project to me, I would be very happy to look at it thoroughly, carefully, and conscientiously.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

APPLICATION MADE FOR DISABLED CHILDREN'S PLAYGROUND

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same Minister, concerning the same Employment Initiatives Program. Last November 29 I wrote to the Minister responsible for disabled persons asking him if there were any moneys available to upgrade a school playground for disabled kids. That was last November 29. Last week the Minister wrote back and said if there are any moneys available under the federal Departments, I am afraid there is no program within my Department with a mandate to provide funding for capital expenditures" for this purpose. At the same time the Hon. Member for Kitchener received a grant from that Minister's Department under that program. What is the difference between a disabled child who happens to live in Kitchener and any other disabled child in this country?

• (1440)

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it may be that I did not hear the Hon. Member correctly. If so, I apologize. I thought I heard him say that he wrote to the Minister responsible for disabled people. I assume he meant he wrote to me.

Mr. Young: No.

Mr. Roberts: If he did not write to me, then I am afraid, at least off hand, I am not aware of that specific item of correspondence which I gather was directed to another Minister. If he is asking about the reply of another Minister to him, I am afraid I cannot help him without undertaking some investigation to find out what was the content of the reply and what, if any, was the distinction between the two cases.

GRANT MADE TO KITCHENER RIDING PROJECT

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Employment and Immigration has told the House repeatedly in the last couple of weeks that he discussed this question in his caucus on several occasions. The Minister is a member of that caucus. He knew about the program. He tells me that he knew nothing about this letter, yet under his Department he gave a grant of money to the Hon. Member for Kitchener. I want to know why. It is in the Minister's documents which he tabled in the House the other day. What is the difference between a disabled child in Kitchener, a Liberal riding, and one in my riding, or in any other riding across the country?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is difficult for me to reply in relation to correspondence to which I have not been a party. If I heard the Hon. Member correctly, he said that he received a reply from my colleague saying that there was not a program within his Department for this purpose. In so far as I know from hearing the comment, it is probably true that there is not a program within the Department of my hon. colleague for that purpose.

Mr. Young: What is this?

Mr. Roberts: It seems to me that if he is referring to the correspondence which was exchanged, if I heard him correctly, the correspondence was accurate. What seems not to have happened is that the hon. gentleman did not write to me with his suggestion, which perhaps he should have done.

HEALTH

EFFECTS OF BILL C-3

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Saint-Michel-Ahuntsic (Mrs. Killens).

Mrs. Thérèse Killens (Saint-Michel-Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. According to statements published in the newspaper La Presse on February 22, the Quebec Minister of Social Affairs, Mr. Pierre-Marc Johnson, said that Bill C-3, relating to health services in Canada, might deprive Quebecers of dental care for their children and of medication for the elderly. Could the Minister give the House the assurance that, contrary to what was stated by the Quebec Minister of Social Affairs, the Bill under consideration is not aimed at penalizing children and the elderly in Quebec?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm to the Hon. Member for Saint-Michel Ahuntsic what I said yesterday to the Member for Jonquière who asked the same question, that I am very sorry the Quebec Minister, Mr. Johnson, saw fit to make statements to alarm the elderly and mothers and their children. The health Bill does not cut services in any province. On the contrary, it entrenches once and for all the basic insured services that are to be offered free of charge to all Canadians and all Quebecers.

So, as far as this particular situation is concerned, I fail to see why the elderly are again being used by the Minister, who seems to feel guilty, because if the Act is complied with, there is no penalty and thus Quebecers cannot be deprived of any services. I think it is clear this legislation reinforces the health insurance system to protect Quebecers.

UNEMPLOYMENT IN NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The construction industry is the bellweather of the economic climate of the maritime Provinces, and right now the economic forecast is for continuing storms. Unemployment is rampant and, like a drought, is ravaging the land. What does the Minister have to say to the 83 per cent of pipefitters, the 82 per cent of carpenters, and the 84 per cent of labourers in New Brunswick who only want a job more than they want his neck? Never mind the frigate program, most of which will not come onstream until 1985.

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have had discussions with my provincial counterpart in New Brunswick about the problems of training and equipping people for future employment, and about the immediate need for creating jobs there. Early next month I will be in Saint John, New Brunswick, again to meet with him and my other provincial colleagues to discuss these problems.

The third thing I would say to him in reply to his question is that he may not feel the frigate program is one which is worthy of support. But we in this Party feel that it is very important and will have the benefit of creating jobs within his Province.

Mr. Corbett: I can assure the Minister that what we require in southern New Brunswick, in all Atlantic Canada, and in Canada, is much more than talk. We need action, which we are not obtaining from the Government.

Oral Questions

EMPLOYMENT

SPECIAL EMPLOYMENT INITIATIVES PROGRAM—DISTRIBUTION OF FUNDS TO NEW BRUNSWICK RIDINGS

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I remind the Minister that we asked for the details under the SEI Program back in 1982. We were told to await the details, to put our questions on the Order Paper. We did that, and we got nothing.

How can the Minister explain away to the suffering families of the unemployed the ineffective dumping of more than $7 million under the SEI Program into New Brunswick Liberal ridings for the sole purpose of electing the unelectable? How does he expect Canadians to believe that over 90 per cent of the unemployed reside only in Grit ridings in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there seems to be an extraordinary inconsistency in the hon. gentleman's question. On the one hand he preaches at us for having done nothing in New Brunswick. In fact what we have done is put $89 million worth of job-creation investment into New Brunswick in exactly the kinds of programs which he then turns around and condemns us for having brought into effect.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

COSTS OF LITIGANTS CONTESTING LEGALITY OF QUEBEC LEGISLATION

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. Yesterday federal Government lawyers were in the Supreme Court with Quebec school groups to contest the restrictive education provisions in Quebec's Bill 101. Furthermore, his colleague, the Secretary of State, provided funding to cover the legal costs of the litigants.

This week four Montreal businesses and Alliance Quebec joined together to contest legally the restrictive sign provisions in Bill 101. Will the Minister say whether his Department and the Secretary of State will provide the same assistance to these litigants in order to strike down these oppressive provisions?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member's question recognizes, the Government has been very active in supporting the claims of minority groups of both official languages in many parts of the country in cases involving the rights of minority linguistic groups. The program is administered by the Secretary of State, on the advice of the Minister of Justice. We have a considerable number of applications. We try our best to consider them favourably. The kind of application to which my hon. friend referred is the kind that would likely receive support from our program. I would actually have to receive the application and discuss it with my colleague before I could give an absolute assurance, but certainly prima facie it would seem to be the kind of case where assistance would be given.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ACID RAIN—PROTEST TO UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. He is aware of the recent protest sent to the Government of the United States. Could he give us an idea why it took so long, inasmuch as the U.S. President made his statement approximately six weeks ago? Would the Minister tell us what the Government intends to do on its own to reduce emissions by 50 per cent? That is what we will have to do to set a good example.

● (1450)

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, this being a decision that resulted in a serious setback in our plans to reduce acid rain precipitation in this country, we wanted to make a very thorough analysis and put our case forward to the United States in the most concise and effective manner. Therefore, we have proceeded in a rational and orderly way. We presented this statement yesterday to make our case. I do not think the Hon. Member would have approved if we had rushed into the State Department with an ill-conceived position. We have done it in a way that I believe is rational and will hopefully convince the American authorities that they are making a very serious mistake in disregarding the economic consequences to their economy as well as the Canadian economy in postponing action on acid precipitation.

As to the second part of the Hon. Member's question, I am approaching the provincial Ministers of the Environment in order to convene a federal-provincial meeting very soon to assess our position, and to determine where we go from here.

AUTOMOBILE EMISSION STANDARDS

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, the Minister is aware automobile emission regulations in Canada are much more lenient, in fact three times more lenient as in the United States. I believe that something will be done in Canada to make ours stricter, but not until the 1990 models. I am wondering if the Minister would have a word with his seatmate, the Minister of Transport, and maybe between the two of them they will do something to change the 1990 date to at least 1987. Surely we do not have to wait that long, since cars manufactured in Canada are shipped to the United States equipped with strict emission controls. It could probably be done here by 1986.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Hon. Member for his intervention on this subject. I have frequent conversations on this with my seatmate. I will take his submissions as a good input into resolving this matter, possibly much sooner than 1990.

GRAIN

RAIL SHIPMENTS FROM THUNDER BAY

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport, who also reports to the House for the Canadian Wheat Board. As he knows, last winter over one million tonnes of grain were shipped east by rail from Thunder Bay to central and eastern Canadian ports. So far this year only 160,000 tonnes have moved. Over 900 grain workers are laid off at Thunder Bay because the Canadian Wheat Board and Canadian National cannot reach an agreement on a freight rate east of Thunder Bay. Will the Minister report to the House on that and what action he is taking with Canadian National?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker I appreciate the question from the Hon. Member. I would like to clarify one point. There is no price differential between the two railroads in this case. I agree that for some reason or other the Wheat Board is not assigning allocations to CN. We understand, of course, that CN is heavily involved in the Prairie region, particularly in the northern parts of the Provinces because of a very large movement of grain out of those areas. We are holding discussions to alleviate the shortage of equipment that CNR presently encounters, and at the same time I will be meeting, as the Hon. Member knows, on Tuesday with the Senior Grain Transportation Committee at which time the railways, the Wheat Board, the shippers and producers will be present. It is a matter that I will take up with them at that time.

FREIGHT CHARGE INQUIRY

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Mr. Speaker, Thunder Bay has practically ground to a halt. This is affecting grain movement from Manitoba, eastern Saskatchewan, as well as east of Thunder Bay. I am informed that Canadian Pacific has moved about 160,000 tonnes. That is all that has moved so far. Canadian National is not moving it. I am informed that the argument is about what the freight charge will be east of Thunder Bay. Can the Minister find a solution to that problem and get the grain moving, otherwise the port remains shut down for the rest of the winter?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I cannot add a great deal to what I said earlier, that the comparability of rates between the two shows no difference. However, as the Hon. Member well knows, the Wheat Board does have the authority to allocate the movement by railway. There is the extenuating circumstance that CN is very heavily committed, particularly in the Peace River area and other areas, and most of its equipment is tied up. We have recently held meetings to see if we can gain additional equipment through leasing by CN for a short period of time. I understand the Hon. Member's concerns. I share them. I will be raising those matters on Tuesday when I meet with all the concerned parties, which shows the value of having a Senior Grain Transportation Committee, which in turn shows the value of having the Grain Transportation Act.

ENERGY

NEWFOUNDLAND OFFSHORE RESOURCES

Hon. Roger Simmons (Burin-St. George's): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. A week or so ago the Hon. Member for St. John's West indicated in a television interview that if the Tory Party came to power it would turn over ownership of offshore resources to the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador.

Mr. Crosbie: All offshore provinces.

Mr. Simmons: Yesterday the Leader of the Opposition failed to confirm that promise in a meeting with the Premier of Newfoundland. Indeed, he completely contradicted the hon. gentleman from St. John's West, the bionic mouth not attached to any known intelligent life form. In view of this continuing contradiction from the unguided missile from St. John's West, versus the take-no-position of the Leader of the Opposition, I ask the Minister whether he has had any recent representation from the Premier of Newfoundland to get on with the job of offshore negotiation, despite the lack of position, the many positions, from the Tory Party?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have not received any communication from the Premier of Newfoundland since that Province quit negotiating more than a year ago. I am always available for discussion. I am not surprised that the Hon. Member for St. John's West would say such a thing. He offered a deal whereby he would have for the Province of Newfoundland the same revenue as the Province of Alberta. The offer I made to Newfoundland was for much more revenue than the Government of Alberta is receiving. The Hon. Member misled his people and, in fact, will be depriving the people of Newfoundland of financial resources if his policy were accepted. I understand why the Leader of the Opposition is not accepting the proposition of his colleague, who is still fighting against him.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

OIL COMPANIES' MEETINGS ON PRICES AND SUPPLIES

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, it has been brought to my attention that there is a conspiracy to fix prices between the major oil companies. One of the partners in this conspiracy is Canada's own Petro-Canada. I would ask the Minister responsible for Consumer and Corporate Affairs to please answer to this House why she is allowing Petro-Canada, Shell, Imperial Oil, Gulf and Texaco to have secret meetings and set a location from which fuel will be picked up at one specific refinery. The price is fixed at that refinery. It could be Petro-Canada or Shell. As a result, all of the people in that marketing area, including some in Ottawa, have been paying as much as 50 cents a gallon more than people in Peterborough because the price is fixed.

The ripoff is occurring. For eight years the Liberal Government has done nothing to interfere with the price fixing that is going on within the oil industry.

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is aware that the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission is holding hearings. Those hearings just received a very comprehensive report from the Bureau of Competition. I wish the Hon. Member would take a careful look at it. Other than that, I think it is best for us to remain silent until the full story is told. He can rest assured that the Government will take appropriate measures once they are suggested by the Commission.

INDEPENDENT SERVICE STATIONS—REQUEST FOR FREEDOM OF COMPETITION

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, this has been going on since 1958. I have been in the fuel oil business for 25 years. You know as Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that that ripoff is occurring. For eight years you have had a commission studying it, you and—

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Domm: —the former Minister responsible for Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The position of your own solicitor, Gordon Kaiser, is that the Government should intervene to stop the fixing of prices by the major oil companies in Canada and allow the independent retail service stations of this nation to buy their product wherever they want to buy it, not from those who fix the prices.

• (1500)

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Again, Mr. Speaker, I would recommend to the Hon. Member that he pay close attention to the inquiry which is taking place now, and if he can wait six more months we will have the answers to the questions he is raising. I can assure the Hon. Member that I am as anxious as he is. I would also like to comment, Mr. Speaker, that the Hon. Member may have had a lot of practice in the oil business, but I notice he has not been particularly successful lately.

PETITIONS

TABLING OF REPORTS OF CLERK OF PETITIONS

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have the honour to inform the House that the petitions, with the exception of one, presented by Hon. Members on Wednesday, February 22, 1984, meet the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

One of the petitions presented by the Hon. Member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott) does not meet the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Nielsen: I rise on a point of order, Sir. Could the Government House Leader inform us as to the business for tomorrow? Since the House will be rising at the close of business tomorrow for the mid-term break and will not be returning until March 5, can he give us some indication of the business which he intends to call, at least for the first day or two, March 5 and March 6, and as far into the week as he can take us?

Mr. Pinard: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Tomorrow we will start debating Bill C-10. Following the winter break, on Monday we will have the fifth day of debate on the Budget and Tuesday will be the sixth and last day of debate on the Budget. I am prepared to go even further, if the Hon. Member is interested. On the Wednesday and Thursday following we will be debating Bill C-21.

Mr. Nielsen: I thank the Government House Leader for that information. While the Hon. Member for Algoma, the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, is in his seat, would the Hon. Member, as Chairman of that Standing Committee, indicate when he is going to call the Committee together to deal with the assurances given by the Prime Minister last January 19?

The statutory report of the Chief Electoral Officer for 1983, which was automatically referred to the Committee and is waiting there to be dealt with, deals, among other things, with Section 72 of the Canada Elections Act, formerly Bill C-169. When is he going to call the Committee together so that that report, and Section 72 in particular, can receive the complete review which the Prime Minister assured us last January 19 would be happening?

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, the Steering Committee met yesterday and we are planning to call the first meeting of the Committee on March 20. However, the exact agenda for that meeting will depend on the decision of the Committee as to what work to take up at that time.

Mr. Nielsen: This question then might be appropriate, Mr. Speaker. I think perhaps the Steering Committee might want to give some thought to meeting to consider this important matter before March 20. In any event, the Steering Committee might wish to consider Hansard for January 19 at page 557, where there are certain assurances recorded which were given by the Prime Minister of the country with respect to the review of the report of the Chief Electoral Officer.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. ROBERTS—UNPARLIAMENTARY LANGUAGE OF MR. CROSBIE

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, yesterday when I was replying to a question in the House of Commons, there was an intervention by the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). I did not hear it at the time, Mr. Speaker, but I did see it this morning recorded in Hansard. The Hon. Member for St. John's West is reported on page 1621 of Hansard as saying in relation to myself "You are a bloody liar", which is both sacrilegious and clearly unparliamentary. I would ask that that expression be withdrawn.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Yes, Mr. Speaker, if I said "bloody liar", it was obviously a mistake. A "well turned out liar" would be more accurate.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Ouellet: Shame.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the Hon. Member for St. John's West, an experienced parliamentarian in this House and one, if I may observe, with certain ingenious talents with respect to language, to withdraw the world "liar". It is unparliamentary.

Mr. Crosbie: Naturally, Mr. Speaker, I will do whatever you wish. I withdraw the word "liar" and say that the hon. gentleman is unable to articulate or comprehend the truth.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Manly: Further to House business, Mr. Speaker—I was standing earlier—on December 12 the Prime Minister said that ending discrimination against Indian women was a legislative priority. I would like to ask the House Leader of the Government when a Bill dealing with this subject will be tabled in the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order! The Hon. President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard).

Mr. Pinard: The question is a very intelligent one, but it would be more intelligible if the Hon. Member would care to repeat it.

Mr. Manly: Mr. Speaker, on December 12 the Prime Minister said that ending discrimination against Indian women would be a legislative priority for this session. I wonder if the House Leader could indicate when a Bill dealing with this subject will be tabled in the House.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I shall give the Hon. Member's representations very serious consideration.

NARCOTIC CONTROL ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING THERAPEUTIC USE OF HEROIN

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-221, to amend the Narcotic Control Act (therapeutic use of heroin).

Mr. Speaker, this is exactly the same Bill that was presented on April 29, 1983 by the late Member for Nepean-Carleton. At that time, as reported at page 24994 of Hansard, when introducing the Bill he said:

Madam Speaker, the purpose of the Bill is to permit designated physicians in defined hospitals, particularly in cancer clinics, to prescribe heroin to alleviate pain and to provide against diversion of heroin for improper purposes and to permit a public debate and decision on this important question.

Ironically, Mr. Speaker, when the Hon. Member introduced the Bill he was in reasonably good health. Shortly afterwards he was diagnosed as having cancer and subsequently he died. I hope the House will agree eventually to allow the subject matter of the Bill to go to committee where the evidence and the expert witnesses can be heard.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

EXCISE TAX ACT

On the Order: Introduction of Bills:

February 8, 1984—Mr. Lambert—Bill intituled: "An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act (annual adjustments)".

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before proposing the motion for leave to introduce the Bill entitled an Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act (annual adjustments) of the Hon. Member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), the Chair ought to enter a caveat as to the procedural acceptability of the Bill which purports to reduce duties. However, I am prepared to hear argument from the Hon. Member and take the matter under advisement before rendering a final decision on the question at a later date convenient to the Hon. Member and the Chair.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, the point was raised by a Table officer, it was replied to, and the simple answer is: Since when is an excise tax a duty?

Mr. Speaker: Nevertheless, the Chair stands by the comments that have been entered on the record. The Chair will come back to this matter before proceeding with the Bill. The Chair still has reservations concerning it.

COMMUNICATIONS AND CULTURE

REFERENCE OF SEXUALLY ABUSIVE BROADCASTING MATERIAL TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I think you will find there is unanimous consent that a motion be put to the following effect:

That the subject matter of sexually abusive television programming be referred to the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture.

I think if you seek unanimous consent you will find that there is a disposition that the motion be put.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Yes, Mr. Speaker. It was the intention of the Hon. Member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott) to raise that as a point of order today, but now that the step has been taken that will not be necessary. Of course, we consent.

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I believe the wording that was understood was "sexually abusive broadcasting", which is more all-encompassing. If that could be understood?

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, it would be acceptable to change the words "television programming" to "broadcasting", if that is agreeable to Members of the Opposition.

Mr. Nielsen: It is the same thing.

Mr. Speaker: Is there consent for the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council to present the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is moved by Mr. Evans, seconded by Mr. Maltais:

That the subject matter of sexually abusive broadcasting be referred to the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture.

Motion (Mr. Evans) agreed to.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the Government; and the amendment of Mr. Crosbie (p. 1445).

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I had covered a large measure of my address before the adjournment. I was concluding my remarks by referring to a number of sectors of the economy in New Brunswick and the Atlantic provinces and indicating the measures which I thought would most stimulative to their extension and development.

There are other sectors, some of growing importance, which have a real or potential export component. These include transportation—port activities in particular and distribution—warehousing for the region, and some services, especially consulting services, engineering, architecture, data processing and so on. The national defence sector has a major impact on the economy as well.

Together the six sectors account for about one-fifth of all economic activity in the Atlantic provinces, providing 20 per cent of both employment and gross domestic product. The balance of economic activity occurs in the construction and service sectors. As indicated, these are largely dependent on other activities in the region.

Generally, although we have perceived the need to move beyond the traditional industries, we have not always moved into better production and marketing techniques, more sophisticated or higher quality versions of existing products, or new products related to our existing basic skills, managerial expertise, marketing channels and the like.

The fisheries offer a good example of these difficulties. Atlantic Canada has one of the world's largest fisheries, yet participation is modest in the manufacture of deck hardware, propulsion machinery, fishing gear, processing plant equipment, and electronic devices used in navigation. The shipbuilding industry finds it difficult to supply fishing vessels to our fishermen on equal terms with subsidized foreign shipyards. In other words, we have fallen behind in a vital high technology market which should have been a natural for Atlantic Canada.

Nor is fisheries-related manufacturing the only unrealized opportunity. Based upon an assessment of competitive strengths and weaknesses, we appear to have significant manufacturing opportunities in plastics, fabrication, and chemicals extracted from marine plants; in drug, personal and homecare industries; in defence related manufacturing; and on a smaller scale, in certain industrial chemicals and home and commercial furnishings. There are undoubtedly many others.

More specifically, we must devote more attention to the following human resource issues: Government-business-labour relationships; management; innovation; restructuring and marketing. Certainly close co-operation between federal and provincial governments and innovative tax incentive programs are needed to spur economic growth in the Atlantic provinces. Sadly, sound federal-provincial relations are not a hallmark of this Government, nor are innovative fiscal policies.

In the Atlantic provinces we require new programs to encourage innovation in business. We need a better transfer of information between the patent and licensing office and the business community to promote new technology. In addition, incentives to increase the supply of risk capital in underdeveloped areas are vital. An expanded and enhanced mandate for research is also required. Further incentives to encourage process redesign and innovation as well as product innovation are needed. Atlantic Canada also needs a stronger marketing orientation in the program structure specifically aimed at more effective penetration of local, regional, national and international markets.

Let me propose a couple of further, specific ideas which could prove beneficial in this respect. One idea would be to provide a 150 per cent tax credit to small firms starting up in underdeveloped regions to cover capital costs and labour costs for the first three years of operation. By allowing a newly established firm to apply these expenses against future income tax payable, the investor would be given the opportunity to recover his investment plus 50 per cent, and his labour costs for the first three years plus 50 per cent. In this way we would create a new corporate taxpayer and ensure the creation of much needed employment—all without taking anything from the federal Treasury.

A second suggestion would be the abolition of the capital gains tax. The enormous administrative costs associated with collection of these revenues already offsets any perceived fiscal advantage. If we accept at face value the $400 million which the Government presently collects in capital gains tax, I would argue that the advantages of eliminating this tax in terms of potential domestic and foreign investment and the resulting creation of jobs and new corporate taxpayers would be overwhelming.

I would prefer to end my comments on a happy note. However, I am afraid the Budget before us offers little incentive for optimism. As I have pointed out, there is little in the Budget to improve the lot of our pensioners, our unemployed citizens, or our underdeveloped regions. The Government simply continues to illustrate its mismanagement and callous disregard for the well-being of its citizens. The Government bases its fiscal projections on anticipated improvements in the U.S. economy which it claims will pull Canada upwards in its wake. For the sake of Canada's long suffering population, we will have to hope that this is so, because Canadians know all too well that solutions and leadership will never come from the present Government. To the despair of the unemployed, it is clear that the Government's expertise lies in the distribution of largess. Its talents do not include compassion, leadership, or positive results.

Mr. Corbett: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member mentioned the importance of military bases to the economy of the Atlantic region. Would he have some comment on the Government's proposal to withdraw the air squadron from CFB Chatham? How does he feel that might affect the economy of that part of Atlantic Canada?

Mr. Howie: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member's question is a good one. I am not happy about the withdrawal of the air squadron from CFB Chatham because I feel it is a militarily wrong decision. I discussed this matter at length with our former and present defence critic. We feel it is the wrong way to go. The new CF-18 fighter aircraft would be better employed at Chatham because, when fully loaded, it has a very limited range. At Chatham it would be able to fly out over the Atlantic and observe Russian aircraft flying down the Atlantic corridor to Cuba. This would be an enhanced role for us in NATO. So my inclination would be to leave the aircraft there on military grounds.

As the Hon. Member knows, the area of Newcastle, Chatham and Miramichi is in a desperate situation economically. We have high unemployment and the removal of about 1,500 or 2,000 people from that area will be a disaster which will exacerbate a very serious problem. The Government has proceeded with development of a maximum security prison in that area which will help alleviate the situation. They have a pay division facility which is supposed to go into that area to help it, and there have been other small developments. However, the total impact of these developments fails to equal the economic effect and purchasing power of the spin-offs from the military base.

One thing the Government should look at is the possibility of developing a duty-free port in Newcastle harbour. Harbour development is always followed by economic development. I had hoped that something like the Bell Helicopter plant, which creates over 4,000 jobs in nearby Quebec at Mirabel, would go to the Chatham area. This would have a fantastic effect on the whole economy of New Brunswick and lift that area economically from one of depression to one of the most advanced in the country.

The move of surveys and mapping branch of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, which we tried to get for the University of New Brunswick and which has the best survey engineering faculty in the world, where it would operate most efficiently, has been refused for the last seven years. The Minister is determined to move it to Sherbrooke, Quebec, and recent court decisions may enable him to go forward with that decision. It will cost us $76 million, and if he is determined not to put it on the University of New Brunswick campus where it can operate best, then I do not know why they do not put it in Chatham where it will stimulate the economy. That $76 million would just be a godsend in New Brunswick and a real advantage to that area. The Member from Miramichi has raised the question and worked very hard in his caucus and with the Government. Our provincial counterparts have co-operated. I think all Members from New Brunswick are concerned with this problem and would like very much to encourage the Government of Canada and the Government of New Brunswick to do everything they can to address the situation.

I hope my few comments have been constructive. I thank the Hon. Member for his question and the Speaker for his patience. I did not really intend to make another speech.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member usually puts a lot of thought and planning into his debate. First of all, I would like to disagree with his closing remarks. If he looks at the April Budget and at this Budget, he will see the Government shows great concern and compassion for the economically depressed areas of Canada. I recommend that he look at both Budgets and I think he would probably strike out the last comment he made.

I agree with him, though, that we should be seeking better marketing techniques. I was wondering if he could share with us some suggestions for improving our marketing techniques, especially in the part of Canada he comes from.

Mr. Howie: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Hon. Member for his question. In addition to the market research and structure I outlined in my speech, another avenue which occurs to me and which might be beneficial is the development of something similar to the DISC program which has operated very effectively in the U.S. That is the concept of the duty-free port in which we import, generally from emerging nations of the world, products which, with their lower cost labour force, they make relatively inexpensively. By trading with them we create a potential customer. My point is that we would import these products to Newcastle, Chatham, St. John, Belldune or some of our other ports which are excellent all-weather ports in New Brunswick. We would assemble them using Canadian employers, technique, engineering, technology and workers. We would assemble them, making the total product, and then export this product to world markets. Because we can import it less expensively, our product would then be less expensive. Because of our higher technology capabilities, particularly in communications, electronics and electronic assembly, our product would be competitive world-wide. Like the Americans, who increased their trade 16 per cent in the first year of operation, I feel that we could reach world markets and create good jobs in New Brunswick. This is one of the techniques I would like us to consider. I thank the Hon. Member for his question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House will now proceed with debate. The Hon. Member for Cochrane-Superior (Mr. Penner).

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane-Superior): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the concluding remarks of the Hon. Member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie) before he answered the questions, in which he took quite a negative approach to the Budget. I would like to strike a different note from that, Mr. Speaker. In my view the Budget, which was presented by the Minister of Finance last week, deserves the appreciation and whole-hearted support of the House.

One very noted columnist in this country, who specializes in matters relating to business and economics, said, concerning the Budget of last week, that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) has produced a winner. I see this Budget as maintaining that steady course which was set out for us last April. This course was designed to lead the country from recession to recovery and on to expansion. The charges which have been made by Opposition spokesmen that this Budget is merely flashy, bright and shiny are, in my view, quite false and misleading. This Budget is one of substance. It is going to wear very well. It is going to stand the test of time. It is going to produce the results which we all want. Therefore, I commend the Minister of Finance for the Budget that he introduced in the House last week.

This Budget was the product of very extensive consultation. The Minister spoke with many groups, interests and individuals across the country, as well as Members of Parliament. This consultative process means that we were given a Budget which is responsive to those representations which were made and is responsible to the needs of the country at this particular time.

When the Minister of Finance rose in his place last week to begin his Budget Speech we had a sense of confidence in what he was going to say because we knew he had not worked by himself in splendid isolation. He had been out talking to people who are deeply concerned about the Budget measures and the effect they have on the Canadian economy. The Minister had consulted widely. Therefore, when we heard the opening words of this Budget, we did not need to feel as did the composer of that old spiritual when he said, "Sometimes it causes me to tremble, tremble". There have been Budgets when that was the feeling on the part of many Hon. Members.

I would like to begin by thanking the Minister of Finance for the additional $150 million to the Youth Opportunity Fund. That is added to the $1 billion which has already been allocated to the Youth Opportunity Fund. I commend the Minister for opening the door to the possibility of greater productivity and better rewards for employees by encouraging profit participation plans. We are grateful to the Minister for his good housekeeping moves in simplifying the tax system for small businesses and for improving tax administration in general.

In his Budget the Minister recognized that above all Canadians today want a greater sense of security. He responded to that desire with his Mortgage Rate Protection Program. This is an incentive to home ownership. It means that a young couple wanting to buy a home will have some assurance that they will be protected against substantial increases in mortgage payments which have in the past, and could possibly in the future, be caused by extraordinary hikes in mortgage rates. That fear was a deterrent to home ownership which the Minister has now removed.

The Minister heard well those who spoke to him and demanded pension reform. Portability of pensions will help immeasurably to improve the mobility of the labour force in Canada. Permitting spousal survivors to retain their benefits upon remarriage is not only eminently reasonable, it is also humane, civilized and long overdue. It is also fair and just to have a provision allowing for the splitting of pensions between spouses in the case of marriage breakdown.

The improved tax assistance for retirement savings will appeal to owners of small businesses, farmers and professionals who are self-employed. Perhaps our medical doctors will see this as more than adequate compensation for having to give up the odious practice of extra billing. Being able to put away additional moneys in retirement savings plans will be of benefit to them. That extra billing will not then concern them so much. That is a practice which is prejudicial to those who have only modest incomes and become ill.

The Finance critic for the Official Opposition has focused the attention of the House on the size of the deficit. It is quite true that the deficit is cause for some concern. A deficit of the size which we have in Canada limits a government's capacity to respond effectively to new challenges. It restricts a government in designing programs to help solve new problems which may emerge. Deficits have a tendency to lock us into the past and foreclose on the future. Deficits call for the exercise of restraint wherever possible without hurting our citizens who are in need. Deficits such as we have in Canada today call for the maximum of efficiency in all our government operations.

We have a servant of the House who is quite capable of advising us on how to be more efficient. In his reports the Auditor General has indicated a number of ways in which the Government can enjoy significant savings and therefore help somewhat with the size of the deficit. Mr. Speaker, when there is a call for an all-out massive attack on the deficit, I think such a statement of public policy must be backed up with some hard facts. For example, if we wanted to spend much more money on national defence, give a great deal more money to post-secondary education, provide the provinces with more money for medicare, or significantly increase the expenditure directed to research and development, all of this while still trying to reduce the deficit, then we would have to ask ourselves where the cuts will take place.

During the recent recession, which was the worst setback for the entire western industrial world in 50 years, there were only two countries — Sweden and Canada — that maintained the so-called safety net. These two countries did not alter, cut-back or reduce their social security systems.

Today, governments in Europe are paring down their social programs. The provincial Government of British Columbia is following that example, as we well know from its recent Budget. As these cut-backs in social security measures are taking place around the world, there are workers, students, mothers, unemployed and disabled veterans who are taking to the streets in protest. I am proud to say that the federal Government of Canada rejected such an approach during the period of economic recession. We knew that recession impacted in a negative way most seriously upon those with the greatest needs. It is never easy and it is never inexpensive to hold back the tides of poverty.

Between 1969 and 1981, thanks to federal Government programs, the number of Canadians living in poverty was cut in half. Now, when there are wild charges made in the House that this is a Government that is profligate in its spending, that it spends with abandon and irresponsibility we should remember that the number of people living in poverty was reduced by 50 per cent. A lot of money had been spent but a significant step forward was taken toward having a much better society.

Regrettably, during the recent recession some of the gains that were made from 1969 to 1981 were lost, especially with two groups of people. One group was elderly single women. They lost ground and as a group in Canada today they are the poorest of the poor. That is why one of the very first actions of this Government, when it took office in 1980, was to increase the guaranteed income supplement by $35 a month. That is why the Minister of Finance announced last week another increase of $50 a month in the guaranteed income supplement for single pensioners.

Also hard hit were single parent families headed by women. I believe the time is at hand to consider very carefully whether we should do more targeting with our social assistance dollars. But that will have to be the subject for another debate at another time.

It is no easy task to launch a massive attack on the deficit. It is no easy task when so much of our spending is already locked in and there is so little—only about 15 per cent of expenditures by some calculations—that is actually discretionary.

Although many governments today, those in Europe and some of our provincial Governments, are being spooked by deficits, perhaps we should be more analytical and objective in understanding what deficits are. Professor Bellan of the University of Manitoba very recently wrote an insightful article in The Financial Post in which he examined how deficits are financed and what the effects of these deficits are upon the economy. With respect to deficits he reminded us that in order to finance its deficits the Government of Canada sells bonds. Thirteen per cent of those bonds are sold to the Bank of Canada. Eighty per cent of those bonds are sold to Canadian business firms and individuals. Only 7 per cent are sold to non-residents.

Since the Government of Canada owns the Bank of Canada, that bank returns to the Government all of its revenues minus its operating costs every year. That is the first point.

The second point is that Canadian business firms and individuals who buy these government bonds pay federal tax on the interest they receive. What they retain, they retain as Canadians and much of it is spent in Canada. Therefore, except for the small fraction of some 7 per cent that is received by non-residents, what Ottawa does not get back is not lost to Canada but is received by Canadians. So when we talk about deficits and the national debt, I think we have to keep in mind the geography in which these dollars are being circulated. We are not accumulating a huge international debt. We are not going into the hole with respect to our trading partners. We are providing the services that Canadians need within Canada itself and circulating the dollars among ourselves.

Nevertheless, it is still claimed that deficits have certain negative impacts upon the economy, such as causing inflation, sharp rises in interest rates and crowding out private borrowers from the money market. Professor Bellan tells us to look at the facts. From 1981 to 1983, the federal deficit increased significantly from $10 billion to $30 billion. Let us see what happened to inflation at the same time. It went from 12.5 per cent to 5.3 per cent, which seems to fly in the face of the proposition that inflation is caused by deficits. The average prime interest rates in Canada during that period went down from 19.3 per cent to 11.2 per cent.

There is no shortage of money for borrowers. It is true that there is not a great deal of borrowing taking place for expansion, but that is simply because the present plant capacity is sufficient to provide the demands that exist in the marketplace. There is no need to go into the market to expand when additional capacity is unnecessary.

Nothing that I have said should be misunderstood. Deficits cannot be argued or wished away, but the way to reduce them is to have an expanding economy, to control new spending carefully, and perhaps to redirect some old spending into some new areas of greater need.

One corporate citizen said recently, "Governments at all levels need to reassess their priorities and programs to determine those that are both necessary and affordable". That is a good and useful exercise at any time for any government.

The Budget of last April and the one presented to the House last week have enabled us to move from recession to recovery and now on to expansion. Recovery is surely under way. Woods Gordon of Toronto reported very recently that production levels have now reached beyond 90 per cent of pre-recession output. The surplus in our goods trade came in last year, in 1983, at $18 billion. What a great exporting and a great trading nation this Canada of ours is! That $18 billion is just a little short of the record we set for ourselves in 1982 of $18.3 billion in our goods trade surplus. So while output is coming back and we have a very healthy trade surplus, there is a negative aspect as well. Woods Gordon also reports that employment levels have not returned to the extent of production levels. They have only come back to the extent of 65 per cent. We have a more than a 11 per cent rate of unemployment and this means 1.5 million persons without jobs. That is why the Minister last week gave priority to job-creation programs. He added another $525 million for job-creation programs, which brings the total to $3.5 billion for the current fiscal year.

It is the job of a Member of Parliament to take a look at these programs and to make use of them. In my constituency I have met with representatives of companies, unions, municipalities, non-profit organizations, small businesses and social agencies. We have designed projects and submitted them under one or another of these many programs for consideration by the Government. Many of the communities have been helped by them. Thousands of unemployed persons have been given jobs as a result of these programs. These people are quite incensed, Sir, by charges from the Opposition that these job-creation programs are ineffective and meaningless. They are going to remember that when the polling booths are next opened.

To conclude, when the final vote is taken on this Budget, I will add my voice to the yeas because we have been given a good Budget. In my view, it is one that is just right for the times.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Are there any questions or comments?

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, this is a divisive Budget, a Budget that is irrelevant to the real needs of Canada and I am, of course, speaking against it. This Budget not only fails to deal with the massive inequities that we already have in our system, but it increases them through the large number of loopholes which benefit the richer members of our society. We will now have a few more loopholes. The Budget fails to deal with the most critical problem we have, and that is, the very high level of unemployment. There are 1.5 million to 2 million people unemployed. We even debate what the real number of unemployed is. Indeed, the budget documents project that unemployment will remain very high at more than a million people, for as many years as this Government has the courage to make projections.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) and other Liberal Ministers of Finance have based their policies on the belief that inflation is public enemy number one, that when inflation is beaten investment will rise, and with rising investment more jobs will be created. This has let Ministers of Finance off the hook in their minds about direct job-creation. Has the theory worked? Inflation has indeed fallen, but investment has not risen appreciably. Canada still has an enormous unused economic capacity. Why should corporations expand, invest and employ more people when they already have unused capacity right now? So we have a Minister who talks about recovery, but it has been a recovery in profits, not a recovery in employment when we have 1.5 million or up to 2 million unemployed. In polite terms this is a fragile recovery. In less polite terms, people ask: With a recovery like this, who needs recession?

The Budget pays lip service to the problem of youth unemployment. This is really tragic because the youth unemployment rate is very high, around 20 per cent. This rate is even worse than the rate for adults. There is the Youth Opportunity Fund, but this will give only one job per year to 1.5 per cent of the young unemployed. It is not as much as the Liberal slush fund is providing in jobs. It is less than the Minister of Finance found last year when he made his slip and let out facts about the Budget and then found an extra $200 million. Here only $150 million is added to this very critical area of unemployment. Further, it is largely a cosmetic kind of investment. It is to help the young acquire job skills. But where will the permanent jobs be once they have acquired these job skills?

The reforms in the area of small business are also rather cosmetic. A simplification of the system has been promised. Certainly we welcome any simplification which will make life easier for small business people. But most of the benefits which have been promised are not really for small business people but to expand the definition of small business to allow professionals, including very high income earning people, to qualify at a lower tax rate. We have doctors and lawyers, who would otherwise be at the 50 per cent tax level, coming in and paying at the small business tax level on only half that amount.

There is nothing for small business to create new jobs directly or indirectly. There is nothing similar to our proposal for lower interest rates for small business to facilitate expansion in an area that creates a very large number of jobs. Since the consumer taxes which were introduced last year are being continued, this will mean less demand for the goods and services which are produced by small business people. Therefore, small business people will be hit with declining demand. What incentive will they have to expand their businesses in these circumstances?

Instead of concrete measures to create jobs, we have a false analysis of the problem, and it is no surprise that we have false solutions to it. Consider the Minister's discussion of productivity, competitiveness and exports. These are high sounding words. Implicit in the discussion is a suggestion that Canada is not doing well in international trade. But in the last two years we have had record surpluses in trade which have amounted to very, very large sums indeed. We do very well with what we export, but we are not exporting the right things. The problem is not correctly understood. We are relying on natural resources, including items such as lumber, but a lot of these are non-renewable resources which are capital intensive and create very few jobs for the investment dollars in them. We are exporting very little in manufactured goods, and manufacturing is declining in our economy. This is the area where the most jobs are. There is nothing in the Budget to attack this problem.

We know that the main reason companies in Canada do not export is not low productivity but the fact that these companies are branch plants and not intended to export. Branch plants are intended to import from the parent company and other companies in the network. It is not a psychological problem that Canadians need to be encouraged by certain measures to be more productive, innovative and efficient, as the Minister suggests. The remedies of the Minister of Finance are therefore inappropriate. He suggests that workers must identify with their company and that a profit sharing scheme will help them to identify with the company more. The profit sharing scheme is one which means that employees who are covered would get 60 per cent, with 40 per cent going to the company. It would also end the practice of treating profit sharing as ordinary income. However, it is not the answer to the problem. It is not a lack of incentive that keeps these companies from exporting. It is the nature of the multinational system. The Budget does not even begin to address this problem.

At the same time, goodies are given away under stock option plans which are available not to ordinary employees but to management personnel, the best paid employees. The incentive for this is that only 50 per cent of the profits made under this system would be taxed. In other words, taxpayers are subsidizing to the tune of 50 per cent income which is going only to the very high income earners.

The unfairness of our tax system is increased in other ways as well. The amount of money that can be put into RRSPs is being tripled. Yet it is the high income earners who take advantage of this scheme. It is a regressive system. Higher income people take greater advantage than lower income people because it is based upon percentage. Of course, low-income people cannot take advantage of a deduction for an RRSP. Of individuals with incomes over $50,000 per year, 54 per cent have deductions for RRSPs, whereas only 12.6 per cent of other income earners have such deductions. There were $53 billion of assets in tax-sheltered RRSPs as at the end of 1982. That is expected to rise to $60 billion by the end of 1983. Enormous amounts of money are available in tax-sheltered RRSPs. They show who is able to take advantage of these benefits.

There are some good things in the Budget. There are some provisions which help low-income people. The increase in the guaranteed income supplement is one. The increase is not as large as we would have liked to have seen. It is $50 per month and it comes in two instalments; $100 per month had been recommended and $100 per month would certainly be better. However, no one will complain as $50 is better than nothing. It recognizes that single people cannot live at half the rate of a married couple. That point has been made for a very long time, especially by women's organizations that deal with the problems of elderly women. Still, with the Old Age Security and the guaranteed income supplement combined, people will be living below the poverty line. Single people who will be receiving this increase will, if they live in large cities, still be $2,000 per year under the poverty line. We should note, by comparison, the enormous benefits which will go to higher income earners who take advantage of the increased opportunities with RRSPs.

There are other reforms in the pension area about which I am very pleased. I am glad to see them. I have lobbied for these changes as an activist before becoming a parliamentarian. I have talked about them as a member of the Opposition. It goes to show that people in Opposition can get reforms through by arguing for them. These are improvements in the Canada Pension Plan that affect very large numbers of people. There are improvements for pensions under federal jurisdiction which affect 10 per cent of Canadian workers. Portability will be required in private pension plans under federal jurisdiction after two years of employment. Vesting will be required, and it will be possible to transfer the pension fund to another employer or to a registered pension account. There will be some protection against inflation. It only affects future pensions, but it is a step in the right direction. There will be mandatory survivors' benefits in occupational pension plans, certainly a very welcome step. There will be, under the Canada Pension Plan, a fifty-fifty split on marriage breakdown, unless both partners agree otherwise or a court orders otherwise. We should note that this is only for the Canada Pension Plan. The Minister responsible for the Status of Women implied this morning that she was in favour of this splitting occurring for all pensions under federal jurisdiction, but if we look at the Budget Speech, it does not say that. It should say that because the federal Government has the opportunity to act in this respect and it should.

Equal annuities for men and women is something which has been recommended for years. Women have obained lower annuities because they live longer. Of course, this is a very serious injustice about which women's organizations have fought for years, indeed for decades. More part-timers will be included in pension coverage. That is also a welcome step. There is a proposal to consider the inclusion of homemakers in the Canada Pension Plan. We certainly need very much a way of including homemakers in the CPP which is equitable and gives women the coverage they need.

I would also like to point out what the Budget fails to do in the area of pensions. The most important failure is not increasing the Canada Pension Plan or leaving it at the same level as it is now. The problem is that it does not pay a high enough benefit. It is a good plan, it has excellent features, but the amounts paid are still inadequate for people to live decently on their retirement incomes. It is the most important reform which could be made for all workers. Private plans do not provide adequate coverage. Too many people are excluded from coverage. Also they do not adequately provide coverage against inflation. The Canada Pension Plan-Quebec Pension Plan is the most important pension plan in Canada.

The Minister responsible for the Status of Women also discussed this matter this morning. She noted that the average woman worker on retirement—and I am not referring to the lowest paid woman worker—would still need the GIS and would still qualify for it. After the OAS and the Canada Pension Plan, she would still need the guaranteed income supplement. The Minister pointed this out as a way of congratulating the Government for increasing the GIS. However, this is looking at the problem the wrong way. Surely a woman who has worked her entire life ought not to need the guaranteed income supplement. Surely the Canada Pension Plan ought to be adequate to ensure that she has a decent retirement income. Surely the better response is to increase the Canada Pension Plan-Quebec Pension Plan.

In the area of maintenance, we can see that there have been some improvements, certainly ones about which women have been concerned for many years. They are modest improvements but they will facilitate the payment of maintenance orders. It will now be possible for payments made prior to a court order or to a written separation agreement to be deductible from the taxable income of the person who pays. The eligibility has been broadened to include deductions for mortgage payments, tuition fees and medical expenses. Since roughly 70 per cent of maintenance orders are in arrears, anything that would improve the actual payment of maintenance orders is to be very much welcomed. I am pleased to see this. I am sorry that we do not have much more comprehensive measures. I am also sorry that the Divorce Act which we will be debating tomorrow does not have comprehensive measures for maintenance payments which we need as well.

The Budget deals with the issue of collective bargaining in the Public Service. For the first time we have in the Budget Speech an admission by the federal Government that collective bargaining was suspended with the six and five program. We welcome the announcement that Public Service employees will again have at least partially restored to them their rights to collective bargaining. However, there is much hypocrisy here too. "We will bargain hard", says the Government. "There will not be catch-ups. The object of bargaining will be to reduce inflation", says the Government. In other words, there is a guarantee that wages and salaries will not keep up with the cost of living. Comparisons will be made with the private sector and will be kept behind the private sector. On awards made by arbitration considered excessive according to the criteria to keep inflation down, the Government will ask Parliament to legislate a wage settlement. In short, we have gone from having open wage controls to having a disguised form of wage controls. Certainly that is undesirable. We should be getting rid completely of these impediments to free collective bargaining.

Another measure which was suggested as a type of reform and is really not one is in the area of mortgages. There is a possibility of having mortgage insurance, but people have to pay for it, the fees are quite high and the coverage is very modest. There are also provisions which get rid of the ability to prepay with a modest penalty. People will have to pay, if they want to prepay their mortgages, the full amount of interest owing. These provisions are described as reforms, but they give further advantages to lenders. They do not give adequate protection to people who hold mortgages. It is far more important to have good protection by having long-term, low-rate interest guaranteed and settled.

An area against which I protest very vigorously in the Budget is the external aid program. It has been announced that there would be an increase in development assistance, as promised in the Speech from the Throne. However, this increase will not go where it needs to go. Development assistance will rise to 0.5 per cent of GNP in 1985 and to 0.7 per cent in 1990, although the United Nations recommends 0.7 per cent now, as does my Party. It is hypocritical to confuse aid and trade. What will happen with this new increase in aid is that it will basically go to Canadian corporations. There are no guarantees that it will go to the country of greatest need or that the people will be able to use it to buy local supplies or to use the money wisely. In other words, these are more give-aways to Canadian corporations. Because we are not addressing at all in this Budget the real problems that prevent Canadian corporations from exporting and competing fairly because of the multinational system, the Budget is totally inadequate. Aid should be aid. It should go where it is needed, it should be used as it is needed. Incentives to export should be frank incentives to export. They should not be couched in the form of aid.

[Translation]

If we are to make a very critical analysis of the Budget, we have to propose different initiatives. We in the New Democratic Party criticize the proposed Budget for what it fails to do rather than for what it actually does. What we need is a budget which comes to grips with the structural problems of the economy, with basic problems, therefore with the economic recovery. An economic recovery in Canada calls for investments in those economic sectors which will provide most jobs, such as manufacturing and especially micro-technology. It is imperative that we invest in natural resources—forestry and fisheries—where we have been blessed by nature and where we can increase the number of jobs. Housing is the economic sector where we can most quickly boost employment and, at the same time, try to solve a critical social issue, the shortage of low-cost housing. The NDP strongly advocates the withdrawal of the federal sales tax contained in the previous Budget. We are talking about a $1.4 billion increase, which amounts to that much less purchasing power for Canadian consumers. We want a reform in the system— .

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member, but unfortunately the time allocated to her has expired.

• (1610)

Ms. McDonald: Mr. Speaker, if I may have just a minute, I think I could finish.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Ms. McDonald: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview-Greenwood): We are calling for a tax reform that will make the rich pay a fairer share. There are now 8,000 individuals with revenues of $50,000 or more who do not pay one single cent in income tax, because of too generous loopholes in our tax system. In the United States, individuals whose income is over $30,000 must pay a minimum of 20 percent of their income. The corporate tax system must also be amended in order to help the Canadian economy.

Ten billion dollars is given away each year to corporations, in the form of grants or tax deductions. It would be preferable to require performance, in technical training for employees for instance or the purchasing of Canadian products, and new product research and development. In other words, jobs must be created here!

[English]

I oppose the Budget. It is irrelevant, it is divisive, and it should be defeated.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments?

Hon. Roger Simmons (Burin-St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to speak in support of this Budget because it is a good Budget. It is a Budget that is right for the times. It is a Budget that will help the economic recovery across this nation, which will mean jobs for Canadians. This is a Budget for the poor people of this country. This is a Budget for small business.

I recall another Budget. Indeed, it was a Budget that was brought down in this House just a few days after I first arrived here as a Member of Parliament. I sat then on the other side. I remember well that Budget because it was brought down by one of my bosom pals, my good friend from St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). I had watched him over the years in the provincial House of Assembly bring down many other budgets. I knew his style. I knew his record for delivery. I knew his record for practising what he preaches. Therefore, in late 1979 I watched with great interest that Tory budget.

It is interesting to compare those two Budgets, the Budget of 1979 and the Budget brought into this House in the last few days. How different are those two Budgets? To show just how different they are, I refer to a couple of publications which, in their respective terms, reported in headline form their summation of what those Budgets represented. If you look at the latest edition of Maclean's magazine you will see a headline which says of this latest Budget, "Lalonde keeps his Promises". That comes as no surprise to those of us who know the man. He has listened, he has listened hard, he has listened well, and he has delivered.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hesitate to interrupt the Hon. Member. There is a rule about quotations in the House. Members should be extremely careful in quoting newspaper or magazine articles. The words a Member quotes should be taken as being his own words. The basic reasoning for that word of caution is that only Hon. Members elected to the House of Commons express their opinions. If they choose to quote from newspaper or magazines, they make those quotes their own words. I say this, and I invite Hon. Members to exercise the privilege of quoting with extreme care.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I thank you, and I thank you particularly for the opportunity which your intervention affords me because I stand full square behind that particular headline, Lalonde does keep his promises.

There is another publication from which I want to quote, a quote which I will also stand by. I refer to a headline in The Toronto Star the day in December, 1979 when the Hon. Member for St. John's West brought down the Tory Budget. The headline that day, which quote I also take as my own and which I support because I know it to be the truth, read: "The promises go down the drain". That is not a Liberal MP writing the headlines; that is a Liberal MP reporting the headlines, one from Maclean's in which it judges the net substance of the latest Budget brought down by this Government and the other from The Toronto Star in which it judges the substance of the Tory Budget. One says the Budget keeps the promises that have been made and the one in 1979 says that the promises made by the Tories have gone down the drain.

What particular promises? If we are going to compare the two Budgets, we ought in fairness to recall some of what went into that 1979 Budget. We ought to recall also some of the promises preceding the bringing down of that Tory Budget by the Hon. Member for St. John's West. Before bringing down the Budget, the Tories had promised that there would be income tax deductions for middle and low-income families. They were very specific on that promise. They said there would be deductions of up to $300. However, the reality, Mr. Speaker, was that there were no such deductions. In the Budget of the Hon. Member for St. John's West there were no fewer than five separate tax increases. How is that for keeping one's promises?

In the fall of 1979, particularly during the campaign in May of that year, the Tories promised cut-backs in unemployment insurance rates. The reality was that the Minister of Finance of the day, the Hon. Member for St. John's West, actually increased those same rates which that Party had promised to decrease.

I could go on and on, but to save my time and the embarrassment of my good Tory friends, I will only refer them to The Toronto Star of December 6, 1979 where it was reported, "Tory promises have gone down the drain", then in table form it had shown the several promises which the Tories had made and how they had systematically broken every one of them in the Budget of December, 1979.

Those two publications, Maclean's and The Toronto Star, reporting on those respective Budgets, show the difference between a Tory approach and a Liberal approach to budget making. The present Budget, Mr. Speaker, is a good Budget, because it is a "jobs" Budget. It will create jobs for my riding. There is a lot of ballyhoo about where the jobs are going, and I want to tell Hon. Members of this House that a lot of those jobs are going to my riding of Burin-St. George's. They are going to people not on the basis of their partisan affiliation, but on the basis of a need for jobs. I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, that since this whole fuss started in the House, I have more Liberals in my riding now than I have ever had before. Some of them who had been offended during the last week to have been called Liberals by those Tory Members have said to me, "Because I have been a sponsor for a job-creation project in a particular community in the riding, am I now considered to be a Liberal? Is that my sin?" What they have done, Mr. Speaker, is to avail themselves of government programs in order to create some jobs.

Let me add to the scandal, Mr. Speaker. This Government is spending—and the Tories have not found this one yet—$50 million in one riding on a research facility. We are spending $15 million on a fisheries facility. Can you imagine that, Mr. Speaker? Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, when my buddies on this side of the House hear about that $15 million in one fisheries facility what they will say? How is that for porkbarrelling, Mr. Speaker, $50 million on a research facility and $15 million on a fisheries facility? How is that for porkbarrelling in two great Newfoundland ridings, St. John's East and St. John's West? The Tories conveniently forgot to mention that because that did not support their thesis, their muck-raking. There was $15 million for a fisheries college and $50 million for an ice tank research facility. But those Hon. Members opposite do not want to talk about that because that does not support their argument. That knocks the legs out from under their scurrilous allegation that somehow Liberals are looking after Liberals only. We were elected to be the Government of this country and we have created 50,000 projects across the country.

I will be the first to admit, to my Tory friends, Mr. Speaker, that that money would have been distributed even more equitably, even more fairly, if the Tories had been less busy muck-raking and more busy looking after the needs of their constituents. The example in Rosedale is a case in point. There is a facility operated by a particular religious denomination which was in need of some government funding. This facility has made a marvellous contribution not only in the riding of Rosedale, but in metropolitan Toronto, and has touched for the better the lives of many hundreds of young people outside of metropolitan Toronto. That organization approached a lady whose record of service to the poor and to the underprivileged is well known in Toronto. She happens at the moment to be a Liberal Member in one of the Toronto ridings, but the esteem in which she is held goes far beyond that riding. She was approached by that particular organization to see if she could tap some government funding. To her credit, the lady from York South-Weston (Mrs. Appolloni) did tap some government funding. Do we hear the Hon. Member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) congratulating her because she had the initiative to do something in his riding which he had neglected to do? Oh, no. We hear him making some cheap politics. I am not sure how that incident, by the way, squares with the argument that all the money is in Liberal ridings. That particular incident happened in the "temporary" Tory riding of Rosedale.

This is a good Budget, Mr. Speaker. Even the critics say that this is a good Budget. I will quote from an article in the February issue of Maclean's magazine by Dian Cohen, an economics writer. She says in part, and I quote:

—in fact, on almost every front Marc Lalonde's efforts were reasonable.

—poor, single pensioners will get a $600-a-year income boost. Self-employed wage earners and others without company pensions will have their RRSP limits raised. Child support and alimony payers will be able to deduct lump-sum payments. The unemployed will be welcomed back into the labour force by a provision that allows them to deduct moving expenses if their new job is far away. We will have pensions reform and mortgage interest insurance. Farmers working their farms and farmers wanting to sell out will get a better break. Small business will be better treated at tax time.

She goes on to say:

Every one of the dozens—

—the "dozens"—

—of suggestions in the budget is in response to a real concern of some Canadian special interest group. And many—if not most—of the suggestions make small-l liberal economic sense and are good for free enterprise.

These are the words of a very informed lady who has often said some fairly critical things about this Government. I regard those words as an important, dispassionate assessment of what this Budget is all about, because this Budget does make some small-l liberal good economic sense.

After the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) brought down his Budget, we were all treated to some vintage remarks from the former Minister of Finance, the Hon. Member for St. John's West. One of the things he talked about was the size of the deficit. Not only did he talk about the size of the deficit, but he talked about what he would do if he were the Minister of Finance, if the Tories were in power. The Hon. Member for St. John's West told us what the Tories would do. Let me tell you, as one who knows that gentleman inside out, Mr. Speaker, that he would do something. He is a man of his word. Take the Hon. Member for St. John's West at his word when he said he would do something. I watched him in another arena. I watched him at the provincial level when he was in Opposition. He made the same kind of criticisms then about the public debt that he is making now about the deficit. I remember how he pointed out to the Newfoundland people across the island, in Labrador and in the House of Assembly that the Liberal Government of the then Premier Joey Smallwood had taken Newfoundland from a surplus position in 1949 and had put it $900 million in debt in 22 years. He told us all that he would do something about that. He did, Mr. Speaker. He got his chance. When the Tories came to power he became the Minister of Finance. Two and a half years later, when he left that portfolio, I want the House to understand in fairness to him that the public debt was no longer $900 million—those big, bad Liberals had taken it from nothing to $900 million in 22 years—after two and a half years under his financial stewardship, the public debt was nothing near $900 million. It was $2.1 billion. The Hon. Member did something, all right. He more than doubled the public debt of the Province, single handedly, in about one-tenth of the time it had taken the Liberals. Take the man at his word, Mr. Speaker. He will do something about the deficit. He will drive it right through the roof.

I remember when the Hon. Member for St. John's West became the Minister of Finance in Newfoundland. One of the things he was very upset about was that the former Premier, Mr. Smallwood, had made what looked like a very sweet deal with Canadian Javelin. He had sold them two large dormitory buildings for about $350,000, two empty shells for $350,000. The Hon. Member for St. John's West though that was a small sum of money and that he could do better. He regarded that as a pittance, so he bought the buildings back. He paid $350,000 of government money and got the buildings back so that he could make more money for the taxpayers. He then put them on tender. He had trouble selling them but eventually he sold one for $1.

I could go on and on, Mr. Speaker. In order to understand where the finance critic for the Tories is coming from and how valid his commitments are, you have to understand how he delivered in the past. I have been watching him for a number of years—and he is a man you have to watch very closely. I have watched his rhetoric and his actions and every time, without fail, he does something—but I am not sure the taxpayers are any better off for what he does.

Who is this wise man from the East, Mr. Speaker? Is he as smart as he sounds? Yes, he is. Does he know all he says he does? Yes, he does. The problem is not how smart he is or how much he knows, it is the machiavellian things he does with that smartness which makes the country so ill served by his being in public life.

I hope, Mr. Speaker—and I shall work to this end—that the people of Canada never again have inflicted upon them the kind of performance that the Hon. Member for St. John's West is capable of. In Newfoundland we know through bitter experience how terrible that can be. We owe it to the people of Newfoundland and the people of all Canada to see that we do not have that kind of thing inflicted on us.

This is a good Budget, Mr. Speaker. It is a Budget I can support with a heart and a half. It will keep the economic recovery going. It is a Budget for the poor, a Budget for the jobless, a Budget to keep us back on the track to good economic recovery.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Questions, comments? Debate. The Hon. Member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga).

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, like the previous Member, I wish to compare this Budget with the Budget we introduced in 1979. My analysis will be somewhat different from that which the Hon. Member opposite just shared with the Chamber.

I think that the amendment we are debating and on which we will vote at 5.45 this evening bears repeating, Mr. Speaker. It reads as follows:

> This House regrets the failure of the government to present measures designed to reduce Canada's budgetary deficit, lower existing high interest rates, reduce crippling high levels of unemployment or to create meaningful pension reform all of which are needed as a result of years of government economic mismanagement and condemns the government for its continued misuse of public funds and arrogant maladministration which have led to a crisis in public trust and confidence in government.

I wish to review some of the things that the National Progressive Conservative Party has put in place so that when our friends opposite have the courage to call a general election and we have the opportunity to govern the nation, we will be ready.

Our Leader, the Hon. Member for Central Nova (Mr. Mulroney), has put together five very important task forces. One relates to job opportunities for Canada's youth, because traditionally unemployment levels for that sector of our society are twice the national average. We have positive recommendations on how to correct those high unemployment levels. We also have a task force relating to Crown corporation accountability. We plan to reform the legislation under which Crown corporations now function so that they will be accountable not only to Parliament but to the Canadian people. A third task force deals with productivity enhancement in the public and private sectors. We need to find ways to increase productivity in the country if we are to improve our economy. The fourth is something that the Budget touched upon, and that is, tax simplification. The complexity of the tax legislation and tax forms is something that needs to be changed. We will develop ways of simplifying both the tax forms and the legislation. The fifth task force will examine manpower retraining. At the present time the retraining programs in the country are inadequate. We want to develop the means of putting manpower retraining programs in place, ones that are functional and ones that will be suitable to all sectors of our society.

Just a short while ago we announced a comprehensive 10 point agricultural policy. A recent press release of the Hon. Member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) touched on that policy. As a national party we would eliminate the 9 per cent federal sales tax on farm fuels. We have a number of other significant proposals to regenerate economic activity in that very important sector of our Canadian society.

We have just gone through one of the worst recessions since 1930. In 1983, investment in the corporate sector was 12 per cent less than the year before. Canadian business is operating at only two-thirds of its capacity. Housing construction throughout the country has slowed considerably. Inflation has declined, however, and we give some credit to the Canadian people and to the Government for that, but it is twice as great as that of our two greatest trading partners, Japan and the United States.

I ask Hon. Members where those bright hopes we held for this country in the early 1980s have gone? I can recall a time when to live dangerously was of one's own choosing rather than a national Government policy. Unfortunately, this Liberal administration has adopted just such a policy. There is scarcely a difficulty that we in this nation face that does not have this Liberal administration's fingerprints on it.

Let us for just a moment look at the future as it relates to our Party. I just touched on the agricultural policy we announced. We put together five very important task forces which are to come forward with recommendations. We have indicated on a consistent basis that we as a national Government would reduce the budgetary deficit. We would simplify the Income Tax Act and reduce the unnecessary government burden on both the small business and the agricultural sectors. We will increase spending on research and development and on our Armed Forces. These are just basic principles, Mr. Speaker, and we are in the process of putting meat on the bone so we can restore economic activitiy in this great nation of ours.

Compare that with what we had on February 15. The Government promised us a plan to study mortgage insurance. One only has to look back to 1974 when the same Government promised us proposals where individuals could repay their mortgage without any type of penalty. To this date we have not seen legislation along those lines. There is a small business reform proposal; we have been pushing for that for years. I commend the Government for increasing the GIS, but here again the increase is only half that advocated by an all parliamentary group studying the pension situation in Canada.

We in this Party are deeply worried about our budgetary deficit because every dollar this Government proposes to borrow will simply go to pay interest on our national debt, interest only. That is like an individual borrowing on his Master Card or VISA to pay off the interest on a car loan he has at the bank. The deficit in this Budget is projected to be close to $30 billion. Our national debt is in the vicinity of some $200 billion; truly a sad legacy for the young people of this nation. I indicated earlier, Mr. Speaker, that we would simplify the Income Tax Act. Our Liberal friends opposite also have a way to simplify the Income Tax Act. The new Liberal proposal for the upcoming tax forms read like this:

Number 1: How much money did you make last year?

Number 2: What were your expenses?

Number 3: How much do you have left?

Number 4: Send your Liberal Government in Ottawa the item listed in Number 3.

Mr. Speaker, I have travelled this country a great deal in my role as the national President of our Association. Canadians are looking to us as a national Party to take corrective action when we do form the Government. We can justifiably point back with pride to the Budget we introduced in 1979. That Budget squarely confronted the economic difficulties we as a nation were facing. We proposed solutions based on sound economic management, and we offered policies which truly offered encouragement to those regions and disadvantaged groups throughout the country. We also offered encouragement and incentives to the private sector of our society. Our Budget of 1979 placed women in a position of equality with men in so far as working in family enterprises is concerned. We introduced an energy tax credit for those in the middle and lower income levels to meet higher energy costs. We had specific measures to help those in the agricultural and small business sector with high interest rates. We had significant capital gains relief for the farming population. To top it all off, we were reducing the Government budgetary deficit and Government spending. Yet the Social Policy Planning Board of Canada labelled that Budget the most socially progressive Budget introduced in Canada in the past ten years. More important than that, I wish to stress that we showed a deep sensitivity to the far flung regions of our country. That too is what the present Leader of our Party is doing. He has shown a deep sensitivity to the far regions and to minorities, be they ethnic, cultural or linguistic. That is why Canadians are looking to us to form the next government.

I am reminded of the time when President Reagan addressed this Chamber quite some time ago. He indicated that he likened government to a baby. He said it was an alimentary canal with a huge appetite at one end and no sense of responsibility at the other. Supposedly that is what we as Members of Parliament are to do, to return responsibility to our federal institutions. But, sadly, this Liberal administration opposite has not done that. Canadians are looking at us to restore that sense of responsibility. We give them that assurance, that we are going to restore economic responsibility to this great nation of ours.

On a few occasions I have referred to my parents coming to this country from Holland. They did so because this was a land of hope and opportunity. This was a land where one could work hard and reap the rewards. Again I stress to you, judging from the input I have been receiving from all across this country, that Canadians are looking to us to restore that hope in this nation. As all Canadians do, I love this country. I love the potential it can offer to us and to future generations. But this potential is being denied by an administration which appears to be uncaring.

Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, we in the Progressive Conservative Party are the only alternative to a Government whose actions are dangerous, have proved divisive and, quite frankly, corrupt. I have sensed a real wave of hope right from Prince Edward Island to British Columbia. That hope is directed at our Party because of the oustanding job the Leader of the Opposition has done and the outstanding way he has conducted himself in the House of Commons, even though there have been loads of sleaze thrown at him from Members opposite. He has shown sensitivity to the people of this country.

We on this side await an unprecedented opportunity not only to form the next Government but to move this country to its full potential. We hope we have this opportunity soon because we do have a great country, but we have a rotten Government. Our country is great because of the uncommon sense of sacrifice and commitment of ordinary people; their pride in their family, sense of community, respect for tradition and attachment to their regions. These are qualities of which great nations are built. These are qualities of which Canada is built.

I ask Canadians to remember one very important thing: A vote for the New Democratic Party is a vote for Mr. Trudeau and the Liberal Party. If you vote for the NDP, 10 times out of 10 you are going to get Pierre Elliott Trudeau. All one has to do is to look at the major issues we have debated in this Chamber, issues relating to energy and the constitutional debate, and then examine the defeat of our Government in 1979.

• (1650)

Mr. Keeper: You defeated yourselves. The people defeated you, and they will do it again.

Mr. Elzinga: That was on a motion by the New Democratic Party. The Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party held hands. They are sleeping together, and when the covers are pulled back they have a pillow fight, but when nobody is watching they pull the sheets over their heads.

Mr. Fisher: What you are saying is obscene.

Mr. Elzinga: My friend will have the opportunity to speak in a moment, if he wishes. I see the Hon. Member and cannot recall his constituency, but on a consistent basis he makes more speeches from his seat in the House of Commons than on his feet. We look forward to his participation later. If he does have any questions I will be more than happy to address myself to them.

Mr. Fisher: I have more interjections than the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) has speeches.

Mr. Elzinga: Mr. Speaker, the Budget of February 15 contained no major tax increases. It did not have to because the Budget which was introduced by this administration in April of 1983 covered all those tax increases, the majority of which are delayed. Many of these changes and extra charges are hidden. I would like to review a summary of those hidden changes.

I would like to look at the special recovery tax which was introduced in April of 1983. The federal sales tax will be increased by one percentage point for the period from October 1, 1984 to December 31, 1988. The new rates will be 6 per cent on construction materials compared to 5 per cent. The rate on alcoholic beverages and tobacco will be 13 per cent instead of 12 per cent, and 10 per cent instead of 9 per cent on all other taxable goods.

With regard to the federal tax reduction, the federal Government does not collect the first $200 of federal taxes payable. This tax break is being significantly cut. In 1985 the maximum tax reduction will be reduced to $100, and in 1986 and subsequent years to $50. In the case of those who pay federal taxes of more than $6,000, the tax reduction will be phased out completely starting in 1984. This will affect those with incomes in excess of $39,000. The phase-out formula will be 10 per cent of any basic federal tax in excess of $6,000. Thus, if your federal taxes payable are $6,100, your federal tax reduction will be reduced by 10 per cent of $100 or $10. The $100 standard deduction is eliminated starting in the 1984 tax year, with receipts now required for all charitable and medical deductions.

The income threshold by which the Child Tax Credit is reduced by 5 per cent for every $100 of household income will be deindexed at the 1982 level of $26,330. As incomes rise with inflation this will mean that fewer and fewer people will qualify.

The tax exemption for children and other dependants under 18 years of age has been deindexed at the 1983 level of $710 for 1984 and subsequent years. This is a hidden increase in taxes. The effect will grow over time as the gap between what the exemption would have been and where it is frozen widens. It will increase taxes for a typical taxpayer by only $11 in 1984 but by $59 in 1988.

The Canadian Ownership Special Charge is a tax of 4 cents a gallon. It was originally imposed as a temporary tax to pay for the purchase of Petrofina by Petro-Canada. It has been extended as a permanent revenue tax.

I would like to speak about unemployment insurance premiums. Details about this are buried in the Budget documents. Employment premium rates will rise from 2.3 per cent of insurable earnings in 1983-84, to 2.35 per cent in 1985, and then to 2.65 per cent in 1986 before falling to 2.15 per cent in 1987. In 1982, the rate was 1.8 per cent. The employer rate is 1.4 times the employee rate.

I see my time is up, Mr. Speaker. I thank Hon. Members for this opportunity to participate in this very meaningful debate.

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Member who has just finished speaking. He said a vote for the NDP is a vote for the Liberals. Is the Member aware that in the House the Conservative Party votes with the Liberal Party many more times than does the New Democratic Party? How does he explain those facts in the face of his assertions?

Mr. Elzinga: Mr. Speaker, I will return the question to the Hon. Member and ask him where his Party stood on the constitutional debate and the energy debate, and how his Party voted in 1979 to defeat a sound economic Budget which was presented to the Canadian people. On issue after issue the New Democratic Party and the Liberal Party have walked hand in hand. Mr. Speaker, there is no difference between those two Parties.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I was the guy interrupting the Hon. Member earlier. I should not have done that. He was quite right to remind me of proper decorum, and I apologize to him. I will ask him the question now rather than doing it in the middle of his speech.

As the former President of the National Progressive Conservative Party can he tell us why his Leader does not come to the House of Commons? Why does his Leader not ask questions in Question Period? Why does his Leader not participate in the debates here? All new guys take a while to learn things, but we do not run away and hide. Actually, we usually throw ourselves into the fray rather than running away from it. This guy seems to have stabbed the Hon. Member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark) in the back and left. Why is that?

Mr. Elzinga: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have the opportunity to respond to the Parliamentary Secretary. On a personal basis I have always appreciated visiting with him, but the sleaze and slime to which he descends in the House of Commons is not becoming to him.

Mr. Mazankowski: Nor is it becoming to the House of Commons.

Mr. Elzinga: As our Leader said, there is no belt below which individuals such as yourself will not kick. It is because of such an attitude that the Canadian people are going to throw you out so fast when you have the courage to call an election that it will be unreal.

Our Leader has an enviable record in this Chamber. On a consistent basis he has spoken on a number of major issues and has put questions to all Cabinet Ministers. The sad part is that he never gets a decent answer from anybody on the Treasury benches.

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Member who just spoke. Would the Member be sufficiently candid to acknowledge that the economic proposals which his Party often puts forward call for tax reductions, particularly with regard to the business sector? That is in fact what the Liberal Party has been doing, particularly in the last Budget. It handed out more tax loopholes to the business sector. In fact, the Liberals and Tories are the same when it comes to give-aways to large businesses and to economic policy. Could he explain that?

Mr. Elzinga: Mr. Speaker, I am more than happy to respond to that. There is no trust in the business community as it relates to this Liberal administration because, on a consistent basis, it changes the rules. There is no predictability for the business sector.

I would like to deal now with the Hon. Member's question as it relates to our economic proposals. As I indicated in my speech, the Budget we brought down was labelled the most socially progressive Budget introduced in Canada in the last 10 years. It was labelled thus by the Social Policy Planning Board of Canada. It indicated that was the most socially progressive Budget introduced in Canada in the past decade.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the gentleman from Pembina. My friend, the Parliamentary Secretary, got his answer. The gentleman from Pembina yelled about sleaze and dodged the question. I can understand his dodging the question, but he should not mislead the House. We all know the gentleman from Central Nova (Mr. Mulroney) makes an appearance here roughly once a week, other than for votes. Everybody knows that.

Mr. Elzinga: You already gave your speech. Ask a question.

• (1700)

Mr. Simmons: This period is for questions and comments, as I am sure the Member will realize. That is my comment. Now here is my question.

Mr. Mazankowski: Neither will make sense.

Mr. Simmons: I understand. I am quoting him so it will not make sense. The gentleman talked about sensitivity to the far reaches of the country. Then he proceeded to talk about the whole country from P.E.I. to B.C. Does he know that geographically, Newfoundland is east of P.E.I.?

Talking about sensitivity to the far reaches of this country, will he explain what sensitivity it was that constrained the Member for St. John's West in the December, 1979 Budget, to cancel, without exception, all small craft harbours fisheries expenditure in Atlantic Canada and the short-term job creation program? Would he explain that in terms of sensitivity to the people of this country?

Mr. Elzinga: Mr. Speaker, I am more than happy to engage myself in a debate with the Hon. Member who referred to himself in Question Period as the Member with the bionic mouth with no brain behind it. If I heard him correctly, that is what he called himself in Question Period earlier today. I do not have to speak on behalf of the man who was the Finance Minister for us in our short lived Government because he is very capable of speaking for himself. I just say to the Hon. Member that we on this side of the House of Commons will take a thoughtful and reasoned approach—

Mr. Simmons: Answer the question.

Mr. Elzinga: —to any policies that we advocate, unlike our friends opposite who will indicate one thing during an election campaign and immediately reverse themselves after the election.

We can point back to the 1974 election when they swallowed themselves on wage and price controls. We can point back to the 1972 election campaign when they swallowed themselves on the issue of indexation of income tax and pensions. They swallowed themselves as it related to the 18c. excise tax when they promised the people cheap gasoline and it is now five times the amount that we campaigned on.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, the Member illustrates exactly the point I was making. He does not understand what is happening in the House, including when his Leader is present or absent. Of course, my description can apply to only one person in the House, and it is not me nor the Member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga); it applies to the Member for St. John's West. I very distinctly said, as Hansard will show, that my good friend from St. John's West is the bionic mouth not attached to any known intelligent life form. I said that about him, but of course the Member for Pembina would misunderstand that as he misunderstands most things.

I spent the time in my speech showing how the Tories reversed themselves on a number of issues. I documented them. If he wants a full report, he should look in The Toronto Star. The Toronto Star documented it in 1979. He does not want to hear that because that is reality. He wants to engage in rhetoric.

The people of Canada, whether from P.E.I. or B.C. or the important part east of that are not listening to him, thank God.

Mr. Elzinga: Mr. Speaker, I am truly amazed when I hear an individual talk about reversal. The Canadian public is aware that, as I just indicated to the Hon. Member opposite, the Liberals have consistently swallowed themselves immediately after their election. They are deceitful in their approach and in what they indicate to the Canadian people during that election period. I indicated their deceit in 1972, 1974 and 1980.

I cannot see how an honourable person could be part of a Party that can swallow itself so readily just to be on the Government benches.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order. The Chair has grave doubts that this 10 minute question period was conducted properly. The Standing Orders are very precise about the reason for this 10 minute question period. I would like to quote from Standing Order 35(2)(b). It reads:

—following the speech of each Member a period not exceeding ten minutes shall be made available, if required, to allow Members to ask questions and comment briefly on matters relevant to the speech and to allow responses thereto;

This question period was not intended for mud slinging or the type of speeches that are more at home on hustings during an election campaign. I would like to remind Hon. Members that comments should relate to the substance of what was contained in a Member's speech.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The House is the master of its own fate. Could we have unanimous consent to continue our questioning so that we could come to the budgetary matters in our comments to the Hon. Member? Since he specifically is President of his Party nationally and a very important spokesman, I am sure he would not mind a few more questions about the Budget.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, it is very unusual for me to rise on a point of order. But in view of what has been happening here in the last few minutes, when the two hon. gentlemen from the other side saw fit to stand and do anything except discuss the Budget speech or the speech of the previous speaker and preferred to cast insults and aspersions on the Leader of our Party, I see no reason at all why we should give unanimous consent for them to continue on that course.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): The Minister of State for Finance (Mr. MacLaren) has the floor.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, we have before us today a motion which criticizes the Budget in four principal areas. It says that the budgetary deficit is too high, that the Budget fails to lower existing high interest rates, reduce unemployment or introduce meaningful pension reform. In the next few minutes, let me deal with one or two of these questions which have been raised.

In fact, we have a Budget which sets out the deficit for 1983-84 and 1984-85 in quite clear terms. It indicates the estimated level of that deficit for the years ahead.

However, the critics of the Budget tell us that that deficit is too high. The Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), among others, says that the deficit is too large. I question the criticism on the part of the Member for St. John's West, who is the finance critic for the Opposition, because he has told us that he would do the very same thing. He said that if he were the Minister of Finance he would have a deficit that is at least as high as the one that is in this Budget.

Let us not make any mistake about what he has said. The Member for St. John's West said that, "the present Minister of Finance had little choice this year except to plan for a deficit in the $30 billion range". That is what we have, a deficit in the $30 billion range. That is what he says he would have done as well.

He went on to say, "A big deficit this year is necessary to encourage economic recovery". That is a quotation from the Hon. Member. That is what we have.

I do not understand how there can be an Opposition motion before us complaining about the size of the federal deficit when the principal spokesman for the Opposition on financial questions says that he would do exactly the same thing.

The reason he would do exactly the same thing is quite obvious. We in Canada have passed through a period of real economic recession. We are on the way to recovery from that economic recession. Indeed, we are on the threshold of substantial growth in the time ahead. The Hon. Members opposite must recognize that during a period of recession there are social programs that must be sustained. The revenue of the Government diminishes during a period of economic recession. Tax revenue is not at the level it would be during a period of great prosperity, so we maintain the essential programs by deficit spending. We do so fully conscious of what we are doing. We do so because we recognize that Canadians must be sustained through a period of recession, expecially those who cannot provide for themselves. But our friends opposite tell us, I suppose they tell us—this must be what they are saying—"All right, fine. During a period of economic recession we see that there is a need for a higher deficit." The Hon. Member for St. John's West says, "Yes, a high deficit is fine for this year. If I were Finance Minister, I would have done the very same thing". At the same time, however, his colleagues, including his Leader, go about the country saying that they would spend more, that they would spend more on defence, more on transfer payments to the Provinces for medicare, for post-secondary education and for farm credit. One could continue.

Each of these proposed areas of increased spending is no doubt needy and could be beneficial to Canada in times of greater economic recovery. But let us be clear that such spending would result in a yet greater federal Government deficit. Other policies of our friends in the Opposition would increase the deficit even further. While they are calling for greater spending, they call equally for tax cuts. When they are spending more, they would have even less revenue and the deficit would grow even more. But our friends opposite say, "Wait a minute. That is not what we mean. We are going to cut out other things. We are going to increase defence spending, transfer payments to the Provinces, and we are going to increase this or that, but we are going to cut other things". What things are they going to cut? Presumably they are not talking about a little belt tightening or a little rejigging of this or that. They must be talking about very substantial numbers. Yet the Hon. Member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) tells us he would abolish, if he were in office, the press clipping service provided for Ministers and for the House of Commons. That is what I understood him to say. What does he think that is worth? A few thousand dollars? And he complains about the fact that the deficit is $31.5 billion this year. But his solution is to cut a little bit of press clippings. Or he tells us about the CBC. Apparently he does not like the CBC, so he will cut the CBC. What is he talking about? The CBC budget, if my memory serves me correctly, is somewhere between $600 million and $700 million.

Mr. Schellenberger: It is closer to $900 million.

Mr. MacLaren: What does the Hon. Member want to do? Does he want to halve the CBC budget and save, as it were, some $350 million or $400 million? Is that what the Hon. Member is proposing? Does he want to undermine one of the principal agencies in our country that gives Canadians a sense of their own identity, practices, traditions and history? Is that what the Hon. Member is advocating? What else does he want to cut? Does he want to cut support for our exports? Does he want to cut help for the neediest of the developing countries? Does he want to eliminate subsidies for rail and certain air services? What are these cuts that he wants? Does he want to cut incentives for petroleum exploration? One could go on, but the fact is that any such measures as the Opposition advocates from one side of its mouth, that of major reductions in our deficit, would bring very real hardship to the Canadian people. Let us make no mistake about that. No wonder the Hon. Member for St. John's West speaks about being "mean and nasty". He would have to be mean and nasty. Any Finance Minister would have to be mean and nasty to eliminate pensions, the UIC and transfer payments to the provinces if he really wanted to bring down the federal Government's deficit rapidly—and in a wholly socially irresponsible way.

That is unnecessary, Mr. Speaker. We have shown that in the April Budget and again in this Budget. There is no need for the vaunted meanness and nastiness which the Hon. Member for St. John's West advocates. What we need is a balanced policy of economic stimulation on the one hand and social responsibility on the other. Such broad approach, an equitable and balanced approach, was elaborated in last April's Budget. It is again here in this past week's Budget. The deficit for 1983-84 reflects that dual approach. The deficit is at the level we forecast last April. For 1984-85, as our economic recovery progresses and real growth is restored, we are forecasting a reduction of some $2 billion, a reduction in dollar terms of some 7 per cent in one year. As a percentage of the Gross National Product, it is a yet higher reduction. We are doing that. We set out our commitment. We are doing that in terms of the commitment we set out last April in the paper on the deficit which accompanied that Budget. We are going to strive to ensure that we keep on track, as we are now, that there is no future crowding out for private sector borrowing in our capital markets by government borrowing. At the same time, and I can assure you of that, Mr. Speaker, this Government will maintain support for those Canadians who cannot adequately provide for themselves.

Let me turn to the second point to which the Opposition motion refers which concerns high interest rates. We have had high interest rates in Canada, and so has every industrialized country, some higher than others. But every industrialized country, indeed every country in the world, has passed through a period of very high interest rates. What has happened in Canada? High interest rates have dropped. They have dropped substantially. Mortgage rates are down. Bank lending rates are down. The Bank of Canada rate, the fundamental rate in the country, is down sharply.

Mr. Blenkarn: Oh? Over a year ago the Bank of Canada rate was 9.43 per cent. It is 10.4 per cent today. You do not know enough to understand.

Mr. MacLaren: Not 14 months ago, Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Blenkarn: A year ago.

Mr. MacLaren: —interest rates in Canada were at high levels. Today we see them sharply reduced, to the benefit of consumers, to the benefit of investors, to the benefit of house owners. Through government policies and through the international decline in interest rates, we foresee further limits in the consumer price index. We have set out our forecasts with regard to interest rates in Canada. They are set forth in the fiscal plan. We see those rates gradually dropping over the next five years. Of course, the Budget document acknowledges that there is a risk with interest rate assumptions. They are based in part on further assumptions about government deficits in the United States and elsewhere. The assumption is that the size of the government deficit and interest rates in the United States will decline as a portion of national income. We are making that assumption. But it is an assumption that will be underpinned by actions here in Canada to ensure, to take an example, that we do not cause inflation by excessive wage settlements, or by the Public Service leading the private sector in the level of wage settlements. We have committed ourselves in this Budget, as we move out of the period of six and five restraint, to control the levels of wage settlements in the public sector. We have also moved to ensure that the administrated prices for which the Government has a responsibility will not exceed 4 per cent in the time ahead. These are direct action plans by the Government to help ensure that we do not, as a country, face high interest rates again.

As well, we have moved toward the real answer to high interest rates in so far as they are within our national control, that is, to increase productivity within our country to ensure that we in Canada become more internationally competitive. Productivity is the essential answer to inflation and to high interest rates. That is why we have put in place in recent months a national productivity centre which carries the full support of labour and business and why in this Budget we have offered, for example, a profit-sharing plan that can encourage workers and employees to take a greater share in the success of their own company, through their own hard work and their own efforts, and to benefit from greater productivity. These measures will help to answer the questions about the likelihood of higher interest rates in Canada.

The third problem with regard to the motion of the Hon. Members opposite today concerns unemployment in Canada. We have recognized quite clearly in the Budget that unemployment is at a very high level in Canada. There is no question of that. We are saying also that it will continue to be at a high level in the time ahead. None of us take any satisfaction in that. None of us rejoice in that fact. What we are saying is that we shall make every effort—we have been making every effort—to reduce unemployment in Canada.

Part of the difficulty with which we are faced in Canada is a growing work force. It is increasing at a rate which is unparalleled in most industrialized countries. As new jobs are created—some 400,000 additional jobs in the past 12 months or so—they are more than filled by those joining the work force. That is a challenge for us. It is certainly no cause for despair.

The Hon. Member for St. John's West during his amusing little speech the other evening castigated our unemployment forecasts in the Budget by comparing them to a fish on the beaches of Newfoundland, that it is "shiny on the surface but . . . rotten inside". In amending John Randolph's noted observation about a political opponent, the Member opposite might have asked himself to whom the full quotation could best apply, and I quote, "He was a man of splendid abilities but utterly corrupt. Like rotten mackerel by the moonlight, he shines and stinks". I digress for a moment merely to draw attention to the real applicability of the Hon. Member's use of John Randolph's observation.

In fact, the unemployment figures in the Budget recognize the economic reality facing Canada. To that end, the Government has put in place a comprehensive program to help economic recovery. I speak of course of the April 1983 Budget. In that Budget we designed a four-year effort, an effort which offered early capital spending by the federal Government and early increases in the training of workers to help ensure that the foundation is there for our further economic recovery. Half of the $4.8 billion under the four-year Special Recovery Program is being directed into Special Recovery Capital Projects. Those projects will have their main impact during 1984-85. In the coming fiscal year, $1.1 billion will be invested in public facilities essential to our future economic growth.

In addition to the Special Recovery Program, other government programs are providing direct employment and job training for Canadians. We have committed something over $2.3 billion for that purpose in the coming fiscal year. It is important that we keep these facts in perspective when we are talking about the support being given by the Government to the economic recovery. For example, the Budget announced that an additional $150 million is being allocated for the Youth Opportunity Fund. Some people have tended to lose sight of the fact that this is in addition to more than $1 billion for that fund announced in the Speech from the Throne in December. Altogether the Government is committing more than $3.5 billion in the coming fiscal year to Special Recovery Capital Projects and to direct employment support. That is about $500 million more than in the previous fiscal year.

The motion before us also castigates the Budget for absence of "meaningful" pension reform. I do not know what in this context the adjective "meaningful" means. It must imply that in some way it is thought that the pension reforms are inadequate or perhaps long in implementation. Let us be clear on what we are talking about. We are talking about fundamental issues which affect every Canadian and indeed every business in Canada. We are talking about protection against inflation for future pensions. We are talking about the provision of pension portability. We are talking about people being able to move their pensions with them, in a way that they have never had that opportunity before in Canada, as they move from one job to another. We are increasing the mobility of workers indirectly in that way, which can also bring indirect economic benefit as well as direct benefit to the individual. We are proposing broadened pension coverage for full and part-time workers, again in a way unique in Canada. We are proposing changes to the Canada Pension Plan which will require provincial concurrence, but will certainly bring about better pension coverage for Canadians. We are proposing changes in tax incentives for private pension savings which will help to put all pension plans on an equal basis for tax purposes.

In this way we believe that we are answering the need for Canadians to achieve greater security for their retirement years. We think that these policies will no doubt carry the broad support of Canadians. We are determined to bring them into place at an early date. We shall work with the provinces to ensure that all Canadians have meaningful pension plans in the time ahead.

The Budget before us has brought to Canadians a range of benefits, a range of initiatives and innovations which can only be of the greatest value to them as our economic recovery progresses and real growth is restored in our economy.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, would the Minister confirm that transfers to Crown corporations this year have increased from $3.767 billion to $4.618 billion, an increase of 22 per cent? Did the Minister not realize that the increases to the CBC were as much as $895.7 million; that EDC was getting $287 million; that Petro-Canada was getting $460 million, plus $60 million more for drilling off the coast of Jamaica; that the post office was getting $520 million, which was never provided before in budgetary figures; that Atomic Energy of Canada was getting $331.4 million; that CMHC was getting $1,345.1 million; that the National Capital Commission was getting $105 million for its parks and parkway belts in the City of Ottawa; and that the Cape Breton Development Corporation was getting $134.4 million? Will he advise the House that in his opinion none of these expenditures could be challenged or reviewed, that all these expenditures were perfectly proper and the kind of thing a Liberal Government would do and increase from time to time? It borrows money at a 10.4 per cent rate, which is significantly higher, indeed six-tenths of one per cent higher, than it was a year ago.

Mr. MacLaren: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member opposite has offered a whole shopping list of Crown corporations, some of which have had substantial increases in their operating budgets or their capital budgets. Others which he did not mention of course have not. Be that as it may, I hardly think it is for me to ask the Hon. Member what he is talking about. I must infer from what he says that he thinks that the Cape Breton Development Corporation is not a good idea. He must be telling us that he thinks the CMHC assistance for subsidized housing or lower cost housing in this country is not a good thing. Is he telling us that we should not make the investment in the Post Office to ensure that in the future we shall have better postal service in Canada? Does he wish to scrap Candu reactors and write off the investment Canadians have made in a high technology industry which is respected around the world? What is he telling us? Certainly we have had increases in the budgets of some of our Crown corporations. Those budgets are subject to review and analysis. We on this side of the House are satisfied that those budgets can play a major part in the expansion not only of the public sector activities which are assigned to them, but they can also be a vital catalyst in the further growth and expansion of the private sector.

The Hon. Member opposite questions the budget of the Export Development Corporation. Is he telling us that we should not be offering insurance guarantees and lower cost loans to purchasers abroad of Canadian goods and services? Does he wish us to withdraw from the international financial area? What is he talking about?

Mr. Schellenberger: Mr. Speaker, the Minister constantly gives the impression that there is nothing to be saved in these various Crown corporation budgets, that when they demand certain numbers of millions of dollars, that money can just be granted. In his speech he also gave the impression that there was no way to cut the expenditures of government that are leading to the $31.5 billion deficit this year, well over $25 billion last year and projected deficits in upcoming years of over $20 billion for each of the next four years. Is the Minister concerned about that? Is he saying there is no restraint available for these huge deficits? Is he not concerned about the lack of borrowing ability in the private sector because the Government is such a huge borrower and because of the effect that that may have on interest rates?

Mr. MacLaren: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member opposite perhaps did not follow the comments I made earlier to the effect that we set forth in the April 1983 Budget a plan for the gradual reduction in the federal Government deficit, both in dollar terms and as a percentage of Gross National Product. The Hon. Member is right that over the time ahead we shall see deficits in Canada remaining at over $20 billion. That amount as a percentage of our GNP, and indeed in absolute dollar terms, will diminish as our growth goes forward and the recovery is completed. Our deficit will be going down. One reason why we are committed to such a policy is that we do not wish to see the sort of crowding out that the Member has described. If you ask any of our financial institutions in Canada, brokerage houses or banks, there has been no crowding out. There has not been the demand in the private sector for massive borrowings which would be affected by the presence of the federal Government in the money marketplace. We believe that as recovery goes forward, and I refer the Member to the document with the April Budget, crowding out is a potential problem. That is one reason why we on this side are determined to bring down gradually the level of the federal deficit.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, the Minister began his speech, and I think I quote him correctly, by saying that we passed through a recession and we are now in a period of real growth. The fact is that we have 1.5 million unemployed. If one looks at the Budget papers and the projections of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde), he is projecting double-digit unemployment for the next number of years. How can the Minister argue that we have passed the recession when we have 1.5 million unemployed, when the projections of the Minister of Finance are that we will continue to have very large and unacceptable unemployment? Balance that against the fact that all the Government is proposing in the way of funds for job creation to try to help the 1.5 million unemployed is $150 million. At the same time the Government was able to propose tax incentives, particularly for upper-income people through the RRSP formula, which will cost the people of Canada in lost revenue four or five times the $150 million new money which the Government is prepared to put into job-creation programs.

Mr. MacLaren: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure from the last two interventions that we do not have a classic example of the difference between the Conservatives and the Socialists or NDP. Our Conservative colleague tells us we are spending far too much. He presumably would want us to cut out some of the social spending. I do not know how else you could sharply reduce the deficit without doing that. On the other hand, our friend from the New Democratic Party says that we are not spending enough, that we should be spending far more, that we should somehow spend our way out of recession.

As usual, the Liberal Party is in the centre, in the right place, in the equilibrium position. What we are doing, of course, is providing on the one hand, as I noted in my speech, substantial support for the unemployed for retraining and direct employment. As I pointed out earlier, we are adding a $150 million allocation for the Youth Opportunity Fund. That is in addition to the $1 billion for that fund that we announced in the December Speech from the Throne.

The Member opposite overlooks an essential fact, as our colleagues from the NDP often do, and that is, what we must do to stimulate greater productivity in our country. We are not talking merely about redistribution of income. We are talking about the creation of income. The creation of income will be assisted by the sort of incentives that we put in place for the business sector in the April Budget and in this Budget. The Member opposite must surely be aware that the research and development incentives, the tax carry-forwards—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order. The question period has now elapsed. We will now resume debate.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Members opposite are always asking for more opportunities to raise issues and to question the Minister. He is doing very well now. I might ask the House for unanimous consent to continue asking questions.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): There is not unanimous consent. The Hon. Member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski).

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, we really did not learn all that much from the Minister's speech. The exchange in the question period was perhaps a little more productive. It seemed that the Minister was quite apologetic about this Budget. I guess we can sympathize with him. He admitted that the Government does not have the answers to the economic ills that face this country. He admitted, albeit in a roundabout way, that this Government lacks economic leadership. The point has been missed time and again that over the last 15 years this Government really has not changed. Whenever there is a problem, it merely wants to throw money at it in the form of another alphabet soup program. That is really what it expects to do. Rather than providing the incentives and the kind of environment which would be conducive to growth and productivity, it simply creates another government program, put a fancy title to it, and say, "Here, go get it boys". If the Liberal ridings are a little more aggressive, they will get more than their fair share.

What we really need in this country is an admission that we have some very natural strengths. We have built this country on some very basic, natural strengths; agriculture, forestry, fisheries, energy, mining, and a whole host of things. But what has happened is that every one of these industries is in trouble because of the economic policies of this Government. What we need in this country is stimulation of these industries, greater productivity, and the production of more high quality products at lower prices. That way we can generate new health in this country.

We certainly do not argue with the theme which is contained in this Budget. The theme is great, except that there is nothing in the Budget which will help to achieve that kind of feeling of optimism and confidence, nothing which will encourage greater productivity and opportunities for individual Canadians.

The Hon. Member for Burin-St. George's (Mr. Simmons) delivered what I would consider to be a scathing personal attack on the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). He unleashed a litany of insults and innuendo which quite clearly demonstrate, I believe, the lengths to which some Hon. Members will go and the desperate methods they will use in dealing with the integrity of Hon. Members of this House. The Hon. Member also posed as an expert on deficits. He really admitted that he was not an expert on deficits in the federal domain. He talked about the experience he had in the Newfoundland legislative chamber, again attacking the Hon. Member for St. John's West. He refused, Mr. Speaker, in the course of his comments, to deal with the deficit problem we have right here in this country, which emanated essentially from the work of this Government. The fact of the matter is, Mr. Speaker, that if you look at the record you will see that when this Government came into office under its current Leader, we had a gross debt in this country of some $31 billion. Today, at the end of this fiscal year, the gross debt will be $190 billion. In terms of net debt, when this Government came into office under its current Leader, there was a net debt in this country of $17.7 billion. At the end of this fiscal year, March 31, 1984, the net debt in this country will have reached $150.7 billion. We all know that the percentage of government expenditure is rising very dramatically. As a percentage of GNP, the Government expenditure was something like 21 per cent four years ago. It is now approaching 26 per cent.

The current Leader of this Government promised in 1980 that Government would keep the level of expenditures on a consistent basis with that of the then current percentage vis-à-vis the gross national product. Since 1968, Mr. Speaker, there has been only one balanced budget. What about the future? We have a $31.5 billion deficit at the end of this fiscal year; $29.6 billion for next year; $27.9 billion for 1985-86; $27.1 billion for 1986-87 and $26.1 billion for 1987-88.

Mr. Blenkarn: That is if you believe its projections.

Mr. Mazankowski: Yes, that is if you believe its projections. And this $31.5 billion deficit was to have been $11 billion—

Mr. Blenkarn: That's right.

Mr. Mazankowski: —as estimated by the former Minister of Finance. Therefore, the problem, Mr. Speaker, is that this Government has no credibility. No one trusts it. No one believes it. The only way we will restore confidence in this nation is to bring in a brand new Government, and it will be a Progressive Conservative Government. Only then will the country be really working.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order, please. It being 5.45 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 65(7), to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith any question needed to dispose of the amendment now before the House.

[English]

The question, therefore, is on the amendment. Mr. Crosbie, seconded by Mr. Hees moves:

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "That" and substituting the following therefor:

this House regrets the failure of the government to present measures designed to reduce Canada's budgetary deficit, lower existing high interest rates, reduce crippling high levels of unemployment or to create meaningful pension reform all of which are needed as a result of years of government economic mismanagement and condemns the government for its continued misuse of public funds and arrogant maladministration which have led to a crisis in public trust and confidence in government.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): In my opinion, the nays have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Call in the Members.

AIRPORTS

ZONING REGULATIONS AFFECTING FARMERS' SILOS AT CHATHAM AND HAMILTON, ONT.

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, let me tell you a story about two farm silos. One is located in the flight path at the Chatham, Ontario, airport. The other silo stands in the flight path at Mount Hope, in my riding, where Hamilton Civic Airport is currently undergoing expansion.

My constituent, Mr. Joseph Popper, last year received authorization from Transport Canada and the Municipality of Glanbrook to erect a silo in accordance with Hamilton airport zoning and height restrictions. Several months later the Department of Public Works claimed that Joe Popper's silo violates the height in feet above mean sea level. Although local pilots have indicated no problems or any incidents in the area, Mr. Popper has now been ordered to take immediate action to remove about 10 feet off the top of the silo. That would mean a very heavy financial burden for the Poppers, who are understandably upset that they had acted in accordance with Transport Canada and the Municipality of Glanbrook height regulations in the first place.

We switch you to the controversial silo at Chatham, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Axworthy) has agreed to solve that problem after meeting with the Hon. Member for Kent (Mr. Bossy) and the Mayor of Chatham, along with Transport Canada officials.

Meanwhile, at Mount Hope, my office, Glanbrook Mayor Don Weylie, and Joe Popper, have yet to hear from Transport Canada, despite repeated attempts during the past several weeks to work out a compromise similar to Chatham airport.

Farm silos are not porkbarrels. After what we have been through this week about government favouritism toward Liberal ridings, I sincerely hope the Minister of Transport will rise above treating these situations as first and second class silos.

INCOME TAX

TAX ON TIPS EARNED BY WAITERS AND WAITRESSES

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, there are 600,000 Canadians who work as waiters or waitresses throughout Canada. Most of them receive minimum wage, or a little more, and supplement their low wages with the tips they receive.

Recently Revenue Canada has begun to enforce a rule that they must pay income tax, not just on their wage but on their total income of wage and tips. However, when they pay their unemployment insurance premiums and Canada Pension Plan, it is done on the basis of the lower wage. When they are unemployed they receive unemployment insurance benefits at the lower rate, and when they qualify for Canada Pension they will get it at the lower rate.

I call on the Government to change the laws and regulations so that, if these people must pay income tax on their total income, they will also receive benefits based on their total income.

POLITICAL PARTIES

SOCIAL SECURITY—POLICIES OF LIBERAL AND PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE PARTIES

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South-Weston): Mr. Speaker, according to the National Council on Welfare, the poverty rate in Canada has declined sharply since 1969. The report states that, among families headed by people over 65, the percentage living below the poverty line dropped from below 41.4 per cent in 1969 to 11.7 per cent in 1982. The National Council on Welfare credits improvement in the quality of life to such government programs as the Old Age Security Pension, Guaranteed Income Supplement, and the Canada Pension Plan.

Perhaps there can be no greater testimony to the effectiveness of the Government of Canada under the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) than the dramatic improvement in the quality of life for so many Canadians.

The Liberal Government has done much, and it realizes much remains to be done. That is why Canadians have never heard Liberals make remarks like those in 1976 of the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney), who called for a five year moratorium on increased social spending, or of the former Leader of the Opposition who, as Prime Minister, told Canada's elderly that they would have to endure the effects of inflation until the economy improved. That was Tory policy in 1979.

An Official Opposition that now calls for the Liberal Government to increase the GIS is the same Tory gang who would not, not could not, increase the GIS in 1979.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Unfortunately, the Hon. Member's time has expired.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LAY-OFFS AT BLACK AND DECKER PLANT IN BROCKVILLE, ONT.

Mrs. Jennifer Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Mr. Speaker, in his Budget Speech a week ago the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) stood in this House and whetted our appetites with proud promises of lasting economic recovery and sound fiscal policies. He said:

In my April Budget, my goal was to secure the recovery. That goal has been met.

I would ask the Minister how can he justify that statement when just last Friday 110 employees were laid off at Black and Decker in Brockville, Ontario. This is a responsible, sound firm, that has provided 700 local residents with secure employment for over 25 years.

In announcing these lay-offs, the company president stated the signs of economic recovery last spring had caused them to anticipate a higher volume of sales than actually materialized when the economy failed to recover as the Minister predicted in his April Budget.

The Government has failed these employees with its promises to secure economic recovery and job stabilization. Government spending grew almost 10 per cent last year, well over its own six and five guidelines imposed on Canadians to reduce inflation. The message was obviously "Do as I say, not as I do".

The Finance Minister's Budget Speech, full of rhetoric and encouragement, held little for these recently unemployed Canadians in my riding.

EMPLOYMENT

SPECIAL EMPLOYMENT INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL FUNDS FOR SPECIAL PROJECTS

Mr. André Maltais (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I referred to the funds allocated by the federal Government for job creation, and I mentioned several projects in my riding which would deserve special attention from the Government.

I have received an incredible number of telephone calls from constituents asking the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) to reinstate special funding for ridings affected by unemployment, whether these are Liberal ridings or not.

Mr. Speaker, in Baie-Comeau they are still asking for a harbour master's office and harbour facilities, as special projects. In Franquelin and Godbout, they want boat ramps and repairs to small harbours, while in Baie-Trinité they are asking for a harbour and facilities at Petit Mai which have yet to be completed. At Pointe-aux-Anglais they want community facilities; Port-Cartier is asking for relocation of a pier, plus I.T.T. installations. It is the same in Sept-Îles, with Phase III of the industrial park, and, Mr. Speaker, I could also mention Rivière-au-Tonnerre, Tête-à-la-Baleine or St-Augustin, La Tabatière, Blanc-Sablon and Gagnon, plus the airports at La Romaine, Tête-à-la-Baleine and Kegaska. The point I am trying to make is that the unemployed will never get enough money from our governments to put them back to work, and most of the people who called me in my riding have asked me to condemn in public the attitude taken by the Opposition Parties who are indulging in petty politics at the expense of the unemployed.

SOCIAL SCIENCES

BUDGET OF SOCIAL SCIENCES AND HUMANITIES RESEARCH COUNCIL

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, the self-congratulatory press release of the Department of Communications of February 16, 1984, misleads the Canadian public. It suggests that the base budget of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council will increase by $2 million to almost $59 million in the financial year 1984-1985. In fact the budget of the Research Council will be substantially reduced. A previous allocation of $5.9 million for Canadian studies will not be renewed. The Government's magic arithmetic, as the Canadian Association of University Teachers calls it, gives the Council an increase of $2 million, but really it loses $1.2 million.

This sleight-of-hand is taking place at a time when millions of dollars are available at the whims of Liberal MPs, but post-secondary education support is being attacked under the six and five formula.

The Social Science Federation of Canada affirms that most major problems are both social and economic. More, not less, research is needed. High technology is impacting on the job market, especially for women. Prostitution, pornography, and visible minorities, are all being studied by separate and expensive commissions. Why, I ask, is the Government setting up costly parallel mechanisms for research, and refusing to introduce a five-year plan for research in the social sciences and humanities?

NATIONAL REVENUE

POWERS OF DEPUTY MINISTER

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue who will know that today's press contains reports of growing signs of Liberal back-bench revolt against the lack of ministerial control over the Department of National Revenue. Does the Minister of National Revenue agree with his various colleagues who have spoken to the press in the past two days to indicate that they feel his Deputy Minister has too much power and that the Minister himself does not have adequate control over his own Department?

• (1115)

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have, on several occasions, discussed with my caucus colleagues any problems they may have had with my Department, and I have also done so with Members of the other Party caucuses in this House.

Nevertheless, I would like to point out to the Hon. Member that it is my responsibility and that of my officials to work together and co-ordinate our efforts in order to provide equitable administration of the Income Tax Act, and that is our objective.

[English]

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, you will note that the Minister again avoided answering the question of whether or not he agrees with his own colleagues who are attacking his Deputy Minister as having too much power and saying that the Minister does not have enough power.

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION DEALING WITH DEPUTY MINISTER'S POWERS

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, two days ago the Minister's colleague, the Hon. Member for Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke, introduced Bill C-220. The whole purpose of that Bill is to strip away the legal authority to give the Deputy Minister powers similar to those of the Minister of National Revenue. Does the Minister support the Bill introduced by his back-bench colleague, which is designed to curtail the powers of his Deputy Minister?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the Bill has been tabled in the House, and as soon debate starts on the Bill, the Hon. Member will have an opportunity to find out the Government's position.

[English]

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, you will note that again the Minister has refused to answer a direct question.

MINISTER'S POSITION

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, The Toronto Star has reported that when the Liberal caucus was in revolt on Wednesday and a succession of Members—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Beatty: —rose to attack the Deputy Minister and to demand his resignation, the Minister sat silently by refusing to take any position one way or the other. I want to know what is the Minister's position. Does he defend his Deputy Minister, or is he prepared to go along with demands from his caucus colleagues that the Deputy Minister be replaced?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member says I am not answering his questions. Actually, in my answer to his first question, I answered the question he put to me just now. My responsibility and that of my officials, including Deputy Ministers, Assistant Deputy Ministers, Directors and Supervisors, is to work together in order to provide for sound and equitable administration of the Income Tax Act. That is our objective.

[English]

TRAINING FILM FOR AUDITORS—OFFER TO SCREEN EDITED VERSION

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the same Minister. Last month an application was made to the Minister's Department by the Hon. Member for Saskatoon West with respect to viewing the training film for auditors called "The Investigative Approach to Auditing". By letter of February 15, signed by Mr. Twolan of his Department, access has been denied to the original film, but an edited version has been prepared for his viewing.

Has the Minister personally viewed this film? Did he personally make the decision to give an edited version of the film to Members, or was it just his departmental officials, as indicated in the letter of February 15?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is short and to the point. The question was: Did I see the film? The answer is: Yes. The second part of the Hon. Member's question was: Did I personally ask to have changes made in the film? Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the Hon. Member read carefully the provisions of the Access to Information Act, which provides under what conditions and circumstances records are to be made available to individuals requesting access. If I am not mistaken, departmental officials gave the Member for Saskatoon West a reply, in accordance with the letter and the intent of the Access to Information Act.

[English]

Mr. Beatty: Four questions, four evasions.

ACCESS OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT TO FILM

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, the Minister has acknowledged that he has personally viewed the film. Would the Minister tell us what is in the film that Members of Parliament cannot see with respect to the attitude of the auditors? What is it that is being cut out? What is it that is being covered up? What is it that we cannot see?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is showing contempt for the laws passed by this Parliament. If his ignorance or bad faith or blind partisanship did not prevent him from doing so, he would have taken the time to read the Access to Information Act, where he would see that under the provisions of this Act, the Department may protect certain kinds of information. I do not know what was taken out, but I do know that the officials who gave the Hon. Member access to the film did so in accordance with the letter and the intent of the Act.

EMPLOYMENT

SPENDING ESTIMATES FOR JOB CREATION

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The Estimates which were released on Tuesday indicate that the Government has cut spending on job creation by $172 million. According to the Government's own criterion of roughly $4,000 per job, the loss of this money will cost 42,000 jobs. How can the Minister justify cutting funding for job creation at this time of very high, crisis level, unemployment?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman may be miscomparing figures. He was not exactly clear what comparison he was making, but I do not think that the facts will bear out that there was a cut of the kind he has described. What he may be doing is comparing the Main Estimates which were presented a few days ago, but he must remember that, as the fiscal year goes on, those Main Estimates are increased by Supplementary Estimates. It may be that he is comparing apples and oranges and not comparing one set of Main Estimates with another.

BUDGET PROPOSALS

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Mr. Speaker, what I am pointing out is that the Estimates cut funding for job creation by $170 million. The Minister may promise money down the road, but the unemployed need that money today. The Budget added 40 per cent to the PIP grants, which is another $450 million for the oil companies. How can the Minister give $450 million to the oil companies, which is less than he put in the Budget for the unemployed? How can he justify that at this time of unemployment?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have two comments. If indeed in the Budget there was an increase of funding flowing toward the problem of the unemployed, particularly young people, and if the Member does a fair comparison of our expenditure projections, he will find that we are not cutting back funding for job creation.

In so far as the PIP grants are concerned, this is a question which should be directed to the Minister responsible, and not to me.

OUTREACH PROGRAM FUNDING

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Mr. Speaker, the Estimates also indicate that the Minister is cutting funds for the Outreach Program by some $5 million, which will be a loss of 25,000 placements. How does the Minister justify slashing the Outreach Program, which has helped disabled Canadians and those who lack job skills? Is he simply taking advice from the former Conservative Finance Minister who said over the CBC this morning that a Conservative Government would cut job-creation funding?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, that may very well be the view of the Conservative Party. It is not our view. The basic answer to the Hon. Member's question is the one which I gave to him earlier, that what he must look at is not the expenditures last year in comparison with the Main Estimates. He must look at the figures which respond to the Main Estimates as we go through the year with the Supplementary Estimates added. He has to make a fair comparison and compare the same things, not different things.

FINANCE

EFFECT OF TAXATION ON DISTILLING INDUSTRY

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance I will direct my question to the Minister from Etobicoke North. On February 6 I asked the Minister of Finance about excessive taxation on alcohol products and lost jobs in the distilling industry. In his holier than thou reply, he said that declining sales were the result of decreased consumption by Canadians, a trend we should applaud, and that the excessive taxation was due strictly to the taxation by the Provinces. Does the Minister accept this government reply?

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister of State (Finance)): Yes.

• (1125)

MEMBERSHIP OF TASK FORCE

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Mr. Speaker, in a letter dated February 20 from the Minister of Finance he points out to all government Members how to answer their constituents and shareholders in the distilling industry. He explains his great concern that the federal share of revenue from alcohol has dropped from 41 per cent to 31 per cent, that a task force has been established to look into the matter, that they will consider alternatives which meet the objectives of both the industry and the Government, and that meetings of the task force are under way. He says further that he trusts his remarks will be helpful in replying to their constituents.

What about our constituents, Mr. Speaker, and the jobs lost to the people we represent in this industry? I would like to know who is on the task force, how often have they met, what are the objectives, and will we on this side have input, or will it be like the Local Initiatives Employment Program?

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the task force is chaired by a vice-president of the Toronto Dominion Bank, Doug Peters, who is currently on loan to the federal Government. The members of the task force have been nominated and supplied by the associations most directly involved in the question. They are currently reviewing the situation. The Member opposite, indeed any Member of the House, or for that matter any Canadian, is welcome to make his or her views known to the task force. I am sure the task force will want to take those views into account.

The task force is charged with a broad review of the industry and of fiscal policy as it affects the industry. It will, of course, address the question of the proportions of taxation represented by provincial Governments and the federal Government. It will address the question to the impact of taxation policies at the federal and provincial levels on the further growth and development of the industries affected. If the Hon. Member wishes to make his contribution, I am sure the task force would welcome it.

FISHERIES

GEORGETOWN SEAFOODS PLANT—SCHEDULED ANNOUNCEMENT BY MINISTER

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Fisheries my question is directed to the Acting Minister. Last Friday my good friend, the Minister of Veterans Affairs, stated in Prince Edward Island that within a week the federal Governmemt would be in a position to announce the details of the reopening of the Georgetown Seafoods plant in Prince Edward Island. Since that week is now up, I wonder if the Acting Minister would be in a position to share with the House the details of that reopening.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, I think I can answer the question. I am aware that the Minister of Fisheries is working on that subject very, very intensely. I am aware that he is going to live up to the commitment he has made, and that he will inform the House as soon as he can.

REQUEST THAT ANNOUNCEMENT BE MADE IN HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, although it is apparent that the Acting Prime Minister does not have a clue about the question posed to him, I wonder if he would, nevertheless, assure the House in the name of fairness, if nothing else, that such an announcement will be made in the House of Commons to Members who have been asking questions about this for the last two years, rather than in the forum of a partisan function on Prince Edward Island before only Liberal Members in Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of External Relations): Mr. Speaker, every Minister has a choice to make when he has news to announce, particularly when it is good news. I will bring the representation made by my hon. friend to the attention of the Minister of Fisheries.

IMMIGRATION

HEAD TAX IMPOSED ON CHINESE IMMIGRANTS

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. From 1885 to 1923 the Canadian Government levied a discriminatory and racist head tax only on Chinese immigrants. This was followed by complete exclusion of any Chinese immigrants until 1947. In order to make amends for this shameful period in our history, and to recognize our new Charter of Rights which should prevent such future discrimination against ethnic minorities, will the Minister forward a request to the Prime Minister asking that he, on behalf of Canada, formally acknowledge these injustices to Canadians of Chinese origin?

• (1130)

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time I have heard about this one. I learned yesterday about Baltic Consuls and things of that kind. My education is progressing. I will look into that particular matter. I would believe, however, on the face of it, that the legislation on human rights is not retroactive. However, I will look into the matter and see if a more generous approach could be taken.

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, I was asking Canada to apologize to the Chinese at this point in time. I was not asking for retroactivity of legislation.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT PAY COMPENSATION

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): My supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Justice, on this same matter. Perhaps he would also consult with the Prime Minister. Since last Chinese New Year, when I called on the Canadian Government to compensate persons who have paid the discriminatory Chinese head tax, a number of elderly Chinese people from all over Canada have come forward with tax receipts. The Chinese community as a whole is most interested in this, as a symbolic gesture. Would the Minister be prepared to investigage the possibility of compensation for the few remaining survivors who paid this discriminatory head tax? Would he also ask the Prime Minister to convey our apologies on behalf of Canada?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we will certainly give very full consideration to that request. As I am sure the Hon. Member knows, the Charter, which we are all happy to have, is prospective in its application, and for any kind of consideration to be given to the past this requires that we establish a new policy for that period. I know that the Hon. Member appreciates that we cannot really rewrite the whole of Canadian history. There have been many kinds of injustices committed by many groups, and suffered by many groups. We cannot undo all of those things which have happened in the past, but we can, at the very least, make a resolution that they will not happen again. In selected cases we can also look at the past, as the Hon. Member has suggested, and I undertake to do that.

NATIONAL REVENUE

ACCESS BY ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE TO DEPARTMENTAL FILES

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue.

[Translation]

Could the Minister tell the House whether, by virtue of the agreement entered into by the Solicitor General and his predecessor, the Hon. Member for Sarnia-Lambton, under which the RCMP would have access to the files of the Department of National Revenue for the purpose of investigating infringements of the Income Tax Act and later, signed by the former Member for Saint-Boniface, now sitting in the other place, the RCMP was given access to tax files for the purpose of investigating infringements of the Criminal Code? Is the Department of National Revenue carrying on with this practice or has the previous agreement been adhered to religiously? We would like to know whether the RCMP or someone else has access to the files of the Department of National Revenue.

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to check about the agreement mentioned by the Hon. Member in the much broader context of his question which suggests the involvement of police forces in taxation matters. The Hon. Member will understand that, wherever fraudulent action is suspected, police may be justified in getting involved in the taxation aspects of investigations. However, as I would like to be more specific in my reply, I ask the Hon. Member to give me a little time to check on this matter.

DEPARTMENT'S DEPUTY MINISTER

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. Would the Minister give us a clear flat statement that he has full confidence in and supports his Deputy Minister?

Mr. Beatty: Yes or no?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe has set such an example of narrow-mindedness that his colleagues are having about the same simplistic reaction as he has.

Mr. Speaker, in my previous answers, I have twice described my responsibilities and those of my senior executives and told of my commitment to fulfill these responsibilities in order to promote the common good and ensure that the Income Tax Act is administered fairly for all Canadian taxpayers.

[English]

Mr. Huntington: As a supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: This appears to be a day when perhaps we can call upon a number of people who have not had an opportunity to put a question for some time. The Hon. Member for Kootenay West.

EDUCATION

FUNDING OF POST-SECONDARY INSTITUTIONS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State, and I have given him notice. The Minister will recall that I wrote to him in January of this year regarding the closure of the David Thompson University Centre in Nelson, British Columbia, and other problems arising from the massive diversions of federal post-secondary education funds by the British Columbia Government and, to a lesser degree, by other "mean and nasty" Conservative provincial Governments across Canada.

At that time I requested that the Minister give consideration either to imposing federal sanctions against British Columbia, or to providing special emergency funding to aid those programs and institutions being destroyed in my home Province, and in others. Similar appeals have also been made by my colleague, the Hon. Member for New Westminster-Coquitlam, and were echoed on February 14 by the Liberal Member for Ottawa Centre.

Will the Minister advise the House, first, whether he recognizes the seriousness of this problem in post-secondary education, especially in British Columbia, and, second, whether he is now considering, or will consider, any action along the lines suggested, either sanctions against B.C. or direct emergency funding to save the future of our students, their programs, and educational institutions?

Hon. Serge Joyal (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the question raised by the Hon. Member is a very serious one. It asks the question of what this Parliament should do when, after having voted funds in support of higher education in Canada, transferring these funds to the Provinces, one Province or another decides, in fact, not to pass on the funds to the institutions, but to cut additional funding to them.

I have already written twice in the last six months to the Minister of Education for British Columbia, drawing the seriousness of this situation to his attention. This week I did appear at the Standing Committee on Finance of this House to announce that I have appointed a special task force, headed by Mr. Al Johnson, to review the over-all policies which this House should adopt in future to ensure that, when it votes funds for support of higher education, those funds are passed on to the students and the university community.

DAVID THOMPSON UNIVERSITY CENTRE, NELSON, B.C.

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I want to be clear on the answer. Is the Minister giving consideration—at least giving consideration—to the imposition either of sanctions or special emergency funding in the case of the David Thompson University Centre? This is the second time in seven years that a university campus has been closed down in that same community. And those are the first and second times, I believe, in the history of Canada that that kind of action has been taken. We need help desperately, and we need it now. Will the Minister consider, or is he considering, such sanctions or such aid as suggested by myself, the Hon. Member for New Westminster-Coquitlam, and by the Liberal Member for Ottawa Centre?

Hon. Serge Joyal (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, those are options and suggestions which are under consideration. As a matter of fact the suggestion to impose penalties has been commended by some associations of university teachers in the country, although some have opposed that as not being the right course of action to take.

The Hon. Member is then suggesting additional funding, or emergency funding be provided. I would suggest to him that it would not solve the problems because some other Provinces might be tempted to do the same in order that Parliament would be called upon to vote additional funding. We are reviewing the various options. I will be in British Columbia myself later this month to meet with the Minister of Education. I will certainly raise the matter pointed out by the Hon. Member. However, as I said, we are looking at the various options which would address the root of the problem and not just come up with a temporary solution which would not cure the problem at its root.

DEPUTY MINISTER

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Mr. Speaker, my colleagues have been unsuccessful with this question. I will try again. I would like to ask the Minister of National Revenue if he will give us a simple yes or no. We know about all the responsibilities, and everything else. Does the Minister support and have complete faith in his Deputy Minister in the Ministry of Revenue—yes or no?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, we have just seen the true face of the Conservative Members—

Mr. Beatty: Yes or no?

Mr. Crosbie: Answer the question.

An Hon. Member: Answer the question, yes or no.

Mr. Crosbie: Does the Deputy have any confidence in you?

Mr. Bussières: The Hon. Member just said that he does not care about the sense of responsibility. I do care.

MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Mr. Speaker, that is not what he said at all. That is not what the Hon. Member said at all. He said, "We know the responsibilities". What I am asking the Minister is, does he have faith, does he support unequivocally, his Deputy Minister? Will he stand up and say he supports him, yes or no? It is a simple yes or no answer we want from him. Oui ou non; what is it?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member will simply not understand.

I told him how I intend to take my responsibilities, and he replied that he did not have any sense of responsibility. I went on to say that my responsibilities and those of my officials are to work as a team to ensure the fair implementation of the Income Tax Act. Mr. Speaker, that implies that all parties concerned work in a climate of mutual confidence and trust.

PLACEMENT OF MINISTER'S CONFIDENCE

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of National Revenue. If I were the Deputy Minister of National Revenue I would be humiliated by the answer which has been given by the Minister. Will the Minister answer yes or no on whether he enjoys the full confidence of his Deputy Minister of Finance?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is a bit confused by his own improvisation!

I would simply suggest to him that, instead of rising when prompted to do so by his colleagues, he ought to prepare sensible questions rather than making stupid remarks like his colleagues when clear answers have already been given.

[English]

REPORTED STATEMENTS MADE BY MEMBER FOR KITCHENER

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of National Revenue a question in another context. Yesterday as I left Kitchener the Minister's colleague, the Member for Kitchener, indicated on radio station CKKW that the problems in the Department lay at the feet of the Deputy Minister. The Minister's Deputy has been attacked by his colleague. Does the Minister have full confidence in his Deputy?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, either the Hon. Member is deaf, or he does not want to understand anything, or perhaps he does not listen to the answers!

I answered his questions three or four times.

NUCLEAR ARMAMENTS

CRUISE MISSILE TESTING—STATISTICAL CRASH PROJECTIONS

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Defence, the Minister of the Environment, the Prime Minister, and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I would like to direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister.

This week a claim was made by the Department of National Defence that the chances of environmental hazards such as crashes and forest fires resulting from the Cruise missile tests were one in a million. This is totally misleading the public. The U.S. consultant who conducted the Cruise hazard study used by the U.S. military has said the figures given by our Department of National Defence were totally unrealistic and, in fact, absolutely in error.

Will the Acting Minister inform the House, on behalf of the Government and the Department of National Defence, that it will immediately issue another bulletin with the correct assessment of the very grave hazards which are going to come upon us with the testing of the Cruise missile?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of State (External Relations)): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid my hon. friend will have to make her own decision. As an intellectual, which she is to a great degree, she has had to make decisions of this kind in her life. On almost every subject she is confronted with extremist and middle of the road opinions, and she has to make her own decision.

If the Minister of Defence were here I am sure he would say he has full confidence in his officials, particularly in his DM, when they present him with views of this kind. I cannot help her very much. It is a question of her making up her mind which of those opinions is the most valid. I would tend to believe the Canadian opinion in this matter.

Mr. Speaker: A short supplementary. We have refused supplementaries lately.

NUMBER OF CRASHES

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the Cruise crashed were 44 out ot 109 flights, not one in a million. I would like to direct my supplementary question to the Prime Minister, who is in the House, Mr. Speaker, but not in his place.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

THE ROGER BILODEAU CASE

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. Precisely why has the Government of Canada taken the position it has in its factum in the case of Her Majesty versus Roger Bilodeau?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member's question is so broad that I am not sure what he has in mind. If he could be more specific in his supplementary question I might be able to provide a reply.

This case in under appeal and there are limitations on what either of us can say with respect to it.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona. Please bear in mind the problems.

GOVERNMENT SUBMISSIONS

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, the Minister and I are both lawyers. Why is the Minister opposed to the position of Roger Bilodeau on the basis of the "shall" being a mandatory, and on the basis of necessity, which is the position his factum takes in the Supreme Court of Canada? His position seems to me to be inconsistent with the position of the Prime Minister and Section 23 of the Charter of Rights. Can he tell us why this is?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, there was certainly no such inconsistency. However, in light of possible happenings in Manitoba I think the federal submissions before the Supreme Court of Canada will clearly have to be reconsidered.

DEPUTY MINISTER—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. I would like to apologize to the Minister of National Revenue. I have been listening carefully over the last number of days, and particularly today, to his answers, because I have had a veritable flood of difficulties in my constituency with Revenue Canada to the extent that my constituents and myself have lost confidence in the tax system.

I could not understand the Minister's response to a number of previous questioners today. Was his answer yes or no when he was asked whether he had confidence in his Deputy Minister?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have the impression that the Hon. Member needs more time before my answers sink in. I would urge him to ponder over them in Hansard next week to find out the answer he is seeking.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

COURT HEARING ON CRUISE MISSILE TESTING

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, in the recurring absence of the Prime Minister, my question is for the Minister of Justice. Members of the House, and Canadians generally, know the position taken by the Minister and the Prime Minister in the past on matters that are before the courts, particularly the Supreme Court of Canada. Would he tell Members of the House what his position is on the testing of the Cruise missile in Canada? Would he not agree that it should be stopped, completely terminated, while this matter is before the courts, simply on the principle of British common law and law practised in this country?

• (1150)

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, if the Hon. Member is addressing his question to me on the basis of the law, and indeed that is the only kind of question to which my portfolio would allow me to reply, the answer is that he is clearly wrong. In our law the remedy in such a situation is an injunction. It is not to ask parties to stop short of an injunction. Therefore, there is certainly no legal requirement on the federal Government in such a case.

If my hon. friend has a question of policy, he will have to address it to the appropriate Minister.

THE PRESS

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING IN ETHNIC PRESS

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): Mr. Speaker, my question was to be directed to the Minister of Multiculturalism, but he is in Toronto cutting back all kinds of grants for the ethnic press. I will direct my question to the Secretary of State who is senior Minister in that particular Department. Why is the Minister of Multiculturalism cutting back on government advertising to the ethnic press, particularly in metro Toronto? Does his Government separate it between Grits and Tories? What is happening?

Hon. Serge Joyal (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has raised a point that creates many questions around his allegation. If I remember well, less than a year ago there was an announcement by the then Minister of Multiculturalism that there was an enrichment of the programs of the Secretary of State in support of the ethnic press in Canada. I am quite sure that in the application of the criteria to support the ethnic press, some cases may have been reviewed along the lines of the criteria of the program. But the total budget that has been allocated for that specific program has been increased by many hundreds of thousands of dollars in the last year.

There might be one case where that could be questioned, and we would like to look into the definite details of that case. On the whole, my recollection is that the program has been enriched and that the over-all community should profit from it.

DISTRIBUTION OF ADVERTISING

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): Mr. Speaker, I hope the Minister would review this because I have had a number of inquiries. As a former Minister I guess they feel they should write me a note to say that the Government is doing now what it is supposed to do 60 days before the next election. It is already starting to cut back between those who are Grits and those who are Tories in the Toronto area.

Hon. Serge Joyal (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, if the Hon. Member wants to provide me with the details of the specific case that he has in mind, I will certainly take it upon myself to look into it and report to him, either today or early next week, to make sure everyone is fairly treated and that the criteria are applied with the same kind of equity for everyone.

TOURISM

IMBALANCE BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism. At the first of the week we had a meeting in Charlottetown with TIAC, the Tourism Industry Association of Canada. There were numerous statistics given to us at that meeting on the decline of the tourism industry in Canada in 1983. There are an increasing number of Canadians going south, and fewer Americans coming north. Could the Minister give us any indication of why that is occurring?

Hon. David Smith (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, it is true that there is in fact an imbalance in terms of tourist dollars between Canada and the United States. What we have done was to announce just recently a television campaign that will be launched in April in the northern tier of the United States, through which we will be going after American tourists to encourage them to come to Canada this summer.

In addition, a television campaign has just been launched encouraging Canadians to vacation in Canada. I believe the impact of both those campaigns will be to turn the situation around.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

WORKING CONDITIONS OF EMPLOYEES AT CRANBROOK, B.C.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. He will know that CP Rail was included in the six and five restraint program, yet at this time CP Rail has invoked a material change in working conditions that will reduce the wages of employees of CP Rail in Cranbrook, British Columbia. Will the President of the Treasury Board investigate this, with a view to telling CP Rail that it cannot do this at this time and must wait until the restraint program is completed?

Hon. Herb Gray (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to look into the matter, and certainly if it turns out that it is not consistent with the law passed by this Parliament I will see that appropriate action is taken.

EMPLOYMENT

DISTRIBUTION OF JOB-CREATION FUNDS IN ONTARIO AND QUEBEC

Mr. Gordon Gilchrist (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. He and the Prime Minister have made a very large case for the competence—I think efficacy was his word—of Liberal Members of Parliament in getting special recovery funds for their ridings as opposed to other ridings. Would he explain why Ontario, as a total, which has higher unemployment than Quebec, has managed to get 51 per cent less funds than Quebec? Does that mean that the efficacy of Liberal Members in Ontario is substantially below that of their counterparts in Quebec?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would not want to come to such a broad and sweeping condemnation as the Hon. Member has, but I would remind him that we have also said that these programs are part of the effort to combat unemployment and that there are others on the part of the Government that are equally directed in doing so. I have stressed particularly the importance of my colleague's Budget and the kinds of tax incentives that it has provided to create jobs which will obviously have a very considerable impact in Ontario.

I have also pointed out to the House that one must take into account, in considering job creation questions, the fact that some Provinces, because they are wealthier, have greater fiscal resources for responding to job-creation problems within their areas. In considering that, Ontario is one of the richer Provinces and therefore can reasonably be expected to make a more vigorous effort than some of the relatively disadvantaged Provinces in other parts of the country. I have repeated those kinds of facts in the House before.

I have argued that when one takes into account those alternative thrusts toward job creation, the figures that relate to Ontario are reasonable in terms of the over-all context.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

REQUEST THAT HELICOPTERS BE STATIONED AT ST. JOHN'S, NFLD.

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Mines in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The abandonment yesterday of the oil rig Vinland dramatically highlights and emphasizes the danger to our off-shore workers.

The Minister of National Defence has indicated that in his estimation there is sufficient deployment off the east coast of Newfoundland, in reply to a request from the Newfoundland Government for direct access to helicopters for the offshore workers. The Minister knows that this year there are very hazardous ice fields out there. Can the Minister tell the House and his own Province why the Government will not agree to the reasonable and responsible request of the Government of Newfoundland to have helicopters placed in St. John's so that they will be directly accessible to the 500 workers out there who are in constant danger?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of State (Mines)): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the Hon. Member's question. I want to assure him of my own concern over that matter, as I am sure he, and indeed the people of the Province, are deeply concerned.

I think to focus on the helicopters exclusively is possibly not to paint the whole picture. I think a lot has been done in the past couple of years to improve the situation with regard to search and rescue off the East Coast. Many guidelines and procedures have been put in place. There is a lot of equipment that was not there before.

I also point out to him that there are other ships, such as fishing ships and transport ships, that must be accounted for in addition to the drill rigs.

I would say to him that I do not think that we can ever rest easy about any system. I think we should continue to monitor that, and as we proceed into the development stage I think we should be very careful that every possible consideration is given to putting the best possible search and rescue system in place.

RAILWAYS

AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT FUND

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Would he tell the House whether he still has the $204 million Agricultural Adjustment Fund available to him? Is it his intention to use that fund, if it is still available, to alleviate the livestock hurt as a result of the Crow Bill as was indicated in the Gilson report, or will he use it for a new feed grains policy for which the Minister of Agriculture seems to be intending its use?

Business of the House

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member knows, we addressed that particular question several times during the committee debates on the Grain Transportation Act. What I indicated at that time still holds true. The money that was set aside to provide for that adjustment was related to the method of payments question. My intention is to establish an inquiry committee as early as this April to look into the various choices and alternatives in the method of payment. We would not want to have any disposition of those funds until some report was made back to Parliament and some conclusions were made so the money would be relayed to that specific part of the Act, which is very central to the operation of the entire Bill.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, consultations have been held by the Prime Minister of Canada and the other Party leaders, and it seems there is unanimous consent for the following: first, to allow the Minister of Transport (Mr. Axworthy) to move forthwith a Resolution concerning language and language rights in Manitoba. Once the Resolution has been moved, the understanding is that there will be one speaker for each Party which will enable adoption of the Resolution without further debate.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that you seek unanimous consent of the House for allowing the Minister of Transport (Mr. Axworthy) to move the Resolution, and then put the Resolution before the House. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Axworthy) will then make his speech, followed by one speaker for each Opposition Party.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the Minister of Transport (Mr. Axworthy) to introduce the motion?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, the consultations referred to by the Government House Leader have, in fact, taken place. He has stated the agreement that will be arrived at after the three representatives of the respective parties in the House have spoken. The motion will be deemed to have been passed. We agree to that. We are also giving unanimous consent to the motion being presented at this time.

Mr. Young: Mr. Speaker, the statement of the House Leader for the Government side is in conformity with our understanding and our agreement.

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed and so ordered.

RESOLUTION ON FRENCH LANGUAGE RIGHTS IN MANITOBA

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Transport) moved:

That:

Whereas the House, in a resolution adopted on October 6, 1983 with unanimous support from all Parties, invited the Government and Legislative Assembly of Manitoba to take action as expeditiously as possible to fulfil their constitutional obligations and to protect effectively the rights of the French-speaking minority of the province;

Whereas the House also endorsed on that occasion the essence of the agreement reached to that end on May 16, 1983 by the Government of Canada and the Government of Manitoba, with the participation of the Société Franco-Manitobaine;

Whereas the Government of Manitoba introduced in the Legislative Assembly of the province, on July 4, 1983, a constitutional resolution providing for the amendment of the Manitoba Act, 1870 and, subsequently, amendments thereto as well as a bill respecting public services which, together, are consistent with the essence of the agreement reached on May 16, 1983 by the Government of Canada and the Government of Manitoba;

Whereas the Legislative Assembly of Manitoba, after several months of debate, is being prevented from bringing the constitutional resolution to a vote, and therefore from fulfilling its constitutional obligations;

(1) the House urges the Government of Manitoba to persist in its efforts to fulfil the constitutional obligations of the province and protect effectively the rights of its French-speaking minority in a spirit of tolerance and civility, amity and generosity;

(2) the House urges the Legislative Assembly of Manitoba to consider such resolution and legislation in an urgent manner so as to ensure their timely passage.

He said: Mr. Speaker, first let me express my thanks on behalf of Members on this side and all Members of the House for having granted unanimous consent to introduce this resolution that is of such major importance both to my own province and to the country as a whole. It takes us back not that many months ago to October 6 when this Parliament, perhaps in one of its finest hours during the past several years, agreed also unanimously to a resolution urging the Manitoba Legislature to find the solution to the matter of language rights in my home province.

That was a very important moment. It was a very historic moment. This Parliament was united, speaking with one voice, marking a spirit of hope and expectation so that a major historical wrong could be put right through the actions of the elected members of the Assembly of Manitoba and ultimately this Parliament.

Unfortunately, as we viewed those hopes and expectations of October they have become something of a distant echo. All too often news reports coming from Manitoba are full of stories of paralysis, stalemate, rancor, indignation and frustration. As we all know, the legislature of that province has been unable to find the resolution to the proposals that were brought forward.

As a citizen of the Province of Manitoba, and there are other Members of this House who share that distinction, we ache with what we see in our home territory. It is difficult to witness the kind of division that takes place. It is frustrating to see the business of the province come to a halt, to be received by deadlock in the Legislative Assembly. This is preventing the business which that province desperately needs to create work and to deal with the social problems of its citizens which cannot be seized by the Manitoba Legislature because of this overriding issue.

The business of the province has reached a stalemate, but perhaps more important is what has happened to the people. I think I speak for most Manitobans who would like to see the problem resolved. There is a great sense of willingness, I believe, to look at the record of almost 100 years and to find ways of resolving it. But for whatever the causes and for whatever the underlying reasons, that has not been the case. That is why it is so important that this House once again speak with a united and unanimous voice and reassert and reaffirm its commitments to the Constitution of Canada. Once again we must put forward our voice of reason and reasonableness to argue that we must correct a historical wrong, correct the past injustices and invite Manitobans, in fact all Canadians, to approach this matter in a state of tolerance and generosity.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: There are some in my province who argue that this House has no business in the issue, that it is purely made in Manitoba. I think throughout the discourse and debate that has gone on there has been a degree of restraint on behalf of federal Members of Parliament and other Canadians to allow over time the efforts of that province to focus on its responsibilities. Those who say that we have no business are dead wrong. This is not a matter that can be confined or limited simply to the boundaries of Manitoba; it is an issue for all Canadians. We are going to the very heart of what this country is all about, to the very basic fundamentals of our Constitution—the fact that we are not prepared to recognize that anybody will be a stranger somewhere in this country, that there is equality of treatment. Whether it be linguistic, sexual or moral treatment, everyone must be treated equal. We must make sure that takes place.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, we know it is vital for all Canadians to have the right to work, to live and travel anywhere in Canada. We know it is important to fight the separatist view that a group has to stay in a given region without having a choice in this matter. We realize the importance of protecting English and French minorities in each region.

Language rights are a fact of life in Canada and an essential part of our Federation. Therefore, we must accept official recognition of French in Manitoba.

[English]

There is another issue which it is important to consider, that is, what has happened in Manitoba and what statement it makes about the democratic process. One reason our resolution of October 6 was so heartily endorsed by all Members of the House was that we believe fundamentally it should be a decision that takes place within the democratic chambers of our country; that it should be a decision arrived at by elected members; that it should demonstrate that the authority and legitimacy of making decisions for the protection of minorities can be and should be made by elected representatives. It is important for the House to re-establish and reaffirm once again our commitment to that area.

What future can there be for parliamentary government in Canada if in every legislature certain groups try to halt the process when their arguments fail? How can legislatures remain the central focus of legitimacy and authority in our society? How can they remain the central decision-making body if a government has to prorogue because some of its members prevent the taking of a vote—perhaps the most fundamental right of any democracy, the right finally to decide?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: I believe the strong message of this resolution which we are putting forward in the House today is to underline clearly the commitment to that process and to give a sense of hope and confidence to all Canadians, minorities or otherwise, that this is the place where decisions are made, that this is the place where rights are protected and that this is the place where liberties are defended. We may disagree, as we do every day, about the nature, extent and character of those rights and liberties, but this is the place, in the Chamber, where those decisions must take place. We must say in our resolution, which we will through its unanimous adoption, that that really is the underpinning of our society.

This is why it is so important for us to encourage and to provide every ounce of persuasion, both as a Chamber and as individuals, to the leadership, the political people and the elected members in Manitoba to find once again a basis of moderation, to search out for a common sense solution and to adopt a position which will firmly recognize those rights in the Constitution, firmly prefer and offer the services required, and do so in a way which will extinguish the fumes and vapours of extremism that are beginning to seep over that territory and have the possibility of spreading even further.

We have an opportunity today to build a fortress against any further extension of those tragic and sometimes very unhappy circumstances which we see happening. It is my hope that through this resolution we will be able to provide that sense of encouragement and sense of support to the Assembly of Manitoba to come to a resolution.

It may be important as well for Members of the House to consider whether there should be further steps, to look at the basic spirit and essence of the May 16 agreement which recognized the importance of a resolution being passed in both Houses, and to determine whether, if it would help, if we had the sense through consultation and discussion with our confrères in Manitoba and among ourselves, and if we were able to move a resolution based upon that May 16 agreement in this House again entrenching and confirming those rights, it might provide a further incentive, a further impetus and a further motivation for Manitoba to pass its resolution so that this House can live up to its responsibilities and complete our side of the bargain.

I leave that as a matter of some examination, some judgment and some assessment by Members of all Parties in this House. I think it is our responsibility to speak out and provide suasion, but it may also be important at this point in time or in the near future—perhaps when the House returns after our break—to address the further issue of whether it is time for a resolution here to demonstrate clearly to the official opposition in Manitoba that their amendments and subamendments, which are simply there to validate some statutes, are not acceptable to the House of Commons.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: I have taken up enough time of the House. I do not think we have to go over the history or the details of the organ; I am sure we are all well familiar and associated with it. I would simply express once again on behalf of our side our appreciation to other Members of the House, knowing that we all share the same spirit and interest in having the problems of language rights in Manitoba resolved, not just for Manitobans but for all Canadians. We really are debating today, once again, the future of this country.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brian Mulroney (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in a perceptive column Fred Cleverly of the Winnipeg Free Press described a recent meeting of the grassroots movement in Manitoba: the meeting was peaceful; the tone temperate; the participants, hard-working Manitobans. They were neither extremists nor reactionaries, as some have called them. They were ordinary Manitobans, articulating a vision of Canada, a vision I can understand but cannot share on this important point.

[Translation]

On October 6 of last year, I announced on behalf of my colleagues the unanimous support of our caucus for the resolution tabled that day by my colleague, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I said at the time, and I shall, if I may, say it again today, that our support for the French speaking minority in Manitoba, as well as for other minorities in this country, is a strong and lasting one. I also said that this resolution compelled us to remember our overriding commitments in this country of almost limitless space, overflowing with great opportunities for the future. These commitments comprise a respect for our linguistic and other minorities, a long-held desire to encourage their flowering, and the duty to protect the rights of our minorities—wherever they may be.

Mr. Speaker, the same thoughts are appropriate to the resolution tabled in the House today.

On February 15 of this year, following a caucus meeting, I announced publicly our renewed support for the Franco Manitobans. The press release issued that day, following our meeting, announced, and I quote:

All Members of the Federal Progressive Conservative caucus renewed their support for the position announced by Mr. Mulroney. That support remains unchanged and continues to reflect the position of Mr. Mulroney and all his caucus colleagues on this subject.

[English]

We are all children of our environment, the sum total of our human experiences. I learned years ago that a Manitoban, indeed most westerners, does not perceive the Canadian duality and the importance of its linguistic application with the same degree of immediacy as someone whose roots are in the east. In eastern Canada from the very beginning, the French-English alliance, uneasy though it has been, became a daily reality. The sheer impact of numbers and the consequent political influence have ensured that it be so. Millions of French Canadians could not be ignored, nor could their rights be set aside. Accordingly, we have witnessed the slow but certain evolution of the protection of French language rights and others over the decades. Perfect equality has not been attained everywhere, but the evolutionary process, deeply rooted in reality and the doctrine of fairness, is irreversible in the east of this country.

● (1220)

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: I acknowledge, Mr. Speaker, that the view in some areas of western Canada is different. It is neither pernicious nor benighted. It is simply different. It is different because the evolution of western Canada did not in some very important respects parallel the evolution in the east.

Vast waves of courageous immigrants from the Ukraine, Central Europe and elsewhere arrived to cause the Prairies to blossom and grow. Their sense of sacrifice and their unremitting commitment to the soil gave life to western Canada. Though different in background, they found in western Canada common ground in language. English became the quasi-universal instrument of communication. In many ways, in many important ways it became a unifying force among people of remarkably diverse backgrounds.

That precious and fragile dimension of linguistic duality which Macdonald and Cartier saw as an indispensable characteristic of nationhood was submerged by growing demographic realities of the new west. The country grew; the English language became more dominant and ultimately more pervasive. This was the silent and the inexorable toll of history. In my judgment, it emerged less through contrivance than through the irresistible effect of overwhelming numbers. Large groups of Germans, Ukrainians, Poles, Swedes and Icelanders have made the Prairies home.

But what of the small group of Franco-Manitobans who were there at the beginning as one of the founding partners of the dual linguistic dimension of Canada? They were there with rights and obligations, establishing the unique beachhead for Canada. They would later be joined by so many others of whom I have spoken who opted for the English-speaking side of our unique dual dimension. But the linguistic rights of Franco-Manitobans were not submerged. They were removed. They were removed by a wilful act of the legislature in violation of a historic understanding. Today, Mr. Speaker, we ask simply that these rights be returned.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: I think in some way, I hope in some important way, I understand the feeling of large groups of Manitobans who believe that their languages brought from the old country deserve a place no less prominent than the French language, which is used by relatively few Manitobans. But those few—those courageous few—who have kept the French language and culture alive in Manitoba deserve today the gratitude and not the harassment of their fellow citizens.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Because they have ensured through decades of anguish that, in some modest way, the unique and priceless vision of our founding fathers has perservered. To the dismay of some and the chagrin of others, but I suspect to the pride of most, they have made it possible for Canada to affirm today that French Canadians need not be locked into an enclave in one province; and they have made it possible for us to say as a nation that there are other ways, because not only there can the rights of French Canadians be protected to the exclusion of other areas in Canada. They have made it possible for Canada and millions of French Canadians to reject the ultimate siren call of separation based on language. They have made it possible for Canadians in a very certain way, and in particular for growing, overwhelming numbers of young Canadians, the hope of the future, to say of our unusual and imperfect land: this is the kind of tolerant and generous country I want to preserve for future generations.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: So, Mr. Speaker, today my thoughts are with that small group of people in Manitoba, isolated from Quebec and New Brunswick and Ontario where millions of their fellow French Canadians live in increasingly beneficial, cultural, linguistic and economic surroundings. I think of them and I salute them for their dignity and their courage. On behalf of my Party today, I feel genuinely honoured to assist in a process that begins to repair a grievance and historic wrong.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: I think as well of the other Manitobans whose vision of Canada, formed and shaped in circumstances different from mine, might make it difficult for them to understand or accept what I have said. I say to them how deeply I regret the unsettling events of the last few months. Although we have disagreed on this fundamental issue, I know that Manitobans have been motivated by a different historical perspective of our nation and not by a sense of malice.

I invite Manitobans, all Manitobans, as Canadians, to bind up the wounds and to deal promptly with the question of minority language rights. There could be no doubt where I stand. There can be no question as to where the obligation of a national political party lies. It lies today, as it shall tomorrow, in ensuring that our minorities in Canada are treated at all times with dignity and with justice.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I was born in Manitoba. I have lived all my life there. I grew up in the south; I represent the north. I know that my province is not the domain of bigots. I know that my province is not the domain of racists. Most Manitobans have a tolerance for those with different religious beliefs, those from different language groups, those with different colour skin.

Part of our history has been to welcome people from the Ukraine, to welcome people from Germany, to live with the native population of our province. Louis Riel is the father of Manitoba. We have been tolerant of each other from that day. We have had our problems. We have had unjust laws passed by the Manitoba Legislature. The actions that are taking place in the Province of Manitoba at this time are to restore the rights of those who have been deprived by those unjust laws. It is imperative that we in this House and Canadians throughout this country, regardless of their political beliefs, work for the protection of each and every minority in our country.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I, too, have watched television and seen the antics of those who have disgraced Manitoba and shamed me personally. Those people do not represent the majority of the people of Manitoba.

There are others who have legitimate concerns about the course of bilingualism. There are people who are legitimately concerned about the employment opportunities of their sons and daughters if bilingualism is entrenched in the Province of Manitoba. It is a legitime concern which all of us as parents can understand. But it is not the real issue in the Province of Manitoba.

The legislation before that legislature is limited. It limits French language services to areas where the population warrants those services. It limits the use of those services in government offices. I say to all Canadians that it does not provide complete protection and complete use of services to the Francophone minority in Manitoba, but it does recognize the historic right of that population and that where there is a French speaking community, there should be services for those people.

The proposals in Manitoba provide adequate safeguards for both the minority and the majority. That is important for all of us to understand, important for all Manitobans to understand. I am a Manitoban who speaks only English. I am learning French but it is a slow process for me. I represent a riding where there are two official languages, English and Cree. In my riding 30 per cent of the population speak Cree. They are not affected in a positive way by this legislation, but they are people who can understand that in Canada we are not just English and French; we are not just English, French and Ukrainian; we are not just English, French, Ukrainian and German. We are a mosaic, not a melting pot. In Canada, as in Manitoba, we must respect that fact. We must respect the concerns and the aspirations of the Ukrainian population, the concerns of the Mennonite population, indeed the concerns of all segments of our population. In the Manitoba Legislature that is what is being attempted, and both I and my caucus support it not only on historic grounds but because it is the right thing to do in Canada; it is the right thing to do in the Province of Manitoba.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Murphy: Since 1870 we have had protection in our Constitution in Manitoba for the French and English fact. In 1870 the French-speaking native population was the majority. Louis Riel, as a result of a rebellion, negotiated with the Government of Canada for the protection of both English and French. That is a proud part of our history and we should all recognize that. Now that the English are the majority, now that other cultural and linguistic groups have surpassed the French, we should also show the tolerance of Riel. We should recognize that there are some services, some basic rights, for a group which granted the minority of that day, the English, those rights.

We in this nation are anything but monolithic. But if the majority in our nation ever decides that it is going to use its power as some in the Province of Manitoba are presently trying to do, if they are going to use that power on the French-speaking population of Manitoba with its constitutional guarantee which has been upheld by the Supreme Court of Canada, then, Mr. Speaker, no Canadian is safe; no religious minority is safe, no linguistic minority is safe, no individual or group of individuals with different beliefs from the majority is safe in this country.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Murphy: The Government of Manitoba can stand with pride. They are fighting a difficult fight. They are fighting a fight not only on behalf of the 6 per cent of the population of Manitoba who speak French, but they are fighting a fight on behalf of tolerance throughout this nation. In Manitoba that tolerance is being challenged by a minority party in the legislature. It is being challenged on the streets and in meetings held throughout that province. But we as Members of Parliament, as Canadians, and we as Manitobans, must fight for tolerance throughout this nation. We must fight for tolerance throughout Manitoba, and we must fight for tolerance in the Legislature of Manitoba.

That is what this resolution does. We are saying that we will work to protect the rights of one of our minorities. It is a small minority in Manitoba, a larger minority in other parts of Canada, but nevertheless a minority; and we believe, along with the Manitoba Government, that we must support that minority despite the intolerance which exists, despite the bigotry which exists in some areas. We must do so despite the fact that at one particular time it may be politically unpopular.

I congratulate the Government of Manitoba, I congratulate the Leaders of all three Parties in this House, and I hope that not only do we pass the resolution, Mr. Speaker, but that we work to make sure we have a much more tolerant society throughout this nation. Thank you.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to agreement reached earlier this day, the motion is deemed to have been adopted.

SENTENCING GUIDES FOR JUDGES

Question No. 471—Mr. Howie:

1. Since January 1, 1983 did the Department of Justice undertake any studies relating to sentencing guides for judges and, if so (a) were these studies carried out by outside consultants (b) was any amount allocated to the studies and, if so, what amount (c) what is a list of the names of the person or persons who carried out the studies (d) were any studies carried out within the Department and, if so, how many?

2. What was the purpose of the studies, did they achieve their objectives and will they be made public?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Minister of Justice): In so far as the Department of Justice is concerned: There were no formal or discreet studies as such undertaken since January 1, 1983, by the Department of Justice relating to sentencing guides for judges. However, information and background materials were gathered by departmental officials as part of Phase II of the Criminal Review Project on Sentencing, which forms part of the Criminal Law Reform Bill introduced in the House of Commons on February 7, 1984. This information and background material, including approaches followed in other jurisdictions, were considered and used in the formulation of the purpose and principles of sentencing which are contained in the Bill.

NATIONAL TRAINING PROGRAMS

Question No. 548—Mr. Howie:

Does the Canada Employment and Immigration Centre operate the Occupational Orientation Program or the Job Readiness Training Program and, if so, how many persons availed themselves of each of these programs during the last year for which figures are available?

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Both the Occupational Orientation and Job Readiness Training Programs are operated by the Canada Employment Centres across Canada. During 1982-83 fiscal year, 3,512 Canadians were enrolled in the former and 6,776 in the latter program. The trainees are enrolled in courses that are purchased specifically for the program purposes by the Commission; the courses are designed and offered by the community colleges or equivalent institutions in each province.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. PAPROSKI—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MR. COLLENETTE

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): Mr. Speaker, Ministers usually make statements in the House and you have called Statements by Ministers. The Minister is in Toronto making statements to the ethnic cultural community about the amount of money he is going to be giving out for advertising to the different communities. Why would he not make it here in the House? This is the place for making statements—

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member has made his point but it is not a point of order.

DIVORCE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-10, an Act to amend the Divorce Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, to rise to support second reading of amendments to the Divorce Act, the first amendments since 1968 and, in fact, the most fundammental we have ever had to our law of divorce in Canada, is not a happy task. It is, rather, an onerous and painful duty. I believe the subject of marriage breakdown is one which many people in Canada would wish not to have to deal with. Indeed, we all wish that the reality in our country was not such that this is a matter which we are now required to consider. We are told that the estimate is that there is about a 40 per cent chance for any marriage entered into now to end in divorce.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the concept of the family and the sacredness of marriage are deeply rooted in our society. As a government, we are entirely in favour of protecting and supporting this institution in Canada. For instance, our policies on the tax system, family allowances, the Canada Assistance Plan in relation to day-care and employment all indicate the Government's strong support for the institution of marriage and its preservation in Canada.

As for the causes of marriage breakdown, they are many: financial problems, urban overcrowding, housing shortages, increased mobility in our society owing to the search for employment and career development, changes in the traditional roles of men and women and finally, the emphasis on individual rights.

Mr. Speaker, marriage breakdown is a fact, and the Divorce Act is not intended as preventive but as curative legislation, aimed at organizing the legal status of people whose marriage has already broken down.

I also would like to make the point that the Divorce Act in its present form is destructive rather than constructive, and that it should be changed in order to promote as much as possible, reconciliation of the parties, in the hope of avoiding a divorce.

[English]

If this set of amendments to the law of divorce were likely to have the effect of undermining the institution of marriage in our society, we as a government would not be putting them forward. As I indicated, this law of divorce has to deal with a social fact. The social fact of marriage breakdown is occurring for broad social causes, for reason. entirely independent of the laws of Canada. It may be true, indeed it is true, that the law regulates the number of divorces that take place each year in Canada, but it is not the law but rather social conditions that regulate and cause the number of marriage breakdowns which occur in our country. The role of the law is to deal with the social reality and the terrible cost in human pain and suffering which are involved in it.

As I will illustrate in the course of my remarks, it is the children more than any other single group who are the losers in marriage breakdown, in divorce. We would wish to have a law which would be so humanized that the children would suffer less than now is occurring under the law—as little, indeed, as our law can make possible.

Many people seem to have the idea that these proposals will make divorce easier to obtain in Canada. I categorically deny that interpretation, if by easier they mean quicker. This law, in fact, will make it slower, more difficult, for more than three-quarters of Canadians who now are obtaining divorces.

Statistics Canada tells us that in the years from 1969 to 1977, 75.8 per cent of divorce cases were completed through to decree absolute in less than 360 days, which is less than the period of one year which we are making the minimum possible for obtaining divorce under our amendments. In other words, three-quarters of the Canadians now obtaining divorces obtain them in less than the time we are proposing as the minimum time in this legislation. Because of the legislation, one-quarter of Canadians will be able to get their divorces more quickly but three-quarters will have to wait.

Mr. Lambert: No, you are wrong.

Mr. MacGuigan: The Hon. Member simply does not know the statistics.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. For the sake of orderly debate the Minister should be allowed to make his comments now and replies will follow.

• (1250)

Mr. MacGuigan: I can tell Hon. Members that these statistics are available through Statistics Canada, and they refer to a considerable period of years. In case the Hon. Member is not aware of what is now happening in our courts, I can tell him that since this legislation was given first reading in the House I have spoken to groups of lawyers practising family law in many cities in Canada; in Toronto, Victoria, London, Windsor, Charlottetown and other centres. They showed massive support for this legislation because as lawyers they understand what is actually happening. I have heard of divorces being granted in five weeks, four weeks, three weeks, and in one case from the beginning of the divorce to decree absolute a total of only nine days. That is what the present law in Canada is bringing about.

We are going to require all of these people, without exception, to wait a minimum of a year. We believe that there has to be time for reconsideration and reconciliation. The law which we are proposing would encourage married couples to reflect on their decision to divorce. It would impose an obligation on those who counsel them to draw to their attention the mediatory facilities which exist. It would also change the law with respect to the reconciliation period so that there would no longer be only a single period of cohabitation for reconciliation during the running of the time for divorce. It would be possible to have any number of such periods of reconciliation up to a maximum of three months.

More important than even those points, Mr. Speaker, is our proposal to reduce the accusatory aspect of the divorce process to the absolute minimum. As Hon. Members know, the reason that most people who are now applying for divorces can get them in such a short time is that they are obtaining them on the basis of cause: adultery, physical cruelty, mental cruelty and so on. The legal necessity for alleging cause—and we fear sometimes even for fabricating cause—in order to obtain a divorce is a legal concept which imposes an atmosphere of confrontation on the parties. It can involve the children as pawns in the marriage breakup, and it can, as I am sure Hon. Members know, have the effect of having children called in on examinations for discovery to testify, for instance, that they saw their father beating their mother.

We already know, Mr. Speaker, as my earlier words indicated, that children in all divorces carry a sense of guilt that they were somehow unwittingly the cause of the marriage breakup. When the law adds to this natural psychological tendency by requiring there be accusation, and sometimes accusation piled on accusation and counter-accusation, it of course adds to the guilt that a child will feel, especially if the child has to testify to prove the existence of the cause of cruelty on which the divorce may be based.

There is a profound need, Mr. Speaker, for the humanization of our divorce system in Canada. That is the objective of the Government in this legislation. It is not to make divorce easier. In fact, it will not make divorce easier.

It will make divorce less expensive, I am happy to say, by the fact of enabling the provinces to adopt rules and procedures which will eliminate the making of the decree in open court. The expense of lawyers will diminish, it is our estimate, to a third or a half of the present billing. Therefore, there will certainly be a financial saving on the part of couples who are seeking divorce. It will, in addition to what I mentioned, make the process as healing and as mediating as I believe it is possible for the law to do.

Of course, in order for this to happen most effectively, as I will also indicate later, there are some other changes apart from the law of divorce which are also necessary, such as more facilities for mediation and conciliation in our country.

[Translation]

Before concluding this explanation of the Bill, Mr. Speaker, I would like to stress some of the proposed aspects of the reform which are more technical but none the less significant. The way things are now, three conditions are required before a petition for divorce can be filed before provincial courts: first, the petitioner must be a Canadian resident; second, one of the two parties involved must have been a resident of the province for at least one year at the time of the petition; third, that same person must have been a resident of that same province for ten months. I intend to replace those three conditions by only one, namely that one of the parties must have resided for at least one year in the province where the petition is filed. That would simplify the issue and provide easier access to the courts.

Under the existing system, orders concerning alimony or child custody can be changed only by the court which has issued them. This rule may have serious consequences. For example, let us take the case of a couple whose divorce was granted in Toronto, one of the spouses now being in St. John's and the other in Calgary. Any order pertaining to alimony or child custody issued at the time of the divorce of that couple could be changed only by the Toronto court.

I intend to make the rule less stringent in that respect. Under the Bill, if both parties agree, a petition for any variation of the order pertaining to either question could be filed before any court. Should only one of the parties want to have the order changed, that party could apply before the court of his or her province, or that of the province where the other party resides. However, the court will always be free to turn down the petition should it feel that, under the circumstances, either party would be wronged.

The suggested amendments represent an in-depth review of the Divorce Act. In fact, such a review is long overdue. The proposed reform is based on a new approach not only to the grounds for divorce, but also to the whole divorce system. The procedure will be greatly simplified. As for the judicial rules concerning the determination of the effects of divorce, that is the rights and obligations of spouses as well as the rights of the children, they will be made more specific and more sensible.

This reform will have a direct impact on the welfare of an increasing number of Canadians.

There have been virtually no changes made to the Divorce Act in the past fifteen years. The principles on which it is based must be reexamined in the light of modern social trends. We need a more humane system for settling marital conflicts, a system which will be more effective and less distressing for those faced with the painful experience of divorce. We need a statute which will take the needs of people into greater consideration and which is more in agreement with the interests of society as a whole.

The reform project which I have just outlined will, I believe, allow us to fulfil all those objectives.

Mr. Speaker, may I now call it one o'clock and continue at two o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. When I left the chair at one o'clock, the Hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. MacGuigan) had the floor. I must add that he still had 23 minutes left in his allotted time.

The Hon. Minister of Justice.

[English]

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of taking all the time which would be available to me, but I would like to make one or two additional points with respect to the legislation and then review briefly some parallel initiatives.

In response to the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in the case of Messier versus Lessard we have provided objectives for maintenance orders in the Bill. This is the first time there have been such objectives in the Divorce Act. The Supreme Court has now effectively required them. Even if it had not, they would be useful tools for the judiciary in deciding how to deal with the question of maintenance.

It is very important to note that the objectives set forth there are not absolute. There is obviously some overlapping. There are also key words in Clause 10 of the Bill. Those words are "in so far as is practicable". Those words govern each of the four objectives which follow.

With respect to children, we have for the first time set forth principles respecting children. It is important to note that this is put in terms of a right of the children; the children ought to have as much access to each of the spouses as the circumstances permit. That in particular is a very important statement of principle.

It should also not escape notice, Mr. Speaker, that for the first time we have provided for access by other parties to the children. In those comparatively rare cases where it was appropriate, this could mean that any person other than the parents could have the custody, care and upbringing of the children. It also includes access to the children. Of course, that would apply to the respective grandparents more than to any other group. This possible right of grandparents has long been overlooked by the law, so this is a very important change.

Also important is the change which in the discretion of the court, allows the appointment of an advocate to represent the interests of the children. We have not laid down rules with respect to how this should be done, thinking it best to leave it to the discretion of the court to work out. Of course, there is discretion in the provinces to establish rules which may be relevant to all of these situations.

The provinces will have the discretion to decide how divorce actions will actually be handled, whether they will continue to be handled in open court or, if not in open court, whether they will continue to be dealt with by a judge. From what little I have heard on this point, the disposition of most provinces seems to be to keep the involvement of the judges in the process but through some simpler procedure than decisions made in open court, as at present.

I also mentioned that I would like to deal with some parallel initiatives. Any Divorce Act, particularly in our federal state, is necessarily very limited legislation. It deals only with a very well defined territory. There are other initiatives which are necessary and we are taking those initiatives. I might mention that in his Budget the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) announced that the Canada Pension Plan would be improved to provide for mandatory credit splitting of Canada Pension Plan credits on marriage breakdown. As well, for all private pension plans under federal jurisdiction the Minister provides that there will be splitting of pensions between spouses in the case of marriage breakdown. I think those are important principles to have established.

We are also concerned about the fact that there presently are not adequate institutions or an adequate number of properly prepared people to assist in the very important process of conciliation and mediation in the case of marriage breakdown. If this can lead to reconciliation, of course, that's all the better; but even if it cannot lead to reconciliation it can lead to the easing of discussions over questions of custody and maintenance and therefore can be of great assistance.

It is my hope that some of the money that the provinces save on legal aid will be devoted by those provinces to trying to establish adequate systems of conciliation-mediation. We will be taking some initiatives in this area ourselves in order to show our concern about the development of a better system of mediation conciliation across Canada.

The final matter I wish to mention is, in some ways, the most important of all, though it is not in itself a matter for a Divorce Act. That is the matter of enforcement of ancillary orders, orders of maintenance and custody. This is another serious social problem.

It has been estimated that some 75 per cent of the maintenance orders in Canada are now in arrears. Spouses—I am afraid this is normally the husband—have been known to go to great lengths to escape the liability which the court has imposed on them at the time of divorce, by moving to other provinces or even by disappearing. All governments in Canada must do everything they can to deal with this problem.

As the House knows, since ancillary orders are registered as orders in provincial courts, this is a matter for the provinces primarily to deal with. They have the jurisdiction in this area. The only way I am aware that we could conceivably get federal jurisdiction is to use the Federal Court across the country as the court for divorce. However, the Federal Court is not generally accessible to people. I think it would not be as effective a system as the present one, even with all of its deficiencies.

Thus, I believe we are limited to proceeding with the present system or some variation of it in which the provinces have jurisdiction over these orders. We have had a federal-provincial study and a number of recommendations have been made to provinces and the federal Government. We have followed those recommendations in our divorce legislation to the limited extent that it is possible. For instance, we have provided for the possibility for easier variation of orders subsequent to their initially being obtained. We have also provided that it will be possible for a judge to require the party on whom maintenance payments fall to give security as well as to incur an obligation to pay on a monthly basis. This possibility of security—of course, in cases where the party with the responsibility has property against which the security can be made effective—will be a very effective new remedy.

Beyond that, it is important to try to move to what I would call a national enforcement network. It is only in this way that I believe we can really have greater success in the implementation of ancillary orders. In this respect, I was able to announce recently not only that the federal Government was prepared to agree to a national divorce registry and ways of making it effective through tracing and enforcement, but that the provinces now appear to be willing to go along in this direction as well.

Once again, I want to pay tribute to my colleague, the Minister responsible for the Status of Women (Mrs. Erola), and her departmental officers for their efforts in continuing to press for a national registry of maintenance and custody orders. Their efforts have helped in the very significant breakthrough that I think has been made in reviving the interest of the provinces in this kind of proposal and improvement of enforcement procedures generally. Officials from my Department and that of the status of women are now working together in studying the feasibility of establishing a national registry of custody and maintenance orders. I very much appreciate the contribution of my colleague and her officials.

I was able to tell the House recently that at a recent meeting of deputy attorneys general there was a general disposition to proceed with the establishment of such a registry. There will be a further meeting in this respect in March. I believe it is realistically possible to hope that even in this year we can achieve success in setting up such a registry. The Government of Canada is prepared to contribute its share. I think the operational costs would not be great but, of course, there obviously will be some start-up costs to which I would expect all governments would wish to contribute. The Government of Canada would certainly wish to be part of that because we want, so far as we can, to induce, lead and persuade the provinces that we really cannot go on any longer without establishing a national enforcement network.

As I mentioned, these parallel concerns are terribly important. They are not matters that can be resolved by divorce legislation but they are matters that are worth mentioning in the discussion of divorce legislation. They are certainly matters which are worth pursuing as objectives of national importance.

● (1420)

Within the divorce legislation itself, we have adopted a new approach. We have changed the basis of the law so that it will no longer be adversarial in this area of human difficulty, so that we will not add to natural difficulties, artificial problems created by an adversary system which, as we all know, is sometimes in all respects misused and abused.

The non-adversarial, no-fault basis which we are proposing for divorce will enable divorce to take place when marriage breakdown has already occurred with the least trauma possible. We have to support the institution of marriage in every way possible. When that institution has already ceased to function because marriage breakdown has occurred, as testified to by the witness of the parties themselves, we have to try and resolve the social problems without the addition of legal burdens that are in themselves unnecessary and are no longer related to the social conditions in which we find ourselves. That is the essence of what we are trying to do. It is to change the atmospherics of the divorce process so there can be a humanization of that process, one which can benefit all of the participants but especially the children whose interests, most of all, need to be protected. We believe this is very much in the interests of society.

Mr. Hudecki: Mr. Speaker, are there any provisions in the rules for questioning the Minister?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Not at this time. Under the rules this is not possible for the first three speakers.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to participate in this very important debate with respect to the first amendments we have had relating to divorce law in Canada for over 15 years.

Before I proceed with my remarks, I might be forgiven, after hearing the Minister in his remarks speak about the initiative taken on the part of the federal Government in the area of divorce reform, to observe that the Minister seems to be sending out different signals with respect to this legislation. When the legislation was introduced in the House and presented to the press in a formal press conference, as I recall the Minister referred to it at that time as a step forward toward a more efficient, faster and more facile method of obtaining divorce in Canada.

Mr. MacGuigan: I never said faster.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The Minister confirms this. I just want to make sure that something was not wrong with the hearing utensil on my desk. The Minister said today that this law will make divorce more difficult and slower.

Mr. Lapointe (Charlevoix): He did not say that.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I know the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Lapointe) has been listening carefully, but I am afraid he will just have to lean over and whisper to his colleague, the Minister of Justice (Mr. MacGuigan), because I made a note of precisely when the Minister made that reference.

As I said, we have two signals coming from this legislation. I think this is one of the difficulties we experience with respect to this legislation. It has been held out to whatever crowd the Minister and Government spokesmen have been speaking as the basis of great reform, but it depends upon the forum to which they are speaking as to which way they describe that particular reform.

Mr. MacGuigan: That is entirely untrue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair would like to intervene at this point and remind Hon. Members that Standing Order 15(3) reads:

When a Member is speaking, no Member shall pass between that Member and the Chair, nor interrupt him or her, except to raise a point of order.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Not even the Minister.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I had to intervene this morning when the Minister was speaking. I would expect the co-operation of all Members on both sides of the House in listening to the very interesting speech of the Hon. Member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn).

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I know when I have hit a responsive chord on the Government side because when I speak the truth with respect to the position the Government has taken, we hear squeals, yelling and whining from the Government benches. It does not affect me at all. I am prepared to set forth on the record what I think are some of the concerns we have regarding this legislation.

At the outset I should remind Hon. Members that 40 per cent of all marriages in this country end in divorce at the present time. In 1982 this translated into some 70,000 divorce decrees being granted. That means 140,000 people were directly affected by the laws relating to divorce.

It must not be forgotten that, in addition to that figure, there are untold thousands of children and relatives who suffered and endured the breakup of marriages. The cost of the people involved cannot be adequately measured. In financial terms the expenditures are enormous. Canadians involved in divorce have spent an estimated $500 million in legal fees alone over the last ten years. Under our present laws, even a straightforward, uncontested petition can result in significant financial hardship for many individuals. In addition, the cost of court administration continues to grow.

Yet in the scheme of things and the way things operate in this area, the financial cost in many cases may not be the most important component of the costs litigants are required to bear. The psychological and emotional costs are more often than not far more significant. Parties to a divorce are put through an emotional wringer in many, many instances. At the time they are dealing with the stress of a family breakup, they must also deal with courts, judges, lawyers and the intricacies of formal divorce proceedings. This process is, when all is said and done, another form of legal proceeding. This means a component common to all legal proceedings, the adversarial component, is still present in the present proposal brought forward by the Minister. It will involve lawyers who are hired and who by and large are involved in pursuing cases on behalf of their clients to ensure that their client receives the best possible result in terms of the relief claimed by the applicant, in terms of the financial settlement and in terms of custody.

Lawyers are used to operating in an adversarial system. I am not criticizing them for that. They do their work. They are trained to pursue their clients' cases in that way, the same as if they would pursue a case on behalf of a commercial client. They are there to get the most they can for their client. They are not, by and large—although there is a tendency to improve the situation—trained in the area of counselling and mediation, which often is so essential in cases of matrimonial breakdown.

Unfortunately, in the process factors that are unique to a divorce proceeding may be ignored and counselling and mediation may be forgotten. As a result, the parties often emerge bitter and mistrustful of their former spouses, lawyers—usually lawyers on the other side—and the judicial system in general. Another consequence is that marriages that may, in fact, be salvaged are not saved because of the adversarial nature of the proceedings in a formal court setting.

In short, I would suggest that anyone who has gone through the process will say that it is very often a most unpleasant one for the participants and often highly traumatic and distressing. Legislation dealing with divorce will necessarily affect hundreds of thousands of Canadians. Such legislation will of necessity deal with a matter of extreme importance to the individuals involved. Therefore the importance of this particular Bill cannot be overstated. Canadians have a right to expect that their elected representatives will give it the care and consideration it deserves.

As I mentioned, the last major changes to the divorce legislation took place some 15 years ago, in 1968. Since that time there have been significant social and economic changes in the structure of Canadian society. New trends have emerged both in judicial approaches to marriage breakdown and in provincial legislation dealing with the division of matrimonial property. During that 15 years numerous groups and agencies have grappled with the problems of divorce and with difficult questions as to just what reforms are desirable.

The Law Reform Commission of Canada studied the matter closely. The Canadian Bar Association and the Law Society of Upper Canada provided detailed recommendations in this area. Changes and reform have been urged by a great many groups and agencies, from church representatives and spokespersons for social workers to a variety and a number of important women's groups. Not all of these parties have called for the same changes; it would have been surprising if they had. However, what is noteworthy is that for a great many years many people have asked for change and reform to our divorce laws. In point of fact, the Minister of Justice has been promising great and sweeping changes for almost as long as he has held his portfolio. When he took over his responsibilities he said that divorce reform was a "top priority". Time and time again the Minister in various fora, in newspapers and in front of the media across the country, promised that new legislation would be introduced immediately, if not sooner. Every time I picked up the Monday morning edition of The Globe and Mail there was another article featuring the Minister promising divorce reform and the introduction of sweeping legislation during the course of the coming week. We were repeatedly disappointed until the Minister finally brought forward Bill C-10 as a result of enormous consideration on his part and that of his colleagues.

The fact of the matter is that with all the trumpeting and fanfare preceding the introduction of this Bill, Canadians expected comprehensive, well thought out, effective legislation which would deal with the many problems involved in marriage breakdown and the possibility of salvaging relationships between human beings. We have had reason to expect that, but now I am sorry to report that, as a result of all this cogitation on the part of the Minister and his colleagues, he has come up very much short of what might have been expected on his part.

The Hon. Member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence) has termed the proposal before us as shallow, superficial and simplistic. My colleague was always a Member noted for his understatement of a point of view. When he says that about this particular piece of legislation, I know he knows about which he speaks.

The Minister has addressed himself to the relatively easy question of grounds for divorce. For all intents and purposes he ignored far more difficult and contentious issues, such as maintenance and child custody. In terms of this kind of legislation, unless we deal with these matters the legislation in itself will be wanting and subject to great criticism across the country.

I would like to indicate the depth of concern which has been expressed with respect to this legislation. Many Hon. Members will remember that when the Minister brought down his Bill it was met with the usual approbation by "The Toronto Trudeau Star". It was very much applauded as being a forward-thinking piece of legislation. Even The Toronto Star has now had second thoughts and realizes that the legislation is seriously lacking. In terms of editorial opinion and representations by people who follow the issue and are concerned about it, such as women's groups across the country, they are together and consistent in their criticism of the legislation, not so much because the Minister has tried to do only a few things but because there are many items which should have received attention but received absolutely none.

I could refer to the editorial comments in newspapers across the land, but I would like to quote from the Vancouver Province and its editorial of January 25, which characterized the Bill as "short on courage". A small portion of that editorial reads:

> After all the preening and advanced promotion of its divorce law changes, the federal Government has brought forward a mouse . . . For six months the Justice Minister . . . heralded the proposed changes as his "top legislative priority". The end product is the work of a tired administration sapped of political courage.

That is precisely the point. This Bill does not even come close to dealing adequately with the subject matter. It is a calculated attempt to give the appearance of action while in fact doing very little at all. It is clear that the Bill requires a great deal of consideration and work to turn it into an acceptable Bill, if it is at all possible. Canadians must be given the opportunity to express their views on such a fundamental topic. It must receive a fair and thorough examination in committee so that we in this Party, as well as Members of the other Parties in the House, can do the job which the Government has apparently abdicated.

I am concerned as well with the legislative initiatives which have been brought forward at this point in time by the Minister and whether we will have sufficient time in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to deal in a proper manner with the legislation. He has brought in an omnibus Bill which requires two pages to carry around concerning amendments to the Criminal Code. He has brought in this divorce legislation. His colleague the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) has brought in an important piece of legislation which we are now debating dealing with a civilian security service. A further Bill has been languishing on the Order Paper for some years now. It deals with the grievance procedure in the RCMP. I ask whether or not the Government is serious when it says that it is interested in reform or whether or not this is window dressing with no anticipation of being able to complete our work in committee, even if we worked morning, noon and night to deal with the many topics which the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General have brought before us for consideration and for ultimate consideration by the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Much has been made of the fact that if this Bill is passed the traditional grounds for divorce would be eliminated and replaced by the sole ground from this time forward of marriage breakdown. This approach is justified on the basis that fault grounds "encourage the view of divorce as an adversarial conflict between an innocent and guilty spouse". I have already referred to some of the drawbacks in an adversarial system. I have already talked about whether or not the adversarial system is the appropriate one to deal with marriage breakdown.

However, I want to raise with the Minister some of my concerns with respect to the reform that he proposes should be accepted by Parliament. Any lawyer who practises in the field of family law will say that the questions of maintenance, property division and custody of children are the contentious issues in a marriage breakdown. It is on these issues that adversarial conflicts are joined. If there is agreement with respect to these matters, the question of grounds or fault is often of little significance. I suggest that it makes no difference under the present law in my experience.

Although I have not specialized in the practise of family law, members of my law firm who have been involved in it confirm this point. No matter if the grounds are three years, five years, adultery or cruelty, in terms of the dispute that takes place in the court that is often insignificant, if not completely secondary. Where the real dispute takes place is with respect to the level of maintenance and the whole question of custody.

To be sure, the process of apportioning fault, finding one party guilty of misconduct, may exacerbate the feeling of hurt and embarrassment. However, the elimination of these so-called fault grounds will not necessarily mean the end of the adversarial process. The danger with what the Minister is suggesting is that he may well be throwing the baby out with the bath water. In his attempt to lessen adversarial conflict by eliminating fault grounds, he may well be giving rise to new problems if those grounds are entirely eliminated.

I pose to the Minister that it is not necessarily a question of grounds for divorce being based on fault. Very often they can be regarded as being on the basis of necessity. I want to pursue that and try to examine what might occur in a great number of instances with this proposal which requires a one-year waiting period in all circumstances.

What of the woman who becomes pregnant by a man other than her husband while the marriage is still extant? With the traditional ground of adultery or infidelity gone, the possibility of immediate divorce is eliminated. In fact, if this Bill is passed, the divorce will not be obtained until some time after the child of that liaison is born.

What of the wife who is subject to extreme physical cruelty at the hands of her husband? It may well be that it is in both party's interests, when that circumstance exists, by virtue of the doctrine of necessity, to have an immediate dissolution of the marriage. I ask the Minister this rhetorical question: Must a woman under the circumstances I have indicated be obliged to wait for a rather long period of time, causing great anguish and difficulty?

I want to make another point with respect to the elimination of necessity grounds. In my experience, under the present law judges are often reluctant to make orders for interim relief that may not be made final for an extended period of time. This is based on the knowledge gained by judges that facts that are alleged on interim applications often are in conflict and do not coincide with facts in the final disposition of any matter relating to marriage breakdown or divorce.

Under this Bill, interim relief could and would often extend for a year before such relief could be made final. The Minister will say if there is cruelty that you issue the divorce, and although you cannot get a final decree for a year, you can apply to the judge for a decree of interim alimony. I say to the Minister, because of the experience that I and many lawyers who deal in family law have had, that this may be a great disservice to the party who has every right, because of cruelty or whatever reason, to be living separate and apart from her husband.

The realistic facts are these. In these interim agreements judges have been somewhat reluctant to grant reasonable and adequate interim alimony, even under the present law, pending the completion of the litigation. We should consider these matters in terms of the effect that the sole ground for dissolution may have with respect to people in very difficult circumstances.

The move to eliminate the grounds of necessity requires serious consideration. I understand what the Minister is trying to do with this Bill. By dropping some of the grounds, we may find in the course of our deliberations that it should be sufficient for the parties to have the right to proceed immediately to divorce. We should look at this as the present law may not ameliorate the difficulties that surround the adversarial system.

The second major difficulty with this legislation is in its approach to the whole question of maintenance. This in turn involves the dual question of maintenance criteria and maintenance enforcement. I know the Minister spent a long period of time on this matter. I am sure he is sensitive to the very serious criticism that has been put forward regarding the lack of adequate provisions dealing with maintenance enforcement.

In dealing with the issue of maintenance criteria, this Bills sets out a number of objectives that the court should consider in making a maintenance order. While these objectives may well be desirable, what is conspicuously absent from them is any sort of precision. It will be left to the courts to try to establish a systematic method of achieving those enumerated objectives.

The absence of precision, coupled with the clear ambiguity, is objectionable for a number of reasons. First, it is much easier to arrive at a negotiated settlement between lawyers or through mediation if the rights and obligations of the parties involved are precise. The clearer and more explicit the criteria, the fewer things there are to fight about.

If you want a demonstration of this principle, Mr. Speaker, you need only look to provincial laws concerning matrimonial property. In many provinces the law now states that there is a presumption that matrimonial property is to be divided on a fifty-fifty basis. The parties are aware of this, and hence litigation and consequent expenses are significantly reduced. Instead of lawyers' fees eating up the family assets, they now go to the parties involved in the dispute.

A second problem with the stated objectives is that they do not ensure adequate maintenance for one type of situation in particular. I am referring to the common case of a woman who has been married for 20 or 30 years being faced with divorce proceedings. She has devoted her life to her home, husband and family and, as a consequence, the unfortunate fact is that she has few if any marketable skills and little prospect of being in a position to obtain the kind of training to put her back into the workplace so that she can sustain herself or be self-sufficient. Realistically, if her husband petitions for divorce she is not going to be able to support herself.

The Bill presented to us today does not adequately deal with this situation. It is often impractical to suggest that a woman in such circumstances can become economically self-sufficient. Yet even if the court recognizes this, there is no guarantee that the wife will receive maintenance sufficient to live in the manner to which she was accustomed. While her ex-husband may still have significant earning potential, the woman may be sentenced to a life of penury and deprivation. Surely it is up to us to direct our minds to seeing if we can structure this legislation to provide as much protection as is possible for women who find themselves in those unfortunate circumstances.

At least as important as the question of how maintenance is determined is the question of how maintenance orders are to be enforced. A maintenance order is of absolutely no use if the maintenance debtor refuses to pay and cannot be forced to pay. It is difficult to say precisely how many maintenance orders are in default at any one time, but estimates indicate that up to 75 per cent of maintenance orders are in default at this time.

This is a shameful and scandalous situation that has been tolerated for far too long in this country. It is too easy for a spouse to evade payment of a court ordered maintenance obligation by simply leaving the jurisdiction. Even if the spouse simply refuses to pay, it leaves an onerous obligation on the other spouse, who is obliged to bring an action to enforce the legitimate order. It invariably results in the administration of justice being brought into disrepute. The spouse, generally speaking the woman, has gone through a harrowing and traumatic divorce proceeding. She has obtained a maintenance order from the court obligating her husband to make payments. Her husband then refuses to pay. How can you explain to that woman that the justice system cannot force her husband to do what the court said he must? You cannot, of course. Meanwhile another person has lost faith in the system which is supposedly in place to protect her and her family.

The other obvious problem with the general unenforceability of maintenance orders is that the financial burden for family support is lifted from the individual, where it belongs, and transferred to the state, where it does not belong. Surely if the husband has the ability and legal obligation to help support his children, and perhaps his ex-wife, he should be made to do so. The Minister cannot justify his inaction in this area by claiming it is one of provincial responsibility. He has not seen fit to implement the recommendation made by the federal-provincial committee on the enforcement of maintenance and custody orders in Canada.

Mr. MacGuigan: We have.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: These recommendations were brought down last year and the Minister has had ample time to consider them. Certainly the proposal put forward by the committee deserves serious consideration.

In addition, they came down clearly in favour of the establishment of a central registry for maintenance and custody orders. The Minister has now said they are giving the most serious and immediate consideration to the final implementation of this concept. However, these are things which should have been pursued with great vigour prior to bringing in this legislation. This should not have come up after the Bill was introduced in the House. In a planted question on the floor of the House, the Minister was able to stand up and say: "Well, we finally got around to considering this matter and things are looking good. I want to thank my colleague, the Minister responsible for the Status of Women, for all the assistance she has given me".

That, Mr. Speaker, should have been dealt with by any self-respecting Minister of Justice in order to bring it to a conclusion. I believe, and it has now been verified by the Minister himself, that the provincial governments had been prepared to co-operate. He now tells us this is the case. Not before the Bill is brought in, but afterwards, which gives some indication of the bona fides with respect to the amount of time and energy the Minister expended to reach this very important agreement. Even though maintenance enforcement is primarily of provincial concern, surely it is up to the federal Government to show some leadership in resolving the horrendous problems which now exist. Uniform provincial agreements to permit nationwide enforcement of maintenance and custody orders are clearly necessary. No longer should it be possible for a spouse to escape his or her legal obligation simply by pulling up stakes and moving out of the jurisdiction where the original order was made.

When I began my remarks this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, I mentioned the difficulties which can arise when matters end up in the courts and the legal system and lawyers are inserted into the complex factors surrounding marriage breakdown. Unfortunately the legal process often exacerbates many problems rather than diminishes them. A large property or maintenance award may well be obtained at high cost in emotional and psychological terms. Unfortunately it is not possible to completely eliminate this difficulty. However, there are things which can be done to offset the negative aspects of divorce proceedings. In my view this should have been pursued by the Minister and his Government in order to bring some sanity to this whole question.

The Minister will know that we have across this country pilot unified family court projects. These resulted from federal-provincial agreements and involved not only judges with jurisdiction in both the federal and provincial areas of responsibility in these matters, but judges who can hear all these matters as superior court judges. But they also have a very unique capacity which I think is an important ingredient in any so-called reform and our divorce law. That, Mr. Speaker, is the capacity to make available to people faced with this unfortunate circumstance in their marital relationship good pre- and post-divorce counselling services.

I think one of the most successful parts of a unified family court is this unique counselling capacity which exists in the system. I know in my own home city of Saskatoon that we are indeed fortunate to have a unified family court system. I am sure the Minister will agree that these have been very successful enterprises. I think this is the direction in which we as legislators and as Members of Parliament must encourage divorce reform. We can all understand the pre-marriage breakdown counselling. Husband and wife have come in, their minds are set on dissolution of the marriage, but there is available a service which will bring perspective to the custody of and access to children. It will remove the adversarial atmosphere which exists in the courtroom. From the people I have spoken to who deal in family law, it is amazing the enormously good work which has been done in these counselling services.

This is the kind of expenditure of public funds we on this side of the House would very much encourage the Government to get involved in. It is a meaningful expenditure which, in the final analysis, will save Canadian taxpayers literally millions and millions of dollars lost when one spouse, usually the wife, finds herself on welfare and unable to support herself or her family.

I would also point out, Mr. Speaker, that pre-divorce consultation may in fact have the advantage of allowing people to consider reconciliation in a meaningful way. However, I suggest the post-divorce counselling services are equally important for individuals who have just had their world shattered. The normal situation in a divorce proceeding is that the last we see of these people is when they leave the courtroom hearing with a decree absolute. There is no provision except through welfare departments in some provinces for any kind of counselling in order to assist these single parent families where the change has been very difficult.

When we consider a Bill which will, according to some of the Minister's utterances, facilitate divorce, I think we have the responsibility of considering how best to implement counselling and mediation. One way which has worked, as I say, is through the unified family court concept.

Mr. MacGuigan: Manitoba has done it; speak to Saskatchewan.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Well, Mr. Speaker, there are examples across this country and I want to bring some to the attention of the Minister. A further example of initiatives in this area can be seen in the approach to mediation and custody disputes in Ontario. The Children's Law Reform Act provides a mechanism whereby a mediator can, at the request of the parties, be appointed. The role of the mediator is to consult with the parties, attempt to reach an agreement between them and ultimately file a full report with the court on the results of the mediation. I think this represents a novel and constructive approach and, along with similar concepts should receive comprehensive review by the committee. I agree with the Minister. Let us look at the experience in Manitoba, in Ontario and in Saskatchewan to see whether we can bring forward proposals that will enhance and improve the legislation.

● (1500)

The long and the short of it is that the Minister promised much and delivered little. We are getting used to that from this Government, of course. Unfortunately, it is the hundreds and thousands of Canadians who will seek divorces in the next few years who will suffer because of the lack of government action.

There are a number of areas that I could deal with but I do not want to spend an inordinate time on this. Many of my colleagues feel strongly about the legislation, feel strongly about support of the family unit and feel strongly about the protection of the rights of people affected by divorce. My colleague, the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), who is this Party's spokesperson on women's issues, has had a long and distinguished career standing up for the rights of women, particularly the disadvantaged women in our society, those who often have suffered the trauma of divorce. I look forward to her remarks on some of the inconsistencies in this legislative package. She will deal with matters to which I have only had an opportunity to allude in a general way. I look forward to a full and reasonable debate.

There are aspects of the Bill which I think may lead, willy-nilly, to results contrary to those that the Minister intended. For example, we should consider the Minister's idea about trying to take the whole question of divorces arrived at by agreement out of the courts. I understand the motivation of the Minister in this regard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member but his time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is it agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I want to conclude with one example, Mr. Speaker. In the present circumstances the law is that even when there are settlements with respect to maintenance and other things that come before a judge in a divorce action, the court is not required to accept that agreement arrived at by the spouses. The idea the Minister put forward would obviate the necessity of a trial where there is consent to divorce proceedings and where all items such as maintenance, dissolution of marriage, custody and other ancillary matters have been settled. It is my experience that in a great number of cases, after observing the litigants first hand and having had an opportunity to examine and cross-examine the parties, the judge will come to the conclusion that such an agreement is not in the best interests of one party or the other. He may feel that the wife is accepting it because she has been harangued and harassed and would be in a difficult position if she did not accept the husband's offer. In those circumstances, whether the parties like it or not, the judge may not accept the agreement and rule that the maintenance be twice as much, for example, and if the wife does not want to pursue it, then so be it.

These are the things that I think we must examine. We must examine the Bill and determine whether it is constructive and thorough and if it will bring about appropriate reform. The Minister has taken a one dimensional approach, I think, but we need an approach that is consistent with the welfare of the men and women concerned, that is consistent with the welfare of the children of those marriages and consistent with the principles of equity and fairness regarding maintenance orders and the enforcement of them.

I can assure the Minister that on this side of the House we regard this as a very important piece of legislation and he will receive a number of constructive suggestions from my colleagues.

I want to thank Hon. Members for their indulgence in allowing me extra time to speak, Mr. Speaker. I also want to tell the Minister that because we find the Bill lacking in so many essential elements in its present form, we in this Party are unable to support it.

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to take part in this extremely important debate on divorce. This is the first reform in our divorce legislation in Canada since 1968. There are roughly 60,000 divorces in the country every year, half of them involving minor children. It has been estimated that up to 40 per cent of first marriages presently undertaken will end in divorce, so it is a matter that touches a large number of people.

Reform is needed, Mr. Speaker, and the Bill will accomplish one major reform. It also deals with a few minor reforms. However, it is grossly deficient in a number of other matters, especially in the area of maintenance. I shall deal with these deficiencies at some length.

Let me begin with the area in which there is broad agreement, that of marriage breakdown as the sole grounds for divorce. It has been said that divorce does not cause marriage breakdown; unsatisfactory marriages do. A decree of divorce does not kill a marriage; it certifies that it is dead. This is the spirit behind the approach to marriage breakdown as the sole grounds for divorce. It is a principle that the New Democratic Party has accepted for many years. It has been on our books since 1967, and a large number of women's organizations have recommended recognition of this principle as the sole grounds for divorce. There is overwhelming support for it among women's groups. Let me quote from a couple of them, Mr. Speaker.

The Catholic Women's League, an important women's organization in Canada, in its brief to the Minister of Justice (Mr. MacGuigan) said that the present system of having to air one's marital laundry in a public court room seems both demeaning and time consuming. It is obvious that at a time when the matter is being heard by a divorce court judge, any possibility of reconciliation has long since dissipated. The organization says that the present system appears to lend itself to a good deal of mutual disrespect and disposes of any possible future friendship the spouses may have. Furthermore, it believes that the accusations and counter-accusations of the present adversarial system seem to do a great deal of harm to the familial relationship which oftentimes must survive the dissolution of a marriage because of children.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, it is especially because of the children that we are concerned to see marriage breakdown established as the sole grounds for divorce. Having it so established will make it easier for arrangements for custody and maintenance to be facilitated.

The National Association of Women and the Law says that to attempt to focus upon a single marital fault on the part of one of the spouses as the cause of the breakdown of marriage is most often a distortion of the marriage relationship. It says that hostility between the spouses on the issue of grounds must necessarily taint negotiations between the parties on corollary issues where important decisions must be made on more relevant considerations such as the best interests of the children.

The one-year waiting period to establish marriage breakdown, of course, is more controversial. Some people think it is too short and some think it is too long. Some women's organizations have suggested that there ought to be no fixed waiting period at all. The National Association of Women and the Law and the National Action Committee on the status of women have taken this position, and they have reasons for doing so. Let me quote the National Action Committee. It says:

Marriage must be recognized as an equal partnership, entered into voluntarily by a woman and a man. Once one of the parties has decided that the partnership is not working, the relationship is clearly ended and no legal rule will make it work. The spouses should be able to declare that the marriage has broken down, and that declaration should be regarded as sufficient to prove the breakdown. Proof of separation or fault should not be required.

This is quite an extreme statement and lots of people would disagree with it. Clearly, the one-year period to establish marriage breakdown is a compromise between those who think it is too long and those who think it is too short. I suspect that there would never be a period on which we could agree as being ideal for all situations.

I consulted a number of ministers and priests in my own riding. We had an excellent discussion on this subject. Some felt that one year was too short. Some felt that there might be greater reconciliation achieved if there were a longer period. None of them, however, felt it was easy to arrive at a time, and there were no great objections to the period of one year. The one year seems at least not unreasonable.

With respect to support for the family, some groups, particularly the Catholic bishops, have argued that instead of making divorce easier, we should be making marriage more difficult. It is indeed true that it is easier to get a marriage licence than to get a driver's licence. Certainly, I myself and the New Democratic Party have vigorously supported all kinds of measures to assist the family; family allowance, maternity benefits, parental leave and daycare provisions. I welcome as well the provision in this legislation which would promote reconciliation within the marriage itself. However, I have to remind people who would like to see marriage made more difficult that marriage itself comes under provincial jurisdiction. It is not possible in the course of amending the Divorce Act to deal directly with that question. We, of course, do have responsibilities as parliamentarians to support the family with many other provisions.

With respect to custody arrangements, here again we do see some improvements, and I welcome them. It will be clearly stated in the legislation that the best interests of the child will be the principal factor in determining custody. There are provisions for awards of joint custody and for persons other than the parents to have custody, possibly the grandparents, and access could be established for the grandparents in a court order. This is certainly an important reform. There is also provision for independent representation of the children in court.

I feel that the Bill could be more explicit in establishing the criteria by which the best interests of the children would be determined by a court. The Law Reform Commission of Canada made some recommendations back in 1975, and these have been taken up by Ontario, and, indeed, used more widely in Canada. I will cite some of them; the emotional tie of the child to the persons claiming custody, the preferences of the child, the length of time the child has had with the person claiming custody, plans for the upbringing of the child, the capacity of the parents for guidance, education and providing the necessities of life, any special needs of the child, the stability of the custodial household, and the relationship to the child, whether by blood, adoption or any other kind. We do, therefore, have some criteria and perhaps it should be in the legislation. Other lists could be provided, and the National Association of Women and the Law, I believe, has a very good list as well. It refers to the mental, emotional and physical needs of the child and the ability of each spouse to provide for such needs. There is the effect of disruption on the child's sense of continuity and need for stability, the views and preferences of the child where such can be reasonably ascertained, the need to foster access to the non-custodial spouse, and the relationship among other children in the family. I believe some greater specificity on the criteria would be important to have in the legislation.

[Translation]

Even though we agree with the principle of marriage breakdown being the only ground for divorce, we of the New Democratic Party do not support this Bill on second reading. The drawbacks of this Bill are much too serious and, if it is adopted, it will have dire consequences, especially for women and children who are economically dependent. Although current alimony payments are already inadequate, the proposed amendments, will make the situation of dependent women and children even worse than it is today. The trend nowadays seems to be towards lower alimony payments over ever shorter periods of time. Yet this Bill goes further in the sense that it advocates fixed periods of time and even less generous alimony payments. Why? Apparently because this Bill considers economic independence as something which is due. Indeed it is a reasonable objective, particularly in the case of young childless couples where both spouses are still working. I am reading the text of the Department of Justice on divorce.

It may be true that in many instances the dependent spouse ought to be entitled to long-term financial support, but that is not always the case. After leaving the labour market in order to run the household and take care of the children, the dependent spouse may find it difficult, if not altogether impossible, to earn a decent income after the divorce. This decrease in one's ability to earn a living is a direct consequence of marriage and should be taken into account when figuring out the amount of financial support. In many cases, however, the dependent spouse might be able to return to the labour market, particularly if measures are taken to enable him or her to get vocational training or go back to school. Some day, that spouse might become self-supporting and financially independent.

The Department is aware that it may be impossible for some women to become economically independent, according to this Bill, yet the Bill does imply that all women are financially independent. Quite simply, the Bill fails to take into account the real situation of a great many women who have looked after the household and raised their children on a full-time basis over a number of years.

Let us admit that there is indeed economic dependence in such a case. Take for instance a women aged 55 who has not had a paid job for 30 or 35 years. She quit working when her first child was born. Her work at home has made it possible for her husband to take the technical training needed to pursue his own career. At the age of 55, that woman cannot make up for lost time. Without any experience on the labour market, what can she do? She could earn a living washing dishes in a restaurant, but is that fair? Let us suppose that this woman had been the wife of a doctor, a lawyer or a Member of Parliament. Is it reasonable for her standard of living to go down that much? Are the highly abstract principles of economic independance, justice and maintenance of a comparable standard of living without significance for the lawyers at the Department of Justice? Unfortunately, the Bill is firm in this regard. The only criterion applicable to maintenance payments is avoidance of serious economic conditions. Maintenance payments will no longer promote economic independence and avoid hardship. That is all! According to the criteria proposed in this Bill, I would say that the principle of economic independence for every man and woman should be outweighed by the concept of justice.

There are various types of marriage. Especially where marriages having lasted a long time are concerned, other criteria should be developed. The other basic deficiency I find in this Bill is the absolute lack of practical provisions for the collection of maintenance payments. As we know, unfortunately, most maintenance payments ordered by the courts are never made. About 75 per cent of maintenance payments are in arrears with the result that thousands of women and children are living in proverty without adequate means of support. These figures are well-known and cannot be questioned. In addition, many practical solutions have been suggested to change the alimony system. During the summer of 1983, a federal-provincial task force came up with recommendations for the reform of the present system. Yet, this Bill contains no practical answers.

A reform of our divorce legislation is not acceptable without a reform of the provisions to enforce maintenance orders.

• (1520)

We have heard too much talk about this Bill legislating no fault divorce. The fact is that really it legislates no responsibility divorce. The provisions for maintenance in Bill C-10 are unrealistic, short-sighted, unfair and will cause real harm to women predominantly, and in some cases to children, if it is passed.

In the rarified atmosphere of the Ministry of Justice the pursuit of an abstract principle, that of economic independence, is considered more important than dealing with the real problems we all know too much about. The goal of economic independence is suitable for many divorced people. The paper outlining the Bill admits it is not realistic for all. It is what is in the Act that counts rather than what is in the discussion paper when it comes to a case in court.

Many women's groups and expert individuals have made very good and persuasive arguments for different provisions. I would like to quote Judge Rosalee Abella from a paper entitled "Economic Adjustment on Marriage Breakdown". Judge Abella notes that spousal independence should not be taken too literally. "Independence will not be possible for every one". It should not be used, as it has been, prematurely, and certainly not where the realities of the marketplace and community make it impractical. If the wife is at home, it is usually because both spouses expect it and often want her there. To suggest to these women that they should become independent when their marriages dissolve is to ignore the economics of their situations. Though they are legally considered equal partners in their former marriage, because of the marriage and because of community expectations, they undertook a role which, though it created equal status, did not create equal access to independent sources of income.

According to Judge Abella, maintenance should not be paid because the wife was formerly her husband's dependant but because she was and is his equal partner who has needs which the partnership created and encouraged. Ideally these payments should be at a level to permit both of them to continue at the same standard of living they had in the marriage.

The years when the husband was increasing his educational and career prospects were years which increasingly diminished the wife's prospects in the labour force. It is the traditional marriage partnership itself over the years which creates an economic disability. The economics of indefinite support flows naturally from the economics of most current marriage relationships.

The National Action Committee on the status of women has made its recommendations on maintenance very clear. They are more realistic and fairer than the ones in the Bill before us today. The National Action Committee suggests that we consider three different types of marriage. For some the principle of economic dependence simply as it is is quite adequate. These are younger couples who split up without either partner having been harmed in the sense of an economic dependence being created in the course of the marriage. When a spouse's capacity to support herself or himself has been reduced by the division of tasks within the family, temporary support should be granted to allow that spouse to continue to be a full-time parent and allow time to upgrade skills and re-enter the labour market. This should include general education up to and including university.

Let us look at the situation of a long-term homemaker where a permanent dependency has been created. In divorces following marriages of long duration where one spouse was a homemaker and a permanent dependency was created, long-term maintenance should be ordered and the criteria used should be fairness and justice. Such wholly dependent spouses should not be expected to seek employment in occupations far below their previous living standards. For example, a homemaker married to a doctor for 30 years should not be denied long-term support for the reason that she could support herself if she found a job as a sales clerk or cleaning lady.

The National Association of Women and the Law has offered a set of similar criteria beginning with a mutual obligation to take all reasonable steps to become financially independent, but conceding that where this is not possible because of the duties undertaken in the marriage, long-term maintenance is required.

Most maintenance payments ordered by the courts are not made. It is true that to improve collection much must be done at the provincial level and some changes require joint action of the federal and provincial Governments. Many measures could and should be taken under federal jurisdiction. One of the main contributions the federal Government could make is in the location of persons defaulting on court ordered maintenance payments. If a defaulter leaves the province to avoid payment, he may be receiving unemployment insurance or paying his income tax and there are records by which his new address could be located. There is a concern for privacy, but I would suggest this does not outweigh the concern that children be supported and dependent spouses receive justice. All federal records, save the census, should be open for the location of addresses of defaulters in the case of court ordered maintenance.

Legislation is needed to provide such access and should be dealt with, if not in the same legislation, in companion legislation at the same time. Given the complacency of the Ministry of Justice, I am not optimistic that we can wait for it to deal with this matter. The recommendations of the Law Reform Commission of Canada on this subject go back to 1976. The Royal Commission on the Status of Women in Canada reported on the deficiencies in 1970. It has had a long time to work out practical criteria with the provinces.

Consistent with the proposal for improving access to addresses to locate the defaulters is the notion of interception. Wages and salaries are subject to garnishment for non-payment. I suggest the same principle should hold for other moneys under federal jurisdiction. Income tax refunds, unemployment insurance, interest on Canada saving bonds, and pensions are all moneys under federal jurisdiction. Why should they be exempt? In the time of the marriage itself these moneys would be shared for the support of the whole family. After a divorce why should they become the private property of only the breadwinner, while other members of the family suffer want as a result? It is time the federal Government stopped blaming the provinces for inaction and did what it can under its own jurisdiction.

Good divorce law should take into account pensions. After all, pensions are deferred wages and salaries. When a couple divide their labours so that one joins the work force and earns an income and the other stays home to look after the home and raise the children, there is an implied contract that that income is for the support of all of them. The same should hold for pensions which are simply a carry-over of that income. Pension splitting is only fair, but Bill C-10 does not deal with it.

In the Budget reference is made to the Government's intention to split Canada Pension Plan credits on marriage breakdown. Certainly the Government is recognizing the principle and the Minister referred to it earlier today saying it would be done for other pensions under federal jurisdiction. I remind Hon. Members that this was not said in the Budget and we have not seen the legislation. Given the slowness of action on the part of the Government and the complacency on this subject, I would not be optimistic. I would like to see all pensions under federal jurisdiction dealt with promptly. That would include pensions of MPs, Senators, judges and federal public servants.

Last year the Judges Act was amended but this was not dealt with. It could have been dealt with then. After all, judges are making decisions about the livelihood of dependent members in families. Their own pensions do not permit credit splitting. Judges should have model provisions for pensions if they are going to be enforcing the law for other people.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer to the issue of unified family courts. This is a very important reform. Lawyers, social workers, women's organizations and so forth have recommended the institution of unified family courts on a comprehensive basis. Experiments have been made and it has been found that they are better. They provide counselling services, they are less expensive for access and for changing maintenance orders. There are many conveniences in having unified family courts. It is difficult for people to go from court to court, from superior court to provincial courts and to family courts. This is a reform which must be dealt with. I am just not satisfied that the recommendations on it are being considered. There should be legislation on it. It should be possible for any province that wishes to establish a unified family court to do so.

To conclude, I say that Bill C-10, is grossly deficient. It must go back to the drawing board. I do not accept the Minister's excuse that we cannot do more in the present context. The Minister himself is an expert in omnibus Bills. We had a 306 page Bill on criminal law legislation. Surely this is an area on which there should be an omnibus Bill. It should be omnibus on divorce, to deal with all the related issues such as the enforcement of maintenance payments, the establishment of unified family courts, credit splitting of pensions by judges, and income tax access and statistical record access for the location of defaulters. These are all federal statutes which need quite modest amendments. However, the principle is important. When this does not take place people really do suffer.

If the Department cannot draft suitable legislation, it ought to hire someone who can. I suggest that the Minister withdraw the Bill and bring it back with suitable amendments. We do not need more study because we know what needs to be done. I can assure the Minister of my Party's support for speedy passage when he brings back a Bill that really deals with the issues of maintenance, a Bill which is fair and deals with the issue adequately and concretely.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I know the Hon. Member is seeking to ask questions but questions are not permitted with the first three speakers. Questions may be permitted with the round I am starting. We will welcome the intervention of the Hon. Member from Hamilton at that time.

When I look at this Bill, I call it swinging door legislation. Marriage in Canada is destined to become a swinging door affair. It is extraordinarily easy to get married, notwithstanding the rather strict requirements of many established churches for people to attend marriage preparation courses. While many people take those courses, and I am pleased that they do, they in themselves are no guarantee that a marriage may not break down. A mere trip to a justice of the peace, the deputy registrar of vital statistics in any city or some "marrying Sam" is evidence enough that if certain people perhaps have an amorous or physical desire for one another they can satisfy themselves under the cover of legality. But surely a marriage based upon that alone will not last.

What I and, I am sure, many Hon. Members and hundreds of thousands of Canadians are concerned about is that this Bill is frankly an attack on the family and its continued existence. Marriage should not be buried as a traditional way of life that has gone out of style. That is not the purpose of marriage.

The purpose of marriage is essentially the procreation and raising of children by a man and a woman. Through the years it is married people who have produced and raised children. Are we now to make a sort of rabbit colony relationship in which man meets woman, man likes woman, woman likes man, bingo, they live together and produce children? Is that going to be our concept of life?

I suggest to the House that this Bill is in many ways part of this, shall we say "easy does it" mentality of the 1960s and 1970s that has permeated through to certain academic levels, certain levels among social workers, among the so-called intelligentsia and sophisticates. The mentality is that if a couple of people get tired of one another or if a particular way of life is not satisfactory, the man need only go out and shuck his wife as he would discard his suit or the wife may discard her husband as she would her year-old dress. This Bill merely reflects that attitude. I do not know that Canadian society will improve as a result thereof.

This Bill has encountered a good deal of opposition. One might expect the Conference of Catholic Bishops to have their say, and to their credit they have done so. It is an area in which they have a right and obligation to speak. There are other church groups and organizations which must look after the children of many of this mismatings and casual matings that we have in modern day society. They also have to look after wives who are discarded.

Incidentally, this divorce law is in many ways no different from some of our veterans affairs legislation. That legislation allows a veteran, under the insurance plan, merely to put aside his wife and live notoriously in the open with another woman. After a year, if he is not in a position to get remarried, he can merely designate his female companion as a beneficiary under the policy. There are other similar features about common law living with regard to veterans' pensions. It is "easy does it."

We must reflect upon whether Canadian society has become a rabbit hutch society. Many of my colleagues have criticized the philosophy behind this legislation. May I say that I have before me a Department of Justice hand-out of information which is printed in the National Review that is published by the Canadian Bar Association. The only thing I can say about the Department of Justice publicist who wrote this is that I wish he had learned his English. We are at repeated points. Just to take one, the word "alternatives" is used to describe numerous options. Let that individual go back and find out what the word "alternative" means. It means one of two, not one of many. There is a column replete with the misuse of that word. That is not good enough for the Department of Justice. We are faced here according to this learned person, with a span of 15 years from the last divorce amendments and consequently there must now be a change in the Divorce Act to comply with social developments. What utter piffle!

We remember before when the Divorce Act was changed when cruelty, desertion for three years, adultery, and several other sex-related crimes were the sole grounds of divorce. Of course, that really did set up, at times, an adversarial form of dealing with divorce, an accusation of adultery perhaps when quite often there was not that situation. There was the business of spurious grounds for divorce in manufactured cases, the old motel room routine; what we used to see so often before the Private Members' Committee of the Senate on Divorce. There was a whole industry in the Province of Quebec, which did not on any grounds allow for divorce. We had this sort of set up divorce machinery. Yet the statistics referred to in this Department of Justice release show that only one in 20 divorces may be contested. Usually divorce is not contested on the grounds of whether there was cruelty or whether there were grounds for divorce. The divorce is contested as a result of a refusal to agree or an inability to agree on the separation of assets, or on the size of the monthly maintenance for the spouse and, if there are children, for the children. That is the nub of why there are contests.

Then, I regret to say, there are some cases that finish up before the court because of the crass ignorance and incompetence of counsel who are advising the parties concerned. I am ashamed sometimes to see the performances of some of my fellow barristers, particularly in matters of this kind. There was always the fee hunter who did not care about what he had to do under the Act but wanted to finish up in court because he could then collect more in fees. Not only ambulance chasers do you find among the legal profession, but divorce hounds. That has its influence on that one person in 20. I would go as far as to say that possibly one in 30 divorces is contested. Is that sufficient reason, one in 30, to get into this open door of no fault? After one year of the filing of a petition for no fault divorce, the decree may be granted. But, Mr. Speaker, there are 90 days of cohabitation allowed, either continuously or cumulatively, after that one year following the filing of the petition. What is this filing for petition for divorce with weekend rights, visation and cohabitation? That is really a fine way of doing it, is it not? I will admit that it might be hard to penalize a person who has made a serious effort at reconciliation who has lived with his or her spouse during that period of attempted reconciliation for two or three months and then finds it is absolutely impossible to reconcile. Therefore, that person is excused. But I know how it is going to work out in the courts, the same way as it was 15 years ago when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), as Minister of Justice, brought forward the changes in the Divorce Act. That was supposed to provide for marriage counselling and an attempt at reconciliation. I know for a fact that that was the biggest hoax ever perpetrated on Canadians. Divorce lawyers did not even pretend to refer anyone to a family counselling agency. There was mere lip service paid to that provision. That is why I say this Bill pays the same lip service to reconciliation and to efforts to preserve the marriage. That is why I am against this Bill.

If marriage is worth something, it is worth people putting something into it to make it work. That includes going to marriage consellors, proper marriage counsellors, not some social divorce lawyer who may take off his coat and say, "I am a marriage counsellor now," to make the marriage work possibly after a serious spat.

I invite Hon. Members or anyone who reads or who hears what I have had to say to look into their own family to see how many young couples have separated over a stupid little quarrel where each one took the high ground and gathered around himself or herself people who said, "Yes, you are doing the right thing." They may be people who were possibly unprepared for marriage. But there are people who fall into the hands of right-meaning relatives, clergy, counsellors or family service bureaux. If people really mean anything to one another they will make a sincere effort to see if they can find a way to patch up their differences. Sometimes it takes an extra step or an extra mile to achieve success. Apparently that is not the rule today. It is too much effort to patch it up and it is too easy to get a divorce. They feel, what is the difference; they can be married to someone else within six months. Maybe the girl the chap has married is not as glamorous over the breakfast table as she was at some dinner or at some dance; maybe he has halitosis in the morning or he is grumpy. Well, if all those things cannot be cured by some good will and change on the part of both parties, both of them are pretty poor stuff to start with.

I say that this Bill is deficient in that it makes insufficient provision for appropriate counselling and efforts at reconciliation to preserve the marriage. What should be the objective of any matrimonial legislation? It should not be to split the parties but to preserve them, if at all possible. I have seen some actions involving serious marriage offences. As a matter of fact I could cite two examples of young couples who were married in September and obtained their decree absolute the following March.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order, please! I regret to interrupt the interesting remarks the Hon. Member is making, but the time allocated to him has expired.

[English]

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could continue or take questions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): We will proceed to the ten-minute period for questions or comments relevant to the speech of the Hon. Member.

Mr. Hudecki: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make one or two observations which coincide very much with what the Hon. Member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has just enunciated. Personally I would like to see very few divorce actions, but the reality of today is such that this is not possible. Divorce actions really penalize a third party, the children, and are certainly the basis of a great deal of misbehaviour and insecurity on the part of children and further breakdown of families. However, I want to expand somewhat on the aspect of divorce about which the Hon. Member for Edmonton West spoke so eloquently, that is, the responsibility of the legal profession in assessing whether or not proper counselling or support has been given to the couple considering divorce.

As I understand it, every lawyer is expected to sign a warrant to the effect that every conceivable approach has been taken in order to keep the marriage together. This may vary from province to province, yet when one hears the duration between the time an action is started and divorce is granted, it appears that this has not been carried out. Among the people I have seen in the practice of medicine, there has been very little attempt made to bring these couples together. This is a reflection of negligence on the part of the legal profession. In the medical profession, the greater the challenge, the harder the research work and the harder the practitioner works to find a solution to the problem. In the legal profession the common practice has been to go through with divorce actions as rapidly as possible and not give the needed social support to the couples.

A second aspect which is of concern to me is again the one year duration in the Bill. A divorce action is a very serious emotional experience for both men and women. Much reference has been made to women, but I would like to indicate that men go through the same emotionally disturbed period. There are many who require as much as a year to think rationally and to plan their lives as they had originally intended. Some steps must and should be taken to assess whether or not these people were able to assimilate intelligently the counselling and support given in order to keep a marriage together.

I agree with the Hon. Member for Edmonton West that very often the obstacle or barrier to bringing a couple together is minimal and with expert support could be remedied. On that account I feel that one year is too short a period of time to bring about corrective, remedial action. I feel that that period of time should be reconsidered.

I just wanted to bring those two observations to the attention of the House in the hope that they will be considered further in the deliberation of this Bill.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, unlike most of those who rise to speak on Bills and say that they are delighted to have the opportunity, I do not intend to make any such statement at the beginning of my comments. I am anything but delighted to speak on this Bill or enter into debate on it. I am definitely and deeply displeased to have to speak in this debate because I feel that the Bill is a shoddy piece of work, brought before the House immaturely, and is really a disservice to the House in its present form. It is ill-considered, to put it at its mildest, and it is a disgrace as law and an insult to the institution of marriage.

However, I am on my feet and I intend to indicate my views on this Bill. First, I think it is odd. Perhaps odd is not the correct word. There may be another word which will generate itself as I continue. However, there are three Bills now before us which are intended to go through the House on second reading and be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. I cannot really make out whether it is honestly intended by the Government that these three Bills should become law or whether they are just being put forward as a token of the intention of the Government to do something about the three matters.

One subject is of course the security intelligence Bill which has been before the House but second reading of which has not been concluded. The second one is this divorce Bill, which I say is a disgrace to the House and is offensive in the manner in which it has been put forward and the manner in which it covers the purported matter of the Bill. The third one is that very thick Bill, the Criminal Code amendments, which again offends every good legislative taste. I am not sure whether the intention is that these three Bills be passed by the House or whether it is just a device.

If I may call it four o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I will continue at the next opportunity.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order, please! It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

CONSTITUTION ACT, 1867

REQUEST TO CHANGE BOUNDARIES OF NATIONAL CAPITAL

The House resumed, from Friday, January 20, 1984, consideration of the motion of Mr. Isabelle that Bill C-206, an Act to amend the Constitutional Act, 1867 (national capital of Canada) be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I think we have a rather unusual and even bizarre situation here this afternoon. About two or three years ago, we debated a proposal tabled by the Hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Isabelle) on—I am not sure it was the same subject—the amalgamation or twinning of Hull with Ottawa, to make them both the capital of this country. Or maybe it was to create a National Capital Region that would include Hull. In any case, it concerned the City of Hull and area. However, this time, something funny is going on with the period set aside for Private Members' Business. We start with a first draw for fifty, more or less. Then, when it is a Member's turn to present a Bill or a motion or some Private Bill, he has the right to do so. However, I see that on January 20, Bill C-206 was debated for one hour. The Hon. Member presented his Bill, and subsequently my colleague from Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick) spoke to the Bill, and also my colleague from North Vancouver-Burnaby (Mr. Cook) and finally the Member for Kootenay West (Mr. Kristiansen). But if we look at the list of private bills, who do we see under No. 11? The same Hon. Member for Hull with Bill C-205. Now, how can we have 205, which is also about Hull how can we have both 205 and 206 in the name of the Member for Hull? Who is playing games here? Who is fiddling with the rules? Somebody must have fiddled with the formula for presenting private bills or motions, because the same Member is not supposed to have two in succession. A Member can only have one option in the first fifty. Yes, but this is all in the same session. Do you see? So—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): The Hon. Member for Hull, on a Point of Order.

Mr. Isabelle: I think the Member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) is somewhat mistaken, because the normal procedure was followed. In fact, he must know the procedure far better than I do. Do you know why, after the debate on January 20, the Bill was allowed to stand and fell to the bottom of the list? Because, Mr. Speaker, no one could be found either on the opposition side or on this side. So I was asked whether I was prepared to speak to the Bill. So I said yes. And as for the matter of debating the other Bills, the other Bill or the same Bill, if you prefer, this was because my name was selected at random from the first ten. That is why the Bill is being presented today. There was no fiddling, and if there was, it was not me.

Mr. Lambert: No, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order, please. First of all, I would like to point out to the Hon. Members that, at the beginning of Private Members' Hour, I asked whether all the items preceding No. 102 were to stand. I received unanimous consent. I also want to add that it is normal that we should be discussing at this moment the substance of Bill C-206 and that the subject under consideration is not how the bill numbers are drawn or the order in which they come before the House. The Chair has been informed that the normal procedure was followed when the Bill sponsored by the Hon. Member went down to the bottom of the list the last time it was debated. All those who appear before him on the list were contacted and no one was willing to proceed.

It must be noted that today is Friday. We are discussing item No. 102 and I would ask the Hon. Members who wish to take part in the debate to deal with the contents of Bill C-206 now under consideration.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, if you had followed my comments, you would know that I was saying that there were two Bills at issue and that it was difficult to identify their contents. The Hon. Member interrupted me because I believed and still believe that we have distorted the procedure. The Hon. Member is not to blame! It is the bureaucrats. Well, listen! I know what happened and I am going to say so. This will have to be explained and it is not up to the Chair to consider this matter because the Chair has nothing to do with it. The Chair should not interfere in the debate! We are considering including the City of Hull in the area called the National Capital of Canada. The Bill simply states that it is hereby declared that the National Capital of Canada and the seat of the federal Government of Canada shall consist of the City of Ottawa, in the province of Ontario, and the City of Hull in the province of Quebec, and also of such surrounding area as prescribed from time to time by the Parliament of Canada. This simply means, first of all, according to the comments made by the Hon. Member, that the City of Hull will be included in the National Capital area. It does not say anything about the city of Nepean or that of Kanata. All it says is "the city of Hull and its surrounding area". There is a complete lack of definition. It does not say anything about Rockliffe or Vanier or Gloucester either. If you ask any out-of-towner who is visiting the national capital, Ottawa, and who has no idea of the limits of the many cities and towns within the Ottawa area . . . Does the Hon. Member himself know where are the limits between the City of Gloucester and that of Ottawa?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): The Hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Isabelle) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Isabelle: I must regretfully tell my Hon. colleague that he should read the Bill as it is, because what I really want to do is to replace Ottawa as the national capital—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Can the Hon. Member resume his seat? This is not a point of order. The Hon. Member for Hull may not agree with the Hon. Member for Edmonton West, however the latter has the floor and should be listened to.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, actually, I know what the Hon. Member is attempting to do . . . Listen, I have much sympathy for what he is attempting to do.

● (1610)

Legally, the National Capital is encompassed within the very narrow limits of the City of Ottawa. I suggest there are as many people, if no more, who live in what they consider as Greater Ottawa, an area we think of as the National Capital! I know that my colleague from Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick), and also the two Hon. Members who spoke before favour the idea. Yes! That may make sense! But it must be remembered that, just because Air Canada mentions Ottawa-Hull in its schedules, that does not mean that Ottawa-Hull is the National Capital. No more than Toronto-Hamilton, which appear as twin cities in the same schedule are one city. They are neighbour cities, but not part of the same urban centre. There are many such examples.

I can see some constitutional problems. Naturally, some of you will remind me that there should be consultation with the provinces about the site of the Capital. I know that there is a National Capital Region unilaterally declared by the federal Government and which includes some areas in Quebec, like the entire Gatineau Park, but no agreement has been reached on that point, at least I do not know of any. The Hon. Member suggests that a legal authority exists and that we would merely need an order in council to determine the area included in the Capital. It would be the National Capital Region including appropriate towns and suburbs. I am not quite so sure. It seems to me that it could give rise to a confrontation, especially with the Quebec government. I think that it would almost be like a declaration of war. The province of Ontario could very well say: the provinces are entitled to establish towns within their limits and if necessary to alter the limits of cities or municipalities under such or such an administrative procedure. Well, what can you expect? And we have seen municipalities on the other side of the Ottawa River being merged and made into one city through by-laws under the authority of the Government of Quebec. We all know that. But now, however, we are talking about an order in council issued by the federal Cabinet and stating that henceforth the City of Hull will be part of Canada's capital. Hull would be in the National Capital. What would be the legal consequences? I read the speech of the Hon. Member, but I did not find any reference to the legal consequences of such action. Of course, he did mention certain advantages which would flow from that and would affect the region of Hull as well as Ottawa, but we have not heard anything about some of the negative consequences and it seems to me that we are entitled to a word of explanation before we even consider adopting this Bill, or any other on the same subject, and sending it to Committee. It is not after adopting the Bill that we should have explanations which might perhaps make us change our mind and decide to withdraw our support. You know, Mr. Speaker, we have a practice here whereby, if a Bill is passed on second reading, the principle of the Bill is adopted. I for one do not see it that way and I say that it is wrong because Bill C-206 appears on the Order Paper for second reading and reference to such or such Committee of the House where the Bill would be considered and then reported. It might be reported with an amendment which would have been approved by the majority on the Committee and which might or right not be accepted by the House. An amendment could very well be tabled and debated in this House and the Bill could then be read for the second time. This is the way it goes. The report of the committee of the whole is then agreed upon and the Chair says: "The Bill is read for the second time." We are now being told that, after going through this stage in committee of the whole and after the Bill has been voted on at second reading, it has definitely been accepted or approved in principle. That is false, completely false, but the truth has to be pointed out to these people, beginning with the Prime Minister, because he is always saying that once you have agreed to a Bill you are marked forever, which is completely false, because the Bill is accepted in principle only after its referral here, to the committee, and after the Chair has called the vote at the second reading stage. The same is true, Mr. Speaker, with the procedure in this case. Committee chairmen who do not accept that you put forward amendments because the principle of the Bill has been adopted and the amendment flies in the face of that principle. So this cannot be, you did not present it a second time for acceptance.

I would appreciate that, as a conclusion to this debate, the hon. member speak of certain legal implications he anticipates, and also indicate his view as to the attitude of the Province of Quebec and the Province of Ontario, which are the provinces affected. Frankly, I would have this to say, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion. Do you know that the people in Edmonton would have something to say on the composition of the national capital? It belongs to them and to me, a resident, a property owner in the City of Ottawa, as much as to the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Isabelle).

Hon. Members opposite also, and the citizens of their towns have a voice as to what should happen to the National Capital.

• (1620)

Mr. George Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I decided to say a few words about the Bill presented by the Hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Isabelle) because having observed his attempts over the last few years to accomplish this change I can see that even now there is some disagreement or lack of understanding of what he is trying to do. Basically he is simply trying to amend Section 16 of the Constitution Act of 1867; in other words to have the national capital of Canada designated the national capital area.

Over the last few years the Hon. Member for Hull has tried to convince Parliament that since 1858 things have changed drastically and so other things should change as well. One of the changes is introduced in the Bill. On numerous occasions he has pointed out that Parliament has expanded to the Quebec side, that the National Capital Region includes municipalities in Ontario and Quebec. He therefore asks the question, why not make it the capital of Canada? Ottawa and Hull and the surrounding areas equal the National Capital Region.

If we look at the remarks made by the Hon. Member for Hull when introducing the Bill, we will see that on January 20, as reported at page 617, he said:

> —if we refer to the history of the national capital area, we see that since the small village of Bytown was selected by the Queen in 1858, it was then ridiculed and called a forest centre and a capital of logs, the City of Ottawa as such has constantly developed.
> The reason why I am asking for that amendment is that since the time of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Sir Robert Borden and even the Right Hon. Mackenzie King, we have always wanted to make of the capital of Canada a national symbol, the seat of our national languages or, if you prefer, the beating heart of our nation.

Up to now, I think that we have always thought of the capital of Canada as a city in Ontario. I have nothing against Ontario or Ottawa, but throughout the years, we have asked the Federal Government to contribute to the beautification of the region and we have been saying that it should not be restricted to the city of Ottawa. Parliament has continued to expand the region on the Quebec side, in the Outaouais region, and we are now saying that the National Capital Region is a product of Canadian federalism and reflects many of the familiar political, social, linguistic and cultural differences and ambiguities of Canadian society. It is typical of Canada.

In other words, it is a simple matter. The National Capital Region should be the capital of Canada. The Hon. Member for Hull has referred to the positive results of such change over the years. One of the things he has always concentrated on is that it would lead to increased co-operation not, as the former speaker said, to problems. What the Hon. Member for Hull is saying is that it would lead to increased co-operation between the municipalities. He explained that in his last speech when he said:

Whenever we have asked for the co-operation of the various regional governments, it has always been a difficult proposition. This is why over the years I have always advocated a federal district, in order that the federal Government be at home here. But this is not for tomorrow, because we know what came out of the so-called co-operation between the various levels of government, both local and provincial.

The Hon. Member for Hull represents his constituents as well as or better than most Members in the House. He made a statement in introducing his Bill which I thought was interesting. I believe his comments were to the effect that because of the present situation on both sides of the river, it is the most over-governed and overtaxed region of Canada. Why is that, Mr. Speaker? The Hon. Member for Hull says it is because of this complete lack of co-operation between the various levels of government, local and provincial.

In reviewing the objections to the Hon. Member's proposition over the years, a couple of things stand out. It has been said that it is not a simple matter to do this; it is very, very complicated; it is difficult to amend Section 16. I should like to refer the House to what the Hon. Member has said repeatedly over the years. It is reported at page 618 of Hansard as follows:

To those who suggest that an extraordinary process is required for amending Section 16, I say all that is needed is an Order in Council, simply adding Hull and the surrounding municipalities on both sides of the river, so that Canada's National Capital truly reflects the daily life of every Canadian. Because certainly visitors, whether they come from British Columbia or from New Brunswick or Prince Edward Island, are not particularly enthralled when coming to Ottawa to visit just another Ontario City.

When the Hon. Member presented his Bill, some politicians provincially and some federally accused him of trying to "get rid" of Ottawa. In all the statements the Hon. Member has made he has clarified this matter. I should like to quote briefly from his speech of January 20, 1984 in the Chamber when he said, as reported in Hansard at the botton of page 618:

—we should make Ottawa part of the National Capital Region just as all the other municipalities which are now part of the National Capital Region. And I am sure that members of the House are aware of this major problem of a capital for a young country such as Canada, for we have had a flag for some twenty years and we have a practically new, at least freshly patriated Constitution. In my opinion, what really matters now is to endow ourselves with a capital which clearly reflects the wills, aspirations and modus vivendi of all Canadians.

● (1630)

At that stage, Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member got to the exact point of his campaign over the years with this Bill. He went on to say:

It should occupy a neutral ground, outside the territory of any individual province—

—I just cannot understand how a province such as Ontario can logically have two capitals. If there is disunity, if the West feels alienated, it may be because we have no meeting point where we could all get together and feel at home as Canadians. People from western Canada think that they are away visiting eastern Canada when they come to this Ontario city, and those from eastern Canada think they have gone West when they are in the same Ontario city.

How true that is, Mr. Speaker. The Hon. Member for Hull went on to say:

Therefore, to dispel any doubt and give Canada a new image or impetus, in line with the novelties we have known over the past few years, including the flag, I think it is a matter of individual self-esteem and national pride to have a capital which reflects the character of all Canadians from coast to coast.

That, Mr. Speaker, is basically what the hon. gentleman is proposing in this legislation, and basically what he has said over the years in trying to accomplish his objective. He is saying to us all that we do not as a whole understand exactly why he has been proposing to amend Section 16 of the Constitution Act, 1867 that the national capital of Canada become designated as the national capital area. It is a fact of life today that Parliament, that the federal Government, has expanded to the Quebec side. The National Capital Region itself includes municipalities on both sides. Why not make it the capital of Canada? He is also saying that there will increased co-operation between municipalities. He is making the accusation that this area is presently, and I will quote him exactly, " . . . the most over-governed and over-taxed region of Canada." He said it is so because of a total lack of co-operation between various levels of government, local and provincial. He makes the point that it is a simple matter, and something for Government to think about, to amend Section 16 of a simple Order in Council. He is not saying that he is trying to get rid of Ottawa.

I commend the hon. gentleman for his persistence and perseverance on behalf of his region and on behalf of his constituents. I believe that, regardless of what happens now, we will see in the not too distant future the Hon. Member's proposition become a reality.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, before embarking upon the comments I have prepared for this debate today, I should just like to make a few comments on the remarks which have just been made by the Hon. Member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker). He said that Parliament had expanded to the other side of the Ottawa River into Hull. Parliament had expanded? I wonder if he knows what Parliament is, Mr. Speaker. Later on in his remarks, the Hon. Member said that the federal Government had expanded its operations across the river. I believe that is probably what he meant. I hope he did not mean that Parliament has expanded in that way. I would suggest, therefore, that perhaps the Hon.

Member could be permitted to correct his first statement so as not to be on the record as having made a statement he did not intend to make with respect to Parliament expanding across the river, because, to my knowledge, Parliament has not.

I am surprised, Mr. Speaker, that this Bill is now before us, that it was accepted by the Table officers. Presumably it was examined for legality before being presented to the House. I do not feel it would stand the test in the courts, with all due respect. If it became law despite its unconstitutionality—because I am satisfied it is unconstitutional—it would be tested in the courts of the land. I am sure of that. Even the most recent constitutional documents which eventually became the Constitution Act of 1982 provide adequate justification for my comments. I can go back earlier than that to the British North America Act of 1867 where again there is a provision suggesting that this is an unconstitutional document.

It has been brought to us, Mr. Speaker, improperly and I intend to demonstrate that. I will choose the most recent document, which of course is not the law of the land, and look at this particular Bill against the background of the Constitution of 1982, as I must. This is a Bill which has to mesh or be found not to mesh with that particular Act. I draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to Part V, Section 38(2) of the Constitution Act of 1982 wherein the following is found, and I will paraphrase it in order to make it a readable sentence: An amendment made under subsection 1 that derogates from the proprietary rights, or any other rights or privileges of the legislature, or government of a province, shall require resolution supported by a majority of the Members of each of the Senate and the House of Commons, and, Mr. Speaker, the Legislative Assembly is required under subsection 1.

You will notice that the wording of this particular Bill before us, which was presented by the Hon. Member for Hull, purports to declare that the national capital of Canada, "... shall consist ...". This is a declaration of the House of Commons. Presumably, he would expect it to be declared also by the other place, otherwise it could not become law. But are we legally competent in face of what I have just cited, Mr. Speaker, to make any such declaration? I contend that we are not. We are acting beyond the powers that this particular Parliament of ours possesses under a law which was passed by this Parliament and approved by the legislatures of the provinces. I suggest to you, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that Bill C-206 is faulty, is before us improperly and is merely inviting a ruling by the Supreme Court of Canada to declare it ultra vires.

More than that, Mr. Speaker, the following is to be feared. I feel that legislation of this Parliament should be aimed at doing something positive to hold the country together. If one of the provinces were to contest this Bill before the Supreme Court of Canada, should it become law, the only result would be acrimony. Why are we considering a Bill which would produce acrimony in the country? Surely we have had enough of that. Legislation should not do that. I have suggested, as has the Hon. Member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), that this is more than invasion of provincial jurisdiction; it is an invasion of municipal jurisdiction.

The Constitution of 1982 has all sorts of appendices. One of them is what I still call the BNA Act of 1867. It describes the exclusive powers of the provincial legislature. One of them is property and civil rights. We are dealing with property here. This is incorporating the property of two provinces into a single unit. This is offensive to the BNA Act of 1867, Section 92(13). Property and civil rights are dealt with there and, to the best of my knowledge, that has not been withdrawn.

Section 92(8) deals with the exclusive jurisdiction of provincial legislatures. How can this Parliament dare—and I use the word advisedly—to consider legislation which derogates from Section 92(8) of the Constitution of Canada? It is invading a provincial jurisdiction by presuming to say that Ottawa and Hull are part of the national capital under the jurisdiction of this Parliament. That is absolute effrontery. The Member who proposed this Bill should have had the good grace to suggest that it would be expedient, once this Bill had been passed, to request the authority of the provinces to accede to the wishes of Parliament. However, this Bill purports to declare that something shall happen. There is nothing more affirmative than that. There is no concession or recognition that there is any other jurisdiction at all.

To whom would the residents of this capital pay their provincial tax? He had not thought of that, had he? The taxes in the Province of Quebec are a little high and people may not want to pay them in Quebec. Perhaps they could pay their taxes to the federal authority which now declares that this incorporated area is the capital of Canada rather than paying provincial tax. It worries me, Mr. Speaker, that we are considering a Bill beyond the powers of this Parliament to consider.

I would like to refer to Section 43 of the Constitution Act of 1982 which was proclaimed in front of this building. This Bill purports to amend the Constitution of Canada. I was surprised to hear the Member for Gander-Twillingate say there was going to be an Order in Council. This is now an Order in Council; this is a legislative Act being proposed.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. gentleman is misquoting. If he had been listening carefully he would have known I was quoting the Hon. Member for Hull.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I withdraw. The Hon. Member for Hull ought to have known better. There is no Order in Council here at all. This would be a legislative Act if it were accepted in its present form.

Section 43 of the Constitution Act of 1982 reads:

An amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to any provision that applies to one or more, but not all, provinces, including

(a) any alteration to boundaries between provinces—

That is virtually what this would do. It would ignore the boundary between the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec. The section goes on to say:

(b) any amendment ... may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada only where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province to which the amendment applies.

In his wildest imagination does the Member think the National Assembly of the Province of Quebec is going to cede territory to the federal Government? What does he mean by "the capital"? Is it to be some sort of vague area? We were talking about the jurisdictions of municipalities. Who will levy the municipal taxes in the conglomerate which is being gathered up here?

● (1650)

I know the Member has worked on this for a long time but, with all due respect, I believe he might have thought about it a good deal more clearly and fully in order to realize these implications. For instance, what tax will we pay on the gasoline which we buy, whether in metres or gallons? Would you buy in one place because it is cheaper than in another?

I honestly do not believe that the Hon. Member went into it as well as he should have. Maybe he just dredged it up before the Constitution Act of 1982 had become law and brought it forward in this form.

I am not blaming the Member for drafting the Bill, because I am sure he had legal advice. We all need legal advice when drafting a Bill because very few of us are legislative draftsmen. It worries me that a Bill so badly drafted should have been accepted for presentation to the House in this form. Even if it were to be passed, all it would do is to incite opposition in one province or the other or both and create a situation which this country does not need.

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, first let me congratulate the Hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Isabelle) on his preparedness. You have explained why it is that for three Private Members' hours in a row we have been discussing matters concerning the National Capital Region, and particularly the constituency of Hull, that have been brought forward by the Hon. Member from that city. I guess it reflects upon the rest of us when we are not prepared for the eventualities of Private Members' Business under the new rules.

In the few minutes that remain let me address very briefly the constitutional issue which was touched upon by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), and gone into in some detail by my colleague from Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro). If we look at Section 16 of the Constitution Act, formerly the BNA Act of 1867, we find that the determination of the capital of Canada is stated under this section. It reads:

Until the Queen otherwise directs, the Seat of Government of Canada shall be Ottawa.

I think the Hon. Member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker) would have been quite right had his remarks referred to the situation 100 years ago when he said that strictly through executive action, through Order in Council, a change could be made. I strongly suspect that it is quite conceivable that in those far off days the capital of Canada would have been changed fairly quickly.

I do not know why Ottawa was chosen. Maybe there were some military considerations, such as the existence of the military canal close by or the fact that Ottawa was a little farther away from the St. Lawrence River and the Great Lakes so it could not be readily attacked by our enemies then, now our friends south of the border. Perhaps it was another great Canadian compromise, having something right on the border between Canada East and Canada West as it existed before Confederation.

I suspect that there was a possibility that the capital might have been moved. It had been moved from Kingston and Montreal, if I remember correctly, in times past. As years went by things have changed. If one looks at the remarks of Mr. Justice Cartwright in 1966, in the Munro versus National Capital Commission case, one can see that his interpretation at that time, some 20 years ago, was that the authority, prescribed by Section 16, of the Queen to change the location of the seat of Government of Canada would now be exercisable by Her Majesty in right of Canada, and that while the section contemplates executive action, as cited by the Member for Gander-Twillingate, the change could doubtless be made by an Act of Parliament in which Her Majesty acts with the advice and consent of the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada. At that time it was suspected by the Supreme Court that the change could not be made by executive action alone but that it would require an Act of Parliament to make the change.

Since that time we have had the Constitution Act of 1982. I think that constitutional traditions and constitutional conventions have developed in the intervening period to the point where right now we would be satisfied with the arguments made by the Hon. Member for Esquimalt-Saanich that to change the capital would indeed be a constitutional change requiring the consent of the provinces.

To get away from the technical constitutional arguments, let us take a wider view. The Bill we have before us addresses itself to the question of the location of the capital of Canada. If we have that in mind, why can we not at the same time consider other possibilities than the present location? One hundred or more years ago, this was the centre of the population of Canada, the centre of the wealth of Canada. There was very little to the West at that time.

Things have changed in 100 years. The West is built up. Before there was only Prince Rupert Land. Now there are cities like Vancouver, Edmonton and Calgary. This is where the rapid growth in population has been. This is where the new wealth of Canada has been created over the years. Why can we not now look at the possibility of changing location to a place that is approximately at the geographical centre of Canada? I am not suggesting that we necessarily go to Gimli, Manitoba, but we might at least look at the possibility of moving to Winnipeg. It would be a lot easier for western Members of Parliament to go to Winnipeg than it would be to take a plane to Toronto, then change planes in Toronto and come to Ottawa. As years go by and the make-up of the House of Commons changes, as it should do, that argument will become more and more relevant.

Another series of problems that we have with Ottawa as the capital of Canada is that this is very much a company town. The one industry here is Government. This gives rise to all manner of problems. There is no cross-fertilization of ideas between people who are principally involved in government and people who are principally involved in business or some other endeavour. For that reason I think sometimes the decisions made in Ottawa, in the comfortable ivory towers in the capital city, do not reflect the thinking of Canadians who live elsewhere in this country. It is not right when there is an isolation of the people who do the governing from those who are governed. I think there is a lack of knowledge on the part of many people in Ottawa, especially those who work in the Government Departments here, pertaining to the real life of Canada and Canadians.

If we were to buy this argument, then we might want to move the capital of Canada to a place like Toronto.

Mr. Gauthier: Never.

Mr. Nickerson: Or Montreal.

Mr. Gauthier: Never.

Mr. Nickerson: An even worse suggestion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order. The hour provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. It being five o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 3, this House stands adjourned until Monday, March 5, 1984, at eleven o'clock a.m.

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

THE LATE JOHN KUSHNER

TRIBUTES TO FORMER MEMBER

Mr. Brian Mulroney (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is with sadness that I rise today to pay tribute to John Kushner, a Member of this House whose career has been dedicated to public service and who in many ways exemplified those qualities most desirable in a public servant. His entire life was one of devotion to family, to community and to this country.

His was a remarkable career of involvement in Calgary; in the community as a school trustee; as an alderman; on behalf of the labour movement as president of his union; and as a director of hospitals. However, the most important thing in my judgment is that John Kushner was a man of modesty and accomplishment. He accomplished things that really mattered on behalf of people, ordinary Canadians, and this gave him his greatest joy.

He was deeply proud of his heritage. I remember last December his speech at Maple Leaf Gardens to the World Congress of Free Ukrainians, a body which was a great source of pride to him. He spoke from the heart when he mentioned his immigrant roots and he spoke to the soul of Canada when he talked of the need for tolerance in this society, coupled with a strong and ringing defence of liberty, a quality that most immigrant groups bring to this great country. This was his overwhelming belief, along with the need to couple tolerance in Canada with a strong understanding of what we have achieved here. But most of all he believed that freedom must always prevail in Canada.

He was direct, encouraging and warm. He had both a sense of history and a sense of humour. To me he provided thoughtful counsel and loyal support. To my Party he provided dedication and deep commitment to his principles and to its unity. To Canada he provided an abiding love and a real sense of gratitude for the citizenship which he held in this country.

Mr. Kushner's involvement in our Party, both at the provincial and federal levels, goes back to the 1970s when he was elected to the Alberta legislature, and thereafter when he was elected to this House where he provided able and distinguished service.

In that very special way, as it is for most of us, John Kushner's greatest pride was his family. His greatest love was his wife and his children. John Kushner made a real difference in his community, in this Party, and certainly in this House of Commons. This country is, in my judgment, a better place because of him.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleagues and my Party, and I am sure on behalf of all Members in this House, I want to convey to Olga and her family our deepest condolences.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, we were all shocked to learn of the sudden passing of John Kushner. Only a few weeks ago he seemed to be his usual robust self.

Mr. Kushner was a shining example of how Canada has been strengthened by contributions from people who came here from many lands. Born in Poland, he completed his education in the United States. He devoted himself to public service, both in education and in politics. He served his community for four years in the Legislative Assembly of Alberta and for almost five years in this House.

Mr. Kushner will be especially missed by many members of the staff of the House, the little people like the messengers and maintenance staff who always found his door open when they needed advice or encouragement.

I especially want, on behalf of this Party, to extend sincere sympathy to the late Mr. Kushner's widow and her sons.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I was personally shocked and depressed to hear of the passing of John Kushner. We have lost a good man. John Kushner was a people's politician. He served his people very well at the municipal level, at the provincial level and at the federal level. But to me John Kushner was even more; he was a friend. He was somebody in whom I could confide. He was somebody who offered me sympathy in some of my darkest moments.

• (1110)

We worked together for four years at the provincial level. John was very conscious of his ethnic background, a background similar to mine, and we tried hard provincially to do something on a multicultural level. I know his heart was in multiculturalism in this House because he recognized, as I have, that Canada was more than just the English and the French factions; it involved people from all over Europe, from all over the world, who came here to find a home.

I say bless him. I hope he has found peace. I offer my deepest sympathy to his wife and family. His family will be carrying on the political tradition, I expect, as his son, Stan, was in the Alberta legislature. I am sure I speak on behalf of all Hon. Members of the House when I say bless John Kushner; we hope he has found peace.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic Party I should like to express our sadness at the passing of John Kushner. Indeed, as the Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) said, he was a man of modesty and accomplishment. That is unique. He served his people well, serving, as I understand it, as a trustee, as an alderman in Calgary, in the legislature and here in Parliament since 1979. In other words, he served in all levels of government in Canada—municipal, provincial and federal. That is a real accomplishment.

He was active beyond politics and was very active in the multicultural area. He was deputy critic of multiculturalism for the Conservative Party at the time of his passing. He was of Polish background and very proud of it.

Further, I should like to make two personal observations. John Kushner used to sit near me and we had a little pact among our group. Many people see us arguing in Parliament, but when we leave this House sometimes, in fact most times, we talk to each other as friends. That is a good point about the Canadian Parliament, in my view. We also had a little shared pact. It is very hard to be a back-bencher and to have heckling when one first rises in the House of Commons to put questions. John was part of our little pact. We agreed that we would not heckle each other when we rose. That only applied around this part of the House. In fact, we encouraged each other when we asked a particularly good question and when we struggled with a bad question.

Personally, I will miss John. On behalf of the NDP, I should like to extend our sympathy to his wife and his two sons. To John, ave atque vale, hail and farewell. We will all miss you here, John.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver-Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I would be remiss if I did not say something about John. John and I go back to when he was the locksmith for the Calgary school board in the very early sixties. He and I have been brushing shoulders now for 25 years. I agree with every word that has been said, but nothing has been said about John and his spirit. This was a happy man. This was a man I never saw truly depressed, a man who oft times caused a smile, oft times gave one a lift just by being in his presence.

In terms of his service, it was to the people of his community. He was, I firmly believe, one of the best constituency men the House of Commons will ever see. John Kushner did not attend just some events in his riding; he attended every event and, more than that, he cared greatly for his people, the people of the area he represented. Whether it was on the school board, as an alderman, as a provincial MLA or here in the House of Commons, his was a life of service to the community.

He will be sorely missed in that area of Calgary. I will sorely miss him as well, miss him in the sense that another bit of laughter is gone, another bit of fun. He was a man you could truly admire because of his skills, feelings and the work that he did. I just want Olga, Jack and Stan to know that I grieve with them.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[Translation]

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Thursday, February 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the Government.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I wish to congratulate my eminent colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde), on his excellent Budget, which was entirely in line with the initiatives announced in the Speech from the Throne. Mr. Speaker, the Budget is part and parcel of the Government's plan to build a strong and growing economy, and, as Minister of Labour, I may add I am particularly happy to see the emphasis placed by the Minister of Finance on creating lasting jobs for all Canadians who want to work. Since I took up my new duties, Mr. Speaker, I have constantly stressed the need for treating Canadian workers as full and equal partners with employers and the Government, and I believe that in our efforts to provide for economic recovery, it is absolutely essential that workers as well as employers should benefit.

I am therefore particularly pleased to see that the Minister of Finance intends to promote economic growth by fully co-operating with workers and business. He has stated publicly that he is determined to promote increased co-operation and economic well-being, using the most powerful mechanisms available to us under our tax policy.

To stimulate the economy, the Minister has decided to act through the private sector which, and we agree, considers itself to be the main creator of jobs. The Government will help, where the need arises, by lightening the burden of administration where feasible, and by leading directly where necessary.

We feel that the best stimulus for economic progress will come from the increased confidence of Canadians, whether they are workers, consumers, savers or investors.

The creative energy and entrepreneurship that flow from this confidence will shape our future.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to stress the importance of consultation with and full participation of workers in the economic recovery process. Although job creation will be a major factor in restoring the worker confidence, it will be useless if the old attitudes and confrontation tactics do not change.

If, as employers and workers, we try to take more out of the economy than we put in, our country's return to prosperity will be threatened and the economy will again be subject to inflationary pressures. Consequently, as Minister of Labour, I am pleased to see that we are phasing out the 6 and 5 program. The program has done the job it was intended to do. It has brought our inflation rate down from 12 per cent to 5 per cent, an accomplishment that has opened the way for new productive investments. However, the 6 and 5 program has not always been smooth sailing, especially for Canadian workers. I feel that new controls would only cause serious disruption in our economy. Once the 6 and 5 program is phased out, we shall, I hope, be able to turn over a new leaf and improve relations between workers and business.

Once the 6 and 5 program is terminated, collective bargaining in the private sector will not necessarily be tough, but it will be a serious matter. However, I am confident that all those who take part in the collective bargaining process will act responsibly, bearing in mind the responsibility they share for the Canadian economy and the general well-being of all Canadians, and refrain from any unreasonable disruption of labour-management relations through sterile and frivolous disputes.

Our present economic recovery must be kept growing. We cannot make excessive demands on this recovery, either collectively or individually, without endangering the economy in the long run. A sustained and strong recovery is our only chance of achieving the legitimate economic goals we all share, that is, job security, maintaining and enhancing our purchasing power, and constantly strengthening our competitive position, both on national and international markets. We have resolutely crossed the threshold toward a period of rapid development in technology and industrial relations. Refusing to take advantage of what modern technology has to offer would have disastrous consequences for the Canadian economy. One of the tangible contributions being made by the Government of Canada towards bringing labour and management closer together is the Employment Profit-Participation Plan, proposed by my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde), in his Budget Speech.

This plan is designed to bring workers and employers closer together, but it is certainly not intended to complement or replace the collective bargaining process. This plan should on no account be considered a substitute for collective bargaining. In fact, the Profit Participation Plan being proposed would provide a tax credit of 10 per cent of the profits shared under the plan, with 60 per cent of the tax credit going to employees and 40 per cent to the employer. I know the initial reaction of the unions to this announcement was mixed, which is not surprising, since the unions have always seen such plans as a plot to draw employees closer to management and, occasionally, to keep unions out.

I therefore want to make it quite clear that this is certainly not the Government's intention, and, although I may be repeating myself, what the Government supports is establishing an equal partnership and respect between workers and business. Details of how the plan will work were not given in the Budget Speech, since we intend to work these out with labour and management. In keeping with this concept, the Government intends to continue its consultations with business leaders and unions, in order to discuss the Profit Participation Plan in greater detail. We are particularly anxious to seek their views on the format and implementation of such a plan. To that end, I intend to consult in the coming weeks with leaders of Canada's major labour and business associations. I trust we shall be able to establish a plan that will be beneficial to all.

Mr. Speaker, I shall, if I may, repeat what was said in the Budget Speech, and I quote: "The Employee Profit-Participation Plan is designed to complement the collective bargaining process, not replace it. Experience has shown that to succeed, profit sharing cannot be a substitute for competitive wages". There is certainly no mention of forcing the profit sharing plan on workers. Another quote from the Budget Speech: "Any company wishing to establish a plan must form a labour-management committee. The details of the plan will have to be agreed on by both workers and management."

● (1125)

Pension reform is another Budget item that should be of particular interest to Canadian workers. The benefits deriving from a new partnership relation between workers and business must be shared equitably. We must therefore ensure that retired workers are able to live in comfort and dignity. For a long time, labour groups have been criticizing the deficiencies of the existing provisions of the Pension Plan. The proposals contained in the Budget will make our Old Age Security plan—and I have no hesitation in saying this—one of the best in the industrialized world. To start with, legislation will be introduced by my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mrs. Bégin) to increase the maximum payment under the Guaranteed Income Supplement by $50 a month. This raises the guaranteed income for elderly single individuals, that is, those who need help most in Canada today, to more than 60 per cent of the amount paid to couples, as recommended by many business, labour and women's groups.

Other provisions will provide protection against inflation for future pensions and will assist mobility by ensuring that employees acquire rights to their pension benefits after two years' service instead of ten. Individuals would also be allowed to take their benefits with them if they move to another job, a frequent occurrence during initial years of service among many Canadian workers. Further proposals will broaden pension coverage for full-time and part-time workers. There are provisions providing survivor benefits and ensuring equal treatment of Canadian working men and women. In addition, the Budget proposes to broaden considerably the Canada Pension Plan. We therefore have a whole series of pension-related measures that ought to help Canadian workers.

Mr. Speaker, the Government intends to take further steps to improve the dialogue between workers, business and government, and I am referring to a proposal originated by my own Department of Labour. I am therefore pleased to be able to confirm today that Cabinet has approved the establishment of a government-union employee interchange program. The program embodies a concept first described in the Throne Speech. It will foster the exchange of personnel between labour organizations and federal Government departments for periods of up to two years. I believe that this program will improve understanding and communications between unions and the Canadian Government.

The experience and know-how of the labour movement can be extremely useful in the preparation of Government policy. On the other hand, civil servants will be able to explain to the unions how the Government's decision-making process works and how they can best put their case to the Government. Until now, there have been no meaningful employee exchanges between the Public Service of Canada and the Labour movement under the current program. However, I think that with time we can hope to have an admittedly limited but none the less efficient group of public servants and union representatives with the wide knowledge and experience which one can acquire only by working for a while in the other's field of work.

This project will cost $1.9 million over a three-year period, mostly to offset the cost of salaries paid to detached employees. The program will be operational on a limited basis with only five person-years in the first year, fifteen person-years in the second year and twenty person-years in the third year.

The other administrative provisions will be nearly identical to those of the Public Service Commission Interchange Canada Program. Each exchange will flow from an agreement between the originating organization—the host organization—and, of course, the worker who is directly concerned. As in the case of the Canadian Labour Market and Productivity Centre whose establishment I was pleased to announce recently, this new initiative of the Government of Canada shows to what extent we are committed to improving our relations with the labour movement.

In short, Mr. Speaker, as Minister of Labour I fully endorse the remarks of the Minister of Finance that we cannot be satisfied with past performance and past habits if Canadians are to meet the challenge of the future. Nor can we hope to work together towards a more promising future at the expense of another segment of the population. That is why the Government has made a series of proposals to meet the needs of workers and pave the way for more harmonious labour relations in Canada. Mr. Speaker, I think we can say that Canadian workers, wherever they are, can look to this Budget as a guarantee of better and more numerous job opportunities, improved pension plans and more input in decisions which affect their life at work. In addition, the Government's labour program concerning employee detachment will surely have a strong impact on relations between unions and the Government. As for me, I shall continue to be attentive and responsive to the concerns and legitimate needs of labour. In fact, I plan to emphasize consultations with the unions so that they may have a voice in discussions on a national level. I am convinced that some type of social contract must of necessity be entered into with the unions which contract necessarily implies a spirit of co-operation if we want to have a sustained and equitable recovery. Mr. Speaker, working together can be really effective if each and everyone is willing to do his share. The Government believes in this principle and it was in this spirit that the Minister of Finance prepared his budget which I support enthusiastically.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): There will now be a 10-minute period for questions, answers and comments.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, I have two questions in two areas with which the Minister dealt. The first question is with respect to the Employee Profit Participation Plan. The Minister indicated that at an early date he would be having consultation with business and union leaders in order to bring in the best and most workable plan. I wonder if the Minister would be good enough to identify what business and union associations he would be consulting with. Could he identify them by name today? If not, I understand that he might want to give me that information at a later date.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I have already had discussions with the representatives of the Canada Labour Congress and we have agreed to meet with officers of the CLC later in March. I have also been in touch with the Chairman of the Canadian Federation of Labour who told me that he would approve of a meeting with his senior assistants before the end of March.

I would also like to consult with other Canadian labour organizations. I have not yet had any conversation or exchanged any correspondence with other national unions, but I plan on doing so within the next few days.

However, I have had a brief discussion with a representative of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and we hope to be able to sit down with this association later this month to discuss the program more fully. I know that my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde), is himself planning to meet with certain management associations and national organizations to discuss the details of this new program.

[English]

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, I would hope that consultation might take place with associations representing small business, because it seems to me that if this plan is to become successful, one of the targets for the plan would likely be in the small business sector as compared to larger manufacturers and processors.

My principal concern with the Budget dealt with the section in which the Minister dealt with containing inflation. He talked about the potential for strikes in the Public Service and indicated that his Government would be willing to ask Parliament to legislate wage settlements in the face of lengthy strikes. That causes me some concern, and I believe it would likely cause the Minister some concern. He has not direct responsibility but certainly he should be concerned in this area.

We are the least able institution, in my view, to write a collective agreement. That should be the responsibility of union and employer. I am very concerned to see in the Budget that one particular sentence, particularly the words "to legislate a wage settlement", because as the Minister of Labour (Mr. Ouellet) well knows, in Parliament we could end a strike without rewriting a collective agreement.

It seems to me his colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde), has not looked at that option, and I hate to do it at the best of times, although I know it is essential from time to time. He seems to indicate in his Budget that he would prefer the House to rewrite the collective agreement as compared to going only the half step of ending a labour dispute in order that the parties, under whatever vehicle we may choose to give them, could continue to discharge their responsibility, which is to write the new collective agreement. I would appreciate the Minister's comments on that.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the Hon. Member's first suggestion to the effect that we should consult with the small business associations, I can assure him that this shall indeed be considered and that such consultations certainly will take place. I think that this is a great idea and that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) was also thinking about this when he referred to consultations.

On the other hand, concerning the Hon. Member's comments about the possibility that the Canadian Parliament might legislate a collective agreement, I hope that what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) said about this in his budget was hypothetical, and that, in the future, collective bargaining within the Public Service can lead to an agreement signed at the bargaining table by both parties and that what the Minister of Finance was saying will not happen.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, my question deals with some of the statements the Minister made. In discussing the Budget, he referred to the Government's six and five program, a program introduced without any consultation with labour groups. That was admitted by the Minister responsible. It seems that when the Government wants to do something which adversely affects labour, such as the six and five program which prevented unions from negotiating protection for part-time workers or negotiating packages to help people at the lower end of the economic scale, the Government acts quickly. The Budget introducing the six and five program was introduced in the House on June 28, I believe, and the legislation was ready as soon as the Budget debate was finished. However, when it comes to proposals which will enhance labour, it is never a program but always a study. It is always something down the road, not something the Government is ready to act upon. Under those circumstances, can you blame organized labour for being skeptical?

While the Minister is at it, perhaps he could explain why it takes so long for the Government to introduce legislation which will change Part IV of the Canada Labour Code to protect workers' safety, indeed their lives, in the workplace?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the Hon. Member that the government will not be dragging its feet as far as setting up a profit-sharing scheme is concerned. I suggest it would have been improper to announce forthwith such a scheme without first involving both employers and employees in the preparation and development of this profit-sharing scheme. The Hon. Member will certainly agree, therefore, that it was worth seeking the involvement of the interested parties as well as their co-operation in devising methods and mechanisms to operate this scheme. I can assure him that we will make haste and implement this program as soon as our consultations with employers and employees are completed.

As to his remarks concerning amendments to Part IV of the Canada Labour Code, I can assure the Hon. Member that the government has every intention of introducing the relevant bill at the first opportunity in March.

Mr. Lambert: Getting back to the issue raised by my colleague the Hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Jarvis), Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether, judging from the few remarks which we have heard so far, the program which the government has announced does not seem to differ much from the programs which have been in existence for a great many years on a voluntary basis. Now, has the government chosen to implement this program to demonstrate its gratitude to his colleague the Hon. Member who has since been appointed Minister of State and who was heading a sub-commission to deal with this issue? Yet, I think I can say that these programs always meet with difficulties and suffer through lack of interest, for employees, foreign to the very notion of profit, are anxious to sell off their shares for cash. Cash is all that matters to labourers and employees, whether unionized or not. Could the minister indicate to us how the government plans to remedy these shortcomings which have plagued these plans for generations?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): The answer by the Minister of Labour should be very short.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I would like to state that the Government intends to provide both labour and management with another means of coming together. In this country, we have gone through a period of acute confrontation in labour relations. We are aware that during those years of high prosperity, we could live with that kind of environment in labour relations, where each party would aggressively fight for the biggest possible share of the pie. But now that we are going through hard times, there is certainly no collective bargaining possible any more when confrontation is the rule and each side is trying to get the better part of the bargain. Therefore, we must find new ways conductive to agreement, co-operation, understanding and collaboration. And this employee profit participation plan, which the Government has suggested to labour and management, is one method among others to help improve the labour relations environment in Canada.

As far as details are concerned, we will ask labour and management to help us work them out so that the plan is acceptable and beneficial to all parties.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin my remarks this morning by quoting the first lines of the Budget Speech delivered in this House on February 15. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) said:

> My Budget today is dedicated to building a strong and growing economy—an economy that will generate lasting, meaningful jobs for all Canadians who want to work, an economy that will provide the economic opportunity and security all Canadians seek.
> My Budget puts into action the program for growth, opportunity, security and partnership outlined in the Speech from the Throne.

No one in this House, Mr. Speaker, and no one across this country, can argue with those objectives. However, I think it is fair to say, as speaker after speaker on this side particularly have said, that this Budget is simply not going to set the direction for the achievement of those objectives outlined. It is very interesting to note that the Speech went on at great length about reliance on the private sector as being the main engine for economic growth.

There was something in the order of 100 promises in the Speech from the Throne which we know will never be fulfilled by this Government. What is really interesting is that there are roughly 26 commitments to set up new task forces, boards and agencies which essentially postpone any decision-making or any action in terms of dealing with the problems within various regions of the country. One can see that there is quite a collection of these boards. There is a task force on information technology, a task force on private trading houses, a task force on textiles and clothing, a task force on shipbuilding and a deep sea fleet. There is a task force on the service sector and a task force on co-operatives. There is a commission of inquiry into eastern Canadian potatoes and an Asia Pacific foundation. An office is being set up for industrial innovation. There is a new industrial and regional development board. Then there is a parliamentary task force on charities, consultations on the Canada-Japan auto pact, consultations on domestic air fares and consultations on acid rain. I could go on and on, Mr. Speaker. That is certainly not leadership; it is simply a postponement and quite frankly a cop-out.

This Budget, I think it is fair to say, as my colleagues have pointed out, fails to address four basic essentials to economic recovery. As a result of the failure to address those basic economic essentials, I suggest that Canadians will be committed to a dubious, bleak and diminishing economic future.

Let me back that up with some examples. First is the issue of interest rates. Interest rates have continued to soar since the presentation of the Budget. As a matter of fact, I look at The Edmonton Journal of Friday, March 2 in which the headline reads "Rising Bank Rate is a Blow to Recovery". It goes on to state:

> If Canadian policymakers maintain current fiscal policies, "the economy is just going to grind to a halt," warned Aron Gampel, economist with the Toronto investment firm Pitfield Mackay Ross Ltd.

He goes on to say:

> The slowdown in economic growth caused by Ottawa's high interest rate policy is alarming, Gampel said.
> He described recent GNP figures as a "disaster". Take away exports and the build-up of inventories, and growth actually declined in the final quarter of last year, he said.

We have a situation in which the Minister of Finance quite correctly pointed out at page 2 of the Budget Speech that inflation was brought down to 4.5 per cent at the end of last year, yet we have an interest rate which is up to 10.07 per cent. The spread is simply too great. At the end of 1982 there was a spread of roughly 3.2 per cent between inflation and the bank rate. Today it is approximately 6 per cent and that is simply too high. This problem has not been addressed.

There is nothing in the Budget that will encourage or motivate increased consumer demand. In fact, what is provided in the Budget but does not really address the issue since it is part and parcel of the leftovers from the previous Budget are some very huge, hidden tax increases which take effect in this fiscal year. We can see that approximately six of these tax measures will result in a tremendous amount of money being taken out of the Canadian economy.

For example, over the three-year period from 1984 to 1987, the special recovery tax will take out $2 billion from the Canadian economy. The changes to the federal tax reduction over the three-year period will result in $4 billion of tax revenue taken out of the economy. The elimination of the standard $100 deduction over a three-year period will result in some $400 million being extracted. The deindexation of the child tax credit income threshold over the three-year period will amount to $700 million. The deindexation of child exemption will result in the removal of $250 million. Making the Canadian Ownership Special Charge permanent will amount to roughly $3 billion over the next three years. This represents an extraction of some $9 billion in order to pay for the Government's make-work programs, the puffery and fluffery and porkbarrelling such as we have seen in the House in the course of the last few weeks. There is nothing in the Budget to increase consumer demand.

Third, there is nothing in the Budget that will stimulate investment in this country by creating a more positive and conducive climate toward investment, both domestic and foreign. As a matter of fact, I think we all recognize that there are some structural problems within our economy. There are some industrial structural problems that will require huge investments of capital. There must be more investment in research and development and an increased percentage of productivity which will require huge expenditures of investment capital. That investment capital will not be realized unless a climate of confidence is created in this country.

It is interesting to note that in the Daily Commercial News dated November 8, a New York analyst says that foreign investors await a new government, not a new Liberal government but a brand-new government. The article indicates:

> Foreign investors are waiting for a change in government in Ottawa before returning to Canada in a big way, a New York investment analyst said last week.

He went on to say:

> If Brian Mulroney's Progressive Conservatives take power, 'I think you will see an immediate change in investor attitude,' said Reinhardt.

An Hon. Member: Pick what you want from the newspapers.

Mr. Mazankowski: Some newspapers speak the truth, Mr. Speaker. My hon. friend across the way does not like some of these quotations but the facts must speak for themselves.

That is an attitude which prevails in this country. The fact is that there has been a net outflow of investment capital of roughly $16.7 billion during the last four years, both domestic and foreign. That money should be spent here in Canada to generate jobs, improve our competitive ability and eliminate the structural deficiencies. There is nothing in the Budget which provides any assurance that that can happen.

That fact relates very closely to the fourth point that is not addressed in the Budget. It is mentioned but it is not dealt with in a comprehensive way. It concerns measures to improve competitiveness and productivity. I submit that that is closely tied to the ability to encourage investors, domestic and foreign, to invest in this country.

I suggest there is very little in the Budget for the 1.5 million or probably two million people who are unemployed and have been standing on the sidelines for far too long. In fact, there are 193,000 fewer people employed today than at the start of the recession, in spite of all the Government's make-work programs. There are close to two million people in this country who have been standing on the sidelines and not participating. As a result they are losing any confidence in the system and there is no hope, optimism or promise.

It is more than simply an economic problem. It is a very major social problem, shameful social problem that has not been addressed by this Budget. What promise does the Budget provide? My colleague from St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) put these figures before the House and I think they should be repeated. The projection is for 1.4 million people unemployed this year, 1.3 million unemployed in 1985, 1.2 million unemployed in 1986 and 1.1 million unemployed in 1987. That certainly does not provide much faith, hope and confidence or do very much to raise the level of pride and dignity of these people who have been unemployed and standing on the sidelines. Those figures are simply not sufficient and one must really question their accuracy. While there was to be a deficit of approximately $11.8 billion in this fiscal year, there is a deficit of $31.5 billion. The Government is out by $20 billion. It is just a small mistake. It shows that we cannot rely upon the projections that are made in this Budget.

What hope does the Budget give to the thousands upon thousands of small businesses that have gone bankrupt over the last four years or to the farmers and fishermen? In 1983, 488 farmers went bankrupt, which is a 400 per cent increase from the year 1979. What hope is there for those people in this budget? Even that does not tell the true story because there is probably another 10 per cent who have voluntarily liquidated or gone out of business. There is nothing in the Budget to inspire confidence, hope and promise for farmers and fishermen.

More than 100,000 Canadians have individually declared bankruptcy since the Government was returned to office four years ago. What hope is there for these poor individuals who have lost their homes, their business, their jobs and all the material goods they have owned? This is a human tragedy. These are not simply human statistics; it is a tragedy.

The Speech from the Throne is really a litany of things that should be done but will not be done. It is an acknowledgment of the fact that this government has been a failure over the last four years. As I said and I repeat, there is nothing in this Budget to restore hope, promise and confidence, or to restore the pride and dignity of the people who have been standing on the sidelines for far too long in this land of ours.

The only positive development that has occurred during that last little while is the announcement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to resign. In my part of the country this day would be referred to as "day five" of recovery because most Canadians in my part of the country are relieved that the Prime Minister has decided to pack it in. Let me read some of the headlines from the western papers. The first one reads: "Happy PET packs it in". The headline in The Edmonton Sun reads, "Bye Bye. End of Trudeau era is greeted with relief". That has inspired some confidence, about the only confidence that has emanated from this Government in the last little while.

Canadians are rejoicing today because they see a new era on the horizon. The landscape has changed somewhat. I think that is all for the good. I should say, however, Mr. Speaker, that one cannot blame the current Prime Minister for all of the difficulties, particularly the derision, contempt and disregard he has held for western Canada. The Prime Minister did not do it alone. We know what the current Minister of Finance and former Minister of Energy did for western Canada when he brought in the odious and pernicious National Energy Program which wiped out hundreds of thousands of jobs and small businesses.

We remember the former finance minister, Mr. Donald Macdonald, when he was Energy Minister and the attacks that he levelled at western Canada. We also know it was Mr. Turner, who is now aspiring to be the new leader, who really set us on this road to huge deficit financing. It is interesting to note that all Liberal Party members across the country are now rallying around Mr. Turner. It is strange to see them rallying around a quitter, but that is the way it is. Say anything, do anything to get into power; that is the most important thing.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Chrétien) came to Edmonton last week and lectured Liberals there. As reported in The Edmonton Journal, he said:

—Alberta should welcome the collapse of the boom because the megaprojects were "too big, too difficult to manage, too difficult to finance and too risky".

Implicit in the Minister's statement is the fact that he is suggesting Albertans should be grateful for our 14 per cent unemployment rate, a crashing real estate market, and that we should be grateful for the bankruptcies, the foreclosures and the shattered dreams which have stripped away billions of dollars of revenue. This revenue has been transferred from the west into other areas, particularly into pork barrelling programs. Liberals who attended that meeting cheered him. They should have hissed him out of the room. That NEP constituted the downfall of the only engine of economic growth and development existing in the country at that time.

We must make sure that the current Prime Minister does not take all the blame for the failures of this Government over the last 15 years because Liberals were all by his side cheering him along. Let us take a look at the trial and error policies the Liberals have imposed upon us. It has been a policy of "impose and then back off". What about FIRA? It was heralded as great to have, but when it was obvious that FIRA was destroying investor confidence in this country in undermining the integrity of our economy, the Liberals backed off. What about the National Energy Program? Every time this Minister of Energy announces a change, he is heralded as doing a great thing for the energy sector. But the Liberals destroyed the energy sector in the first place.

The Liberals have a policy of destroy and then restore. The Liberals are doing the same thing with VIA. Look at their defence policy. Look at what they have done to NATO. The Liberals have cut back on NATO expenditures by 50 per cent. Now there is great interest to restore the commitment to NATO. What about the reduction in the defence budget? We did not see anybody in the Liberal Party coming to the defence of the three prairie provinces, which were going to be relegated to second-class status under the original amending formula that was advanced. There is no question that there is more to the Liberal Party than simply the Prime Minister of the day. There have been Ministers, like the former Minister of Multiculturalism, who have suggested there is an attitudinal problem with the Liberal government of manipulation and ballyhoo, and to mention the activists who have said that the Party is governed by non-accountable, non-legitimate, non-elected members of the Party for manipulative electoral shams, and that the polls, propaganda and patronage are orchestrated by a small elite.

That is why we are in trouble today, that is why there is mistrust, and that is why this Government has no credibility. It really does not matter whether you change leaders or not. The problem is so entrenched and the attitudinal problem is so immersed within the Liberal Party that the only thing that can turn the country around is an election and a brand-new government. Canada needs a new government that will create jobs as its number one priority, that will build upon our natural strengths, that will restore the dynamic prospects of the agriculture, the fisheries, the mining, and the energy sector. We need a government that will turn those natural advantages into economic advantages. Until we have a government that is committed to doing that, we will stagnate and falter.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I was intrigued by the comments of the Hon. Member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) and his reference to what is happening south of the border. Is the Hon. Member suggesting that we in Canada should go along with policies that leave over 40 per cent of our people living below the poverty line, as is the situation in the United States? Is the Hon. Member suggesting that we should not lower the number of those who are living below the poverty line? We have been trying to assist those people through this Budget.

Is the Hon. Member suggesting we should destroy our social safety net that we have for these people? We want to try to lower the number of people living below the poverty line so that fewer are caught in the transition taking place in the economy. The Hon. Member for Vegreville does not mention that expenditures in relation to GNP are 33 per cent lower than in 1979. I believe it is 9.2 per cent this year compared to 13.9 per cent for 1979.

The Hon. Member makes remarks about the "odious" National Energy Program being responsible for the slow-down. What does the Hon. Member propose we should do with natural gas in the west, where approximately 11,000 wells in Alberta are shut in due to lack of markets? The Canadian government removed the natural gas and gas liquids tax as of February 1, 1984. What has the Alberta Government done in this regard? Has it lowered its royalties on gas to make it more marketable?

Finally, what has happened with the Ontario Energy Board? Has it approved a lower industrial rate to get this gas moving and to create cash flow for companies? If the National Energy Program is so odious, why in 1983 were over 4,000 oil wells—I am not talking about gas wells—drilled and completed in Canada? That is the highest number ever on record. The previous best year was 1980 when there were 2,600 wells drilled. Can he explain that?

• (1210)

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has given me an opportunity to make another speech.

Mr. Axworthy: I hope it is better than the first one.

Mr. Mazankowski: I regret I did not get into transportation issues in my speech. I had fully intended to, but I noticed that the Minister removed himself from the Chamber during the time I was speaking.

I did not set out to compare Canada with the United States. However, the Hon. Member gives me that opportunity. There is certainly much more buoyancy, optimism and confidence in the United States than there is in this country with respect to employment prospects. The fact of the matter is that the United States has turned its economy around. Once again it is becoming a very dynamic and vigorous economy. The U.S. does not find itself in the same situation. Its unemployment rate is roughly around 8 per cent and its inflation rate is down. From the standpoint of providing the kind of stability required for future economic growth, the Americans have certainly carved out a pretty good path on the road to recovery. I sense that the policy of this Government is primarily to rely upon the anticipated recovery in the United States. That certainly does not represent economic leadership.

With respect to the deficit, if we compared the size of the two economies and they were on a comparable basis, we should be looking at a deficit in the vicinity of $18 billion rather than $31 billion with some prospect of it levelling off. We cannot believe those figures because they have been inaccurate over the last few years.

I am surprised the Hon. Member defends blindly the National Energy Program. He has been very closely involved in the agricultural community. He knows what it means to small family businesses and small family farms. The tragedy of the National Energy Program is that it destroyed that sector of the energy enterprise—the small operator, the small Canadian firm and the small family-operated business. I am not referring to those who became involved in the energy business or the surplus-related business as a result of the boom. I am talking about people who have been involved for some 10 years to 15 years. Their hopes and dreams were frittered away.

The energy policy was formulated to get even with the multinational firms. Foreign-owned oil firms are doing very well, but it is the Canadian ones that are suffering. We have organizations such as Sulpetro, Dome and Turbo and all the little guys who are in business serving the oil industry. The Hon. Member should go into Red Deer, Lloydminster, or Drayton Valley to see the impact of the National Energy Program. That is where the difficulty arose.

If the Government would acknowledge the fact that it made a mistake, there would be some satisfaction and some move to restore confidence in that sector; but it simply continues arrogantly and stubbornly in the same direction and says, "It is too bad but we were right", and at the same time corrects its mistakes. It is policy by trial and error which has been devastating, damaging and certainly not in the best interests of individual Canadians or of the Canadian economy in general.

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the speech of the Hon. Member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski). He quite rightly condemned the Government's economic policies, but I did not hear him elaborate on what sort of approach the Conservatives would take to the economy. However, I heard him laud and praise American economic policies and their results. Does this mean that a Conservative government, should there ever be one, would follow Reaganite, neo-conservative economic policies which would involve cuts in social services and continued unemployment?

Mr. Mazankowski: It would take me another 20 minutes to outline all the things we would do. Other speakers have done so, but unfortunately I got caught up in the many things that are bad with this administration and the prospect that things will not get any better.

The fact of the matter is that jobs are a number one priority. Certainly the United States has done a much better job than Canada in terms of job creation. We would do that for starters. Then we would be able to restore the dignity and pride of the two million Canadians who are standing on the sidelines and do not have any opportunity.

Unless we generate some new wealth in the country, we will be unable to provide the necessary funding and resources to maintain the social net about which the NDP and the Liberals talk but are not sure who will pay for it. We will restore some confidence in our basic industries—agriculture, mining, forestry and fisheries, but agriculture particularly.

The Government talks about how we should improve our competitive ability in agriculture, but every time a farmer fuels his tractor or combine, 62 cents of the cost goes into federal coffers. Our fuel prices are higher than those in the United States. Certainly that makes it difficult for producers to compete effectively. Those are the kinds of things which have to be remedied.

We have a $2 billion trade deficit in tourism. Why cannot we do something to reverse that? These are positive things which would stimulate growth and generate new wealth to pay for the programs that are in place. No one is talking about scaling down the social welfare net. However, if we do not generate the wealth we need to sustain those programs, it will have to be one alternative. There is another alternative. A Conservative government would generate the kind of confidence, enthusiasm and enterprising spirit which would allow the country to forge ahead so that it can achieve its great potential.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I have a short question for the Hon. Member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski). In his remarks he talked about returning the industry to private enterprise. Did he mean Petro-Canada, Suncor and those socialistic enterprises under the control of the Government of Canada and the Government of Ontario?

Also he talked about the recovery in the United States. Is he aware of the terrible layoffs which are occurring in the United States steel industry? Because of those layoffs, companies such as Iron Ore of Canada have actually closed down operations and towns in Canada.

Mr. Mazankowski: I would rather talk about the problems, issues and proposed solutions within our own country because we have tremendous opportunities of which we have failed to take advantage. We have some natural strength which we have frittered away. For example, we failed to turn our energy advantage into an economic one and we failed to turn our tourism advantage into an economic one.

Mr. Murphy: What about Suncor?

Mr. Mazankowski: I will get to that. I listened to the Hon. Member when he asked his question, but if he is saying that he wants to continue the Canadian Ownership Special Charge to further socialize industry ad hoc without any controls or accountability, I will meet him in the election campaign on that one. There is $900 million in a slush fund which was to be used to buy out foreign multinational companies. It is now being used as a political patronage porkbarrel. If the Hon. Member is in favour of that, as I suggest he is, I am sure Canadians would have a different view. I would certainly debate that on the hustings with him at any time.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, in 20 years the Liberal administration has increased the annual deficit five times the total Budget of 1963. When Walter Gordon became Minister of Finance in 1963, his total Budget, which incidentally provided for a small deficit relative to today, was a mere $6.3 billion. Now we wonder at the equanimity with which this administration since the days of John Turner has piled up deficits so that we have an accumulated deficit of close to $160 billion. That is the problem with which the Budget did not deal.

One can agree with the effect of some things in the Budget. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) has at least deigned to look upon certain problems. He has taken certain corrective measures. We do not know how effective they will be.

For example, the Minister boasted about how he was simplifying taxation for small business. He did not do that from any Government initiative. I invite Hon. Members and anyone else who is interested to look at the testimony before the Economy Affairs Committee in the fall of 1982. It dealt with the horrible mess of the proposals in 1980, 1981 and 1982, which had not been passed into law, under the general heading of income tax, as proposed by the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) when he was Minister of Finance.

There are only two Liberals officially in the Chamber at the present time. I can see others who recall the testimony from organizations representing all parts of Canada, particularly that dealing with the complexity of taxation for small business. The proposals were going to add some hundreds of pages to the income tax text, not only statutory changes but regulations. No one knew what they said.

We have a peculiar system with regard to drafting legislation. A Minister such as the Minister of Finance makes certain proposals and they are put in the Ways and Means Motion, which is the general thrust or intent of the budget for that ministry. The statute changes and the regulations are written in the drafting section of the Department of Justice. There is a certain philosophy that applies there with regard to writing statutes. The net result is, as was admitted before the committee, that not even the tax officials in the Department of Finance really know what is meant by the text that parliamentarians are supposed to consider and pass.

Such is the system here that a tame government majority does as it is told. As George Bain said in The Globe and Mail of last Saturday, it almost makes you feel as though parliamentarians are nobodies. They are supposed to consider and pass legislation. We have a Government that presses for closure, allotted time. The past several years have been nothing but a scandal with regard to the allocation of time on income tax legislation. Not 5 per cent of the Government members understand what is being passed, and not many more elsewhere, because the language is so difficult. The Minister says this time he is going to remove a good deal of the verbiage and the requirements of that verbiage with regard to small business. We will see when the legislation is brought forward. It may be that the cure will be worse than the disease.

The Minister takes a bow toward farmers by introducing a very narrow amendment with regard to capital gains on the sale of farm land, allowing up to $240,000 of increase in sale price over purchase and in capital improvements, providing the farmer—not within the farm family group, but the owner—operated the farm for ten years, so that that may be invested in the RRSP. An investment in an RRSP implies that there is a fair amount of cash to be invested in an appropriate plan. The 1971 rule will not apply, but we do not know how far that ceiling will be lifted.

How long are the payments to be allowed? I ask the Parliamentary Secretary because he has some knowledge of farm financing problems. Are the limitations going to be ten years on any mortgage or agreement of sale, or as the previous Budget provided? Thank God that was eliminated. The Department of Finance was wedded to limiting any credit contract, such as an agreement of sale or a mortgage, to five years. Whether the payments had been received or not, whether interest had been received or not, whether capital gains portions had been received or not, the taxpayer had to pony up in entirety.

There is a philosophy in the Taxation Division of the Department of Finance that as soon as a dollar has been earned, whether it has been paid or not, the Government has a right to a portion of it, and it wants it now. Of course, it is not entitled to it. The taxpayer does not exist for the benefit of the Government. The Government exists for the benefit of the taxpayers and the citizens of this country. That is the difference between the present Government philosophy and the Liberal Party, and the Official Opposition. We do not believe that people exist for the benefit of government. Government exists for the benefit of the people.

The Government must also spend the money that it sees it can get. It organizes programs that are easy to sell to gullible voters and then turns around and taxes those programs like it is doing with the petroleum acquisition tax. That is a plain grab. That petroleum capital assets acquisition levy has produced far more than what was required even though those assets were acquired at a scandalously high price.

The same goes for PetroCan, the so-called ideal of the Government and of the people who think that PetroCan is good for Canada. It is paying rates for drill ships and supply ships and for acquisition that is far in excess of the market and it is paying daily rates that are far in excess of the current market. However, because PetroCan is a Crown corporation, it does not have to worry about who will foot the bill. The gullible taxpayer will offer his or her wallet when supporting such programs.

The policy of the Government and the policy of PetroCan vis-à-vis the Canadian public is dishonest. PetroCan behaves in the crassest of manners. The public press alleges, that the standard of behaviour of PetroCan is similar to the behaviour of some foreign corporations like Imperial Oil and Exxon which have been in the country for 50 years or more drilling for oil. As well, there are the opportunists who want to cash in on the hard work and blood, sweat and tears of the thousands of people in the petroleum industry who are trying to make a go of things.

In one fell stroke, this administration, in 1980 and 1981, put an end to a good industry. This industry was working throughout the four western provinces. The administration did not realize it but at the same time, of course, it sure put an end to a lot of the Ontario and Quebec industries which supplied goods to the petroleum industry. Ask automobile workers how many fewer vehicles were sold annually as a result of this administration. I see an Hon. Member over there who is shaking his head. We know this for a fact. I am talking about trucks, automobiles, bulldozers, front-end loaders and the like. The market from western Manitoba all the way to the Pacific coast went straight downhill.

An Hon. Member: American automobiles.

Mr. Lambert: No. When the Hon. Member says American automobiles, he does not know what he is talking about. However, we do know what the decline in sales was and we know the number of automobile agencies that went broke and the number of auction sales of surplus equipment that went on. This all came about as a result of the National Energy Program.

The last point I wish to return to and really dwell upon, Mr. Speaker, is the question of capital gains on farm lands. It is now almost impossible for the owner of farm lands who faces a disposition either by will or by sale to determine whether capital gains taxes are to be paid or whether those taxes can be postponed. Those taxes can never be escaped because of every relieving provision implemented since the first one which was introduced by John Turner back in 1973 or 1974 after the imposition of capital gains on farm lands came about in 1971. That happened in spite of our express vote. I put forward an amendment which would eliminate any question of capital gains on the sale of farm lands for farming purposes.

Mr. Mazankowski: How did the NDP vote?

Mr. Lambert: They came along with us on that one, as I recall. We had tax department interpretations which were just as ruthless as those of today. If a wheat farm were to be changed into a beef farm or if a farm were to be changed from one on which poultry was the principal occupation to one on which the production of honey was to be the principal occupation, it would not be deemed to be a similar purpose and would therefore be subject to full capital gains tax.

We now have all sorts of farming corporations which have been encouraged by the Department of Agriculture but are taxed by the Department of National Revenue. In the past there could not be devolution by will from a father to a son, a married daughter or a widow without attracting capital gains. Now those capital gains taxes are deferred one generation. At this time, this relief provides that if a farmer wills his property to his son and the son should die without leaving any direct heirs, the land, under the usual succession, could revert back to the mother and still be allowed as one of the deferrals.

Frankly, this situation is so expensive to the farming industry of the country. Hundreds of millions of dollars have been siphoned off from the capital that is required to own a farm in this country. No wonder we are having difficulties setting up young farmers who want to buy land. One of the reasons for this, Mr. Speaker, is that the sale price of a farm is always inflated by the amount of the expected capital gains tax. The vendor naturally tries to protect himself or herself and so the price goes up.

The Government has sucked those hundreds of millions of dollars which would have served as capital within the industry out of the industry. This capital could have been used to buy machinery, to build more buildings on the property, to acquire more land or to put more land into production. No, the ever-hungry, blood sucking operation that is conducted by the Government in order to finance plans that it announces or wants to announce without any idea of where the money will come from is one of the reasons we have this tax. It would be far better, Mr. Speaker, to scrap the capital gains tax on lands used for farming purposes and give some priority to supporting the agriculture industry in the country, an industry which is facing such a tough time today and will as well in the years to come.

• (1240)

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I noted the comments of the Hon. Member and would remind him that prior to the imposition of the capital gains tax, representations were made by many farm organizations for the removal of the previous level of estate tax. As an alternative to that, they suggested a high capital gains tax. Little did they guess that we were heading into the high inflationary spiral of the 1970s.

The Hon. Member referred to Petro-Canada paying rates in excess of current market rates for supplies for drill ships, et cetera. Could he tell me if these are for exploration taking place in Canadian offshore regions or are they being paid by Petro-Canada International, which has formed a joint venture with British Petroleum to develp huge resources in the China Sea? It has contracts for Canadian technology and will use smaller Canadian companies, some from Alberta. This will provide jobs for Canadians. Do these rates reflect a higher level of risk in exploration work due to Canadian climatic conditions if they are in the Canadian offshore regions, or a higher level of risk in internationl waters as they work toward the development of these resources with British Petroleum in the contract with China?

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, I wonder where the Hon. Member got the kind of misinformation which would lead him to ask such questions. I am talking about the cost of ships PetroCan is using off the coast of Newfoundland. Newfoundland is no different from the North Sea as far as danger is concerned. Drill ships have been lost over there due to storms as well. I will find the article from which I got the information and let the Hon. Member have it. It refers to the rates being paid to Wolff, for instance, who is the darling friend of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), for the use of ships off the East Coast.

As far as what the Hon. Member has said about working with British Petroleum, I would remind him that this is a contract for work in the future off the coast of Nigeria and at some time, perhaps, off the coast of China. The Hon. Parliamentary Secretary cannot tell me that there is one piece of equipment belonging to PetroCan at work in those two fields. I seem to remember that PetroCan was going to develop Canadian resources, for the benefit of Canadians. If the Parliamentary Secretary can tell me what is the benefit to Canadians of a Canadian Crown corporation working at very high rates in Nigeria and China, I should like to know. We will not sell one barrel of oil to them at any time. How is that deemed to be within the purposes of that great God-saving operation known as PetroCan, the thing that the Liberal Party used to steal the 1980 election?

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, with all due respect, I should like to suggest to the hon. gentleman that the Canadian operations being carried out in Senegal and Gambia reflect the high-risk international situation in those areas. The risk is due to international uncertainty. I would also suggest to him that if we look at the geographical location of PetroCan operations in the offshore of eastern Canada, we will find that there are areas with a higher degree of risk than others. For example, the area of Hibernia where the ice packs sometimes come down involves a higher cost than in other areas.

I would be delighted to receive the article to which the Hon. Member referred. I will follow the matter up and get all the information required to identify where this is taking place.

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member speaks very critically of Petro-Canada. It is difficult for us to get any reading on the policies of the Conservative Party and what it would do if it gained office. I wonder if the Hon. Member is saying that if his Party got into office it would privatize Petro-Canada. Would it sell it off? Would this apply also to Suncor, which belongs to the Ontario Conservative Government? Would the same policy apply to other public corporations, whether they be CBC or any other? What is the Hon. Member's attitude toward Petro-Canada? Does he mean that a Conservative government formed by his Party would sell it off?

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, this question is merely a reflection of the oversimplification of particular questions by the NDP. Petro-Canada is here with us. We cannot tear it down, there are no two ways about that, any more than we can tear down that 54-storey white elephant in Calgary which serves as the central palace for PetroCan. It was built with the Hon. Member's dollars but there is no need for it in Calgary.

Be that as it may, at the present time Petro-Canada is not operating a well-run, competitive, private enterprise. It can afford a lot of excesses by reason of some of the concessions it obtains from government. Incidentally, the Hon. Member is way off base regarding Suncor. The Ontario Government owns only a piece of Suncor, which was entirely privately owned previously. It should be remembered that Suncor is a different oil company from Syncrude, but perhaps the Hon. Member is confused in that regard.

I am not the Conservative Party, Mr. Speaker, but I have my choices. It would be a good thing for the Canadian public if we axed many of these Crown corporations on the head; on the other hand, there are some that are useful. While I am critical of part of the operations of the CBC, for instance, I find that the level of programming, particularly in radio, is something in which I can take pleasure. But I am not going to be held responsible by my answers in this type of debate for the total policies of this Party, any more than I can hold the Hon. Member accountable for the policies of the New Democratic Party.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Debate.

Mr. George Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a few words to say about the subject under debate today, the Budget presented recently by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde). It is basically a good Budget, from three standpoints. First, there were no new tax increases; second, it contained additional benefits for those Canadians who need them most, namely, our elderly; third, and perhaps most important, it retains a Liberal attitude of not bowing to Conservative pressures to cut existing programs.

• (1250)

Let me deal briefly, Mr. Speaker, with a couple of major areas of conflict, general misunderstanding and, I believe, political confusion as far as my part of this country is concerned. The first fallacy, pontificated daily over and over by certain provincial governments and certain Members opposite, is that the federal Government has and is still cutting back on cost-share programs and direct transfers to provinces like Newfoundland. That is the first fallacy.

Let me take an appropriate example of the province with the highest unemployment, Newfoundland. This year, 1984, we will see the largest amount of federal transfers to the Government of Newfoundland. Transfer payments to the Government of Newfoundland will increase this year by some $100 million, as was the case last year. Equalization payments and transfer payments have been growing by leaps and bounds. It becomes an interesting formula and somewhat of an enigma if you listen to the provincial politicians who claim that just the opposite is true. For example, each time the price of oil went up over the last few years, provinces like Newfoundland received increased equalization payments. One dollar a barrel amounted to something like $20 million added in equalization at the end of the year.

As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, upon examining this entire formula on equalization, I believe it can be termed logically to a certain degree as taxation by the back door. One never hears the Newfoundland Government, or any other government of what we would call an economically depressed province, criticize the increases in the price of oil and gas for that very simple reason. There seems to be a social pact between all governments on this issue which I, personally, Mr. Speaker, strongly disagree with.

If we look at the established programs funding, or the formula of general increases under the Canada Assistance Plan, the same steady increase has been seen over the years. But how disguised and politically shifty that formula has become. For example, Mr. Speaker, the great debate in Newfoundland today concerns the cost of operating hospitals and homes for the elderly. A commission studying the question of homes for the elderly has just presented a report. I witnessed recently the presentation of a brief to a standing committee in Ottawa by the provincial minister of health for the Newfoundland Government. The brief said that the federal transfers for hospitals and homes for the elderly had decreased to 37 per cent of the total provincial budget in those areas. However, as was pointed out in the committee, the actual figures showed that 53 per cent of the entire hospital budget of the Newfoundland Government, and a full 60 per cent of the operating costs of senior citizens' homes, nursing homes and homes for chronic care, came from the federal Government.

The question I asked at the time, Mr. Speaker, was why the confusion? It was discovered that these transfers were made directly to the provincial Department of Finance and went into the consolidated revenue fund. The provincial minister of health could therefore say he did not see the money for hospital costs and the provincial minister of social services, who runs senior citizen and nursing homes, could say he did not see 60 per cent of his budget coming from the federal Government.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that the most regressive piece of legislation ever passed in this House was when we decided to give each provincial government block funding; in other words, one big cheque to cover all matters involving cash transfers to provincial governments. The provincial governments receive the money and spend it as general revenue. The big lie comes in, Mr. Speaker, when they say, as the provincial minister of social services said recently: "The Government of Newfoundland has to totally finance the operation of senior citizens' homes". These transfers to the provincial treasury are for specific purposes and to make up for revenues which a poor province cannot receive. However, it is downright dishonest not to recognize that these cash transfers are being made and obviously are not being spent in the intended areas.

The provincial governments want to protect this block funding principle because it leaves them with more manoeuvrability. However, in my opinion, Mr. Speaker, that federal money, making up over half of the costs of running hospitals in Newfoundland, should be transferred directly to the provincial department of health, not to the provincial finance department, and federal funds earmarked specifically for the operation of homes for senior citizens, nursing homes and chronic care homes should go directly to the provincial department of social services and not to the provincial department of finance.

I would like to say a few words now, Mr. Speaker, about jobs and direct job creation as it relates to the federal Government, this Budget and unemployment. The Province of Newfoundland which I represent is going through the worst economic time in our history. Nothing is opening. Everything is closing down.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Except Mr. Peckford's mouth.

Mr. Baker: My hon. friend says except the Premier's mouth. I must admit it would be some source of revenue if we were to tax each speech he makes.

Our three major industries in the Province of Newfoundland, forestry, mining and the fisheries, are in desperate straits. Paper mills are closing down. Mines are closing down. Fish plants are going bankrupt all over the province. That is the scene in Newfoundland today. What does the provincial government do in this state of desperation? It throws up its hands and says: "There is nothing we can do". But there is something it can do, Mr. Speaker. There is something it could have done over the years but did not. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, we could say that basically the situation in Newfoundland is the fault of our political system which we cannot do anything about. It cannot be corrected. It is still probably the best system in the world. But an extremely political government always looks to the short term, to the next election. It gives people a dream, and in this case it is an offshore hope, and then lets the people wither in despair onshore. There is no planning, no long-term employment measures, and no immediate solutions to anything.

Should I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member, but it being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF LIQUOR SECTION IN INDIAN ACT

Hon. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I have just returned from a visit to the Indian reserves in the far northern part of the Kenora-Rainy River constituency. One of the items raised with me by individuals and band Councils was the status of Section 97 of the Indian Act. This matter was raised particularly by the North Cariboo Lake Band at Round Lake. This Section has permitted the bands to hold votes to determine whether or not a reserve would be wet or dry. It permitted the Minister of Indian Affairs to have the final say in the matter.

A year ago a Manitoba court struck down Section 97, claiming it violated the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Since that time havoc has reigned in northern Ontario reserves with some areas continuing to enforce Section 97, others not, and others laying charges under the Ontario Liquor Licensing Act.

Alcoholism in northern Ontario reserves has been called an epidemic. This was said by the Deputy Minister, Doctor Lyle Black, who is in charge of the Medical Services Branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare. That Branch is responsible for providing medical health services directly or indirectly to Indian bands. Of all the diseases which the Indian people are subject to, alcoholism is probably the worst. One of the weapons against this disease has been struck down by the courts.

In the name of those people who—

Mr. Speaker: I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member, but the time allocated to him has expired.

TOURISM

IMBALANCE IN TOURIST INDUSTRY

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, one industry which received little attention in the Budget was tourism. The current figures on the travel deficit give very little encouragement. Canadians travelling outside the country spent a record $2.087 billion more last year than foreign visitors spent here. This deficit, which will worsen the country's balance of payments position, is up from the previous record of $1.2 billion posted in 1982.

This country earned $3.8 billion from international travel in 1983, up 3.5 per cent from 1982. During the same period, Canadians travelling abroad increased their payments by 18.6 per cent to $5.9 billion. Canadians are consistently lured out of the country by cheap gasoline prices in the U.S., and a favourable exchange rate in other countries. This loss also costs Canada an estimated 100,000 jobs and, Mr. Speaker, that hurts. When will the Government give tourism the breaks it needs to improve its position?

THE PRIME MINISTER

ANNOUNCEMENT OF IMPENDING RESIGNATION OF RIGHT HON. P. E. TRUDEAU

Mr. Brian Mulroney (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in my remarks today on the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) retirement I shall be prudent.

Mr. Chrétien: It is snowing outside.

Mr. Mulroney: I am mindful that there is blizzard going on in Ottawa.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: Last time this happened, Mr. Speaker, the eulogy proved to be somewhat premature. Accordingly, I would like to congratulate the Prime Minister and wish him well, but I propose to do so on the instalment plan. As the weeks unfold, and if the Prime Minister has not unretired, I will become progressively fulsome and complimentary. Should the situation change, all bets are off.

The campaign for the Liberal leadership and the Prime Minister's worthy succession is already giving signs of being very close and exciting. It looks as if it will be a nip and tuck battle right up until the bitter end—on March 16.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: Because of the Prime Minister's deep concern for policy and wanting to know where people stand on issues, a very appropriate concern because he has always wanted to know where people stand on issues, I know he must be comforted by the clear-cut positions some leading candidates have adopted over the years. Because of the Prime Minister's determination to avoid any right wing bias affecting his Party, he must be consoled to learn that policy making will now be removed from the back rooms of the Liberal Party and brought right up front, over smoked salmon and caviare at one of Toronto's best restaurants.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: On September 12, Mr. Speaker, in my first remarks to this House I said that the Prime Minister was, in my judgment, an individual of accomplishment and class. I have had no reason over the past six months to change my view. I would never have voted for the Prime Minister, but neither would I have remonstrated vigorously with anyone who did.

As I am in the process of learning, the leadership of a national political Party is no small task. I have not yet had the experience, and the trials and tribulations, of doing so for 16 months. That the Prime Minister has done so on behalf of his Party for 16 years is a remarkable tribute to his talents and his unquestioned love of Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: All the more so, Mr. Speaker, because the Prime Minister for 16 years has led a Party which Lord Birkenhead once described as akin to Noah's ark, "filled with all manner of strange beasts and wandering aimlessly all over the face of the earth".

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, to those of us from Quebec, this is an important moment. There is no doubt about the sincerity of the Prime Minister in insisting on increasing the number of Francophones involved in Canada's decision-making apparatus.

No one can deny the energy and feeling with which he has always defined and defended his vision of a more bilingual Canada, more tolerant in its attitudes to minorities, either linguistic or otherwise.

This noble legacy will be defended with enthusiasm by his successors, in the interests of a united Canada.

From the outset I took part in regrouping the "No" forces in Quebec at the time of the Referendum, and I shall never forget the role played by the Prime Minister at that historic moment. The Referendum night was a great moment in the history of Quebec and Canada. In the future, anyone looking back on these events through the perspective of history must recognize the vital role played by the Prime Minister of Canada in the final outcome.

It was the challenge of his career, and he met this challenge with courage and dignity.

[English]

One is always uncertain as to the ultimate judgment of history. Irrespective of that view, I am confident there will be little disagreement, Mr. Speaker—at least I hope—with the following personal assessment. He was a strong leader and an honourable man who cared for his country, saw its future threatened, and sought to make it right. When he leaves this Chamber he will do so with the scars of vigorous, democratic debate, and the memories of hopes dashed, and dreams fulfilled. He will leave with honour unsullied, and with the warmest good wishes of all to enjoy the pleasures of a family he loves so very much.

• (1410)

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I speak today on behalf of the New Democratic Party and on behalf of our Leader, the Hon. Member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent). Unfortunately our Leader is in British Columbia and unable to return in time, because he would have wanted to speak.

I reread with interest the last goodbye statements that were made, and I could not help but think to myself: "I hope I don't say anything here today that will prompt you to reconsider." I must say that 16 years of leadership are a very long time. In those 16 years the United States has seen five Presidents, and other countries have had many leaders. It is an accomplishment that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) can look back on with pride.

We are much too close to the scene here in the House of Commons, in Ottawa, to be able to understand either the importance or the significance of the contribution that the Prime Minister has made. I will, as I must, leave that to the historians to decide.

I look back though, to 1968 and the years that followed, and I think of the varied presentations of self that we saw from the Prime Minister—the flower child of the 1960s, complete with rose and sandals, and the vision of a just society. It is a vision that I think we all subscribe to, and a vision that we all hoped would come to pass but, I might say, eluded us somewhat. However, it is still valid and still must be pursued. From there he went to the gunslinger, thumbs tucked in belt, threatening and challenging the country to rise to aspirations that the Prime Minister himself had set; and on to the new Father of Confederation seeking that compromise, that common ground, that would make Canada a viable entity as it entered into the new world politics.

I wonder how the Prime Minister will be remembered. I was thinking this morning, as I trudged through the snow—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deans: I want to say that when I was told our Leader would not be here I had a sauna, looked up, and said: "Oh God, why me?"

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deans: However, I think the Prime Minister will be remembered for his burning commitment to a Quebec within Canada, a Quebec which was understood by the rest of Canada, and a Quebec which understood the aspirations of the rest of Canada. I think he will be remembered for the fact that he was prepared to fight to achieve that vision by going into Quebec and to the rest of Canada to place, quite clearly and unequivocally, his views before the people who must, out of necessity, make the decisions on what this country is going to be. To this point, the measure of success of that goal is still difficult to be judged but, if one can judge it, it can be done on the basis that Canada is still together. Given the events of the recent past, that in itself is an accomplishment.

I think the Prime Minister would agree with us that the issue of federalism remains. Perhaps the focus has changed somewhat from the time when he first established where the country was going, but maybe he leaves us all a challenge, not only those of us in politics but those of us outside of politics, with regard to what our country will be a year or two from now. Will we be able to meet the aspirations of the various regions of the country? Will we be able to come to grips with the challenges and the solutions to the challenges of those who reside in the West who feel that they are not understood, of those who reside in the Maritimes who feel they are not understood, or of the native peoples of Canada who struggle continually for a place constitutionally guaranteed? Will we be able to establish a place within our country for the northerners of Canada who want to participate fully? That is the challenge that we must take up, along with the ongoing challenge of how Quebec and francophone or anglophone Quebecers fit within the greater future of the country.

It is always difficult to find appropriate words, but, as an aside, I may say I looked through the newspapers, and there are a couple of jobs available. I noticed them and I thought they were appropriate. There is one job advertisement here with the title "Super Salesperson". It states that a national manufacturer of established automotive and industrial product lines requires a sales person with five years' minimum experience. This is the interesting point, "travel 60 per cent of the time—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deans: —all expenses paid. Bilingualism an asset". The one problem may be the Toronto headquarters, but we may be able to work that out. With the pension, I think the $65,000 might be suitable.

There is another job that I thought looked appealing, perhaps, and had a similar resumé requirement. It is at the King Saud University in Saudi Arabia. It provides free return air tickets annually. There is furnished accommodation. When you leave public housing, you will be able to go there. There is a monthly transport allowance, a relocation allowance, and then an end of service gratuity so that, 16 years from now, perhaps you can retire again.

We wish the Prime Minister well. We hope that his retirement is all that he would want it to be, and that he looks back with a sense of accomplishment and pride to the things he was able to do for the country that I undoubtedly know he loves. Bon voyage!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, as I was saying on November 27, 1979, before I was so rudely interrupted—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): —I rise very briefly to salute the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) as a formidable adversary, and as a man of extraordinary personal force, whose mark upon the country will exceed that of most of the great leaders of the nation.

He and I have disagreed—indeed we have disagreed more vigorously since I last bade him farewell than we had before that—but despite those disagreements I cannot overlook, as can no one in the House or the country, the extraordinary personal qualities of the man.

I do not want to go on at great length, but I admire particularly that he is a man who, despite the natural constraints of leadership and public life, was prepared to take great risks on behalf of views he held deeply, and was able to use his remarkable talents to enlist so many others in his cause.

I have never pretended to agree with his fundamental vision of the country, but I certainly have admired his ability not only to pursue that vision but to persuade so many that he was correct, and to enlist so many in his cause. The Right Hon. Member for Mount Royal has had an extraordinary and distinguished career in this country and in the House.

• (1420)

I am pleased to see him gone or going again, and I wish him most sincerely—

[Translation]

And I must do so in the second official language, since I believe that without him, without Pierre Elliott Trudeau, the status of French-speaking Canadians would not be what it is today. In this respect at least, he has changed our country.

[English]

It is a much better country for his Prime Ministry, in that regard at least and I salute him for it. I wish him success and satisfaction in whatever career he chooses ahead.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thought it might be appropriate to say a few words on this historic occasion, a momentous occasion certainly for the Liberal Party and for those of us who have worked so closely with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) over his 16 years as Leader of our Party and as Prime Minister of Canada.

The Prime Minister was good enough to call me before he made his decision public last Wednesday. I was in my constituency office in Port Hawkesbury where there were many people in to see me. I interrupted my work to take the call from the Prime Minister. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that even though I continued to see the rest of my constituents for several hours, my mind was constantly on the implications of the decision that had been conveyed to me by the Prime Minister. I could only reflect at that time what a formidable political leader he is, and what a brilliant Prime Minister he is.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: The Hon. Member from Hamilton asked how the Prime Minister will be remembered. He will be remembered for many things, and it is not for me to detail all those controversial, difficult, and profound issues with which he has successfully grappled during his period as Prime Minister. But I know he will be remembered as a political leader who dominated the public life of Canada all during his public career. He will be remembered as a leader who dominated the House of Commons and during that period had no peer in the ability to carry an argument. That is an admirable quality for those of us who appreciate the value of Parliament.

The Prime Minister worked in caucus. Over all those years he held the support and affection of members of that caucus. As well he held the support and affection of his colleagues in the Cabinet.

I believe the Prime Minister did make a good decision for himself and for the Liberal Party which he has served so effectively, but I cannot help but have a deep feeling of sadness at the decision, and I cannot help but have a very deep pride in having been associated with him all during those 16 years and having lived through the ups and downs of political life.

The Prime Minister's career, I think, can be a model for anyone, a career of dedication, personal tranquility and integrity. I think Canadians have every reason to be proud of him, as I am and certainly as every Liberal member is on this side of the House.

I spoke on November 21, 1979, also. I want to read a sentence I uttered on that occasion.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: I said:

> It has been my view since the last election that the Right Hon. Member for Mount Royal (Mr. Trudeau) could continue to lead our party and could succeed in returning this party to office in the future.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: Not bad, Mr. Speaker, for in a sense predicting what happened subsequent to November 21, 1979.

I did speak in 1979, and I am speaking today. I did not keep the notes I used in 1979. The notes I use today I will keep against possible future use in the House of Commons.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, like others who have spoken, I had the privilege on November 21, 1979, of saying a word in favour of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) because of his intention at that time to resign. He gave us that indication on November 21, 1979, but on February 18 of the next year, there he was again, re-elected Prime Minister.

In that process, as one who has been here for quite a while and who has known quite a number of Prime Ministers, I think it is a credit for the Prime Minister to have taken enough years so that, even if he leaves this job as Prime Minister in June of this year, he will become a gentleman who will have served 15 years and five months as Prime Minister which, of course, is longer than Wilfrid Laurier served. He was Prime Minister for 15 years and three months. That means, therefore, of the 16 persons who have been Prime Minister of Canada there was only one in our time who served for a longer time, Mackenzie King. But the one next to him will be the present Prime Minister. We congratulate him very, very much on that achievement.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: I must say as one who has been here, I have known personally six of those who served as Prime Minister. We have had 16 Prime Ministers in the history of our country. Indeed, I met two out of two of the longest serving Prime Ministers. Of the six who were here I knew Mackenzie King, Louis St. Laurent, John Diefenbaker, Lester Pearson, Pierre Trudeau, and Joe Clark.

I suppose it is a natural thing for one who has been here to form an opinion of them. I was beginning to do that at the time of Mackenzie King, St. Laurent, and Pearson. But after that I certainly formed a very definite and strong opinion that the best of the Prime Ministers I have seen in those 40 years of mine were Louis St. Laurent and Lester Pearson.

Now, what am I going to say about the other one, the present Prime Minister? Well, we will just wait until he leaves and we start to assess him. But my opinion is that the present Prime Minister's 15 years make a total longer than the other two, who had 14 years between them, and I think he has had to face more severe and more difficult problems than previous Prime Ministers I have known. I think that applies to Governments and Parties as well. The problems facing Canada today are greater than they were before. During the time of the present Prime Minister they were greater for him than they were in the past. However, he has done a good job. He has worked hard. He has done his best to make this an effective country.

When my day comes to sit back and reflect upon all those who have been Prime Minister, I shall be including his name along with St. Laurent and Pearson as persons who have done a tremendous job for the country. I am most grateful for what they have done for us through the years, and I am happy to pay tribute to the present Prime Minister today.

I have talked about our country having had 16 Prime Ministers over the years. Several had very short terms. Some made history, but not the typical ones. The atypical ones in this century about whom we all know are the two I have named already and the one we are naming now. If Parliament concentrates on trying to solve some of the problems facing us, we may do something about them. We will attempt to solve our problems, and this Prime Minister has prompted us to do so.

I made a statement about a week or so ago guessing when the election would take place. I even joined in the guess that maybe he would keep us around a bit longer. Of course we know what happened in November, 1979. We accepted that resignation, but he came back. What will happen this time, we do not know, but the general opinion is that he is making a contribution of which we are appreciative. Some of us have known him for a long time. I hope I do not spoil his story if I say that we had the experience of knowing him when he had some connections with members of our Party. I remember him being at some of our meetings.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: I even recall an occasion in Montreal when I presented a book that I had written about our Party. The present Prime Minister was there. He read it in both English and in French. He somewhat criticized the speech I made at the time. His main criticism was that it was not strong enough; that we were socialists and we should be stronger. I was delighted that he had that conviction and that he had an interest in some of us, such as Tommy Douglas who liked him so well, and others of the New Democratic Party. Because of that I dared to hope that the future years for that man would be tremendous ones for us. In the meantime along came Lester Pearson who brought some of the people close to us into here, into this Chamber, as Liberals. However, it is important to place an emphasis upon social problems, and he has done that. He has also done it as well on questions of world problems among other nations. He has worked very hard on that.

I have one main reason for being disappointed that he is leaving. It is because we should have a person who will continually work toward peace. As I say, I have known some of the Prime Ministers over many years. I have given my opinion of two of them who were very important in the past. I will put the present Prime Minister very high on the list I expect to draw later.

On behalf of my Leader, my colleagues, and my friends across the country, we are glad to join in this response. I appreciate what he has done for us. We hope things will be better for him. We think our country will gain from the kind of government and concern for our problems which were delivered to us by the present Prime Minister. We thank him and we wish him the very best.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Berger (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, for nearly five years I have had the honour and the privilege of sitting in the House with the Right Hon. Prime Minister. I have listened to him daily during Question Period and at our Liberal Caucus meetings. I have always been impressed by his great intellect, his grasp of a host of subjects, his way of conciliating divergent views, of putting things in perspective and simplifying the complex. My only regret, Mr. Speaker, is that all Canadians did not have the same opportunity to see him at work.

[English]

Most Canadians credit him for his contributions to Canadian unity and to the development of our country with the patriation of our Constitution and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. He is well regarded for his views on social justice and international aid. It is my firm belief that many areas for which he is criticized will be recognized as problems that cannot be attributed to any one person.

[Translation]

In recent months he approached the disarmament issue by trying to promote a dialogue between East and West. Many people tried to accuse him of ulterior political motives. Personally, I prefer to quote the late Governor General Vanier, whose words define the Prime Minister's actions better than any other comment could do. The Prime Minister recalled these words when he spoke in the Debate on the Constitution on March 23, 1981, and I would like to quote what Georges Vanier said in 1967, three days before his death:

> The best time is always the present time, because it alone offers the opportunity for action, because it is ours, because on God's scale it is apocalyptyic, a time when the lines between good and evil are clearly drawn, and each one of us must chose his side, a time when there is no longer room for either the coward or the uncommitted.

Mr. Speaker, this is counsel all members of this House would be well advised to follow.

[English]

I would like to say on behalf of a new generation of Liberal Members of Parliament that we intend to carry on his work and the great traditions of the Liberal Party. We will be counting on his advice, support, and active involvement.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, speaking with independent authority, I would like to state that, after almost 16 years of riding tall in the saddle, our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has decided to hang up his spurs.

Mr. Crosbie: We think.

Mr. Yurko: He leaves his hoofprints all over the nation, and indeed throughout the world.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: That is not all.

Mr. Yurko: This was one tough cowboy, unique in his time. He lassoed the strays, kept the nation whole, and prevented the herd from stampeding all over the place. He burned his bilingual brand upon the hide of the nation—an E/F brand with a multicultural bar.

On one of his most famous rides to the old country, he brought back in his saddlebags our individual and collective conscience. In his time he rode many horses—some ornery, some wild, some nags, some thoroughbreds, and only once did he get bucked off. But he did not quit for long. He dusted himself off and rode again. Now he rides slowly into the sunset. As a westerner I say: "Adios," "Drum Bun"—I know he does not know that "Drum Bun" means—good journey—and "Bon chance". Mr. Prime Minister, we respect you for what you have done. Thank you.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The Right Hon. Prime Minister.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I suppose it must be the grace of my new status, but so many kind words and cordial reminiscences seem to have brought on one of my rare moments of humility.

I would like to thank all those who spoke on their own behalf, and on behalf of their party, for their kind and gracious words. Above all, I want to thank the Members of my Caucus for their support, and I would like to thank especially my constituents in the riding of Mount Royal for their infinite patience and trust. I am always moved when I realize that it is thanks to our democratic system that we represent the Canadian people in Parliament, following a secret and written ballot, and when I realize that all the Members of this House are here thanks to this process. I think we all feel very honoured, as I do myself, at having been elected, in confidence, by a large section of the Canadian people.

[English]

Looking at the clock, I think that it will become apparent to you, Mr. Speaker, and to many of us who have been sitting through these statements, that I meant well by retiring on a day when Parliament was not sitting. I think that that in itself is one of the reasons why it took me so long to retire, because it did mean sitting with as much humility as I could muster—and that I can only do once in a while—listening to the very generous and friendly statements that have been made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney), the former Prime Minister, the Right Hon. Member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark), the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the longest sitting Member in this House, who was good enough to show that his memory was still as keen as his mind, the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans), who spoke on behalf of his Party and offered some help as to my future career, and the independent Member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) who seemed to have stated all the images that, as a younger man, I fancied myself living out, riding into the West. It happened in a different sense, but I was happy to be reminded of all these metaphors.

Of course, my deep thanks go to the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen), who has been exemplary in his loyalty, his support, his hard work, and the devotion with which he filled his task.

It is a rare occasion when one can be judged by one's peers, and perhaps a few of my peers also, and be judged as generously as I was today. I can only express my deep gratitude for the thoughts expressed. Some may serve some day in my obituary, but I can undertake that they will not serve in any resurrection.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Is it the disposition of the House to proceed to Question Period?

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, if it is the disposition of the House to proceed to Question Period, may I suggest that Question Period continue until 3.30?

Mr. Pinard: We agree to that, Mr. Speaker.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT POLICY INQUIRY

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance I would normally ask this question of the Prime Minister, but I do not want to shatter any illusions today. I just say to him: "Git along little doggie". My question is directed to the Minister of State for Finance. I will come back to the Prime Minister later in this last roundup. Oh, he is gone. He is spared being lassoed.

The Budget was brought down on February 15. Since then we have had several pieces of bad news about our economic prospects. Final domestic demand declined in the last three months of 1983, for the first time since the middle of 1982 when the recession was at its deepest. Business investment plunged 12.2 per cent in 1983, worse even than in 1982. StatsCan says that weak business investment will or may continue this year. Real personal disposal income declined in 1983 again. It is now slightly below the level of 1981. The Minister of Finance admitted that this new Budget will have no effect on the economy, as is the analysis of most economists.

Having brought in this Budget, which is a failure and which will have no effect, what steps does the Government plan to take to overcome this bad economic news and start us on the track of a proper economic recovery which will put people back to work? What is the Government going to do, or is there going to be a three-month hiatus while the Liberal leadership business goes forward?

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member should recognize that the growth rates in Canada today are at the sustainable levels which we forecast and which the Hon. Member must know follow naturally from the initial impetus in the economic recovery that constantly occurs in the cyclical nature of our economy. The first surge of re-investment and the first surge of growth come from consumer spending. It is typically followed by a period of some retrenchment when the investment rates gradually pick up. That is what we are seeing today.

The Member speaks of business investment being at a lower level. If he will look at total capital spending he will see that in fact it is up. There is a percentage increase in total capital spending. He will know that part of it is from Special Recovery Projects which the Government put in place in the April Budget. We did so knowing full well that, in the first period of our economic recovery, inventories would be run down, that there would be a period when productive capacity would be more utilized and that the Government, in that initial period, needed to provide a capital impetus in the economy. That is what has happened. We are confident that the private investment will follow in 1984.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, no one will swallow this jabberwocky and gobbledegook.

REPORT ON ECONOMY'S PERFORMANCE—IMPOSITION OF TAX INCREASES

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I show the Minister the Statistics Canada daily report for Thursday, March 1. Statistics Canada, the Minister's own agency, says this:

> The slowing of the recovery in Canada in the fourth quarter was largely attributable to weak final domestic demand. Residential construction and business investment in plant and equipment declined at accelerated rates in the fourth quarter, and the recovery of consumer expenditure slowed.

Everything which has to do with promoting a recovery has slowed. In view of the fact that this domestic demand has weakened and is declining and slowing the recovery, can the Minister explain to the House why he is imposing $6.1 billion in additional taxes on the Canadian consumer this year, and in the next two years, including the sales tax increase of 1 per cent this coming October, or will the Government consider doing away with these increases in view of this weakness in domestic demand?

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister of State ((Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I do not know where the Hon. Member has been recently. Any economic forecast in Canada has made it perfectly clear, as did the Government, that after an initial period of strong recovery growth there would be a more sustainable level of growth stretching through late 1983 and into 1984. The Bank of Montreal, for example, in its recent forecast, welcomed such a sustainable rate rather than the rampant impetus that marked the first months of economic recovery.

With regard to the increased taxation that was forecast in the April Budget, it is our policy to continue that increase. The Bill with regard to the sales tax increase is before the House, and I trust that it will be adopted shortly. We will see the payment for the recovery programs met in part from the increased taxation that will be sustainable and will be affordable by the economy as the recovery goes forward. The Hon. Member knows that as well as I do.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Minister wonders where I have been. I have been out where the unemployed public, the people who are suffering from the lack of jobs and lack of recovery in this economy, are. That is where I have been. They want answers and action, not jabberwocky.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MINISTER'S BUDGET STATEMENT

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, could the Minister tell us how the Minister of Finance was able to say in the Budget of February 15 that his goal was to secure the recovery, and that that goal has also been met, when all of these figures that I have mentioned here today, including those for domestic demand, business investment and real disposable personal income, are all down, but all need to be up and growing stronger in order for us to have any kind of recovery? How could that deceitful and fraudulent statement be made by him and by the Minister?

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the forecast that the Minister made, and with which I fully associate myself, is accurate. We have seen rapid growth in Canada during 1983. We see continuing growth through 1984. The forecasts are there, and the evidence is there.

The statistics which the Hon. Member opposite cites are for short term, and refer to the current recent quarter. They are not trends and are not of a nature that indicates where the economy is going. The economic recovery is taking place in Canada. Exports and total domestic sales are up. Investment is recovering. Inflation is down, and interest rates are down. The conditions now exist for full economic recovery and a restoration of growth in our economy.

If the Hon. Member opposite wishes to engage in his usual doom and gloom, and his distortions of statistics to substantiate his doom and gloom, and to speak of being tough and nasty, that is up to him. That is not our policy on this side of the House. The statistics are evident. Recovery is here and is well under way.

REQUEST FOR SYSTEM OF TAX CREDITS TO COMBAT YOUTH UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of State for Finance. The Bank of Nova Scotia has charged that the economic outlook for Canada accompanying the Budget is too optimistic. That will mean an even higher unemployment rate than the Finance Minister has anticipated and predicted. Under those circumstances, will the Government consider a crash program designed to reduce unemployment? Specifically, will the Government consider introducing a system of tax credits designed to help young people obtain their first steady jobs?

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member opposite selects one forecast to substantiate his gloomy view of the Canadian economy. If he will look at any number of indicators, he will find that in fact there is every expectation for further growth during 1984.

With regard to his suggestion that the Government should somehow offer tax incentives to reduce youth unemployment, he will be aware of the range of programs that the Government has already put in place with regard to employment and training for young people.

I do not know whether the Member opposite is advocating higher deficit spending on the part of the Government. We on this side of the House believe that we have achieved a real balance between direct spending in the public sector to reduce youth unemployment and help retraining, and spending in the private sector. Equally, we have put in place a number of tax incentives and other measures to assist the private sector to create the jobs for young people where the jobs really can be created, which is in the private sector.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I would remind the Minister that the Government has achieved an unemployment rate of 11 per cent, and that is unacceptable.

STATEMENT ATTRIBUTED TO FORMER ADVISER TO PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer the Minister to another expert. In an article written after the Budget, Jim Coutts, a former adviser to the Prime Minister, argued for a fundamental change in our approach to job creation, not just an incremental increase in our programs. He calls the Finance Minister's unemployment projections of over 10 per cent unacceptable. I would ask the Minister what his reaction to that criticism would be, and if the Minister does agree that we need a fundamental change in our approach to job creation.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I do not agree that we need a fundamental change in our approach to job creation. Last April, we did put in place major programs to reduce youth unemployment, including a massive retraining program. We have also offered incentives to the private sector which, as I say, we are convinced will sustain and enhance the economic recovery and from which real jobs will come.

As for the views of Mr. Coutts, the Hon. Member no doubt would want to address himself directly to Mr. Coutts, but I am sure that he equally would want to recognize the programs this Government has put in place which account in part for the high level of deficit financing and which we on this side of the House have recognized as essential during this period of economic recovery. We are confident that those dual programs of public and private sector incentives will bring down the rate of unemployment, as they have already in the past months, in Canada.

NUCLEAR ARMAMENTS

CRUISE MISSILE TESTING—CANCELLATION REQUEST

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister I will direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister. As the Deputy Prime Minister knows, women have been and are today in the forefront of the disarmament and peace movement in Canada and elsewhere. He will recall that it was Sweden's Alva Myrdal who won the Nobel peace prize in 1982, and that it has been women in Canada, led over the decades by the Voice of Women, who have been in the forefront of the struggle to end the nuclear arms race. As a tribute to Canadian women, and women everywhere, will the Deputy Prime Minister, on this first day of International Women's Week, announce on behalf of the Prime Minister the one thing we all want to hear—no Cruise missile testing tomorrow?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think that the Hon. Member is asking for a very tall order by requesting that we abrogate a formal agreement we have made with the United States on 24 hours' notice. We have already made that decision and I do not think that her request at this stage is one that even she would think reasonable.

Ms. Jewett: Mr. Speaker, I guess the Deputy Prime Minister does not know that it is International Women's Week. I thought that he at least might make some reference to that. Perhaps he will do better in his answer to my supplementary question.

• (1500)

REQUEST FOR POSTPONEMENT PENDING COURT DECISION

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the question of testing the Cruise is before the courts and that a decision still has to be rendered on the constitutionality of the testing, would the Minister not agree that the Government has every reason, and has had for the last several months, to say to the United States that we will not be able to go ahead with the Cruise testing? Why has the Government not done that when the issue has been and is before the courts and, indeed, there is an application for an injunction before the courts today? Why has the Government not said there will be no Cruise testing until the matter has been determined in the courts?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is framing her question as if the Government were seeking a way out of carrying out its obligation to test the Cruise. We are not seeking a way out; we think that is an important contribution that we are undertaking, and to which we have agreed. I do not believe that the Hon. Member has provided me with any substantial reason why we should change course at this particular time.

The Minister of National Defence has already made clear that it is the intention of the Government to continue its co-operation with the United States. As I understand it, the fact that the matter is before the court in a particular way is no justification to suspend arrangements that have already been put in place.

Ms. Jewett: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Deputy Prime Minister even knew about the testing. We only learned about it from Washington.

WOMEN'S CONCERN

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I go back to the earlier point I was making about the importance of women in the peace movement and in disarmament. He saw that himself at Stockholm. They were outside the conference hall; only men were inside.

Given the interest and concern of the women of this country in this issue, not only Cruise missile testing but the whole issue, will the Minister give serious consideration to having at least one woman involved in the arms control and disarmament division of his Department, and will he suggest to the Prime Minister that he do the same with his task force? Above all, will the Minister fill the position of ambassador for disarmament which has been vacant for many months, with a prominent woman who is concerned about the issues that that ambassador is supposed to be concerned about, namely, disarmament and peace? Will he put a woman in that position?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the ideas which the Hon. Member has put forward are worth considering. I understand the concerns which women have about the basic question of the nuclear arms race. It is a concern that is deeply felt by women and, I believe, by all persons who are watching what is happening in the world. I am quite favourably disposed toward doing what is possible to reflect the particular point of view of women in the Department where that is possible. The Hon. Member has suggested that we consider an ambassador for disarmament. I would do that, and if she has any candidates she would like to propose, I would be happy to receive the names from her.

Ms. Jewett: Don't you know any?

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ACID RAIN—SULPHUR DIOXIDE EMISSION TARGETS

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment and concerns acid rain and the meeting the Minister is to have tomorrow with provincial ministers.

In 1982 the Minister's predecessor, now the Minister of Employment and Immigration, said that over all we are committed to cutting sulphur dioxide emissions east of the Saskatchewan-Manitoba border 25 per cent by the end of this decade, and that if we have parallel action from the United States we will commit ourselves to a reduction of 50 per cent. May I ask the Minister if he is now prepared to change that official position?

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the meeting tomorrow is to examine our over-all policy between provincial and federal Governments. I would not want to negotiate on the floor of the House what the outcome of tomorrow's conference will be. I would therefore ask the Hon. Member to be patient. The purpose of the meeting tomorrow is to re-evaluate our policy, keeping in mind the fact that, even if we were to go all the way by ourselves, we would still be damaged, and considerably so, in some parts of Canada by acid rain emissions coming from south of the border.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, as the Minister well knows, many Members of the House believe that his reasoning does not help, because we shall have to go to a 50 per cent reduction in any event.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL MEETING

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister if he is prepared to go before his provincial counterparts tomorrow with a strategic plan for a 50 per cent reduction in Canada now, unilaterally, so that that position can be given to the many allies we have on the United States side of the line who are working with us to end the scourge of acid rain?

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the meeting is to develop a strategic plan with our provincial counterparts. I think that is the proper approach to follow, rather than announcing it on the floor of the House of Commons. I want to hear the input of my provincial colleagues, and to develop the plan with them.

STATUS OF WOMEN

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST INDIAN WOMEN—INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is some three months since the Prime Minister promised that removal of discrimination against Indian women would be a matter of urgent legislative priority.

Since three months have gone by and we have seen no sign of such a Bill I want to ask, first, when such a Bill will be tabled and second, is the matter of equality of Indian women on the agenda of the conference later this week between First Ministers and native leaders.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can tell the Hon. Member that the question of the legislation which she has mentioned is very much on the mind of the Government. It is a matter that undoubtedly will be related to the conference held later this week, following which we might be in a better position to indicate the progress or timing of that legislation.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT ACT WITH URGENCY

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, in recent days this House has been seized, and rightly so, with inequities that exist in other parts of the country but this inequity, discrimination against Indian women, was created by an Act of this Parliament. If we have a right to speak to other Legislatures about what they should do, we should be getting on with cleaning up our own act. We have the right and the responsibility to do so. I should like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister why there is not more urgency attached to this drastic situation by the Government of Canada?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is urgency attached to this matter. The Hon. Member is not raising a matter that is not well known to the Government. It is true that the situation arises from legislative action previously taken by the Parliament of Canada and that that has to be corrected in order to reach the objective which she and we espouse. I want to tell her that there is urgency. She knows that there are quite a number of other Bills that have to be dealt with in the House, but that is not the reason why this matter is not going forward at the present time.

AGRICULTURE

FARM FUEL SALES TAX

Mr. Laverne Lewycky (Dauphin-Swan River): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of National Revenue. As he would be aware, farm women have not received the financial recognition that is due to them. Farm incomes have been so low that it is almost impossible to take advantage or recent changes to allow a salary for spouses on the farm and their opportunity to contribute to the Canada Pension Plan. If there were some attempt to increase the over-all farm income, however, such as taking off the sales tax on farm fuels, that would help considerably to increase small farm income. Would the Minister be prepared to support a rebate in the federal government sales tax so that farmers could have an increased income at this time?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of tax policy and the question should be directed to the Minister of Finance or the Minister of State (Finance). I am not responsible for amendments to the Excise Tax Act or the Income Tax Act. That comes under the Minister of Finance.

[English]

Mr. Lewycky: Mr. Speaker, I was not really talking about the excise tax; I was talking about the sales tax.

THRONE SPEECH PROPOSAL TO HELP FARMERS

Mr. Laverne Lewycky (Dauphin-Swan River): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is addressed to the Minister of Agriculture. I am sure he is aware that many farmers are on the verge of bankruptcy. Meanwhile, however, they have been contributing to the Western Grain Stabilization Plan. Just when the payments are most needed, the five-year pay out formula has triggered absolutely nothing. When can we expect to see the legislation which was promised in the Speech from the Throne? And will the Minister agree to make these changes retroactive to the calendar year 1983 in order to assist many farmers who are on the verge of bankruptcy at this particular time?

• (1510)

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to say that the Hon. Member uses very loose terminology when he says there are many farmers facing bankruptcy. Does he mean 100? Does he mean 50? Does he mean thousands? Our figures show there are some farmers, but even we do not have accurate figures. However, we do have figures which show the farming industry in Canada, when compared to any other industry, is probably the best off of all. When the Hon. Member talks about the Western Grain Stabilization Act, he knows, and we have stated, that it is under review. The report is just about completed on how they can use the five commodities, how they can base the price so that perhaps there would be pay out on the individual commodities to those farmers. That report is not finalized at the present time.

Oral Questions

NATIONAL REVENUE

EXAMINATION OF INCOME TAX FILES BY ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. Last week, or the week before, I asked the Minister about the existence of an agreement between the RCMP and the Minister of National Revenue concerning the examination of income tax files. Can he bring the House up to date, as he promised at that time? And could he tell us in what other kinds of instances is the agreement used?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the agreement to which the Hon. Member is referring has to do with RCMP officers investigating criminal cases such as organized crimes or other aspects of criminal activities. I should like to point out to Hon. Members that the confidentiality of tax files is paramount in such investigations; we ask for RCMP support when criminal activities are uncovered in the course of the investigation.

[English]

PROVISIONS IN AGREEMENT

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister agree that the agreement is only in connection with files dealing with the Income Tax Act, and that there is no suggestion whatsoever in the agreement that there is power to show the files to the RCMP in the investigation of crimes other than investigations under the Income Tax Act?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to look into that particular aspect in order to give a better answer to the Hon. Member.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

INVOLVEMENT WITH COMMERCIAL ENTERPRISES

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for Canada Post. Mr. Michael Warren recently announced that Canada Post intends to get involved in various commercial enterprises. Does the Postmaster General really think that this should be allowed, at least until Canada Post becomes capable of delivering the mail, something it is certainly not doing very well yet?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I think that the question of the Hon. Member is quite hypothetical since the suggestions made by the President of Canada Post do not entail activities which would have priority over the Corporation's first responsibility, which is to deliver mail. There can be no doubt that mail delivery comes first, and I do not think that the President gave the impression that the Corporation is seeking other duties which would prevent it from continuing to provide all Canadians throughout the country with postal services which compare favourably with those of any other country in the world.

[English]

LIABILITY TO PAY CORPORATE TAXES

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same Minister. Certainly the press made it sound as though the Director General of Canada Post was serious. If Canada Post is to be allowed to intrude on private enterprise, will it use its extensive government subsidies to help one or two companies compete with the rest of the business community? Will it then pay business tax in the communities where this takes place? And will it then pay corporate taxes, as any other corporation must do?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I think that the Hon. Member ought to read again the Post Office Act where the duties and responsibilities of Canada Post are clearly set out. Members on both sides of the House voted unanimously for this legislative measure and I have the impression that the Hon. Member would be well advised to read the Act over again.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

APPLICATION TO PUBLIC SERVANTS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of questions on the role of women within the Public Service of Canada. My first question is directed to the Minister of Labour and it is in respect of his role as the Minister responsible for occupational health of workers in Canada. As the Minister is aware, there are proposals from his Department which we hope to have in front of the House, which would give workers in the Public Service, many of whom are women, the right to come under the Canada Labour Code in matters of occupational health and safety. I wonder if the Minister can tell us whether or not the Government is willing to give the same protection under the same legislation to those workers who work for the federal Government as it gives to workers who work for the private sector under the federal regime?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, my colleague the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Gray) answered a similar question in the House about three weeks ago. As I recall, in his answer he referred to a sentence in the Speech from the Throne which clearly indicates that, in that field, the Government of Canada has every intention of dealing with its employees just as it does with all other workers governed by the Canada Labour Code.

[English]

PROTECTION OF WORKERS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is obviously the same question to the same Minister. Hon. Members of the Conservative Party do not seem to be very concerned about occupational safety in the Public Service. Will the same legislation provide protection for federal Government workers as it does for other workers who come under federal labour legislation? Will those workers have the same legislative protection?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would urge the Hon. Member to be patient, for he will have an answer to his question as soon as we introduce amendments to Part IV of the Labour Code.

AIR TRANSPORT

AGREEMENT WITH QUEBEC GOVERNMENT ON TRAINING AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Six weeks ago, I think, I sent a letter to the Minister of Transport stating the concerns of a Quebec CEGEP after a representative of the Department of Transport in Quebec had announced the department's plan to cancel training courses for air traffic controllers in the Province. Since the Chouinard inquiry has stressed the need for such courses to train bilingual controllers, can the Minister assure us today that these courses which were to be given under an agreement entered into with the Quebec Government and valid for the next three years will be maintained? Will the agreement be respected? Can the Minister tell us whether he really intends to cancel this training course for air traffic controllers in Quebec?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, all the students enrolled in the programs at this time have agreed to complete their air traffic controller training at the Cornwall College. We have discussed the possibility of maintaining the air traffic controller courses with various CEGEP representatives and with the Quebec Departments of Transport and Education. I shall be meeting Mr. Clair Thursday of this week to discuss this matter.

Mr. La Salle: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

I do believe that all my colleagues from Quebec and all the Members of this House are interested in this matter. Am I to understand that the Minister is willing to recommend that these courses be continued in Quebec since, according to the Chouinard report, nearly 300 air traffic controllers had to be trained there? As only 75 have now been trained, I would think the Minister will be able to tell us today whether he intends to maintain this training course in Quebec without reducing the importance of the course also being given in Cornwall.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, I have received several representations from the Hon. Member for Saint-Jean about this matter, but we must look at the applications for air traffic controller courses, and after having done so and having discussed the issue with Mr. Clair, we shall decide on the future of these programs.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SYRIA—TREATMENT OF JEWISH POPULATION

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. No doubt he has seen correspondence directed to him or his Department from various Jewish groups throughout Canada, as well as from Members of Parliament on this side, concerning a Mrs. Lillian Abadi and her two children, who were brutally murdered in Syria in December. These Jewish groups have indicated their concern and fear for the 4,500 Jews now in Syria. Has the Government made any representations to Syria, admittedly on humanitarian grounds, to see whether or not it would be willing to allow Jews to move if they wish, presumably to Israel, possibly Canada, or the United States?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we are aware of the concern which exists and which has been expressed by the Hon. Member and others. We take whatever steps we think will be effective in dealing with the Syrian situation. It is not a question which can be the subject of repeated or forceful representations because at times we have to guarantee the steps we take will be helpful rather than hurtful. However, within that framework we do our very best to assist cases such as he mentioned.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT MAKE REPRESENTATIONS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, the Minister would admit that he was pretty vague and general in his answer to me. Perhaps he could be a little more explicit. What steps is the Minister taking in this particular case? Is he using Canada's good will, for example, with the Government of Syria? Have we put forward the case for allowing Jews in Syria to emigrate if they so wish? Have we done that? What diplomatic channels are we using? Could he be more specific?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): I will be as specific as I can, Mr. Speaker. The Hon. Member knows these matters are within the internal management and prerogative of the government concerned, in this case the Government of Syria. It would be easy enough for us to make either public or private representations which might have a short-term effect in meeting the Hon. Member's request but not be very helpful in getting the job done in Syria. That is what we have to keep in mind.

I know we have had this particular matter under consideration. I will inform myself as to whether there have been any recent representations on this particular case, and I will be glad to advise the Hon. Member.

EMERGENCY MEASURES

MINISTERIAL POWER TO ESTABLISH CIVILIAN INTERNMENT CAMPS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. The Emergency Planning Order of 1981 has a provision which empowers the Solicitor General of Canada to establish, administer, and operate civilian internment camps, facilitate the selective reduction and transfer of prison populations, and to provide for the establishment of civilian internment camps. That has the effect of freeing people who have been convicted of a criminal offence in order to make room for people who have not been convicted. I would like to ask the Minister, who is charged with the protection of our civil rights, if he agrees with that provision?

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am responsible for Emergency Planning Canada and I suggest the Hon. Member read the Order in Council carefully. He will realize that, with a minimum of understanding, he cannot come to that conclusion.

POSITION OF MINISTER OF JUSTICE

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put my question to the Minister of Justice and have him answer it, not the President of the Privy Council. I want to know from the man who is supposed to be protecting our civil rights whether he agrees with that provision?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it is a question of interpreting the clause to which my hon. friend refers. Every proposal put forward by the Government in statutory form or for regulation is vetted by officials of the Department of Justice precisely for that kind of criteria.

RAILWAYS

TRANSPORTATION OF DANGEROUS GOODS

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport who, earlier this winter, in a speech to the Council of Transport Ministers, expressed his firm resolve to reduce the risk involved in the movement of dangerous goods by rail. Specifically he talked about reducing the speed of trains in densely populated areas, and about measures to deal with empty cars which carry hazardous products. What action has been taken in that regard? Can he give the House any indication which might demonstrate his firm resolve to deal with these very important and crucial issues?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think we can satisfy the Hon. Member because we have taken two very specific steps since that declaration. First, I met with the country's major railroads to talk about the issues brought forward. We agreed at that time that we would call together an advisory group of railroad and industry people, particularly the petrochemical industry, to talk about how further standards or measures might be developed and whether the existing requirements and standards are in fact satisfactory. We are now in the midst of drafting the terms of reference which would be agreeable to the parties involved.

Secondly, we have the new office of Inspector General of Safety in Transport, and I have given to him prime responsibility to begin examining the entire area of the movement of dangerous goods. He is now engaged in that and will be meeting tomorrow morning with a major group from Toronto to hear the representations on that issue. I have asked him to do an overview and report back to me on whether supplementary or ancilliary action should be taken.

DISTRIBUTION OF DEPARTMENTAL DOCUMENT

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I am advised the Minister has had a briefing document commissioned by his Department in response to the recommendations of M-Trac, the citizens' group from Toronto. I also understand this report has been made available only to Liberal Members of Parliament for the Toronto area. Will the Minister not make that information available to all Members of the House so that we can see precisely what he has in mind? Also, as I understand it, there are some very basic differences of opinion between the Minister office, the CRTC, and the railroads, about speed reduction and the issue of harmonic oscillation. Could the Minister tell the House whether he has had any discussions with the CTC over resolving these different points of view, and can he report to the House on the success or failure of those discussions?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have had several rounds of discussions, and one was with the Railway Transport Committee where they brought forward the kind of action in which they are presently engaged. As I said, I have met with railroads to discuss their activities, and with other interested parties. I will be meeting with M-Trac itself tomorrow morning.

As far as the report from the Department is concerned, I will ckeck and see. I do not know what the distribution has been. If it has been distributed to Members, I will make sure the Hon. Member receives one, because I think it is a useful document or evidence to put forward. I am trying to achieve, particularly by using the offices of the inspector general, a more independent point of view because each of the major groups involved has its own special interest and perspective. I want to make sure we get one which covers everything and comes out with a series of recommendations on which I can act. Therefore, I will keep the Hon. Member informed.

PETITION

MR. KEEPER—TESTING OF CRUISE MISSILE ON CANADIAN SOIL

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition today from Stella Mission in Winnipeg which is the place in which J. S. Woodsworth started his work. As such, it should serve as a reminder to the House that Canadians expect political decisions to be based upon moral principles.

To the Honourable the House of Commons in Parliament assembled, the petition of the undersigned board of directors and staff of North End Community Ministry, more commonly known as Stella Mission, who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your petitioners in the certain assurance that your honourable House will therefore provide a remedy, humbly sheweth that the petitioners formally object to the testing of the Cruise missile over Canadian territory.

Wherefore the signatories, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to withdraw Canada totally from the nuclear armament's race between American and the East Bloc countries of which the Cruise missile is but one part. And is in duty bound your petitioners will ever pray.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 30

[English]

NUCLEAR ARMAMENTS

TESTING OF CRUISE MISSILE ON CANADIAN SOIL

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans), that the house do now adjourn. I am moving the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 30 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the testing tomorrow of the U.S. air-launched Cruise missile over Canadian soil.

As I have indicated in my notice to you, Mr. Speaker, this is an urgent matter because Members of the House learned only on Friday last from a source in Washington, D.C., that the test will take place tomorrow. Canadians have again been kept in the dark.

It is an urgent matter too because an application has now gone before the Supreme Court of Canada to suspend any Cruise missile test until the constitutionality of those tests can be considered. A Supreme Court ruling on the suspension of the tests is pending.

Finally, it is urgent that the Prime Minister's recent peace efforts not be undermined or contradicted and that the widespread desire of Canadians to halt Cruise missile testing be fully debated in the House.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member gave the Chair the required notice of her intention to seek leave to move a motion under Standing Order 30. As Hon. Members know, the Chair, in considering a request for an emergency debate, must "have regard to the probability of the matter being brought before the House within reasonable time by other means".

This matter has regularly been raised during Question Period, even today, and the Government's intention to go ahead with the testing of the Cruise missile has been no secret. No doubt, the intention of the mover of the motion is to try to prevent the test which is to take place tomorrow. However, this issue hardly qualifies as a sudden emergency and there have been and will be various opportunities to debate it in a broader context without setting aside the normal business of the House. Three allotted days remain during the present period. The Estimates have been tabled and have been referred to various committees just this afternoon, and of course Question Period takes place every day.

I also refer the Hon. Member to Citation 288 of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition which clearly states that the subjects excluded by the established rules of debate relating to Standing Order 30 include matters under adjudication by a court of law. The Hon. Member knows, as she states in her notice, that the Supreme Court of Canada has yet to render a decision on an application to suspend the proposed test.

I must therefore rule that the Hon. Member's request does not satisfy the criteria of the Standing Order.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the Government.

Mr. George Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, before being interrupted at one o'clock, I was outlining the basic economic situation in Newfoundland. I was referring to the way the Newfoundland Government was not attending to the affairs of state in that province.

As I was saying, it gave people a dream—in this case an offshore hope—and it let the people wither in despair on shore. There was no long-term planning, no long-term employment measures and no immediate solutions.

What great mind ever thought of the principle that one can always and forever export raw material? What great Rhodes Scholar decided that processor licenses can be granted to every Tom, Dick and Harry, so long as it is some corporate conglomerate, so that he can continue to export fish in a raw state to a foreign country so that our people can buy it back later as a finished product? What an economy we have in that province! What foresight! What economic genius! The great crisis, in the fishing industry—and this House should realize it—was really limited in Canada to fish plants that concentrated mainly on frozen cod blocks to be exported to the United States, giving employment to thousands of people there.

• (1540)

I suppose it takes some thinking, some planning, some philosophy, some feeling for people to do something about it. I would venture to say that there is not another provincial government here that could dish out these so-called processor licences as the Newfoundland Government does, not to process one single thing with it. That same philosophy, or lack of philosophy, has permeated the Newfoundland government in every other natural resource in the province.

I should like to say a few words now about a specific section in the Budget that deals with job creation. Unfortunately, there appears to be in this Chamber an attitude held by a small "c" conservative community, pontificated by the Progressive Conservative Party of this country, that direct job creation should be done away with, in other words, outlawed. I could never understand that rationale. I could never understand how people can be so isolated, so parochial, so unknowing or uncaring as to advocate such a drastic action. The P.C. Party has that philosophy. In its last government the Progressive Conservatives wiped that out, hook, line and sinker. It went straight out of the window. It was said of the infamous P.C. Minister of Finance who wiped out direct job creation that if brains were dynamite, he could not blow his own hat off. There is a reality in non-industrialized areas in the poor provinces, in rural areas, that private enterprise cannot provide jobs. There is no private enterprise, so how can it provide jobs?

There is also very little provincial government money spent. There is no program, no source of funding available to small rural areas that have a right to exist. They have a right to the basic services that people have in other areas of Canada. They have a right to a community building. Take, for example, high unemployment areas where work is seasonal. That is a great section of our country, particularly as it affects the fisheries. Suppose the fishery has been a failure, as it was this past year in Newfoundland? Even if it were not a failure, the philosophy of doing away with direct job creation programs says there will be no jobs in these areas, none at all. It means that no community will get a wharf, a community hall, a community stage, or a basic water system. What kind of a creature in politics today would be so cruel and so uncaring as to advocate the discontinuance of these funding mechanisms? Yet we see this opinion present in this Chamber continually. It is also present in certain sections of our society. What about the armchair experts sitting back in their comfortable surroundings? They have convinced the P.C. armchair experts that these programs must be discontinued. Lucky for the poor in our rural areas that this Liberal Government held the line on direct job creation.

Instead of holding the line, I believe this Government should embark on a completely new initiative and pump hundreds of millions of dollars more into summer student employment programs and Canada Works Programs. Never mind talking about national recovery programs. A national recovery program for a slipway in a community like Dark Hole would cost $14,000. What about a national recovery program for a water line in Herring Neck in my riding? It would cost $89,000. What about a national recovery program for a water line in Whale's Gulch? It would cost $100,000 so that children can drink non-polluted water for once.

For those who are cruel enough, crude enough, and unchristian enough to advocate an end to direct job creation, let me ask them if they would like to change places with any number of men today who kneel by their beds every night and pray for a job on a Canada Works Program that pays $180 a week so that they can feed their children? Let me ask that same armchair expert if he would like to live off welfare payments in the Province of Newfoundland, the lowest welfare payments in all of Canada. If you have five children over 18 years of age and not working, not one penny goes into the household for them. What about living in the widow's shoes at $278 a month? The same type of armchair expert who advocates the end to these direct job-creation programs which go into the rural and the high unemployment areas where there is normally no employment, that same type of armchair expert also advocates among other things that Newfoundlanders should not be allowed to kill seals! Again, you could put yourself in the position of dozens of my constituents this week who are walking or crawling over the ice with a white sheet, or white underwear, over their heads trying to kill a seal to feed their hungry children. Some of these fellows are making less than $100 a week on unemployment insurance. On and on it goes.

I think we should be charitable enough to repeat the prayer of the Sioux Indians, which goes:

> Oh Great Spirit, keep me from ever judging and criticizing a man until I have walked in his moccasins for two weeks.

When we pass judgement on direct job-creation programs, let us remember that.

Let me say in conclusion that when the off-shore Newfoundland government members have some free time from taking trips down south, I wish they would put themselves in the moccasins of the unemployed on the northeast coast of Newfoundland.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): We have a ten-minute period for questions and comments.

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to enter into the debate on the Budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) of February 15, 1984. I am pleased to represent the views of my constituents of Simcoe North. During the course of my remarks I shall bring to the attention of the Chair those parts of the Budget which address the concerns of my constituents, those parts which missed the mark, and I hope I can make some positive suggestions.

The interesting thing about the economy of Simcoe North at the present time is the sense of confidence which I feel in the small business community. The Canadian resilience is evident. The small business community has bounced back and it is cautiously optimistic. Small business in Simcoe North weathered the Liberal recession, which brought high interest rates, bankruptcies in the farming and small-business communities and record high unemployment. Self-confidence is returning, but I suggest to government Members that the self-confidence of which I speak is internal to the small-business community. It does not translate into any sense of confidence in the Government. Universally in Simcoe North I am asked when the federal election will be called, when they can throw out the Liberals and get on with building Canada. Unfortunately, I would also point out that the payrolls of the larger employers in Simcoe North are not rebounding to pre-Liberal recession levels. That will only come when the energy, forest and other manufacturing industries recover from the Liberal recession and consumer confidence in the Canadian economy is restored.

• (1550)

The Budget is annually the most important address of the Minister of Finance to the House of Commons. It should review the country's economic position, state what steps the Government intends to take to improve the economy and make improvements in the taxation system. In this Budget the Minister of Finance has reviewed the Canadian economy with his usual honesty, that is to say, he took credit for the positive actions of others and ignored the disastrous policies of the Liberal Government. However, I am quick to say that the Budget has some admirable qualities which I applaud. First, it does not seek radical change in the taxation system. In the past four years the Liberal Party has brought forward the national energy policy in the guise of a budget. That Budget resulted in the rape of the energy industry in Canada for the sake of confiscation and higher energy taxes. As a result, the Canadian energy industry has collapsed, leaving a Liberal legacy of unemployment and bankruptcy in Simcoe North as well as across the country. Also I would like to refer to the disaster Budget of November 1981 introduced by the late departed, but not lamented, Minister of Finance, the Hon. Member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso (Mr. MacEachen). That was the Liberal Budget which caused a greater recession in Canada than anywhere else in the industrialized world. Coupled with the Liberal high interest rate policy, the insular attitude of the bureaucracy in Ottawa and an arrogance beyond belief in today's democracy, Canada catapulted into the great Liberal recession.

The second admirable quality of the Budget is that it comes in the first quarter of the year. Frankly I am tired of the "here a budget, there a budget, everywhere a disastrous budget" policy which has characterized the Liberal Government. I suggest that we should adopt the policy that the Budget be brought forward by March 31 each year, that it be debated and voted upon through six days of nearly continuous debate, that the Budget legislation be introduced and passed by June 30 every year, and that any Budget measures which are not introduced or passed by June 30 lapse. In other words, if the Government and the bureaucracy cannot get their act together, introduce legislation and pass it forthwith, then tough luck, do not confuse taxpayers any longer.

Also I point out that the Minister of Finance and the Liberal Party appear to have discovered what the rest of us have known all along, that the private sector must be the main creator of jobs. After decades of grinding the private sector, shackling its efforts to create, the bureaucrats and the Liberal Party admit the unthinkable, that is, that the private sector must be the main creator of jobs. We are fortunate to have a strong private sector in Canada. It had to be strong or it would not have withstood the assaults of the Liberal Party over the years. I find those things to be commendable about the Budget, and I would like to deal now with specifics.

The glaring omission in the Budget is the lack of a comprehensive plan to reduce unemployment to a level acceptable to Canadians. Under the Liberal Government, unemployment has reached heights which it has not seen since the great Great Depression. Young and old are crying out for jobs, yet the Liberal Government, with all the research and consultants at its disposal, does nothing to tackle realistically high unemployment today. Unemployment in January 1984 was at 11.2 per cent. The predictions indicate that it will remain in double digits for two years or three years to come.

While denying responsibility for the highest unemployment figure since the Great Depression, the Finance Minister is attempting to take credit for bringing down inflation. He does not seem to realize that it is difficult for people to bid up the costs of goods and services, which are after all the cause of inflation, if they do not have jobs. Canadians know who let inflation get out of hand and did nothing about it—the Liberal Party. Canadians know who tackled and beat inflation with precious little help from the federal Government—the Canadian people.

I am amused at the declaration of four principles under which the Government will now bargain. On page 4 of the "Budget in brief", it reads:

> The government will bargain according to four principles:
>
> —settlements should contribute to reducing inflation and be fiscally responsible
> —compensation should be comparable to the private sector, on the basis of total working conditions and benefits, not just wages
> —compensation should not exceed that in the private sector
> —settlements should encourage increased productivity and improved performance and recognize relative job responsibilities.

Why has the Liberal Party and the Liberal Government not been bargaining on that basis all along? Why are they stating to Canadians that they have not been doing it until now? Why in fact did they allow things to get out of control?

I will leave the area of inflation with one comment. I note with amusement that Mr. Ian Sinclair, that great independent capitalist, has proven, like many other Liberal Senators, that he can be bought. He trumpeted across the land for a year or more preaching six and five while his companies gave out 22 per cent. He then went to his just reward—a seat in the Senate, an appointment for services rendered. He takes his rightful place with Senators Cools, Barrow and Giguère. It looks good on him!

During the past four years Canadian home owners have been brought under severe pressure by the Liberal high interest rate policy. Homes were lost, families broken up and dreams gone forever as Canadian home owners were forced to renew mortgages at crippling interest rates. While the Government played at protecting Canadians from the spectre of foreclosure as set forth in the 1980 Speech from the Throne, the very real threat, not of foreclosure but of power of sale proceedings, was forced upon thousands of Canadian families. The Liberal Party and the Liberal Government did nothing to help. The housing industry, a major employer in Canada, went into a slump throwing thousands of Canadians out of work. That is a very bipartisan introduction to some non-partisan remarks.

In reviewing this section of the Budget, I would like to do it on a non-partisan basis and draw upon my experience as a real estate lawyer. I suggest very sincerely that I am not trying to score political points but rather to examine the Government's three suggestions on a practical basis. The Government proposed a Mortgage Rate Protection Program designed to enable home owners to insure themselves against sharp increases in mortgage rates. I have examined the proposal. While I see at what the Government is aiming, I am not sure it will work either mathematically or practically. For example, the plan will only be economical to the home owner if mortgage rates increase 3.75 percentage points from the time the mortgage is taken out until its renewal five years later.

● (1600)

Second, home owners will have to find that premium up front when closing the real estate purchase. I know from my experience that this can be a real crunch for home buyers. I wonder whether it will place an unreasonable burden on them at the time of purchase.

Third, I suggest that mathematically they may be better off to borrow less and thus pay less interest during the term of the mortgage rather than insuring against an eventuality which will not take place.

Fourth, the plan lacks portability. It may not be possible to put portability into this plan. When a purchaser buys a house and assumes an existing mortage, the protection is only there if the vendor also took out this mortgage insurance. This is nevertheless a start. I hope there will be extensive consultation with the various sectors of the housing industry before the legislation is brought in so that the proposal can be properly studied and improved.

The second proposal is that the Government amend the Interest Act so that borrowers can prepay their mortgage at any time with a penalty equal to the loss which the lenders would suffer as a result of that prepayment. I suggest that is a fair proposal for both the borrower and the lender and that that legislation should be brought in quickly.

The third proposal that the Government makes is to take measures to encourage the return of the long-term mortgage market. What has bothered me the most over the past four years is not so much the instability of mortgage interest rates but the instability of the mortgage market. In the 1950s and 1960s, life insurance companies loaned on a 25-year basis. In the 1970s, the term came down to five years and the life insurance companies got out of the business. In the 1980s we have one and two-year mortgages and even six-month mortgages. I suggest that that alone has created a social stress for Canadians. They are not only worried about mortgage payments, but they are worried about whether or not a mortgage will in fact renew even if they keep up the payments. I suggest that the Government give immediate attention to this initiative which will provide real security for the average Canadian home owner.

With respect to the sales tax changes, my constituents in Simcoe North welcome the changes in the sales tax system which shifts the manufacturers' sales tax on imported motor vehicles to the wholesale level. In Simcoe North we supply the Canadian automotive industry. Workers at industries such as Decor Metal Products have wondered for a long time why the Liberal Government has allowed foreign auto workers an unfair advantage.

One section of the Budget which was forced upon the Liberal Party and an unwilling bureaucracy was the section which is entitled "Improving the fairness of tax administration". For the past four months, the Progressive Conservative Party has exposed the scandalous manner in which officials of National Revenue, acting with the encouragement and blessing of the Liberal Party, have been harassing the Canadian taxpayer. Daily the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Bussières) has denied it, only to be refuted by his own officials. One day there was no bonus system. The next day the bonus system was only in Kitchener. The day after offices across Canada had been advised to discontinue the bonus system. Surely no Minister in any Government has been made to look as foolish by his bureaucrats as has the present Minister of National Revenue.

In any event, we now have the Minister of Finance riding to the rescue. What is he going to do? Let us examine some of the proposals. Interest will be paid on overdue sales tax refunds. Big deal! What the Minister of Finance should do is to arrange to have the refunds processed faster.

The next item is that tax paid on sales that become bad debts will be refunded. That corrects an inequity that has been in the tax system since time immemorial. For decades the Government said: "You levy the sales tax, you pay it to us and we run for cover if the sale goes bad."

I pose the question that every sales tax collector will be asking: "Does the Minister mean that the tax collector will be able to deduct the sales tax previously paid on a sale that went bad, or does the Minister mean the collector must apply for a refund? The business community would much prefer to apply legitimate bad-debt losses of sales tax against current taxes collected. I suggest that would eliminate administrative costs. The Tax Court of Canada will be allowed to order Revenue Canada to pay up to $1,000 of the costs of a taxpayer's successful appeal. That begs the question, why just up to $1,000? If a taxpayer is challenged by the Department, goes to the expense of proving his or her case, why does he not get all of his costs?

Revenue Canada will do a lot of things for these taxpayers. It is going to refund an overpayment of income tax to a Canadian resident resulting from a successful appeal to the Tax Court of Canada or the Federal Court, even if the Minister decides to appeal that decision. That oozes with sincerity. Let us examine it closely. What is left unsaid is that when the Department issues a notice of assessment, the amount demanded must be either paid or secured. The Liberal Party still considers the taxpayer guilty until proven innocent. The Minister of Finance does not realize the real cause of the problem. It used to be that tax assessors tried to settle a problem with the taxpayer in an honourable way. Assessment notices were only issued when an impasse was reached, or a legitimate issue had to be tried. Now, driven by the requirement to meet inequitable and unrealistic bonuses, assessors are forced to reassess in favour of the Department with little or no attempt to settle legitimate disagreements. That is why the system has broken down.

In conclusion I want to say a little bit about trust. I suggest that the Minister of Finance and the Liberal Party have completely lost the trust of the Canadian people. A trust is the same as a reputation. A reputation takes years to build, but it can be lost in minutes. Trust takes years to build, and it too can be lost quickly. The Liberal Party has spent the last four years losing the trust of the Canadian people.

That is not to say that the Liberal Party will not win the final vote in the Budget as it did the vote on the subamendment and the amendment. Liberal back-benchers, anxious to protect their jobs, will file in like the nobodies the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has called them and dutifully support the Government. The Government will have the numbers, but it governs by numbers alone; it does not govern by trust. The entire Liberal Party has lost the trust of the Canadian people.

The change of leadership will mean nothing. It is amusing to note that the leading contender for the Liberal leadership is a Bay Street lawyer who quit nine years ago. It is a sad commentary on a political Party when the best it has is someone who quit. Those of us who have watched this motley crew operate for the past four years are not surprised. Many of them should have quit a long time ago.

In closing my remarks on the Budget I would like to say that when the vote comes tomorrow, we will vote against the Budget.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): There is a ten-minute period of questions, comments and commentaries. There is no one wishing to put questions.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[Translation]

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the Government.

Mr. André Maltais (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be taking part in this Debate on the Budget brought down by the Canadian Government. Earlier, I was surprised to hear that the Progressive Conservative Party would once again be voting against the Budget. I was surprised, since about two weeks ago there was a debate on the Special Recovery Projects and the Progressive Conservative Party was very upset at the thought that many Government members had taken advantage of special funds to create jobs in their own ridings.

As soon as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) brought down the Budget a few weeks ago, the financial critic got up to condemn the Budget. The Minister of Finance had hardly finished reading the measures he was proposing! What really surprises me in all this, is that every time a Budget is brought down by a Minister, according to custom, that same Budget is condemned before anyone has had time to examine the exact contents of the measures being proposed. On the Government side, however, as soon as the Budget is brought down, we ask the Minister and officials of the Department of Finance to explain the workings of the Budget to us, so that we can be sure of getting maximum benefits for Canadians out of the Budget proposals. Mr. Speaker, it is easy to follow tradition, to be against something, to be constantly negative, but if we take the time to examine these Budget proposals, we would find things that are positive.

I am saying this, Mr. Speaker, because that is our custom. I have been a Member of this House for five years, and the custom has not changed. As soon as one side of the House says something, the other side immediately retorts that we should have done the opposite. I agree with Hon. Members and the public that the measures being proposed may not necessarily be the only possible solution, but they deserve to be assessed on their merits, without being dismissed out of hand.

What did the Minister of Finance announce in his last Budget? He simply announced measures, in addition to those proposed in the February 1983 Budget, aimed at balancing the budgets of Canadians, of small and medium-sized businesses, and of retired Canadians, with particular emphasis on the latter. Furthermore, among the benefits provided for Canadians, the Minister of Finance has once again made funds available for creating jobs for young people. Mr. Speaker, coming as I do from an economically depressed area, I always tend to agree when I hear Hon. Members opposite say that the deficit is too high. I always feel that governments can spend too much. However, if the Hon. Members would come to the North Shore once in a while, they would realize that some regions, and not only on the North Shore but also in Northern Quebec, in Northern Ontario, as well as in the Maritimes and especially in Newfoundland, have some catching up to do, considering that before the recession hit, other areas such as big cities were given many advantages. In our sparsely populated areas, there is a serious lack of infrastructure. There is a serious shortage of office space where officials can provide essential services and that is why members both on this side and on the other side of the House are constantly asking the Minister of Finance for improvements in our well-being and economic conditions. And if the Minister of Finance really wants to meet the needs of the various areas, of economic and political interests either at the provincial, municipal or other levels, he has to provide more money in his Budget.

Mr. Speaker, it is so easy to criticize a budget especially when it shows a deficit. However if the Hon. Members opposite would consider how those funds are directly earmarked as far as the various departments and regions are concerned, they would find, much to their surprise, what can be done in the short term and the long term with the funds provided in the budget. Mr. Speaker, as the Member for Manicouagan, I have asked for a lot of money and I have also suggested many medium and long-term projects for the economic development of my region. Even in my own constituency, some people were skeptical at first about the undertakings of the National Harbours Board at the cost of some $42 or $43 million. Nevertheless, such major infrastructure, which I suppose will contribute to the deficit, will enable the Sept-Îles and Port Cartier area to attract other economic projects. Such facilities should normally be used for a 25, 30, or 40-year period. That is called "borrowing against the future", Mr. Speaker, to make sure that the present is economically viable and that future generations may use such facilities for regional development.

It might be suggested to the Minister of Finance not to invest in similar projects which, seen from metropolitan areas, may not appear to generate all the anticipated economic activity. But, back home, we call this "fighting an economic catching-up battle", for our area needs diversification as well as facilities to compete with other areas both in Quebec and the rest of Canada.

As far as air transportation is concerned, Mr. Speaker, the same phenomenon exists throughout Eastern Quebec. I have indicated to the House on many occasions how expensive it is to travel by air on the North Shore. I should like to remind the House that a return ticket, second class, between Blanc Sablon and Montreal costs $695. Clearly, a return ticket between Montreal and Paris casts a lot less. The trip between Blanc Sablon-Montreal, depending on weather conditions, may take an average of two days. And what do Hon. Members from Eastern Quebec want, whether it is the Hon. Member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Bujold), the Hon. Member for Gaspé (Mr. Cyr) or the Hon. Member for Rimouski-Témiscouata (Mrs. Côté)? We want the Government to subsidize air transportation so that the people living in isolated areas in Eastern Quebec or the Maritimes may leave their homes out of necessity to visit health care specialists in metropolitan areas, so that our young people may pursue their education elsewhere. But travelling by air in these areas costs a lot of money. We urge, therefore, the Minister of Finance to grant us money as well as cost equality per 1,000 seats—this is the way we assess transportation costs back home. Mr. Speaker, we request for our areas the same facilities as those which exist already in more-centrally located areas. But this costs money, and money comes from the Ministry of Finance. We, on this side of the House, are aware that this has been a difficult period economically, not only in Canada but throughout the industrialized world. It is important to point out that fact to the people, because it is so easy for the Opposition to blame the Government for mismanagement or lopsided priorities. It is so easy, for those who are not responsible for managing the economy to suggest that if they had been in charge they would have done better.

I would also like to remind the House that I am negotiating with the Schefferville and Sept-Îles reclassification committee, and maybe soon with the people in Gagnon.

• (1620)

Not that I want to cast a stone at anyone. We all know that the global market for iron ore is depressed. However we need government money to get people out of these remote areas without too much hardship. It would be very easy for me to start blaming corporate management of mining operations in my area and score political points, but as a responsible

Member of Parliament, Mr. Speaker, I prefer to look for short term ways of helping people out of the dire straits they are in, through no fault of their own, rather than blaming the various mining companies in my area. But what answer do I get? Each time I call for extra funds to help people, either through additional mobility grants, mortgage compensation for house depreciation or total loss in real estate value, what answer do I get from officials, and often from ministers? That there is a financial problem, that there is not enough money. Mr. Speaker, the member for Manicouagan has a duty to press the ministers to find funds, even if it means increasing the deficit, to help people out of their trouble. But it is very easy for the other side to suggest that money is wasted. I believe the Leader of the Opposition is very well aware, since we worked together for solutions to help workers, that the government has a responsibility to the people who are hurting in those areas. What I often dislike in the speeches of Official Opposition members is that they always go along these lines: any operation showing a deficit must be left to the government and all profitable concerns are for the private sector only. That is just not good enough, Mr. Speaker! It is ironic that businessmen we meet have the tendency to continually ask for help from the government when the going gets rough; they keep asking for all sorts of grants. However, as soon as the situation improves, they readily claim they are overburdened with taxes. Mr. Speaker, one must face the facts, and take good care of the various elements in the Canadian society. The government's role is to ensure that the private sector can function within a free market ruled by the supply and demand law. But the government has also a responsibility to distribute the wealth amongst citizens of this country. The role of the State is not to substitute for private business, but to create a favourable climate for trade and business. That is the role of government: to create a healthy state of affairs in the economy, in order to generate wealth and, in turn, to ensure a wise distribution of this wealth amongst all citizens. And the budget brought forward by the Minister of Finance exactly meets these expectations, Mr. Speaker. One must have daily contacts with citizens to understand what individual needs really are. Mr. Speaker, senior citizens have also been adversely hit by the economic crisis, and they need support from the government; and moneys provided in this regard through all kinds of indexed benefits within the pension system are certainly not excessive, considering the hard work these people have invested over the years to build this country.

Mr. Speaker, one cannot deny that it is important and indeed essential to address the problems of youth, to provide jobs to our young. However, it is equally important to provide for the well being of our elders who have enabled us to enjoy the standard of living we have achieved. It is normal to have special consideration for those people and to take specific measures in favour of that group of citizens.

Mr. Speaker, a visit to any home for the elderly is all one needs to realize just how important an additional $10, $15 or $25 a week can be to enable them to make ends meet, particularly keeping in mind the extent of rising costs in the past three of five years.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, we are not motivated only by compassion when we adjust old age pensions, we are simply assuming our social responsibilities and ensuring that those people get a fair share of our wealth.

Mr. Speaker, I represent a remote area and we could use additional airports. For five years now, I have been trying to bring English television service to a small village such as Tékaska, and invariably I have been met with near indifference, allegedly because there are not even 500 residents in that small village. CRTC regulations deny cable television to those people, so that a typically English-speaking community is serviced only by French television. That is an injustice! Yes, an injustice!

Mr. Speaker, I think that I will have to bring more pressure to bear on the Minister of Communications to have the Department of Communications or the CRTC change those regulations, so that the small community of Tékaska can have English television.

Between Sept-Îles and Blanc-Sablon, Mr. Speaker, there are about fifteen small communities which are anxiously awaiting development, and young people return to their place of origin in increasing numbers to regain control over the administration and the economy of those communities. I think that, in all fairness, we must support and help them become the economic fulcrum of the Middle and Lower North Shore. There are not only empty words, Mr. Speaker. I have been their Member for four or five years and I know that over $30 million have been spent in that region which perhaps are not producing quite as much as they can. However, I am convinced that it will be a resource-producing region for Quebec and the rest of Canada within a few years. That is why I have accepted the Canadian Challenge, I want to help those people. The same thing can be said about other cities in the North, Mr. Speaker, their outlook is promising indeed!

We could have accomplished a lot more had we been more logical in the past by carrying out worthwhile research projects and processing programs, and if mining companies, governments and universities had combined their efforts.

Before my allotted time expires, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say simply that I will vote in favour of this Budget. There are still many things that I would have liked to say about Manicouagan, which I regard as a Canadian microcosm on account of its ethnic and economic make-up. However, in spite of all our present economic woes, I believe that we must not entertain a negative attitude vis-à-vis the budgetary proposals but rather that it is time to be positive and ensure a true economic recovery in such areas. Here, in Toronto and in Montreal, an economic recovery is certainly underway. We are still waiting for it in my area, but, thanks to Government support, we shall now be able to achieve our purposes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): There will now be a 10 minute period for questions, answers and comments.

• (1630)

[English]

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, the fact is that on the basis of the Bank of Canada rates, interest rates are higher now than at any time since December, 1982 and are rising. There is every indication that, with the squeeze on the availability of money, interest rates will rise dramatically for the balance of this year and into next year.

Could the Hon. Member tell me how he thinks that deficit financing, which will have to be financed by borrowing at higher and higher rates, will be helpful? How was that helpful to his constituents who perhaps want to finance a home or a business? Does he not perhaps believe, when he talks of the free enterprise mode, that if Government got out of some of the things it is doing, perhaps there might be more money so that his constituents can expand and do things on their own?

[Translation]

Mr. Maltais: Mr. Speaker, first of all, I believe that this is hypothetical since interest rates could go back to what they were in 1981-82. On the other hand, I want to point out to the Hon. Member that, concerning mortgage rates, in Mr. Lalonde's Budget a ceiling is proposed that will give us a mortgage guarantee, which means that we shall not be faced in the future with the same mortgage rates as were experienced during the last two or three years. That is my first point.

Second, when the Hon. Member asks which Government programs we could scrap in order to support smaller busineses, I would like him to tell me which program he would personally like to see removed. Would it be the Federal Business Development Bank? Many businesses regularly use the services of the FBDB because, while it admittedly has a relatively high lending rate, that is somewhat higher than the average rate of other banks, it may be the bank which incurs the largest risks. It should be said that when the FBDB loans money to a small business, it is because most of the time such a business was refused a loan by regular banking institutions. Then there are other programs. Does the Hon. Member mean the programs administered by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce?

Mr. Speaker, Quebec and also Ontario have greatly benefited from these programs these last few years. To my knowledge, very few small businesses have asked us to scrap DREE programs, now called IRDP's or Industrial Regional Development Programs. These programs should perhaps be strengthened, but more importantly, Mr. Speaker, we should perhaps have a single dispensing agency. I would be in favour of having a single service through which businessmen could deal directly with the various Government programs. This is a first point.

Secondly, Mr. Speaker, if the Hon. Member wants to suggest that certain programs should be abolished, he can say so and perhaps make the suggestion to the appropriate committees of the House.

[English]

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is clearly familiar with the Budget and the spending Estimates of the Government and will appreciate that as a result of Supplementary Estimates (C) the Government will be putting $550 million into Canadair in this fiscal year alone and $300 million de Havilland in this fiscal year alone, to build airplanes. There is no provision in this Budget for money to these corporations for next year. I was wondering if the Hon. Member feels then that the Budget was a fair presentation of what is anticipated as being the costs of running the Government when this year it is necessary to put into those two rather defunct corporations over $850 million, yet no provision is made for them in this Budget? On that basis, how can the Hon. Member support this Budget as it does not clearly indicate all the liabilities of the Government?

[Translation]

Mr. Maltais: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member can certainly refer to de Havilland or Canadair when he speaks about deficits. However, I would like to remind him that the difference between the Canadian Government and the American Government in the area of research is that we often act through Crown corporations while, in the United States, research is carried out through the Defence Department. If the Hon. Member is well informed, he will know that, in Canada, we have often used Crown corporations to carry out technological research. Certainly, Canadair is having problems and so is de Havilland. However, how many people work for these companies? Second, the research activities they carry out will be used to reinvest in products which could become profitable in years to come. Every company will experience problems sooner or later, Mr. Speaker. The Hon. Member has referred to de Havilland and Canadair. In my area, I could mention mining companies which are exclusively of the private sector. The difference is that, when they have a deficit, they lay off workers. This may be one way of solving many problems, but the role of Government is two-fold: first, it must make sure that private companies, and yes, I did say private companies can operate in Canada within the free market system, and, second, it must allow Crown corporations to be set up to carry out research. We are now facing hard economic times and the Hon. Member will have to admit that. Even during the nine months when the Progressive Conservatives were in power, abolishing these corporations was out of the question. And even during the Progressive Conservative Party Leadership Campaign, the most serious candidates had to agree that selling or closing down these corporations was out of the question. I suggest that this is like saying that de Havilland and Canadair do not have the means to operate and that the budget does not provide anything in this respect . . . That is not the whole truth, for in the budget tabled in 1983 as well as in the budget tabled in 1984, the Minister of Finance had allocated funds, so that de Havilland and Canadair have sufficient funding to operate. And if they are ever faced with financial problems, they know they can come to the Government or Parliament for additional funding.

[English]

Mr. Blenkarn: I am happy to hear, Mr. Speaker, that the Hon. Member thinks they might come to the Government for funding, but he will appreciate that the contingency allowance set out in the Budget is only $800 million, having been reduced from $1.1 billion to only $800 million. With respect to de Havilland and Canadair alone, the amount of money spent this year on those corporations is $850 million—that is on those two expenditure items alone—and there is no provision in the Budget for those expenditures which are undoubtedly going to take place with those corporations, as they both, as the Hon. Member knows, have funded debt well in excess of $1.8 billion, and they are both losing money at the rate of $20 million, $30 million and $40 million a month.

Surely the Hon. Member must understand that there has to be an allowance somewhere in the Budget for this contingency expense, but the contingency expense is only $800 million. How does the Hon. Member then wish to support a budget which does not have a proper contingency allowance, clearly does not foresee expenditures which he knows, and I know, will have to be met? What does he propose to do, sell Canadair, close it down, fire the workers? Is that the Hon. Member's proposal? Is that why there is no contingency allowance for Canadair and de Havilland?

[Translation]

Mr. Maltais: Mr. Speaker, I am always amazed when I hear remarks such as those the Hon. Member has just made, blaming the government on the one hand because the deficit is supposedly too high, and blaming it on the other hand because the contingency allowance for Canadair and de Havilland is supposedly not high enough. This is definitely a contradictory statement. The second point, Mr. Speaker, is that both de Havilland and Canadair have the funds they need for the time being. So far, these corporations have not come directly to Parliament for more funding, but if they ever do, I would simply ask the Hon. Member opposite and his colleagues to grant these corporations additional funds. I think, however, that the minister responsible for Crown corporations sought budgetary adjustments a few months ago. Some changes have even taken place within the various Crown corporations to improve administrative performance as well as to recoup our losses, while maintaining the greatest number of people on the work force and making de Havilland and Canadair products more cost efficient and exportable. I think we should be reasonable, and should, at some point in time de Havilland request more funds, I would mention to the Hon. Member that we might have to vote supplementary estimates.

[English]

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, before commencing with my remarks on the Budget today, I would first of all like to add a few words to some of the exchanges which went on earlier regarding the retirement of our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Many Hon. Members will recall that some time ago he suggested to some of us in western Canada that we should climb our own mountains. Coming from the constituency of Kootenay West, which has some of the most spectacular mountains and mountain scenery in the country, I had already done so. However, since his remark I have done so again and what I have seen from the tops of mountains in my own constituency and what can be seen from mountain tops in many areas of Canada is not particularly attractive as regards the state of our forest industry. That is the subject which I would like to discuss today.

• (1640)

If you stand on a mountain top, fly by helicopter or light plane, particularly over many of the once forested areas of Canada, you will see many areas which have been cut and laid to waste and not replanted. They have been ignored both by federal Government and by provincial Governments across this land for generations. It is, Sir, a national scandal.

It is sometimes difficult for people in metropolitan areas to appreciate that we are facing large-scale shortages of commercially viable forests in Canada. It has been a deliberate policy of many of our Governments to keep green belts around the highways and keep the scarred areas out of sight beyond the mountain tops. The public generally has thus not been aware of the lasting devastation created. And we have done virtually nothing to redeem it.

In my own province, the unsatisfactorily restocked areas make up some 640,000 hectares. They have been ignored and not replanted. Above and beyond that we have huge areas which have not been effectively managed. We do not thin or fertilize. Any farmer would be absolutely insane to farm in the same way that we handle our forestry resource.

I would just like to run down a short list of headlines which we have seen lately. Some people in Canada have begun to wake up. People in the forest industry, whether they be loggers, mill workers, company spokesmen or foresters, have begun to speak up. Indeed, the public has begun to speak up more and more in the last few years, and the media and some politicians are finally catching on. None of us are without sin in this matter because the claims to priority by many segments of the public often get more attention from many of us than do the long-term demands of our nation and its number one industry—having regard to its contribution to the Canadian economy. There was a headline in the Toronto Globe and Mail on February 11, 1984, which said "Massive lay-offs seen in B.C. forestry study", and "B.C. lay-offs foreseen". The Vancouver Sun of February 11, 1984 carried the headline, "Forests being written off". The article said:

Ottawa and Victoria have "written off" B.C.s forests jeopardizing more than 60,000 jobs—

Again from The Vancouver Sun of February 10, 1984, we have "Ottawa predicts disaster in woods", and "Tree planting cuts can mean disaster". The Vancouver Sun of November 19, 1983, carried the headline, "Forest renewal aid called abysmal". The suggestion here is that Canada spends more abroad assisting other countries with reforestation than we spend on our own resources. The January 1984 newsletter of the Western Sylvicultural Contractors Association headlined, "Federal forest funds fade". The article said:

For all intents and purposes B.C. has lost out on a $60 million cost sharing program with the federal Government. The money would have been spent on backlog reforestation—rehabilitating and planting 600,000 hectares of the Province's better N.S.R. sites.

The Vancouver Sun of February 18 this year said, "B.C. forests being raped, prof charges". Again The Vancouver Sun of February 8, 1984, said, "Forest renewal plan put on hold for a year". This delay is absolutely devastating for employment and the viability of that province and its people. Another headline, from the Trail Times, reads, "Forestry aid is less likely to continue". In The Vancouver Sun of February 9, 1984, the headline reads, "Government is gambling with the future of B.C. forests". The government referred to is both the Government in Ottawa and the provincial Government in Victoria. In The Vancouver Sun of February 4, 1984, an article headlined "Axe-wielding Waterland attacked for cutting 500 jobs" says:

Professional foresters and B.C.s biggest forest union laced into Forests Minister Tom Waterland on Friday for axing more than 500 jobs in his ministry.

To quote from the February 3 Canadian Press statement on which this story was based, Mr. Speaker, it said:

The provincial Forests Ministry will cut 506 positions April 1 to reach its target of reducing its work force by 25 per cent to 4,145, Forests Minister Tom Waterland said Friday.

Waterland said employees have been given the options of taking earlier retirement, voluntary retirement and collection of severence benefits or moving to another position in the Forests Ministry or another ministry if jobs are available.

Waterland said 316 jobs will be eliminated in 46 regional offices, 100 positions in the six district offices and 90 positions in the Department's headquarters.

The cutback should not affect any specific branch of the Ministry, Waterland said, because it is a uniform cutback throughout the Department.

That Ministry, which has been criticized continuously for having too few skilled people to do the minimum job of overseeing forest management in my province, not to mention their failure to begin the process of catching up on backlog reforestation, says that a 25 per cent cut across the board in services, including their total destruction of the B.C. forestry school, is not going to have any impact. The Minister has the nerve to suggest that people can move to jobs elsewhere in the Department. It is a tragic picture, Mr. Speaker, absolutely tragic, and the policies of this Government in Ottawa are not helping.

I can understand the frustration of some of the federal Ministers who I believe have had a legitimate and sincere interest in trying to promote the welfare of that industry and the people who depend upon it. But whether they be Ministers in this Liberal Government or Ministers in the former Clark Conservative Government, they are of no help when they cut programs just because we have an irresponsible Government in British Columbia which is destroying its forest industry. For the federal Government to join in this attack on our forest industry does not help anyone at all.

Another headline from the Nelson Daily News says, "Forests Ministry lay-offs hit city". Some 50 people in my home town of only 9,000 people have just been laid off. This does not simply mean that those 50 families are going to be in trouble, or that this community, Nelson, which already has an unemployment rate of some 30 per cent to 40 per cent, is going to be in trouble; it means that we are not going to take any concrete steps to renew and revitalize one of the most decadent timber areas in British Columbia. We have been logged and logged for almost a century, and virtually nothing has been put back. Then we get complaints from both the federal and provincial Governments that they do not have enough money to do the job that is required. Well, there is more news in the headlines.

● (1650)

This headline, from the Trail Daily Times of February 17, 1984, again from Canada Press, reads, "Taxpayers Cheated. Sloppy Work Costs-Ombudsman". The article says:

British Columbia Forest Products Ltd. has been getting millions of dollars of timber tax free because of sloppy work by the provincial forests Ministry, Ombudsman Karl Freidmann said Thursday.

And slipshod measuring by ministry scalers had cost six small independent firms $4.5 million to $6.3 million, and forced them to the 'brink of financial disaster,'—

Provincial ombudsman Karl Friedmann went on to say:

'Since the timber was not scaled, the company benefiting from the use of Crown timber had never been billed, and millions of dollars have gone uncollected.'

Friedmann said it appears the ministry will not bill the company because B.C. Forest Products had made it clear it does not want to get a bill, and this was contrary to the spirit and intent of the Forests Act.

To quote from him again, he said:

'This position contradicts any proposition that the ministry might be managing the province's forests in the public interest.'

That is from the provincial ombudsman of British Columbia after an extensive investigation.

The headline from The Vancouver Sun of February 29, 1984, reads, "$750 million in fees unpaid over the period of the last five years". That charge, made in the legislature, reported in The Vancouver Sun, is well substantiated. We have seen drastic declines in revenue, not just because of recession but because nobody has been collecting the money that part of the forest industry in that province has been making even in good times. Talk about horses on the payroll!

For governments, whether federal or provincial, to suggest that they do not now have the money and therefore we will have to bail out eventually the entire Province of British Columbia, which produces the lion's share of forest products in this country and the lion's share of employment—the federal Government's own report suggests that—is absolutely scandalous.

Here is an editorial from The Vancouver Sun dated February 16, entitled, "The Free Log Scandal". It reads:

> Is it true that the government has allowed Crown timber to be delivered to B.C. Forest Products or other large forest companies free of charge? If so, how did it happen? Was there incompetence? Was there criminal activity?

There is one front page headline after another, from Toronto to Vancouver. The same scandalous situations exist in Atlantic Canada. While the stories may not be as nauseating as some of those from British Columbia, equally serious charges have been levied about ignoring the welfare of our forest industry in Atlantic Canada. Finally, an editorial headline from the Globe and Mail of February 21, 1984, reads, "Running out of Trees". That is exactly what we are faced with.

The federal Government's own report entitled, "The need for forest renewal and management in British Columbia", recently issued by the Pacific Forest Research Centre of the federal Department of the Environment, outlines a scenario that ought to alarm every Canadian whether or not he lives in one of the 300 communities dependent upon the forest industry. This report says that British Columbia faces massive unemployment in nearly every major city and town unless a strong push is made to reforest large tracts of land logged during the past few decades. It states that more than 30,000 jobs will disappear in the forest products industry alone and another 30,000 will vanish in related servicing industries. The federal Government's own report added that the impact would be so severe that the provincial Government would be unable to handle the resultant financial crisis and the federal Government will have to intervene.

I ask the federal Government why it must wait until it needs to embark on a massive emergency bailout of one of the so-called have provinces of Canada? The federal Government is now cutting back, and it should not do so.

The Leader of my Party, the Member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), asked the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Caccia) responsible for the Canadian Forestry Service on February 13, 1984, as reported at page 1315 of Hansard:

> Before the weekend his Department released a report which predicted that we will lose 30,000 jobs . . . Would he confirm to the House if these alarming figures are accurate and, if so, what does his Government plan to do about this fundamentally important part of the Canadian economy?

The Minister of the Environment went on with some irrelevancy about a commitment to FORINTEK, and then said:

> We have renewed this commitment, and the Hon. Member knows very well that we are very concerned with maintaining the viability of this sector of our economy.

He then went on to say:

> In 1983-84 we have done everything possible to maintain jobs in this particular sector, particularly through unemployment insurance funding of jobs, despite lack of co-operation from one province.

There has been a little more than lack of co-operation from one province. However, the Minister was suggesting how much the Government has done to save the industry through employment creation programs. This year alone, the forecasted expenditures of 1983-84 compared to the Estimates for 1984-85 show that for 1983-84 they were $115 million and for 1984-85 they were $45 million. That is a 61 per cent cut in forestry expenditures under the Department of the Environment. Employment programs went down from $21.5 million to less than $60,000. That is a 99.998 per cent cut in forestry-based employment programs. Is that their measure of concern? It is absolute, asinine stupidity by a Government which says that it is looking after employment programs in the forest industry. It is using band-aids instead of major surgery, and even that commitment is collapsing.

We know that the Government of British Columbia and some other provinces are destroying our forest industry through neglect, but the federal Government should not get even by joining them in that destruction. It does not help, and eventually someone will have to pay.

We are talking about an emergency arising from a scandal on a scale which this country has never seen. At some point the federal Government must take hold of this problem and give serious attention to the needs for a solution.

Finally, let me make some proposals. We must deal with the problems of reforestation, research and development, new market developments, product diversification and new technology before it is too late.

I and my Party, the NDP, make the following suggestions: One, to create a separate federal Ministry of forests. Under the current Government, forestry is primarily handled by the Canadian Forestry Service which operates under the Department of the Environment. But there are some 19 separate branches and departments responsible for forestry. Thus, there is no co-ordination or strong voice that is able to speak in Cabinet. While there is now a Minister responsible, he has a multitude of other responsibilities, some of which are in conflict. Surely an industry which contributes more to the Canadian economy in terms of balance of payments than fishing, mining, energy and a number of other areas put together deserves more responsibility.

Two, to establish a committee to coordinate job training programs as technology changes the nature of employment in the industry.

Three, to increase expenditures on research and development to a level comparable to that in the United States and Scandinavia. If one wants a comparison, the track record of the Government of Sweden is one that simply cries out for some emulation. I plead with the Minister of the Environment and other Members who may be interested in the future of their constituents who depend on this industry to compare that country with Canada. Sweden has insignificant forest resources compared with Canada but is actually increasing its acreage every year as well as its capacity to produce every year. The Swedish industry is also much more modernized than Canada's because it paid attention to the future. That is the kind of action our industry requires.

Four, to tie corporate tax incentives to performance and forest renewal, research and development and resource processing. To establish a fund to help one-industry towns find other industries. We are running out of time. Even if the Government addresses the emergency now and begins to grapple with the problem, many communities will still go under because they will have to pay the price of our neglect in the past.

I urge all Members of Parliament to consider places that have done a better job and not just pass the buck. The buck stops here.

Mr. Ferguson: The Hon. Member suggested that a Ministry of Forestry be established at the Canadian Government level. Recognizing the fact that the forest industry is a provincial jurisdiction, does he feel that the provinces would hand over this jurisdiction to the Government of Canada in view of the fact that they have not done a very good job of handling the forests themselves?

● (1700)

Mr. Kristiansen: Mr. Speaker, I am not suggesting the federal Government ought to take over total jurisdiction from the provinces. If the Hon. Member recollects, during the constitutional debate in which we were engaged, my own Party was instrumental in strengthening that section which dealt with the prerogatives and jurisdiction of the provinces, especially with regard to renewable resources. Forestry was one of those areas most on our minds.

The problem is that this crisis will be dropped in our lap unless we begin to take some initiatives. I do not think many of the provinces will object to most. In the proposals I mentioned, however, there is one area that may cause some difficulty. It is to tie corporate tax incentives to performance in forest renewal, research and development and resource processing. I can see some provincial objections to that. But as the federal Department of the Environment's own report said, unless we act now we will have to bail out the entire Province of British Columbia a few years down the road. It becomes a matter of choice.

I know that the Minister of the Environment in his negotiations on the renewal of the forestry subsidiary agreement with British Columbia took the position, and I understand it, that federal spending would only be incremental to provincial spending. But, we simply do not have the time to wait. We are falling further and further behind. We must spend additional moneys now. We must use some leverage, use some push, use bait, or even threaten in such a way that provincial Governments may take us to court for interfering with their jurisdiction. This will at least make it a higher profile political issue. Maybe we will gain more allies and smarten up some of those provincial Governments into doing their share. If that is not done, we will get stuck with the bill in time anyway. This is the Hon. Member's own Government's report that says what will happen to us just a few years down the road.

I know the difficulties, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the questions which the Hon. Member posed. I think the emergency is just too great to waste any more time.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise and participate in this debate on the Budget. I am pleased because, having had the opportunity to listen to what has come from the other side, one can only be more convinced that this Budget is adopting the right course and the right perspective. What have we heard from the other side? We have heard the most irresponsible mixture of criticisms and commentaries that it has been my privilege in the four years I have been in this House to hear. What do we hear? First, that the Government has not dealt with the deficit.

Mr. Clarke: Right.

Mr. Blenkarn: Right.

Mr. Peterson: Right, as Hon. Members opposite say. But in the next breath we hear them say that we have not dealt with unemployment.

Mr. Blenkarn: Right, again.

Mr. Peterson: But you are not going to deal compatibly with those two issues at the same time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Blenkarn: Why not?

Mr. Peterson: Pick your priority, I say to Hon. Members over there. There is no way that we can go about in the Reaganist way which the Tories suggest—

Mr. Blenkarn: It is not bad. Americans have growth and more employment.

Mr. Peterson: —of reducing our deficit and increasing our military expenditures while at the same time creating more jobs for Canadians. Canadians are not so stupid that they will buy that type of Mickey Mouse economics.

Mr. Blenkarn: They won't buy you much longer. Let us go to the country and find out.

Mr. Peterson: Unemployment is a critical issue facing all of us. What are the Tories' solutions for dealing with it? It is to cut the deficit.

I am concerned about the size of our deficit, I must confess. If the Opposition had wanted to argue credibly that perhaps in the halcyon days of the 1970s, when we had real growth in the order of 4 per cent, 5 per cent, 6 per cent to 7 per cent, we should have been setting aside some of our surplus funds and creating some budget surpluses, putting them away for a rainy day, then I might find some credibility in what they are saying today.

Mr. Blenkarn: You were in power then.

Mr. Peterson: When we are in the midst of the worst recession since the Dirty Thirties, and when unemployment is at excessive levels, intolerable levels, to try to cut back on that deficit is absolutely irresponsible.

Let us look at our record in job creation. In spite of these totally unacceptable levels of unemployment, we have not done badly. During the previous 12-month period we have created in Canada more than 400,000 new jobs. Since 1970, our record has been the best of all the industrialized nations. We have created in Canada more than a 50 per cent increase in new jobs. Compare that with the so-called dynamic economy like that of—

Mr. Blenkarn: The United States.

Mr. Peterson: —West Germany, in which case it has had a 2 per cent decline in the number of actual jobs.

Mr. Blenkarn: How about the United States?

Mr. Peterson: If all Members feel that the way we are going to cut the deficit is by cutting back on social spending, I would like to hear them rise and with a unanimous voice tell us which of those programs they would cut back.

Mr. Blenkarn: How about Canadair and de Havilland?

Mr. Peterson: The Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), the clown prince of the Official Opposition, has said that when the Tories are in power they are going to get tough. On whom are they going to get tough? We have listened to them throughout the debates over the past six months on Canada's economic future. When you go through the the debates, Mr. Speaker, and look at what the Official Opposition is proposing, you will come up with more than 150 new expenditure programs. Almost nowhere are the Tories prepared to say, "Let us cut back there". Tories are political opportunists and hypocrites of the worst order. If they feel they merit the confidence of the people of Canada, then it is up to them to come forward with comprehensive, constructive alternatives. But what have they told us they are going to do? Very simply, they have told us that they have no policy. The Hon. Member for St. John's West has said, "Well, I agree with what the Finance Minister has proposed". Or we hear, "Yes, we have policies, but we are afraid that if we tell you what they are, you might implement them for the benefit of Canadians. Therefore, we are going to hold them back". They feel we will pinch these wonderful policies which could be helping the Canadian people at this time—if they have them. Tories are pretending they have them, but they are going to hold them back to try to make political hay with them when it comes to election time. I was not elected to this House to think only of the next election. If the Tories have concrete alternatives to help the unemployed, I say, bring them forward.

Before I leave this point, it is important to mention some figures that were contained in the Globe and Mail of this morning. The article pointed out social spending as a percentage of gross domestic product in seven of our major countries. West Germany spends 31.5 per cent of its gross domestic product on social spending. Canada spends only 21.7 per cent. This is only a percentage point more than the United States spends. At the bottom is Japan which spends 17.5 per cent. The international comparisons with comparable countries do not indicate that we are overspending on our social programs. When I see the unemployed people out there, I am not prepared to advocate that we cut back on our social spending in order to try to come to some Holy Grail, whereas the Tory solution will be increased expenditures, decreased deficits and more jobs than we are presently creating. Canadian people will not buy that.

Let us look at some of the measures in the Budget. I commend what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) has done here for small business, particularly in cutting back on the limits where small business tax is available to our small businesses. Small businesses have demonstrated their capacity to create new jobs in Canada. We are putting money into the hands of small business people who have the track record at creating jobs. We will see those efforts come to fruition. They will bear fruit. I also like the thrust of encouraging more worker participation in both stock ownership and profit sharing. Those two measures are an integral part of the measures dealing with business.

Pensioners have been dealt with in a way that is responsible. The most crying and pressing need of any group of Canadians today has been that of senior citizens, particularly single ones, most of whom are women living below the poverty level. By increasing the guaranteed income supplement by $50, we are addressing that group directly in the most concrete way possible. If there is to be any criticism from the Opposition, let that criticism be on the basis that perhaps we have not gone far enough in bringing the incomes of seniors closer to the poverty line. The poverty line should be the minimum target when we are a country of such great resources and means. It is a travesty that persons reach their retirement years, having made their contribution, with their only aspiration being to live below the poverty line.

I appreciate what the Minister has done in trying to bring private pension plans and the Canada Pension Plan more into line with the needs of meeting the vast financial commitments which will exist as our population ages. It is a tough issue with which to deal, but I believe excellent steps have been taken. I commend the task force chaired by the Hon. Member for Sudbury (Mr. Frith) for its recommendations which found their way into the Budget. I am particularly pleased that those provisions will create greater equality of opportunity for women, particularly single women, with survivor benefits and compulsory splitting of pension plans on separation. In the past we have seen in areas such as these that injustice has reigned. I am particularly pleased that we will see a two-year vesting instead of a ten-year vesting. Private pension plans have to become portable. The test will be whether the private sector will grasp the opportunity made available to it in this Budget. If private sector businesses and the insurance industry do not take up those plans and increase the role of private pension plans in our society beyond the paltry 10 per cent they now enjoy, the only alternative for governments in this land will be to increase the size of the public pension sector. We are awaiting anxiously what the private sector will do with this opportunity made available in the Budget.

There are many other areas about which I would like to talk. I look forward to the consultative process of the Minister of Finance with respect to part-time farmers and Section 31 of the Income Tax Act. Those consultations will be very, very important. We have to ensure that part-time farmers are not penalized just because they have to work in town to supplement their poor earning capacity on marginal farms. We want to ensure that people who work in towns and are trying to buy into new farming situations can keep their jobs in town and not suffer. We want to see the people in marginal farming areas, which have suffered enormously over the past few years because commodity prices have not kept pace, being given an opportunity through hard work and initiative to stand on their feet, not be besieged by artificial limits imposed in the income tax or by rapacious tax investigators.

I have watched Budgets closely since 1970. I have followed them in great detail. It is my considered opinion that the Budget of April 19, 1983 and the one of February 15, 1984 are the two very best Budgets. They respond to the needs of our nation, our economic needs, the needs of taxpayers and the need for investment better than any other Budget over that period of time.

One area about which I want to talk is unique and provides a new opportunity over the long term to create a better economic future in Canada. I am referring to the provision dealing with aid-trade. The Aid-Trade Fund was announced in the Budget, but first I would like to back up somewhat to look at our position with respect to foreign aid. Hon. Members will recall that back in the early 1960s we set global targets for development assistance to developing countries, to less developed countries, to the Third World. We set a target among rich western nations of about 1 per cent of the Gross National Product. We felt that out of every dollar each of our economies produced, we could devote one cent to developing countries. Then we found that we were falling short of that target. Canada had a sorry record. Our aid amounted to less than .4 per cent, even though we are one of the wealthiest countries. Prime Minister Pearson headed a commission in the late sixties which set a new target of .75 per cent. It cut our overall target for development assistance by 25 per cent. Major western countries fell short of that target. In 1980, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) appointed a task force of the House of Commons headed by the Hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau). It did an excellent job in its report. It set a target of .7 per cent of GNP. We have not yet come close to that target. Where are we?

In 1981, of the 17 development assistance committee members of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, of the 17 wealthiest industrialized countries in the world, Canada ranked eighth in terms of the proportion of its resources it was prepared to commit to development assitance—.54 per cent. At the top was The Netherlands with 1.1 per cent. At the bottom or seventeenth was the United States of America with .24 per cent. It is a great regret that the United States, the economic leader in the western world, has cut back on its once very proud figures exceeding 1 per cent of GNP. That was in the 1960s. This is a shortsighted policy. It is selfish. It will lead to a worsening of the world economic order, situation and structure over the decades ahead. As Jean-Jacques Servan-Schreiber has written in his book The World Challenge, Le Défi Mondial, the rich western nations are going to be able to compete among one another over the years ahead, perhaps the decades ahead. In one year we will be up in one product and another nation will be up in another. Basically he said that we are not going to have tremendous leaps forward in the quantitative growth of our economies in the West. We will only gain marginal advantages over one another from time to time. He said that our solution for growth lies in the 160 developing countries in this world, and that there is a necessity for us to work in a co-operative way.

This is what the Aid-Trade Fund is doing. As we increase our expenditure on foreign aid, it will go to helping Canadian exporters. I do not object at all to tying our Third World aid to Canadian exporters. This is good for Canadians. It means that we will be able to spend more. Let us not continue with parsimonious levels of even .7 per cent of gross national product when it comes to building the type of world which will benefit the Third World, when we will have incredible opportunities to benefit and to grow along with them. This is a farsighted policy. This is typical of many of the measures in this Budget. I am proud to speak today in favour of the Budget of February 15, 1984.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, would the Chairman of the Finance Committee comment on a statement made before the Senate Budget Committee in the United States by Paul Volker on February 29 last when he said:

> The adverse effect of the imbalance of domestic savings and investment on credit markets has become more apparent as the U.S. economy has grown and those imbalances can only worsen if deficits of the magnitude projected by the Congressional budget office and others, deficits without precedent during a period of economic expansion, are permitted to materialize in coming years.

In view of the fact that our deficit in terms of borrowing requirements will be 92 per cent of domestic savings, in view of the fact that our deficit on a per capita basis is one and a half times greater than the United States and in view of the fact that our deficit is nearly three times as large as that of the Americans on a comparison of gross national product to gross national product, how can the Chairman of the Finance Committee of this House conceivably approve this Budget?

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, this question is obviously rhetorical. If the Hon. Member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) had the slightest suggestion as to where we were going to be able to cut expenditures in order to give Canadians better value for their tax dollars, I believe he would have come forward with that. The simple fact is that that question is typical of what the Opposition Members have been doing throughout this debate. They are not prepared to say on what they were prepared to cut back in terms of expenditures. Is it going to be the senior citizens? Is it going to be transfers to the provinces? Transfer payments are approximately 85 per cent of federal Government expenditures.

The other day in the Finance Committee the Hon. Member voted along with the New Democrats to increase our expenditures to the provinces for post-secondary education. They are not going to cut back on transfers for post-secondary education. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) said: "We would not cut back on payments for health care. We would give more money to the provinces for health care". Are they a good advocate of cutting back on payments to senior citizens? No. Where are they going to save the billions of dollars that they want? That is the first part of my response to what was an obviously politically rhetorical question.

On the second aspect, quite frankly I am not prepared to agree with the Hon. Member that at this time, as we are rebuilding a new type of economy, a new base using the new technologies, we can afford to pull back. I am not afraid of a deficit of $31.5 billion in the last Budget. Would the Hon. Member like to put his own figure on what he thinks that deficit should be?

The only honest approach they can take is that in previous years, perhaps during the 1970s, we overspent. We had real growth and at the same time we were running deficits. If that is their approach and if they can honestly say that during those times they were advocating cutting back on expenditures, that they were against indexing personal income taxes in the mid-seventies and all of those things, then perhaps they would have some credibility when they speak on the issue of deficits today.

I do not apologize for the deficit of $31.5 billion contained in the Budget of February 15, 1984. Anybody who does so has the obligation to come forth and show us where they would make the specific cuts and who would suffer from those cuts.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I listened to what the Hon. Member for Willowdale (Mr. Petersen) had to say with regard to pensions. It is an issue in which I happen to have a particular and ongoing interest. I heard his eloquent remarks about the needs of the elderly, particularly elderly single Canadians. I am in agreement with him, except that he also made some complementary remarks about the parliamentary task force on pension reform which recommended an increase of $102 a month to these people who exist on nothing but the GIS and OAS. The Government did not choose to go that route. I want to ask him for his personal opinion. I have had the reaction of the Government. Those people over the age of 65 today, the 600,000 who are living below the poverty line, are primarily women. Most of them are there because most of their lives they have spent working full-time in the home and there was no provision for them in any kind of pension plan. The parliamentary task force came up with a self-financing proposal by which homemakers could be brought into the Canada Pension Plan in their own right so that if they are divorced or separated or if the husband dies, they can carry on as beneficiaries of the Canada Pension Plan. I am looking for recruits, for supporters of that proposal. I say to the Hon. Member that I know the Government does not support it, but does he as an individual who seems to be concerned about that issue realize that if we do not correct the inequities that presently exist for people who work full-time in the home, there will be even more than 600,000 people in that desperate category who will be over the age of 65 very soon?

• (1730)

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, I have two comments to make in response to the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald). I support enthusiastically the concept and the recommendation of the task force with respect to homemakers' pensions. As the Hon. Member points out, the situation is, I think, absolutely unconscionable. There are so many people who have made their contributions. No one can tell me that being a homemaker is not an important, critical and valuable contribution in terms of social values and in terms of the economic possibilities it often gives the other members of the family. No one may denigrate that contribution, particularly when it comes to the retirement income of these single women who are below the poverty line. It is a national disgrace that so many single women are living below the poverty line.

I would like to know what the position of her Party is on this matter. I support that recommendation completely. Let us all work in a constructive way toward seeing that it is achieved.

My second comment is that the Budget Speech made by the Minister did indicate that discussions are being undertaken and will be undertaken quickly with the provinces in order to obtain provincial support and co-operation in this endeavour. I do not think we can wait very long for those discussions to start and for us to come up with some very practical solutions to the very real problem that the Hon. Member has articulated.

Mr. Kristiansen: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Hon. Member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson) a couple of questions. He dwelled for a long time on the question of debts and deficits, and I was wondering if he had seen a recent column in The Financial Post of February 18, 1984, written by an economics professor from the University of Manitoba, Mr. Ruben Bellan. The column points out that instead of pursuing in Canada an approach to deficit and debt similar to that pursued by the Government of Japan, we have, because of the policy of the Liberal Government, which is urged on even more strongly by the Progressive Conservative Party, been pursuing a policy of borrowing abroad and forcing our municipalities and corporations, etc., to borrow abroad because the Government does not borrow at a low cost.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): The question period is terminated. We will return to debate.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, in starting off I would like to congratulate you on your new position and I wish you well. Before I begin to state my thoughts and comments on the Government's February 15 Budget, may I take this opportunity to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on his retirement plans. As a Conservative and a Member who sits on the opposite side from the Prime Minister, I can honestly say that I have not always seen eye to eye on all matters with him, but I certainly have a great deal of respect for him and I believe his retirement is well earned.

I might also take this opportunity to wish the potential successors to his job the best of luck. I was pleased to see that both the CBC and the CTV networks were able to arrange to have an audience with the Liberal leadership frontrunner who is now in sunny Jamaica. I was also pleased to hear that he agrees with the Tory Party in claiming that unemployment is the most serious problem facing the nation. I can tell the House that I can think of approximately 1.5 million reasons why this Party has always considered unemployment to be the most pressing problem to date.

Twenty-one days ago, 1.5 million unemployed Canadians were anxiously awaiting the release of the Minister of Finance's 1984 Budget. A great many of these men and women were waiting to hear some good news about the action the Government was going to take to help find jobs for young people who had just graduated from high school, college or even university. These young people who are coming on to the job scene for the first time are obviously disadvantaged because they lack the experience that potential employers are looking for. In other words, they have been caught in the standard trap of not having enough experience for a job because they have never been given the opportunity to work and gain that experience.

After listening to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) 20 days ago, the 1.5 million unemployed in this nation have once again been disappointed by a Government that does not seem to care about the citizens who cannot find work. As a Member who represents northern Ontario, I can tell you and the House that thousands of unemployed in my riding and all ridings in northern Ontario and across the region are extremely disappointed with the Finance Minister's efforts at job creation. Members opposite who represent northern Ontario together with the rest of the Liberal caucus have proven once again that government priorities are not reflective of the needs of the people of the country.

In April 1983, the Finance Minister proudly boasted that his Budget was a recovery Budget. He did not mention the fact that Canadians were recovering from the Government's mismanagement of the Canadian economy. He boldly told the House the following:

> I am proud to be associated with this Government that has not, despite intense fiscal pressures, forsaken its compassion or its obligation to support those Canadians who most need help. The Government has taken significant actions in the past ten months to contain the rise in unemployment.

He earlier stated:

> Madam Speaker, my dominant concern in preparing this Budget has been to help the more than one and a half million Canadians who want to work but cannot find jobs.

Like the repeat performance of a bad film, we have seen what effect the Minister's recovery Budget has had on the Canadian economy.

Ten months ago, the Minister told us that 1.5 million Canadians could not find work. Today, after 10 months of Liberal recovery, there are still 1.5 million people unemployed. Ten months of recovery—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): I am sorry to interrupt the Hon. Member but the Chair is trying to find out whether the Hon. Member will get to his speech. He has been reading remarks from the outset. While the quoting of documents is allowed in the House, speeches should be made orally.

Mr. MacDougall: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I certainly will be coming to the points in my speech. I must apologize to you, Mr. Speaker. I did get carried away.

Several weeks ago, I received a disturbing letter from a constituent of mine from the mining industry, an industry in northern Ontario in which problems are certainly not uncommon. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps I should not quote from the letter, but I must say to you that there are 1.5 million people unemployed in Canada including people in northern Ontario. I must refer to some of these letters because they are very sincere and relate to the problems in northern Ontario and, of course, in my riding. The letter from my constituent indicated that her husband has been out of work for a year now. He has filled out applications, answered advertisements and checked the UIC boards across northern Ontario. His UIC runs out on February 13. What should he do? I was trying to refer to that type of question, Mr. Speaker. That is what I was referring to in regard to the Minister and his Budget. In his Budget, the Minister did not relate to the problems that existed 10 months ago. The Budget we are discussing today is the same Budget as before and there are still 1.5 million people unemployed.

I tried to find work for that constituent, but unfortunately I was not successful and was unable to find work for this person because I was here the night the Budget Speech was made looking for what I thought would be the answers that would help these people who are unemployed.

Perhaps what is even more frustrating to a new Member of Parliament like myself or to my constituents is the fact that when the Government does in fact produce funds for job creation, the money is not evenly distributed across the country. What we have seen happen in the House in the last few weeks is very, very upsetting to myself and to my colleagues on this side. It is upsetting to see public funds distributed unequally across this land. By using public funds to prop up the Government's sagging popularity, the Liberals have created two classes of unemployed citizens.

● (1740)

On November 29, 1983, I informed the House that Canada Works money was distributed unfairly. In the Liberal held riding on Nickel Belt, the average allocation for an unemployed person was $168 per week, while in the riding of Timiskaming the average amount was $97 per week. That is not fair, Mr. Speaker. The people being hurt are those who are unemployed, those who are looking for jobs, those who have lost their unemployment benefits and who have to live on social benefits. That is what I mean when I say that the concerns should be equal for job-creation programs throughout this land.

When I think of societies where different classes of citizens live, I can think of the cast society in India or the suppressed people within the communist bloc. That should not happen in Canada. There should not be two classes of people here, one that happens to live in a Conservative or NDP riding and the other that happens to live in a Liberal riding.

To play politics with the unemployed is the sign of a very desperate government that would consider bribing the Canadian people with their own money instead of using the money in a fair and honest fashion. The only money that the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Roberts) could find for this Budget was $150 million, but just ten months ago when the Minister of Finance was playing the clown in front of the TV cameras, he was able to come up with $200 million to cover his foolish error. When it comes to helping the unemployed, however, all he could come up with was $150 million.

I should like to take this opportunity to quote again a famous Canadian and his opinion of the unemployed. As he entered the 1980 election he said:

> As we enter the 1980s, we have to remind ourselves that there's no greater challenge facing this country than that fundamental requirement of creating jobs, especially for Canada's young people.

The famous Canadian was the Right Hon. Prime Minister, and his remark was addressed to the University of New Brunswick on January 10, 1980. Clearly the words and the deeds of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance are two drastically separate things.

This country needs a government that can control its spending and once and for all send a signal to private enterprise that it is serious about restraint and recovery.

Last year the Minister of Finance informed us that the deficit would reach $31.5 billion; today, for every $3 that the Government spends, $1 must be borrowed. Year after year the federal auditor tells the House of Commons that government spending is leading us down the road to disaster. I believe the Government has reached that destination, Mr. Speaker. It is clear that not only is the Government morally bankrupt but it is playing politics with the unemployed. The Government is also financially bankrupt because it does not seem capable of controlling its own spending.

I have discussed the plight of the unemployed and I have touched briefly on the subject of the nation's sagging federal deficit. Next I should like to address something that is completely ignored by the Minister of Finance in the Budget. The mining industry in this country is in serious trouble and its problems have not been addressed in the Government's blueprint.

From January, 1982, until November, 1983, over 25,774 miners were laid off either on a permanent or a temporary basis in Canada. On top of that, close to 100 mining operations or projects were suspended on a temporary basis. In the midst of the mining crisis, what did the Government do? In one word—nothing. The word mining or mine is not even mentioned in the 20-page Budget Speech that the Minister of Finance read to the House last month.

Mining plays a crucial role in every community in nothern Ontario. I expect to see Members from ridings in that part of the country stand in the House during this debate and voice an objection to the Budget. It provides nothing for the thousands of laid-off miners in our region.

As things stand today, Mr. Speaker, there is one employment program operating in Canada that is tied directly to the mining industry. The Mining Internship Program which is administered under the Career Access Program in co-operation with the Mining Association of Canada is a good program that is intended to help graduating students from the faculties of geology, mining engineering and mining technology. It is an excellent program which opens up opportunities for graduating students. It is fine to have that program, but if the mines are not in operation, then we cannot put the students to work.

I see the Minister from Nickel Belt sitting over there laughing, Mr. Speaker, because I am concerned about the mining industry. The miners in northern Ontario are not laughing, Mr. Speaker, that is for sure.

This program combined with the employment programs operating under Section 38, conditions of the Unemployment Insurance Act, are clearly not doing enough to help companies that face a very uncertain future.

During a recent mining tour of my riding my colleague, the Hon. Member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) and I were told that increased foreign competition was hurting if not killing the Canadian iron ore industry. We had the opportunity to meet with the mine manager at the Adams Mine in Kirkland Lake, Mr. Bruce Taylor, who told us of the pressure to improve costs to compete with Brazilian ore which can be landed in the Canadian Great Lakes region for up to $10 per ton less than it can be delivered from mines in northern Ontario. The same conditions apply to another mine only 60 miles away. The Brazilian ore coming into the Great Lakes can be shipped in at $10 less than ore from northern Ontario. These are the problems that have to be addressed.

The fact remains that the mining industry which, when operating at full capacity employs over 200,000 men and women, did not receive any help in the Budget. We will probably not hear the Minister of State for Mines (Mr. Rompkey) address the subject in this debate because he has nothing to defend. At one point the federal Government left the impression that it actually cared about the mining industry and introduced a mineral policy discussion paper in March, 1982. We are approaching the second anniversary of the release of that paper and have seen no action or statements about what the Government will do. The Canadian mining industry has the right to be upset about this lack of concern.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order, please. May I ask the Hon. Member to address the House orally as provided for in our rules and traditions? This is the second time I have reminded him.

Mr. MacDougall: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I will certainly do that. When dealing with such major issues as natural resources or mining and with the unemployed, I must say that I am concerned and I want to be factual in what I say. That is why I have notes in front of me. I must continue and say that the mining industry—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): I am sorry but the Chair failed to realize exactly what the Hon. Member meant. Does he mean that he is going to carry on reading?

Mr. MacDougall: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We have seen Members of the House read their entire speech. This Hon. Member is simply referring to notes and he should not be interrupted. Surely you have to protect the rights of all Members. I have seen Members on the other side read their entire speeches without interruption. This Member is not reading his speech; he is referring to notes and should not be interrupted.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): First of all, these are reflections on a decision of the Chair. I will read Citation 309 of Beauchesne which is very clear on this matter: It reads as follows:

> It is a rule in both Houses of Parliament that a Member must address the House orally, and not read from a written, previously prepared speech.

I could read Citation 310 and Citation 311. There are exceptions to this, such as a maiden speech. I do not want to bore the House with this. All I should like is that Members abide by the rules.

Mr. Taylor: But it should apply to everyone, not just to one Member.

● (1750)

Mr. Gurbin: Mr. Speaker, I believe I understand the rules not as completely as you do, but I remember an occasion when I was remarking to myself that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was reading from a speech. Why should the rules not apply to the Prime Minister—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order, please. I believe we are getting into a reflection on a decision of the Chair. That is exactly what is being done.

Mr. Gurbin: No, Sir, I am asking a simple question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Will the Hon. Member resume his seat? I can answer this because there are exceptions. I will quote from Beauchesne's Fifth Edition at page 102: It reads:

> Tradition has established exceptions to this principle, and these have been recognized by the Speaker from time to time. Ministers of the Crown, Leaders of Opposition Parties (and those speaking on their behalf), a Member speaking in a language that is not his own, and a Member making his maiden speech—

I could go on, but I feel that is enough to make the point.

Mr. MacDougall: Mr. Speaker, it certainly turned into a lively last ten minutes of debate, I must say.

Miss MacDonald: Tell him about the mining industry.

Mr. MacDougall: I would like to continue, and I will not be going by my notes. Not once in this Budget has there been anything done to help the mining industry in northern Ontario or across this country, Mr. Speaker. Looking back over the years, what has this Government done for the mining industry? What has it done for the secondary industries? What has it done for the diamond drilling industry?

Mr. Taylor: Nothing.

Mr. MacDougall: What has it done for the thousands of unemployed miners across this country?

Mr. Taylor: Nothing.

Mr. MacDougall: Nothing at all, Mr. Speaker. What has this Government done in this Budget to help the tourist industry? Can those Hon. Members opposite tell us where in the Budget the Government has helped the tourist industry?

Mr. Taylor: In Liberal ridings only.

Mr. MacDougall: There is nothing in the Budget to help the tourist industry.

Where has it helped small business across this country? Can the Hon. Members opposite tell us where the Government has helped the mining industry and the tourist industry?

Miss MacDonald: It is just to tax them.

Mr. MacDougall: Tax, tax, tax, that is right. Earlier an Hon. Member opposite talked about the forest industry. What has been done for the forest industry? Where has this Government addressed the problem of the forest industry? I must say to some Hon. Members opposite, yes, we were fortunate a year and a half ago to meet and start to work on the problems of the forest industry, but it has taken too long to get this going, Mr. Speaker. Where is this Government going? It has not helped any of the resource-based industries in Canada which are the backbone of this country. That is where we ought to be looking, Mr. Speaker, at the resource base in this country, what this country is built on, what we have worked on over the years, what has made Canada a natural resource-based country. This Government has neglected it time and time again. What has it done for the fishermen of this country?

Mr. Taylor: Nothing.

Mr. MacDougall: Fishermen on the West Coast and on the East Coast have been given nothing at all. I am glad that I have to forget about my notes because I can say plainly now, Sir, that the people across this country know that our natural resources, our tourism industry, our forest industry, our mining industry, our fisheries, have not been addressed in this Budget. This Government feels that, by giving our senior citizens $25 in July and another $25 at the end of the year, it is doing something. But what is it doing with the numbers of individuals who are having a hard time day in and day out? It is doing nothing for the people of Canada. I feel sorry for this Government. There is only one answer which can be given, and that is, if those Hon. Members feel that the Budget which was presented here is that good, why do they not go to the people of Canada?

Mr. Taylor: They will throw them out.

Mr. MacDougall: Let the miners in northern Ontario, the fishermen in British Columbia and Newfoundland, the tourist industry and our senior citizens show this Government how they really feel.

In closing, Sir, I urge this Government, if it feels there is that much in the Budget, to go to the people and let them decide.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): The Hon. Member for Sudbury (Mr. Frith) has a question.

Mr. Frith: Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to the Hon. Member for Temiskaming (Mr. MacDougall) that, since we both represent ridings in northern Ontario, I believe we both recognize as well that we do have a cyclical problem in the mining industry at the present time. It is one which has happened before, and I am hopeful that if we have some long-term commitment with respect to the tax policy of the provincial Government, we might have some opportunity—

Mr. Blenkarn: Oh, come on.

Mr. Frith: I would just like to remind Hon. Members opposite that there was a Treasurer of Ontario by the name of John White, who represented the provincial riding of London—

Mr. Blenkarn: There was a Minister of Finance by the name of John Turner who screwed them up, too. Let us talk about Turner's famous budget which screwed the mining industry.

Mr. Frith: —the Hon. Member for Temiskaming, for research purposes, might inquire of Mr. John White about the mining industry and his response to the imposition of the provincial mining tax act changes of 1974—

Mr. Blenkarn: What about Turner's Budget? Did you read Turner's Budget?

Mr. Frith: —and the effect it had, more than anything else, on the downturn in the mining explorations field in northern Ontario.

Mr. Taylor: This is a federal House.

Mr. Frith: The Hon. Member for Temiskaming mentioned in his speech the fact that Brazilian ore—I would assume iron ore—can be imported at some $10 less per tonne. He might be able to enlighten the House as to what position he feels the Conservative Party would take with respect to that so that we can open up the iron ore company in Schefferville.

Mr. MacDougall: First of all, Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that the Hon. Member for Sudbury (Mr. Frith) has recognized also the mining industry in his own community. He refers to the provincial Government, Mr. Speaker. I have been very fortunate over the last number of years to be able to work closely with the provincial Government and the Minister of Natural Resources, which is much more than I can say for the Hon. Members on the government side. They have a tendency not to work together but to work separately.

With respect to Brazilian ore, all I can say to the Hon. Member for Sudbury is that the problems with which we are faced today are problems which have been built up over the last 20 years under the Liberal Government. That is where the blame lies. Over the last 20 years of the leadership of this government we have had problems with Brazilian ore, with Iron Ore of Canada and with other iron ore mining industries across this country.

Mr. Fisher: I wonder if the Hon. Member for Timiskaming (Mr. MacDougall) would be kind enough to tell us his views on the proposals of his colleague, the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), in his own eyes the hopefully future Finance Minister? If the Hon. Member for Timiskaming thinks things have been tough for the last few years, they will seem like a picnic in comparison with what the Hon. Member for St. John's West is going to visit on us. The Hon. Member for St. John's West was quoted as saying that the next Minister of Finance has to be "mean, nasty and tough-minded". I am sure in northern Ontario that is a welcome piece of news.

Mr. Taylor: But fair and honest.

Mr. Fisher: I wonder if the Hon. Member for Timiskaming would tell us specifically if he agrees with the Hon. Member for St. John's West when that Hon. Member calls for means tests? Does the Hon. Member want to go back to that degrading experience in the same way that the Hon. Member for St. John's West wants? Or is he going to rebuke publicly the Hon. Member for St. John's West for phoney economics and for taking out the problems of the deficit on the backs of the poor?

Mr. Taylor: He has at least been fair and honest.

Mr. MacDougall: Mr. Speaker, my short answer would be that the people of Canada already have a mean Minister of Finance. All we need is an election, and we will be glad to let you know what we are going to do.

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 45 deemed to have been moved.

Adjournment Debate

VETERANS AFFAIRS—REJECTION OF EXCEPTIONAL INCAPACITY ALLOWANCE APPLICATIONS. (B) DELAY IN PROCESSING PENSION APPLICATIONS

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, on February 21 I asked two questions of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Campbell). The first dealt with the way in which the Canada Pension Commission has been dealing with applications for the exceptional incapacity allowance. Only a relatively small number of Canada's most severely disabled veterans are eligible to apply for this allowance.

My second question dealt with the delays veterans continue to face in applying for disability pensions, up to four years from first application to final appeal in many cases. The Minister's responses were less positive than I had hoped.

Canada's veterans should be given a firm undertaking that their interests are the principal consideration of the Minister, his Department and the various boards and commissions which report to him. Some of the veterans of whom we are speaking are now in their eighties; surely prompt consideration of their needs is the least they deserve.

Exceptional incapacity allowance, the subject of my first question to the Minister, affects a limited number of the most severely disabled veterans. Only those who are classified as 100 per cent disabled, and who have been rendered helpless, suffer pain and are unable to enjoy life and whose life expectancy has been shortened as a result of their disability, are eligible for the allowance. As of March 31, 1983, there were 960 awards in force at an annual cost of just over $3 million. The relatively small number of veterans pensioned at the 100 per cent rate, 3,736 or 3.7 per cent of all veterans' disability pensions, means we are not talking about a program which has the potential to become prohibitively expensive. There is a limit of something under $3,000 per person per year for those who can get the allowance.

My question sought clarification from the Minister as to why so many applications for this allowance are being turned down by the Canadian Pension Commission. We are not discussing frivolous cases. The 17 unsuccessful applications I referred to in my question were those of amputees, many of whom also suffer from arthritis, back problems and heart disease. The CPC refused in most cases to admit a connection among these various disabilities, and would not recognize the exceptional incapacity of these veterans. Fortunately, 16 of them appealed to the Pension Review Board and in each case the ruling was overturned and the award granted.

Therefore the problem here is that the Canadian Pension Commission is taking a very hard line on these cases, necessitating expensive and time consuming appeals. Surely the CPC can take into consideration previous rulings by the Pension Review Board in order to make its own judgments more consistent with those of the Pension Review Board. If the Commission feels it is the Pension Review Board which is in error, granting awards too easily, perhaps closer co-operation in the other direction would be appropriate.

What we come down to here is the inability of these two bodies to interpret the same piece of legislation, Section 57 of the Pension Act, in a judicially responsible manner. The losers in this struggle over the correct interpretation are the veterans who gave up their health and in some cases their limbs in service to their country.

The time invested in appeal after appeal was the substance of my second question to the Minister. Thousands of veterans are waiting for two, three or even four years for a final ruling on their pension applications. In his answer to my question the Minister stated that he was concerned to see veterans' cases dealt with as quickly as possible while respecting the necessary preparatory work to ensure that a veteran's case has the greatest possibility of success.

In my question to the Minister I made reference to the average 277 days from receipt of an application for hearing by the Pension Review Board until its decision is rendered. This 277 days' delay comes after the veteran's case has been heard and ruled upon by the Canadian Pension Commission, which will in most cases have taken well over a year. Having received an unfavourable ruling, the time taken to apply for a pension review board hearing may be up to 11 months, depending on the case load of the veteran's advocate. By this point the veteran has been involved in the process for something like two years, on average. His case has been before two boards and he will have been working with a representative of the Bureau of Pensions Advocates or a veterans' organization.

While one must commend the Minister for his concern that adequate evidence be prepared in support of the veteran's application, 277 days from appeal to the Pension Review Board until a decision is rendered is excessive. The Minister's implication that the interests of the veteran would suffer if the process were speeded up is simply not credible.

There is, of course, a close relationship between the consistency of rulings by the CPC and the Pension Review Board and the interminable delays in the whole application process. If the CPC was ruling fairly and was perceived to be doing so, there would be fewer appeals to the Review Board level.

The veterans who are bringing forward these applications feel justified in asking for disability pensions. Their anger and frustration with the inconsistent rulings and endless delays is very understandable. The Pension Commission and Pension Review Board exist to serve, not to thwart the interests of Canada's veterans. Bearing this in mind, I am sure the Minister will see the necessity of remedying those problems which I have mentioned.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order, please! The Hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Veteran Affairs (Mr. Leduc).

Mr. Jean-Louis Leduc (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Veterans Affairs has already stated he would discuss the subject raised by the Hon. Member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon), with Mr. Cliff Chadderton, Chief Executive Officer of The War Amputations of Canada at a meeting to be held as soon as Mr. Chadderton returns from his trip.

Discussions were held between The War Amputations of Canada and the Canada Pension Commission on procedures and the interpretation of facts with respect to the exceptional incapacity allowance applications. As we already know, that allowance is awarded when there is 100 per cent incapacity. Last year, 160 veterans were awarded that allowance for a total $3.26 million.

Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Victoria raised the matter of the 16 applications that were turned down by the Review Committee and later awarded by the Pension Review Board. This shows in my view that all applications are treated fairly. Numerous unfavourable rulings are appealed, with legal aid granted. The Review Board's favourable ruling on so many appeals shows that the system is efficient.

As I said, the Commission is holding discussions with The War Amputations of Canada to try and resolve the differences concerning the allowance. Hopefully, the meeting between the Minister and Mr. Chadderton should solve many problems.

Hon. Members should appreciate that the legislation on exceptional incapacity allowance is quite complex. When a veteran is not satisfied with a Review Committee's decision, it is his privilege to submit new evidence that may enable the Review Board to amend its original ruling.

Concerning the time requirements for processing an application, the Hon. Member for Victoria is certainly aware that improvements have been made by the Commission in the hearing of the first application. All possible efforts have been made to accelerate proceedings at all levels, but it must be recognized that there are delays because applicants or medical experts are slow in submitting necessary material. Mr. Speaker, three Review committees hold hearings each week in various locations across Canada. Each week, some 28 applications are heard by each committee. As I said, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Campbell) is very much aware of the needs of the War Amputations of Canada and strongly hopes that his meeting with Mr. Chadderton will be fruitful.

CANADA POST CORPORATION—DELIVERY TESTING SYSTEMS

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): On February 9 last I raised the question of the honesty of the reporting of Canada Post with respect to its delivery of mail.

Canada Post, you will recall, Sir, issued in December something called "Performance Report—December 1983". It has interesting pictures on the front of postal workers and equipment. It states that monthly combined performance levels ranged from 85 per cent on time to a high of 92 per cent in October. The average improvement over a full year is 2 per cent over over 1982. This is on average an 11.5 per cent increase over existing performance levels when the post office became a crown corporation. It goes on to state that performance tests were conducted in July and December of 1983.

I want to speak to those performance tests, Mr. Speaker. Those performance tests were reviewed by Canada Post officials and by Mr. A. M. Davies, special representative to the executive vice president and chief operating officer of the Corporation. Mr. Davies in his report to Mr. D. Turner, executive assistant to the executive vice-president and chief operating officer of Canada Post, under date of November 14, 1983, indicated that the procedures for testing were faked, and the tests totally compromised both the NEPS and CPC mailer tests. He also indicated that the results were deliberately "fudged" to indicate improved performance; that test letters were "walked" through the plant in most cases by supervisors, and that quality assurance control personnel guided this walk. He indicated also that incoming first-class mail was deliberately delayed in favour of processing originating mails, that the real service performance for first-class mail has actually deteriorated; that the real productivity performance had dropped by 50 per cent; that morale was at an all-time low and that in the interests of Canada Post the matter had to be corrected.

The whole issue was brought to the attention of René J. Marin, Chairman of the Board of the Corporation. Mr. Marin writes in his letter with respect to this testing. I quote only a portion as follows:

> We realize that much rests on our ability to improve our performance results; we also realize that nothing useful is gained by conducting tests under unrealistic conditions.

Then Mr. Marin goes on to state:

> While we are all interested in developments in this area, it is not our intention to interfere with management's actions at this time.

Why is it not in the interests to interfere with management's actions at this time? The answer is as follows:

> I have a great fear, which I expressed to John Bodrug last week; and that is that the Union is in a position to strip Michael Warren of his credibility by revealing the manner in which testing is being compromised. The tests are not worth anything; but what is worse, they cause massive delays to legitimate First Class mail.

He went on to state, "No one is listening, Doug. Seventy-five per cent of the work done by my service improvement group was wasted. The transportation network is still not documented, and it is vital to the critical links. The special delivery service is in a shambles. I mailed a special to Guelph on Thursday morning, and here, on Monday morning, it is still not delivered."

This government, this minister, this Crown corporation, has been deliberately, knowingly, fraudulently and falsely representing to the public of Canada that it is improving its service. Its own employees know that those representations are false and improper, yet the Chairman of the Board does not want to get involved. The Minister of the Crown responsible to this House of Commons does not want to get involved. I ask why. The blue book tells us why. With $450 million going to Canada Post this year and another $550 million next year, with a first-class mail rate of 32 cents compared with an American first-class mail rate of 20 cents, and with a deficit in our post office far in excess of anything forecast or even believed in the United States, something is radically wrong; something is rotten in Denmark. The responsibility lies with this Minister.

• (1815)

[Translation]

Mr. Normand Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the accuracy of assessment methods will always give rise to controversy; we all seek a better, more accurate and more effective method. The Canada Post Corporation also seeks to improve its methods, but until new techniques are developed, it will stick to present procedures to test the quality of its delivery system.

Mr. Speaker, members of the House, the media and the general public have requested that efficiency indicators be made public. This would facilitate following the progress of this awesome task we have assigned ourselves, that is to turn a department into a dynamic Crown corporation. The Corporation explained to this House its units of measure, its procedures and parameters before making the results public; since then, it has also appeared before various parliamentary committees to explain these results. So Hon. Members knew what to expect. That is why it seems unfair to me for people to upbraid the Corporation for doing what it had been asked to do, that is publishing the results.

Ever since the beginning of the 1970s, the delivery system has been continually assessed by means of mailing tests made within one or several post offices.

Mr. Speaker, the Corporation continues to use these tests and to publish the results because it enables Canada Post to detect eventual problems and to take appropriate action to correct them. Also, these tests allow the Corporation to determine whether the actual efficiency is improving or worsening. Both the Corporation and the Auditor General are fully aware, when presenting results to the general public, that these tests are not perfect and do have limitations. That is why the Corporation has developed two new test batteries following an Auditor General analysis, almost three years ago. It has implemented a program to assess customer mail service. In co-operation with customers, this program can test the mail delivery system for any given letter, whatever the method of transportation.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, we have devoted about a year developing and testing this program. The Corporation has also contracted a private firm to conduct an assessment of the mail system. Preliminary findings show that this private firm's results and the Corporation's results are very similar. Any difference falls within the anticipated margin of error. In order to guarantee the validity of these results, the Corporation has developed a cross-checking procedure. Moreover, the enormous volume of mail tested, approximately 40,000 mailings every two weeks, confirms the value of the tests.

Mail service has been considerably improved in Canada since the creation of the Corporation. The Corporation feels that its indicators are reliable. Nevertheless, it will continue to improve and to refine its testing procedures, seeking the best available advice with a view to obtaining more versatile and effective methods.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—INQUEST INTO DEATHS OF MILITIA MEMBERS—REQUEST FOR TRANSCRIPT. (B) DRIVER'S LICENCE

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, on August 21, 1983 two young members of the Canadian militia, Private Darren Michael Krosney and Private Rodney Laurendeau were killed on their way home from CFB Dundurn, Saskatchewan. On September 29, after becoming familiar with the many misgivings of the parents about the quality and quantity of the information they were able to get about this tragic accident, I wrote to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campbell) to express my concern and to seek some answers. The Minister provided me with the description of the incident, which I do not have time to quote in the seven minutes allowed me under this procedure, but he did not provide me with a copy of the transcript of the military inquiry which I had asked for. I asked him for it again in the House of Commons Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence on November 24 and expressed my concern about the way the militia was handling things.

I wanted to know why the parents of Darren Krosney were unable to get a copy of Darren's military driver's licence so that they could see for themselves whether he was qualified to drive the jeep which overturned on him. At that time the Minister advised me to seek a copy of the transcript through the Access to Information Act, something which I felt should not be necessary and which I still feel should not be necessary, even though I have now applied for a copy on this basis.

Subsequent to my November 24 question of the Minister in committee, I waited for the arrival of a petition that I knew was coming in the hope that it would cause the Minister to intervene and to provide the transcript for the parents. I presented that petition to Parliament this year on February 13, on behalf of 2,800 Canadians who were asking for the release of the transcript. On February 15 I asked the Minister in the House to release the transcript and, if he could not release a copy of the transcript, to at least provide a copy of the driver's licence.

Subsequent to my question in the House, we have been provided with a copy of the driver's licence which, as I read it, raises several questions. Darren was qualified to drive a quarter-ton jeep, but was he qualified and should he have been driving such a jeep with a gun mounted on it and a trailer on the back of it after only two weeks in a convoy on a public highway, with no co-driver, and when the night before there were some who thought he should be flown home because he was so ill from extensive poison ivy? This is the kind of question yet to be answered by the militia.

Also subsequent to my question in the House, Mr. And Mrs. Krosney have been informed and so have I, that the initial results of the militia inquiry have been found wanting by the senior military authorities who had to review it, and it has been sent back for further and more complete details. Does this mean more delay? Does it mean that what I have applied for under the Access to Information Act is now not there to receive in complete form? If so, I will request that the initial transcript be provided and I will apply for the final one later, when it is ready.

In any event, I will not let up on this incident. The secrecy, the delay and the apparent incompetence of the militia in this matter must be fully scrutinized if tragic accidents like this are to be avoided in the future. There is much in this case that would benefit us all, particularly members of the militia, if the light of day were allowed to shine on this particular event and we could find out what actually went on there. That is exactly what I intend to see happen.

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Hon. Member for the continued interest that he is showing in the problems of the militia and the circumstances of this particular accident. Many of us have sons and daughters who are members of the militia. We are very anxious that the militia in turn give them the protection and the support that they deserve and need.

I wish on behalf of the Minister to express our condolences and sympathy to the family. Certainly any words that are brought forward in this House will not and cannot repay or take the place of the lives that were lost.

● (1825)

I agree that there has been a considerable amount of delay in getting the information that the Hon. Member is seeking. The last question that he put forward to the Minister on February 15, 1984 received the response by the Minister who stated that, through the Access to Information Act, appropriate information would be forwarded to him and he in turn could pass it on to members of the family.

The request was received by the Department on February 17 and the prescribed period for the delivery of the answer to the Hon. Member is 30 days. It should be made available to him sometime next week. The only deletions from the document are those which are called for under the Act.

I hasten to indicate that there has been a delay, as the Hon. Member has suggested, and that the delay was the result of the review that had been carried out by the Board of Inquiry. The delay was not a result of the contents of that particular report, but because not enough information was submitted. In the report more complete, thorough and accurate information was requested by a senior officer before a report is approved, and it is approved on behalf of the Chief of the Defence Staff at the National Defence Headquarters.

The inquiry will answer the questions raised regarding the licence given to drivers in the militia. Private Krosney was qualified under the DND 404 driver's licence. Such a licence is given even if a civilian licence is not in the possession of the licensee. He was qualified as far as our Department is concerned as an expert driver and was qualified to drive the vehicle.

In closing, I would like to thank the Hon. Member for raising this matter again. The Minister, as the Hon. Member is no doubt aware, has shown great interest in making sure that the information sought will be made available in the shortest possible time. The Chief of the Defence Staff has directed that this matter be dealt with on a priority basis and that the complete Board of Inquiry information be provided as soon as it has been approved on his behalf.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Monday, March 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the Government.

Mr. Jack Masters (Thunder Bay-Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, again it is a pleasure to have the opportunity to participate in a Budget debate, particularly this one. I say that because the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) labelled his Budget "Partnership for Growth". It is my conviction that the Budget we are debating now is entirely appropriate to the times for a number of reasons.

It should be noted that the Budget in fact builds on strength in the country. Throughout the land, while we have difficulties and problems to surmount, essentially we are looking toward the immediate, medium-term and long-term future with a greater feeling of confidence than we have been able to feel collectively for many years due to many factors in the Canadian economy, the North American economy and the world economy.

Much will be said about the Budget in the next while both inside and outside this House. Some of it will be positive. Much of it, especially from Members opposite, will be negative. I respect the right and the duty of the Opposition to be critical, but I have a caveat, if I may presume to make a modest suggestion to Members opposite. They might consider legitimate criticism, because it is not a perfect world that we live in. We do not come up with perfect documents and plans. I hope that the tone of their opposition and comment will not be so entirely negative that it is counter-productive in the sense that it will take away from this feeling of confidence.

Confidence is not a partisan issue. Partisanship sometimes takes away from the fact that we have a wonderful country, that we believe in it, that because we are the kind of people we are, living in the land that we live in, we can look forward to the future with confidence. Confidence is also a state of mind. All of us in this House have an obligation to contribute to that state of mind.

One of the first features about this Budget I would like to address, because I believe it is the most significant, is that it was prepared with a great amount of consultation. The word "consultation" is almost a cliché. It is so obvious that one wonders why we do not do it all the time. Each of us in our own sectors finds other priorities that prohibit or inhibit us from being able to speak openly with each other, to take the time to talk with one another and, most important, to listen to one another.

We are still in a very difficult period economically in our country's history. The mood is that we must listen to one another. We must consult with each other in a meaningful fashion. I believe even Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition will agree that some very important groups and individuals were consulted regarding this Budget. The common taxpayer was consulted. I see items in the Budget that came about as a result of representations from Members of this House in caucus. I see the changes that have been made. I hope some of this came about as a result of some of the letters and personal interventions that I have made. Opposition Members have expressed some thoughts in this House. They are all there, pointing the way.

It is a leadership direction that the Minister is taking on behalf of the Government of Canada. It says we must take a leadership role. This is something that governments can do. Governments can do some things well and we do some things very badly. One thing we can do, if we work at it properly, with the right attitude and with the right frame of mind, is to promote honest consultations, consultation being in the form of the two-way street that I mentioned earlier where we pass on our ideas, listen in return and come up with something better than either side could come up with individually. Some 30 major groups across this country participated in a most meaningful way in putting this Budget together.

While in political terms one does not want to acknowledge that many sectors of the economy have said that yes, this is a good Budget, that this is the right kind of Budget at this point in time, to my way of thinking one of the right things about the Budget that we are debating at this moment is that it does build confidence. But it did not send shock waves throughout the nation. That happens periodically and it must happen once in a while when we have to find new directions because we have been following one path for too long. All of us know that nothing is forever and that we have to change direction and thoroughly examine issues in the light of prevailing conditions in the world and in Canada.

The Budget indicates that we have put many things in place that are working. We are moving in a forward direction. Perhaps we are not moving forward as fast as some of us would like, and I may address that point a little later. However, we are moving in the proper direction. What we need is a Budget that tells Canadian citizens that they will have an idea as to the direction in which we will be going for the next number of years. They will see refinements and improvements based on their suggestions and on the initiative of the Government, but they will not see anything startling. We will put in place policies and actions that we can trust and that we can move forward.

I think that is one reason the Budget has met with such general approval. I say general approval because sometimes when dealing with any subject in detail there will be many who will argue that we did not go far enough with pension reform or that we are not moving quickly enough. There are those who say that those issues are the important ones now but we need to talk about them a little bit more. The general direction we are going has been set and we think that we are on the right track; but for goodness sake, give us a chance to examine proposals and come back with better ideas so that we have a more refined package to present regarding pension reforms for the average citizen, programs for senior citizens and, above all, programs that will assist the women in our society to have a more equitable future and a more equitable participation in the present. Those are not easy things to accomplish.

The Budget has put on the table some of the results gleaned from the heavy consultations that have been going on across this land and has indicated in general terms where we think we have to make improvements. We have to make sure that there is more portability. We have to make sure that a spouse has more of an opportunity to prepare for his or her future. We have examined these matters but they must still be covered in more detail. The Budget does not indicate exactly what we are going to do but it does indicate the direction we propose, and, after further consultation, we will be in a position to implement these ideas.

Make no mistake about it, Mr. Speaker, some proposals have been made for the assistance of home owners. While there are those who will ask why we do not implement those proposals right now and who will say that we are just postponing them with further consultations, I sense from my colleagues in the House, from members of the Cabinet in particular and from the country as a whole, a sense of urgency about these matters. We are going to implement these policies with the co-operation of the Opposition. The Opposition can certainly slow down the implementation of these policies, but we are going to be in a position quickly to conclude the consultation process, put the finishing touches on what I believe are some very creative ideas that have been born out of much discussion across the land and then implement those ideas.

Another item in the Budget that has not been receiving sufficient attention as far as I can see is the suggestion of employee profit participation. I have always believed in profit-sharing plans. I have spent much time working on that kind of thing during my tenure as President of the Thunder Bay Chamber of Commerce and in my work in general with the Chamber of Commerce. I have worked for firms that have had profit-sharing plans and I know how well those plans can work. However, the beauty of this plan is that it does another thing—it indicates that to implement an employee profit participation plan, there has to be a labour-management committee. Think of the genius of that simplistic idea. Most good ideas end up in very succinct terms.

Another thing that is beginning to happen more and more in this country, and must happen, is that labour and management no longer think of each other as adversaries—that management has all the right ideas or that labour has all the right ideas. They are in the same ball game and must have devices to enable them to meet in mutual trust and understanding.

I believe that if labour and management allow the proposed Employee Profit Participation Plan to bear fruit it will lead to better conditions. Both must have a stronger recognition of their vested interests in the profitability and progress of their endeavours. They must also recognize that the labour-management committee is the means of making the plan work. Not only will they be in the position to deal with the profit sharing aspect, but out of necessity they will begin to move toward improved consultation and the exchange of information. I think the federal Government has given the leadership to encourage movement in this direction. It is only common sense but it is very necessary.

We have heard a lot about Revenue Canada in recent times, Mr. Speaker, and not all has been complimentary. I do not mean to digress from the discussion of the Budget but not all the statements made about Revenue Canada have even been fair. Who defends the taxman? Who defends the man who is in charge of accounts receivable, for instance? He is always the bad guy. He is the one who has to bring in the revenue to pay for whatever has to be done, but he is viewed as not a very nice guy. In the case of Revenue Canada the individual is not in a position to defend himself. I do not mean to defend anything that has gone wrong, or bad administration. Those things will happen; they happen in the private sector as well as in government and they must be examined from time to time.

To return to the Budget, Mr. Speaker, I think it is a start toward simplification of the tax system. As one who is not an accountant, I have always been bothered by the fact that even accountants cannot agree on the interpretation of taxation laws. However, something has been done in the Budget to simplify taxes for small businesses. I can assure you that is one of the major thrusts we are giving to that generator of jobs in our economy, the small businessman.

We must all stand back from Revenue Canada and our taxation laws, however, and ask how we can make them better. I do not believe we can do that by castigating a whole Department of what essentially are very capable and able civil servants who are doing their job as directed by the House of Commons. I believe that case has been overstated. If you will excuse the expression, Mr. Speaker, I am just bootlegging a few thoughts on some of the outlandish and unfair statements that have been directed at the Department.

Nonetheless, the Budget is also addressing the goal of more fairness in tax administration. Through the consultation process we are learning how that might come about and I think we will see great improvements through new legislation, through new directions and in new examinations of the system. The consultation process is vital, particularly if it is carried out with the positive view of making the system better. That is what we were elected to do.

• (1125)

I do not even object to the fact that the Opposition has a task force going across Canada to test the views of Canadians on the tax system. My only hope is that this task force will do good and not simply conduct a witch hunt; that it will not just reinforce a bias or just be a vehicle to allow the malcontents in the taxpaying sector of the economy to use that platform to receive all kinds of publicity which really would be used to attack the Department, serving no end and giving a voice to a group of people who have not always played fair with the tax system.

The Budget talks about more fairness in the tax administration system. I believe the Opposition, in what it is doing, has a chance to do either great good or great harm. We are going into an election year and, Mr. Speaker, I believe all of us, while we will fight our partisan political battles, must not do so at the expense of the good of the country by overstatement and by overzealousness in the wrong areas. While the Budget has pointed out that we are experiencing an upturn in the economy, that we have a feeling of confidence, we also know that there is a certain fragility to it. I believe this is a time for yeoman service on the part of all of us in this House to make the system work better.

I would like to speak now about the plan put forth in the Budget to aid home owners. We have all been looking for some way to be of help to something which is near and dear to all of us as Canadians, home ownership. We found as we went through that period of very drastic fluctuation in interest rates that there were a lot of people with great problems and in dire circumstances regarding their most precious possession, their home. While the Budget has made some suggestions as to how one might insure against rising interest rates if they should go beyond a certain point, which will give some stability, I believe, it should be noted that the Budget also takes a look at how the investment sector might be encouraged to go for the longer term mortgage. I feel that is probably one of the more important features of the Budget, although it does not seem so sensational to many of us until the prospect is really examined. When we as home owners had mortgages with terms of 20 years, 25 years and 30 years, it gave us a great feeling of stability. We knew where we were at. I do not believe you can ever turn the clock back, but I do believe there is a way we can move toward longer term mortgages, and that would be to everyone's good.

I support the Budget because I feel its theme "partnership of growth", is well named and accurate. I believe the Budget does help encourage the feeling of confidence which I view to be fairly dominant in the country.

Mr. Kristiansen: Mr. Speaker, I believe the gentleman who just spoke is the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay-Nipigon (Mr. Masters). I would like to ask the Hon. Member, with regard to his comment on labour-management committees and profit sharing, whether he is aware of what initiatives the Government may now be taking in order to implement some of the measures proposed in the recent Throne Speech of the Government? Is the Hon. Member aware of whether or not those crown corporations, in which the Government has a total interest are living up to the commitments in that Throne Speech to give their employees some share and some voice in the management of those corporations?

If the Hon. Member is not aware of any such progress—I certainly am not and I have been asking regularly—how does he believe that because employee-employer profit sharing is introduced into the private sector, there is going to be any voice for those employees in the management of that operation, including how the moneys which they invest will be used, whether or not they will be allocated to dividends, spread among the employees, used for the build-up of the company, or used in any other way? Our experience in B.C. shows that that sort of operation can be a total con job and I would like to know just where he gets his faith from.

• (1130)

Mr. Masters: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate what the Hon. Member has suggested. I think it is far easier, because of the money factor, to get into a profit-sharing plan in the private sector. But I think, too, that because the Budget furthers the idea of labour-management relations, and if the Government is going to be true to its own code so to speak, we must in parallel, as I believe we are doing, as imperfect as the system might be, begin to look for that same kind of labour-management investigation within the Public Service. If we are not, we should be.

Perhaps this will explain one of the reasons I took off a little bit on those who are critical of Revenue Canada, not that any function of Government is beyond criticism. However, it does nothing to enhance the feeling of co-operation; it puts it back into an adversarial position because we as parliamentarians have a role to play in labour-management relations involving the Government of Canada and the Public Service. If our attitude is the cliché that the Public Service is overpaid and underworked, and all of these wrong, wrong impressions, then we have not done any good.

The bottom line is, how do we improve upon labour-management relations between the Government and the Public Service? I think the point is well taken and the Hon. Member has shown an initiative in encouraging Government to look at that issue. If we have a happy, contented, effective and productive private sector, then surely we must have the same situation in the Public Service sector. We have an awful lot of people in the Public Service who are just dying to be able to show more intiative. They have management skills, so I for one will be encouraging the Government to pursue the thought the Hon. Member expressed more fully.

Mr. Kristiansen: Mr. Speaker, I think it is important for both the Hon. Member and the Government he supports to realize that such mechanisms, whether they be a share in decision making, profit sharing, or whatever, are not a substitute for the adversary system. If they are regarded as such, they will be treated with a great deal of animosity. They may be complementary to it, and by taking those initiatives they may alter the mood in the industrial world. But if anyone suggests, particularly the Government, that these are a substitute for an adversary system which, particularly in North America, has done more to ensure that not just the collective body but individual workers have rights in the workplace, then he is treading on very dangerous ground and it is going to blow up in the Government's face.

There were initiatives a few years ago with the so-called labour-management consultative committee under the aegis of the federal Department of Labour. Many of the meetings became a talk shop in which issues were talked out to the point where grievances were lost due to being "out of time". They were misused by many corporations so as to bring the whole idea of co-operation into disrepute. I ask the Hon. Member to impress upon the Government he supports, that these systems are simply an adjunct to, or possibly supplementary to, the adversary system, not a substitute. There is a real danger if the Government pursues the substitution course.

Mr. Masters: Mr. Speaker, the only thing I would say in response is that the adversary system is terminology I want to disappear from our vocabulary. I would hope that through consultation we can solve the problems mutually. If you work on something in a mutual way, then I respectfully suggest you are no longer in an adversarial position; you are having an honest discussion.

Mr. Kristiansen: But who is in the driver's seat?

Mr. Masters: I understand what the Hon. Member is getting at, that the rights of the workers have to be protected and so on. However, we have now reached a point where we can do it in a better way and it does not always have to be by throwing rocks at each other from across the table. The basic thought of labour-management relations in the Public Service is a valid one but it should not be maintained in the adversarial role as we have known in the past.

Mr. Kristiansen: Parliaments and the courts work on the adversarial system, too.

Mr. Parker: Mr. Speaker, I would also like to direct a question to the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay-Nipigon (Mr. Masters) regarding the labour-management profits system. When the Government initiated the six and five program, the request was made that mediation officers be brought before the committee so the method of dealing with this topic could be discussed. This really relates to labour-management within the Public Service which he is talking about, and we were denied that. It was strictly a confrontation.

Until this Government sets up some sort of system as in Sweden where a labour-management program is put in place, I think the Government is grasping at straws. Until it can lay out some sort of program to accomplish this, with Government assistance, then we are not going to meet that goal. We have had confrontation up until this point. If the Government is trying to change this direction, then I hope there is a structure in place. Does the Hon. Member see a structure in place to assist these groups in doing that?

Mr. Masters: Mr. Speaker, I think the six and five program, which worked, was undertaken because of extraordinary times.

Mr. Kristiansen: For whom?

Mr. Masters: The Hon. Member asks for whom. It has worked for the country as a whole because inflation came down. Unfortunately it is up to Government to set a tone and use whatever weapons it has in its arsenal to combat things such as inflation. What I hope will happen now is that we will have found the middle ground where we can meet with our Public Service employees. I would hope the NDP, because they seem to have their followers, will encourage our renewed attempt at honest dialogue to be fair to all concerned.

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, it is amazing how often you stand to speak having prepared in your mind exactly what you want to say and interventions from our colleagues to the left change your mind. It seems unfortunate that the NDP has such a terrible hang-up that, first, anyone should ever, heaven forbid, make a profit, and second, that any group of employees would want to work with a group of employers and thus remove the possibility of confrontation between the two.

Mr. Kristiansen: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to debate. But somebody deliberately miscontrues what is said and suggests that I, as a representative of the NDP, said there was something wrong with profit per se. He knows that his is a misleading statement. He knows that absolutely. I never said any such thing and neither has my Party.

• (1140)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order, please. Differences of opinion are debate and do not constitute a point of order.

Mr. Ellis: Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but they do not know the difference between debate and points of order.

I intended to start my remarks, Mr. Speaker, which I will do now, with a quote from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) on February 15. He said:

My budget today is dedicated to building a strong and growing economy—an economy that will generate lasting, meaningful jobs for all Canadians who want to work, an economy that will provide the economic opportunity and security all Canadians seek.

He went on to say:

My objective as Minister of Finance has been and remains straightforward: to keep the economy growing, so that Canadians who want to work can find productive and meaningful jobs.

I had intended to deal with a number of items emanating from the Budget Speech dealing with taxes, with the items mentioned by my friend across the way for Thunder Bay-Nipigon (Mr. Masters), and with the delay in implementation of many items. Frankly, there is no general thrust to the Budget. The Budget does little to spur ecnomic recovery. It is a white paper Budget. Proposals are presented on mortgage protection and other items which are to be studied rather than implemented. The fact is we will have an election long before the Government gets around to dealing with any of those items. Perhaps that is a good thing as they will be dealt with expeditiously, properly and fairly when that time comes.

How can anyone say that the goal of economic recovery is met while 1.5 million Canadians are out of work? How can anyone say there is economic recovery when the unemployment rate is going to average 10 per cent this year, with our industrial capacity being used at only 70 per cent, and when real wages will not go up one cent? The concern of the Government was said to be jobs, Mr. Speaker. That, too, is an illusion.

Two days after the Budget was tabled The Globe and Mail carried this comment:

What bothers us, too, is the small return on the money the Government has allocated to finding jobs for the unemployed. Projects appear from nowhere and quickly return there. Often they're sabotaged by politics, as in the controversial handling of the Special Employment Initiatives Program—

For that, Mr. Speaker, you read "Liberal slush fund".

—which seemed little more than an excuse for Liberal MPs to pose beside constituents with cheque in hand.

The editorial went on to speak about the need for the Government to have a cohesive plan. It spoke about "a gaggle of programs which sound dandy when described in costly brochures". The article went on to estimate that it will cost $2,333 for every unemployed person in Canada. The point is made that by the time that has cleared the bureaucracy very little actually gets spent. That would mean about $12 million for the unemployed coming into my constituency of Prince Edward-Hastings. There is no way that has happened or will happen.

I would like to quote from that mouthpiece of the Liberal Party in Ontario, the Toronto Star. The day after the Budget was tabled an editorial in the Star said:

Finance Minister Marc Lalonde has effectively told Canada's 1.4 million unemployed that they're out of luck. He isn't prepared to undertake a single major new initiative to ease their plight, or to address our most pressing economic and social problem.

It concluded by saying:

—the crucial test of this budget was what it would do to reduce unemployment. And, by that test, Lalonde has not provided what Canadians were entitled to expect and demand.

I will tell you what the situation is in Prince Edward-Hastings, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday morning at about 7.30, at the height of what was the second worst storm this winter, between 3,000 and 4,000 men and women stood huddled in a line a kilometre long outside the Canada employment office waiting for it to open. A major company in Belleville had said it would release to the Canada employment centre some 500 job application forms. This employer is one of the larger employers in Belleville and is a very sensitive and good employer. From time to time it asks the employment office to hand out forms for job applications. The last time this was done was in 1980-81. Through this procedure their lists are upgraded. As they need to hire more employees they refer to that list of applicants who have previously been screened. They then call people to come in for final interviews before hiring. They did not have 500 jobs; they were only handing out employment application forms. They had perhaps two or three dozen jobs over the next few days.

The point is, Mr. Speaker, that between 3,000 and 4,000 people, some of whom slept outside of the Canada employment office overnight, wanted a job. When people are prepared to do that it gives us some idea of the need for employment and the lack of consideration for employment which is evident in my part of Ontario.

I would like to make a very simple and small point which illustrates the lack of concern by the Government. Yesterday I received a letter from the President of Northern Telecom, a gentleman I know very well. In his letter he indicates that the Department of Communications has put in place a standard for telephones known as CS-03. Because Canadian manufacturers are meeting the costs of complying with the standards they are paying a penalty. They are at a competitive disadvantage in their home market against foreign suppliers who cannot or do not bother to comply. This has the undesirable effect, in terms of the Canadian economy, of tipping the scales in favour of imports. This in turn means that jobs go out of Canada. This is evidenced in the following reference:

Offshore manufacturers whose products are allowed to sell in Canada without complying with the CS-03 are putting Canadian consumers at risk and Canadian jobs in jeopardy. Some 800 jobs have been lost since 1981 in Northern Telecom's plant in London, Ontario, because sales of the telephones it makes have been declining in the Canadian market.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that the Government is not interested in enforcing its own regulations. Thereby we have foreign products coming in which do not meet Canadian standards and are taking away Canadian jobs.

About one year ago I spent a good deal of time speaking in the House about the problems of Stephens-Adamson. There was a great deal of debate as to the quality of the product needed to move the coal in western Canada and about a $20 million contract. A Canadian firm was the only company in the world capable of building that particular piece of equipment at that time. Its bid was low and it was on time. It became very obvious that Mr. Franche, who was the head of the National Harbours Board at that time, was going to give that contract to a Japanese manufacturer whatever the cost. The Canadian competitor never had an opportunity to bid that job fairly.

● (1150)

It seems to me that is another piece of evidence of the disregard for Canadian jobs shown by this Government. One step further, the gentleman I mentioned a moment ago, Mr. Franche, went on to become the President of VIA Rail. Now we know how badly VIA Rail has screwed up. Its trains do not even run 20 per cent on time.

In Belleville there are a wide variety of industries. We have a good selection of good employers. They attempt in every way possible to improve their working standards. They attempt in every way possible to improve their working standards. They attempt to improve their portion of the work in the community. They would like to improve their portion of work in the market. In each of the cases I mention, Mr. Speaker, I am not giving names simply because it would not do to bring the names of these employers in the House of Commons. They are embarrassed, I am sure, to seek help or to seek redress from the Government by virtue of the fact that the regulations imposed upon them are so ridiculous as to make it impossible for them to show a profit without having to seek a change.

One of those employers produces a product from a plastic made in Canada. Its competition comes from Brazil, Tanzania and Portugal. Twice this company has been before the Anti-Dumping Tribunal and twice it has been proved that foreign countries dump their product into Canada at a level that is jeopardizing the Canadian company and taking away Canadian jobs.

The Government of Canada does not recognize that currency values in those countries drop so rapidly that their worth becomes almost zero against the Canadian dollar. It does not matter at what level you put the import duties. Companies can ship into Canada because the value of their particular currency is so much lower than ours. That gives you some idea of the problem, Mr. Speaker. It does not matter at what cost we produce a product. We are certainly producing product at much lower cost than the United States, but no protection is given by the Canadian Government such as U.S. firms have.

Another company entertaining an expansion in Canada required a customs duty remission for the period of time that it was designing and establishing its new facilities. That is standard procedure. It allows a Canadian company to import from a parent company, usually in the United States, until such time as facilities are completed here. In this instance the Canadian company asked for and got a duty remission. In the course of its negotiations with the parent company, the company was able to increase its involvement in the community of Belleville four times. This company went from a $2 million addition to an $8 million addition to its plant. However, negotiations covering that increased involvement in the community took the company beyond the deadline arbitrarily set by the Department of National Revenue, which meant the company was cut off from its customs duty remission even though it was increasing its participation in the community.

Need I spend a lot of time talking about the distillers in Canada? One of the largest and best run distilleries in Canada is in my constituency, I am happy to say. It is in the position of laying people off because the taxation levels of this Government are so heavy. We have heard my colleagues pointing out that these heavy taxation levels endanger the tourist industry and tourist operators. Jobs are taken away from constituents in my riding simply because of the rapacious greed of this Government in its taxation policy which has now turned the whole situation around. Products are not being purchased simply because taxes are too high.

Need I talk again about the Maislin company? In this case a United States company was allowed to come to Canada and buy up a Canadian company. Had the federal Government not been so anxious to climb in and dump $34 million to help out its friends, that company might well have gone into bankruptcy a few months earlier. But if that had happened, the company would have been bought up by Canadian companies making money. Certainly more of Maislin's people would have been working now than is the case under a U.S. company.

I could tell you about a large lumbering operation in the north end of my constituency, Mr. Speaker. It had planned with a German manufacturer to establish a brand-new plant. All of the details were ready when the federal Government stepped in and promised all kinds of money, many, many millions of dollars, if the company were to establish the plant in the Gaspé section of Quebec. Never mind that a Hastings County entrepreneur had started a deal. Never mind that a Hastings County entrepreneur was capable of putting the deal together. The federal Government stepped in and with taxpayers' money asked the company to go to Quebec. Of course, the company did so. Now we have a consumer starting a new plant in my constituency and he needs that particular product. But what does he have to do? He has to import it all the way from the Gaspé instead of having it right at hand where it should have been.

Textiles are another major problem concerning jobs in Prince Edward-Hastings. Major textile producers, names that have been in business for nearly a century, are now turning into importers simply because they cannot possibly compete with the regulations put in place by the federal Government. The allowance of imports is well beyond what is normally called for.

A large part of Prince Edward-Hastings is obviously agricultural. Prince Edward County particularly has had a couple of bankruptcies recently of major farm operations simply because the Farm Credit Corporation will not consider a pari passu situation where the Farm Credit Corporation and the banks equally share the risks and equally share the lending. It seems to me it is just that straightforward. Section 16 of the Unemployment Insurance Act means that farmers in Prince Edward County now have to put in unemployment insurance benefits for literally tens of thousands of students who work part time during the summer and have absolutely no opportunity of ever collecting unemployment insurance under those benefits. This is just another aggravation in the way of putting jobs in place in Prince Edward County.

There are those situations in the two-county area that I represent where we have been successful. I have probably dealt with every Minister of the Crown who has the least bit to do with employment. I have to say, having pleaded the case with these many Ministers, that in some situations I have had success. If those Ministers were here this morning, I would be the first to recognize them. It is not always the fact that Ministers are at fault, but certainly the policies of this Government are at fault; certainly the policies of this Government are causing us a great deal of grief in the employment sector in Prince Edward-Hastings.

To conclude, let me say that jobs were said to be the thrust of this Budget. Jobs should have been the thrust of this Budget. Jobs were clearly not seriously considered in this Budget. Once again, this crowd has failed. Leaderless for the next three months, things can only get worse. The country, especially those who need jobs, will benefit by the Liberals going.

Mr. Kristiansen: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Hon. Member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis). He bemoaned at some length the problem of low-value foreign currencies in comparison to Canada's currency. In view of some of these problems, would the Hon. Member not agree that both the Liberal Government and his own Party, the Progressive Conservative Party, should reverse their past and present major policies and let the Canadian dollar float rather than propping it up as is the case, now? Would he not agree that we should peg interest rates instead of letting them float as is the case now? Interest rates are now floating upwards. Would he not agree that we should be going along the lines suggested by many economists and, most recently, by columnist Don McGillivray, who wrote an article to this effect about a week ago in the Ottawa Citizen and other papers across the land?

I am suggesting that that kind of reversal in policy on behalf of both his Party and the Government would provide stability and confidence internally for many Canadians in business and in labour. It would give us a better competitive edge and provide some real incentive to manufacturers to manufacture more durable goods and machinery in Canada instead of relying heavily upon imports. The current policy of pegging the dollar and letting interest rates float is one of the major causes of the trouble in this country, and that is the policy of both his Party and the Liberal Government.

Would he not agree that there has to be a drastic reversal of both these areas of policy on the part of the Conservatives and the Liberals if we are to have any hope of placing our economy in a competitive position and getting on with the job of creating jobs and goods for Canadians?

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, just four years ago that Party put the Liberal Government in place. Methinks they do protest too much. In all the rhetoric of the Hon. Member one thing was very clear. He kept saying that the dollar was pegged. Of course, the dollar is not pegged, it floats. As a matter of fact, there are changes in the interest rate every Thursday which usually affect the value of the dollar.

I know they are sorry that they put the Liberals back in, but I am not at all sure they know which way they will go, come the next election. Come the next election, we will set the economic policies of the country in a way which will give jobs to all Canadians.

Mr. Kristiansen: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Prince Edward-Hastings went off on a tangent once again. Instead of dealing with the issue, he rhetorically asked why we defeated the Conservative Government of the Right Hon. Member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark). Of course, it was the people of Canada who later decided to put the Liberal Party back into power. The reason for our action was obvious in my question to him a few moments ago. It is because their basic policies are the same. They are doing immeasurable harm to the country. We would vote against the Party opposite, and we have done so more than twice as often as has his own Party, for the same reasons we defeated his Party when it formed the Government: it had exactly the same disastrous approach to the problems of the people of Canada.

I would ask him to realize and admit the real problems with this Budget and perhaps take some corrective action within his own ranks. We now have Liberal politics and a Conservative Budget, and that is the worst of both worlds.

Mr. Ellis: That is not really worth answering. However, I will just say that those comments come from people who are opposed to everything and anything. As I said earlier in my remarks, they are opposed to employers making a profit. They are opposed to employees and employers getting together to try to make a profit jointly.

Mr. Kristiansen: Not true.

Mr. Ellis: They were opposed to the excellent Budget which was brought down by the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) four years ago.

Mr. Kristiansen: True.

Mr. Ellis: They do not have any choice but to oppose this—well, I cannot use the language in the House I would like to use—to oppose this Budget. They are now prepared to oppose us again, even before we come into power. I am delighted. We look forward to meeting them on the campaign trail, and we will see what their opposition gets them.

Mr. Kristiansen: Your answer was no.

Mr. Parent: Mr. Speaker, I tell the Hon. Member opposite that we, too, look forward to the next election.

Mr. Ellis: Then let's have it; the sooner the better.

Mr. Parent: I am sure the Hon. Member would want to correct an idea which he put forth. I do not think he meant it so I am asking him for clarification. He mentioned that Government funds were made available to a company to re-establish in Quebec. From the tone of what he was saying, it sounded as if he was more upset with the fact that this company, which could have been established in his own riding, was established in Quebec, as opposed to simply being established in any other part of Canada. Would the Hon. Member set the record straight?

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, I was and am disturbed that that company was moved to Quebec. Certainly I would have been as disturbed if it had been moved anywhere else. The federal Government had absolutely no bloody business getting involved. The entrepreneur from Ontario and the entrepreneur from Germany had their deal put together. When they went for approval, the Government stepped in and moved the company to Quebec. I would have been just as opposed to its being moved anywhere else. I am not against Quebec, but the federal Government had absolutely no right to become involved. It was a good, viable deal. They might well have supported it, but they did not need to move it.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of attention to the Hon. Member from Belleville because many years ago I made the decision to centralize and to move out of Toronto and Ottawa the total operation of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. The Hon. Member will recall that after very detailed study I placed it in the City of Belleville. I do not recall the good Member of Parliament complaining that I had betrayed my trust in moving the Unemployment Insurance Commission out of the cities where it was situated, principally Toronto, into Belleville. Nevertheless, I am not interested in becoming involved in that type of partisan debate at the moment.

I frankly look upon this Budget in a very selfish way. I look at it from the perspective of what it means to the people of my community. I am very fortunate, in my declining years as a Member of Parliament, to have had the privilege of representing the riding of Lincoln which is situated, as most people know, essentially along Lake Ontario between Niagara Falls and Hamilton. Its characteristics are for the most part rural, with at the same time a very heavy urban end closer to Hamilton.

The response to the Budget—and I say this as effectively as possible—has been very positive, to the point that it surprised me. For instance, the farm community is particularly pleased with the Budget in that it meets the problems of capital gains, of retirement years and farmers' inability to pass their farms on to their families without paying severe financial penalties. Of course, I credit this Party with this move, and I commend the Hon. Member sitting on my right who is helping the House Leader today because he was the strongest voice in caucus among many in ensuring that the Budget brought in the required changes for the farm community.

Unlike the Hon. Member from Belleville, the NDP has the tendency not to change its mind but to raise false issues or, if the issue is not false, to treat it so superficially that it is unfair to the issue and to the people listening.

Mr. Ellis: He has gone to lunch.

Mr. Mackasey: He has always gone to lunch. There is nothing new about that.

Mr. Ellis: They are out to lunch.

Mr. Mackasey: I want to speak to the size of our deficit and about whether or not we can afford it. I know that in 1980 the deficit was also an issue. At that time I was able to conduct a little study on it. In fact, I recall that practically the same debate occurred in 1976. One of the strongest proponents of the sizeable deficit at that time was the Conference Board spokesman. I am not for a moment suggesting that a deficit is a good thing, either individually or collectively, or as a company or a country. However, I think that at times deficits are imperative and necessary. The only country of which I can think that balanced its budget was Portugal under Salazar. Because of the policy of balanced budgets annually, Portugal was never able to amass sufficient funds in those days to provide schooling, compulsory education, hospitalization and decent roads. Now the Government of Portugal has to work very hard to catch up.

• (1210)

I remember asking members of the farm community who were complaining about the size of our deficit how many people in the hall did not have a greater deficit now than 20 years ago when they entered farming. They all agreed that they owed more money today they owed 20 years ago. In the next breath they reminded me that they were quite capable of handling that debt. Their assets had grown because of their periodical borrowing over the 20, 30 or 40 years when they bought a new section of land, a tractor or more modern equipment. The real issue is not the size of the deficit but our ability to finance it.

In his Budget the Minister has virtually frozen the deficit. He has not reduced it. He knows that to reduce it dramatically at the moment means cutting back on social programs. The Liberal Party will never cut back on our social programs, at least the basic, fundamental ones.

I remind Members opposite that we differ from the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) who two weeks ago suggested that we introduce a means test to decide who gets the old age pension, a fundamental characteristic of this country which all Canadians pay for through their sweat, toil and contribution to our economy.

Mr. Ellis: He didn't say that and you know better.

Mr. Mackasey: I heard it over the radio. I did not interrupt the Hon. Member when he was speaking. I must be hurting him where I do not like to hurt him because he is one of my favourite Members. However, I heard the Hon. Member for St. John's West on a Saturday morning, on a CBC radio program, say that when he comes back to power and is Minister of Finance he will have to give it serious consideration. Why is he considering? When asked how he would cut the Budget and cut spending rather than the deficit, he turned immediately Pavlovian in his concept to say: "We will have to give serious consideration to introducing a means test", not for family allowances, although he mentioned that, not for many of the other fringe expenditures and social policies, but for the old age pension.

I have to give the Hon. Member credit. At least he is clearing the road. He is clearing the debris. He is bringing back, helping to clarify and sharpen the policies of the Conservative Party as opposed to the policies of the Liberal Party. He is making it quite clear for the electorate in six or eight months, or whenever the time may be for an election, to say let's get away from personalities; let's get back to issues, let's get back to policies.

What are the clear distinctions between the Liberals, Conservatives and New Democrats? Every time they come under that scrutiny the New Democrats simply disappear. The 12, 13 or 14 per cent of the population, appealing mostly to intellectuals who can afford those socialist tendencies and those who are indoctrinated in the policy and their own basic philosophy, cannot realize the extent to which the world is changing.

We are now understanding the Conservative policy. It is now emerging, slow but sure, day by day. When you strip the front pages of the personalities, the leadership, who will be this, who will be that, policy differentiation is emerging. That is good for Canada. It is good for the Tory Party. If the majority of Canadians want a government that is dedicated to bringing in means tests for old age pensions, one which thinks President Reagan is the greatest invention since sliced bread, that our policies must be a reflection of neo-conservatism in this country, they can at least see that the issues are not blurred, that they are distinct. They will see the Liberal Party remains faithful to the concept that the government has a role to play in protecting the less fortunate, the helpless, those with no organized union, the 66 per cent of the workers in this country who through no fault of their own, and perhaps through their own fault, are unable to cope and meet the day to day expenses that people incur.

Is that a legitimate role for a government to play? I have to say it is. If I did not think so, I would be over knocking on the door of my good friend, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney). Whenever the industrialized world is under pressure for money, as it has been for the last few years, these strains are bound to emerge. Liberalism has been the marriage of an economic policy that does not differ all that much from the Conservative Party with social reform. Where we do differ from the Conservative Party is in our social concepts, our conscience, our concern, our compassion, our care for people. We are not a cold, efficient organization. We are not the disciples of Adam Smith. We believe in compassion and concern. That is why we favour transfer payments to extremes in this country, unlike the Americans. That is why we are dedicated to seeing that everybody has equal opportunity by funding universities and other schools of education, and making medicare possible so that everybody has a chance to be healthy and to be educated. Without health, you can be nothing. These are the fundamental things that distinguish us from the Conservatives.

The Budget also points out certain ways that we differ from the New Democrats. We believe that social policies can only come from increased productivity. Money does not come from Heaven, it comes from private enterprise. We believe in free enterprise. The NDP have an open invitation. Any time they want me to join their Party, they can tell me one single society in this world that I would trade for the Canadian way of life. Name it. They can't. They are silent. I have been issuing that challenge for 20 years. Will it be Sweden where you wait eight years, not to buy a home but to rent a home? Would it be Poland? Would it be Russia? Would it be Cuba? Where is it? They may have the right political doctrine for a country at a certain stage of its emergence, but we are well beyond that. This country is well beyond the doctrine of the New Democratic Party.

How do we increase productivity? I share with my friend in the corner his concern for the labour movement. I do not believe that the adversarial concept can ever be legislated out of existence. There is no country that can export its labour-management concepts, be it Japan or wherever. We have a system that has worked remarkably well.

What the NDP do not realize, or perhaps they do, is the tremendous change in the composition of the work force. Not too long ago four workers out of five were so-called blue collar workers. Today three out of five are white collar workers. They are educated. They are intelligent. They do not want to be dominated by a union leader who says you have to walk down Main Street on May Day. They do not even understand the connotation. They want to be amply compensated. They do not even need a toolbox any more. They are "knowledge workers" rather than skilled workers.

This is the computer generation. It has been going on for a long time, certainly as long as I can recall. These changes are subtle and bring about a change in attitude. These workers know the need to co-operate. They know the need to sit down with management. They know the advantages to management, to labour and to the free entreprise system of increased productivity. They ask only that they get their fair share of that increased productivity. An enlightened and realistic management understands that as well. I am quite optimistic about the growth of labour, management and government co-operation in the future which will create jobs and increase our productivity.

We will never destroy or eliminate the adversarial role of labour and management. However, it will become the exception, just like strikes of any serious nature will become the exception rather than the rule in the future. This will not be because government has determined that by a piece of legislation but because technology has changed the workplace. It has changed the workers, their concerns and their characteristics. I repeat that when the majority of the work force consists of what we call knowledge workers or white collar workers who go to the workplace with their knowledge rather than with their screwdrivers, there is a change in attitude, a change in approach, and a change in understanding.

I can remember the election of 1962 when the then Right Hon. Prime Minister, Mr. Diefenbaker, was unfairly castigated for a 92-cent dollar. It was a big factor in the election. Today we talk knowledgeably about this subject. I do not mean only Members of Parliament but people in general talk knowledgeably about floating dollars, about fixed dollars, about 80-cent dollars, about 79-cent dollars. It is not a political problem. People understand that it is only a relative measurement of value as compared to the United States dollar. It is no longer an issue, just like the deficit is no longer an issue if explained properly.

It is significant that when Hon. Members speak about measuring the deficit on a per capita basis, they are using the wrong measurement and the wrong criteria. The deficit must be measured in comparison to our ability to repay it at an appropriate moment, to finance it and to carry the debt charges. That is why it must be compared to the GNP.

The Minister of Finance's Budget pointed out that although he is freezing the amount of the deficit to $31 billion, the increase in GNP in two years' time will make the relationship between the GNP and the deficit half of what it is today. I may remind the House that after the war in the early 1950s, the deficit in the country was running at 23 per cent of GNP. The deficit is not a problem unless, of course, it is unbridled or represents waste, and nobody wants that. That is why the Auditor General and a committee of public accountants look assiduously to see where there is waste.

I believe that at this point in our history people are entitled to a little more intelligent input from the New Democratic Party. There are exceptions, of course. I know that my time is coming to an end, Mr. Speaker, so I would like to say that yes, there are distinctions between the Parties, and they exist not only in debate. There are clear distinctions between the three Parties. One of the good and useful things that has occurred in recent months and now leading up to our leadership campaign is that those distinctions are becoming more pronounced. People are entitled to know what we stand for.

I do not particularly appreciate that some Members from my own Party's front-benches are unaware of the fact that federal legislation provides that the negative impact of technological change must be negotiated on the federal scene. We brought that legislation in 13 years ago. Three weeks ago, I heard members of the New Democratic Party saying that what we need is legislation that will provide that the Government must negotiate the impact of technological change. That has been a main feature of the changes of the Labour Code. I think I had something to do with introducing that change in 1971. Thirteen years have gone by and members of the New Democratic Party still fail to understand and appreciate that every collective agreement under federal jurisdiction must make provision to negotiate technological change.

What did that legislation flow from? The Hon. Member for London East (Mr. Turner) could tell us that it came about because of a change in the technology of the railways in the 1960s. At that time, the railways converted to diesel which made the picking up of coal to create steam redundant. Of course, the railways, being the unenlightened employers they were, thought that they could just disrupt the whole work force and never negotiate. Of course, Judge Freedman told us the opposite.

This Party will stand on its record in the next election. It will stand on the universality of its programs, including the old age pension, unlike the former Minister of Finance who, just three weeks ago, said that we must bring in a needs test and apply it, if necessary, to old age pensioners. I hope he repeats that statement in the election campaign. I hope he comes to my riding and tells that to the senior citizens who live there. There are many senior citizens who live in my community because they love the community; they are well represented, the climate is nice, there are many senior citizens' homes and we look after senior citizens in Lincoln.

I would like to see the former Minister of Finance come to the Riding of Lincoln and say: "Vote for me, but remember that if we are elected, the first thing we will have to do is take a good, hard look at old age pensions and see if there is not some way we can save a little money by introducing a needs test". I shall not go on to fight an election campaign on the basis of this Budget, but that statement has bothered me ever since I heard it.

All Parties work collectively at times to ensure that the quality of life in the country is as high as possible, even for those who for reasons beyond their control can contribute very little to the economy. It would do a disservice to the Canadian public if at this late stage, because of the influence of the President of the United States, we bowed to the temptation to become politically expedient and get votes by destroying the things that people have been working for many, many decades to achieve.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey) has made quite an issue of means tests and has clearly implied that he is opposed to them in their entirety. I would ask him if he supports the Government policy of having a means test before the granting of the guaranteed income supplement to about 50 per cent of old age pensioners in the country. Does he also support the Government policy of having a very rigorously applied means test before a veteran aged 55 can receive the war veterans allowance?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is not in the habit of putting words into my mouth and he has no right to imply that I said that. I know what I said. I spoke specifically about Old Age Security, not the guaranteed income supplement. I understand the difference between the income supplement and OAS. I understand that in order to preserve the basic principles of OAS, we must bring in some form of means test before we hand out the supplement. That at best is a compromise, but one that is necessary in order to retain the OAS. It has worked remarkably well.

The former Minister of Finance did not talk about the GIS, he talked about OAS. There is a fundamental difference between the two, as the Hon. Member knows. I do not mind having him ask me that question, but yes, I do support the principle of a means test in determining the guaranteed income supplement.

If I am not mistaken, it is significant that the Minister increased the GIS substantially in this Budget. One could question how substantial $50 a month is. To some people it is not very substantial but others have expressed satisfaction, pleasure and relief that some help has come. I just hope that the provincial Tory governments which have a great deal of control over senior citizens' homes and those kinds of things make certain that that money is not siphoned off from the senior citizens and swallowed up in the form of rent or charges against these individuals who live in senior citizens' complexes.

I apologize for not having mentioned the veterans. I share the hon. gentleman's concern. The Minister is in the House and I suggest that we need an approach on the part of the bureaucrats who deal with the veterans that is a little more enlightened. There seems to be a pattern developing in that Department of which the Minister is aware. I have talked to him about the practice of automatically refusing and delaying veterans' pensions. As a Member of Parliament, I too have come across cases that have dragged on for years before they are settled, and they are inevitably settled properly on behalf of the individual.

Mr. Parker: Mr. Speaker, I would like to question the Hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey) with regard to his comments about the New Democratic Party. Yes, Canada is a wonderful place to live and we all want to enjoy Canada's benefits. I wish to reaffirm to the Hon. Member that there are over two million people unemployed and on social assistance at this time and they too are looking for some of the benefits of the country.

I would like to take up the challenge presented by the Hon. Member and tell him about the proposal we have put forward with regard to the sale of western Canada coal, a clean coal that would clean up our environment, would create jobs right across Canada and help alleviate the cause of acid rain right from the source rather than after the fact. We are importing coal with a sulphur content 800 per cent higher than the coal of western Canada.

We proposed that a study be done that would create thousands of jobs, alleviate a lot of the causes of acid rain and keep $1 billion from leaving this country for the United States. That proposal could do something for all parts of Canada but the Government has refused to consider a study. I should like to hear what the Hon. Member thinks of that proposal. I invite him to take up the challenge.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, one thing the New Democratic Party is noted for is extravagance of expression. The Hon. Member spoke of two million people out of work; a little while ago someone mentioned 1.5 million people out of work and another person mentioned one million people out of work. As one who had charge of that Department at one time, I will not talk about what can be done with statistics. It is unfortunate that so many people are out of work, but the sheer reality is that we have come out of this recession second only to the United States. Our dollar is the second strongest currency in the world. Our recovery has been the fastest in the industrialized world, faster even than that of the United States.

As far back as I can recall, the level of unemployment in this country has reflected three things and they have not changed in the 10 years since I made a study of the matter. First of all, it reflects the advent of women in the work force. This is an overdue phenomenon, if you like, compared to Europe where that movement was accelerated, if you like, by the last war more so than it was here. Women came into the work force, discrimination against them was eliminated to a great degree, barriers to certain disciplines such as engineering, dentistry, law, were lowered. They add to the numbers, Mr. Speaker. They add to the quality of the work force, they add to the GNP, they add to our ability to look after the unemployed. But they also add to the numbers.

The second thing that still adds to our numbers is the rather civilized and open approach we have to new Canadians from other parts of the world. As a former Minister of Immigration I can remember the anger of some Members, particularly some from Toronto, when I brought in 7,000 Ugandans. I am sure that today each and every one of them is working and contributing, but they add to the numbers. Hardly a day goes by when someone does not ask the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Roberts) to open the door even further. But that also adds to the numbers, Mr. Speaker.

Finally, we still have the fastest growing work force because of the remarkably high number of young people just coming into it. This reflects the generation that came back from overseas, married late and whose children are now coming into the work force.

Those are three reasons why unemployment figures are high, Mr. Speaker. What the hon. gentleman did not point out is that we have created jobs at a faster rate than any other country in recent years. It is no great secret how to go about creating jobs. We can overheat the economy and have inflation back, then another deep recession six or nine months from now. That is the trouble with socialist policies, Mr. Speaker; they are not balanced. It is hard to argue with members of that Party. They are well intentioned and they are concerned about people; they have that human touch, secure in the knowledge that they will never have to be realistic about the cost of implementing a program.

Coming back to the question of coal, Mr. Speaker, I agree that pollution of the environment is a problem. We have been buying coal offshore but it is not so long ago since Japan was buying coal from British Columbia. Apart from the devastating harm the acid content does to the environment, I think the Hon. Member should understand, and does understand, that the marriage of convenience between social policy and free enterprise which is characteristic of this country, which works well when there is lots of money, does not work so well when there is not lots of money.

Mr. Kristiansen: Is that not free enterprise?

Mr. Mackasey: The other gentleman is getting into it. Don't spoil your lunch. Go back to sleep.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order, please. The Chair regrets to interrupt the Hon. Member but the time for questions has expired. We now resume debate.

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in the debate on the Budget presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) on February 15. It is an interesting Budget—a few things here and a few things there—but I do not see any general thrust in it at all. It does little to spur further recovery and does nothing to put the Government's financial house in order. Relative to the projections outlined in the 1983 Budget, spending, the deficit and interest costs are all up. This is a white paper Budget. Proposals are presented on mortgage protection, small business tax relief, profit sharing and pensions. These proposals are to be studied. They may or may not become reality but for the time being they give the appearance of action.

I looked at the Budget, Mr. Speaker, mainly to see what was in it for my constituents, the people of Haldimand-Norfolk, and I looked at youth. We know that there are hundreds of thousands of unemployed youth in the country. There are thousands in my own riding. The Budget says that creating jobs for Canada's youth is a priority, that the strength and vitality of our nation's youth depends on our young people. It also states that $150 million will be added to the $1 billion Youth Opportunity Fund announced in the Speech from the Throne.

I have two questions about that, Mr. Speaker. What is $150 million going to do? It is less than the amount the Minister used to cover up the leak in his last Budget when an opportunist TV cameraman took an opportune shot of it. The Minister casually added $200 million with a stroke of the pen in order to save his Budget and his neck. Does that mean we can assume that as far as the Minister is concerned the youth of the country mean less than his Budget or his neck? Let us be realistic, Mr. Speaker. Let us provide some permanent, long-term assistance and programs for the youth of the country.

We see that the Minister is going to continue his wage and price restraints. In his Budget Speech he said that the federal Government is firmly committed to continued wage and price restraint and that the existing policy of limiting increases in the prices that the federal Government sets and regulates will be continued for another year. He said as well that the guidelines will be reduced from 5 per cent to 4 per cent for this period and that mandatory wage controls in the public sector will not be extended. The Government is not firmly committed to continued wage and price controls, Mr. Speaker, but only to price restraint—and only price restraint that it sets and regulates.

The liquor and tobacco industries would be glad to have had their increases for the past year set at 4 per cent, Mr. Speaker. The 15.8 per cent tax increase on cigarettes imposed in September was a price that in my estimation the federal Government sets and regulates. What we have is a government that already breaks its promises before they are implemented. We have a government that is attempting to tax the liquor industry and the tobacco industry out of existence in this country without being concerned about the consequences to the people involved in those industries.

With respect to the question of tax increases, Mr. Speaker, let us look at the hidden agenda. The Budget of February 15 contained no major tax increase. It did not have to. From the Budget of April, 1983, Mr. Speaker, we have the following increases which are now taking effect for the 1984-1985 year: the special recovery tax, adding an additional $300 million; changes to the federal tax reduction, adding an additional $445 million; elimination of the standard $100 deduction, adding $180 million; deindexing of the child tax credit income threshold, adding $155 million; deindexing of the child exemption, adding $40 million; making the Canadian Ownership Special Charge permanent, adding $965 million, and the Unemployment Insurance Commission increase this year, Mr. Speaker, will add $45 million. If we were to carry that same hidden program to 1986-1987, we would come to a total for that year of an additional $5.654 billion. No, this Budget did not have to bring in tax increases; they are already there.

I come now to Revenue Canada, Mr. Speaker. We all know what Revenue Canada is; it is the Department that finds you guilty until proven innocent. Apparently it is going to change that. We are not going to be quite so guilty any more. That is the Department, you might recall, which has $800 an hour auditors; the Department which provides free meals for the auditors who bring in the biggest increases in a month; the Department which provides the day off for the financial collectors who collect the most money in a month. That Department is going to be kind to us now, Mr. Speaker. Individuals and corporations with federal taxes of $1,000 or less will no longer have to make quarterly tax instalments. This is a good step. This will assist those senior citizens who have wrongly been required to make quarterly instalments on earnings which, in most cases, do not arrive until the end of the year.

Second, that Department is going to pay up to $1,000 for the cost of a successful appeal by someone who is appealing his tax assessment. This is a start, Mr. Speaker, but anyone out there in the country who has had to appeal their assessment knows that $1,000 is not going to go very far. It will not even scratch the backs of their lawyers and accountants.

Third, taxpayers will be given the right to provide security rather than pay cash for taxes in dispute. What is the security? Who decides what that security is? Is it the same person who assesses your taxes or the person who is going to come out and collect your money? We need further details on that.

Steps have been taken toward cleaning up Revenue Canada, Mr. Speaker, but the Minister has a long way to go before it is clean enough for the taxpayers of this country.

There are provisions in the Budget for the senior citizens of this country. There is an increase of $50 in their guaranteed income supplement. That is a very positive step for those single female senior citizens who are living so far below the poverty line. However, the two $25 instalments, Mr. Speaker, instead of bringing them up to the level of luxury at which they should be, actually amounts to two increases over a year of 83 cents each per day. I question whether that will even buy those senior citizens a quart of milk.

I come now to an area, Mr. Speaker, which is close to the heart of a lot of us in Haldimand-Norfolk, and that is agriculture. I quote from the Minister's little book, Budget in brief, the section on agriculture:

> Farmers will now be able to invest up to $120,000 of taxable capital gains from the sale of a farm in an RRSP. The amount eligible will be $10,000 for every year they have farmed the land from 1972 to 1983. This will assist farmers to build better pensions for retirement.

Will it really, Mr. Speaker? On the surface it is quite a step, but what does it really mean when you get down to it? The $120,000 of capital gains rolled into an RRSP will, in reality, increase the cost of the farm. Before this measure, Mr. Speaker, if a farmer were to sell his farm in my area, he might take a $100,000 down payment on that farm. He would leave the remainder of the value of that farm in a mortgage, would take his $100,000, move into town, buy himself a home and establish himself. He is now told that he is allowed an additional $120,000 tax exemption on capital gains in an RRSP.

What that will do, Mr. Speaker, is force that farmer to save that $120,000. It will force him to up his ante for the down payment on his farm to something like $220,000 because he will still need that $100,000 to set up his new home in town, and he will need that additional $120,000 to put into an RRSP so he can avoid the taxes. What that will create, Mr. Speaker, is a problem for the young people who are trying to get into agriculture because it doubles the ante for a down payment.

There is a further spin-off to this, Mr. Speaker. We are talking in this Budget about stimulating the economy. We are talking about getting money into flow and yet at the same time we are telling farmers to save an additional $120,000 in an RRSP. We would be better off, Mr. Speaker, if we took out this capital gains on agriculture completely for bona fide farmers and allow them to have their money to spend in the economy, therefore helping to stimulate the economy of this country.

I note there will be something for part-time farmers or so-called "hobby farmers". The $5,000 loss provision will not be replaced by the realistic $20,000 provision, so what is the Government doing to assist part-time or so-called hobby farmers? We are told that a consultative working group will be established to assess the impact that such changes might have on the agriculture sector before any specific action is taken. I think that describes what this Budget is, Mr. Speaker—gone today, here tomorrow, if tomorrow ever comes. The riding of Haldimand-Norfolk, Mr. Speaker, is 75 per cent agricultural. I do not see anything in this Budget which is of any significant help to the people in that area. All I have seen this Government do in the past is hinder agriculture.

One of the major agricultural sectors in my riding, Mr. Speaker, is the tobacco industry. There are some 2,600 or 2,700 tobacco farmers in Canada. Probably 60 per cent of them are in Haldimand-Norfolk. It is an industry which provides some 18,000 full-time jobs and some 35,000 to 40,000 part-time seasonal jobs. It is an industry whose spin-offs are far-reaching to all parts of this country. It is an industry which provides tremendous export and has great potential for further export.

What has this Government done for that sector of agriculture? It has increased the tax on cigarettes so it now takes $1.14 billion per year in tax from that industry. That is an industry which only brings in, in comparison, $285 million to the growers. It appears to be then using that same money to turn around and wage its anti-smoking campaign in the country. The Government increased the taxation on cigarettes in this past year—a six and five year—by 15.8 per cent, thus pushing the price of a package of cigarettes in some areas, Mr. Speaker, to $2 or more. What does the grower receive for the tobacco which goes into that package of cigarettes? The grower gets six cents out of a $2-plus package of cigarettes. That is a good return?

The Government hopes that through its anti-smoking campaign it will reduce the number of cigarette smokers in Canada by 10 per cent. That means a reduction of 10 per cent in tobacco grown, a reduction of 10 per cent in tobacco growers, the loss of livelihood for some 260 to 300 farmers and the loss of some 2,000 permanent and 4,000 part-time jobs in Canada this year alone. If we are going to kill this golden goose, Mr. Speaker, why do we not at the same time take steps to help increase the export of this commodity to countries who do want it? When we take in $1.14 billion in tax from this commodity, why do we spend only $2 million at a research station to find crops for farmers who are forced out of tobacco? Why do we not put some $10 million into the research station at Delhi and find crops these people can move into when they are forced out of tobacco by this irresponsible Government?

I looked for something for the fisheries, Mr. Speaker, in this Budget. I have a lot of fishermen in my riding and over 50 boats go out of one port. Perch, smelt and yellow pickerel are a major industry. We have an $8 million a year market in Japan which went sour last year because of the dioxin scare and which has only recovered about 30 per cent now. We have fishermen and fish processing operations on the verge of bankruptcy. We have a potentially tremendous unemployment problem in southern Ontario because of this. What did I find in the Budget for the fishery, Mr. Speaker? I could not even find the word "fishery". There was nothing in the Budget for the fishing industry in my area which is in such serious difficulties.

I could go on and refer to the mortgage insurance program we have all been waiting so long to hear about. One critic had this to say about the program:

> Hours after Finance Minister Marc Lalonde proposed a mortgage insurance plan in his February 15 Budget speech, industry spokesmen hailed it as a pioneering attempt to protect homeowners against rising interest rates. But a sober second look has convinced many the plan is not quite the sweetheart deal it first appeared. Experts say the insurance costs too much, the pricing scheme makes no sense, and the plan encourages home owners to lock into longer term mortgages at higher rates which could cost them a bundle in the long run. Many say home owners would be better off to use the money to decrease the size of their mortgages and take advantage of lower interest rates available for one and three year mortgages.

Many examples are given, Mr. Speaker, of how this is actually costing us more money.

There are some good breaks for small business, but overall I think they are too little, too late. We need further incentives for small business to get this country going again.

What I do not see in the Budget is anything to help the 3.5 million Canadians under the age of 65 who live in poverty. There is nothing to help the handicapped or disabled, and no incentives for the voluntary sector. There are a lot of promises in a lot of areas and a lot of things that could happen in the future, which reinforces the fact that this Budget is nothing more than a white paper: Gone today and here tomorrow, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McRae: Mr. Speaker, I listened with care to what the Hon. Member had to say. I agree he has had some serious problems in his community, and I commend him for supporting the idea of more money for research into alternate crops for tobacco growers. However, I will leave that and ask him a question about the collection of taxes which he mentioned at one point. In my community, as I think in most communities across Canada, 70 per cent or 80 per cent of taxpayers pay tax at the source. They are wage earners and their concern is that taxes are a zero sum game. In other words, their taxes are collected at the source and they pay the full shot. They are very concerned that the Hon. Member and his Party are going to undermine the system. I agree with the Hon. Member that there are some bad cases which have to be looked into and changes made, but is he not concerned that we are undermining the Department and the way it functions. Therefore people who pay their full taxes at source, the wage earners, will be forced to pay more.

My second question deals with the tax commission of the Hon. Member's Party which is travelling around hearing complaints. Is that commission asking people making complaints if they will sign a document to allow the tax department also to say something about those complaints? It seems to me one gets only one side of the issue unless you get the tax department people into it. They are not able to comment simply because of the requirement for confidentiality which is very important. However, if individuals appearing before the commission are willing to sign a document allowing the tax department to give its side of the story, then I think it becomes fair. Otherwise it has a tendency to undermine the tax department.

Mr. Bradley: Mr. Speaker, as to the first question, I know the Hon. Member's concern about taxes paid at source. I have not seen any policy in our Party which will undermine that. Mind you, I do not write that policy. I am concerned with social development, women's issues and defence. However, if the Hon. Member wishes, I will have our finance spokesman search that out for him.

Pertaining to our being fair to the tax department, I do not find it fair when a restaurant owner in my riding is charged $1,500 in a tax reassessment. This is a person who did not oppose it, who felt he must have made an error and gave three cheques, one for immediate payment, one for payment two weeks later and one for the end of the following month. The first cheque was cashed, the second was cashed two weeks later and the next day, Saturday at noon, the collector came into his restaurant with the local sheriff, pushed the girl from the till and took the money because they did not want to wait the extra month. I do not call that fair to the people of this country. Until the tax department is fair to my constituents and Canadians in general, I do not think we have to be fair in our dealings with them. I feel we can be tough in our dealings with the department to correct these actions. Some of those actions have been corrected in this Budget and I thank the Minister for that, but there are many more corrections to come.

TOURISM

EFFECT OF TAXATION

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, you can kill the goose that laid the golden egg. The tourist industry was going to be, and still could be, the shot in our economic arm which many of our communities need. However, heavy taxation in such areas as gasoline, wines, and spirits makes Canada too expensive a place to spend a vacation.

Grape and wine production were part of our growth industry. First, there was the harassment of grape producers in the taxation of hybrid grape production. Were they capital expenses or were they part of the deductions? This caused confusion, irritation, and delay. Then came the decline in wine sales attributed to increased federal and provincial taxes, a poor economic climate, and mostly low-priced imports.

The St. Catharines Chamber of Commerce has called for a curb on what they call "exorbitant and inflationary" taxes. Its policy statements say these increased taxes can only have a damaging effect on the tourist industry. The Government is, in effect, driving the prices of dining, drinking, and entertainment beyond the reach of local residents and visitors alike. Even worse, the current situation has led to the very first lay-off in a local winery. Is this the way the Government proposes to build the economy of the country?

BILINGUALISM

POSITION OF LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Mr. Gaston Gourde (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition has accustomed Canadians to the most incredible inconsistencies in his statements. Last year, on June 13, he said in the newspaper Le Droit that he, as Leader, would speak for the Party and that he would tolerate no dissent on the major issues facing Canadians. Subsequently, last fall, the Leader of the Opposition supported the position taken by the Liberal Party on bilingualism in Manitoba, and then in February of this year, two Progressive Conservative Members created the McKenzie-Stewart Fund to show their opposition to bilingualism in Canada. The Leader of the Opposition then tried to have us believe he had made them see reason and that the Progressive Conservative Caucus was now unanimous on this issue. Then, still in February, the Leader of the Opposition supported a second motion on safeguarding the rights of Franco-Manitobans, this time without the support of the Progressive Conservative Members from that Province. Now the Opposition Leader has stated that in the name of freedom of opinion, he is prepared to tolerate dissent but that his Party is unanimous on the issue. Moreover, and the gesture reeks of hypocrisy, the Progressive Conservative Leader is supporting the nomination of Bob Sherman as the Progressive Conservative candidate in next federal election in Winnipeg, the same Mr. Sherman who was one of the fiercest opponents of the legislation to safeguard the rights of Franco-Manitobans. The Progressive Conservative Leader has a long way to go before he puts his money where his mouth is. Former Leader Robert Stanfield must be very unhappy to see that the present Leader has succeeded but not replaced him. Francophones and Canadians in general will remember the Leader of the Opposition. They will remember his pretty speeches, but also the inaction of the hon. gentleman who was the subject of a caricature not long ago in the newspaper Le Soleil—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Hon. Member's time has expired.

EMPLOYMENT

SPECIAL EMPLOYMENT INITIATIVES PROGRAM—FUNDING SOUGHT FOR PORT COLBORNE PROJECT

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, over the past five years I have been working closely with the City of Port Colborne, regarding improvements to facilities connected with the Welland Canal which passes through the heart of that city. This waterway is not only a key component of the St. Lawrence Seaway, but is a scenic tourist attraction.

Specifically, I am referring to the proposed weir crossing which would help to provide flood protection to the downtown for a cost of roughly $6 million, or one-thirtieth the cost of a budget leak. In my most recent attempt to assist with this project I contacted the Minister of Transport (Mr. Axworthy) on June 20, 1983. I received a quick reply on October 24 of the same year. I was told that no federal money was available for the project.

Lately there has been quite a bit of talk regarding the Special Employment Initiatives Program which has been of great benefit to selected ridings. Perhaps the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Roberts) would give some thought to diverting some of this funding into my riding to fund the above project, which I feel to be worthwhile and necessary. I believe the time has come for Erie and other Niagara ridings to benefit from the Special Employment Initiatives Program.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS

NATIONAL SINGLE PARENTS DAY PROPOSAL

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland): Mr. Speaker, nearly 40 per cent of Canadian first marriages now end in divorce. Many people live in a single parent situation, either separated, widowed, or never married. These conscientious single parents are endeavouring to bring their children to healthy maturity with the same prospects for normal adulthood as children who mature within a two-parent family unit.

The single parent in our society is isolated to some degree and must contend with the difficulties of providing, both for themselves and their children, a reasonable equivalent of normal family life. I suggest that Members of the House establish March 21 as National Single Parents Day in Canada in honour of all the single parents who are doing such a difficult task single handedly.

AGRICULTURE

CALL FOR MEASURES TO INCREASE FARM INCOME

Mr. Laverne Lewycky (Dauphin-Swan River): Mr. Speaker, times are tough these days on the small family farm. High interest rates have severely weakened the agricultural sector. Grain prices are declining and Statistics Canada is projecting a 26 per cent drop in realized income this year over 1983 for my home Province of Manitoba.

Farming is not like most other businesses. The whole family pitches in, often on a daily basis, to do the work on the farm. Women on the farm have not received the financial recognition due to them because incomes on the farm have been so low. This has made it almost impossible for them to take advantage of the recent changes which have been allowed for a salary for spouses on a farm and the opportunity to contribute to the Canada Pension Plan.

We must address this depressed income situation on two fronts, a reduction in cost through elimination of the tax on farm fuel and more low-cost money for FCC, and improved incomes with measures such as changes to the Western Grain Stabilization Plan.

Women who are partners in most farm operations have a right to compensation. During International Women's Week we should pay tribute to their work and consider ways to improve farm incomes for all of the farm family.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

COMPENSATION FOR VICTIMS OF CRIME

Mr. Garnet M. Bloomfield (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, today I would like to inform the House of the Danny Edwards case. In 1981 this young man from my area of Ontario was shot in the spine by two robbers while he was working as a variety store clerk. Evidence has shown that he offered no resistance, and was brutally kicked following the shooting. He is apparently paralysed for life. The assailants, who both had criminal records and were free on parole at the time of the shooting, were subsequently captured, convicted, and each sentenced to 17 years' imprisonment. About three months ago the sentences were reduced to 14 years, which means they could be eligible for parole by late 1986.

This 18 year old, Danny Edwards, was gunned down by hardened criminals, their crime leaving him a prisoner of his own paralysed body, confined to a wheel chair for the rest of his life. How much time will his assailants serve? At the most 14 years, and if paroled, probably less than five years. Just consider the difference—probably 60 years of paralysis for the victim, and possibly only five years of imprisonment for the criminals who savagely caused that handicap. Obviously, justice has not been served.

I feel that this case candidly illustrates the urgent need to enact legislation that will allow the courts to award compensation to the victims of crime, and to impose tougher sentences. I therefore urge all Members to strive for rapid passage of Bill C-19 to allow compensation for crime victims and stiffer sentences for offenders.

SOCIAL SECURITY

PLIGHT OF SINGLE WOMEN BETWEEN AGES 60 TO 65 YEARS

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, in his recent Budget the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) stated that "pensions are the principal lifeline Canadians have to economic security in their retirement years". Judging by his proposals for pension reform it would appear that the Minister is unwilling to extend this lifeline to the tens of thousands of women presently sentenced to a life of poverty. I speak of those women in the lost age bracket between 60 and 65, who have little or no personal incomes and have lost their husbands, yet are ineligible for pensions.

● (1410)

Rather than spend the $150 million necessary to extend the spouse's allowance to assist those most in need, as recommended by the all-party parliamentary task force on pension reform, the Government has chosen to direct $300 million through a revised system of registered retirement savings plans to those presently earning over $55,000 a year. As a result, twice the amount of money is being spent, yet those people who really need help will not benefit by one penny.

The facts confirming the desperate plight of widowed women between the ages of 60 and 64 were made public by the task force, yet the Minister of Finance did not turn his attention to these people, and neither did the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin).

Like so many other provisions in the Budget, the pension reform proposals show that the Liberal Government has got its priorities all wrong.

Mr. Speaker: I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member, but his time has expired.

HUMAN RIGHTS

U.S.S.R.—PLIGHT OF UKRAINIAN POET, MYKOLA HORBAL

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Mr. Speaker, Canadians of Ukrainian descent wish to bring to the attention of this House the plight of Mykola Horbal, Ukrainian poet, composer, and musician, who is currently serving a five-year prison sentence in the Soviet Union.

In 1971 Mr. Horbal was arrested on charges of "anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda". The sole evidence brought against him was a poem Duma, written by Horbal, in condemnation of the absence of fundamental human rights and freedoms in the Ukraine. For this poem he was officially sentenced to five years of imprisonment in hard labour camps, and two years in exile.

After his release from prison, Horbal was continually harassed, to the point where he applied for an exit visa to the United States, where he has relatives who are willing to support him. The application for an exit visa led to a fabricated criminal offence, and to a further five years of imprisonment in hard labour camps.

The latest information Ukrainian Canadians have concerning Mykola Horbal is that in 1982 he was transferred to Novodanylivtsi prison camp in the Mykolaiv region of the Ukraine. Nothing has been heard of him since.

Canadians of Ukrainian descent are deeply concerned about the state of Mykola Horbal. His story illustrates yet again the open violation of basic human rights by the U.S.S.R. which is, ironically, a signatory to the human rights declaration of the United Nations.

I urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen), on behalf of the Ukrainian Church community, to voice our Government's protest to the Government of the U.S.S.R. and to use all possible diplomatic channels to ensure the observance of the Declaration of Human Rights.

Mr. Speaker: I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member, but his time has expired.

LABOUR RELATIONS

DOUBLE STAFFING URGED FOR ALL-NIGHT CONVENIENCE STORES

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I rise with an urgent plea to put a stop to the killing and the crippling of this nation's youth who staff all-night convenience stores.

We need tough laws to shut down these operations between the hours of 12 midnight and 6 a.m. At the very least, Mr. Speaker, we need regulations to ensure the presence of two persons, one being an adult, in all 24-hour stores across Canada.

Something must be done to prevent 17 and 18 years old kids from being left alone and exposed to terrorizing experiences at the hands of the sick and ruthless criminal element in our society.

I realize that convenience stores are subject to municipal by-laws, and that their employees are administered by provincial Departments of Labour. And so, this may not be the proper forum to raise this issue in that there is nothing that we, as federal Members of Parliament, can do directly to correct this worsening situation.

What I can do is commend the proprietors of Mississauga's Mac's and Becker's milk stores for shutting down their 24-hour operations in the wake of two recent horrible incidents of killing and maiming lone teenaged employees.

What we can do is urge all provincial Ministers of Labour to amend their laws to make it mandatory for employers to double-staff all convenience stores, with appropriate security measures.

The bottom line is that there cannot be, there must not be any more teenage tragedies like Nizam Ali or Barbara Turnbull through the neglect of legislators.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

REQUEST FOR RENEWED DESIGNATION OF SEPT-ÎLES-PORT-CARTIER REGION OF QUEBEC

Mr. André Maltais (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, over the past years, the federal Government has done a great deal for the North Shore through its designated areas program. However, designation of the areas in question was terminated a year ago. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether the Canadian Government could once more designate the Sept-Îles-Port-Cartier and Schefferville regions, because I believe the Labrador City-Wabush area is to be designated shortly. Because of the Iron Ore Company, there have been more lay-offs in the last six months than during the two years when the Sept-Îles-Port-Cartier-Schefferville area was designated.

Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I saw Father Mongeau who was in Schefferville for a long time and is now here in our Gallery. We discussed this point, and once more, I think it would be important to have not only the Canadian Government but also the Quebec Government involved in the designated area program. During the last few years, the Quebec Government has never been involved together with the Canadian Government in helping to resolve the problems being experienced by the people in Canada's North.

Mr. Speaker, for all the reasons I have just mentioned, I think it would be important to designate again the entire area that is suffering as a result of the present iron ore situation.

PROVINCIAL AFFAIRS

EFFECT OF BRITISH COLUMBIA BUDGET ON WOMEN'S SERVICES

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, the Social Credit Government in British Columbia has declared war on women in its last two Budgets.

Women of all ages are the target. The 23 Seniors Day Centres had their funding eliminated, student aid has been chopped, and the Vancouver Transition House, which has been a haven for ten years for battered women, is up for tenders. The Social Credit-Conservative style Budgets also cut community clinics by 27 per cent, eliminated the Vancouver Women's Health Collective; will probably cut funding completely to the Vancouver Status of Women, has cut funding to planned parenthood groups, has cut funding to daycare, and to disabled persons.

The B.C. Budget did not even mention the word unemployment yet it penalizes singles, and childless couples under 25 who are getting $25 cut from their welfare cheques. There will be a surtax of 8 per cent on personal income tax, called the health care maintenance tax, as well as a health care levy, and user fees. The war against women has just begun in British Columbia.

By cutting social service programs, cutting unionized women in the public sector, cutting programs for legal aid, cutting programs for the disabled, and for daycare, the Social Credit Government is demonstrating the true contempt for women which underlines modern conservatism. If you do not believe me, Mr. Speaker, just ask Maureen McTeer.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE ECONOMY

ECONOMIC FORECASTS—REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT IMPLEMENT NEW MEASURES

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question, in the absence of Mr. John Turner, is for the Minister of Finance.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Yesterday the Minister of State for Finance indicated that he was satisfied with the state of the economy. The Minister will know that capacity utilization rates in manufacturing are still 10 percentage points less than the level they were before the recession. He will know that business fixed investment fell by 4.3 per cent in the last quarter of 1983. He knows from Statistics Canada that there is no revival in machinery and equipment outlays.

In view of these and other alarming facts that I related yesterday, will the Minister tell the House whether he is now revising his forecasts for economic activity for this year? Will the Minister also tell the House when he will take some new steps that might affect the economy positively, as is now most certainly required?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is the same question as was asked yesterday. The same answer applies. As far as the last point raised by the Hon. Member is concerned, those steps were taken in the Budget of February 15.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, this Minister is just as useless in his answers as the Minister was yesterday if he is going to give the same answer as yesterday.

STATISTICS CANADA PROJECTIONS—REQUEST THAT SALES TAX INCREASE BE CANCELLED

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, the people of Canada want to know whether the Minister is going to bring in a Budget that will have a positive effect on the Canadian economic scene, not a Budget that has no effect, as the Minister did.

In view of the fact that on March 2 Statistics Canada reported that consumer demand appears likely to slow in the first quarter of this year, and that work put in place will remain weak in the first quarter of 1984, is the Minister prepared to take steps to bring in some measures that will affect positively these weaknesses? Will the Minister at least remove the sales tax increase which is supposed to come into effect in October?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I want to remind the Hon. Member that the Budget that was introduced contained a number of positive measures which were taken, bearing in mind the background figures which have been referred to by the Hon. Member. Those figures have not been published yet, but the forecasts that we have produced are the forecasts upon which we worked in the Department of Finance and which have guided us in the decisions that we came to in the Budget.

As far as the other points raised by the Hon. Member are concerned, they were answered yesterday.

• (1420)

Mr. Crosbie: I can understand that the Minister has nothing to say about the miserable state of the economy or what he is going to do.

AMOUNT OF CAPITAL OUTFLOWS

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, it is reported that Canada lost $6.6 billion in unrecorded capital flows last year. It is speculated by Statistics Canada officials that these errors and omissions seem to have gone to finance illegal drugs, U.S. real estate, and stocks. In other words, the Government is driving Canadians to the cocaine trade, Florida real estate, or shady offshore tax havens.

Would the Minister tell the House what is his analysis of this $6.6 billion in unrecorded capital cash flows last year? Why is this occurring? What steps does he plan to take to stop these flows, certainly for the purposes indicated by Statistics Canada officials?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, obviously I will not speculate on speculations by officials. The only thing I can say is that the mean means tester is still at work.

EXCHANGE RATE ON DOLLAR

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, now that our dollar is at 79.5 cents, the chickens are coming home to roost. The international market has made a judgment as to the management of the economy by the Government. Is the Government going to increase interest rates to attract hot money into Canada and so make our dollar appear good, or is it going to allow the dollar to continue to depreciate and take the brunt of the criticism for a falling dollar?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member had better make up his mind whether he wants the dollar to go up or down. I have indicated what the policy is and has been. It is to let the market decide the value of the Canadian dollar. This is the policy which has been followed by the Government for over ten years.

Mr. Crosbie: What about the Bank of Canada?

Mr. Lalonde: And the Bank of Canada. It has been a policy which has served our country well. I suggest that we maintain that policy.

There may be some people like the Hon. Member who are concerned about some depreciation of the dollar. I know many other Canadians, particularly in the forest and mining industries, who have claimed quite vociferously recently that the Canadian dollar had been over-valued as a matter of fact compared with the yen, the Japanese currency, and with European currencies. As the Hon. Member knows, over the last year, for instance, the Canadian dollar increased by about 10 per cent in value over European currencies. Many sectors in the Canadian economy have argued that the Canadian dollars could do better, that the Canadian economy could do well in many sectors by being able to compete better against European and Japanese products. There are pros and cons on both sides of the issue. I can understand my friend being unable to make up his mind, except that he appears to be negative on both sides.

Mr. Blenkarn: I have no problem making up my mind. When the Hon. Member for St. John's West was Minister of Finance, our dollar went up to 87.5 cents. We know where we stand; we would have a strong economy.

GOVERNMENT POLICY ON INTEREST RATES

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, the last time the dollar went out of reach and down into the 79-cent area, the Government came to the rescue, propped up interest rates, drove all sorts of people into bankruptcy, and put all sorts of people out of work. Will the Government give us an undertaking that it will not do that kind of thing again, that it will not use cosmetic increases of interest rates in order to make the country look good, the Government look good, and the Minister look good at the forthcoming convention? Will the Government give us that undertaking?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I fail to see how jacking up interest rates would make us look good at the convention. This may be a Tory policy. My friend referred to when the Hon. Member for St. John's West was Minister of Finance. At that time he was asked about high interest rates and he said, as reported on page 1380 of Hansard for November 15, 1979:

—it is a condition that the government cannot do anything about at the moment. It is not through choice.

This is what that Member had to say when he was Minister of Finance. I have indicated the attitude and the policy of this Government. We will pursue our consistent policy in that regard.

NUCLEAR ARMAMENTS

CRUISE MISSILE TESTING—REQUEST THAT AGREEMENT WITH UNITED STATES BE TERMINATED

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, Martin Luther said long ago: "If Adam had seen in a vision the horrible instruments his children were to invent, he would have died of grief." My question is directed to the Prime Minister on this dark day of Canadian history, a day that in recent hours of Cruise missile testing has seen the death of any claim that Canada is not involved in the nuclear arms race.

There is one ray of hope. Will the Prime Minister, now that the Pentagon has had its way on this occasion, begin negotiations immediately to end the Cruise missile testing agreement with the United States?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the Hon. Member is addressing herself to the future, my understanding is that this is the only test that will take place this year. I sincerely hope that before another test is necessary or is made in Canada, immense progress will be made in the direction that I believe both she and I wish; in other words, that there would be real steps taken toward control and reduction of nuclear arms.

Ms. Jewett: I share the Prime Minister's hope. We would all be reassured, however, if he would now enter into negotiations with the United States to take Canada out of its nuclear role.

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER NEGOTIATE ENDING OF AGREEMENT

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, does the Prime Minister not think that testing is an integral part or link in the chain—testing, production, deployment of nuclear weapons? If he agrees with that, will he not therefore seek to end the Cruise missile testing agreement?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is asking for an answer now. I just indicated in my first reply that there is a considerable amount of time available to see if further progress is made between the superpowers and the other nuclear powers. I note that the Hon. Member says she would be reassured if, and so on. I would want to point out to her that the purpose of the operation is not to reassure her. I really ask the question, if she believes the Government's credibility is impinged by the decision we took, who it is impinged with? After all, it does not make us more credible with our NATO allies if we decide to test the Cruise. They are not only part of the double-track decision, but the majority of them will be involved in the possession and deployment of nuclear arms themselves, which Canada will not as of July 1. It will not increase our credibility with them to stop testing the Cruise. It may reduce our credibility if they think we are falling back on a NATO commitment.

As far as our credibility with Warsaw Pact countries is concerned, I know from experience—because I have visited three of them in recent weeks, as the hon. lady knows—that they find we are credible and I am credible because Canada is a member of NATO, and a member in good standing. If we were neutral, non-aligned, non-members of NATO, not in good standing with NATO, I can assure her that they would have been less inclined to listen seriously to my message.

CANADA'S ROLE IN NATO

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I preface my final supplementary question by reminding the Prime Minister that on numerous occasions he has said that Cruise testing has nothing to do with a NATO request, nothing to do with the two-track decision, nothing to do with any NATO commitments—nothing whatsoever. He has said that himself.

Canada's honour is at stake. Will the Prime Minister admit as well that the majority of NATO members, Norway for example—indeed all NATO members—are free to choose the nature of their role in the alliance, nuclear or non-nuclear, and that Canada in the past, will he not agree, had decided on a non-nuclear role at least as far as our forces in Europe are concerned? Will he not therefore see that by testing the Cruise we are going against that non-nuclear role? Therefore I ask him again: will he not bring Canada back to its traditions, to its honour, and not play a nuclear role in this world?

• (1430)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there are perhaps more elements in the question than I can deal with, but I would want to point out that the short answer is no. The testing of the Cruise does not make Canada a nuclear country, or does not make its army, navy, or air force armed with nuclear forces, any more than the fact that we will in certain circumstances let United States aircraft overfly Canada with nuclear arms. We do permit our allies, notably Germany and Britain, to test aircraft in Canada that are nuclear-capable. This does not make us a nuclear power. Therefore, I am answering that part of the Hon. Member's question.

In so far as the two-track decision which she is referring to is concerned, you can argue one of two things. Either this guidance system is to test cruises which will be part of the two-track decision, the GLCM, the ground-launched Cruise missiles, either you argue that the guidance system is for those and therefore is part of the two-track decision, or you argue, and I think incorrectly, that the guidance system is only for the air launched, the ALCM's, in which case it would seem that the Hon. Member would have to agree that this is probably the safest form of the triad.

The Hon. Member shakes her head. She has not heard my argument, but I think she should reflect on it. The ALCM's, if those are the ones she is saying we are testing for, are the only ones of the nuclear deterrents that can be recalled. You cannot recall a submarine-launched ICBM, and you cannot recall an ICBM which is ground-launched, but you can recall the B-52s which will be travelling several hours before launching the air-launched Cruise missiles. Therefore, they are the best possible and safest possible of the whole array of dangerous weapons. They are the ones that will not permit an error because they can be recalled if they have been launched in error.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

SPECIAL RECOVERY CAPITAL PROJECTS PROGRAM—EMPLOYEES DETERMINING PRIORITIES

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development. It refers to the colossal porkbarrel known as the Special Recovery Capital Projects Program. Will the Minister confirm that the secretariat administering that program does not operate out of his own Department but, indeed, reports directly to Cabinet through Senator Keith Davey, and that the key employees engaged in determining priorities under that program are former government employees presently operating under contract? If so, will he table for the examination of all Members an indication of which of these employees have long distance telephone credit cards, car rental cards, government codes, expense accounts, and the like? In other words, will the Minister indicate the extent to which government employees are being paid massive contract amounts to administer this program if they are trusted political friends of the Government?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I will begin with reference to the porkbarrel. It is curious that the Hon. Member for Richmond-South Delta would raise that since there is a very significant project in his own riding at the Vancouver airport. I look to the riding of the Hon. Member for Vancouver Centre. I see she is not with us today. There is something like $41.9 million in that porkbarrel for Vancouver Centre. Looking on from there, I see Vancouver Quadra, and I think the Hon. Member for Vancouver Quadra might be here, $15 million in Vancouver Quadra. I go over to the Island to Esquimalt-Saanich. The Hon. Member for Esquimalt-Saanich is here. He is not blushing, I hope, about receiving $8.5 million for the graving dock improvements in Esquimalt. I see the Hon. Member for Hillsborough sitting here, to go to the other end of the country, $14.5 million for the veterinary college in Charlottetown. I do not hear him saying that he would not like the project there. I note that the Leader of the Opposition is not present. It is interesting that we have a $25.9 million project in Central Nova, Ferguson Industries Ltd. of Pictou. Just so this will be completely non-partisan, I see the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-North Centre is here.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

EMPLOYMENT

ADVERTISING CAMPAIGN

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Mr. Speaker, we can see that one particular potential leadership candidate is dumb to the questions that are asked in this House. I would like to try another, if I might. Will the Minister of Employment and Immigration confirm that a Mr. Zarry, who was formerly a government employee, No. 1 in the telephone directory, is also being paid under a substantial contract to prepare a $20 million—

Mr. Speaker: Order, this kind of questions should be placed on the Order Paper, asking whether or not—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: A Minister cannot be expected to confirm whether one individual is or is not under term.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Does he know?

Mr. Speaker: Will the Hon. Member for Esquimalt-Saanich please observe order?

It is a well established practice of this House that questions relating to an individual in that level of detail should go on the Order Paper. The Hon. Member may want to rephrase his supplementary.

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, just to be concise, in this case the Minister well knows of the individual involved, because in government circles this advertising campaign is called the "Roberts Campaign". I wonder if he would confirm that he is spending $20 million of taxpayers' money in order to promote himself for the leadership of the Liberal Party.

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL REVENUE

REQUEST THAT INCOME TAX REFUNDS BE PAID PROMPTLY

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. I am very concerned about the growing number of Canadians who have to resort to discounting of their income tax refunds. Tax officials say there will be some 300,000 this year as against 150,000 last year. The majority of these people who have to forfeit some part of their income tax refund are really the working poor, single parent mothers, people who need that money urgently and who know that their refunds are going to be held up. What steps is the Minister of National Revenue taking to ensure that these people get their income tax refunds just as quickly as possible so that they do not have to resort to the discriminatory practice of tax discounting?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the Hon. Member for her question. First of all, I can inform the House that this year, all our audit programs are proceeding according to schedule, and that we have already made improvements in the processing of income tax returns. I can also inform the Hon. Member that simplified return forms are processed on a priority basis, and that in most cases, these are from single persons who often are entitled to a tax credit. If these people complete their tax returns early and send them in as soon as possible, it is very likely their returns will be processed quickly and they will receive their tax refunds quickly as well.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

TAX REFUND DISCOUNTING PRACTICE

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate affairs who was here just a moment ago. Possibly she could come back into the House. My supplementary question dealing with income tax discounting is directed to that Minister. From all reports I am getting, the matter is hitting hardest, may I say, at single-parent mothers who are seeking their child tax credits. Perhaps I could just describe to the Minister the situation in this regard.

● (1440)

A single-parent mother with three children who may be living on welfare could be getting a child tax credit of $1,000, but an income tax discounter will take $150 of that away. However, she is the last person in the world who should lose that amount of money. Because the Minister sets the regulations in this regard, I would like to ask her if she is concerned about this practice and to ask about what steps she is trying to take to see that these injustices are not allowed to be perpetrated.

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am concerned about and aware of this matter. In fact I have had a rather lengthy meeting with the anti-poverty organization on this very issue, and I think the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands is quite right. There is something wrong with a system that allows for this kind of a practice. Therefore, I am actively considering ways we can overcome the problem.

In the meantime, I have been advised that the project which I suggested with some of the credit unions which are providing this service is actually under way and these credit unions are not taking advantage of the interest as are the tax discount rebaters. There are ways of getting around this problem and I am very pleased that the credit unions have decided to take some constructive action. As well, I am looking at other ways to find some solutions to this particular problem. It is, I feel, quite wrong.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE'S SELF-GOVERNMENT REGULATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. The special committee on Indian self-government recommended that the federal Government commit itself to constitutional entrenchment of self-government as soon as possible.

Yesterday, in the Government's official response to the report, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development dodged this issue and said that it was one which only the Prime Minster could deal with. If the federal Government does stand by, it will not be an innocent bystander. It cannot be neutral on this issue.

Will the federal Government be an active and out front advocate of constitutional entrenchment of self-government in this week's constitutional talks? If not, why not?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot say what the final position of the Government will be because we are discussing that currently in Cabinet and in cabinet committee. Obviously, I will have to have those discussions finished by Thursday morning, and I can assure the Hon. Member that I will state the government position at that point as clearly as I can.

REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my supplementry question is also directed to the Prime Minister and relates to a similar matter. In spite of continuous government promises to end Indian Act discrimination against Indian women, yesterday's response indicated only that the Government is giving consideration to this matter. When will the Government stop considering and start acting? When will it table legislation that will end this discrimination? Will this legislation, when tabled, have an adequate timetable so that it can be considered properly, both in the House and in committee, or does the Government intend to leave this issue to be settled by the courts?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member would know that the Government has taken the position that this discrimination was ended by the Charter of Rights that, under the leadership of this Government, was adopted by Parliament and made part of the Constitution. He will also know that last year, at the constitutional conference on aboriginal rights, we took a further amendment on the subject.

The Government is prepared to do as it said it would in the first Speech from the Throne of this Parliament, which is to abolish that discrimination. I believe it has been abolished by the Charter of Rights, but I am open to persuasion to take further steps, and these will be discussed at the First Ministers' and Aboriginal Conference taking place on Thursday and Friday.

BILINGUALISM

MINORITY RIGHTS IN MANITOBA—INQUIRY RESPECTING INTRODUCTION OF RESOLUTIONS IN PARLIAMENT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. Considering the political defeat suffered by the Manitoba Bill to provide a minimum of protection of minority rights for Franco-Manitobans, and also considering the constitutional deadlock caused by the refusal of certain groups, including the Manitoba Progressive Conservative Party, to enshrine, in the Constitution of that Province, rights that derive from the most elementary justice; considering that in the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada, the number of dissenters on the language issue is increasing daily and that these dissenters have even been absolved of their sins by the Leader, could the Prime Minister inform the House whether the Government intends to introduce a resolution in Parliament, in accordance with Section 43(b) of the Constitution Act, 1982, concerning amendments with respect to the use of French and English in certain provinces?

Finally, could the Prime Minister inform the House whether he intends to go to court, to the Supreme Court of Canada, to determine the exact implications of Section 23 of the Manitoba Act?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member accurately pointed out the two avenues that are open to the Government, the first being a constitutional resolution, anticipating one by Manitoba. The Hon. Member will recall that the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Roberts) stated that this was an option we would consider seriously. The Hon. Member is, of course, aware that such a resolution would also have to be adopted by Manitoba. In any event it is an option we are considering. The other alternative is to go before the Supreme Court. In any case, this option will probably be taken because the Bilodeau case is now before the Supreme Court, and the federal Government will want to take part in the discussion. We may therefore decide to opt for one or the other or perhaps for both. This is a matter I intend to put before Cabinet in a week or two, as soon as possible, and I will be happy to give the Hon. Member further details should he so request at a later date.

MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS

QUEBEC MUNICIPALITIES—NEGOTIATIONS OF AGREEMENT ON FEDERAL GOVERNMENT GRANTS

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The Minister is aware that 1,250 Quebec municipalities are very anxious to hear the federal Government's decision on this agreement which has been pending for well over a year, and I am referring to an agreement under which municipalities would be able to receive federal grants, a federal-provincial agreement, of course. Could the Minister inform the House today, and I have discussed the matter with him before, whether officials on both sides are now agreed on the principle and whether the Canadian Government will be able to announce very shortly that an agreement will be signed?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I believe we are very close to an agreement. Talks among senior officials took place last week, and there is still a slight difference of opinion. I am writing to the Quebec Minister to prepare our final policy, but, as the Hon. Member is aware, there is a new Minister in the Provincial Cabinet, namely, Mr. Marcoux, and I intend to write to him today or tomorrow. I expect to receive an answer as soon as possible.

REQUEST FOR CONFIRMATION OF DATE OF SIGNING OF AGREEMENT

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, the Minister and a number of Quebec Members are aware of the importance of this question. Could the Minister give the House the assurance that he will do everything in his power to have this agreement signed before the opening of the Quebec National Assembly's session, considering the fact that the municipalities are very concerned about Bill 38 which has been tabled in the National Assembly? In the circumstances, could the Minister confirm, and I am sure millions of Quebecers will be overjoyed, that he will do what he can to have this agreement signed before the provincial session resumes?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will do my best to take action as soon as possible, as soon as next week, if the Government of Quebec agrees with the latest proposals I intend to send them tomorrow. It is up to the Province of Quebec to say it agrees! However, with a new Minister, I am not sure they will be as keen as we are. However, I will personally do my best. From tomorrow on, it will be up to the Government of Quebec.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

PRICE OF GASOLINE—REPORTED EFFECT OF MONOPOLY

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, it has been brought to my attention, and to the attention of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, that major oil company refineries, including Petro-Canada, are collectively setting prices at the refinery gates by signing 15 year reciprocal contracts with each other. As well, the refineries are signing agreements with retailers which will allow the refineries to set the retail price of gas at the pumps in return for a guaranteed profit.

I wonder if the Minister would confirm today's story on Broadcast News which quotes a national automotive trade association report as stating that Canadian motorists are paying 6 cents per litre, or 27 cents per gallon, too much, because of monopoly in the retail of gasoline, which is getting worse as the days go on.

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have not heard the broadcast so I cannot confirm or deny the statement. I will take every opportunity to examine the truth of the statement, however. In the meantime I would advise the Hon. Member that an inquiry is under way and all of this information is being fed into that inquiry.

Mr. Domm: Mr. Speaker, it is as a result of this inquiry that I raised the question today. In January this year I asked the Minister the same question, and at that time she said she would respond to me or the House within two months. It is two months since January. Her exact words were, as reported at page 918 of Hansard: "We expect a report from the Commission within a couple of months."

REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister. Now that she knows that the prices are set at the refinery gates she should know that they are also set at the pumps by the refineries, and now that she knows that Petro-Canada is part of that combine that is fixing the prices and gouging the Canadian consumer, will she do something and not spend another $70 million of taxpayers' dollars in order to fund a commission when she knows, as the Minister responsible, from her own officials, exactly what is going on in price fixing in the oil industry today?

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is taking his usual simplistic approach to matters. He knows very well that this is an extremely complicated issue and that is why the oil inquiry is taking such a long time. I can assure him that I am as impatient as he is. He also knows that this is a quasi-judicial body which I must observe at arm's length, as he must. We will all have to be patient. I can assure him, however, that from all the reports that I have received thus far this is going to be a very comprehensive report that will come into our hands.

Mr. Domm: What about Petro-Canada?

CANADA PENSION PLAN

ELIGIBILITY CRITERIA

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the friendly Minister of National Health and Welfare. As of January 1984, the Government of what was formerly the "Belle Province" amended its pension plan to allow individuals who have reached the age of sixty and are no longer on the labour market to receive benefits under the Quebec plan, subject to a penalty, which is not the case for the Canada Pension Plan. It means that an Ontario resident, after working for the Government in Hull or Quebec throughout his life, will be able to take advantage of the benefits of the Quebec Pension Plan, while another Government employee who resides in Quebec or Hull but works in Ottawa will not be able to take advantage of the same privileges, even if he has lived in Quebec all his life.

Could the Minister inform the House whether this is part of a federal-provincial agreement, and if so, does the Minister intend to conclude another agreement to correct this discrepancy and prevent the kind of injustice that is inflicted every day on residents in the Outaouais area who have been held hostage for some time by a Quebec government that is now complicating their lives, with some malevolence?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Complicate is perhaps the word, Mr. Speaker, because I have just found out that it takes two Quebec ministers to deal with me on health issues alone, and I say this without arrogance, of course. To answer the question about Ontario residents working in Quebec who benefit from advantages that Quebecers working here have yet to receive, I would say yes, but by a different route, because this summer the Minister of Finance and myself are going to propose to the Provinces that we amend the Canada Pension Plan to allow people to retire at an earlier age, for instance, sixty, it being understood that pension plan benefits would be prorated over five years more, which is exactly what is being done right now in Quebec.

EMPLOYMENT

RETRAINING OF WOMEN AFFECTED BY TECHNOLOGICAL CHANGE

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. While technological change promises wealth, it also threatens job security for many Canadians, particularly women. One of the ways to meet the challenge of technological change is through training. Women are under represented in training programs, however; 24 per cent of training spaces are available to women, while they constitute 42 per cent of the labour force.

I should like to ask the Minister whether he is prepared to apply affirmative action principles to training in order to assure equal access for women to training and a fair chance at benefits from the technological change process.

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we already do that, and we take a variety of steps to try to ensure that affirmative action in our training programs is extended to women.

Miss MacDonald: What a failure!

Mr. Roberts: This is particularly so in areas of training which have not been traditionally been available. The recommendation which the Hon. Member is making is one on which we are already active.

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, the Minister is acting pretty ineffectively. I pointed out to him that women fill only 24 per cent of the training spaces in the country. Surely that is not equality. There are predictions that, as a result of technological change, unemployment for women will be as high as 35 per cent by 1990, yet we know that a paid educational leave system in the country could reduce unemployment.

CONCEPT OF PAID EDUCATIONAL LEAVE

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Mr. Speaker, when the report "Learning for Life" was released yesterday, the Minister appeared to endorse the concept of paid educational leave. Was he only paying lip service to the objectives of paid educational leave and equality for women, or is he preparing legislation to introduce a system of paid educational leave?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the report which I received on skill development leave training yesterday is an extraordinarily important one, and deals with an extraordinarily urgent question. Yesterday I endorsed the over-all recommendations in the report. I will be raising the subject matter of the report with provincial Ministers when I meet with them in Saint John on Thursday.

I also intend to ensure that the report is forwarded to the Canadian Labour Market and Productivity Centre for consideration. Some of the recommendations in the report can be acted upon within my Department immediately, and others will be discussed promptly with other government Departments.

I also expect to receive very shortly the report of the task force headed by Judge Abella, on actions which can be taken within the Government and Crown corporations to respond more aggressively and more positively to the provision of special employment for women in Crown corporations and in government.

There are reports on their way to us. There is the one that we have just received which contains many useful suggestions. As a Government we are determined to act to implement those suggestions as quickly and as practically as possible.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION

DISCLOSURE OF CONFIDENTIAL INFORMATION

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, on February 21 I asked the Minister of Justice if he would report back to the House on any possible statutory breaches with respect to the disclosure of certain confidential information under the Unemployment Insurance Commission Act, or any other Act, given to people not entitled to it in the Peterborough and Durham-Northumberland areas. He undertook to report back to the House. I know there is at least one government report on the matter, and I wonder if the Minister has come to a conclusion and what action he has taken.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the information that was disclosed apparently falls into two categories. One was the category of information which was provided by the person concerned, and the other was information provided by the Department. In the case of the disclosure of the first category, that is information provided by the individual—such things as his name, age, SIN and so on—the disclosure is regulated by Section 114 of the Unemployment Insurance Act. This creates a defence for the disclosure of information obtained by CEIC from any person. As a result, there would appear to be a technical breach of the Act in the case at hand. However, it appears that the official concerned acted in good faith and made an honest mistake.

Disclosure of information in the second category is covered by Section 8 of the Privacy Act. Disclosure does not appear to have been authorized under this Section, and thus there has likely been a breach of the Privacy Act. However, no offence is created in the Privacy Act for breach. In any event, Mr. Speaker, we have been informed by CEIC that the disclosure was contrary to its policy and that corrective action has been taken.

TAX PROPOSAL TO ENCOURAGE OIL SANDS PROJECT

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance. Has the Government agreed to remove the Petroleum Gas Revenue Tax and set a floor price on production, as recommended by William Hopper, to encourage the construction of an oil sands mining operation north of Fort McMurray?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will bring the Hon. Member's question to the attention of the Minister of Energy, and I will ask him to bring the answer to the House as soon as possible.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION

UNAUTHORIZED DISCLOSURE OF INFORMATION

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice, who is under a statutory duty to make sure that the laws of Canada are carried out, now talks about a technical breach, or an unauthorized breach by a civil servant. Intent may not really be a relevant factor in respect of these statutes. We have a Privacy Commissioner now, even though the Government—

Mr. Speaker: Will the Hon. Member ask his question, please?

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is this. Under Section 8(1) of the Privacy Act, has the Minister of Justice informed Mr. John Grace, the Privacy Commissioner, of the breach of the Privacy Act? And if not, why not?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it is of the essence of the prosecutory decision-making that the Attorney General and his prosecutors should have the kind of discretion which my hon. friend is questioning. We have exercised that discretion, and we have decided not to prosecute.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. SIDDON—REQUEST LIST OF SPECIAL RECOVERY CAPITAL PROJECTS BE TABLED

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I will be very brief. During his reply to my question relating to the Special Recovery Capital Projects Program, the Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development (Mr. Johnston), the Minister responsible, made reference to a list, a detailed breakdown of projects under that program individual Members' ridings. I have asked the Minister to table this list on previous occasions. He is under an obligation to do so. I watched very closely; he was referring to that list and to specific Hon. Members and projects on a riding by riding basis. I happen to know that within the Department such a list has been prepared and I would ask the Minister now to table it, as in his obligation.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I have no problem with what the Hon. Member says. I was responding to the porkbarrel charge and I had drawn from the list certain very significant projects from coast to coast which are in ridings of Hon. Members on the opposite side of the House, members of the Progressive Conservative Party and the New Democratic Party. I suppose this is a representative list. I do not even know if it is complete. It certainly does not have all of the projects, by any means, but it has a very substantial number.

I am only sorry I did not have the opportunity in answering the question to complete my recitation of the projects with which, I am sure, most Hon. Members would be quite impressed.

Mr. Speaker: Is the Hon. Minister undertaking to table the list, such as it is?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, I would prefer to extend a clean copy because I wrote a few comments on it.

Mr. Lawrence: You mean a laundered copy.

Mr. Speaker: According to Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, Citation 327:

> A Minister of the Crown is not at liberty to read or quote from a despatch or other state paper not before the House, unless he be prepared to lay it upon the Table.

In the circumstances I invite the Hon. Minister to table the list to which he referred.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, it is the custom, I believe, in answering questions in the House, to refer to material, which is what I did. I have a briefing book. I never laid it upon the Table. In any event, I have no objection to laying this list upon the Table. I see that the Hon. Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) would like to see it because he knows there is a $35 million project in here for him—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Is the Minister contending that he views this as reference material and that there is not a list in existence such as described? Is that the Minister's contention?

Mr. Ouellet: Yes.

Mr. Johnston: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I missed that.

Mr. Speaker: Is the Minister contending that he does not have a specific list but is using reference material only? Is that the Minister's contention?

An Hon. Member: Table the list and be done with it.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, I cannot deny this is in list form. I have no objection to tabling it, Mr. Speaker. I would just like, if I may, to have a photocopy of it.

Mr. Speaker: The Minister has agreed to table it and that disposes of the matter as far as the Chair is concerned.

An Hon. Member: Well, he is not tabling it.

Mr. Speaker: The Minister has agreed to have it photostated and tabled.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. My understanding of the Minister's comments is that a photostat copy of the list in his hand will be tabled with the Chair. Is that correct?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, I am quite happy to table my reference material as is, provided I receive a photocopy of it.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, since the Minister has referred to a project in my riding which I approved in 1979 when I was Minister of Public Works—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: Porkbarrel!

Mr. Dubois: Slush fund!

Mr. Nielsen: —which is the first air terminal building ever in Whitehorse, would he now table—which seems to be the logical extension—the complete list so that we will have before us a complete picture of the entire list of projects in all ridings?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I wonder why the Hon. Members are taking offence when I am simply reminding my learned friend from the Yukon that, as he is well aware, the Minister has said that he would be willing to table a two-page document from which he read in the House. There is no question of the Minister tabling other documents which were in front of him but which were not quoted and which are not relevant, and there is no question of this because the public interest could be involved.

Indeed, the Minister will be doing this on his own. He is under no obligation to do so. He was quoting from personal notes jotted down on two sheets of paper which he is willing to table provided he gets a photocopy. As far as other documents are concerned, the Minister is under no obligation to table anything else.

[English]

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, might I just add that I have furnished the Hon. Member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon) with all of the material, every scrap, every piece of paper respecting press releases, lists of projects. It is not a very big challenge for someone who has any wit, Mr. Speaker, to take that list and divide it up geographically around the country. All the locations are there. Therefore, I believe this exercise is somewhat academic. However, as I said, I am quite prepared to table this particular piece of paper.

Mr. Speaker: The Minister has undertaken to table the document to which reference is made and that appears to dispose of the matter.

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, I suspect it is only a partial list because it only includes members of this Party—

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member cannot speculate beyond this point. The Minister has undertaken to table a document to which reference was made. That disposes of the matter.

MR. MICHAEL MANLEY

Question No. 108—Mr. Stewart:

Did Mr. Michael Manley, former Prime Minister of Jamaica, receive any direct or indirect financial assistance from the Government and if so (a) how much (b) from which departments or agencies (c) for what reason?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): The International Development Research Centre informs the Government that it provided the following financial assistance to Mr. Michael Manley, former Prime Minister of Jamaica: (a) $948, (b) IDRC, (c) For air fare and living expenses to permit Mr. Manley to visit IDRC headquarters in Ottawa during November 23-25, 1980 for discussions with IDRC staff on a possible research fellowship.

NON-BUDGETARY FUNDS TO CROWN CORPORATIONS

Question No. 374—Mr. Huntington:

In the fiscal years 1979-80 through 1982-83 inclusive, what was the total amount, if any, of non-budgetary funds provided to Crown corporations and other entities in which the Crown has a financial interest and what is a list of all such entities?

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Loans, investments and advances made to Crown corporations and agencies are presented in Section 7, Volume 1 of the public accounts.

Payments, grants and contributions made to Crown corporations and agencies under general programs are not readily available. To provide that information would entail a costly examination of all disbursements made under each government program.

On March 31, 1983, and December 31, 1983, how many persons were receiving Unemployment Insurance Benefits in each of the Unemployment Insurance Commission offices in the Province of New Brunswick?

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): The number of persons in receipt of Unemployment Insurance Benefit payments as of December 31, 1983, for each Canada Employment Center is not yet available. The most recent figures are for October 31, 1983. The following table lists the Canada Employment Centers in New Brunswick, and the number of UI beneficiaries at each of these offices as of March and October, 1983.

PURCHASE OF SEATS AT COMMUNITY COLLEGES

Question No. 470—Mr. Howie:

1. In 1983 did the Department of Employment and Immigration purchase any seats in New Brunswick community colleges to train carpenters, upholsterers and pipe fitters and, if so, how many?

2. Did the Department decide the number of seats, in each of the above categories, which will be purchased in 1984 and, if so, in each case, what is the number?

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): 1. Yes, seats were purchased during 1983-84 fiscal year in New Brunswick as follows: carpenters, 50 seats; upholsterers, nine seats; pipe fitters, 58 seats.

2. No, a decision has so far not been taken about what number of seats will be purchased in 1984-85 in the above categories.

CANADA LABOUR RELATIONS BOARD

Question No. 582—Mr. Howie:

Are figures available relating to the current average period of time taken by the Canada Labour Relations Board to process complaints, and (a) if so, are such figures available to the general public (b) if not, are such figures being compiled?

Mr. Normand Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Figures are compiled quarterly and annually each fiscal year, for the average period of time taken to process all cases, including complaints. The figures are broken down by type of case, and by case requiring a public hearing by the Board as well as by case disposed of without a hearing.

Although the Canada Labour Relations Board does not release these figures to the general public nor does it publish them in its annual report, they are made available, upon request, to other government agencies such as provincial labour relations boards, Labour Canada, the Public Service Staff Relations Board, et cetera, as well as to university researchers and students of industrial relations. We have no record of any request by the members of the general public for such information, but it is the Board's policy in the event of such requests, to exercise discretion in the release of this type of information since it could easily be misinterpreted, as the averages would reflect delays not necessarily attributable to the Board, such as cases kept in abeyance at the request of the parties, et cetera. The figures would also have to be interpreted in the light of priorities and of difficulties in scheduling public hearings on a nation-wide basis.

SAINT JOHN HARBOUR BRIDGE AUTHORITY

Question No. 590—Mr. Howie:

What are the (a) names (b) positions of the persons who occupy positions on the Executive and Board of Directors of the Saint John Harbour Bridge Authority and, in each case, what amount was he/she paid in respect of that position in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1983?

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister of State (Finance)): The Saint John Harbour Bridge Authority was incorporated under provincial law and is not a federal Crown corporation. The federal Government is merely a creditor of the Authority and has no ownership rights.

The information the Hon. Member is seeking should thus be requested from the Authority whose address is P.O. Box 6176, Station 'A', King Street, West Saint John, N.B. E2L 4R6.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the Government.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Haldimand-Norfolk (Mr. Bradley) has some time remaining in the question and answer period. If there are no questions or comments, the Chair will recognize the Hon. Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Roberts).

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in Toronto I received and welcomed a very interesting report prepared by the national advisory panel on skill development leave. I established this group last autumn to advise me on steps which could be taken to help educationally disadvantaged Canadians. I would like once again to thank the panel for its efforts to draw attention to the need for society to change its attitude about training and education. While time today does not permit a detailed review of the panel's recommendations, I can assure the House that I am giving them top priority and will be discussing them in two days' time when I meet with my provincial counterparts in Saint John, New Brunswick.

I am deeply concerned that all of us who have responsibility for preparing Canadians for the world of work have not always co-operated in a way which ensured all Canadians had access to opportunity to improve their skills. To be blunt, our system of education has failed many Canadians, especially those who have been near or at the poverty level. About 250,000 students annually drop out of high school before they complete their education. Between 50 per cent and 60 per cent of young people in native reserves in western Canada leave school before completing grade eight. Without a trade or marketable skill of any description, they move to the cities for dead end jobs or welfare rolls. Now more than ever before in our history, skill obsolescence underlines the need for a new pattern of working and learning spread over a lifetime.

I said in Toronto yesterday, Mr. Speaker, that it was an extraordinary thing that in a country as rich as Canada, with a history of a century of free access to education, there are adults who are not literate or adequately prepared for work. According to the last study done by UNESCO, something close to one Canadian adult in four has less than grade nine functional skills. Thus I share the national advisory Panel's sense of the importance and urgency of tackling literacy problems in Canada.

I accept the conclusion of the panel that we should focus on the problems of those who require skill development because of industrial obsolescence. I also believe that the report underlines the need to rethink the compartmentalization which bedevils the discussion of these problems. Education, training, skills development, paid leave, work and meaningful activity are not terms to be rigidly defined and pigeon-holed away from each other. They are, rather, themes that intermingle and require co-operation and flexibility among government, educational institutions, the private sector and labour if they are to be properly managed.

The fact that the Government of Canada will be spending $1.3 billion in job training and employment programs for young people in 1984-85 shows how seriously we are committed to helping them become established in meaningful careers. It is a personal social and economic disaster that young people today make up almost half of the unemployed, with an unemployment rate double that of the adult population. We cannot ignore the needs and aspirations of young people seeking work as the cost to society of doing that would be enormous.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the Government is quite concerned about unemployment among young people, which continues to be tragically high. That segment of our labour force has always experienced more difficulty in finding jobs than has been the case for older people. It is precisely to give young people better opportunities on the labour market that we have improved our training programs. Indeed, our last two budgets featured increased financial incentives to enable private enterprise to create jobs. For a number of young Canadians, it is often the first worthwhile job which will eventually provide them with the necessary work experience they could not have gained in any other way.

We are going through difficult times, even though the economic recovery is well under way, but unfortunately some employers are still reluctant to hire additional staff, with the result that young people are often forced to go back to school.

In the next few years we will have to create job opportunities for those young Canadians who having attended institutions of higher learning will be joining the labour market in increasing numbers. Again they will be in direct competition with older workers who already have practical experience. With a view to making it easier for our youths, the Canadian Government has created programs such as Career Access.

• (1520)

Compounding this problem is the fact that the majority of young adults entering the labour force lack marketable work experience; thus their transition between school and work becomes even more difficult. Many young people leaving school find their skills are out of step with the needs of the labour market. In a tight economic climate these people are among the most vulnerable to changing economic conditions in which the last hired becomes the first fired. This in turn leads to unstable employment patterns which makes subsequent job search even more difficult. It is therefore imperative that, in order to facilitate their future entry into the labour market, young people still in school be provided with an opportunity to obtain the kind of experience that will make them more acceptable to employers.

The summer jobs created for students through the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission have been highly successful in providing young people with the kind of work experience they need to prepare for their eventual entry into the full-time work force. Summer Canada has also had a significant impact on summer youth employment each year. In fact, last summer's program created more than 73,000 jobs and no doubt contributed significantly to lowering the unemployment rate for students returning to school. In recognition of the serious employment situation students will continue to face this summer, funding for student summer employment initiatives in 1984 has been increased by $70 million over its base level, bringing the total funding for this year's program to $170 million. This money is being used to create career-oriented jobs for more than 69,000 students and to place hundreds of thousands more in employment in both the public and private sectors.

Summer Canada emphasizes the creation of qualitative, career-oriented jobs that will prepare students for future labour market participation. The bulk of the jobs will be created through the summer components of two of our year-round job-creation programs, Canada Works and Career Access. This summer Summer Canada Works will create experience-giving jobs for more than 41,000 students in projects sponsored by community and volunteer groups, professional associations, local governments and private sector employers. I understand that the quality of sponsorship proposals received for this year's program is better than ever. Those proposals are now being reviewed and my colleague, the Minister of State for Youth (Mrs. Hervieux-Payette), will soon be announcing which ones have been approved for funding.

Student internships in the private, public and non-profit sectors will be created this year through Summer Career Access. Funded at over $30 million, this wage subsidy program will create jobs for more than 12,000 students.

The concept of summer internships was introduced three years ago in jobs with federal Government Departments and has been expanded to include non-profit organizations, and last year for the first time, the private sector. Assessment of last year's experimental private sector internships indicated the program was a tremendous success, both for the students involved and for the employers who hired them. Jobs have been created in a range of professional and highly skilled fields providing quality career-enhancing experience for students in activities such as medical and scientific research, program development in social, health and recreational services, and provision of technical services in fields ranging from computer applications to archeology, speech pathology and fashion design.

Also included in Summer Canada are the Department of National Defence cadet and reserve training programs and the RCMP special supernumerary constables program. These programs will create jobs for about 14,000 more students who are interested in jobs in the military, law, or law enforcement.

Another important aspect of the Government's summer employment initiatives are the Canada Employment Centres for students. More than 450 of these centres will begin opening across Canada next month. Operating through the summer, the centres serve as a key link in the community between the federal effort in student summer employment, other levels of government and the private sector.

In 1983 the Canada Employment Centres for students accounted for some 333,000 placements in both the public and private sectors. In all, over 550,000 registrations were taken and 374,000 job vacancies were listed with these student centres. Approximately 160,000 post-secondary placements were made while the remaining 172,000 placements were secondary students. This summer the centres expect to place more than 333,000 students in employment.

[Translation]

The Canada Employment and Immigration Commission also provides a series of permanent programs especially designed for young people. These include the International Exchange Program for Students and Young Workers, the services offered by On-Campus Canada Employment Centres and our special youth units.

These special units, which exist in every province, are designed to meet the specific needs of disadvantaged young people who are seeking employment. The units help young people prepare realistic career plans, in addition to acquiring practical job experience. This is done in co-operation with local private businesses and unions, and with the help of other agencies and individuals who are anxious to increase job opportunities for the young people in their communities.

Mr. Speaker, there is more, for in addition to the programs I just mentioned that are intended specifically for young people, there is also a large number of federal job creation programs for all Canadians, which also benefit young people.

These programs focus mainly on areas where the unemployment rate is particularly high. In addition to an opportunity to earn wages instead of drawing unemployment insurance benefits or being on welfare, individuals taking part in these programs can acquire skills that will be useful in future jobs.

[English]

Young people aged 25 and under are a major target of all of these programs. It is estimated that they represent close to half of all participants. In 1984-85 we estimate that some 70,000 young people will take part in the Canada Works Program. Another 78,000 will benefit from Career Access while youth participation in LEAD and the Job Corps will amount to 4,300 and 2,200 young people respectively. As well, young people are major participants in the federal training programs and represent 45 per cent of the clients of Canada Employment Centres and 50 per cent of the clients of the federally funded Outreach projects.

All of these efforts are designed to assist severely unemployed youth in establishing positive employment patterns and in easing the transition from school to work for youth in general. While they have been provided and are successful, we are not stopping there. Intensive efforts are currently being made to identify the best methods for assisting young people in becoming productive members of our work force. I will soon be going to Cabinet to discuss with my colleagues how the $150 million of additional funds allocated in the recent Budget can best be allocated so that we can continue to provide young people with relevant employment-related assistance.

Our commitment to the young people of Canada of $1.3 billion in Government of Canada programs is a heavy one. We owe it to them as a means of fulfilling the promise of opportunity in our society, and we owe it to ourselves as a means of investment in the future of our country.

Mr. Lewycky: Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to what the Minister had to say. As are most of my colleagues, in terms of constituency case work I am making sure that employment programs are a number one priority.

• (1530)

Could the Minister indicate whether he has had the opportunity to examine what his predecessor had done in terms of local advisory boards and their participation with regard to summer youth employment programs and so forth? This has given a more democratic element to the things we were faced with in our constituency. I am especially concerned about very large ridings such as mine, where people who participate on local advisory boards may have to travel 120 miles just in one direction to participate in meetings. Has the Minister had an opportunity to examine the way the local advisory boards function, and whether there has been any sort of evaluation done? Would the Minister consider reconstituting them for the upcoming programs? I would be very interested in the Minister's response to that.

Mr. Roberts: Yes, Mr. Speaker, we are assessing those boards. Since the assessment is not complete, I cannot give the Hon. Member a definitive response. I can say to him that I am partial myself to that kind of community involvement and the engagement of people in the private and voluntary sectors, and so on, in these issues. I do believe it is not by the federal Government acting alone but through co-operative action in our communities that we are best able to respond to the problems of youth employment. I am very much aware of what has been done.

As I indicated in my speech, we are now considering the possible allocation of the $150 million of new funds which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) has allotted to us in the Budget. In the process of reflecting on the ways in which that funding can be used most effectively, we are reviewing the community-oriented programs and making the kind of reassessment he has asked of us.

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Minister about the local advisory boards. I found that in my riding they were incredibly effective. I took the attitude, after 1979 when I was elected and again after 1980, what I was elected to represent all the constituents, whether they had voted Liberal, NDP, Conservative, or otherwise. When the money was allocated to the riding by setting up a local advisory board which drew on all sectors of the community, the old, the young and the handicapped, we found that the decisions they made were very wise and with no sense of partisanship at all. More recently, decisions are made by officials. I think there is an increasing worry about that, and I want to put in a word to the Minister to ask him to consider reinstating the local advisory boards for those of us who feel we do represent Liberals, New Democrats and others after an election is over.

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, there is not a great deal I can add to my previous answer. I think the attitude which the Hon. Member has shown is exactly the one that I would hope would characterize moving back in that direction. I think indeed most Members would express and share the kinds of opinions that he has voiced. I think I would be reluctant to impose it as a mechanism. But I think the Hon. Member was suggesting it should be optional, at the discretion of the Member. I cannot give the Hon. Member a definitive answer today because the review is taking place. I have already indicated my sympathy for this approach. It is indeed the kind that I myself supported when I was not the Minister in this portfolio but had responsibilities as a Member of Parliament.

Mr. Kristiansen: Mr. Speaker, I have a question which is supplementary to the last two questions posed by the Hon. Member for Dauphin (Mr. Lewycky) and the Hon. Member for Lethbridge-Foothills (Mr. Thacker). I want to endorse what they have said about local advisory boards.

The Minister has said he would like to provide for some discretion for local advisory boards. That exists now, except that in my own case it is now up to the individual M.P. to cover the cost of travelling and meals. This I do quite gladly. I would rather do that than make unilateral decisions which can end up being either unproductive or cause division rather than unification within a community.

Aside from that, there is a directive which my constituency office was advised of today. This directive requires the constituencies' or the Members' final answer, to go along with the Minister's approval, by March 20. We got that information on the telephone today. Apparently this is a departmental directive that really does not allow much time or notice. Members of Parliament and people in our communities who may be involved in advisory boards have busy schedules too. I understand the necessity for speed because Summer Canada project employment has to start April 30 or shortly following. I hope the Minister will allow us a little more discretion, at least a week or so beyond this arbitrary deadline of March 20. Within a matter of two weeks we must have an answer and check out all the various groups within our community and see about the proper allocation of funds so that we can make rational decisions with some community input.

Could I have some assurance from the Minister that we may have a little bit of flexibility that accords us our due as well?

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I was going to make the first point myself which the Hon. Member made. There are many Members, at least I know there are many on this side of the House, such as my colleague from Thunder Bay, who do avail themselves now of an advisory group in an informal way. I think many Members do. I assume that the question was whether that informal process could be converted into a formal process with some degree of support. To be entirely frank with the Hon. Member, I did not realize the calls and gone out today establishing March 20 as a deadline. That does still give two weeks for the forwarding of the recommendations to me. I would not want to vary that date without seeing if there is not some very good reason for having brought it forward that quickly. Clearly, as the Hon. Member indicated in his remarks, we have to take decisions fairly promptly if projects are to go into place for the time when they are needed, that is, moving from April on for the summer employment period. I cannot give him quite as strong a response as he would like such as to guarantee him more flexibility, but I will guarantee to the Hon. Member that I will look into the matter in the interest of trying to find more flexibility.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I used the advisory committee for two or three years. I found the travel in a constituency as big as Bow River was very expensive. Also there was the diversity of industry to consider. For instance, Banff and Lake Louise have tourism. Right down the boundary there is ranching, coal mining, grain-growing, manufacturing, and hog-raising, etc. I found it was difficult to find people who had any knowledge of the other end, or the other side, of the constituency. I did, however, manage to resolve the matter. Civil servants have been very co-operative. I arranged for my executive assistant to sit in on meetings once or twice a year, and together go over all items. My executive assistant has a good knowledge of the entire constituency. I have been most impressed by the fairness with which the civil servants try to administer these funds. I like that very much.

One thing, however, does bother me, particularly as it concerns the Canada Works funds. We have so much advertising and, as a result, we get 15 or 25 applications, all worthwhile. This year with $100,000 there was sufficient money only for three or four projects, which causes a lot of frustration and anger. I do not know what the Minister can do about this. It is not a good program when we build up peoples' hopes and they go to all the trouble of getting worthwhile projects only to find them dashed to the ground because of insufficient money.

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, first I want to thank the Hon. Member for recognizing the work done by the civil servants in my Department. Quite often brickbats are thrown at us and it is very nice to have a bouquet when it is deserved, and I will pass along the Hon. Member's comments to the relevant officers.

Second, we did increase very substantially the funding for the Summer Canada programs last year. My recollection is that it was increased by $70 million. The amount of funding provided this year so far is equal to that funding. I know there are always more expectations than can be fulfilled. Indeed, as I noted in my remarks, another $150 million has been added for youth employment programs generally. There is clearly the possibility that we could consider using some of that funding to expand once more the summer employment program. I am not guaranteeing Hon. Members of the House that that will happen, but I note that it is a possibility. I hope he will not find himself overwhelmed by the expectations. We have tried to make people aware of the programs. The funding has been substantially increased in previous years. The quality of projects being suggested is even higher. That may reflect the fact that we have made people more aware of the programs than perhaps has been the case in the past.

● (1540)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in the Budget debate because I believe the Budget itself gives us as clear a picture as we could possibly expect of why we need a change in government and why we have to move in different directions. I say this not just because of the matters we have raised in the House in the last few months about the way Revenue Canada has been run or is totally out of control or about the way the Government has manipulated taxpayers' funds to favour those ridings that have happened to elect Liberals. I do not say this because of the action taken by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) in making public a confidential discussion between the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) and one of his public servants. I do not say this just because Canadians have been turned off by the Liberal Party. I say it because the Government today is totally avoiding the major issues.

Let us look at some of them. In the medicare issue, they have focused on two narrow parts of the overall issue. They have done so entirely for political reasons—to raise the level of fear on the part of elderly Canadians and Canadians with health problems. In terms of the peace issue, the matter has been dealt with primarily by raising the whole issue of the fear Canadians have about the possibility of nuclear war. They have not dealt with some of the more substantive elements of the issue. Now we have in the Budget a clear example of how the Minister is dealing with the peripheral issues while avoiding some of the major substantive issues which are causing the very serious problems we face in the country.

I do not think any of us would disagree that in the Budget the peripheral issues have been brought forward, such as the question of pension reform particularly, and the treatment of single elderly women and the adequacy of their pensions. We have been in favour of tax simplification for a number of years now. We are pleased that the Government is starting to unwind the very serious damage it has inflicted upon the economy, particularly upon individuals and small-businessmen, in the 1981 and 1983 Budgets which added, between them, 600 pages of legislative amendments to a tax Act which prior to that consisted of some 875 pages. There is a slight change for the better in the Budget, but we still have a long way to go. There are some initiatives to address the problems we have been raising about the administration of Revenue Canada and the initiation of a study on profit sharing of which we on this side of the House have been in favour. We are supportive of these initiatives, but we have to recognize that most of them are not law. They are initiating the consultative process. We must take into account the past practices of the Government as it approached an election. "Let us put some of these on the table", they say. "Let us put them on the table and ask for some comments", they say, because it allows the Government to avoid addressing the problem and making decisions which will bring into effect changes Canadians would like to see. We do not have any confidence whatsoever that there will be substantive changes made in these areas prior to the election.

I would like to address one of the peripheral changes, that is the proposal for mortgage interest insurance. This addresses the symptom of the problem, not the cause. It is very expensive for the taxpayer or the home owner to purchase this mortgage interest insurance. However, I underline the fact that the problem is not addressed by this particular proposal. The problem is high interest rates and the lack of control which the Government has demonstrated over its monetary policy. We have seen more than a few instances where interest rates in Canada have risen far higher than they should have. I will address one element of this later in my remarks.

The problem is that the Government has addressed these peripheral issues in the Budget and has ignored the very major issues of the federal Government deficit and the declining international competitive position of our industry. Lip service merely is given to these problems. It is the same lip service we have seen in budget after budget, but no action is taken on the problems which lead directly to the most serious economic and social problems facing us in Canada. I am referring to the level of unemployment—the 1.5 million Canadians including the 500,000 younger Canadians who do not have jobs today. This Budget is words, words, words. There is no action. There are no policy initiatives.

I want to take this opportunity to set out some of the priorities and objectives which the Progressive Conservative Party has clearly established in addressing these problems. My first point is that we identify these as real problems, problems which must be addressed if we are to have a health economy in Canada. Let us look at the Budget deficit. Any time I have raised the question of the Budget deficit, I hear Members from the other side of the House braying, "What would you cut, what would you cut?" That is the wrong question. The question is: Do you regard the deficit problem as being a serious problem and, if you do, would you do something about it? The clear answer on the Conservative side of the House is that we view that as being probably the most serious economic problem today. We would do something about it. Then the question is: How would you cut; would you cut by raising taxes or by cutting government spending? Again the answer is very clear. We would cut spending. We would not raise taxes. Tax levels in Canada are already too high. Spending cuts are important for another reason. If we raise taxes, we provide more funds for politicians and bureaucrats to spend. A discipline has to be applied to the Government and to the bureaucracy. That discipline is not applied if we provide more funds for the politicians and the bureaucrats to spend.

Government today overall represents close to 50 per cent of our national economy. We have talked for years about the problems in England and in Sweden when they got close to 50 per cent. We are there now. I see the Hon. Member for Mississauga North (Mr. Fisher) shaking his head. I suggest that he should take out his sliderule or little pocket calculator and find out where we stand. Overall in Canada, federal, provincial and municipal Governments spend just short of 50 per cent of the national income. If we are to have spending cuts, clearly they have to be broad and affect all segments of government. They have to be sensitive and they have to be equitable. Also we have to address waste and inefficiency in government. Every time we receive the report of the Auditor General, there are examples of how we could cut waste and inefficiency. Also there are some programs which clearly could be cut or even eliminated today. They are low priority programs. Some have been in place for many years. Very few people in the country would even know they had been eliminated.

The key question that we must address here is why we cut spending. First, it is very clear that reduced deficits mean less government borrowing. Less government borrowing means less pressure on interest rates. We would therefore have lower interest rates in this country. Less government borrowing also means that the limited resources for investment would not be spent by governments but would be spent in the private sector for investment in new technology, new types of equipment, more productive equipment. That results in a better competitive position for Canada. The improved competitive position would automatically lead to an improvement of job performance, economic performance and a healthier economy.

The other point, on which is somewhat harder to put your finger, is that it would lead to better confidence in our economy, better confidence in the long-term performance in the economy. There is continued debate among economists as to whether high Government deficits lead to high interest rates. I say, with respect to the economists in this place and outside the House, that that is an academic argument. It has been a discussion between academics. The real world has made the decision. The real world has clearly demonstrated by the rates in the market today that high deficits lead to high interest rates. High interest rates are slowing down the economic activity in Canada. That is the clear reason why we have to spend some time in addressing that problem.

While talking high deficits, I want to draw attention to what deficits are doing to our younger generation. We are worried today about young Canadians who do not have jobs. Let us consider what the deficits today mean to those same young Canadians. I ask Members of the House whether they would go to the bank today, take out a $10,000 or $15,000 loan on behalf of their children, leave it to their children to pay the interest and repay the loan, and take that money to buy a new suit or a trip to Florida, spending it on themselves and not for the benefit of their children. That is what deficits are today. We are literally robbing the next generation of something that is rightfully theirs. As participants in that robbery in the House, we are doing something to undermine the basis of security and stability of the next generation.

Let us look at the impact of the deficit on the economy. I want to draw the attention of the House to a number of statistics released recently by Statistics Canada. The growth of our national economy in the fourth quarter of 1983 was only .9 per cent, after being adjusted for inflation. That expressed on an annual basis is 3.6 per cent, sharply down from the previous quarter of 8.1 per cent.

Another notable indicator in the slowdown is the decline in real personal disposable income in 1983. Nominal income rose by 5.1 per cent, but with a 5.8 per cent increase in prices, it means we have suffered a decline of .7 per cent in real disposable income. That cuts back from the ability of the economy to grow.

Business investment is down by substantial amounts, 12.2 per cent in real terms after a decline of 11.2 per cent in 1982. The outlook this year is for business investment to increase, after adjustment for inflation, practically not at all. Therefore, we are in a static period after two years of substantial decline. That means that money is not being spent on new equipment and new technologies. We are going to slip further in our international competitive position.

Let us move on to the international competitive position. How are we going to address that problem? First, obviously, we have to do something about the deficit. I discussed some of what we would do there. Let us look at the other elements here. Inflation control is a very important part of it. We have had a drop in the level of inflation in Canada from the 12 to 13 per cent to which the Government had taken us some two years ago down to a 5 to 6 per cent level now. It is still 1 per cent to 2 per cent higher than that of our competitor countries. We should be striving to get it 1 per cent or 2 per cent lower so that we improve our competitive position. I will say it again:

An improved competitive position is the best, surest, most permanent way of creating jobs in this country, far more permanent, far more successful than all the alphabet-soup job-creation programs which the previous speaker talked about. That is the way that we improve our economy.

Let us look at some other means of improving the competitive position. These represent the four pillars we established in the Conservative Party industrial policy as being the key objectives, the objectives against which all our specific policies would be measured. The first is improving research and development. The second is a greater degree of expenditure and emphasis on improving our human resources through training, retraining and other means by which individuals can become more productive. The third is improving the entrepreneurial investment climate in Canada so that we have more money invested in startups of new businesses and new types of equipment and technology. Fourth, if we are going to have a healthy economy, we must have the outlet to the international community. We need to have solid international trade promotional activities. The key that I want to stress here is that we recognize the seriousness of the problems. We understand that they have to be addressed with clear sets of policies and clear objectives that demonstrate very much that identity the problems that we are facing here and lead clearly to the solutions.

I want to put some numbers on the record that relate to comments I made earlier. The Government, this Minister and the previous Minister have always talked about this being a Budget of restraint, something that would lead to a reduction in the deficit, a lesser degree of Government involvement. If we make some assumptions here, that Government expenditures would increase annually at the rate of growth of the national income, and we have heard many Ministers of Finance say that that was what they were going to do, if that had happened for the period of time of the current Government, dating back to 1968, the cumulative savings would be $131.1 billion. That is equivalent, almost, to the net debt of this country. Let us look at a more recent period. If we did that since 1979, the savings would be $36.4 billion. That demonstrates the order of magnitude that we are talking about here.

In closing I want to emphasize that we have picked these areas of deficit reduction, inflation control and building international productivity for one key reason, that is, to improve the economic independence of Canada by giving us a better performance relative to the United States. When the United States makes some policy mistakes, as it will from time to time, or if it acts in ways that are quite appropriate for the United States economy but not for our economy, then we have that flexibility to move away from the direction taken by the United States for whatever period of time necessary.

● (1600)

I just came back from spending last week in Europe and I talked to a number of international economists, investors and bankers. The one thing that struck me very clearly in Great Britain was that it has, as the people there call it, unhooked itself from the U.S. economy. Interest rates in the U.K. are now lower than they are in the United States, and the underlying reason for this is that in 1981 the U.K. made the decision to get its deficit down to a reasonable level. That deficit is now at about 6 per cent of overall spending. In Canada we are at 30 per cent.

There is a clear lesson to be learned there, Mr. Speaker. If we were to follow the policies that a Conservative Government would follow, we would have a healthier environment, better job performance and a degree of independence from United States policy and from the performance of the United States economy when it is appropriate for Canada to have that independence.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I always enjoy listening to a speech made by my neighbour from Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson), partly because he offers some interesting ideas and partly because it is stimulating to me. I disagree with much of what he says, but he forces me to think about it.

I would like to ask the Hon. Member directly what he thinks he would cut in a federal budget. He says that this question is irrelevant, but then he goes on to say that government spending cuts are the key to a reduction in the deficit. First of all I would like to ask him what he would cut, and second, whether he agrees with his colleague, the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), who has said that we should introduce means tests for our social service programs as one way of controlling expenditures.

Mr. Wilson: Mr. Speaker, the fact that my hon. neighbour from Mississauga North asked that question in the way he did tells me that while he may think my speech stimulating, it did not stimulate whatever brains he has in his head. The key question that the House has to address is whether the problem of high deficits is the overwhelming problem in Canada today. I take it from his question that he does not yet understand that. Until he gets that through his head, the question that he has asked is irrelevant.

I responded to that question in my remarks by saying that there must be broad spending cuts, and whether it is in this Department or that Department is irrelevant. It must be across the board. Yes, there will be some differences in application depending upon where a government will apply its priorities, but the overall result is that spending must be reduced in the broadest possible way.

The Hon. Member was in business as I was in business. When he found that he was spending more than he could afford, I am sure that he addressed the problem the same way I did, which was by cutting right across the board so that everybody would feel they had some involvement in the reductions that were being applied through an overall discipline. That is the key answer to that question. If we in the House do not accept that that is the number one problem, then we are not going to achieve the performance that the country deserves and is certainly capable of achieving yet has certainly fallen far short of achieving at this point.

Mr. Kristiansen: Mr. Speaker, after listening to the Hon. Member from Etobicoke, I think that we now clearly know where he and his Party stand on the matter of debt and deficits. That basically is that Canada should not borrow from the Bank of Canada at relatively low cost in the same way that Japan has done but rather that Crown corporations, the provinces and municipalities should be forced to borrow abroad from foreign markets at high costs in the same way that Mexico, Poland and some other countries which are going bankrupt have done. That seems to be the policy of the Conservative Party and is increasingly becoming the policy of the Government, because it has echoed that theme throughout its entire Budget. It is a Conservative economic statement.

I would like to ask the Hon. Member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) a question. Now that we clearly know his stand on economic policy is to lead us on the road to bankruptcy, what is his position and that of his Party on matters of social policy? Does he subscribe to the means test as does the Leader of the Conservative Party or does he subscribe rather to the "mean, nasty and terrible things" test of the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) who is the finance critic for the Conservative Party?

Mr. Wilson: Mr. Speaker, what the Hon. Member has just said has totally distorted and totally misrepresented what I said in my remarks a few minutes ago. I made abolutely no reference to the fact that the policy of this Party is to force the provinces, the municipalities or the corporations to borrow externally.

Mr. Kristiansen: That is the result.

Mr. Wilson: If he says that that is the result, his understanding of economics is smaller than I thought it was, because the result of cutting back on federal government borrowing in Canada would be to free up the market for the provinces, the municipalities and the corporations so that they would not have to borrow abroad. That is the direction in which we are trying to go. We want to have less of an external exposure and put more of our domestic savings not into paying the day-to-day bills of the Government but into financing the development of new technologies and startups of new small businesses, which would result, as I hope the Hon. Member would understand, in more job creation. Admittedly, it is job creation by the private sector and he would not enjoy that, but it would result in more jobs being created by the private sector, and surely that is something that he can accept.

Mr. Parent: Mr. Speaker, I rise at the risk of being berated by the Hon. Member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson). He might consider me just a small town boy who does not know too much about economics. My question is quite straightforward. In view of the fact that the Hon. Member has stated that the number one problem in the country is the deficit, would he please put into perspective for me what his feelings are on unemployment?

Second, I wonder if he would address himself specifically to the problem of cutbacks with regard to the social programs. By that I mean, would he cut back on medicare? He said that he would cut back across the board, but I simply want to get it into perspective here. Would he indeed cut back on medicare and on pensions? If the answer to that is yes, then I believe that he will be at loggerheads with what his Party stands for. Could he please clarify that for me?

Mr. Wilson: Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the Hon. Member should in any way belittle his knowledge of economics by saying: "I am just a small town boy, I don't know too much about economics". In many cases, it is the small town boys who use good, sound common sense in addressing the economic problems and who have a far better and clearer understanding of the directions we should be taking. I hope that he will not move away from his small town traditions when addressing the economic problems that we are facing.

He asked me to address the question of cutting expenditures for social programs. We made it quite clear that we will not cut spending on medicare. In fact, my colleagues have said that we would increase the commitment that we have made to medicare. Referring to education, as I indicated in my remarks earlier, upgrading of our human resources, education, training and retraining are key priorities, so no, there would be no cuts there. I can answer the question that he has asked quite clearly.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could continue the theme that was started by the previous speaker. It is interesting to note the fixation on the deficit and the determination to cut spending in Canada that the previous speaker and many people in his Party have. In my eyes it is a given that one of the largest blocks of spending that is the responsibility of any Party which forms a government is in the area of health programs, social programs and education. It is a given that if we are to maintain the quality of life in the country, there is a desperate need to maintain those programs. The Armed Forces account for a very large portion of the spending in the country, and the Conservative Party is obviously committed to that. Just exactly where are those cuts going to take place?

The Canadian people do not want the kind of double talk in which the previous speaker and his Party are indulging. How about some hard figures? Let him stand up and show some guts. Where are they going to cut spending? What can women in Canada expect who are having some difficulty with equality? What can native people expect from the proposals the Hon. Member put forward? What can young people expect who are having a terrible time and who are extremely dependent on education, social and health care programs? Exactly where would the previous speaker and his Party make cuts in the Budget? Who would he harm?

• (1610)

Mr. Wilson: Mr. Speaker, I cannot really understand the direction of these questions. The Hon. Member did not listen to what I was saying and he does not accept that the most important economic problem we are facing is the size of the deficit and the fact that 22 per cent of government spending goes to servicing the debt. That increases every year. Surely he understands that we have gone far enough.

He says that we have to continue spending in this and that area. Taking that to its logical conclusion, we must ask why we tax anybody. Why do we not just spend money and make everybody happy. That is really what the Hon. Member is saying.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member but we are running overtime. Perhaps he would be allowed to complete his answer by unanimous consent. Is it agreed?

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We will proceed to debate. The Hon. Member for Mississauga North (Mr. Fisher).

Mr. Douglas Fisher (Mississauga North): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to speak in the Budget debate. I think this is a good Budget and a timely one. I believe it reflects the good progress we have made on economic recovery and it provides us with major advances on key social problems, especially on pensions, mortgages, and women's financial rights. It continues to strive for a simpler tax system, particularly for small business, and it provides extra relief for unemployed young people. It also creates more tax incentives for increased industrial productivity. Those are important themes and all are reflected in the Budget.

We achieved this kind of timely impact because of the wide consultation that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) undertook for the second time in preparing and presenting his material. The Minister of Finance and his colleague, the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. MacLaren), and all his other colleagues in various Departments of Government, crisscrossed the country in the months before the Budget, talking to interested groups in order to make sure that people in all regions had input into this document. In fact, Mr. Bernie Beckett from the St. John's Board of Trade was quoted on February 17, two days after the Budget, as saying "It is nice to see the consultative process with business". I agree with Mr. Beckett. It is an important reform that makes it possible for us to bring out a budget that is in tune with the expectations and capacities of the private sector.

It is important to note that this consultative process will not end when the Budget is finished. Each of the major proposals asked for better input before implementation. I think, for example, of the proposals for private pensions. They will affect not only the pensioner but also the employer. So we need to have feedback from the private sector before final implementation. The same is true in the home building industry with our proposals for the mortgage insurance plan, and it is also true of our recommendations for an employee profit-sharing plan.

We do not intend to make an idea into law the day after the Budget. We intend to repeat the consultative process and invite interested voices and informed voices back for further input into the final documents.

I should like to give a plug to the consultative process that the Finance Committee of the House of Commons has employed in the past two Budgets, the six and five Budget and the special recovery Budget. It has worked on tax concessions involved in those Budgets. Before the legislation was introduced, the Finance Committee examined the documents, heard witnesses, talked to experts from various Departments, and then made recommendations to the Minister. I should like to see this process continue because I think it is an intelligent use of abilities of Members of Parliament. We have seen some dramatic improvements in the actual legislation as a result of it. I hope that the present Chairman of the Finance Committee, the outstanding Hon. Member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson), and the Minister will continue this process with the current Budget.

I must say that this is the fourth Budget on which I have worked as Parliamentary Secretary, Mr. Speaker. If I may be allowed a personal reflection, I should like to say that it is one of my most satisfying experiences as a parliamentarian. I have had the opportunity to work with the Minister of Finance since September, 1982, and have enjoyed my affiliation with him. His energy is boundless. I especially appreciate the way he is willing to go across Canada to listen to other Canadians and bring their ideas to the House of Commons. This is one of his outstanding strengths and it has been reflected in two very good Budgets, that of April, 1983 and that of February, 1984.

Of the four Budgets I have seen, each has had a special characteristic. The November, 1981 Budget created enormous controversy with its tax reform. After that controversy died down and after all the dust had settled, we were left with some of the very significant benefits in our tax system that were introduced by the then Minister of Finance. As people look back on that Budget they usually overlook those benefits. They forget that the tax rate was significantly lowered in that Budget, that we not only cleaned up some of the problem areas but we passed the savings back to the taxpayer in the form of a lower rate. From the bottom of the tax scale to the top, the rates dropped. Today Canadians pay less tax because of that reform, and as the controversy dies the benefit will remain.

I had the opportunity to work on the six and five Budget. That was an imaginative effort that unified Canadians and brought them together in the fight against inflation. The six and five program provided Canadians with a management target that they could use in their personal lives to measure whether they were helping the fight against inflation or hurting it. Canadians took up the six and five program as their personal standard. They were able to identify with the elements of the program. As it ends in this Budget we can look back at it with great pride and realize that it has gone a long way toward unifying the economy and helping the fight against inflation.

Last April we saw the special recovery Budget. This was an effort to attack the weakest sectors of the economy and bring strength to them. It was a time to give the economy some kind of immediate stimulus until the private sector had the confidence and strength to take over. I think the present Budget follows dramatically in the steps of the special recovery Budget and the two should be seen as going hand in hand.

A few moments ago I mentioned that job creation and unemployment are major priorities for the Government. Let us take a look at what has been done in the Budget of April, 1983 and the Budget of February, 1984. There is a smooth flow of policy and economic thrust between those two periods. Over $3.5 billion has been committed for job creation and retraining in 1984-1985. The bulk of that money was committed back in April. Additions were made to those commitments in the Speech from the Throne last fall. Then in this Budget an extra $150 million was added to the Youth Opportunity Fund. The total package for this year alone is $3.5 billion. That stimulus is working as a result of the commitments made last April, last fall and again in February. There is a smooth flow of policy throughout all of this period.

● (1620)

In my riding, for example, at the Pearson Airport, a Special Recovery Project involves the expenditure of almost $14 million. There is also a railroad grade underpass where another $2.5 million is committed. In Mississauga South there is a third Special Recovery Project involving the expenditure of $2.5 million. That total expenditure of almost $20 million is a result of the April Budget and its impact is evident today. Workers in the construction industry in Mississauga are benefiting from the commitments made in 1983.

Additional work will be created as a result of the new commitments made last fall and again in the new Budget from Environment 2000. For example, in my riding again the Credit Valley Conservation Authority has asked for a grant of $250,000 under the environment 2000 Program. That stimulus will come into our riding in addition to all the extra stimuli provided by the Special Recovery Program.

Mr. Shields: The slush fund.

Mr. Fisher: The Special Recovery Program, Mr. Speaker, was instituted last April and it is still working.

Mr. Shields: The Liberal slush fund.

Mr. Fisher: It started the recovery and now we are waiting to help, in addition, the private sector. The Special Recovery Program was aimed at the weakest sectors, the construction industry, for example, and it was aimed at the new productive technological sectors like shipbuilding, high technology and aerospace.

I heard the Hon. Member opposite say it was a Liberal slush fund. I invite him to come into my riding and talk to the people who received work as a result of that, and he will learn that that kind of contempt is not acceptable to ordinary people. In fact, he should know that at the meeting of the Canadian construction industry in Toronto, where I spoke last fall, many of the people there were from Alberta and each of them said that the Special Recovery Program was a major incentive for the construction industry. The kind of contempt demonstrated by the attacks by Hon. Members, such as the one who interjected just now, is not being accepted by the Canadian people. People want to see some action and some compassion on behalf of unemployed workers, and this Government is providing that.

All of this special recovery activity, Mr. Speaker, is having a good impact. Let us take a look at what the Minister said in his Budget, and I quote from page 1423 of Hansard. He said:

> In my April budget, my goal was to secure the recovery. That goal has also been met. Growth has been stronger, inflation lower, and our employment higher than forecast last April. When we compare our economic recovery to that of other countries, Canada is faring better than most. Our economy, growing steadily and surely, is expected to be among the leaders in the industrial nations this year.

That is a direct quote from the Budget. There are some facts in the background documents which reinforce that claim. It is not a hollow claim. I will quote from a document entitled "The Canadian Economy in Recovery". On page 5, under the title "Economic Developments in Canada", and I will just skip over some of the quotations, the following is pointed out:

> Real output is estimated to have increased 6.3 per cent from the fourth quarter of 1982 to the fourth quarter of 1983, almost recovering the 6.5 per-cent decline experienced during the recession. The growth in output was accompanied by a 3.4 per-cent increase in employment—357,000 jobs—in the four quarters to the end of 1983. The decline in the rate of inflation since the introduction of the 6 & 5 program in June 1982 gained momentum in 1983. By the fourth quarter of 1983, consumer price inflation was running below 5 per cent.

There are other statistics in here. For example, and I quote:

> —real GNE is estimated to have increased 2.9 per cent in 1983.
> —real consumption expenditures rose an estimated 2.9 per cent, in part due to a decline in the savings rate from a high of 15.1 per cent in 1982 to an estimated 12.3 per cent in 1983.

A little further on in this report, Mr. Speaker, it says, and I quote:

> On balance, however, the over-all current account should achieve a moderate surplus in 1983 with net transfers continuing to move in Canada's favour.

Which is an observation which reflects very well on our trade performance.

I quote from page 7 where the report speaks about the Canadian dollar:

> On balance, the Canadian dollar strengthened against the currencies of Canada's non-U.S. major trading partners, rising about 7 per cent from the end of 1982 to the end of 1983 on a trade-weighted basis.
> The strength of the Canadian dollar and the continuing success on the inflation front allowed Canada more latitude than most other OECD countries in responding to international interest rate pressures in 1983.

That is contrary to the claims of the Hon. Member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson).

Finally, it states:

> The lower levels and the relative stability of interest rates in 1983 after several years of substantial volatility were positive developments for the financial position of the corporate sector.

All of those statistics—and there are many more—reflect the confidence which people can have in our economy today. They reflect the advances which we have made in our recovery. We can be sure, Mr. Speaker, that the ordinary Canadian agrees with the statement made by the Minister of Finance in his Budget when he said, and I quote from page 1423 of Hansard:

In my consultations with Canadians in all walks of life and in all regions, I have been encouraged by the sense of realism they bring to our economic and human challenges. There has been a renewal of confidence throughout the country—confidence in our economic potential and confidence in our ability to achieve that potential.

That is good news for Canadians who are looking forward to additional prosperity through the 1980s. Of course, we have a continuing problem with unemployment, and that is why I observed a moment ago, Mr. Speaker, that we have dedicated over $3.5 billion to work in the economy in 1984-1985 alone. Of that amount, an extra $150 million has been allocated to the Youth Opportunity Fund, bringing that fund up well over $1 billion in its commitment and activity in the Canadian economy.

All of this, Sir, is a good Liberal Government's approach. As an illustration, let me say we have immediately allocated increases of $50 a month in the guaranteed income supplement, $25 now and $25 in December. By December, recipients of the guaranteed income supplement will be receiving $85 a month more in GIS payments than they were receiving in 1980. That extra money is indexed so that the benefit is a permanent one for them. At the same time we improved private pensions. We made recommendations for reform on portability and vesting, for flexibility provided by a registered pension account, and for higher RRSP limits. The two measures combined represent the approach we as Liberals have followed. There is immediate help for those with the greatest need as represented by the GIS increase. There is a proposal for long-term reform for everyone in our country.

All of this comes out of extensive consultation. We saw a conference on pensions, federal-provincial discussions, a green paper and a parliamentary task force on pensions, all of it culminating in these measures in the Budget. We went to the Canadian people, examined the situation carefully, and then made some proposals which interested Canadians will help to shape into their ultimate form. That is a Liberal approach to this kind of problem.

We have seen similar approaches with the mortgage insurance plan, mortgage investment instruments which will bring back the ten-year market, and clearer rules. Again it is a balanced Liberal approach. We provide immediate help for those in need under the Canada Mortgage Renewal Plan, and we offer long-term reform through the ideas contained in this Budget.

There is plenty of benefit in my riding. People in Mississauga like to see the kind of changes we brought about in the sales tax reforms, and here I would like to pay particular credit to Mr. Richard Bennetts at Mary Kay Cosmetics whose advice to me personally on this issue has been informed and intelligent. We saw a lot of benefit derived in my riding from the sales tax reforms on domestic and foreign automobiles. My riding has over 5,000 small businesses, and those people will like the simplification offered in the tax rules. In my riding we have lots of senior citizens, many of whom have expressed to me their need for a simpler tax reporting system. The new method of reporting investment income will help hundreds of people in hundreds of families in my riding.

This Budget, Mr. Speaker, continues the smooth thrust developed previously, a thrust toward economic recovery. It is based on open consultation, both before and after the Budget, with large numbers of Canadians. It uses a Liberal approach which helps those most in need, offers reform in major social areas, and does so in partnership between Government and the private sector. I am proud to have worked on this Budget and I am proud to have been associated with the Minister of Finance in his recommendations.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I thought it was very fitting that the Hon. Member got his best advice from a cosmetics company, because the Government spends most of its time on cosmetic solutions.

Mr. Fisher: Another contemptuous comment; that is all you have. There are thousands of people who work for that company.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Hon. Member will have an opportunity later to respond.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I just wondered if his consultations were on how to use the blush brush?

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, that is a remarkably contemptuous comment. I do not understand why the Hon. Member would say that. Let me expand on the ideas I heard from Mr. Bennetts. I would like to assure the Hon. Member that Mr. Bennetts has thousands of women and men who work for him not only in their location in Mississauga but also as sales agents going from door to door right across the country. I am sure they will not think this is a laughing matter.

It was Mr. Bennetts who pointed out to me originally that the work of the task force was very positive. He indicated that it was not necessary for us to change the federal sales tax from the manufacturing to the wholesale level on all items. He indicated the problems with the administration of the tax, appeals and assessments, and the problems in specific industries like the car industry where we give unfair advantage to foreign competition. All of that was explained to me by this individual, and the result, not just because of his input but owing to similar input from hundreds of other businesses across the country, is the reforms we see in this Budget. We see the sales tax system being continued the way it is with much better rules, much fairer assessments, and with an attack on problem areas such as the car industry, and with a general sense that we should reform slowly because we have learned to live with this system over a period of some 50 years. I do not think that kind of benefit deserves the sort of contempt we just heard from the Hon. Member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen). I want to say that loudly so the Mary Kay ladies out there will vote against him.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, there was a lot of time spent in the Budget indicating how much the Government was concerned about small business. However, small businesses in my riding, and I am sure in the rest of the country, are suffering because of the inflexibility of the Federal Business Development Bank. Businesses are unable to refinance the 19 per cent to 22 per cent interest rates they are paying to that organization. Other businesses in the community which were lucky enough not to have to finance through that bank were able to bring their interest burden down to a much lower level, and in some cases they are now thriving. The businesses which were forced to work with the federal Government through the FBDB are suffering seriously and cannot refinance without heavy penalties. Perhaps the Hon. Member could tell me why that was left out of the Budget and why the Government is not doing anything about it.

Secondly, Mr. Speaker, in single industry communities in the sort of mid-Canada corridor where many of us represent communities, small businesses are suffering heavily from transportation costs which are a tremendous burden. The federal Government had the opportunity to remove, or at least ameliorate, the 9 per cent excise tax on fuel. It would have helped fishermen, brought into equality inshore and offshore fleets, and would have been of tremendous assistance in solving the transportation problem of high costs. Could the Hon. Member enlighten us as to what really could be done for small business to help them out with those problems?

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I mentioned in my comments that this Budget should also be read in connection with the April Budget. I would encourage the Hon. Member to do several things, which I do with small businessmen in my riding. First I tell them to check out the possibility of getting equity investment instead of debt financing. That possibility results from the tax changes introduced last April and is a real incentive for small businesses to have cash put in on an equity basis and get them off the inflexibility and high interest penalties they face with debt. I might add that the experience we have had in Vancouver, I believe, with the FBDB pooling ideas and investors, has proven to be very useful. The second thing I do is to refer my small businesses to the FBDB to see if they can find an investor to come into their business instead of their having to borrow the money. So there is a positive tax measure, and the FBDB has set up a group to try to pool investors to take advantage of investment opportunities and tax breaks.

I have to remind the Hon. Member that the FBDB is the lending institution of last resort. It is not a question of being lucky when you go there; it is a question of being risky. If you have a risky business and you cannot get a loan or investment elsewhere, the FBDB will look at you. But it is a high risk area. The financing comes from commercial banks, the loans are backed up by FBDB and the federal Government, and as a result the interest rates are higher. Business people do not like that, but they are practical and they know that if they have a risky business and need a lender of last resort, then they are going to pay a little bit extra. The FBDB's charges are not exorbitant in light of those conditions.

Mr. Parker: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Hon. Member why there was no provision made for small farmers who have come before the Cabinet with problems with regard to income tax. They have had to leave their small farms to go to work in small businesses and other places. They are now being attacked for three and four years of back taxes. Yet in the Budget there was a provision for the incremental oil revenue tax to be deferred for an additional year to June 1, 1985. Provision was made for the oil companies but not for the small farmer who must face high interest rates. In order to pay those rates he must obtain employment off the farm. Then the Department of Revenue taxes him and disallows expenditures on his small farm. Why was there no provision made for that? Is it because they were not able to come to Ottawa and lobby individually for their rights?

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question. It was expressed very emotionally and, I regret, very irrationally. First of all, the Hon. Member would be well advised to do his homework. He gets paid a good fat salary and should at least earn it by reading the Budget. The Budget says that a consultative committee will be set up to get rid of these problems. However, it is a very thin balancing act. The Hon. Member knows, or should know, that we could move in this area and make situations worse for farmers very much more easily than we could make them better.

The Hon. Member laughs, but all he has to do is to go to Surrey-White Rock-North Delta where farmland is at a premium and see what would happen there when hobby farmers flood into the area, raise land prices and take away legitimate producers because they want the tax benefit.

Mr. Parker: I will send that answer to my constituents.

Mr. Fisher: The Hon. Member has not taken that into consideration. The Hon. Member has also not taken into consideration the very special relief given to farmers to help them with RRSPs and capital gain problems upon retirement.

Mr. Parker: They want to save their farms.

Mr. Fisher: Again I see him rolling his eyes back and again obviously he has not listened to retiring farmers who will very much welcome the opportunity to spread out or remove altogether their capital gains burdens. Those are important problems. I suggest, after he has taken a look at all these things and—

Mr. Parker: After they lose their farms.

Mr. Fisher: —studied the issue in a little depth, that he might want to make a submission to the consultative committee. Hopefully, it will reflect a lot of thoughtfulness.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The time for questions and comments has now elapsed. We will proceed to debate. The Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly).

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, the previous speaker from Mississauga, wherever it is, reminds me so much of the other Member, the Hon. Member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn), that I can never keep the two constituencies or their lines of thought straight.

I really enjoy the Hon. Member's presentations in this House. Anyone who can maintain such humour and enthusiasm in the face of such a dismal performance as the Government has displayed throughout this Parliament really deserves the praise and support of the entire Parliament. There certainly is not another Member who can produce such enthusiasm, humour and vigour in the face of absolutely no content. There must be a medal that we as Members of Parliament could collectively conjure up to give such an individual.

There was one aspect, Mr. Speaker, that was very important. The Member for Mississauga North (Mr. Fisher) enjoys haranguing other Members of the House to do their homework. Unfortunately, the lack of background of the Member led him to misunderstand the question which I put to him concerning the Federal Business Development Bank. I would like to review that one more time for him. The point is that we are not talking about new investors in a business. The Hon. Member knows very well that in order to refinance the existing debt or cancel the debt due to repayment there is an enormous and unreasonable penalty imposed by the Federal Business Development Bank against those small businesses to bring in equity capital to attempt to pay back that debt.

The Member also knows that the problem is not one of risk. During the time of the Liberal Government's high interest period all businesses were at risk. During this period of time the Federal Business Development Bank was charging an usurious rate of interest. It is unfortunate that neither the Minister of State for Small Business and Tourism, (Mr. Smith) nor the former Parliamentary Secretary for the Minister of Finance will seriously consider talking to the Federal Business Development Bank to encourage it to allow refinancing without the exorbitant penalties and incredible amount of red tape with which it involves itself. Hopefully that Parliamentary Secretary, the Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) will seriously consider the concerns of small businesses and their very negative relationship with the Federal Business Development Bank.

During the Budget speech debate today I would like to call the attention of the House, and particularly of the Government, to three problems which the Budget completely ignores. The first problem is that of the fishing industry on the West Coast of the country, the second one is that of native communities, and the third one is that of single industry towns in general.

The most important one would be the problem of single industry towns. These spread from one end of the country to the other throughout the north. Much of the wealth generated in the country comes from single industry communities. There are 32 communities in the riding I represent. Many of them are in fact single industry communities. The ones which do not fit the classical definition resemble it very closely. A single industry town generally has one major employer. It may be a logging outfit, a pulp mill, a saw mill or a mine. That one employer is generally the only source of employment in the community. Therefore, one-half of the community is generally without any means of gainful employment. It is interesting to go into towns such as Gold River, Tahsis and Zeballos and find that only one spouse in a family can work. The other spouse, regardless of his or her level of talent, is unemployed with generally no hope of employment.

There seems to be a great trend of providing federal Government grants, federal Government initiatives and federal Government services to the larger communities in the southern Canadian belt. However, in those communities there is nothing for young people. The Government does not reach there with its programs. The Government does not reach there with its concern. In fact, it takes a look at the single industry town and notes that the average income of most wage earners there is medium to high. Yet for more than half of the community, for women and young people generally, those communities offer absolutely no opportunities.

The second serious problem which the Government's Budget fails to address, and which it fails to address generally, is the problem of Government services in those communities. Those communities are generally 100 miles or more from any source of Government services, whether it be postal service, unemployment insurance, National Health and Welfare programs, education programs, recreation programs or sports programs. Instead of providing mechanisms to service those communities the Government generally moves, in the restraint mode, to try to cut back the travel time of civil servants. As a result, no one ever gets into those communities to talk about summer employment programs, Canada Works Programs or the Environment 2000 Program. In fact, many of those communities are left out of the mainstream of opportunities through federal Government grants.

Unemployment insurance is a beautiful case in point. I will use the town of Tahsis as an example. There are two large sawmills there. Because the pulp industry is having difficulty and the same employer owns the pulp mill, saw mills and logging operations, they say that if they are shutting down the pulp mill they are going to shut down the sawmills. The Unemployment Insurance Commission used to send a person in there to collect the applications for unemployment insurance and the separation slips from the employer. They would put it all in a package and process it very quickly in the main centre 100 miles away in Campbell River. But they chose not to do this. In providing for restraint, by cutting back and being responsible, they decided it was well to be responsible in the community of Campbell River and in the southern communities. But it was not, I guess propitious to be responsible to the residents of Tahsis who pay a very large proportion of their wages in income tax. Consequently, they have to depend on the mail service, which from Tahsis and many other similar type communities is very poor. You can look at ten days one way. If an application is on its way, it takes ten days to come, then ten days to go back, and if there is a mistake, another ten days goes by before it is returned. You then correct the mistake, send it back, taking ten days more. By the time you have managed to establish your claim, a month to six weeks has gone by. The postal services are not good. The unemployment insurance services are not good. The employment services are nonexistent. Small businesses in single industry communities are in difficult situations. They deal with a small market. Prices, because of small volumes, are extremely high. The cost of transportation in many areas is absolutely outrageous. The ability of small businesses to attract financing and generally develop a range of goods and services for people in those communities is extremely limited. Not only does that hurt the entrepreneur in the small community, but it detracts from the quality of life in those communities. The small business assistance program that took special cognizance of the plight of small businesses in single-industry towns would be worthy of this Government since a great deal of the wealth here is generated in those communities, but they receive a very small share of the return on the investment they make.

Let me point out one other factor in single-industry towns. I am thinking of the cost of living, which is outrageous. There is usually a very limited supply of goods and services, whether we are talking about food, clothing or appliances. That small selection is generally extremely expensive when you can have the same things in the southern Canada belt. Again, there could be some concern that this Government provide some sort of relief for transportation costs. That in turn would provide a substantial benefit to those communities. It would improve the quality of life. It would improve the range of goods and services, and it would certainly bring down the prices. I mention that again to the former Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, the Hon. Member for Mississauga North (Mr. Fisher), who unfortunately with his rather convoluted explanations of the Federal Business Development Bank did not get around to the matter of reducing the federal excise tax on transportation fuels, or to the matter of allowing some form of rebate to designated single-industry communities that are beyond, say, a certain distance. Small businesses that bring goods into those communities could then apply for a rebate and reduce the cost of transportation. Should we be looking at another budget before the next election, which seems to be coming upon us at a rather rapid rate, I would hope that by raising these concerns the Government could pay closer attention in the next Budget to the plight of single-industry communities.

The next area I want to speak about concerns the native communities. Of the 32 communities in my riding, I have a rather large number of native communities. I am sure many other Members of Parliament have the same type of situation and are very concerned that this Budget does nothing for native communities. It does absolutely nothing. One of the greatest continuing failures of the Canadian Government is its failure to work with diligence to solve the problems of native communities or to help native communities solve their problems. Unemployment in most native communities within my riding ranges from 75 per cent to 90 per cent. The indicators of the quality of life in those communities are very different from the general indicators of the quality of life in Canadian society as a whole. Life expectancy is lower in native communities, a completely unjustified state of affairs. Infant mortality is higher and suicide rates are higher in those communities. Housing is abysmally poor. Medical and health care standards are much lower than they are generally in the Canadian society. Economic opportunities exist in many cases, but the access to capital, which would provide them with the ability to capture those opportunities, is extremely limited, if not non-existent. Training in native communities, because of the Government's failure to provide adequate resources to bring the development of human resources forward, is almost nonexistent; it does not appear in the Budget, Mr. Speaker. There is no mention in the Budget or any indication which could bring hope to those native communities. There is no doubt those communities are in serious difficulty. We have heard from Members who represent them time after time.

There are four general principles that I think would go a long way to help resolve the plight of native Canadians. The first one is the rapid settlement of aboriginal land claims. Access to land, water, forests and mineral resources is access to the wealth, a share of the wealth, of this country. This Government could make moves in some areas to provide perhaps downpayments on that access, which would bring a direct link to wealth in the native community.

Second, the Government has to provide access to capital. Without some form of developing resources readily available in some communities, native people will continue the cycle of welfare, unemployment insurance, limited seasonal work, back to unemployment insurance and then welfare. That access to capital is imperative. Many mechanisms have been suggested, but these suggestions have largely fallen on deaf ears. Given the choice of providing income maintenance in the form of welfare and unemployment insurance, the Government has failed to take advantage of many of the recommendations that have been put forward.

Third, the movement to Indian self-government is imperative. The entrenchment of the principles of native self-government in the Constitution must go forward, as well as the phasing out of the Department of Indian Affairs. Working diligently to support the development of the self-government concept for native people is imperative.

Fourth, a massive commitment to improve the quality of life in Indian communities is very important. There has to be a substantial investment in housing, health care, education, community services, and in income support systems for those native people who are, because of dislocation, age or some handicap, not able to participate in growing opportunities.

The Budget does not speak of native people. The Canadian Government has a special responsibility to the aboriginal peoples of this nation. Those people and that special responsibility have been completely ignored in this Budget. It is my opinion, and I think this opinion is shared by many Members of the House, that the Government will fail to act until after the next election on many of the important principles on which the House could act now to put native people at least on an improved footing to share more meaningfully in the wealth and the benefits of this country.

It is an absolute tragedy that the Government failed to put forward its special responsibility in a prominent way in the Budget.

The last item I would like to raise, because of its prominence and importance, is the fishing industry on the West Coast of Canada. That industry is in a serious and difficult situation. There is the potential for massive dislocation of both fishermen and coastal communities which depend upon the fishing industry. There are some very serious problems which the Government is compounding, in my view. The failure of the Government to listen and to consult in an effective and meaningful way with the various participants in this industry has led to a very divisive situation in which a variety of user groups are now in conflict not only with the Government but with each other as well. This will never lead to a solution to the problem. Effective consultation is extremely important. It would be almost as important for the Minister to go back to square one to try to pull the groups together and find a common approach so as to resolve this problem.

● (1700)

The Budget failed to address the non-controversial aspects of strengthening and improving the West Coast fishing industry. Also no resources are allocated in the Budget for enhancement of habitat protection. We are facing the Kemano completion project, the Quinsom coal project and logging out of our river valleys. The Government could have acted on these things with the unanimous agreement of all user groups. A pittance is being put forward under the Salmonid Enhancement Program, whereas a massive amount of funding is required. We need enforcement in that industry. Additional resources should be put into enforcement in that industry, especially now that things are so difficult. Catch allocations are almost cut in half. There will be more and more pressure. We need more enforcement.

My last point concerns high seas interception. Why are we enhancing salmon stock if they are simply being picked up by Japanese and Asian fishing fleets in the mid-Pacific? There is serious concern about American interception of our resources. At this point in time, one non-controversial aspect for which the Government could provide funding is a very detailed research program into the effect of the high seas fishing effort of Asian fleets on Canadian salmonid resources.

It is unfortunate that the Government—and certainly it was in tune with solving problems on the East Coast—largely ignored in this Budget many of the important non-controversial aspects of the West Coast fishing industry. By and large, with the comments I have heard in the House and the observations I have made of the province in which I live and the riding which I represent, I certainly do not share the enthusiasm of the previous speaker for the document we find before us today.

Mr. Kristiansen: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) a couple of questions. One concerns the subjects of unemployment and job creation which he mentioned in his remarks. Some of us have viewed with some consternation and puzzlement the continuing claims of the Government that it has created more jobs in a shorter period of time—I believe that is the claim—than almost any other government in the western industrialized world.

Perhaps his assessment or judgment is similar to mine. We are seeing something similar to a recycled old western movie where the cavalry continually goes by the gap in the canyon. There are many short-term jobs, so they are continually recycled and regurgitated. Actually they are not jobs in the normal sense of the word. That is my impression of many of these programs. As desirable as many of them may be, they have a short-term impact. Is the Hon. Member's assessment similar to that of my own? What is his experience with those programs in his constituency?

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, the question of job-creation programs points to several things. First, there is a great deal of political patronage involved in the business of job creation. That certainly has not given an opportunity for communities to put forward suggestions that would use those job-creation dollars to the best effect or give the biggest bang for the dollar. There have been some tragic examples of how political patronage has distorted the fair efforts of the Government to try to create meaningful jobs and economic opportunities in communities. Political patronage is a very serious flaw in the job-creation program.

Second, there is no effective mechanism for community consultation. Unfortunately there has been a cut-back of public servants who do the evaluation. There has been a failure to put forward a small amount of resources to make effective the consultation process. Sometimes a little seed money in a community through a job-creation program can create an enormous effect in terms of the community bringing forward a long-standing, solid economic program. I could point to the communities of Powell River and Alert Bay. In these areas small amounts of money have in fact helped. Certainly the Government does not go nearly far enough. I could point to another very successful program where we used Canada Works money in my riding. I was very pleased that the Government was able to assist us with this money to hire employment enhancement workers. The jobs of each one of those people were worth about $5,000 in Canada Employment funds. They created, along with the committees with which they worked, about $1 million per person worth of economic activity. I have tremendous praise for those three people. The cost was $15,000 and they generated roughly $3 million worth of activity.

The third factor is the single-industry town problem in which the focus of employment activity for Canada Works

Government grants tends to be in larger communities. Larger communities have economic opportunities which the smaller ones do not have. Unfortunately there is tremendous resistance. The Public Service establishes a set of priorities based upon blanket population and upon arbitrary allocation of resources. It is tremendously difficult to change those arbitrary plans and those arbitrary allocations so that the dollars are spent in communities where the need is greatest.

I am very pleased that the Hon. Member asked me his questions. I hope some of my answers might be taken as suggestions for improving job-creation programs.

Mr. Kristiansen: Mr. Speaker, I have a further question which concerns the new job-creation programs mentioned in the last Speech from the Throne. In my constituency of Kootenay West we have now been frustrated on three occasions by a provincial ministry, the parks branch of the Conservative Government of British Columbia. It has blocked three different Environment 2000 projects in that community alone. The branch has given as an excuse, although informally, "union problems". The unions concerned are unaware of such "problems". In fact, that provincial Conservative Government is using prisoners to do some of the work in those parks. This is why it does not want Environment 2000 involved. I wonder how widespread that experience is. We have one from the Nakusp Legion, another from the Kootenay Mountaineering Club and another from further down on the Arrow Lakes. We are facing that kind of problem throughout British Columbia.

Has the Hon. Member faced those situations in his riding? If so, what action would he suggest in order to try to turn them around and ensure that the provincial Conservative Government is not frustrating the few things which the Government opposite does?

Mr. Fisher: We are neck deep in good things.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, the only thing in which the Hon. Member will be neck deep at the next federal election is a rope. That brings great joy to my heart. The question raised by my colleague is certainly a very valid one. Unfortunately, the people of British Columbia, more than those in any other Canadian province, are being deprived of federal funding or their share of the return of tax dollars for programs by one of the most vicious, anti-people governments which has been seen in this country to date.

I wonder whether the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) at some point might want to retract his statement that the provincial Government in British Columbia might be doing some things wrong. He is on the right track. It has probably deprived British Columbians of more in a shorter period of time than any other government in Canada.

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure for me to rise today to participate in the debate on the Budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde). This Budget is really a program of action designed to lead Canada from recovery to expansion. I believe it is a very timely Budget in that it shows business and the various economic sectors in Canada the direction in which we are heading in terms of our economy and our economic plan so that businessmen can plan ahead with confidence and the knowledge that the programs are in place and that they can build upon these programs in the years ahead as they make long-term investments.

I am alarmed that during this Budget debate various Members of the Official Opposition have been making comments that are somewhat difficult to substantiate. They have made comments about the National Energy Program. One referred to it as an odorous program. They have failed to follow what has been happening with the National Energy Program. I pointed out in a question yesterday that over 4,000 oil wells had been drilled and completed in Canada in 1983. I am talking about oil wells, not gas wells. One province alone has over 11,000 gas wells that are capped because of lack of markets. Why would any driller want to drill more gas wells when there is such a surplus? I repeat, over 4,000 oil wells were drilled and completed in Canada in 1983. Compare that with the previous best year, 1980, when 2,600 were drilled and completed in Canada. There was an increase of 53 per cent. Something must be working, or we would not have had that increase. I further point out that in 1984 the number of wells drilled and completed as of February 4, 1984 was 11 per cent over 1983. The number of rigs drilling is up dramatically. Something must be working in the National Energy Program with the expansion that is taking place. It is irresponsible to cast such a cloud of doom and gloom over the energy industry in Canada when there has been a dramatic turnaround. The small oil companies and the companies providing allied services are contributing to our economic recovery.

I want to comment on some other matters mentioned this morning by Members of the Official Opposition. They complained about the lack of assistance in the Budget for farmers wishing to export, in this case the export of tobacco. It is mystifying, to say the least, how members of the Official Opposition can make such a complaint when it is they who opposed the legislation going through the House last year. With the makeup of the board of Canagrex, including the president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture as chairman of the board, a director of the Ontario Flue-Cured Tobacco Growers' Marketing Board, a former chairman of the board, as well as other producers, I had hoped that members of the Official Opposition would have accepted this. I find it difficult to accept their comments which question the competence of those people in responsible positions, working in partnership with producers and processors to obtain a larger share of the export markets. This organization was put in place to exploit our export potential. It is not only for the benefit of farmers, but also for farmers working in unison with others in the food chain.

I find it somewhat difficult to accept the suggestion that adjustments in capital gains tax will not be of much value. One Member who spoke this morning indicated that if someone wanted to take back a mortgage he would not have the money to put into an RRSP. Even though there may have been accumulative capital gain of $240,000 since 1972 that really is non-taxable under the new provisions, surely we must remember that there must have been a value there before V-day in 1972. As these farmers are retiring and selling their operations, they will have such funding and, if necessary, be able to take back a mortgage. There are other ways of taking advantage of RRSPs that will benefit any farmer who has had his investment tied up in his operation over the years and who wants to retire with the dignity and respect which he worked so hard to achieve.

I am very pleased to be associated with the Minister of Finance. I look forward to working closely with him in the months ahead. I respect him for the many bold initiatives he has taken in this recent Budget in consultation with Canadians across this country. I was amazed to see the number of national organizations that he consulted so that Canadians from one coast to the other can point out from prior Budget consultations what the effect will be of various changes that are required as we attempt to ensure that the recovery is maintained.

I want to dwell for a few moments on the commitment of this Government to the family farm operation. I am a farmer professionally. Well over half my riding is rural. I want to underline the provisions which will have a direct and extremely beneficial impact all across Canada. We worked hard on these special measures over the last many months to ensure that retirement funds in the farm sector are not subjected to attacks from inflation. I remind Hon. Members that the capital gains tax was originally brought in in the early 1970s to replace the estate tax, which created such a burden over the years. Little did those who advocated the capital gains tax system, even farm organizations, realize the inflationary spiral we would have during the seventies. That inflationary spiral was checked only when this Government brought in the six and five program that has been so effective in protecting retirement earnings in all sectors of our economy.

The Minister of Finance has taken pains to make the Government's intention clear with Section 31 of the Income Tax Act. As well, he emphasized that farm losses are not in any way restricted only to those farmers whose principal occupation is farming. I would like to examine some of these provisions in these areas in detail, the areas of capital gains, second several technical amendments providing for the transfer of family farms and, third, Section 31 of the Income Tax Act.

The tax-free rollover of capital gains for farmers building pensions demonstrates how well this Government understands the special position of farmers. Often a farmer does not have cash to put into an RRSP. The income which the farmer makes is usually put right back into the farm in the form of buildings, equipment and the acquisition of more land as he builds up his base to form an economic unit. This continual upgrading and expansion is the secret to his success as a farmer. Indeed, it is the key to this country's success as a leading and progressive agricultural nation.

The productivity of Canadian farmers is higher than that of any other nation on a one-to-one basis. This capital investment that is built up over the years has to be looked upon by the individual as a retirement pension when the proceeds of a sale of property are used to finance his retirement. However, it has meant that the farmers' retirement savings were vulnerable because of these large capital gains that have resulted from an inflationary spiral. The Budget proposal makes changes so that the farmers would be better able to provide for their retirement.

To qualify for the maximum benefit, the farmer must have owned the property as of December 31, 1983, dating back to 1972. It covers farm land, buildings and equipment used by the taxpayer, spouse or children, and includes shares in family farm corporations or in a family partnership.

We all realize that only one-half of any capital gain is taxable. We can look at how we would calculate the amount of the capital gains that qualify for special deduction. The taxpayer simply multiplies by $10,000 the number of years between 1972 and 1983 inclusive that he or she has been a full-time farmer. Let us say that an individual started up an active operation in 1976 and sold the land in 1985. This would mean that the individual was a full-time farmer for eight years during the 1972 to 1983 period. Given a deduction of $10,000 for each of these eight years, he could contribute a maximum of $80,000 of taxable capital gains to an RRSP. This would be $80,000 less any other contributions made to an RRSP or registered pension plan for 1984-85 in this example. Thus, he would be able to reap a tax-free capital gain of $240,000 from sale of the farm. This new measure permits savings of federal income tax of an estimated $70 million in a full year with savings on provincial income tax of about half that amount.

We note as well that a special provision will extend the benefit to those who would otherwise qualify but have passed the 71-year age limit for contributions to an RRSP. When the broad pension reform measures set out in the Budget paper, Building Better Pensions for Canadians: "Improved Tax Assistance for Retirement Savings", are fully implemented, and stage two which is planned for January of 1988 is in place, farmers and small business owners will be able to carry forward their unused RRSP deduction entitlements from one year to the next. This will enable them to transfer funds from the sale of a farm business into retirement savings plans when they retire, using tax deduction entitlements built up during their working years. This special tax-free rollover measure for capital gains built pensions that I have described will provide significant relief in the period prior to the full implementation of the broad pension reform measures contained in stage two which I have just mentioned.

As you can see, Mr. Speaker, this Budget proposal is made in recognition of the unusually large proportion of lifetime farm income that is accrued in the form of capital gains rather than annual income. This proposal will therefore allow farmers in particular more flexibility in planning their retirement income in circumstances where their annual income may have been insufficient to allow for the adequate funding of an RRSP. Eventually, I personally would like to see this measure extended to other sectors of the economy in those cases where, like farmers, there is a disproportionately large portion of income in the form of capital gain and where that annual income is not adequate for the funding of retirement savings plans.

The second important innovation contained in the Budget is a provision which will facilitate the transfer of family farms from one generation to another. We must recognize that in the long term, it may take several generations to build up a viable farm unit. Consequently, as an operation expands and everything is invested back into it and the second or third generation comes along having accumulated these various blocks of land and property which make a viable unit, there must be some form of protection to ensure continuity so that the farm does not have to be disposed of at death. This pricing arrangement is not allowed under the present legislation if the transfer is made after the death of a parent as the family farm bequest or inheritance. The Budget proposes to make a change so that on the death of a farm owner after 1983, the transfer of farm property will be allowed to be made at any amount between the property's cost and its fair market value. In other words, it would put family farm bequests and inheritances on the same basis as transfers made prior to the death of the owner of the farm.

As the Budget papers point out, an additional change will expand the types of properties eligible for inter-generational farm transfers to include farm properties leased by a taxpayer to his or her family farm corporation or to a family farm corporation or partnership of his or her spouse or child. This change is applicable to transfers made after December 31, 1983, and will address those circumstances where the farming activity is carried on within the context of the family farm corporation but the farm property is owned personally and is leased or rented to the corporation. Tax-free rollover treatment will also be provided in a special case where a child who received a farm from a parent dies while the parent is still living. In this situation, the farm could be passed back to the parent without immediate tax liability. As you can see, Mr. Speaker, the Government is doing all it can to ensure that the family farm as an important economic unit will continue, not only as a way of life but as a viable business entity.

Back about 29 years ago, Mr. Speaker, I well remember taking part in a series of debates over a winter. The topic of one of those debates was: "Resolved that farming is no longer a way of life but in fact is a business". We have seen that come about very emphatically in the last few years. I remember another debate which resolved that "The present practice of unplanned urban expansion is detrimental to agriculture in Ontario". That occurred back in 1955 and the problem still exists.

I would like to bring us up to date from that time by touching on Section 31 of the Income Tax Act. It must be made clear that the original intent of that section was to make sure that the wealthy, professional people who were looking for a place to invest their money did not take advantage of their hobby farm operation as an income tax writeoff. This Budget addresses that situation and the Minister very clearly pointed out that it is not to be used and was never intended to be used for those individuals who make farming their full-time business but, in order to become established, have to use the money earned from off-farm work to in fact subsidize their operation and get it started.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out that this Budget is one that is intended to ensure that Canadians realize the level of stability that has been brought to Canada over the last two years of recovery and to point out that we intend to maintain that recovery. As we look at the various comparisons in the Budget papers, we note that the GNP will increase dramatically over the next few years and as that increases, the amount of indebtedness that we have been hearing so much about will decrease. As the Hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey) pointed out this morning, we must look at the total value of our economy as a whole, including the GNP.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a short question to the Parliamentary Secretary, and I will be brief. I hope he will be brief as well because there are other Hon. Members who wish to participate.

The Budget provides that there will be $25 in additional funds paid to those old age pensioners who are drawing the guaranteed income supplement and who are single and that those additional funds will begin to be paid on July 1 with a second equal payment on December 1 making $50 extra a month. The war veterans allowance has for many years been based upon a certain figure and when a veteran who is entitled to war veterans allowance draws a guaranteed income supplement and an old age pension, those are deducted from his war veterans allowance, leaving a top-up that is paid by Veterans Affairs. Can the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ferguson) assure the House that that top-up will remain at least at its present point, over and above the OAS plus the GIS?

● (1730)

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I will certainly look into that. The Budget deals specifically with the guaranteed income supplement but, as the Hon. Member pointed out, there is no reference at this time to the war veterans' allowance, but I hope we will be able to make the appropriate adjustments.

When I looked at the amount of the OAS and the GIS paid out in my constituency last fall, I was quite surprised that in a community of 9,000 people, the Government was giving senior citizens something like $4.7 million per year. This is made up of the old age pension and GIS payments. Normally the rule of thumb is that one-third of the amount paid out in old age pensions is paid in guaranteed income supplements. The amount of money the Government had paid out to senior citizens and pensioners is staggering. I hope that, as we look at the GIS increases and as we examine the war veterans' allowance in more detail, no means test will be associated with it.

Mr. Lewycky: Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary talked about recovery and dwelt on the situation of farmers. The only problem I find with his presentation was that he dealt strictly with retiring farmers—it is almost pie in the sky by and by. What about those farmers who need a few crumbs on the table immediately?

The Parliamentary Secretary is aware that the Speech from the Throne promised changes to the Western Grain Stabilization Plan, but there was nothing in the Budget to indicate funds will be available to assist farmers in this area. There is nothing about energy costs either. The Hon. Member spoke about the energy program. I know he is a farmer and has been involved with agriculture in all regions of Canada. Is he aware that among the small farmers, especially in western Canada, energy has become the number one cost? If he has farmers coming into his constituency office, as I do, their books will show that in 1981 and 1982 interest was the number one cost. Would he not agree that today energy costs are the problem that farmers are facing? There was nothing in the Budget about that.

The excise tax rebate of 1.5 cents per litre is not adequate. I am sure the Hon. Member is aware that today more and more farmers are using diesel fuel instead of gasoline and they need some kind of help. Would he not agree that the Budget should contain measures that will assist farmers immediately, not just when they retire? Pie in the sky by and by is not going to help those who are on the verge of bankruptcy at the moment. I am sure the Hon. Member has been in his riding during the past week.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order, please. There is a certain repetition in the Hon. Member's question. The Hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ferguson).

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to respond to the question. I should draw to the attention of the Hon. Member that one of the reasons there was nothing in the Budget about this was that as of February 1, 1984 the tax on natural gas and natural gas liquids was removed. Of course, the Hon. Member realizes that natural gas is the base for the manufacture of anhydrous ammonia. The federal Government feels that it has gone as far as it can in that context.

The costs associated with the production of natural gas will not be the same in Ontario as in Manitoba, I am sure, but on the equivalent of 1,000 cubic feet or one million British thermal units, about 22 per cent of the cost of natural gas goes to the producing provinces—that may vary from region to region. In Ontario there is a $1.01 transportation charge and one 15-cent ownership charge goes to the federal Government. The utility company that sells the gas makes a profit of over $2 per 1,000 cubic feet. There is not much that the federal Government can do about these costs.

I should like to draw to the attention of the Hon. Member that the Farm Credit Corporation has provided a tremendous amount of funding for farmers over the last three years. The funding has gone from roughly $500 million in 1981 to $635 million in 1982. In the 1983 fiscal year we expect the fund will be well over $700 million, and perhaps as high as $730 million. We have put a tremendous amount of effort into this. I would also ask that farmers look at the legislation available to them so that they can make an income that will give them a return on their investment commensurate with that in the rest of society.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I do not have a question, I have a comment. I should like to take a minute to wish my successor in this job of Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance all the best. I know him from other work in the House. I know he has a tough job, but he has a lot of ability and he has a very good boss. I am sure he will be successful.

I should also like to take the opportunity to extend my thanks to representatives of the other Parties whom I have found to be very co-operative during the past two years.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance. In his closing remarks to me a few moments ago he said that he thought a staggering amount was paid out in his constituency to old age pensioners. I doubt very much if that opinion is shared by the old age pensioners.

In his closing remark he also said that the war veterans' allowance top-up would be paid without a means test. He either does not know what he is talking about or he has just announced a radical change in government policy over the years. If that is so, would he reassure us that he is serious and knows what he is talking about and that we are now going to have the war veterans' allowance without a means test?

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that my remark was taken out of context. I was referring to the means test referred to by the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). This referred only to old age pensions in the past. It was only old age pensions and has nothing to do with the war veterans' allowance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): The period for questions has expired. For debate I recognize the Hon. Member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain).

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, when farmers, fishermen and foresters have to deal with a Minister of Finance from an urban area and a Parliamentary Secretary who has been absorbed in the urban sprawl—I do not mean the Hon. Member for Lambton-Middlesex (Mr. Ferguson)—we find that there is not much understanding of the primary industries in the Government's taxing policies.

In the few minutes that I have I want to dwell on the tax changes which must be made in fairness to those farmers. They do not live on the delta or in the area the Hon. Member for Lambton-Middlesex has referred to with respect to hobby farmers and professionals coming from the city and absorbing their land. The general farmer does not live in those areas nor does he have the opportunity to sell his land to either group. Therefore, I want to give some quotations from "Tax Topics" in respect of some decisions that have been made, some of which are judicial.

● (1740)

First of all, I would like to quote the following sample case:

The taxpayer grew up on a farm and purchased a quarter section of farmland in 1969 when he got married. He also purchased eight head of cattle and a horse. During the next few years he worked several months of each year off the farm as an electrician but, at the same time, he continued to build up his herd and to engage in other farming activities. In 1981, the taxpayer began working on a deal, which was completed in 1982, to purchase six quarter sections of land and certain farm equipment.

If anyone needed proof that this man had engaged in farming in a serious way, his final purchase certainly provided that proof to any intelligent individual in Canada.

The report continues:

The taxpayer claimed farm losses for 1976 and 1977 taxation years. During each of these years, the taxpayer earned employment income in excess of $20,000. The Minister restricted the farm losses to $5,000 for each of these taxation years and the taxpayer appealed to the Tax Court of Canada. The Court found that the taxpayer was a gentleman farmer until 1981 when he made the first steps to acquire the appropriate assets for land and machinery. The Minister therefore properly restricted the farm losses in the taxation years in issue. The taxpayer's appeal was dismissed accordingly.

This is not, Mr. Speaker, an intelligent application of the meaning of the Income Tax Act by the Department of National Revenue. However, it does reflect the remarks made by both the Hon. Member for Mississauga North (Mr. Fisher) and the Hon. Member for Lambton-Middlesex who tried to defend the Government's attack on farmers who did not deserve the insult of the Department of National Revenue's interpretation of their principal occupation. I appeal to two urbanites, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde), and the former Parliamentary Secretary to that Minister, to consider the text of a release dated December 19, 1983 from the Joint Committee on Taxation of the Canadian Bar Association and The Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, which I will quote. It reads:

A submission of the Joint Committee on Taxation of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants and the Canadian Bar Association to Revenue Canada suggests that limits on the deduction for farm losses should be repealed.

This quotation is not from a farmer. It is from the legal and accounting experts of Canada who offer this advice to the Government. The quote continues:

The limits now penalize a person who expects to make a profit through farming but who also has other income, the brief notes. Since the Income Tax Act does not restrict deduction of losses from any other business except farming, the committee does not see the justification for such a restriction in the case of farm losses. If the farm has a reasonable expectation of profit, it is a business, the losses of which should be deductible.

And after a man purchases six sections of land and is still not considered to be a serious farmer, there has to be a check made by the Minister of Finance as to why. Another recommendation reads as follows:

A fisherman making a voluntary disposition and replacement of his vessel should be entitled to the same protection as another taxpayer who disposes of and replaces "former business property". That is, any gain on the disposition should be netted against the cost of the replacement vessel rather than being taxed immediately.

The difficulty is that the "urbanites" do not understand the primary industries and their problems. I would just like to refer to one other problem in the fishing industry. When a lobster fisherman files his income tax return, it is recognized by the Department of Fisheries—and the Taxation Department has been so informed—that the minimum bait expense for a lobster fisherman is $15 a trap. Now, Mr. Speaker, when a fisherman presents his return to the present Government with its capability to interpret, he is not allowed the $15 and is often taxed retroactively, in spite of the obvious expense.

I appeal to these "urbanites" who have prepared this Budget to take a look at the country boy and give him a little proper consideration. Take the interpretation capability out of the hands of Revenue Canada and amend these sections which allow hoodlums with a quota to penalize our primary industry.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): It being 5:45 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 64.(8), to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question now before the House. The question is as follows: Mr. Lalonde, seconded by Mr. Ouellet, moves:

That this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the Government.

All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): In my opinion, the yeas have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Call in the Members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Lalonde), which was agreed to on the following division.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S.O. 21

[English]

ROAD SAFETY

CALL FOR MANDATORY USE OF SEATBELTS IN BUSES

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, the seatbelt laws now in force in most provinces apply to passenger cars, but in most cases do not apply to school buses and commercial buses. Statistics have shown that seatbelts have proven themselves in the prevention of serious accidents and many traffic deaths. However, it is disturbing to pick up a paper and read about school bus accidents that have resulted in death and serious injuries to school children that could have been prevented if seatbelts were available.

In Vancouver last month, serious injuries to ten young special-needs passengers were prevented when a school bus, equipped with seatbelts, was hit by a car and flipped over. Because of the seatbelts no one was thrown around and suffered severe injuries.

Just as vulnerable to serious injuries and death are those passengers travelling on public buses each day here in Ottawa and other municipalities. These passengers, including those standing in the buses each morning and evening, are more vulnerable to any accident that may take place, because of the absence of seatbelts. I realize that seatbelt legislation comes under provincial jurisdiction. However, I urge the federal Government to take the initiative by urging its provincial counterparts to pass legislation to make seatbelts mandatory on all school buses and on all commercial buses across Canada.

EMPLOYMENT

DISTRIBUTION OF JOB-CREATION FUNDS

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Mr. Speaker, before the House rose for a one-week break, and again this week, Opposition Members were wailing about job grants on a "you got more than we got" basis. My riding of Parkdale-High Park was named by the Toronto Star on February 10 as the top money-receiving constituency in Metro Toronto. I am proud of that record because it meant more jobs for unemployed Canadians.

Who really got job-creation grants? Are the grants the property of MP's or ridings, or are they grants to assist unemployed Canadians in a region? The point of the Opposition's protest could be understandable if the funds were going into the pockets of MP's. They are not. The funds are going to community and municipal groups. These groups or municipalities, in putting forward projects, think in the context of their communities, not that of federal ridings. People provided with employment opportunities as a result of job-creation grants are not hired on the basis of Party affiliation or even what riding they live in.

This Government recognizes that people want jobs. Are the Opposition Members trying to tell them they should not have a job because a Liberal MP was on the ball and obtained a grant, while they played "poor me" politics? Maybe the Opposition should be thinking more about employment opportunities afforded by this Government to unemployed workers on the basis of need, not their residency location or political affiliation, rather than thinking of what MP got what.

The Opposition would have a scandal if they could give a concrete example of, say, a worker from a neighbouring riding such as Etobicoke Centre being rejected because he or she is not in the riding of—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Unfortunately, the Hon. Member's time has expired.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

GRANTS TO CANADAIR AND DE HAVILLAND

Mr. Gerry St. Germain (Mission-Port Moody): Mr. Speaker, yesterday it was reported that another $550 million of taxpayers' money has been jettisoned into Canadair and de Havilland. The magnitude of that dollar amount is beyond the comprehension of most Canadians, especially to the two million unemployed.

I am sure the workers of de Havilland and Canadair are worried about mismanagement, the lack of controls, and the lack of accountability, because this could lead to their unemployment as well. These Government bailouts are like trying to fill a bottomless pit.

There is an alarming, growing trend in this country—Maislin, Dome, de Havilland, and Canadair. This is the list of financial disasters and failures that the Government opposite has seen fit to prop up with Canadian tax dollars. The Government has gone wild with our tax dollars. It destroys small business and jobs, with taxation and regulation. It threatens to destroy the very fibre of our economic base with its lack of accountability and total disregard for managing the Government's purse strings.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

POLITICAL PARTIES

PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE PARTY—SOCIAL SECURITY POLICIES

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, oh, the high priest of all things mean, tough, and nasty, the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), finance critic for the Conservative Party, recently announced his Party's policy on family allowances and old age pensions. The Conservatives would go back to the days of means tested benefits, forcing senior citizens and poor women to suffer the indignity of detailed examination of all of their income and assets, by snooping public servants.

The CCF and NDP, and in particular pioneers such as the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and J. S. Woodsworth, fought long and hard for decent pensions and family allowances. We have called, for example, for an immediate 25 per cent increase in universal old age pensions and increases in the GIS to bring poor, elderly Canadians, a high proportion of whom are women, above the poverty line.

Given the new Conservative policy as announced by the Conservative finance critic, it is no wonder that Maureen McTeer recently said:

> Because of the type of people who supported the present leader, there is a nervousness . . . there is a tendency . . . to think the Party is moving backwards.

Under the mean, tough, and nasty hand of the Hon. Member for St. John's West and his Conservative colleagues, women and senior citizens will be the first victims. Burnaby women and seniors, beware!

EMPLOYMENT

RE-EDUCATION PLAN TO COPE WITH TECHNOLOGICAL CHANGE

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, a national advisory panel to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Roberts) has developed a 10-year plan designed to help re-educate our nation in order to cope with technological change. The plan calls for the Government to take immediate action to implement programs to reduce illiteracy among Canadians, and to create programs to cope with growing job obsolescence.

The proposed scheme would provide employees with time off to take courses which would improve their skills or retrain them for other jobs. Employees would earn the time off as they now earn vacation pay or sick leave. A tax credit for employers participating in the program would mean that public funds could be used to help workers retrain. At the same time this would help relieve the unemployment rate by paying for unemployed workers to be hired on a fill-in basis. I urge the Government to give considerable priority to this proposal as it offers a progressive model for the lifelong learning process which I believe would benefit the Canadian work force.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN GRAIN STABILIZATION ACT—DEMAND FOR AMENDMENT

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal Government is again betraying the western farmer. The Liberal Minister, when introducing the Western Grain Stabilization Act, told western producers that the fund would provide a cash flow in times of need. In 1982 western grain farmers suffered a loss of income, and they suffered another loss in 1983. Last year 154 prairie farms went bankrupt, with hundreds more on the verge of bankruptcy.

The complicated formula used in the Act covers too large an area and provides for a payout in the fifth year. This could be changed by the House in 10 minutes if the Government would bring in the Bill as it promised to do in the last Speech from the Throne. The stabilized fund now contains over $900 million, and the farmers need the money now. Their cash flow has seldom been worse. This hoarding of the farmers' money is aggravating and, worse still, the farmers are not even permitted to opt out and get their own money back.

Progressive Conservative Members of the House have urged the Government for months to provide a payout, but the Liberals have consistently refused. The Government has locked the farmers into the Act, refuses to let them opt out, and refuses to provide a payout. It almost seems as if the Government wants western farmers to go bankrupt.

The frustration and dissatisfaction of our farmers are so great that hundreds would opt out now if they could. I ask the Government to bring in the Western Grain Stabilization Act for amendment forthwith, and provide for a payout now. Yes, now!

BILINGUALISM

POSITION OF LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Mr. Pierre Gimaïel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Mines)): Mr. Speaker, I am rising to speak in the House today because, after spending a week in my riding, I found that one of the major concerns of the people of Lac-Saint-Jean, a riding that is one of the Francophone bastions of Canada, is what is happening in Manitoba, especially with respect to French language rights outside Quebec.

The point I wish to make, Mr. Speaker, is that it is high time the Leader of the Opposition clarified his Party's position once and for all. The Liberal Party of Canada which, over the years, has welcomed Canadians whatever their language, culture or race, is now asking the other major Party in the House, which claims to be the Party that might take over from the present Government, to do likewise. I wish they would stop telling Quebecers that their Party is open to the French fact and to official policies on bilingualism, because it is the same Party that convinced Manitobans their rights would be endangered if they were to give rights to Francophones! What the Conservatives of Manitoba have done is politically unacceptable, Mr. Speaker. The Leader of the Party should say so. He should discipline future candidates in his Party who supported the Provincial Conservatives in Manitoba, as well as members of his Party who, in the past, have taken a stand against this country's policies on bilingualism. If this is not done, Mr. Speaker, their Leader will have shown that he is not a man capable of holding the office of Prime Minister of Canada nor of leading his Party.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE LATE C. J. MACKENZIE

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay belated respect to a great Canadian who passed away last week when the House was not sitting. C. J. Mackenzie enjoyed a long life—he was on this earth for 95 years. Yet when one reviews his numerous accomplishments, it is hard to believe that one person could have done so much in such a short time. He was one of the greatest forces in Canadian science. He was, among other things, the head of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited in its infant years, and later the President of the Atomic Energy Control Board. But Chalmers Jack Mackenzie will be most remembered as the head of the National Research Council during World War II and the late 1940s.

It was during this period that the NRC, and Canada in general, established an expertise in scientific research that brought our country a world-wide reputation and a range of economic and non-economic benefits that Canadians enjoy today and will for decades to come.

Canada owes a great deal to C. J. Mackenzie. It is only fitting that this House commend his memory today.

EXTERNAL AID

MINISTER'S STATEMENT ON UNITED STATES FOOD PROGRAM

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, mankind has wrestled for centuries and aeons with the problem of matching food production with consumption and with world population. Yesterday at the United Nations the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) dealt with that difficult problem to some extent, but in a way uncharacteristic of him. A good part of his remarks criticized the United States for its "payment in kind" program through which it has attempted to reduce the overburdening surpluses of feed grain and wheat in the American market, which were overhanging the rest of the world. The Minister labelled this an unchristian kind of approach.

I urge the Minister to rethink his attitude. Is he saying that the response of Third World countries to the crisis by reducing their birth rate is unchristian, that it is not the Moslem or Buddhist response? This is the only way that the United States has, with its system, of attacking that particular surplus problem.

Did the Minister describe the Canadian answer to surplus production through the handling of dairy production, eggs or poultry, as unchristian? No. he did not, but it is definitely controlled production. I think it is not the role of Canada to criticize other countries for applying a different system.

NATIONAL REVENUE

OFFICIAL'S THREAT TO BUSINESSMAN—MANAGEMENT OF KITCHENER OFFICE

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. Yesterday in Kitchener a tape was played on which a tax collector, referring to a businessman, said:

> I want to see you in our office by noon tomorrow; otherwise we'll put you out of business.

This was confirmed by the head of the Kitchener tax office. The Kitchener tax office supervisor said that it was just one of those stupid things and the employee was reprimanded.

Evidence was heard, finally, regarding the collection process in Kitchener, as follows:

> —that this office has been far too soft in its collections approach and you haven't had any seizures in here and we're going to get some—that's where the real fun of collections is.

These are very, very serious allegations, Mr. Speaker. What steps have been taken to correct them?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the first part of the question of the Hon. Member, I want to tell him and the House that such conduct by an employee of the Department is totally improper and, as the Hon. Member has acknowledged, the man was reprimanded.

On the second point, I think it is important that we have effective collection action in the Department when money is owed to it. With respect to the more general problem of management in the district office, that problem has been dealt with.

Mr. Speyer: Mr. Speaker, I find the Minister's answer to be totally unsatisfactory. The part that concerns Members of the House on all sides, I think, is the comment "that's where the real fun of collection is", with reference to making seizures. That is the concern of Members on this side.

SEIZURE OF TAXPAYERS' GOODS

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, does the Minister put responsibility on a person who is the head of collection services in Kitchener, who is saying that it is fun to seize the goods of other Canadians? Does he allow this to happen?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I think the Hon. Member maliciously refused to listen to my answer. I clearly informed him that such attitudes were not acceptable, that it was not the philosophy of this Government nor that of the Department, and that corrective action had been taken.

STATEMENT ATTRIBUTED TO COLLECTION HEAD IN KITCHENER OFFICE

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I ask the Minister what action has been taken with respect to the head of collections in the Kitcherner office who gave instructions to her employees that it would be fun to make seizures of taxpayers' goods. What corrective action has been taken with respect to her, the head of collections?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I informed the Hon. Member that such actions were not departmental policy. All employees, managers, and department heads in the Department are regularly informed of any unacceptable practices that may have occurred, and they have very specific guidelines on how they should deal with taxpayers.

JUDGE'S CRITICISM OF SEARCH CONDUCTED BY DEPARTMENTAL OFFICIALS

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, as the Progressive Conservative task force crosses the country, more and more horror stories are being discovered. I would like to tell the Minister with respect to this matter that when the excuse is given that each of these malfeasant actions constitutes isolated instances, and we have hundreds and hundreds of isolated instances, it becomes a pattern of conduct.

I want to refer the Minister to a case in Saskatchewan where Judge Linton Smith was severely critical of the tactics of Revenue Canada with respect to a Canadian of Chinese descent in the case of the Queen versus Den Chow. The judge indicated that the search by the Department was unreasonable and illegal, that Mr. Chow had been browbeaten and tormented, that his home was taken over, and his privacy totally invaded by departmental officials. He was threatened with prosecution for drugs when they found innocent medications. There was evidence of malicious actions which were contemptuous of the dignity and privacy of a private citizen. Those were the findings of a judge.

Would the Minister tell the House what he is doing to prevent the employees of his Department from engaging in these kinds of activities? Is he going to wait until all of these investigations are complete? Why does he not take action now?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I did not wait for comments from Opposition Members before taking action within my Department. I would like to point out to the Hon. Member that whenever a case is brought to my attention, either by Members of this House or by taxpayers who get in touch with me in my capacity as Minister, I examine and review each case, and if there has been unacceptable behaviour on the part of employees of our Department, we apologize, both the individuals responsible and myself as Minister, to the people concerned. I can inform the Hon. Member that we regularly issue reminders of our policies on the attitudes people in our Department should have in dealing with taxpayers.

INSTRUCTIONS GIVEN NOT TO CO-OPERATE WITH PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE TASK FORCE

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Then, Mr. Speaker, will the Minister explain to me why he, on February 23, issued a directive to all regional offices instructing all employees of these offices not to co-operate with the Progressive Conservative task force which is crossing the country so that, for a change, we can hear what the people want to tell the Government of this country? Why has he sent out this directive prohibiting employees from co-operating with our task force? Is this his idea of trying to deal with the serious allegations against his Department?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the answer I gave the Chairman of the Progressive Conservative Task Force that is now travelling around the country, was given in the light of the rules and guidelines that ought to govern the work of parliamentarians. The Progressive Conservative Task Force and the Progressive Conservative Members themselves have decided to play politics with a matter as serious as the Income Tax Act and its administration. This is an obvious sign of their irresponsibility, and I refuse to play their little game.

STATUS OF WOMEN

EFFECT OF TECHNOLOGICAL CHANGE ON WOMEN'S EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for the status of women. The Minister knows, I am sure, that unemployment among women is estimated to rise to something in the order of 35 per cent by the year 1990, as a result of technological change. I am sure the Minister is also aware that there is estimated to be a loss of something like one and a half million jobs by the year 1990 as a result of this same technological change, and that most of those who will lose employment opportunities are women. In view of this problem, can the Minister explain why, given that 1990 is only six years away, there was not one single program in the most recent Budget of the Minister of Finance dealing with the question of job loss for women between now and the year 1990?

● (1425)

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I find it rather unusual that the Hon. Member takes this new-found interest in women, but I welcome it. I also would like him to know that the figures he is bandying about are really guesstimates. There is no really true number out there. No one really knows. The fact of the matter is that as women we are going to be profoundly affected by technological change and we must be prepared for it. There is no new funding in the Budget because there is already a tremendous amount of funding in place. I suggest the Hon. Member familiarize himself with government programs which address the problems of women.

OUTREACH PROGRAM FUNDING

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I am familiar with the programs, as are many other people, particularly the women affected. Surely the Minister knows, having looked at the most recent statements of the Minister of Finance and others, that the programs beneficial to women have been cut by something like $2.4 million, and there will be a net loss of 25,000 job placements for women as a result of cuts in the Outreach Program. In March of 1983 the Minister of Employment released a study of the Outreach Program in which it was stated, as a primary recommendation, that the Government should affirm the legitimacy of the program and make it a part of the permanent national employment system, and that there should be a commitment made for long-term funding.

How does the Minister square her so called interest in providing employment for women who are, as she admits, going to lose their employment opportunities during the course of the next six years as a result of technological change taking place, with the fact that there has been a cut in the money to be spent under the Outreach Program, and no additional funds provided under any other program to try to provide employment opportunities or even training for those women?

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Again, Mr. Speaker, I have to state once more that the Hon. Member is obviously out of touch. There has not been a cut in Outreach Program funding. Indeed, we have solidified the Outreach Program. I suggest he update his facts.

PARTICIPATION OF WOMEN IN EMPLOYMENT CREATION PROGRAMS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, is the Minister suggesting there was no $2.4 million cut? Is she suggesting for one moment that that will not result in 25,000 jobs being lost to women who otherwise would have been employed? On November 1, 1983, the Minister of Employment stated that employment among women was not a priority. He went on to say that the numbers of women who participate in government job-creation programs was way below their proportion in the labour force. That condition continues today.

Does the Minister think it reasonable that women, who make up 52 per cent of the population, and 42 per cent of the labour force, should have been employed in only 31 per cent of the Canada Works projects and only 20 per cent of the NEED Programs? Will the Minister take steps to guarantee that half of the $150 million allocated for Canadian youth will be directed to employment opportunities for young women?

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I am delighted the Hon. Member has made reference to the youth programs because it is in this particular category that the participation of females is particularly high; it approaches the 50 per cent rate. We do take measures in our job-creation projects to ensure women are hired. However, the Member does play fast and loose with figures. The facts are that the male unemployment rate has risen much faster than the female unemployment rate, and therefore it is logical that there would be more males employed in job-creation projects.

However, I assure the Hon. Member that I am concerned about the number of jobs available to women and I am working very closely with the Minister of Employment and Immigration to make sure that affirmative actions are in place in those job-creation projects.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

CANADAIR AND DE HAVILLAND—LONG TERM VIABILITY

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Canadians are shocked at the continuing drain on the public purse to bail out de Havilland and Canadair. The most recent figures bring the losses to some $2 billion between the two companies. The bailouts total $1.25 billion. Many employees of de Havilland and suppliers to de Havilland are very concerned about the continuing viability of the company. they are worried by the continued evidence of mismanagement and continuing weakness of those companies. They are concerned that the brave words of last year just are not being translated into action.

Can the Prime Minister give these people any assurance that there are some plans to assure the long term viability of these companies so they can look at these sources of employment from a long term point of view?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is asking me to say there are long term plans for the viability of those plants. I am happy to see that he and his Party are now supporting those enterprises. I remember a few months ago his colleagues, and I believe he himself, were suggesting it was scandalous that we were keeping those plants open. Now he is saying we must have long term plans in order to keep them open. That is what the management is presently engaged in doing. The Hon. Member will realize that the payments in the Supplementary Estimates are payments of debts. They are not enough to keep the plants open forever. We will have to come before Parliament with long term plans if indeed those plants are to be kept open.

What does the Hon. Member want—long term plans without any money at all from the federal Government? I do not know what he is suggesting, Mr. Speaker. It is obvious that these plants, which were in the private sector, were very heavily in debt. That is why the private sector wanted to dump them. They wanted to dump them, Mr. Speaker. The Hon. Member should realize the truth. The Government was not in the market for aeronautic industries. These plants were going to be closed by the private sector. In order to keep this technology alive in Canada we rescued them. We would like nothing more than to be able to give them back to the private sector. Those are the facts that the Hon. Member should realize.

Mr. Wilson: Mr. Speaker, when I raised this matter before, I said it was scandalous the Government kept pumping money in without providing the attention and management to solve the problem. That is what I was criticizing. The Prime Minister must realize there are suppliers and employees of these companies in Toronto and Montreal who are very worried that these companies will be closed down by the Government because it simply cannot afford to keep them open.

BUSINESS PLAN FOR CORPORATIONS

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Is there a business plan in place whereby the Government can assure these workers and suppliers there is a long term future for de Havilland and Canadair? Can he also tell the House that when he approved this latest amount of $550 million he reviewed those plans personally to assure himself that there was a long term proposal for the companies?

Hon. Herb Gray (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, this additional expenditure being proposed to Parliament was reviewed, not only by myself but by Cabinet as a whole. The Minister responsible for the Canada Development Investment Corporation, the Senator in the other place, will be appearing before the appropriate committee to defend this Supplementary Estimate. At that time he will be in a position to go into detail about the plans in question.

I welcome what my hon. friend now seems to be saying about his and his Party's willingness to make sure those companies continue to operate assuring the existence of the jobs. What a conversion, Mr. Speaker. St. Paul on the road to Damascus has nothing on my hon. friend.

REQUEST FOR FINANCIAL AID FOR AIRCRAFT COMPANIES

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the President of the Treasury Board and concerns a request by the two aircraft companies for a total of $500 million. Senator Austin has said he would be able to submit a full report on the financial restructuring of this company by the end of March. In that case, it would seem reasonable to ask Parliament to appropriate $500 million at some other time. Can the Minister give the House the assurance that he will wait until the report is submitted, which Senator Austin said he would do, before requesting $500 million for these two companies, since Canadians are not concerned about how important it is to keep this industry alive in Canada, but about the manner in which it has been managed during the past two years. In the circumstances, can the Minister give the House the assurance that the Government's request for $500 million to give the two companies a financial boost will not be made until the report on future plans is known to the general public?

Mr. Lalonde: The Conservatives wanted to close down Canadair!

Hon. Herb Gray (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, according to my information, Senator Austin intends to appear before the Committee with the promised information. It would therefore be more appropriate if the Hon. Member would ask for the information at that time. I am interested in what the Hon. Member has to say, because I feel his comments differ from what the Hon. Member for Etobicoke said a few weeks ago. I am also very pleased to have his support for Canadair and to receive advice from the Opposition.

Mr. Lalonde: They wanted to close down Canadair!

REQUEST THAT MINISTER PROVIDE FINANCIAL UNDERTAKING

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Minister for being so pleased to hear us today, but my question is: Can the Minister give the House the assurance that no supplementary funding will be granted the companies before a report or recommendations by Senator Austin regarding long term projects is tabled? We want this industry to be viable. We want it to be profitable, now more than ever before. However, we want to know and Canadians want to know, before re-investing $500 million, what the exact plans are for these two companies, and if those plans are reasonable, you can count on our co-operation.

Hon. Herb Gray (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as I said before, Senator Austin intends to appear before a number of committees to give the information being sought by the Hon. Member. If Hon. Members are not satisfied with the information, they have the option of not approving the requested appropriations, but I am sure there will be sufficient information to convince even the Hon. Member that the jobs in these two companies are important to this country.

STATUS OF WOMEN

LOAN PLAN ASSISTANCE FOR PART-TIME STUDENTS

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for the status of women and concerns the problems faced by women in the post-secondary educational system. The problems are particularly severe for women who are part-time students, whose numbers increased by a startling 250 per cent over the last decade. Most women attending post-secondary institutions on a part-time basis are doing so because full-time studies are not accessible to them.

Does the Minister know that the federal loan system to part-time students discriminates very sharply against part-timers, most of whom are women? Has she done, or will she do, anything to ensure that the federal loan plan is amended immediately so that they will be treated as fairly as are full-time students?

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is a problem which I have discussed with the responsible Minister. I must clarify that it discriminates against part-time students, not specifically against women, though women are the unfortunate recipients. It is something which requires some consideration.

I congratulate Hon. Members opposite for bringing up the subject of women today on the eve of International Women's Day. It is refreshing to have the subject discussed in the House.

Mr. Deans: We are always bringing it up. It is time you listened.

REPAYMENT REGULATIONS

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the Minister does not seem to be aware of the fact that women constitute the bulk of the part-time student population. Is she aware of the fact that the part-timers must start repaying their loans immediately, that there is no moratorium on interest, and that they do not get the $50 allocation for books? Is she aware of the discrimination in the Student Loan Act? What is she going to do about it?

• (1440)

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am painfully aware of that fact, as my sister suffers under those consequences. I reiterate that my concern is her concern, and it is something that I believe we should do something about. But again, I state very clearly that the law is not there to discriminate specifically against women. It does discriminate against part-time students, and unfortunately women are the ones who suffer most. But 'twas ever thus in our society.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONTRACT FOR PURCHASE OF RIFLES

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. On February 7 the Minister announced a contract for the purchase of 81,000 new rifles for the Canadian Armed Forces. At the time he stated to the press that he hoped this would help the re-election of the Member for Kitchener and other Liberal Members. I think we now understand why he made that statement.

It turns out that these rifles are costing the Canadian taxpayer $1,314 each, while the U.S. Army, for approximately the same number of identical rifles, is paying $660 per rifle. That is nearly half.

Can the Minister possibly explain how he could sign a contract that results in Canadian taxpayers paying twice as much in Canadian funds as the U.S. Army for an identical rifle?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that the hon. gentleman is paying attention to what is happening in the Department, especially when we are dealing with something as important as the replacement of the small arms presently used by the Canadian Forces.

I might point out to the hon. gentleman that he has indeed made the mistake that was made by the journalist who wrote that story, namely, simply to do a division of the number of rifles into the total price of the contract. What the hon. gentleman does not know is that the contract price includes the amounts that have been invested in Diemaco in order to set up a Canadian source for small arms. The company is receiving $15 million to be able to provide a source of small arms in Canada for an indefinite period in the future. In addition to that, the amount of the contract involves the payment of a licensing fee to Colt. That fee is paid, of course, to secure for Canada the licensing of the technology in order to ensure that Canada has a source of the best small arms available in the international arena and that we are also able, as a result of the transfer of that technology, to go into the international arena and market that particular rifle with our allies if we are able to compete with other suppliers.

I might point out that, as a result of the expenditure of public funds, we are also creating over 1,900 jobs in Canada. I am sure that the Canadian people, including the Member for Kitchener, are appreciative of that.

Mr. Andre: I wonder how the Minister will compete internationally with a rifle that costs twice as much to make in Canada as in the United States. Aside from that, the Minister has his figures wrong. It is 1,900 man-years, or 150 jobs, which works out to $355,000 per job. On the surface of it, it would be cheaper to buy the rifles from the same place that the U.S. Army is buying them—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: —and to give 150 Canadians a quarter of a million dollars each, and we would still be money ahead.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER TABLE CONTRACT

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, given that this contract was not a result of competitive bidding, and given that it is an outrageous figure to be paying for rifles when the Americans pay half the price, would the Minister table that contract and table the background studies? Would he give some substance to this vague contention of his that somehow it makes economic sense to pay twice as much for rifles for our Army as for the U.S. Army? Can he table the documents to back up his contention because, frankly, his credibility and that of his colleagues is in doubt with the Canadian taxpayers?

Hon. J-J. Blais (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the hon. gentleman is asking the question because, if he had seen what we have been doing in terms of military procurement in the recent past, he would have seen that we have concentrated on the creation of jobs in Canada. When I hear the Opposition saying on an ongoing basis that we should spend more on defence, are they saying that we should be exporting more dollars into the United States in order to purchase armaments in the United States to the detriment of the creation of Canadian jobs?

Additionally, the hon. gentleman is wrong when he says that this procurement was not done on a competitive basis. We identified two finalists, the Belgians and the M-16 technology, we created the competitive environment, and we made a selection. After selecting the Diemaco company and the Colt technology, we went on and negotiated with Diemaco. The deal which we made is one that is good for the Canadian Forces and for the creation of jobs in Canada.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER TABLE BACKGROUND DOCUMENTS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of National Defence table the contract, and table the background documents?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to hear the representations of the right hon. gentleman and I will give them due consideration.

PROPOSAL TO BUILD HOSPITAL AT CFB ESQUIMALT

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of National Defence. On February 24 the Minister announced the construction of a new hospital and dental clinic at Canadian Forces Base Esquimalt. Construction is to be completed by mid 1985. Could the Minister explain to members of the House why this item did not appear in Supplementary Estimates or the Main Estimates which were tabled here three weeks ago?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it is because the expenditures had been forecast. Indeed it is a highly technical question. I would be pleased to take notice of it, review it, and provide the hon. gentleman with additional details if such are required.

Mr. McKinnon: Incidentally, this item appeared in the 1981-82 Estimates at a cost of $6.4 million. Since then it has gone up to $11.8 million, an increase of 84 per cent over $5 million, on a relatively small contract.

OMISSION FROM ESTIMATES

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I am curious to know why it is not mentioned in the Supplementaries or in the Main Estimates. Otherwise, could the Minister assure the House that there is not now a large number of similar Treasury Board agreements that may or may not be mentioned in the Estimates? The Estimates have now gone for consideration by the committee and I am questioning whether we can believe that what is in the Estimates actually represents the spending of the Department of National Defence, or is this just some kind of giant make work project for MPs serving on the standing committee?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I thought the hon. gentleman was rising to commend me for spending money in his province and his general area. The hospital was announced for the riding of Victoria.

An Hon. Member: Esquimalt.

Mr. Blais: It is in Victoria, it is Esquimalt, and it is in his area. Undoubtedly the hon. gentleman from Esquimalt-Saanich is very pleased about this amount being spent within his riding.

In terms of the specifics, as to whether it is in the 1981-82 Estimates or the 1983-84 Estimates, I will be before the committee, if not next week, the week after, and I would be very pleased to discuss the whole matter in detail with the hon. gentleman.

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS

ROLE OF NATIVE LIBERAL CAUCUS

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to ask a question of the Minister responsible for the Status of Women, but while I am waiting for her return I will direct a question to the Prime Minister. Yesterday, two days before the constitutional conference opens, the Prime Minister said that the Cabinet had not yet made up its mind on whether it would advocate entrenchment of aboriginal rights in the Constitution.

I have a letter today from a Mr. Tom Pelletier inviting members of the Native Liberal Caucus to meet with government Members to discuss constitutional issues and to advise the Government on them. The letter places all of this in the context of campaign readiness for the next election.

Why is the Government dealing with the aboriginal peoples and constitutional questions on a partisan basis, when the aboriginal peoples have recognized leaders to speak for them? What advice does the Government expect to get from the Native Liberal Caucus that it could not receive from more representative leaders?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not recall having met this Mr. Pelletier personally, but from what the Hon. Member quotes in his letter, I see nothing offensive in it. If he is a Liberal who is trying to get Liberals to move in the direction that the Hon. Member suggests, I cannot see how he would be objecting to that either.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

DISCRIMINATION IN INDIAN ACT AGAINST WOMEN

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my supplementary question to the Hon. Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Yesterday, in response to my question about Indian Act discrimination against Indian women, the Prime Minister said that this had been ended by the Charter of Rights. Since Indian women still lose their status when they marry non Indians, does the Minister agree with the Prime Minister that discrimination has been abolished, or will he try to educate the Prime Minister on this important issue? Will he bring in a Bill that will end this discrimination?

• (1450)

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I want to tell the Hon. Member how much I appreciate his statement about support for such a Bill. I assume he is committing his Party to it. I know the Prime Minister is supportive of a Bill of this nature. I have had a chance to discuss it with the Prime Minister and with my colleagues. I will be talking about this initiative which the Hon. Member outlined, with the Indian leadership during the course of the next few days.

AGRICULTURE

INCREASE IN FARM BANKRUPTCIES

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. If we are to judge him from his most recent Budget, it would appear that he believes the Canadian agricultural economy is sound. Does he understand that in the last four years since the Liberal Government came into power, agricultural bankruptcies have increased over 400 per cent and, more disturbingly, that in January, 1984, farm bankruptcies had increased over 60 per cent year over year? Is he aware of these facts? If so, why did he not take them into consideration in his last Budget?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have seen those figures. If the Hon. Member looks at the percentage of bankruptcies in the farming sector compared with those in the industrial sector, for instance, he will find that the agricultural economy has performed remarkably well under difficult circumstances. As far as possible measures are concerned, the Hon. Member knows that there is a Bill before the House which was introduced by my current Parliamentary Secretary, as well as one which was introduced by the Government under the Bankruptcy Act, which would help farmers. I hope this Bill receives early and complete consideration by the opposition Parties.

PLIGHT OF FARMERS WITH HIGH INTEREST RATE LOANS

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same Minister. I know he will be aware, despite his protestations, that those figures represent only the tip of the iceberg and that general farm economy indicators show that there are serious problems, problems which will spread across the country and create havoc in the agricultural industry unless the Government responds.

Is the Minister aware that there are over 8,000 Canadian farmers locked into loans with interest rates up to 16.75 per cent, with the Farm Credit Corporation? Is he taking into consideration with his colleagues some relief measures for these people who are locked into these high interest rates, people who were given a program by the Government for relief of up to 4 per cent and are now, after having been considered to be in distress, faced again with high interest rates of 16.75 per cent? Is he prepared to do anything to help them?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the Conservatives could be helpful by supporting the Bill under the Bankruptcy Act which is before the committee and getting it back into the House and passed soon. In addition, the Hon. Member will remember that we introduced measures to help farmers in difficulty, and that several tens of millions of dollars have been used for that particular purpose.

WESTERN GRAIN STABILIZATION FUND

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. He will know that there is now nearly $1 billion in the Western Grain Stabilization Fund and that there is some concern with regard to the operation of the Fund. Is the Minister satisfied with the present formula for payout of moneys from the Western Grain Stabilization Fund? Bearing in mind that a study is under way at the present time, could he indicate to us how soon some amendments might be introduced, and what form those amendments might take?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think the Hon. Member knows that in an exchange in the House before Christmas I expressed the same concern as he did, that the present operation of the Fund does not allow an effective payout during a time when there has been a reduction in farm income. As a result of that, my colleague, the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, is presently working on a number of proposals which should be considered by Cabinet in a very short period of time. We hope they will relieve the present situation.

INFLATION FACTOR

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, does the Minister anticipate a short period of time? Would it be before the start of the next crop year? In making any changes to the Western Grain Stabilization Fund, would he consider the inflation factor and increases in production which come about either by the opening of new lands or by an increase of efficiency on the part of farm producers?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think the Hon. Member has presented two very important considerations which will be taken into account during that examination. I cannot give him a precise period of time in which the changes might be made. It all depends upon agenda and timing. However, I can tell him that we consider it to be a very serious matter and one to which we are paying close attention.

FISHERIES

ATLANTIC SALMON STOCKS—QUOTA ALLOCATED TO GREENLAND

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, but I do not know whether he has left the House or has gone fishing. I guess he has gone fishing. Oh, here he is!

An Hon. Member: Holy mackerel!

Mr. Nielsen: My cod!

Mr. Crouse: The Minister is aware from his own statements that our Atlantic salmon stocks have been seriously decimated. We learned only yesterday in committee that the Greenlanders have caught something like 600 tons of salmon out of a quota of 1,200 tons. At three pounds per salmon, this works out to something like 441,000 salmon. What plans, if any, is the Minister making to reduce not only this quota but the interception and massive slaughter by Greenlanders of Canadian salmon?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has brought a very important issue to the attention of the House. As he noted, Greenland catches salmon, half of which originates in Canadian waters and half in Europe. I think he would agree with me that the only sensible way of approaching that problem is for there to be a joint effort by Canada and Europe to try to get Greenland to reduce its fishing of the salmon resource.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER NEGOTIATE WITH GREENLAND FISHING INDUSTRY

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister has stated, some of the salmon caught by Greenlanders originates in Europe, and some in Canadian waters. However, there is a different fishing season for European salmon as opposed to Canadian salmon.

Has he given any thought to meeting with representatives of the Greenland fishing industry in the hope of convincing them to rearrange their salmon fishing season so that more European salmon are caught, as opposed to catching Canadian salmon carrying a Canadian passport, before the day arrives when we have absolutely no salmon industry left for Canadians?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the information of the Hon. Member does not coincide with mine. My information is that it would be very difficult to make a distinction between European stock and Canadian stock. Perhaps the Hon. Member would suggest that we offer Greenland some fishing allocations off the Scotian shelf in return for reducing its salmon fishing. Perhaps that is one thing upon which the Hon. Member could reflect.

NATIONAL REVENUE

INCLUSION OF TIPS IN TAXABLE INCOME

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. By now I hope he will be aware of the two waitresses who were reported in the Winnipeg Free Press to have been driven into bankruptcy by the actions of his Department and the retroactive inclusion of tips in taxable incomes. Could the Minister indicate at this time whether he will do anything about that policy? When will his Department start to pick on people its own size, go after some of the big boys who are not paying taxes when they should be, and leave waitresses and other low-income Canadians alone?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, should the Hon. Member take time to ponder over his allegation, he will realize that it is totally irresponsible. He seems to think that a group of taxpayers does not pay enough income tax, but that does not justify him saying that other taxpayers ought to be relived of their responsibility to pay their taxes. I would urge him not only to read the Income Tax Act but also to examine the standard returns sent to taxpayers on which it is clearly indicated that all income must be declared, whatever the source. Unfortunately, some people disregard that basic principle from which the fairness of our income tax legislation stems. Naturally, after those people have had their returns audited, they may be forced to pay penalties and additional taxes as well. I am convinced that the Hon. Member is not suggesting in any way that the Minister of National Revenue should arbitrarily dispense any group of citizens whatever from their obligations under the Income Tax Act.

WESTERN GRAIN TRANSPORTATION ACT

EFFECT ON TRUCKING INDUSTRY

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Transport. The Minister will know that, with the application of the new Western Grain Transportation Act, a serious dislocation has been caused in the trucking industry, particularly in British Columbia. It has created some problems with regard to producers who rely on the movement of specialty crops, all as a result of the method of payment. What action is the Minister prepared to take to correct this problem, which is not only having a very serious impact upon the trucking industry but also a serious impact upon the producers who have relied upon the trucking industry to move these specialty crops?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Hon. Member for drawing this problem to the attention of the House. It has also been brought to my attention. I believe it is serious. It demonstrates that there are some anomalies in the workings of the Act, particularly as they affect trucking firms which are supplying service from the West Coast. The new Grain Agency Administrator has authority under the Act to negotiate new arrangements with trucking firms. Unfortunately, he does not have the money to do so. That is something that I will have to take up in terms of my own budget and determine whether there is some way to respond to that. I have a very deep concern about it. I intend to respond to it. I hope the Hon. Member might provide some assistance in helping me to work out a solution.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. MUNRO (ESQUIMALT-SAANICH)—NOTICE OF QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE TO BE RAISED

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, as it is appropriate on the first possible occasion to raise a question arising out of Question Period, I would like to stand today on a point of order to reserve my right to raise a question of privilege if I discover from my research that the reply given by the Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development (Mr. Johnston)—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the Hon. Member has a question of privilege, he can serve notice to the Chair tomorrow prior to the commencement of proceedings and he will be recognized. If he has a point that he wants to raise now, he can state it. There is no point of reservation.

MR. McKINNON—CHANGE IN RECORD OF STATEMENT BY MR. FERGUSON

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I rise with some regret to raise a point of order concerning the recording of the debates in this House as reflected in today's copy of Hansard. A change has been made to an intervention by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ferguson). What I do not like is that he made a change after we had had a disagreement as to whether he knew what he was talking about when he made the statement. Subsequently he changed the statement, obviously when he was given a copy of the "blues". Of course, I received a copy of the same "blues" and it was as he said it in the House. This morning I checked the electronic transcript of the proceedings in the House of Commons yesterday afternoon when the Member in question said:

> I hope that, as we look at the GIS increases and as we examine the war veterans allowance in more detail, no means test will be associated with it.

That caused me to rise in my place during the Question Period and question him on that. I said, and I quote:

> In his closing remark he also said that the war veterans allowance top-up would be paid without a means test. He either does not know what he is talking about or he has just announced a radical change in government policy over the years. If that is so, would he reassure us that he is serious and knows what he is talking about and that we are now going to have the war veterans allowance without a means test?

The Parliamentary Secretary replied:

> I am sorry that my remark was taken out of context. I was referring to the means test referred to by the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). This referred only to old age pensions in the past.

That is all very well on a point about debate at that time, but I object very much to having a gentleman in the House set about to win a debate by changing the record when presented with the "blues", which are not there to enable a Member to change the meaning of what he said but rather to make small and non-argumentative corrections of errors that may have slipped into Hansard. I think the Hon. Member owes the House an apology and I hope this will not happen again.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will look into the matter raised by the Hon. Member for Victoria and reserve comment for the present time.

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if this was taken wrongly by the Hon. Member, I should say that I fully realize that the war veterans allowance is income tested as is GIS, and there are references in there to both OAS and GIS. If I made a mistake, I apologize for it. I know the difference between the two. We are dealing with it from our constituency office. If it came out that way, it certainly was not the way it was intended. I apologize to the Hon. Member if it was taken out of context. I hope it will be taken in that context.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I certainly will accept the apology of the Hon. Member. Thank you very much.

MR. KEEPER—QUESTIONS FOR MRS. EROLA

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order arising out of Question Period. This is International Womens' Week. The Minister responsible for the Status of Women stayed in the Chamber for only half of the Question Period. We had further questions for her.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Hon. Member does not have a point of order.

PETITION

MR. FLIS—RELEASE OF MYKOLA HORBAL FROM SOVIET LABOUR CAMP

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 71, I have the honour to present the following petition. The petition of the undersigned residents of Canada, concerned about the human rights violations in the Soviet Union, who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your petitioners in the certain assurance that Your Honourable House will therefore provide a remedy, humbly sheweth that they urge the Canadian Government to make representations to the Government of the Soviet Union concerning the release of Mykola Horbal, a Ukrainian poet, composer and musician who is now incarcertated in a Soviet concentration camp. In the opinion of the petitioners, the simple desire that people in the Ukraine enjoy the same human and national rights as do people everywhere in the free world does not constitute a criminal offence.

Wherefore the 450 signees petition for the release of Mykola Horbal, and as in duty bound, your petitioners will ever pray.

CANADAIR CL-215 AIRCRAFT

Question No. 684—Mr. Clark (Yellowhead):

[English]

Mr. Cook: Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of the House, and particularly the Parliamentary Secretary, Question No. 717 which stands on the Order Paper and was placed on the Order Paper covering the period of February 26 to March 3. I would not wish to impugn the reputation of any Cabinet Minister of the Government. However, they are involved in a leadership campaign. There have already been allegations made as to the misuse of government aircraft, so I would mention to the Parliamentary Secretary that although I do not expect the question to be answered today, I expect it to be answered next week. Each and every week between now and the leadership convention the same question will be placed on the Order Paper. If the Parliamentary Secretary cannot find it in his heart to answer those questions week by week, then the Canadian public can make a judgement as to the illegal, improper and expensive use of taxpayers' money in a narrowly political campaign. I give the Parliamentary Secretary fair warning. Please have my question answered week by week so that the Canadian public will know what is going on.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, we certainly want to answer the Hon. Member's question, but I think he said that the question was put on the Order Paper during the week when the House was not sitting. This week is the first week we are back from our winter break, and that means that we have had notice of this question for only three days. We will do our best to answer that question and subsequent questions that Hon. Members in the Opposition put before us, but I think it is only reasonable to expect that a little bit of time should be given in order to answer questions that are put on the Order Paper. Three days are certainly not adequate.

Mr. Cook: Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary overlooked the entire nature of my remarks. I was putting him on notice that I wanted the question answered. It actually appeared on the Notice Paper yesterday. I did not expect an answer today, but I wanted him to know that I will be rising to my feet after a length of time has gone by without an answer to that question.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member has made his point.

Mr. Evans: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: The questions enumerated by the Parliamentary Secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1984-85

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister of State (Finance)) moved that Bill C-21, an Act to provide borrowing authority, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in introducing Bill C-21, an Act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1984-85, I wish to place the terms of the Bill within the context of the two most recent Budgets, the April 1983 Budget and the Budget of last month. The Budget of last month does not represent any departure from the fiscal policy developed in last April's Budget. In fact, it represents a confirmation and continuation of that fiscal policy.

The objective of both Budgets has been to encourage an investment-led expansion of economic activity that will create the employment that I am sure all of us in the House seek without the resurgence of inflation that has hindered our economic growth in the past. Our objective has been pursued both through short-term demand side policies designed to provide immediate stimulus and jobs and through longer term supply side measures which have been designed to increase investment and productivity in the Canadian economy. A fundamental dual strategy has included the acceptance of higher deficits in the period from 1982 to 1984 while simultaneously putting in place specific policies to help ensure that the federal deficit declines with economic recovery and expansion.

In the most recent Budget, Mr. Speaker, there were only minor changes made in the economic and fiscal projections contained within last April's Budget. The stability in our fiscal forecast is an indication that we are fully committed to the fiscal strategy set out last April and confirmed in the most recent Budget. This continuity in fiscal policy will also help provide the public with greater assurance about the future, including our commitment to medium-term deficit reduction.

Interest rates, exchange rates, business investment plans and many other important economic variables obviously depend to a great extent upon the public's expectations about the short to medium-term future. I wish to say a word about that point before turning to the terms of the Bill itself. The Budget of last month gives Canadians every good reason to expect that economic recovery will be followed by solid expansion. We in the Government are not relying on "quick fixes". We have put policies in place that will contribute to the completion of recovery and the introduction of rapid expansion in our economy. Most of the jobs required over the next several years must come from the private sector and not from government. That was a key element in the Budget of last April and again in the Budget of last month.

A principal point in our strategy to facilitate a sustained expansion is policies to promote business investment. The recent Budget contains measures additional to those of last April's Budget designed to support business cash flow which will facilitate additional investment. The small business tax rate now applies to more businesses. This will increase after-tax earnings, and the tax simplification that was introduced in last month's Budget will reduce administrative costs faced by small business.

In the energy sector, and additional year of suspension of the incremental revenue tax will increase the after-tax earnings in the petroleum sector. Over the longer term, the imaginative and far-reaching pension reform proposals contained in last month's Budget will increase the savings rate, providing a larger pool from which to finance private investment.

The major policies designed to bolster business investment were announced in last April's Budget. The Budget of last month is a continuation of the proposals set forth in last April's Budget. Those included a liberalization of the investment tax credit, the share-purchase tax credit, the indexed share investment plan, extended loss carryforwards, research and development tax incentives, and the suspension of the incremental oil revenue tax. The legislation for those policy initiatives has now been passed. Also announced in last April's Budget were a number of spending initiatives designed to support private investment, such as the Special Recovery Investment Fund, technology policy initiatives, and an expanded mandate for the Federal Business Development Bank. These policy initiatives will have a significant effect on business cash flow and investment in the time immediately ahead.

In the current fiscal year, financial requirements, excluding foreign exchange transactions, are now expected to be $27 billion, little different from the projection made in our Budget of last April. The economy has in fact been expanding in much the way the Government expected that it would in the projections offered a year ago. Indeed, in several respects the performance of the economy has exceeded those forecasts. Our fiscal plan is on track.

I should like to remind the House, however, that forecasting is an art, not a science. The precise estimate of financial requirements provided in last month's Budget should be interpreted as the most probable outcome, with some variations naturally occurring above or below the forecasted line. The difficulties in providing a highly accurate forecast are heightened when it is done before the close of the fiscal year. Given the arbitrary cut-off date for the fiscal year, relatively short delays in receiving revenues can have a significant impact in year to year movements in financial requirements. Similarly, expenditures may be deferred from one fiscal year to the next simply because of a month or two delay in letting contracts of a major character or in the delivery of material.

For the 1984-85 fiscal year, financial requirements, excluding foreign exchange transactions, are projected to be $25.5 billion, or roughly $1.5 billion less than the estimated requirements of the current fiscal year. This substantial decline in financial requirements reflects an acceleration in the growth of budgetary revenues, a slower growth in budgetary expenditures and a small decline in the net source of funds from non-budgetary transactions.

Having noted the reduction in the financial requirements for the 1984-85 fiscal year, I should like to turn now to the question of the borrowing authority itself.

Under the Financial Administration Act, statutory borrowing authority must be obtained from Parliament. Accordingly, the Bill currently before the House seeks new borrowing authority of $29.5 billion. This is an amount equivalent to the $25.5 billion financial requirements set out in the Budget, plus a non-lapsing contingency amount of $4 billion to be carried forward for possible use in the fiscal year 1985-86.

As Hon. Members know, the request for a non-lapsing contingency amount is not new; there is nothing unexpected or radical in the provision. In the past, however, there has been some misunderstanding of the purpose of this important provision of the Bill. Perhaps that misunderstanding can be reduced if I outline the background related to prior requests for amounts and the reasons for the $4 billion in the new Bill.

Throughout the mid-1970s, when new borrowing authority was sought by way of appropriation Bills which was our practice at that time, a contingency amount was always included. Likewise, in more recent years when borrowing authority has been sought by way of special Bills, a non-lapsing contingency amount has always been included. Recently the contingency amount has been in the order of $4 billion. I want to stress that this amount is intended to cover contingencies only; it does not permit spending beyond what has been approved by Parliament. It does not run counter to an authority given on an on-going basis by Acts of Parliament. Examples of the latter are unemployment insurance benefits, public debt charges, and transfers to Provinces.

The contingency amount is largely designed to cover two special situations of critical importance. The first is the need to accommodate the impact of large and unpredictable foreign exchange operations on our financial requirements, and the second is to ensure that the Government will be able to continue its regular debt program if the House is not in session or if it has been dissolved.

In the case of foreign exchange operations, either upward or downward pressure on the Canadian dollar can give rise to the use of the borrowing authority. In the case of downward pressure, official holdings of foreign exchange are depleted, creating a possible need to undertake foreign borrowings. In the opposite case, foreign exchange is acquired through the sale of Canadian dollars, thereby adding to cash requirements.

In the past, the Government has always acted responsibly in utilizing such contingency amounts when they have been provided. We on this side of the House recognize the need to resolve any uncertainty as to how long non-lapsing contingency amounts authorized in previous Bills and that requested in the Bill before us should remain outstanding. As a result, Clause 3 of the Bill before us is designed to eliminate any such uncertainty. It provides that any unused borrowing authority carried forward from previous fiscal years shall expire either on April 2 of this year or when the Borrowing Authority Act, 1984-85 comes into force, whichever is the later date. Consequently, with the passage of the Bill before us, the only contingency amount outstanding would be $4 billion. It is intended that once new borrowing authority is obtained for the 1985-86 fiscal year, any remaining unused portion of the $4 billion contingency amount would be cancelled.

We believe that the Government should proceed in this way on a regular basis. Thus we envisage an on going process which provides a non-lapsing contingency amount which would give the Government some flexibility but, at the same time, would be unavailable to be carried forward beyond the coming into force of the new authority. Such a scheme is fiscally responsible. It would ensure that Parliament has an opportunity to debate borrowing authority for each fiscal year. The method of providing some contingency which is subsequently cancelled annually provides a reasonable balance between the responsibility of Parliament to review the granting of borrowing authority and, at the same time, provides sufficient flexibility to ensure an orderly debt program.

Let me explain in a little more detail why providing some flexibility with respect to borrowing authority is important. The Government, like any responsible corporate borrower, must be in a position to conduct its borrowing operations without any timing constraints. In this way it is possible to take advantage of market opportunities so as to minimize overall debt charges. In view of the size of the federal financial requirements and the relative size of the Government's debt operations in capital markets, timing can be of critical importance. The level of outstanding government debt will increase by an average of about $2 billion every month. In addition, previously issued debt is coming due and must be refinanced. Each new issue is carefully tailored to meet the prevailing market conditions and investor demand. Any disruption in the ongoing borrowing program might lead to unnecessary disruptions and erratic pressures in capital markets. In turn, this could lead to pressures on interest rates, higher debt charges for the taxpayer and higher borrowing costs for both individuals and businesses across our country.

Clearly, given the size of the Government's financial operations, even a savings of a small fraction of 1 per cent can involve significant dollar amounts. Because of the relative importance of public debt charges in total government expenditure, it is our primary goal to minimize such charges. This goal can only be achieved if ample borrowing authority is always available so as to ensure that the large borrowing operations of the Government do not interfere with those of other levels of Government, provincial or municipal, or the private sector. We have a collective responsibility to see that the goal of minimizing public debt charges is vigorously pursued.

Another factor requiring the ongoing availability of borrowing authority concerns the impact of exchange market operations. Of special importance in this connection is the possible situation when the Canadian dollar is under heavy pressure and U.S. dollar working balances are low, thereby requiring that they be supplemented by drawing on the standby lines of credit which the Government maintains with Canadian and international banks. Toward the end of March when the borrowing authority is nearing exhaustion the Government may find itself in a position where it is unable to utilize either of its two standby lines of credit, if the need arises. Should such a situation materialize, the only alternative may be higher domestic interest rates.

Finally, I would note that the first fiscal quarter is usually a period of particularly heavy seasonal cash requirements because of tax refunds and other factors. Such a cash drain may be financed by market borrowings. Also, there is a large marketable Canada bond issue maturing on April 1. When the $967 million in maturing bonds is refunded in mid-March, there may be an opportunity to raise new cash. This can only be done if there is sufficient borrowing authority available to the Government.

As a matter of interest to Hon. Members, Mr. Speaker, I should like to outline how the Government has made use of the borrowing authority which was conferred on it by Parliament for the current fiscal year. The total mount of authority provided for 1983-1984 was $26.7 billion, which was equivalent to the financial requirements projected in the April, 1983 Budget. This borrowing authority consisted of $2 billion of non-lapsing authority carried forward from the Borrowing Authority Act, 1982-1983, $14 billion from the Borrowing Authority Act, 1983-1984, and $10.7 billion from the Borrowing Authority Act, 1983-1984 (No. 2). To date in the fiscal year, domestic borrowing operations have used about $26 billion of borrowing authority, composed of: $11.5 billion through the issue of Threasury bills, $8.5 billion through the issue of marketable bonds, and $6 billion through net sales of Canada Savings Bonds. However, total use of borrowing authority so far this fiscal year has been reduced by net redemptions of foreign denominated loans. Three foreign loans have matured so far in 1983-1984. The foreign exchange reserves which were used to redeem these loans were partially replaced when the Government borrowed U.S. $500 million in the Eurobond market in October, 1983.

On balance, therefore, foreign borrowing operations have reduced total use of borrowing authority by about $500 million this fiscal year. This means that a total of $25.5 billion of the $26.7 billion of borrowing authority provided by Parliament has been used to date. There is currently about $1.2 billion of unused borrowing authority. The Government expects to use most of this remaining authority by the end of this fiscal year.

While it is obviously desirable that Parliament have adequate time to study the new borrowing authority Bill, its early review would result in an efficient use of parliamentary time. The Estimates have been provided to the House and the debate on the Budget was completed yesterday. Thus the essential prerequisites for determining the level of borrowing authority, which are the planned sources of revenue and expenditures, have now been provided in complete detail and should contribute to the orderly completion of the debate on the Bill now before us.

To sum up, dealing with this Bill in a responsible manner will benefit the taxpayer by helping to minimize public debt charges and avoid unnecessary pressures on financial markets and interest rates. It will also facilitate policies to support the smooth functioning of the exchange markets. I have great confidence in the resourcefulness and strength of Canada's financial markets. They are among the most efficient anywhere in the world. During the recent years of difficult international economic circumstances the Government has been able to meet its financial requirements without any evidence of crowding out other major borrowers from domestic markets. At the same time, we have benefited from an appreciable decline in interest rates. The projected medium-term decline in the financial requirements of the Government should help to provide the necessary room for other major borrowers during a period of sustained economic recovery which Canada is currently experiencing.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, the Minister in explaining his Bill said that the Bill represented a continuation of the Government's plan for the economy. Well, Sir, that is exactly what it is. It is a continuation of the Government's plan for the economy to put the economy into irreversible insolvency. Indeed, Sir, these borrowing Bills which keep coming before us time after time after time, should be named now no longer "borrowing authority Bills", but rather "Liberal national insolvency Acts". This Bill should be named "Liberal national insolvency Act No. 1 for the second session of this Parliament".

The amount of this Bill, Sir, strikes a new level in borrowing demand. This Government is coming to the House and asking that the House approve its going to the markets for $29.5 billion of authority. That is $10 billion higher than any other previous demand. It is the highest demand on Parliament in the history of Parliament. It is unconscionable. It is improper. It cannot be supported by any thinking Member of the House. This House should rise up, Sir, and demand an end to this, not only on behalf of us as Hon. Members and of our constituents, but on behalf of our children, our children's children and our children's children yet unborn or even thought of.

• (1540)

The amount of debt this Government has incurred must be put on record. When this Government took office after the February 18, 1980 election, our net debt was $68.595 billion. That was an enormous amount bearing in mind there was only $17 billion owing when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) first took office in 1968. However, since March of 1980, this Government has pushed the net debt to the point that by March 31 of this year it will approach $151 billion, an increase of at least $92 billion in this Parliament alone. This Parliament, Mr. Speaker, will go down in history as a Parliament of spendthrifts, wasters and profligates, a Parliament that should have been turned out. When we retire from this place, how can we look at our grandchildren and say we sat in this House and did this to them? Yet that is what this Minister and this Government are asking us to do. By the end of the next fiscal year, Mr. Speaker, by March of 1985, if this borrowing plan carries on, this country's net debt will be $180 billion. Having put the nation in this position of bankruptcy, how can we face the nation?

Today our dollar is under attack on world markets. When I came to the House our dollar was trading at 79.3 cents U.S. It has been under attack and is slipping badly. Yesterday the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) was quoted as saying that he was not going to lose any sleep over that.

Mr. MacLaren: Nor are you.

Mr. Blenkarn: He does not care about the confidence the world places in Canada, or the confidence the people of Canada place in this Government. He is not going to lose any sleep because the Germans can keep interest rates down and their currency gets stronger. He is not going to lose any sleep because the Japanese can keep their interest rates significantly below ours and their currency gets stronger. He does not care that the British can get their interest rates well below ours and their currency gets stronger. No, he is not going to lose any sleep over the condition of the Canadian economy. He is just going to borrow more and spend more, as the Minister said, at least $2 billion a month more. He will roll over the existing debt on shorter and shorter terms so that now it will all be due in less than three years. And we as Members of a responsible Parliament should stand by and allow this condition to continue. It is a travesty on the concept of Parliament from the very beginning.

I suppose part of the problem with our dollar is that the world now knows that the Prime Minister has resigned. People had some confidence in him, thought he was a good leader. But they look at this Cabinet—we cannot see them here today—and they see yesterday's men. They know that if any one of them takes the leadership of the Liberal Party things will get even worse. They do not have a fresh idea or a fresh way of approaching the problems. The Minister said today that we must have the flexibility to keep the market going so that we can borrow more and more. Every week the Government will borrow 500 million fresh bucks, every business day $100 million more will go into the maw of this Government. The Government has to borrow 31 cents of every dollar it spends. The blue book we received the other day should not be a blue book; it should be a red book, because it is a red ink Government all the way.

This cannot be allowed to continue, Mr. Speaker. We saw the other day that Statistics Canada could not figure out what happened to $6.6 billion which was supposed to be in the current account surplus. They wondered about that, and StatsCan made the observation that the $6.6 billion, known as errors and omissions, seems to have gone to finance illegal drugs, U.S. real estate and stocks. They suspect a lot of money is being laundered through Canadian subsidiaries in countries with friendly tax regimes such as the Cayman Islands and the Bahamas.

Well, what is happening? Not only has the world no confidence in Canada, but a lot of Canadians have no confidence in Canada because they have this Government here and it borrows and spends and wastes. They are taking their cash out of Canada despite our trade surpluses. That is why there are errors and omissions of this nature. They are not errors or omissions, they are people taking their cash out of this country because this Government gives them no confidence. That is why conditions in the U.S. are far better than here. The U.S. federal reserve estimates that U.S. industry is operating at 79.9 per cent capacity. American unemployment is significantly lower than ours. American business has optimism. And now we are faced with being crowded out because as American business expands, it borrows and we will not be able to tap the American money market as we have in the past. We will have to depend on Canadian savings, which are running away from Canada. It is not a simple matter, but it has to be addressed and cannot be left to this Government, which will carry on in its usual fashion. We will get the usual borrowing authority Bill, the usual $29.5 billion of demand on the credit markets of the country.

Within 100 days or so, Mr. Speaker, the Government is going to select at the Liberal Convention a new Leader. That person will presumably form his own Cabinet and will either go to the country for a mandate, as he properly should, perhaps in August of this year, or he will try to hang on by his fingertips for the balance of time constitutionally available to this Parliament. In any case, Sir, this House can meet on the first Monday after Labour Day of this year. The House should have until then to determine how it organizes its priorities and spending demands and to take a fresh look at where we are taking our families, our children and our children's children.

• (1550)

We are going to have a new Government, whether a Liberal Government or a real new Government created by Members on this side in this Party. There is going to be a new Government in the country very shortly. That being the case, there is no justification for voting borrowing authority beyond the life of the Government. It would be improper for the House to vote borrowing authority to carry the Government beyond October 31 of this year. The House should give the Government no more than $15 billion in borrowing authority. The Government has $4 billion to $5 billion in the bank now. The reason this Bill expires on April 2 is that the Government intends to borrow by then the additional $1.2 billion for which it has authority. The Government will go into the new fiscal year with a good hunk of dough in the bank. If it has borrowing authority for $15 billion, under all circumstances it should have more than sufficient to carry it, even with the squandering, wasting and throwing away of money which the Government has done.

Therefore, the very best we can do at this point is to limit the borrowing authority to carry this wasteful Budget only until the end of October. All it requires is $15 billion, and that is where we ought to cut this Bill off.

I have spoken before about wasteful and profligatory spending. The chief economist of the Conference Board, Tom Maxwell, said, as reported in the Montreal Gazette:

> The question . . . is no longer whether we are dead in the water but when?
>
> He said that what's happened in the U.S. over the past four years shows how difficult it would be for Ottawa to solve its debt problem, if it decides to try.

We have to try to cut back our expenditures.

I would like now to quote Paul Volcker speaking to the American budget committee. Speaking of the American government, he said:

> In essence, the demands of the federal Government limit the rate of growth of other credit-absorbing sectors of the economy. The rationing device is interest rates held higher than would otherwise be the case. Under the circumstances, the more rapidly the economy grows and generates private credit demands, the greater the risk of rising interest rates.

He went on to say:

> We cannot reasonably escape from these problems by "monetizing" the Treasury debt through excessive expansion of bank credit and the money supply. The federal reserve could, in concept, take an approach which inflated all the numbers. But it cannot increase savings and reduce the savings-investment imbalance by undermining confidence. What must be done is to deal with the source of the problem—the excessive deficits. While it is already late to make significant changes for fiscal year 1984, action now affecting fiscal 1985 and later years can only work in the direction of moderating potential pressures, if sufficiently forceful. The market could then well anticipate the time the actions become effective. At the least, the risks of eroding confidence and new market pressures should be relieved . . . The large deficits now being projected can be self-perpetuating.

Mr. Volcker went on to say that the credit crunch, the tight money period, and the recession we had did much to eliminate inflation. All that will be lost if we continue trying to borrow and to print ourselves rich. We cannot run this country on a VISA card any more than you and I, Mr. Speaker, can run our families' household budgets using a VISA card to buy the groceries.

People have asked what we are going to do. First of all, we cannot continue any longer having 31 per cent of the expenditures of the Government financed with borrowed money. We have to consider where we are, where we have been and what our spending priorities are. The Budget provides for a 22 per cent increase in moneys going to Crown corporations.

Two days ago in the Supplementary Estimates we got the next tab for Canadair and de Havilland. By the end of this fiscal year, through the past 15 months, we will have paid to those Crown corporations $1.25 billion. We have not come to grips with the issue yet. In Question Period today the Prime Minister said we will have to spend more money. That is waste. There is something wrong. We cannot continue this way. We do not have the savings in the country to continue this way. We cannot operate with that kind of expenditure. We cannot operate with expenditures which contemplate giving the Post Office $1 billion over a two year period. We cannot operate with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation becoming larger and larger. It now costs $900 million a year. I doubt if we can continue to pay people to insulate their homes or change their furnaces. I do not believe I should receive a grant to buy a heat pump because it may save me some oil and put some money in my pocket, whether or not that grant is taxable. I do not believe I should tell my constituents, or you, Mr. Minister, should tell your constituents that the country should go into the credit markets of the world and create massive deficits to buy me a heat pump. That is what we have in legislation and that is unconscionable.

I believe that without interfering with social programs at all we could cut $5 billion from our Budget deficit. I received a letter from a former civil servant. He says:

> I am not alone in stating this inasmuch as 35 years of service culminating by promotion to upper levels of management has provided ample opportunities to observe waste, sloth and over staffing especially abroad at Embassies and High Commissions to say nothing at this time of UN offices where we are represented.

● (1600)

The Government says that there is nothing that it can do. That is unacceptable to me, my children and my grandchild.

We have proposed that the House of Commons establish a committee of the House to set priorities for the expenditures of Government. We believe that the social programs, such as pensions, family allowances, the child tax credits, the health care provisions and the educational provisions rank first. While there are many other expenditures which may be necessary, surely there is a time for priorizing. Surely there is a time to ask if we can afford the amount that is being spent on art, for example, when the Government must pay interest rates which exist today. Can we really afford a broadcasting system such as we have when the Government is paying the bank what it is currently paying? Can we really afford to go to the markets every week to auction Treasury bills at $2 billion each to pay for the losses in Devco, Canadair or de Havilland?

We are elected to make decisions. The present system prevents Members of Parliament from making decisions with respect to priorizing the expenditures of Government. There is no mechanism for deciding whether matters which come before the Broadcasting Committee take higher priority than the expenditures that are proposed in the Department of Regional and Industrial Expansion. There is simply an alphabet soup of programs for which there is no priority. The existing programs seem to expand every year. There is no zero based budgeting. No attention is being paid to the future or to serious current planning and budget controls.

Our Party has made a pledge to this country. Let me quote from a speech made by my Leader to the Young President's Organization at the National Club in Toronto on February 23. He said:

> We need to take a hard look at current planning and budgetary controls.
> Ask any civil servant involved in the process, and he or she will tell you that the current system, while a major improvement over its predecessor, still encourages padding of stated requirements and unnecessary spending to consume reserves.

One reason why the Minister has so many demands on money in the first quarter of the year is to pay bills that were incurred in the last quarter of the fiscal year. Departments scramble over themselves to spend all the money in its Estimates. Yet there is no effort made by Treasury Board, the Finance Committee or any committee of the House to control that kind of spending.

My views about whether the Government can carry on in this fashion have been expressed by others. For example, the present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen), in his previous capacity as Minister of Finance, said on June 28, 1982, as recorded at page 18883 of Hansard:

> Some say the government should print more money. Others say it should let the deficit rip.
> But that would fail miserably. Inflation and unemployment would get worse. Interest rates would rise even more. Canada would price itself out of world markets. Recovery would be postponed.

His deficit program in June of 1982 was $25.25 billion.

What has the Government done? The deficit rips, the borrowing rips and the demands get larger and larger. We are being asked to rubberstamp a borrowing Bill for $29.5 billion. We cannot as the House of Commons in good conscience allow this Bill to pass in its present form. I have suggested that the Bill be reduced to $15 billion and that Parliament work together, as it should, to priorize government expenditures. All the Liberal members will not be involved in their convention. A number of them will be here since they have responsibilities to their ridings as elected Members of Parliament. That is what they are being paid for. We can sit down together to discuss government expenditure priorities. We can work on the problem of government expenditure programs, as parliamentarians should. We can develop recommendations for the new Government of Canada, whether Liberal or Conservative, because problems must be faced by Parliament. I suggest that it is totally irresponsible for us to pass this Bill in its present form.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, today we are debating Bill C-21, an Act to provide borrowing authority to the Government of Canada. The Bill asks for authority to borrow $29.55 billion for the fiscal year 1984-85. Page 5 of the Budget Speech indicates that the Government's borrowing requirements for the full year would be an additional $25.6 billion, leaving a discretionary $4 billion for unforeseen contingencies. I suppose such contingencies would include intervening in the foreign exchange market to support the dollar, which is where many billions of dollars have gone in the past.

My speech follows that of the spokesman for the Official Opposition, the Member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn). He pointed out some of the problems in granting such a large amount of money for such a lengthy period. He has proposed to reduce that amount by half on the assumption that, since the Government will no longer exist six months from now, half of the spending authority should be quite adequate. I presume that the adequacy of the amount will be argued in Committee of the Whole.

I would like to spend a few moments at the outset of my remarks to consider the assumption that there will be a new government. Apparently my friend from Mississauga South assumed that there would be a new Progressive Conservative government and left the impression that there would be a great change as a result of such a switch in label. I found that very interesting, as I am sure many people in Canada did, because it has been the primary topic of conversation throughout the country. The perception has been left that the Conservatives would gain control of the public debt and bring matters into a manageable form. This caused me to obtain some of the tables showing past perfomance in this area. I received a publication from the Canadian Tax Foundation entitled The National Finances. It was an analysis of revenues and expenditures of Governments of Canada up to 1982-83. It contains an interesting table on page 156 which goes through the years from 1940 to 1982, at which point the table ends. It takes public debt and shows it as a percentage of the gross national product of the country for each year. I will not read the entire table into the record, but there are some periods of time which might be of interest to those who look at public debt over the long term.

Immediately after the Second World War we had, as would be predicted having spent a great deal of money in the war effort, a net debt of 113.1 per cent of the GNP. We came out of the war years with a total debt of more than one year's GNP. That was a tremendous debt. We went into the war attempting to fight deficits, trying to keep expenditures down, and suddenly, when faced with the prospect of war, the purse strings were loosened and expenditure took place. Full employment occurred and we incurred a debt as a percentage of GNP of 113.1 per cent. We worked very hard at reducing that debt in post-war years until about 1964-65 when it was down to about the 30-per cent range.

Having watched the Liberal Government over the past five years or six years, I thought it always increased national debt in relation to gross national product. However, I have to confess that the facts show otherwise for the period from 1965 to 1977-78. It actually declined. The public debt as a percentage of the GNP was down to the 13-per cent to 15-per cent range for a few years in the middle seventies. In 1978, the net debt was 19 per cent of that year's GNP. Given the rhetoric we have been hearing in the House and the perception on the streets, on public television and in other media, one would think that in the 1979 interim when we had a Conservative Government that percentage would have been under attack and would have gone down from the 19 per cent with which we were left after the high-spending Liberals were defeated. It did not happen. At the end of 1979 when the Conservative Government fell, rather than being 19 per cent, our percentage of debt to gross national product was 24.2 per cent. There was a rapid increase in just nine months or ten months of Conservative Government. Our debt began to get out of hand in 1979. It started with our friends, the Conservatives. Granted, it was continued by the Liberals. It continued to remain in the middle 20 per cent range. Today we are approaching 30 per cent of our GNP being net debt. However, the big change occurred when we had a Conservative Government.

It was with a great deal of dubiousness that I sat and listened to the speeches of my friends to my right. They told us that they and only they would get public debt into perspective. The facts of the matter are that the only time in the last few years when they had that power, they abused it or gave up the chance, and it jumped from 19 per cent to 24.2 per cent.

Mr. Blenkarn: You know better than that.

Mr. Althouse: Read the record.

Mr. Blenkarn: Read the record yourself.

Mr. Althouse: Relying on Progressive Conservatives to get the public debt in order is a rather unlikely scenario.

My own Province of Saskatchewan has a long history of CCF and NDP Governments. I would like to look briefly at how they handled deficit financing. After the war like many provinces, particularly western prairie provinces, when the CCF under Tommy Douglas came into power, Saskatchewan inherited a Liberal and Conservative nightmare of spending. There was a large public debt. It took eight years to reduce that public debt so that subsequent budgets would be break-even budgets without going into deficit financing. That tradition continued until the defeat of the NDP by the Progressive Conservative Party. In two short years that little Province of Saskatchewan with approximately one million people had in excess of $600 million of debt. The estimates indicate that the budget which will be levied in that province shortly will show an increase in the deficit one more time, again under a Progressive Conservative Government, the very people who have been saying that they know how to handle public debt and deficits. They certainly do! They are the growth Party—the Party that is able to make deficits grow very quickly. That Party's slogan in the last Saskatchewan campaign was, "There is so much more we can be". It is becoming very clear what that slogan means—further in debt.

The per capita debt for the Province of Saskatchewan in the last year rose from just over $4,000 to just over $5,000. That was an increase of more than $1,000 per capita or an increase of 25 per cent in the gross debt of the province in one year of Conservative Government. They know how to handle the situation! Therefore I understand why the rhetoric continues without reference to the facts.

I listened to my friends on both sides of the House who spoke before me. There are places where the public debt incurred by these Governments could be reduced in ways which would add to the gross national product instead of detract from it by way of increasing the amount of interest payments on the public debt that taxpayers have to come up with. Better management is not something that is easily described, but certain things have gone on of which the public is well aware that do not indicate careful management and good husbandry. We only have to look at the Canadair debacle where $1 billion went down the tube. The Auditor General was critical of the handling of the situation. All Hon. Members of the House have been critical of it as well. It proceeded for several years and no one seemed to take any interest in solving the problem until $1 billion or more of taxpayers' money had gone into that particular operation.

There are incentive programs offered which are of questionable value to Canadians. I will not spend a great deal of time talking about some of the ones to which the Hon. Member for Mississauga south referred. He raised a question as to whether public funds should be used to help him finance buying a heat pump. He can question that kind of spending. We all do. At least that particular expenditure results in increases to GNP and employment, unlike many of the incentive programs supported by both the old Parties which do not necessarily produce more jobs or increase the GNP. One of the more visible ones in that category would be the Petroleum Incentives Programs, the PIP grants, which have often been described as a colossal waste of money, something like $1.6 billion plus each year to drill holes in various parts of Canada Lands in an attempt to find oil. I think the track record has been oil in two of those holes to this point. Some gas has been found, but very little oil. Oil has been found in sites where it is economically impossible at this point to bring it to market. These are very questionable expenditures.

Some of the Liberal slush funds that have been discussed in this House in the last three or four months are very questionable in terms of adding to the gross national product or adding to employment opportunities, even though that was the designation of many of these. A great many of them have dubious value in terms of supplying long-term employment.

I turn now to some of the really big ones, such as deferred corporate taxes. What we have here is bookkeeping operations where we accelerate depreciation that really does not occur. We are giving a benefit for an expense that never really occurs. We are in effect allowing corporations to depreciate assets, which normally depreciate over 10 or 20 years, in two or three years and to set aside the funds for their own use. The problem that this raises is that it gives a direct benefit to those kinds of operations, an advantage of sourcing funds at virtually a zero interest rate as opposed to the sourcing abilities of small businessmen who are not always in a position to have that amount of funds available to them by way of accelerated depreciation. The beginning business and the small businessman is put at a disadvantage compared to the large corporations which are able to accumulate something in the neighbourhood of $22 billion or $23 billion in funds which they are allowed to defer for income purposes. They have the use of those funds at a very low rate, if any rate at all. The real risk takers, the small businessman and those attempting to start new businesses, have to get their capital at the market value, which is a much higher price.

The response of the Government when this has been pointed out has been strange and, I suppose, predictable. I do not see that either one of the two major Parties would approach the problem any differently. For example, the Budget before last allowed for an Indexed Securities Investment Plan for the middle-size and small investor. They can now go to the stock market and set up an ISIP and avoid part of the capital gains tax that such investments would normally have accrued to them.

People who purchase securities and stocks of publicly-traded companies get a tax advantage. They can avoid the normal capital gains tax that small businessmen and farmers, people like you and I, would have to pay if we were operating a small business or farms. Because they trade under this allowable loophole, the Indexed Securities Investment Plan, they do not have to declare all of the capital gains as income, not even half. In fact, it is about one-quarter. Therefore, there is an advantage for publicly-traded securities which private individuals trying to run a small business or farm do not have. They are at a disadvantage compared to those kinds of investors.

Either Party would operate pretty much the same because there was support from the Government and the Official Opposition for these kinds of tax breaks. This creates two levels of investment citizens. There are the ordinary citizens attempting to set up and continue a small business or farm who operate at high interest rates, a money from the bank situation. Their competitors, the large, publicly-traded and incorporated firms, are able to get their funds at lower rates. Not only do they get them at lower rates, but they are able to pay much lower taxes than the individual attempting to get the economy going by starting his own business, operating a farm or a service industry.

The giving up of money which the Government has allowed has created inequities. It has not solved the problem of deficit spending. In fact, it has exacerbated it, creating more hardship for Canadians like you and I. What can be done? There are a number of areas where some expenditure would help. There are a couple of areas where we proposed to make expenditures where we should have second thoughts. One is just a small one, but it is very important. It gives an impression to the world and to Canadians regarding what we think of expenditures and the use of tax funds. I refer to the proposal to expand the size of this House. It will involve an annual cost of $14 million to $15 million, not big in the scheme of things. It would add 28 Members with concomitant staff. The people of Canada will not be better represented by having an additional 28 Members and another 100 and some staff members. There are better ways to create employment. That is one area where Members on all sides of this House should act to show there is some concern for public expenditures. It would in a small way to show that some effort is being made to get public expenditures under control.

Our Party has put forward a number of proposals that would increase the gross national product and not increase the public debt. It would provide a great many jobs, particularly for young people who are discriminated against when it comes to job availability. A certain number of jobs can be created by improvements to municipal infrastructures such as bridges, sewer systems, changes to the railways that go through certain cities, and ports. A great deal needs to be done in the way of public and co-operative housing. There is still a great need for housing and the very act of creating housing is one of the useful job-creating tools which is still available to this economy.

For the long term, forestry regeneration must be addressed now. Our forests are not being regenerated as quickly as they are being depleted. Forestry regeneration is something that cannot wait. It takes 80 years to 150 years in parts of our country for a forest to revitalize and regenerate. We cannot afford to be without an adequate supply of forestry products for that amount of time, so it is very crucial that we address reforestation now.

Along with reforestation, we can improve the spawning habitat of some of the fisheries by reducing the amount of silt flowing into the river system, thus improving and enhancing the ability of those river systems to spawn fish. Then, rather than cutting back on the amount of fishermen who are allowed to fish along our coasts, we can meet their requirements and provide fish stocks for those fishermen. There would then be regrowth and regeneration in that important sector of our economy.

During the so-called Crow rate debate, we outlined a transportation policy for most of Canada that I think is still very apropos and must be acted upon soon. This policy consist of rebuilding and combining the two railway systems so that they can be operated in a more efficient manner.

I see that my time is coming to an end, Mr. Speaker. Last but not least, there is one area of federal Government spending for which there is a great need and which will produce a great many benefits now and in future years, and that is an increase in the amount of money that the federal Government provides for post-secondary education. I think that training the young people who are waiting to get into our labour force is of utmost importance in an age of high technology and rapid change. Well educated people have a better opportunity to survive the kind of rapid change that is about to occur in the economy, both in this country and in the world, and expenditure in education is probably one of the best investments that we could be making at this particular time.

I believe that if we look at reducing the incentives and giveaways made by way of accelerated depreciation and forgiveable capital gains on ISIPs, we could easily finance the expansions to the economy which I have mentioned. This would result in more jobs, a reduced deficit and an increased Gross National Product, the first steps toward getting the economy back on the road to recovery.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I suppose that this is the eleventh or twelfth year that I have been called upon to speak on a borrowing authority Bill and some years I have been called upon to do so two or three times a year, so I am certainly not new to this kind of Bill. When I listen to speeches made by Hon. Members on the other side of the House and particularly to speeches made by members of the Tory Party, I find that a great many of them use raw numbers without offering any kind of explanation or understanding of the meaning of those numbers. For instance, they talk about a deficit of $29.8 billion as if it existed in some kind of a vacuum. It is a large amount of money, but no figure exists in a vacuum. One must deal with deficit numbers in terms of the Gross National Product and in terms of things like the gross capital formation or the savings ratios. Understanding these things are all fundamental to understanding the nature of the deficit.

Another thing that is very fundamental to understanding the nature of the deficit is understanding the way that money is spent and in which ways one could cut back on the deficit. I hear many Members on the other side discuss how we could reduce the deficit at a tremendous rate. I think that the Tory finance critic is being very honest when he says that reducing the deficit hurts very badly and that they will have to be mean about it. I guess that is what must be done if we really want to cut the deficit.

As well, there is constant reference made by Members on the other side to how well things are done by the Reagan government in the United States. I take it from the finance critic and from the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) that we should move much closer to the way the Americans do things and particularly to the way the Reagan government does things. I would like to deal with these things and try to develop some notion of what the deficit means and its significance in terms of what is happening to our economy. I would like to try and compare the two economies with the information that I have available. I do not have complete information available and I would certainly be loath to say that I do. However, with the information I have available, I would like to see how we would fare if we were led by a government which has not really told us where it wants to go but has given a pretty good indication that it would like to follow the route taken by Mr. Reagan.

The nature of borrowing itself is something that I think should be understood when making a comparison between borrowing here and borrowing in the United States. In the United States, the government puts a lid on the total amount of money that can be borrowed. In this country, it is done on a different basis. I do not know that I could say that one way is better than the other, but in Canada the Government asks to borrow a certain amount of money and that is the limit. It does not put a lid on the debt. At this particular point we are asking to borrow $29.8 billion. With the authority that we still have left, we actually need something like $25.9 billion or $25.8 billion. About $4 billion worth of borrowing authority is not absolutely necessary but I think it is prudent to ask for it. The money is not actually borrowed until it is spent. We are only asking for the authority to borrow such an amount at this particular point.

Let us look at that $29.8 billion figure in terms of the Gross National Product which, in the year 1983, amounted to about $366.6 billion. That $29.8 billion represents about 8.1 per cent of the Gross National Product. However, by 1984 that amount will be reduced to about 6.8 per cent of the Gross National Product because there will be a decrease in the amount of the deficit itself and there should also be a 3 per cent or 4 per cent increase in the Gross National Product.

I find it difficult to understand how the Tories could simply use raw figures when describing this kind of situation. Let us say that I own a small company and I have assets of half a million dollars. I approach my bank and say that I want to borrow $50,000 against those assets. That is one situation in which I could find myself. Another situation would be if I were to have assets of $100,000 and I wanted to borrow $50,000. That is a very different situation. We cannot talk about a $50,000 loans as something which exists in a vacuum. It is a loan against the securities that I have.

When we talk about the deficit, we are talking about the deficit as against a certain Gross National Product and that is the only meaningful way to look at it. In other words, the Gross National Product of the country this year is something in the order of $366 billion and the deficit is a little over 8 per cent of that Gross National Product.

That is one way of looking at the deficit. The other way of looking at the deficit has reference to savings. Again I shall return to simplicity although I do not like to do so because there are different ways of explaining these things. However, let us take a simple situation. Let us say that I have a certain amount of savings invested in stocks or securities of some kind. I go to the bank to borrow half as much as I have saved this year. That is not such a bad deal. Let us say that I saved $50,000 and I want to borrow $25,000; that is not such a bad deal.

• (1640)

Let us see how this compares with the American system. In this country the savings ratio this year is a little over 12 per cent and I am told that in the United States it is about 5 per cent. With the deficit at 8 per cent, against a capital formation in the area of 12 per cent, that will not push interest rates up to the same extent as is being done in the United States where the savings ratio is about 5 per cent. The deficit in the United States this year is a little over 6 per cent of the GNP but as a function of the capital formation it is much higher. The congressional budget office tells us that the deficit will absorb almost 100 per cent of the capital formation.

The situation in the United States is much more dangerous than it is in this country. The very high rate of savings here makes a great difference in the way the numbers come out. These things have to be dealt with if we are to deal intelligently with deficits.

Let us consider how this money is spent, Mr. Speaker. The Tories have talked about how they will reduce the deficit and cut spending, but I should like to know just where that will happen. The blue book shows projected expenditures in the order of $94.6 billion in total, or a $9 billion increase over the previous year.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. May I appeal to Hon. Members not to interrupt the Hon. Member who has the floor, as provided in the Provisional Standing Orders. May I refer Hon. Members to Standing Order 15(3), which reads as follows:

When a Member is speaking, no Member shall pass between that Member and the Chair, nor interrupt him or her, except to raise a point of order.

Mr. McRae: Mr. Speaker, I find that Members are either responding in this way or they are asleep. At least I am not putting them to sleep and I am pleased about that.

Of the $96.4 billion, $46.4 billion represents transfers to the provinces for such things as health and welfare. The national debt takes up $20.3 billion. When the amount of transfers is taken away from the amount of expenditures, what is left pays for the operations of the Government—the post office, Department of National Defence, employees of the House of Commons and of the Government, transfers to Crown corporations, et cetera. It represents 28.3 per cent of the total spending.

How much could the Opposition cut back in this area which represents 28 per cent of total Government expenditures? Will they have to dip into the other 72 per cent which represents transfers to people, and so on? The largest transfer is for health and welfare. Health costs in the United States are much higher than ours but they are paid for privately. They represent 10 per cent of the Gross National Product in the U.S. compared to 8 per cent in Canada.

Substantial cuts can be made only in two areas. The first is the operational area of government, the goods and services that the Government exchanges; the other is in the large area of transfers to people for health, welfare, pensions and other things. Where will those cuts be made? I submit that there is always some fat that can be cut out.

Mr. Blenkarn: When did you ever do that?

Mr. McRae: In the next year we will reduce the deficit by about $3 billion. Most of the cuts will have to come from these transfers to people. If the Tories believe that the deficit is the greatest problem, then pensions, health services and such things will have to be cut, particularly if the cost of defence is to be increased. I do not know where the cuts will come.

For an indication I can look at what President Reagan has done in the United States. He has cut school lunches, social security and so on, areas that we have not cut. Basically this is a compassionate Government. I should like to refer Hon. Members to an article that appeared in The Sunday Star of Toronto of February 12 this year.

Mr. Crosbie: The bible! The bible tells me so.

Mr. McRae: I consider Joseph Schlesinger to be a very reputable correspondent. He wrote:

> Canada and the United States have both been going through tough times the past three years with high unemployment, increasing poverty and strained budgets.
> But there is a major difference in how the two countries have dealt with the victims of the hard times.
> Call it the Compassion Difference.

Paraphrasing the President of the United States, he has said that a lot of people sleep out at nights because they choose to do so. A former assistant to the President, the Attorney General of the United States, says that people go to soup kitchens to eat because it is cheaper that way. This shows a lack of compassion and there have been large cuts in these areas.

One would not think that these cuts would have created growing deficits in the United States. There were large tax cuts for people earning $80,000, for instance, which amounted to $15,000; but for people earning under $10,000, it amounted to $240 per year. The congressional budget office tells us that if defence expenditure increases and tax cuts had not been brought in, the United States would have no deficit by next year. That is what happens under a very conservative government, Mr. Speaker.

I cannot tell whether the Official Opposition would do the same thing if it formed the government but it seems as if it is indicating it would. That gives me great concern about what would happen to pensions, family allowances and health services, for instance. The Tories talk about cutting back on such things and increasing defence spending. They sound exactly like President Reagan.

This Budget brought in some very important programs. A lot of Canadians are afraid for the future and in some areas the fear is legitimate. Contrary to what I see in the United States, I see in this Budget an attempt to eliminate some of the worst fears. I believe the worst fear which Canadians can have in an economic sense is the fear that when one retires there will not be enough money to keep oneself going. That is particularly the case with private pension plans where very often when the husband dies, he being the person who worked and who put money into a pension plan, the wife receives nothing, or two years of benefit or something of that nature. We are saying we must get these private pension plans working. We must make sure that people have good incomes after retirement. It is very important that people be secure. These pensions must be indexed so that people can continue to live in a decent way. This kind of thinking is very different from what I see of the Reagan government in the United States, and it is different from what I believe is going to happen if those people opposite come into power.

There is another area where there has been a good deal of concern over the past few years. We have had a lot of cases in Thunder Bay where people buy a house, put down a nice down payment and are managing very well. Then all of a sudden interest rates climb. They have to renew their mortgages and they are caught. Perhaps one member of the family loses a job and they cannot make the payments. As a result, they lose their home.

We have fought very hard for a solution in my own constituency, and I commend the people in my office particularly, who have written very many letters about this kind of situation. We are now putting a plan into action which will give protection to Canadian home owners so that they will be secure in the knowledge that their mortgage will have, more or less, a fixed interest rate. These are the kinds of things which a compassionate government does, and which we have been doing. But I am very much afraid, and I believe Canadians are very much afraid, that in the future, if the government changes, this will not be the case.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. A period is now provided for questions and comments. Questions, comments? Debate.

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to speak this afternoon on Bill C-21, an Act to provide borrowing authority. I feel a great deal of compassion—and I would like to express it at this time—for those members of the Government, such as the previous speaker from Thunder Bay, who must attempt to defend this borrowing authority Bill. That Hon. Member indeed danced around in a vacuum and really gave no explanation, as far as I am concerned, for the horrendous debt which this Bill intends to impose on the people of Canada.

Bill C-21 is a short Bill; it has three paragraphs. But I do not want Hon. Members of this House, or the people of Canada, to be misled by its shortness into believing that Bill C-21 is insignificant, because this Bill packs an immense wallop. It has enough of a wallop to bankrupt most of the small businesses of this country when the rippling effect is finally felt throughout the system in high interest rates and inflation. It has a wallop big enough to destroy the middle class in this country when the rippling effect of inflation and high interest rates is felt, and that is bound to occur when this Bill hits the money markets. I tell you, Sir, that no one in Canada should ignore this "small" Bill because we and our children are going to be living with it for a long time.

This Bill provides to Canadians, to this House, the philosophy of the Liberal Party starting from 1968 when this Government came into power. The Liberal philosophy is reflected in this borrowing Bill because its philosophy is to overspend—overspend yesterday, overspend today and overspend tomorrow.

What do I mean by overspending? My definition of spending is when government taxes people and uses that money for the operation of government. Overspending is when government does not have any money and spends anyway and must borrow outside the country. That is the Liberal Government philosophy—overspending. In fact, Mr. Speaker, it has been so successful in that philosophy it has out-NDPed the NDP. That poor Party has no place to go now because the Liberals have taken over its socialist position of heavy spending.

This Government's spending since 1968 is well detailed as a percentage of the Gross National Product, and I would like to inform you, Mr. Speaker, that this is on a national accounts basis. My figures do not seem to agree with some of the other figures which have been bandied about, particularly by the Hon. Member for Humboldt-Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse) who spoke for the New Democratic Party. We had a lot of humbug from Humboldt. My figures show, and I believe these are accurate figures, that in 1968-1969 we were spending 17.4 per cent of the Gross National Product. That figure has increased steadily. The only time it showed a decrease was during the period when the Conservatives were in power. That was in 1979-1980, I believe, and the figure decreased by one percentage point that one year. In the previous year government spent 21.3 per cent of the Gross National Product. The following year when the Conservatives were in power, it was 20.7 per cent. The year after when the Liberals again became the Government, spending went up to 21.2 per cent, and today it is 25 per cent. Spending is going up, up, up, and there is no indication it will go down.

That is an example of the Liberal Government's philosophy. We have a Budget of $100 billion. We have an annual deficit of $30 billion. We have a total deficit of some $180 billion at the end of this year. Not very many people can comprehend $180 billion. However, I believe everyone can comprehend $6,000 to $7,000 a year, and that is the debt which every child born today is burdened with. That is our children's heritage because of the overspending of the Liberal Government over the past number of years. The minute a child is brought into this world he or she owes a debt of $7,000. How it is going to be paid is really a good question.

What has concerned me, and I believe what concerns a lot of Canadians, is how can anyone spend so much money? How can one overspend to the extent of $30 billion a year? We have been provided with some very good examples and I do not intend to go into all of them, but I would like to mention a few which the average Canadian can understand. However, first of all, I would like to tell the average Canadian that the deficit of $30 billion is probably not an exact figure. I will quote what the Auditor General said in his report about that deficit:

> The increase in the national debt is important to all Canadians. Parliamentarians have the need—and all Canadians the right—to know the actual deficit, the actual debt as precisely as can be stated.

He continues, and this is the important part:

> My opinion on the Financial Statements of the Government of Canada illustrates that those amounts would differ by many billions of dollars from what is presented—

That is the $30 billion figure. So we are not even getting the facts on this horrendous $30 billion annual deficit. As I was saying, how do you overspend that kind of money, Mr. Speaker? Well, let us go to something Canadians can understand, the Auditor General's report. He talks about a horror story in New Brunswick involving the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. It guaranteed a loan for some $315,000 to build a 22-unit hotel. The motel did not make its payments. The trust company seized the hotel and sold it. But did they do it properly? Not at all. A corporate guarantee by the same hotel owner was never pursued by the Government. The Government failed to ensure that a protective bid was placed at the auction, nor was it even represented at the auction to ensure the proceedings were conducted in the best interests of the Crown. What happened at the auction? We sold the motel for $200. The successful bidder, and I will guarantee you he was a Liberal, sold the property the next day for $75,200. A nice day's profit. The fellow who brought it mortgaged it a month later for $285,000.

● (1700)

That is how this Government overspends. It gives money away, throws it away. You may say $315,000 is not a lot, and perhaps not. But it is a lot of money to me and my constituents in the Okanagan where we have 20 per cent unemployment. We can use that kind of money. All I am saying is that that sort of thing is repeated time and time again, and how do you explain it?

What about Centennial Towers here in Ottawa which we were talking about the other day? The Department of Public Works wanted a building so they put out bids and got 32 proposals. Number 24 on the list was the so-called Centennial Towers. Not the second, third, fourth, fifth, tenth or fifteenth but the twenty-fourth. The Department is paying $1 million a month and the building is still empty. Why? Because they were told the Security Service would be in effect by that time. This Parliament still has not passed the Act to set up the secret police, the super-snoopers, and probably will not. The building is right down here on Kent Street and it is empty. I pass it every day. It used to be an apartment block and now they are getting $1 million a month for the thing standing empty. And one wonders why this Government is overspending, why it has a $30 billion annual deficit! That is why. I suppose the person who did that has been promoted.

It goes on and on, Mr. Speaker. However, perhaps the public is most interested in another aspect of Government overspending and waste, the porkbarrelling aspect of these programs. We have heard a lot about these programs, but I would just like to read from an article in The Globe and Mail which referred to "porkbarrelling the Axworthy way". At least, that is what I call it. It begins at the Winnipeg airport where several tens of millions of dollars have been spent. There is a housing project as you drive into town, then a giant excavation for the Air Canada Computer Centre. Then there is $13 million for another complex, $8 million for a Senior Citiznes' Home, and $41 million for the National Research Council. There is $8 million for a South Winnipeg Training Centre. It goes on and on. I guess there is nothing wrong with all that money being spent in Winnipeg.

Mr. Huntington: Seven hundred and eighty million dollars.

Mr. Dantzer: Yes, for Winnipeg. I do not know why they should be taking taxes out of Okanagan North when we have 20 per cent unemployment and pouring it into Winnipeg. They are very deserving people but so is the rest of the country. Why do we porkbarrel only where Liberals are? Surely the rest of the country is entitled to be treated in equal manner. That is how we arrive at a Bill asking for the authority to borrow $29 billion. This Government has overspent and is still overspending.

It is interesting, Mr. Speaker, when we talk about porkbarrelling, to realize that in this little Bill there is a request for some $4 billion which is not even set out in the Budget. We do not even know what it is going to be used for. A contingency! You get a little upset when you hear about that and you know there is going to be an election pretty soon. You hear reports from the Nova Scotia Liberal caucus that they are going to win the election like they did before; they are going to keep Quebec, ignore the west and porkbarrel southern Ontario. Maybe that is what the $4 billion is for; a nice, neat contingency fund. I do not know but I wish someone on that side would explain to us why then need that $4 billion. I charge the Government with defrauding the Canadian taxpayer, because that is exactly what it is.

Another question we should ask is why every spring do we have these immense borrowings by this Government. As someone said earlier, this is the largest borrowing Bill ever to come before this House. Number one, of course, is to pay the people of Canada their income tax refunds. That is money the Government of Canada has taken from people wrongly, has used it and is now paying them back without interest. Every year we have the same problem. Another more serious reason is that at year end every Department of this Government is scrambling to find ways and means and schemes to spend all the money they budgeted for. Every year it is the same thing. I have talked to civil servants and they say it is the hardest task they have all year. One would think that a properly run government could work out a scheme whereby every year there is not a scramble to use up money which should not be used. Surely that is not so difficult. They do it in the private sector, why can it not be done in the public sector?

The overspending scenario of the Liberal Government, Mr. Speaker, has gone on in the past and is obviously going to go on in the future. But how are we to pay for these deficits? Not so long ago, in 1980 when the Government got into power, the annual deficit was $10 billion. It is now $30 billion. Can anyone comprehend the waste? The Government has made no effort at all to hold the line.

How do we pay for it? Number one, we print money. Over the past 12 years the Bank of Canada has monetarized some $12 billion of Government requirements. We print money and that causes inflation. Also we borrow it. Federal borrowing is 58 per cent of new debt security in Canada. This year the Government is asking for $29 billion and total private savings were $32 billion. We are asking the people of Canada to cough up 91 per cent of their private savings. The Hon. Member from Thunder Bay talks about our rate of savings in comparison to the U.S. No matter what the rate is, we are using it all. There is nothing left for the private sector. That is what the people of Canada have to look forward to when they see this little Bill that we have before us.

Who are the people who really suffer because of this deficit, Mr. Speaker? It is the people of Canada who have suffered, are suffering and are going to suffer. To print money only cheapens our currency and the cost of living goes up. Certainly it is going to cost more to pay off our foreign debt. It is going to cost more to purchase the equipment we need from abroad and it is going to cost more to put food on our table. As we all know, we get a lot of food from outside this country. That is what printing money does. We only have to look at countries in South America to see that we will become another Argentina if we are not careful and if this Government is not put out of office pretty quickly.

• (1710)

What does borrowing do? There are those who say it boosts the economy. I can tell the House that it is going to increase interest rates in the country and start a recession, the likes of which we have never seen. The markets are already showing that and interest rates are already going up. We already have unemployment because of past high interest rates and we are going to get another round of it. There has to be a stop to this but it appears the Government does not intend to stop. It puts up speakers to argue it is a good thing and that this high deficit does not matter in our situation. I do not think anyone is prepared to accept that kind of nonsense. It is really the back door to socialism. In fact, it may even be the front door.

The Hon. Member for Humboldt-Lake Centre spoke about what his Party would do and how they would spend. I would like to quote from a report of Mr. James Laxer, who is the the key intellect of the NDP. He argues that their policies are not appropriate today. He said:

> Just where would the NDP notion of economic recovery lead if it was actually implemented? . . . to a skyrocketing deficit in manufactured products, trade, to a disastrous balance of payments situations, to a falling dollar—

That is what is happening right now.

> —to higher interest rates. Leaving the structure of the Canadian economy the way it is and stimulating consumption would result in a huge leakage of dollars out of Canada . . . Such a policy would quickly return Canada to a disastrous balance of payment crisis—

That is exactly what the Hon. Member proposed in his speech—increased spending and more debts.

Mr. Gustafson: Payment for overexpenditure on Crown corporations.

Mr. Dantzer: That is what the Liberals have been doing, Mr. Speaker, for the last 16 years. It is time they relieved the Canadian public and left office.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, would the Hon. Member care to reply to a couple of questions? He had a lot to say about mismanagement. He gave a number of examples of mismanagement. I suggest there is nothing inherently Liberal or Conservative about mismanagement. Certainly Members on this side would like to see every effort made, and they do make considerable efforts in standing committees of the House, as do Cabinet Ministers, to try to manage better.

I would like to move to a couple of fundamental questions which I do not believe he addressed when he spoke of the deficit. The Hon. Member's Party and Leader advocate increased spending on health care. The Progressive Conservative Party advocates increased defence spending. They also say one of the problems with our economy is that we do not spend enough on research and development. Furthermore, they argue we should have increased investment incentives. At the same time they say the deficit should be reduced.

Has the Hon. Member added up how much his Party proposes to spend in each of the areas I have listed? Could he give us some indication of the areas where his Party would cut spending if they formed a government?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before recognizing the Hon. Member for Okanagan North (Mr. Dantzer), I would like to remind Hon. Members that questions and comments must relate to the specific remarks of the previous speaker. No new issues should be raised. However, I give the benefit of the doubt to the Hon. Member and he may respond if he wishes.

Mr. Dantzer: Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to hear the Hon. Member outline the policy of the Conservative Party. So often in the past we have been accused of having no policy. In five, six or seven areas he specifically spoke about our policy. I am glad he told the people of Canada that we have a good policy.

The other day an Hon. Member on this side of the House said the Government is spending $1 billion on advertising. We will cut that out and save $1 billion right there. That is a good start. The Government is spending millions to advertise the fishing industry and at the same time cutting back on the fishing industry. The Government says it sells no fish. There is something wrong with that kind of approach.

There are many ways and as time goes by we will tell you how. After all, we are not the Government. You are the Government and responsible for the mistakes you make. I know back-benchers bleed profusely and are helpless when the front bench makes mistakes.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to my colleague for Okanagan North (Mr. Dantzer). We read the Auditor General's report every year. The situation does not get better. It gets worse. The Auditor General has pointed out that the Liberal Government does not have the will to implement controls. It does not believe in cost benefit analysis. Its theory is blank cheque government. The Auditor General points out that cost overruns on major capital projects total $1.1 billion. It is obvious there is no management when there are that amount of cost overruns. No business could survive with cost overruns like that. Is there any reason we could not get proper management to do cost benefit analyses on these major capital projects to bring a stop to these cost overruns? Some years the overruns are well over $1.1 billion.

There are other areas where we could cut back on expenditures. As an example, in a short period of time 35 Cabinet Ministers were flying all over the country in Jetstars.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hesitate to interrupt the Hon. Member. However, I appeal to Hon. Members to relate their questions and comments to the specific remarks of the previous speaker. This is not a time to raise new issues. Remarks must relate to those made by the previous speaker. The Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie) seems to be stretching the matter beyond the Hon. Member's speech.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, I will just point out that the use of JetStar aircraft cost Canadians almost $1 million in a 100-day period of use in August of 1983. We have had situations where Liberals have taken three JetStars to fly campaign workers to Winnipeg.

Will the Hon. Member make comments on the Auditor General's report regarding the will to bring expenditures under control and to do something about these cost overruns?

Mr. Dantzer: Mr. Speaker, it is true that every time the Auditor General's report comes out there is a lot of wringing of hands and people saying they will try to do better. I am not saying the Government has not the will to do better. However, since they have not done any better they either have not the will or the ability. In other words, they have lost control of government. That may well be the answer. Perhaps the administration has become so large that the Minister and the Government can no longer control the vast number of people under it. However, it is the same both ways. If the Government is not doing the job it should get out and let someone else in who probably could do it.

• (1720)

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I noticed that the Hon. Member referred to government spending as a percentage of the GNP. I believe he said it was 17.4 per cent. I think he indicated the period 1968-69 and that it was at the same level in 1962 under a Tory government. Of course, during the course of a recessionary period such as the one we just came through, this naturally increased due to the safety nets that were put in place in society by Liberal governments over the years so that we would not have to go through the hard times that existed in the 1930s.

With respect to lack of revenue and the increased expenditures by the Government to provide these safety nets, how can the Member use that as a logical comparison when, in fact, the net public debt as a percentage of Gross National Product in 1982-83 was actually lower than it was during the Diefenbaker period in the early 1960s?

Mr. Dantzer: Mr. Speaker, I think the subject of the Diefenbaker period was raised earlier. Mr. Diefenbaker was paying for the war which we had just gone through. It is pretty understandable. As well, at that period, during the early years of the Liberal regime, the deficit was not nearly as high.

I am not saying that some of the deficit is not due to the recent recession. I am merely saying that the recession was made much worse and more harmful to Canada because of Liberal Government policies. I am also saying that the Government has not shown any will or ability to cut that deficit down in terms of the percentage of GNP. That is all I am saying.

In the relatively short period I have been here, the Government has said every year that it will cut the deficit in the next year. However, it is never done the next year but always the year following. It has done the same thing this year. The Government says it will cut the deficit next year to $24.4 billion from $25 billion, then to $23.6 billion from $24 billion and then to $23.1 billion. Wait until next year, if the Member is still around; I bet it will go up again. That is why I suggest we cannot believe the Government or its figures when it presents a Budget.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order! Debate. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport.

Mrs. Eva Côté (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, with Bill C-21, the Government is asking the House for permission to borrow the monies it needs for the proper administration, and I emphasize the words proper administration, Mr. Speaker, of the country's business.

I do not intend to elaborate on the basis for this request, which is fair and reasonable, since I believe my learned colleague from Thunder Bay-Atikokan (Mr. McRae) already did so very successfully. I would rather discuss a number of situations that prevail in my riding as they do generally across Canada, and that justify this request for supplementary borrowing authority. That the Government is asking a little more than it needs merely proves that the Government would rather be safe than sorry. The affairs of state must be administered with an eye to what the future may hold in store, and I think it is quite normal that the Government should ask the House for sufficient borrowing authority to cover its requirements.

I think it is hardly necessary to recall the state of the economy in preceding years, especially since 1981, or perhaps towards the end of 1980 and the beginning of 1981. The economic situation has become extremely difficult, and at the same time it has been necessary for the Government to protect jobs and especially to plan ahead for new generations entering the labour market. When I say that we should open up labour market opportunities, I should add that every effort ought to be made to bring back into the labour market those of our fellow Canadians who have lost their jobs.

I would like to quote a few figures on the amounts of money earmarked by the Government to meet the needs of the people in a region such as mine. If we add up all the money spent not so long ago in Eastern Quebec in particular on unemployment insurance and social assistance, we find that the Canadian Government has been paying out $1 million every day. It seems to me that, in such circumstances, any intelligent person would eventually wonder whether those funds might be expended in a more productive and constructive way than keeping people idle and giving them unemployment insurance benefits or social welfare hand-outs. That is why we have set up very worthwhile programs by using the funds allocated under the provisions of Unemployment Insurance Act Section 38.

Mr. Speaker, a significant part of Quebec forests cover my region—the entire territory of Témiscouata, Kamouraska, Lower St. Lawrence and Gaspé—and everyone knows that it has been extensively ravaged by the spruce budworm. Thanks to the funds made available through unemployment insurance under Section 38 of the Act, we were able to carry out major reforestation and silviculture projects, to the extent that our forests have been given a new lease on life. Millions of young trees were planted, and all those projects have kept Canadians at work to ensure a much brighter future for ourselves and our children. It may have cost a little more than paying unemployment insurance benefits, but the Government and various groups of people put in additional funds to see the projects through under those programs, and even some companies and institutions pitched in so that a great many people, thousands of my fellow citizens, have been able to earn an honest living while doing something useful for the community. Our intention is to maintain those programs and to encourage people to undertake worthwhile projects under them.

With respect to social welfare, we realize now that it is becoming increasingly imperative for the well-being of our community and Canada as a whole to make sure that people who are penalized because they lack adequate training or face job shortages can benefit from some of those programs with a view to becoming active in their community and eventually finding gainful employment.

In this regard, Hon. Members learned last week that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) had signed an agreement with the Quebec Minister of Manpower and Employment Security under which the Canadian Government agreed to increase its contribution by about $60 million over two years to enhance the social assistance program.

Now let us see how these funds will be used to improve the welfare of all the young people who will benefit from them, and I mention young people because this program is intended for those under 30. In addition to receiving the social assistance to which they are entitled, they will be getting an additional amount of $150 a month. Three avenues will then open to them. First, they may continue their secondary or even post-secondary education. They may also gain experience in the workplace by way of contacts with businesses and non-profit organizations, or alternatively institutions will be able to use the services of these young people who will then be gaining an extremely important experience in the workplace. In addition, these young people will be able to take part in projects to meet the needs of the community.

Mr. Speaker, you know as well as I do how extremely important it is to see that this whole section of our population, namely our young people under 30, is integrated as much as possible into what is usually considered a normal society, in other words, people who have as many opportunities to work as possible. However, you also know that in view of the deterioration of the economic situation, there have been serious problems; and if we add to this the thrust of technological changes and everything that will come up in the future, some of our fellow citizens are ill-prepared to take up these new challenges. The program I have just described and on which the federal and provincial Ministers have agreed will offer thousands of young people a very interesting opportunity to improve themselves by taking part in creative and innovative projects for the community.

I also want to deal with certain programs administered by the Department of Employment and Immigration. As I was saying, a number of young men and women have to return to the labour market and the Department of Employment and Immigration is offering them some very useful programs. Programs such as the Youth Job Corps and Career-Access even allow these young people to submit their own projects to the Department and do what they really want.

In particular, Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw your attention to a program developed by Employment and Immigration Canada and administered by the Department of National Defence. I do not believe that it is out of order for me to describe the use that is made of the tax dollars paid by the Canadian people and of the funds for which the Government requests some borrowing authority. In addition to the vast amounts used for the financing of established programs, particularly health and education, there are a number of programs which are necessary and which must be maintained. Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw your attention more particularly to a program which I find extremely interesting for young people. You do remember that the Department of National Defence was asked to develop and implement a whole system of training and employment for some 5000 young people, in its various centres in Canada. The goal we had in mind was to give these young people a special but rewarding training and at the same time an opportunity to explore some trades or professions otherwise unfamiliar to them. In my own area, in Rimouski, enlistment is done at the recruitment centres of National Defence, and 75 young people have taken advantage of that program. They have been with National Defence for a year now.

In the Sept-Îles area where employment problems are very serious, 75 young people have joined the program. In the Atlantic area, for example, 1,057 young people are with National Defence, 1,247 in the Quebec region, 1,809 in central Canada or Ontario, 1,103 in Western Canada. This means that 5,216 young men and women are with National Defence benefitting from a most interesting personal training. In addition, they can learn several trades in those various centres. For instance, those young people can find themselves in the bases in Cornwallis, St. John, Petawawa, Valcartier, Calgary, and so on, and get training in various skills or professions such as administration and finance, the postal service, all technical services. Training can be had in nearly all the trades connected with the navy, even in music, which is not to be disdained. This means that many thousands of young people are now availing themselves of a special program that is worthwhile, both for National Defence and society in general. I remember some parents who told me at home: Perhaps if you had fewer programs or no programs for the young, the Solicitor General or the Minister of Justice in some provinces might have to expand their facilities. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the programs now being offered by the Government of Canada, to women and young people in education or manpower training or the retraining programs for adults are absolutely vital and are only an addition to the normal services the Government of Canada should provide to all Canadians. In the light of the current situation, of course this is expensive. It is extremely costly to ensure that the greatest possible number of people can earn a decent living, making a contribution to society rather than living off it. But it must be recognized that the monies invested in training or adult education are also an asset to us, they are an investment, and it seems to me that it would be niggardly at this point to suggest the funds are being misused or misspent by the Canadian Government. The economic situation we have been going through has been extremely difficult, not only financially, but also, as we know, it has created serious social problems for many individuals and families. In a region such as Eastern Quebec where at one point the unemployment rate almost reached 50 per cent between 1981 and 1982, while the current rate is still 21 to 22 per cent, we have a responsibility in my view to alleviate the hardships or despair which the lack of jobs might cause to many people.

• (1740)

The programs I have just referred to, such as welfare which was once considered as somewhat degrading for the people who are entitled to it, are now enriched because education has been added. People who want to make the effort will be able to go back to school, or train on the job or acquire work experience and do community work. It is simply a matter of giving Canadians, especially young men and women, an opportunity to upgrade their training and get better jobs. They feel more integrated when they can be positively and constructively involved. Like all of us, they now feel they are contributing to building this country while helping their fellow Canadians and hoping that their experiences will enable them to fulfil their role as citizens. This has been our goal when designing stimulating, innovative and flexible programs which will provide young men and women with the opportunity to use their imagination in making the best possible contribution to their community. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I will support the Government's request for authorization to borrow sufficient funds, because as I said earlier, this money is needed to effectively manage public affairs in the best interest of Canadians.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Questions. Comments. Debate. The Hon. Member for Joliette.

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I shall make a few comments on the legislation tabled in the House today, in which the Government is once again asking for borrowing authority, this time for nearly $30 billion.

I listened carefully to the Member for Rimouski (Mrs. Côté), and I noticed the depth of her concern for the problems facing young constituents in her riding. Our problems are the same. I was shocked when she mentioned an unemployment rate of 50 per cent, 22 per cent today, and of course I understand her comments and her concern for the problems facing this group. Mr. Speaker, when we hear that in the Hon. Member's riding alone, the federal Government spends $1 million a day on unemployment insurance and welfare, the Hon. Member should realize, with respect, that this testifies to the Government's complete failure to take any kind of meaningful action. The Hon. Member has just confirmed and proved that over the past fifteen years, the economy has deteriorated to the extent that in her riding, it costs the Canadian Government $1 million a day to keep people on unemployment insurance and welfare. Mr. Speaker, may I remind the House that in 1969, on August 13, the Prime Minister said: "If we do nothing to slow down increases in expenditures, we are headed towards financial disaster." That is what the Prime Minister of Canada said in 1969. That is exactly the kind of disaster that was described by the Hon. Member for Rimouski, and I think that the concern that could be felt in the comments she made earlier is familiar to all or nearly all representatives of Canadian constituencies.

She is pleased to see that an agreement has been signed with the Quebec government whereby our young people who are on welfare and who must be satisfied with a pittance because jobs are non-existent will receive $150 more from the Federal government. She also said that from now on they will have a decent income of, I think, nearly $300 per month, that is, $75 per week.

I do not consider this as a decent income, Mr. Speaker. Not at all nor do I think that the hon. member for Rimouski would be satisfied with it. I am sure that she would rather see these young people, who are her constituents, with permanent jobs. Try as it might, the government could certainly not justify these $30 billion in borrowing powers on programs which are at best temporary, due to the devastating economic situation. That is why it is developing programs, Mr. Speaker, in view of the disastrous state of our economy. The Prime Minister, therefore, had foreseen a rise in government spending. But what has his government done since 1969, a time when it appeared so concerned about increases in spending? Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to note what various people had to say about this. For instance, not so long ago, more specifically on January 12, 1980, the Prime Minister of Canada made the following statement: "We will maintain the rate of increase in government expenditures below the growth rate of our GNP, thereby decreasing gradually our deficit. All new spending programs set up to meet the changing needs of the Canadian people will be financed through a redistribution of current expenditures or revenue increases. We will not increase the deficit by setting up new programs". Thus spoke Pierre Elliott Trudeau, our current Prime Minister, on January 12, 1980.

Mr. Speaker, I quoted only two remarks from the Prime Minister, and yet we see what situation we are in. The government invokes now, just as it did in 1969, the need to reduce the deficit. Since then, we have had eight requests for borrowing power like today's request. We were successively asked for $12 billion, $14 billion, $6 billion, $4 billion, $19 billion and finally $29.5 billion. Mr. Speaker, as one of my colleagues put it, this really borders on insolvency. Any individual who wants to borrow money from the bank must justify his request. There must be a climate of confidence. He is asked "How is business going?" These questions are asked today. The government is being accused, and with good reason, of being insolvent, irresponsible and hence incompetent. We know it full well, and Canadians are witness, they are worried regarding the growing per capita debt of Canadians, who are into debt for generations to come, Mr. Speaker, and you are aware of this as we all are.

The Government proves that it is unable to make both ends meet. They are asking us today for the eighth time to trust them and vote this borrowing authority bordering again on $30 billion. This is too much to ask, Mr. Speaker. It is too much to ask and most Canadians, according to surveys, no longer trust this Government, and they would surely blame us, and rightly so, for being remiss if we trusted the Government. However, this does not keep the Minister of Finance awake at night, as he stated last night, whether it be the value of the Canadian dollar or the deficit. It is obvious that the Minister of Finance will not spend sleepless nights because of what he considers as a small deficit. It is obvious that the Government has completely failed in terms of keeping its spending, as we ask, under tight control, in particular the spending of Crown corporations which do not hesitate to spend or even squander taxpayers' money and then, submit their deficit to Parliament. And the Government is wont to tell us that the indebtedness of Crown corporations is partly due to the House itself. That would not change anything, Mr. Speaker, and you know it. We get the bill at the end of the year and we cannot do anything about it, although people think we are responsible for the debts of Crown corporations and the way they squander public funds. Today, the Minister offhandedly brings before the House a piece of legislation and asks us to trust him. During all these years, the Government indebtedness has been steadily increasing. You know, Mr. Speaker, the Government reminds me of the chap who, in a hopeless situation, has to sell his stove to buy wood. There is not much difference, and the Government is sinking into debt. On January 12, 1980, the Prime Minister of Canada also accused the Conservatives of increasing by 100,000 the number of unemployed, but he added that the Liberals were going to bring it down, Mr. Speaker. Today, as you know, the Government in spite of countless efforts has to spend incredible sums of money to keep the 1,500,000 officially unemployed, and this does not include those whose claims have lapsed. We know that there are in fact 2 million people unemployed in Canada, Mr. Speaker, and that a good many of them are on welfare and will not even benefit from the agreement just signed relating to youth employment, because they are over 30 years old. At the dawn of the 1980s, we should not forget that the biggest challenge—I am still quoting the Prime Minister of Canada—"confronting our country is job creation, particularly for our young people."

• (1750)

To justify its expenditures, Mr. Speaker, the Government will obviously pride itself on having created thousands of jobs last year, but these are temporary jobs and this fact will never be emphasized too much. These are temporary jobs only lasting for 20 to 26 weeks which means that these young people or not so young will have to claim unemployment insurance again and finally when their claims have lapsed, they will have to be satisfied with the meager pittance provided by welfare benefits. This has been an on-going process, Mr. Speaker. The Government has to borrow more money and therefore asks for additional borrowing powers. The following statistics, Mr. Speaker, speak for themselves; in all cases, they are reasonably adjusted. The number of unemployed in February 1980 was 874,000! In January, 1984, one million three hundred and seventy four thousand, that is, half a million more than anticipated. Youth unemployment: in February, 1980: 12.9 per cent; in February, 1984: 18.7 per cent, five per cent more, Mr. Speaker; 563,000 jobs have been lost during the recession, and the Canadian labour force is still 193,000 short, of what it was before this recession. The unemployment insurance scheme costs between $11 and $12 billion. This figure exceeds total expenditures made last year by the four Atlantic provinces governments combined.

When one looks at the debt and at this government's mismanagement for the past 15 years, Mr. Speaker, ... The Prime Minister of Canada, who announced he would step down in the near future, obviously because he wanted to avoid being accused of this dismal failure, had predicted himself that this bankruptcy was bound to happen if we did not control government expenditures. They did not control their expenditures and we are on the verge of disaster, of bankruptcy. There is not a single businessman who would have put up with such bad managers for more than a few months; and Canadians have been putting up with them them for 16 years.

Given the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, you will understand that it is very difficult and indeed impossible for me to approve this request. This is a matter of confidence. And I cannot believe the Minister is introducing this bill as a normal piece of legislation. Bankruptcy after bankruptcy, and deficit after deficit. For years, we have been calling for adequate control of government expenditures by elected Members of this House, but to no avail. The Right Hon. Prime Minister and his ministers couldn't care less.

Given all this, you can logically expect us to reject this request by the Government. In fact, I believe we are not only right to do so, but it is our duty.

The Government proposes, Mr. Turner said on June 23, and I have met him before—

An Hon. Member: Charles?

Mr. La Salle: No, not Charles, John! The Government proposes, he said, to lead the way in terms of restraint by bringing its spending under tight control. At that time, that Minister of Finance had already introduced deficits, starting with a $5.5 billion deficit in 1975. All things considered, that deficit was quite similar to that proposed by the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde)!

In his Budget, the then Minister of Finance, the present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, stated on November 16, 1978: There can be no weakening in our determination to keep expenditures under tight control.

That is what the then Minister of Finance, who is now the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, said on November 16, 1979: that deficit was $12 billion!

On February 15, 1984, our present Minister of Finance said the following: . . . this budget is fiscally responsible. The time has come to control the expenses incurred by this Parliament: a deficit of $29 billion, Mr. Speaker! And the most recent figure is a deficit of $31 billion!

Would you say, Mr. Speaker, that this Government deserves the confidence of the Official Opposition for such mismanagement, and for what appears to be, even to those who hardly know how to count, such a sorry state of financial affairs? I think it is important that Canadians should realize that our national debt, which was approximately $10 or $15 billion fifteen years ago, has gone up to $150 billion. Mr. Speaker, in my mind, it is unthinkable for us to accept the invitation of this Government. Moreover, it is important and even essential for us to condemn this mismanagement and these shameful expenditures generally, this lack of control and this refusal on the Government's part to give back to this House some control, especially over Crown Corporations. Of course, Government expenditures have to be completely reassessed. We must also be given the controls we are requesting, and I have known this for at least ten years because that is how long we have known that under this Government our country was heading towards very serious financial difficulties. That is exactly what is happening, Mr. Speaker.

What is most incredible, when one listens to, and especially when one rereads the statements made by the various Ministers of Finance from Mr. Turner to this date, is the knowledge that this Government has literally deceived the population. The Members opposite were elected after they had promised to control their expenditures, to reduce the deficit and consequently, to free certain amounts from the costs of financing the national debt. Now, the Government has the gall to ask us close to $30 billion and to tell us: "We only need $25 billion."

Their estimates having long been inaccurate, they mistrust their own projections. That is why they are asking $30 billion when admittedly they need only $25 billion. It is unthinkable, Mr. Speaker.

This is the reason why we will vote against such a confidence motion, because through this bill they are asking us to trust them. The public has lost all confidence in the management of this government and so has the Opposition, being in a better position to watch the actions of those responsible for government administration. They lost our confidence a long time ago, Mr. Speaker.

And since they would not support the measures we had been advocating in the best interest of Canada, to give this country more buoyancy through proper economic management, we will not agree to the request of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance. It would be unthinkable, Mr. Speaker, because we cannot agree with a government which has failed so miserably. It is our duty to condemn this government and request elections as soon as possible for the simple reason that it has lost public confidence over the past 18 months, according to the polls.

And I do commend the Hon. Member for Rimouski-Témiscouata (Mrs. Côté) for her compassion towards her constituents. But, as a supporter of the scaring and harsh economic policies of this government, she cannot disclaim responsibility and is to be blamed for their plight. Canadians have started to realize that, and I hope they will let these Members know what they think of such mismanagement which has gone on too long, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I suggest to Hon. Members . . . Order, please. If Hon. Members wish to leave for supper, they should give the Chair the opportunity to adjourn the House.

It being 6 p.m., this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at eleven o'clock a.m., in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 2(1).

At 6 p.m., the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1984-85

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House resumed from Wednesday, March 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacLaren that Bill C-21, an Act to provide borrowing authority, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Hon. Herb Gray (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in the debate on Bill C-21, the Borrowing Authority Act, which follows the February 15 Budget introduced by my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) and which is supportive of the expenditure plan as well as the very important initiatives set out in that Budget.

The recent Budget presents a very clear and positive context for Bill C-21. It is a Budget which builds on the successes of several previous Budgets of the Government and it deals effectively with the problems created in large degree by international factors that have hindered the well-being of the economy.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would ask Hon. Members to think back to June 1982, when Canada was in the midst of a recession. At the time, double-digit inflation was hitting both industry and consumers, and interest rates were at a record high. Unsatisfactory productivity levels in this country, high salaries and increases in other costs were making it very difficult to maintain our position on international markets because our costs were not competitive. It was a combination of all these factors that caused our economy to decline.

[English]

In these circumstances the Government recognized that it had a prime responsibility to bring down inflation and, through this and other measures, to stimulate economic recovery. It took the decisive action required, beginning with the introduction of the six and five program in June, 1982. All sectors of the Canadian economy were encouraged to follow the federal Government's lead to restrain their demands on the economy so that our future economic well-being would be protected.

• (1110)

[Translation]

Generally speaking, Canadians met the 6 and 5 challenge very well and made the wage and price decisions that were necessary to make the plan a success.

[English]

Six and five has been a balanced program. It is a way of showing leadership and is a demonstration to other sectors. Wage rate increases of federal public sector employees have been held to 6 per cent and then 5 per cent for a two-year period. The prices of all goods and services provided by federal Government Departments, agencies, Crown corporations and the wholly-owned susidiaries, as well as prices set by federal regulatory bodies, were limited to increases of 6 per cent and 5 per cent respectively for a two-year period following June 28, 1982. The Government also initiated an active consultation process with other sectors of the economy. All these steps helped broaden the impact of the six and five program on costs and prices generally in the economy.

When the Government launched the six and five program in June, 1982, the inflation rate was in excess of 11 per cent. By the end of last year it had dropped dramatically to 4.5 per cent. For the whole of 1983 the rate of inflation and what it means in terms of prices was 5.8 per cent, almost half what it had been in 1982 and lower than it had been in over 10 years. With this came a most welcome reduction in interest rates.

In the quarter ending June, 1982 the average compounded annual increase in the base wage rates in major new settlements without COLA clauses in both the Canadian private sector and the federal public sector were close to 12 per cent, but for the most recently recorded quarter the corresponding figure for both those sectors is about 5 per cent. I see by today's newspaper that figures recently released by the Department of Labour suggest a 4.9 per cent average for all of 1983.

The six and five program has made an important contribution to the improvement of Canada's inflation performance. Consequently, it was a major factor in the economic turnaround that resulted in the achievement of about 3 per cent real growth last year and about 400,000 jobs being created. Expanded labour productivity together with improved wage performance have resulted in a very significant improvement in Canada's cost performance. These are very encouraging signs but still we must be vigilant in our efforts not only to maintain our level of improved performance but also to strive by all reasonable means to enhance it further.

[Translation]

All Canadians have a role to play in controlling and bringing down inflation, by keeping price increases for goods and services at levels that will help to reduce inflation even more. Moderate costs and improved productivity explain why we have been able to increase our share of world markets last year.

• (1115)

[English]

We must continue to limit our costs and be more productive. Every country in the industrialized world is endeavouring to become more competitive. Therefore, our continued prosperity depends enormously on our ability to keep pace with the rest of the world. The onus and obligation to keep Canadian costs competitive and improve productivity rests with each of us. This is true primarily in the private sector but also in the public sector. This means not only that we all have a responsibility for containing inflation and for not allowing the successes achieved in curbing inflation to be frittered away, but also that the public and private sectors must be unremitting in their efforts to improve productivity.

A more productive Canada, both in its public and private sectors, in the key to our economic vitality during the rest of the 20th century and on into the 21st century. For the public sector there are additional factors demanding continuing attention to the improvement of productivity in our own operations. The public sector is inevitably looked to for the demonstration it can provide and does provide in the effective and efficient management of human and financial resources.

The Canadian public as well, quite rightly, insist on quality service and on achieving top value for their tax dollars. Canadians want their Government to offer at least as many services as they have become used to, but they want them performed at the least practical cost. The federal Government is providing more services today than ever before with a Public Service work force which is at about the same level as it was in the mid-1970s. The overall Public Service personnel strength has steadily decreased from 2.6 per cent of the labour force in 1976 to 2.1 per cent today.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago I announced a four-point plan containing new measures aimed at improving productivity in the Public Service.

First, we are establishing pilot projects to improve operational effectiveness in departments and a number of Crown corporations with heavy operational responsibilities.

Second, we are reviewing central management policies and methods to determine how they can be made more effective without affecting standards of integrity and responsible management for the administration of public funds.

Third, we are reviewing our methods for applying federal legislation regulations, in order to cut administrative red tape, while continuing to protect public interest.

Fourth, we are considering various ways of changing the job environment in Government offices in order to improve productivity.

[English]

We expect that these initiatives will enhance the productivity, that is, the efficiency and effectiveness, of our government operations. These initiatives will be taken in conjunction with already existing measures like the IMPAC Program, a program which is aimed at improving management practices across the federal Government. It is already achieving savings estimated to be in the order of $122 million each year. This is the case even though it has been in place only in some Departments so far.

With the new Budget with which Bill C-21 is linked, the federal Government has renewed its commitment to provide economic leadership. In this context, the ongoing necessity to contain inflation is part of our over-all effort to foster sustained economic growth and job creation. We have, therefore, decided to continue the policy of limiting price increases for goods and services provided by federal Departments and agencies, Crown corporations and federally regulated industries for a further 12 months. For this purpose, we have set a new price guideline of 4 per cent. The administrative mechanisms of the six and five program for monitoring price increases will remain in place. As was the case with the six and five program, price increases above the new guideline will be permitted only with Cabinet approval and only when they are clearly warranted.

The new 4 per cent guideline and our new policy on collective bargaining demonstrate our belief that the federal Government and, indeed, all levels of government have a fundamental responsibility—to quote the Minister of Finance in his Budget Speech—"to continue to exercise discipline in their own wage and price decisions". As was said in the Budget, Mr. Speaker, the Government will resume collective bargaining in the federal public sector as the six and five program expires.

I welcome a return to collective bargaining. Collective bargaining provides employees in both the public and private sectors with the capacity to play a meaningful role in determining the terms and conditions of their employment. Each group of federal public sector employees will leave the mandatory restraint program two years from their date of entry at best. This means individual groups will begin to phase out of the six and five program this June; by July, 1985 all federal employees will have exited and thus collective bargaining activities will have resumed commencing in May or June of this year.

• (1120)

In its own collective bargaining, the federal Government will bargain hard, but responsibly and fairly. Four major principles will guide the Government as it carries out its side of the collective bargaining process. We will bargain for settlements that will contribute to reducing inflation and are fiscally responsible. We will bargain for settlements based on total compensation comparisons with the private sector; that is, taking into account the whole range of benefits and conditions of employment. We will bargain for settlements that do not exceed the private sector in compensation for comparable jobs; and we will bargain for settlements that encourage increased productivity and improved performance and recognize relative job responsibilities.

Therefore, while there are no hidden numerical pay guidelines, we will apply these four principles which are not only fair but are, I believe, consistent with what the public expects of the Government in its settlements with its own employees. In this regard the Government has no intention of making catch-up payments to its public servants. This is because other sectors have indeed followed the federal wage restraint initiative, as the wage adjustment figures so clearly show. The guaranteed wage increases of 6 per cent and then 5 per cent for federal public sector employees mean that these public servants have not lost out relative generally to other wage earners in Canada. Now the Government will bargain compensation with its employees in a fiscally responsible manner. We will not agree to increased wages to the point where upward pressure is put on inflation or where revenues, in addition to those provided for in the fiscal plan, must be sought through increased borrowing or taxation or through the diversion of funds from other programs in order to meet higher public sector payroll costs.

The Government has indicated its willingness, Mr. Speaker, to ask Parliament to legislate wage settlements in those specific cases where there are excessive arbitral awards, or excessive settlements by federal Crown corporations, or where federal public sector strikes may be damaging to the public interest because of their lengthy or disruptive nature. This recognizes the Government's ongoing responsibility to protect that public interest. The Canadian people generally, and I hope the public sector unions and their members will understand this responsibility and necessity.

The principles for collective bargaining with the federal Public Service set out in the Budget are fair and reasonable, and I believe that federal public sector employees, their unions and the Government itself will act in such a manner that the intervention of Parliament in the process of determining compensation will seldom, perhaps never, be necessary.

The public expects the federal Government, in fact all governments, as well as public sector unions, to strive responsibly to meet the challenges inherent in the resumption of collective bargaining. The public has expectations about the level, quality and continued delivery of government services. It expects value for tax dollars and it expects the public sector, both federal and provincial, to play its part in the restoration of the country's economic health.

I should add that I will be undertaking consultations with labour and other interested groups on possible proposals to amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act. This Act governs collective bargaining in the federal Public Service and has not undergone substantive change, if any, since it was first proclaimed in 1967. We would obviously have some suggestions from a management and a government point of view and I am sure the bargaining agents would have theirs. My objective is to have meaningful dialogue on the matter with unions and others who want to make their views known.

• (1125)

It would not be helpful to speculate at this time on what might or might not eventually be proposed to Parliament on this subject. I would like to have an approach which involves a collective bargaining system in the federal Public Service operating to the mutual benefit of public servants and Canadians generally.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the substantial progress we have made as a nation, fighting together against inflation since 1982, is not entirely due to the 6 and 5 program. However, the program did make it possible to focus the efforts of all Canadians on working towards a more competitive and less inflationary economy. We must not lose what we have gained with considerable effort.

[English]

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, we must strive to make further headway in reducing inflation and increasing productivity, economic growth and jobs. For this purpose the Government has decided to build on the positive results of the six and five program. Therefore we have introduced a new program with a 4 per cent price guideline and with four principles for achieving reasonable public sector wage settlements. I call upon all Canadians to continue to follow the leadership of the federal Government and to work together to achieve our shared goals for the well-being of the Canadian economy.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, the Minister's remarks would be much more credible if he stayed within that 4 per cent guideline in his estimates. It makes one wonder when we see his estimates rising year after year and when we see all his previous ceilings broken in his current supplementaries.

The Minister is responsible for the Treasury Board and in his period of responsibility Canadair has received approval for $750 million from him. Before any of that money was given he had a complete outside report with respect to that corporation indicating major changes which would have to take place. He gave the corporation $200 million in 1982. This year he has provided the corporation with a total of $550 million in his various supplementaries.

Why has the Minister not insisted on a concrete plan of reorganization of that corporation? According to the senator involved in the corporation, the Minister's colleague in the Cabinet, the concrete plan is not going to be available until after March 31. As President of the Treasury Board, how can he possibly authorize $750 million to Canadair and, I might add, $500 million to de Havilland, without a reorganization plan which was demanded in October or November of 1982? That plan has been promised by Senator Austin on three occasions. On the last occasion he promised to have that plan in place by September of 1983. That plan is still not in place and will not be available until after March 31. How can the President of the Treasury Board say he controls spending and waste without coming to grips with that issue?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind my hon. friend that if we examine one portion of the total expenditure plan, the Main Estimates which I tabled a few weeks ago, it illustrates that the rate of increase in expenditure is down from 17.5 per cent, as was the case last year, to 10 per cent this year.

● (1130)

My hon. friend should tell the whole story. He should also be willing to tell the House that when we take the total outlays in the Government's expenditure plan and add the reserves in it for supplementary estimates to the main expenditures and the matters contained in these outlays, the total outlays are down from a rate of increase of over 9 per cent last year to 8 per cent this year.

This takes into account the new initiatives, such as the increased payments under guaranteed income supplements to older Canadians. I hope my hon. friend is not objecting to that. It takes into account additional expenditures of at least $150 million to fight youth unemployment. I hope my hon. friend is not objecting to that. It takes into account the increased amounts we must pay, by law, to provinces for such things as post-secondary education and medicare. I hope my hon. friend is not objecting to that because that would be quite inconsistent with the statements made by his Leader.

Speaking of inconsistencies, I wonder what my hon. friend is getting at with his question, because when it comes to funds requested from this Parliament by the Government to enable Canadair and de Havilland to carry on, these are amounts that were agreed to not only by myself but the Government as a whole. They were voted on by Parliament, and it did so after the responsible Minister came to the committee and gave details of steps that were initially presented to Cabinet for the purpose of effecting the necessary improvement in the over-all management of Canadair and de Havilland. This information was provided initially to Cabinet and subsequently to the House, prior to the amounts in question being voted on.

As I said in the House yesterday with respect to further amounts being sought for these companies in the supplementary estimates, the responsible Minister is coming to the relevant committee and I believe he is coming to more than one committee. At that time he will put forward the information which he has on plans for reorganization. It is up to the members of the committee initially and then up to the House to say whether it is satisfied and to vote for or against the request for these funds.

Let me say to my hon. friend, the country as a whole and to the workers at de Havilland and Canadair in particular, that when one listens to my hon. friend's question, one can wonder what really is the desire of the Conservative Party. Is it the desire, as his colleagues were saying yesterday, to make sure that these companies continue to operate, or is it their desire to carry out another Avro Arrow debacle like the Diefenbaker Conservative government? If they were sincere about wanting to avoid that kind of debacle and preserving the jos and technology base of these two companies, he would not be speaking in that doubting, questioning and critical way about this proposal in the supplementary estimates. Where does he stand in comparison to the view of his colleagues who spoke yesterday?

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, I think the question asked by my colleague concerning Canadair, the fact that a $1.4 billion write-off has been effected on Canadair and that another $700 million is being fed into de Havilland and Canadair is legitimate. If the House of Commons means anything, it is a legitimate question. I noticed that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Gray) absolutely refused to accept the legitimacy of the question and led back with a fist punching, political barrel of rhetoric that really disgraces the House totally.

In his speech here today, dealing with a borrowing bill in which he and the Government are asking for $29.5 billion of spending authority, he talked about delivering top value for the taxpayers' dollar. That is the kind of rhetoric with which the people of Canada are absolutely fed up. If we are getting top value for the dollar, why is it that out in British Columbia there are gravel beds where fish have spawned that are now covered with silt and the Government does not have the money to go and wash that silt off those gravel beds? Yet the same Department of Fisheries can increase its advertising budget to $4 million, a 31 per cent increase over the $3 million it spent in advertising last year. If we are getting top value for our dollar, why does the Department of Fisheries have to pay for beautiful colour ads advertising recipes on how to cook fish when there are recipe books in every kitchen of Canada that are better than the recipes the Department is giving. Why does it have to spend money on advertisements explaining where one can get information on the federal Budget? Why does he stand up here and tell us that the Government is cutting out red tape and will make life in the private sector a lot easier when all it is doing is superimposing more regulation and arbitrary decisions on the system and causing it to collapse absolutely? Can he answer some of these questions?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I have a great deal of respect for the concerns of my hon. friend. We share them. He has played a role in some of the initiatives for better management and parliamentary information that I have often talked about. I have recognized that in the past.

In responding to his colleague, the Hon. Member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn), I was not suggesting that his question was not legitimate. As he says, this is what Parliament is for. Frankly, however, the way the Member for Mississauga South phrased his question could well suggest to people who are reasonably fair minded that he did not want to have this money provided. If it is not provided, these companies would not continue to operate. This is the reason for the response I made.

Certainly the question is legitimate. We must explain why the money is needed and what we are doing to deal with the management problem of these companies. That is what we are doing.

My hon. friend for Mississauga South reminds me of the person who tried to suck and blow at the same time. It is impossible to do. I suppose that people do attempt it, even in a parliamentary setting. From the way the Hon. Member phrased his question, one might assume that in spite of what his colleagues said, including the Hon. Member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), deep down they did not want to vote this money and were ready to accept and agree to the implications of this happening. However, this is a matter for further debate. I want to repeat that questioning the amount and the motives is part of the parliamentary process and it is quite fair.

With respect to the second question, I believe my hon. friend is trying to compare two different things. If the Department of Fisheries advertises for the purpose of encouraging Canadians to buy and eat more fish, this does not mean that it is not interested in cleaning the silt off gravel beds. In my view, the Department has a number of purposes. One purpose is to preserve the fishery itself, the renewable resource in question. Another is to increase the market for the product of that resource. If that were not the case, the well-being of the fishermen in his province and other parts of Canada will not be maintained.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The question period is over. Debate.

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I have not put together a formal address, but in hearing the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Gray) this morning, we listened to a very well massaged, professionally written speech. One just keeps going back to one of the commandments of the Liberal Party of Canada and its mental guru concerning politics of Canada. It is that in politics, perception is reality. We heard a speech from one of the very senior Ministers of the Liberal Government in which he spent ten minutes still talking about six and five, which most of us, I in particular, agreed with. I had a little more courage than the Government because I said that we should move from six and five to four and three, which would have then kept pressure on a system that desperately needs to be corrected.

When questioning the President of the Treasury Board, we mentioned the fact that in his rhetoric he talked about getting top value for the taxpayers' dollar. I noticed that he stumbled and choked a few times when he was reading his address. He must have trouble with some of this rhetoric because I know that the President of the Treasury Board is a very, very hardworking man. He and I do not agree in ideological terms and in terms of the way the country should be run for the well-being of the greatest number of Canadians. We have watched 15 years of his ideology being imposed upon the Canadian people and we have seen the system lose opportunities in the expansion of natural resources. We have seen a work force decline with 1.5 million unemployed. I read just the other day that the work force, if you take the true account of it, contains over two million unemployed because at least half a million people have given up trying to get jobs.

Today we are in very serious condition. We have a lot of young people coming out of educational systems who are not really properly trained and equipped for what lies ahead. We have a national attitude that is leaving us outside of the ball game in terms of the newly emerging industrial world.

What is interfering with and impeding a substantial, meaningful, purposeful recovery in Canada that would start to correct some of these very serious problems we have is government spending. Government spending is at the core and heart of the problem. Government spending has grown from 16.8 per cent of GNP since 1968 to 24.2 per cent of GNP in 1982. Government spending is up this year to 26 per cent of GNP. If we look at the total levels of government spending and we bring federal and provincial spending together, we notice that it has grown from 33.7 per cent of GNP to 47 per cent, and 47 per cent is getting awfully close to 50 per cent of GNP in the form of total government spending in Canada. That is a burden choking us in terms of bringing about a proper recovery.

Let us look back to The Globe and Mail for March 5. We find that an axe hangs over social welfare programs in all OECD countries. Although they just love to label me a red-neck and a right-wing idiot here in Ottawa, I throw out, and you have heard me, Sir, warning after warning after warning that if we continue down this growing path of government intervention over the wealth-creating sector of the country, we will not be able to sustain the very enviable across the board social welfare programs that we have.

The President of the Treasury Board knows as well as I do that the underpinning of the whole pension plan, the CPP and everything else that we have, has teredo-ridden piles. Yet we in this avalanche of government spending and government interference with all our lives are just suffocating any ability to create the wealth we need to sustain the system.

When the President of the Treasury Board today stood up and read that well-massaged speech, he ruined a very valuable speech which I have spent time trying to prepare. He threw me completely off base which, I guess, was his plan. The President of the Treasury Board talked about more pilot projects. He talked about federal statistics and regulation and removing red tape as part of his program. He talked about a new working environment within the Government that will correct the productivity problems within it. I am not allowed to talk about productivity in the federal Government out loud, but obviously the President of the Treasury Board recognizes—he has to recognize because the Auditor General has been putting it on the public record for years now—that there are productivity problems, morale and attitudinal problems existing within the Public Service. Strictly management problems and failure have caused this condition.

The President of the Treasury Board says we are getting top value for our tax dollars. That is rhetoric this House cannot stand. I have great respect for the ability of the President of the Treasury Board but I do not agree with his ideologies. I think we have reaped the benefit of his opportunity and policies in government. I have a great deal of trouble accepting what is valid in any statement the President of the Treasury Board makes. When I sat on the other side of the House, I listened to him every single day saying that he would resign if interest rates went above 14 per cent. Every single day he said that.

Mr. Mazankowski: Another Liberal broken promise.

Mr. Huntington: Yes, another Liberal broken promise. Then he stands here today, Mr. Speaker, and tell us that he is delivering top value for the tax dollar. I remember $34 million being given to Maislin, given to a friend of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), after the company was in a bankrupt condition. The President of the Treasury Board was the Minister responsible for delivering that bail-out. How, then, can you accept the validity of what is right in what the President of the Treasury Board says, Mr. Speaker, when he overruled the Enterprise Development Board when he was Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and delivered $9 million to a friend in his riding building a Hilton Hotel on an interest-free loan? Is this giving the people of Canada top value for their tax dollars? It is this kind of behavioural aberration that destroys the rhetoric that is delivered here. Are we getting top value for our tax dollars, Sir?

In the month of February alone I found a whole series of ads paid for by Canadians. They are for art, Summer Works Canada; and there are more, and more, and more of them. These ads cost hundreds of thousands of dollars. They are full page ads. One reads: "Good news from CMHC", a housing authority. We have a "fall rhapsody". This ad constitutes a full page in a magazine. This is top value for our Canadian dollar? We have ad after ad after ad. I have one for human resources. It is in colour. Isn't that marvelous? We are getting top value for our dollar? Our fish are dying in streams because the Department of Fisheries and Oceans does not have the few dollars needed to send out a crew of students or unemployed people to wash off the silt smothering the eggs. There is something wrong with the priorities here. This Government feeds our tax dollars out to a publishing industry full of advocacy nonsense. These ads include fish recipes. And we are getting top value for our dollar, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. As Hon. Members know, displays are not allowed in the House.

Mr. Harquail: That is shameful.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I really do not know how to interpret the Hon. Member's gestures, but I would simply make that comment and invite him to co-operate.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. When you are dealing with corruption, Sir, you use every conceivable device at your disposal.

Mr. Harquail: That is provincial jurisdiction. Admit it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Hon. Members surely know the rules of debate. I invite them to respect them.

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It has always amazed me that this is the only place in the country where telling the truth can get you sanctioned.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair was not commenting on the Hon. Member's speech in any way, shape or form. I simply suggest that in keeping with earlier rulings from the Chair there should not be displays in the House. I will not prevent the Hon. Member from demonstrating his ire. That is not for me to say or to do.

Mr. Huntington: I trust, Mr. Speaker, that this myriad of interventions will be added on to the time I have for my speech. Usually the Government gives me the courtesy of extended time.

An Hon. Member: No way.

Mr. Huntington: No way?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will resolve that matter immediately. The Chair will exercise its usual discretion.

Mr. Huntington: I am perfectly satisfied with that, Mr. Speaker, because I find you are very fair.

While we are talking about top value for our dollar, let us move on to Winnipeg. Only two Liberals have been elected west of the Lakehead. This Minister is able to deliver $780 million to his city. Every time this Government stands up with its perfect, beautiful, massaged, professionally-written speeches, it always talks about equity and fairness. I remember $1.3 million in the City of Winnipeg being spread around in advertisements and speeches by the Minister from Winnipeg. It was a make-work project for Canadians to go into the Max Bell Athletic Centre.

• (1150)

All of this rhetoric, and what do they do? We have in Canada one of the finest, most renowned experts in the world on the design and building of track and athletic facilities. He has even had design awards from Italy, the mother base of design talent. This man, who lives in my riding, is in desperate need of work. He has a small staff he is trying to keep employed. This Minister with the $780 million, delivering $1.3 million in make-work projects supposedly for Canadians, hires an American as the consultant to work on the design of this track facility in Winnipeg. Why does he hire an American when Canadian designers need that work in Canada? Canadian designers gave of their talent before the Government came through with the money. This is what is going on. In his speech, the Minister talked about top value for the tax dollar.

Let me move on. I can handle the statistics; I have loads of them. I sit in this House and I really weep for the audience or anybody who has the tolerance to watch what goes on here. I have here a book that I think Members on all sides of the House should read. The way we use statements and statistics in this House, we are con artists. Members on the Government side of the House are not going to hear a darn thing I have to say. They have a fixation, a blind and an iron wall in terms of trying to get anything through their thick skulls. All you have to do is look at the performance of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Bussières) in this House. He cannot understand that the people of this country are terrified with one of the greatest threats there is to freedom. That is the misused arbitrary powers of the public servant over the people. That is what has happened in this country.

Today the President of the Treasury Board stood up in this House and said that he would eliminate red tape, that we are getting equity and fairness, that we are getting top value for our dollar, that there is a new price guideline of 4 per cent. They have really moved to 4 per cent with their opening up of collective bargaining. All of this rhetoric is disgusting.

We on this side use statistics to support our point of view. Following my speech, somebody on the other side will quote a bunch of statistics to disprove what I have said. I have here a marvellous book which I recommend for reading entitled "How to Lie with Statistics", by Darrel Huff. When you read that book, you wonder whether we should use statistics or whether we should behave the way we do in this House. We use figures and research to support a particular point of view. No wonder this House disintegrates in the eyes of the Canadian people, 65 per cent of whom feel it is no longer relevant. We ask a legitimate question of the President of the Treasury Board and we get a garbage political answer. This House is designed for accountability and protection of the taxpayer.

We have with us today in the Chamber the President of the Treasury Board. He is responsible for overseeing the management of the Government and that there is some degree of uniformity. A committee of this House has worked for over 20 months trying to assist the President of the Treasury Board, the Comptroller General and Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board to see how we can make this place more meaningful, how we can pull the Government, no matter who is in power, down to account and how the taxpayer of Canada can be protected.

We presented ten reports and the Government rejected nine. In one of those reports we tried to improve the muscle, mind and ability of the average commoner in terms of representing the taxpayer and how to get a handle on this runaway spending. The report attempts to show how we can assist the President of the Treasury Board with one of his four principles, and how we can assist with getting a new attitude out to the managers within the system whereby managers can manage and be held to account for performance of their ability and the delivery of a defined objective.

We are masters at massaging and playing with words. We are masters at playing with people's minds. When he tabled his estimates the other day, I challenged the President of the Treasury Board to refute that this Government, including its Crown corporations, is spending less than $1 billion in advocacy advertising, playing on the minds of the Canadian people and providing a power of suasion over the whole publication industry.

We talk about freedom of the press. They have to answer to publishers responsible for balance sheets. Somebody scattered a lot of mess around here, namely the advertising which this Government put out in the month of February. All of this money is being pumped into the so-called free press. If you were managing a magazine or a newspaper and you got too aggressive in attacking and defending an essential element of freedom and had to go back and look at an advertising account from the federal Government that was being threatened, Mr. Speaker, you would think twice about where that article or that issue was placed. We are dealing with one of the most powerful things of all, impressions on minds. The Liberals are masters of that science. Never since Goebbels in Nazi Germany in the middle of the thirties have I seen anything so frightening as today's use of advertising and advocacy power.

The Minister talks about the people of Canada getting top value for their tax dollars. He should retract that comment because he is misleading Canadians. The anger within the people is serious. I am going to challenge The Globe and Mail on this issue. If you look at the top of every day's editorial page in The Globe and Mail, you will find their motto. It is a quotation from Junius. It talks about the Chief Magistrate and the need to protect the people and Chief Magistrate from the arbitrary powers of government. Look at the symbolism of the Minister of National Revenue today. They do not even understand why the people of this country are so frightened with a bureaucracy that is out of control in terms of arbitrary powers of government over the lives of the rank and file in Canada. They are basically honest, simple people trying to deal with a tax Act and a government regime that is so complicated that nobody can understand it.

This country is in deep trouble because of government spending and government waste. There will be no industrial recovery until the interest rates of the day can come down at least two percentage points. In Britain, the Government cut five billion pounds from its deficit. As soon as that five billion pounds was cut from the deficit in 1981, interest rates came down two full percentage points. The British pound sterling floated on its own on international money markets. Until we do that here in Canada, there will be no meaningful recovery and there will be no lasting help for the one and a half million people who are unemployed.

• (1200)

Government spending is at the heart of this situation. Interest rates will not come down and people will not get back to work in the country until we bite the bullet. I can tell the people of Canada that the people on the other side do not have the guts to bite that bullet.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, when asking this question, I would like to assure my hon. friend that I did not know what he was going to say in his remarks. If I threw him off the rails, as it appears I did from some of the things he said, I apologize for it. It was not intentional.

I would like to know from my hon. friend if I can take it from what he said about federal Government projects in Winnipeg that he and his Party oppose those projects and are saying to the people of Winnipeg, a city which, as I recall, contains more than half the population of the province, that if they had formed the government, they would not have started those projects there. If that is the case, I think that should be on the record.

As well, I would like to ask my hon. friend if he realizes that he made some very erroneous statements about the Hilton Hotel project in Windsor. The federal support through ILAP of not $9 million but $6 million was in the form of a repayable loan and was approved and not rejected by the enterprise development program. Does he not realize that that same project received substantial financial support of over $1 million from the Ontario Conservative Government? That Government was so pleased with that project that not only did it provide support but it sent a member of the legislature who belonged to that Party to the opening ceremonies a few weeks ago in order to take credit for its contribution to the support of that project. Can I take it that the Hon. Member's Party is saying to the people of Windsor that it does not think that that project should have taken place there?

Finally, I would like to ask my hon. friend why, if he says that government spending is the main problem, his Leader is calling for more money to be spent on defence, amounts that would be in the billions? Why is his Party calling for more spending to deal with the alleged under-funding of hospitals? Why is his Party calling for more spending to deal with what his Party describes as the need for more funds for research and development? These objectives are all worthy ones but require substantial amounts of money. My hon. friend, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the Hon. Minister—

Mr. Gray: May I finish my sentence, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister has put a question, made a comment and put other questions. In the previous round of questions and comments, Hon. members must have noticed that we only managed to hear from two Hon. Members. The Permanent and Provisional Standing Orders require that questions, comments and responses be brief and to the point. I must ask Hon. Members to abide by the rules. I will now recognize the Hon. Member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington).

Mr. Huntington: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I certainly apologize to the President of the Treasury Board, who is the former Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, for saying that $9 million went to the hotel project in Windsor. I know that that figure should have been $6 million. I deliberately said $9 million because I thought that might at least get him on his feet. This is the first time he has been on his feet regarding that issue since it was raised in the House of Commons.

The fact is that it is the type of spending that I am questioning. I am sure that I could look at the files in my office and find out that the application for that hotel was originally rejected by the Enterprise Development Board and that a ministerial imposition brought it back and put it through the system. Is spending on low interest rate loans or forgiveable loans the right way to spend money, particularly when it is spent in the Minister's riding? Does the Hilton Hotel need that kind of aid or should that aid go to permanent projects?

The Minister might reply by saying that he opened the dockyard in my riding which the Liberals had talked about since 1974 and which I began when I was a Minister. In six months of governing, we go that dockyard started. That is a project that is creating work on a permanent basis for the shipyard industry in that terminal port of Canada.

It is the classification of spending and the use to which we put the tax dollar that is so important. Spending money on advertising and on interest-free loans to hotels which apparently cannot stand on their own feet is not the type of spending and aid that we need. It is a classic example of the political abuse of the system and of the protections that are built into the system.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, when the Hon. Member just spoke about his use of the $9 million and $6 million figures, I could not help but be reminded of his comments regarding Mr. Huff's book, How to Lie with Statistics. However, I will not pursue that.

Mr. Huntington: Yes, pursue it. I used it on purpose.

Mr. Riis: In other words, he manipulated the discussion by misleading us with statistics.

I listened very carefully to the Hon. Member's presentation and I know that he is serious when making his various allegations. I believe he believes in what he is saying. I would like to ask the Hon. Member to do me a favour by being precise when he refers to the need to reduce the benefit. The Hon. Member used Mrs. Thatcher and how she was able to reduce spending in that government as an example, of reducing the deficit. Perhaps the Hon. Member could provide us with two or three specific examples of areas of government spending in which he feels cuts should be made or spending reduced in some form or another. I do not think it is unrealistic to ask that. I know that when the Hon. Member was a member of government, he was concerned about ways to cut back. I would ask him to be as precise as possible when describing the areas in which cutbacks could occur.

Mr. Huntington: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I would go back and re-examine on a zero budgeting base all of the existing programs that we have had in place from day one that have experienced nothing but inflationary incremental increases. I would force the managers in the system to go back and justify the nature of those original programs in terms of the objectives they were designed to serve and see how relevant they are today. I would turn the programs back to the managers and redefine in narrow terms the objectives of those programs. I would tell the managers to manage to these objectives and to manage efficiently.

In the area of discretionary spending, Sir, we are dealing with 15 per cent of total government spending. We cannot correct the whole ball of wax when dealing with 15 per cent of government spending. I would like to call for a debate in the House without the television cameras and without Hansard which would be an in camera session. We could then talk out the problem with transfer payments to the provinces, the use the federal Government makes of those transfer payments, the use the provincial governments make of those transfer payments and the wasteful competition that goes on between those two political levels in terms of the same taxpayers' dollar. I can tell you that within the first year we could find $5 billion if we really had the guts and the political courage to do so.

I am trying to be as concise as I can, Mr. Speaker. We could simply look at the Auditor General's report to see that there are hotel operations in New Brunswick which are simply scandalous. People should be in jail over those operations. What about Deputy Ministers of Departments who are responsible for Consolidated Computer or for Canadair? At least $1.4 billion is wasted there. Those Deputy Ministers should not be around any more or should be brought before a parliamentary committee and examined in order to see if they need to be disciplined. There is no discipline or managerial control in the system. There is nothing in the system that delivers top value for the Canadian dollar. The whole system needs to be reorganized.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I am amazed by the comments made by the Hon. Member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) regarding the—

Mr. Blais: But you are not surprised.

Mr. Ferguson: I am not surprised at the comments made about the silting of the salmon spawning streams in British Columbia. Just two weeks ago, a fisherman came into my office expressing this same concern and he was not aware of the Environment 2000 program which was established by the Government of Canada to assist communities and municipalities in cleaning up the environment and making the necessary corrections. This program is designed to clean up streams and to plant more trees, which is actually within provincial jurisdiction but the provinces are not doing anything about it. In order to get this information to Canadians—

Mr. Blenkarn: Have you read the Fisheries Act? The fisheries is a federal responsibility.

Mr. Ferguson: And forestry is a provincial responsibility. It is because of the depletion of our forests that this has happened. Consequently, is it not logical that the Government of Canada should pay for advertising to make these programs known to Canadians? These programs are connected to the environment, and without our forests, the spawning grounds will not be viable and the fisheries cannot continue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt but the question period is finished.

Some Hon. Members: Continue.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

• (1210)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Please hear the Chair out. I am bound by the Standing Orders which state very clearly that there will be a period of not more than 10 minutes for questions and comments. If the House wishes to allow the Hon. Member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) to respond, I am in the hands of the House. Is it agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret it is not agreed.

Mr. Blenkarn: He asks a question and then won't let the Member answer.

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. May I draw to your attention and to the attention of the House that unanimous consent was denied by the person who asked that scurrilous, misleading, improper question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Debate. The Hon. Member for Welland (Mr. Parent).

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening to this debate for two or three days. I have come to a couple of conclusions regarding the speech of the Hon. Member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington). First of all, there is no question that he believes in his heart all the things that he said. There is no question that he feels very irate and frustrated. I can well understand that when he delivers a speech like that in the House he is going to become quite emotional. I propose to address a couple of points made by the Hon. Member and others and I will try to bring some rationality to the debate so that we can get away from the emotional side of it.

The opposition Parties have focused on a few major points in connection with Bill C-21, claiming that the contingency amount is irresponsible. I want to talk about responsibility, Mr. Speaker. Quite contrary to indicating that the Government is acting in an irresponsible way, the request for a contingency amount indicates, in my judgment, realistic and responsible planning on the part of the Government. The contingency amount has traditionally been included in the request for borrowing authority. In earlier years when new borrowing authority was sought by way of appropriation Bills, a contingency amount was always included. In recent times, when the borrowing authority has been sought by way of special Bills an implied or implicit non-lapsing amount has also been included.

The contingency amount is designed mainly to cover two important situations: first, the need to cover the impact of large and unpredictable foreign exchange operations on the financial requirements; and second, to ensure that the Government will be able to continue its regular debt program if the House is not in session or has been dissolved.

In essence, the contingency amount is designed to avoid any disruption in the borrowing program which might lead to unnecessary disruptions in the exchange or capital markets which, in turn, might lead to upward pressure on interest rates. Hon. Members have had a great deal to say about interest rates recently, but I defy anyone in the House to come forward now or at any time and say that they are in favour of higher interest rates. All we have been hearing are speeches to the effect that interest rates must be kept down. We are moving in that direction, Mr. Speaker, and this is one of the things we are bringing up.

Mr. Blenkarn: Are you, now?

Mr. Parent: Now we have the lightweight from the other side chipping in. He is also lightheaded, trying to interrupt. He will get his turn.

These developments could very well lead to higher debt charges for the taxpayer. That is who is going to be carrying the load. These developments could also lead to higher borrowing costs for individuals and businesses. Hon. Members opposite are supposed to be concerned with businesses. In this Party we are concerned with businesses but we are also concerned with individuals.

By requesting a contingency amount, in my judgment the Government is attempting to ensure that it will always be in the best position to take action that will avoid disruptions to the debt program that could have adverse effects on interest rates and on debt costs. These are two reasons that we should examine, Mr. Speaker.

With regard to accountability, the Government will account for all borrowing undertaken in a fiscal year. It will not borrow more than is necessary. It does not have to use up all the borrowing authority granted by Parliament. That is common sense.

Cause 3 of Bill C-21 provides for the cancellation of all unused borrowing authority carried forward from previous fiscal years. Could anything be more accountable than that? We want to have enough money to operate, to protect the Canadian taxpayer. We want to have enough money so that interest rates will not jump as they did in years gone by when they were 21 per cent and 22 per cent. Yet the opposition Parties are opposed to the very thing that we are trying to put in place.

Thus, with the passage of Bill C-21 the only contingency amount would be the $4 billion we are discussing. It would be our intention that once new borrowing authority is obtained for the next fiscal year, any remaining unused portion of this contingency would also be cancelled. That is on the record. We believe that the Government should proceed in this way on a regular basis. We envisage an on-going process which provides a non-lapsing contingency amount once a year which would give the Government some flexibility but at the same time would be unavailable to be carried forward beyond the coming into force of new authority, thereby preserving Parliament's ultimate authority.

When Hon. Members opposite speak about Parliament's authority, they seem to believe that if they do not agree with something, Parliament as a whole should not agree. With all due respect, I suggest that we were all elected and when the majority of Members of Parliament speak, then that is the will of the Canadian people. Hon. Members opposite, by themselves, do not speak for the Canadian people; all of us make the decisions. When they say that if they do not agree with what we are doing, then Parliament does not agree, I object to that. Parliament belongs to the people of Canada who put us here to make decisions on their behalf.

Hon. Members opposite speak of the lack of control over expenditures. I have heard the Hon. Member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) say that the contingency is really a porkbarrel for the Government. I want to put something to him and to the House, Mr. Speaker.

I happen to come from a riding that had a chance to get some money in order to create jobs. The amount was $700,000. This is public information and everyone should know about it. Was that porkbarrelling? I invite any Member to ask the 115 young people who got jobs because the Niagara South Board of Education used this program to give them jobs in the schools about that. The program was started some four months ago and since then 15 per cent of the people who were hired have found permanent work. That is because we were able to give them jobs and they got some experience. I defy any Hon. Member to ask any of those 115 young people who got a start in life, if that was porkbarrelling. In my riding we went after this money and I am proud of it. I would do it again. I would do anything I could to help young people and those in my riding who are unemployed. That is why I was elected—to represent them.

Government expenditures are controlled by Parliament; that goes without saying. The contingency does not permit spending beyond what has been approved by Parliament or has been given on-going authority by Acts of Parliament. The House has just completed debate on the Budget and the Main Estimates were provided to the House a few days ago. The recent Budget does not represent any shift in the fiscal policy stance developed in the April, 1983 Budget. The House has had ample time to review and debate the Government's fiscal stance and expenditure program. In my view the contingency amount provides the Government with flexibility in its financial operation and helps avoid unnecessary disruptions in the borrowing program which could have an adverse effect on interest rates and debt costs.

There are other questions that I want to address, Mr. Speaker. I have done a great deal of thinking about the federal deficit and no doubt most Members of the House have as well. We have all asked ourselves why the federal deficit is so high. Surely, this is a bad thing for the country. The federal deficit, Mr. Speaker, is projected to be approximately $27 billion this year, measured on a national accounts basis. The amount of $27 billion must boggle the mind. I do not believe any of us in private life would ever deal with such massive sums. They frighten me.

However, I am here and you, my colleagues, are here to make decisions in terms of these amounts of money because these are the terms we deal with on a national basis. This amount of $27 billion would be a rise of some $20 billion from its level in 1981. Again, Mr. Speaker, $20 billion is a staggering amount. The effects of recession on government revenues and expenditures, particularly with respect to unemployment insurance, account for about half of the rise in the deficit since 1981. We are taking care of those people who, through no fault of their own, find themselves out of work. We and the rest of the people in society have joined together to try to tide our co-citizens over through the tough times.

A substantial portion of the remaining rise in the deficit is due to the increasing public debt charges. Only a relatively small portion of the expected increase in the deficit is due to explicit policy initiatives of the Government. The Hon. Member for Capilano said as much, and agreed to as much in his speech. He said there was only about 15 per cent with which we really have to work. That is true, Mr. Speaker, and I would ask all Hon. Members to reflect on that point.

The Government has accepted the rise in the deficit in order to provide important support for economic activity. I believe that a continuation of the recovery will result in a narrowing of the deficit. I believe that. Rising employment will mean less money will be required for unemployment insurance benefits and personal income tax revenue will go higher. Corporation income taxes and revenue from sales taxes will also increase.

One can say I am just an optimist. I do not want to see the bad side of things. However, I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that a country without hope is a country without a future. We must continue to hope and to build and this is the way we are doing it as we go through these tough times. In addition, scheduled increases in tax rates in part implemented in order to finance the stimulative measures announced in the April Budget will reduce the deficit further. This, I believe, Mr. Speaker.

Does the high federal deficit not reflect the Government's inability to control its spending? Surely, these are questions we have all asked ourselves. Is spending really out of control? Is it not the responsibility, not only of Hon. Members of the Opposition, but also of Hon. Members of the current Government, to ask themselves those questions? Should we not be putting forth at least our own opinions which we can share with one another?

Again, Mr. Speaker, at the risk of being accused of using statistics "any way you want", I will use a few statistics to put this particular point into perspective. Since 1975, Mr. Speaker, the federal Government has been committed to restraining the trend growth in spending to no more than the trend growth of the Gross National Product. This commitment does not mean that the growth of expenditures must equal the growth of the Gross National Product every year. During a cyclical downturn, expenditures would generally be expected to grow faster than the Gross National Product, as is the case right now, since a deterioration in economic conditions would put upward pressure on expenditures and the Gross National Product growth would, of course, be slower. Similarly, the ratio of expenditures to Gross National Product would be expected to decline during the recovery phase of the cycle. The Government, in my view, has been successful in this sense; it has been successful in meeting the expenditure targets. In the 1975-76 fiscal year, total outlays, which are the expenditure control variable, were 22.9 per cent of the Gross National Product. By 1980-1981, they had fallen to 19.1 per cent of the Gross National Product.

Slow growth in the Gross National Product, the associated upward pressure on spending from low activity levels, rising public debt charges and limited discretionary measures, resulted in total outlays rising to an estimated 23.3 per cent of Gross National Product in the current fiscal year. And, yes, to the Hon. Member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) I do admit this is an increase. However, I think that on balance if he would look at the situation which we have been going through, he will find that this follows logically and naturally in the tough times we have faced. I would invite the Hon. Member to question me on any one of these points so that at least he would know what my views are. If the trend, rather than actual Gross National Product, were used in the calculation, the total outlays to Gross National Product ratio would fall to 21.6 per cent, and that is significantly below the ratio in 1975-1976. I will leave the statistics now, Mr. Speaker, because all of us will become embroiled in them.

I would like to direct myself now to specific questions which were brought up, one of which caused me to do quite a bit of thinking and to make inquiries. It was the simple question: Are deficits inflationary? Developments since 1981 demonstrate, in my view, that there is no clear connection between deficits and inflation. Indeed, the recent rise in the federal deficit was accompanied by a decline in inflation. However, there are circumstances, and I admit them, in which deficits could be inflationary. For example, if the Government decided to finance too large a portion of the deficit by printing money—

Mr. Blenkarn: By monetizing money.

Mr. Parent: —by printing money, inflationary pressures could eventually build up. I admit to that. We both agree to that.

Mr. Blenkarn: You are right.

Mr. Parent: There is no question. This has not been the case in Canada—

Mr. Blenkarn: It has in the past. It has not been in recent years.

Mr. Parent: Federal deficits have not been financed through excessive money creation. The Hon. Member for Mississauga South can give us his views on it, but I believe he agrees with my last statement. I would invite him, of course, into the debate as soon as I am finished. Do deficits not drive up interest rates and crowd out private borrowers from financial markets? Surely, this is a legitimate question which we all must look at, Mr. Speaker.

Again, recent developments demonstrate, in my opinion, that there is no clear connection between the deficit and interest rates. Interest rates are considerably below their pre-recession peak despite a rise in the federal deficit. During a cyclical downturn, private demands for credit generally decline—indeed, this is in large part what caused the recession—so there need not be any conflict between private and public borrowing, in my opinion. As economic conditions improve—and they will and are improving—government borrowing requirements should automatically diminish when private credit demands are rising. If it becomes clear that the federal deficit is not falling fast enough, then I believe that the Government should stand ready to adjust its fiscal plan in order to prevent a clash of credit demand. I believe this is one of the things we should be doing.

The federal deficit in Canada is similar to its United States counterpart when expressed as a percentage of Gross National Product. Given the degree of concern expressed over the United States deficit, should Canada not also be concerned?

● (1230)

I want to close with some personal thoughts, Mr. Speaker. I started out by saying that we should not become too emotional, which I confess I am probably as guilty of as anyone else. However, I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, and to all Hon. Members in this House, that if we were to look at these problems as Canadians instead of as Parties in opposition to one another, if we could do as the Hon. Member for Capilano said and turn off the television cameras and get away from the so-called press galleries, if we could talk to each other in the spirit of sharing ideas, we could solve in a more equitable manner some of the problems facing us right now.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I say to the Hon. Member that it is this Party's proposal that a parliamentary committee be struck to priorize the budgetary requirements of the country and keep the deficit down so borrowing will not be too great. That would mean looking at all expenditures from a zero base and determining what is necessary in view of the financial demands placed on the economy, and what is not necessary and perhaps could be eliminated. I suspect the Hon. Member would be in favour of that.

Early this morning Treasury bills were being sold at interest rates in excess of 10.7 per cent, and the debts are that the auction at two o'clock this afternoon will be in excess of 10.85 per cent. This means that trust companies and banks who finance homes and make loans to business will obviously have to pay more interest than the Government of Canada to compete in the marketplace.

In light of that, does the Hon. Member not agree with me that the borrowing demands of the Government are perhaps now crowding out private demands for money, and that the danger of a recession instigated by high interest rates is now upon us? May I remind him that this borrowing Bill represents 91 per cent of the estimated personal savings in this country and it is far greater than the country can really absorb. This Bill will have to be cut back and some priorizing of expenses will have to take place in order that we can cut back on our borrowing; otherwise we are going to borrow ourselves right back into another recession.

Mr. Parent: There are three questions there, Mr. Speaker, and I will address myself to the first one concerning a committee being set up. It is my understanding that a committee such as that exists. I know it is not a special committee, but when we look at the estimates we have the right and responsibility to ask questions as to what these expenditures are.

Regarding the bills that are going to be auctioned today, it would seem, according to the information the Hon. Member has, and I have no reason to doubt it, that we are going to be auctioning these bills at 10.85 per cent, I believe he said. This is, in my view, a dramatic increase, but one thing I do question is that the Member says we have borrowed up to 91 per cent of the total savings of the Canadian people. I would have to verify that. The information I was able to get through my researchers is that it is not that high, that we were talking in the neighbourhood of 75 per cent to 80 per cent. That was the best estimate. But even that is high.

The Hon. Member asks if this borrowing will drive up interest rates. If that were the case, Mr. Speaker, we are trying to look ahead, at least in the field of home ownership. Hon. Members will be aware that in the last Budget we brought forward a proposal which would protect the home owner—and I believe everyone should have the right to own a home—from rising mortgage interest rates if they take out what we call mortgage insurance.

As far as the business community is concerned, I suggest that in the last year or so they have had the best borrowing rates they could possibly have had and we hope this trend will continue.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the Hon. Member that the Department of Finance estimates gross personal savings this year at $32.3 billion. This Bill is for $29.5 billion. While it is true borrowing last year reached 70 per cent to 80 per cent of available money, this Bill is the largest Bill ever before any Parliament and it represents 91 per cent of the personal savings in this country this year.

As to home owners, clearly this insurance does not protect and create houses. It protects people against huge rises in interest rates but that does not help the ordinary guy who is going into the market to buy a property because he has to pay the current rate. All he can do is protect himself against further increases, so that does not help a bit. As rates go higher, it drives people out of business and into bankruptcy.

However, one of the estimates we have before us now, Mr. Speaker, concerns advances to de Havilland and Canadair. In the last 15 months we will have advanced to those corporations a total of $1.250 billion. Those corporations together have 2,709 employees, which represents $173,600 for each job in the last 15 months. Does the Hon. Member think that is responsible? Does he really think that he as a Member of Parliament can justify going into the marketplace and bidding up interest rates at a time when the Canadian dollar is falling? How does he expect us to account to our children and grandchildren in order to justify this kind of activity?

Mr. Parent: Mr. Speaker, the question the Hon. Member asks should be couched in other terms. Yes, we are dealing with economics, with money, no question about it. However, it was not very long ago that we in Canada had a massive brain drain where a great number of our engineers in the aerospace industry left the country. This is what we are talking about at Canadair and de Havilland. I know the Hon. Member was not part of the government at the time, he was not a Member of Parliament, but it was his Party which finished off the Avro Arrow. This place would have put us in the forefront of the aviation industry. It was 20 years ahead of its time. And so ashamed were we of that act, Mr. Speaker, that the government of the day saw fit to destroy all information that we ever had on the Arrow.

If you were to ask whether I believe that the aerospace industry in Canada is worth investing in and tiding over until times are better, my answer would be yes. If it means that at this juncture we must invest the amounts of money we are investing into these businesses to keep them going, to ensure that our children will have a chance in these industries and in all of the high technology jobs which spin off, my answer is that it is worth that type of investment for us as a nation.

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, I would like to put the question of the deficit to the Hon. Member in a different way. In 1968, 5 per cent to 10 per cent of tax revenue went to service the debt. Since 1968 it has risen to 10, 15, 20, 25 and now over 30 per cent of tax revenue used to service the debt. That means it is going into the hands of people who already have wealth and we must tax the middle class to get that money.

Where would the Hon. Member cut it off? When it was 10 per cent we were saying it was high enough. When it was 20 per cent we were really angry. Now it is over 30 per cent and we are inflamed. If it was okay at 20 per cent and 30 per cent, why should it not be at 60 per cent or 70 per cent? Where would the Hon. Member cut if off?

Mr. Parent: Mr. Speaker, on the face of it that would seem to be a very reasonable question. I wish I had an answer but I do not. The only answer I could give would seem evasive. I guess it is whatever the Canadian people can bear, whatever they can do to carry this debt. If I were to say I do not believe it is high at 30 per cent, I would not be telling the truth.

There are other nations, including Japan and Germany, where more of the money taken in is used to pay their debt than we are paying now. They seem to be surviving. Also, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member but the question period has terminated.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening to the debate this morning by the Progressive Conservative Party and the Liberal Party. In a moment or two I would like to make some observations about the points being made by Hon. Members.

I cannot help but ask a rather fundamental question, Mr. Speaker. Imagine the scenario of a small business person or other individual walking into a banker's office to take out a loan. The individual wants to take out a $29,500 loan. The banker asks what the money will be spent on and how seriously the matter has been thought out. The individual says how he will spend $25,500 because he has been spending that amount year after year and just wants to top up what he has always been spending. He has not given it a fair evaluation. The banker asks what the other $4,000 will be spent on. The individual indicates that he just threw that in case he might need it for something in the future and he will be checking it out.

If you were a banker, Mr. Speaker, would you consider allotting that extra $4,000 when the individual has no idea how he is going to spend it, only that he may have some use for it in the future? During very tight financial times I do not think anyone as a banker would throw that in with enthusiasm.

Mr. Blais: You do not understand very much, do you Nelson?

Mr. Riis: Bill C-21 asks us to do this as responsible parliamentarians. It requests authorization to borrow $29.550 billion. This includes a $4 billion contingency fund for things which may come up in the future. This is the largest borrowing Bill in Canadian history, Mr. Speaker. It is only a thin page but it will lock the country into an incredible amount of spending. I will come back to that in a moment.

Mr. Blais: Nelson, it is an authority. It is to authorize the spending.

Mr. Riis: That is right. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Blais) says it is to authorize the borrowing and spending of this money as required. That is what it is.

Mr. Blais: It does not lock anybody into anything.

Mr. Riis: Why do we have governments, Mr. Speaker? I suspect a lot of people in the country have been looking at individuals and reading the accounts of various Ministers as they travel across the country, and are asking themselves why we have these people and whether they are acting in our best interests. What is the point of having a government? I believe there are three reasons we have governments. They are not particularly earth-shattering, but one is to collect taxes fairly from people. That is a fundamental objective of governments throughout time.

One could argue whether taxes are being collected fairly. Over the last number of weeks we have heard many accounts which make it perfectly clear that taxes are not being collected fairly. There is ample evidence to suggest that is the case. I am certain I would not have to read long lists of names, but I could if necessary, Mr. Speaker. For the next three hours I could read lists of corporations in the country which did quite well last year, partly because of the concessions in corporate taxation. Their profits in some cases were hundreds or thousands of millions of dollars. Yet they do not pay any income tax at all. A lot of businesses today do not pay any income tax because they are not making any profits. More and more businesses are coming into that category. However, I am speaking of those corporations which make millions and millions of dollars in profit and pay no income tax at all.

It is obvious that the Government is not collecting taxes fairly in the country. We can list thousands of individual Canadians—

Mr. Blais: That is demagogy. You know that.

Mr. Riis: The Minister of Defence shakes his head and says that is not true. He can stand in his place and explain why thousands of Canadian citizens, whose incomes—

Mr. Blenkarn: Name me a company that has taxable income and does not pay tax.

Mr. Riis: —are $50,000, $100,000, or $1 million a year, pay absolutely no income tax.

Mr. Blenkarn: Because they do not make any income.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. May we have one debate at a time please? The Hon. Member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) has the floor.

Mr. Riis: Why is it whenever I raise the matter of individuals not paying income tax, or corporations making profits and not paying income tax, that people try to interrupt this portion of my speech? It is because I touch a nerve in people over there? Is it because I suggest to people, wherever they sit, that this is an uncomfortable topic to a lot of people?

Mr. Blenkarn: We thought you were brighter than that.

Mr. Riis: Another reason we have governments, Mr. Speaker, is to spend wisely, in the best interests of the people of the country, the money that has been collected. When we see how these moneys are being spent it is perfectly clear they are not being spent in the best interests of Canadian citizens.

I will use one simple example to illustrate this. We have oil companies which call themselves Canadian oil companies but which are really Canadian subsidiaries of the transnational oil companies. They say they are hesitant to explore for oil in the frontier areas unless we bribe them into doing that. I do not believe they would use the term "bribe", but I use it consciously. Therefore, the Government bribes the transnational oil companies, through their Canadian subsidiaries, to explore in the Beaufort Sea, the Hibernia fields and so on.

How much do we bribe these people, Mr. Speaker? When one considers the great expense of drilling some of those oil wells, perhaps $200 million, the taxpayers of Canada pay about $180 million out of that $200 million through PIP grants. There is not one oil producing country in the world that would even think of doing that. There is not one oil producing country that welcomes transnational oil companies to come in and explore their frontier areas on that basis. Those countries give absolutely no grants or bribes to the oil companies yet they are still exploring there.

Mr. Blais: You don't know what you are talking about.

Mr. Riis: The Minister of National Defence says that I do not know what I am talking about. Let us talk about Norway which is also conducting offshore oil exploration. Does the country of Norway bribe those companies with taxpayers' money? No, it does not. It does not use the taxpayers' money to pay for 80 per cent or 90 per cent of those exploration costs. I am just suggesting that if there is a fundamental purpose of government, it is to spend taxpayers' money wisely. The Government is not doing that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair is attempting to follow the Hon. Member's speech but the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Blais) continues to shell the Hon. Member. He uses crossfire. That is not permissible according to Standing Order 15, I remind the Hon. Minister.

Mr. Riis: Thank you for your intervention, Mr. Speaker. I would not call the Minister rude at all because I think that what I am saying is embarrassing to the Minister. The Minister knows that what I am saying is perfectly accurate but he finds it embarrassing since some of his constituents may be watching television and thinking that perhaps they should pay the Hon. Member a visit to his office to have him explain why so many people with sizeable incomes do not pay income tax and how the Government justifies that. However, I will leave that aside since I do not want to stray from my remarks.

The Government has another role besides that of collecting taxes fairly and spending taxpayers' money wisely. One of its very important roles is to provide leadership and the opportunity for Canadians to expand and take advantage of the natural and capital resources of our country.

I am sure most of my colleagues used the opportunity of the last week or ten days to visit their constituencies. I made a point of talking to some of my constituents. If there is one sad occurrence in our country today, it is that the Government has not provided any optimism, sense of hope or any vision for people to see a future in our country that is creative or innovative.

I talked to representatives of the disabled community. There are 1.5 million Canadians who are disabled and the unemployment rate in that group is approximately 80 per cent to 85 per cent. What is the Government of Canada doing for these individuals? Is it giving them some hope that they will be employed in the future? Is it introducing an affirmative action program so that when corporations receive sizeable tax concessions or grants they cannot merely contemplate hiring disabled people but must hire disabled Canadians who are able to work in their plants, offices or factories? Does the Government have that kind of sensible, decent or compassionate approach? No, it does not.

It is evident from talking to the young people of our country that well in excess of 500,000 of them are unemployed. At this time in their lives they should be in the job market or going to post-secondary educational institutions to develop their careers and occupations. They should be beginning their families, buying homes and establishing themselves as productive, creative citizens. However, to do this one must be able to work or be able to afford to continue one's education. When there are 500,000 people under the age of 25 who want to work but cannot find a job in a country as rich as Canada, you would expect the Government to do something about it other than come up with some simplistic make-work program that will assist less than 2 per cent of those already unemployed. There will be hundreds of thousands of young Canadians leaving secondary schools in the next few months. What are their expectations when they enter the job market?

I remember that not too many years ago when I and my colleagues left our secondary schools, colleges, vocational schools or universities, there were up to 15 job opportunities for every graduate, which allowed us to choose our jobs. We were able to decide where we wanted to work, what type of job we wanted and to what extent. Today, the situation has reversed and for every single job there might be 15 young people applying for it. It is a terrible situation. It is a terrible deed we are doing not only to the young people of our country but to the future of our country.

Today is International Women's Day. It is a day when we reflect for a moment on how unfairly women are treated in our society, in the workplaces of Canada, in the Canadian tax system and in the fiscal policies of this country. I think it is perfectly clear that any sensible person would believe that major changes are required in our country to enable women to play their rightful role in our society. But is the Government taking any bold steps in this direction at this time? Is any leadership being provided in this particular area? No. Again, there is that sense of despondency and hopelessness along with the belief that the Government does not care about women, young people or the disabled of Canada. That feeling exists because people look for a hint that this is not so but cannot find it.

When I toured my constituency I talked to the small business people in my area. At a time when the Government has allowed interest rates to remain at these excessively high levels, small businesses can see that the tax concessions are going to the corporations so that they can pay an effective tax rate that is less than that paid by the small business community. They see numerous tax policies that are aimed strictly at the corporate level but not at the small or medium-sized businesses of this country. The number of foreclosures and receiverships has risen. People are being forced to close their doors and walk away from any optimism about the next decade in this country? No, they do not. Again, it is a reflection of the financial leadership of the Government.

We can talk about the food producers of our country, such as the farmers, ranchers and the fishermen from the interior and both coasts. Are they optimistic about being able to maintain their ranches, farms and fishing boats? Will they be producing food for Canadians in the future? There is no feeling that there is an opportunity for growth and development. The opportunities for young people to become farmers and fishermen are not there. The present level of interest rates will not permit a successful economic recovery to allow young people to get into food producing operations. But does the Government do anything about it? No, it does not.

Today the native people of Canada are meeting to discuss their future. One of the most pathetic experiences for parliamentarians is to visit Indian reservations in our ridings. When we see how Indian people are treated in this country, we enter the fourth world, with areas of extreme poverty and hopelessness. There is 90 per cent unemployment. That is the situation in many of the Indian reservations in our country.

We lack leadership. We lack a responsible system of tax collection. Our taxes are not collected fairly and not expended wisely. There is not much good one can say about the present Liberal Government of Canada.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

REVIEW OF ACHIEVEMENTS

Mr. Jack Masters (Thunder Bay-Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, International Women's Day has been celebrated by women of all nations for more than 70 years. When International Women's Day was first celebrated in 1911, Canadian women in most provinces were still struggling for suffrage, and were not even considered persons in the eyes of the law.

Traditionally on this day Members of this House have taken time to acknowledge the legislative milestones that have been passed on the road to full equality and to remind us that there is still a way to go. We have learned that legislative action, while essential, does not automatically result in changes in ways of thinking.

I would like to focus on the initiatives presently under way in Canada as we look forward to the 1985 World Conference marking the end of the United Nations Decade for Women. As we celebrate International Women's Day, the U. N. Commission for the Status of Women is meeting in Vienna as the preparatory body for the 1985 World Conference to review and appraise the achievements of the U. N. Decade for Women.

My colleague, the Minister responsible for the Status of Women, has just returned from these meetings, and has committed this country to the development of a new Canadian plan of action for the Status of Women. This plan, to be tabled at the 1985 World Conference, will cover two very essential periods of history.

I cannot over emphasize our ongoing commitment to the achievement of equality. The work that was started must continue. We view the participation of women in the public life of our country as essential. We join today with women from all countries—

Mr. Speaker: I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member, but his time has expired.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

WOMEN'S STRUGGLE FOR EQUALITY

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, today is International Women's Day. It may seem somewhat anachronistic that in this so-called age of equality we still have to designate a day to focus attention on the struggle for equal rights for women.

This day commemorates the events of March 8, 1908, when a fire in a New York garment factory caused the tragic deaths of female workers whose employers locked the doors during working hours. These women died because they were trapped.

Our society has come a long way since that time, but many women are still trapped by the economic and social realities of today. For instance, older women, trapped in poverty, because of inadequate or non-existent pensions; low income women, trapped in job ghettoes with little or no hope of advancement, and single parent mothers, trapped in a daily struggle for survival because maintenance payments are not forthcoming for them and their children. Indian women have lost their status, trapped by discrimination and inequities not of their own making.

As long as these conditions persist there will be a need to call attention to the injustices still facing women. It is important to do so on March 8, International Women's day, but it is equally important to do so every other day of the year.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

MEASURES FOR ELIMINATION OF OBSTACLES TO EQUALITY

Mr. Michel Veillette (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, International Women's Day has been celebrated in all countries for more than seventy years. In fact, when the first International Women's Day was held in 1911, in most of our provinces Canadian women were still fighting for the right to vote and were not even considered to be persons in the eyes of the law. Traditionally, on March 8, Hon. Members take a few moments to consider what had to be done over the years to obtain full equality, and to reflect on what remains to be done. Mr. Speaker, we know from experience that, although essential, legislation alone does not necessarily bring about a change in thinking. Attitudes and behaviour solidly anchored in a society will change only under constant and increasing pressure.

Today, however, I would prefer to forget the past and draw the attention of the Hon. Members to current activities in Canada in preparation for the World Conference that will mark the end of the United Nations Decade for Women in 1985. On International Women's Day, the United Nations Commission on the Status of Women is meeting in Vienna, as the agency responsible for preparing the World Conference in 1985 that will review and evaluate the results of the United Nations Decade for Women.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the Parliamentary Secretary. The Hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm).

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

CALL FOR REINSTATEMENT FOR FIRST DEGREE MURDER

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, in Canada we have recently witnessed an unprecedented wave of violence resulting in unwarranted acts of brutality and, in my cases, death. The list of most recent victims is ample proof of the rise of violent crime in our country.

Barbara Turnbull, 18 years old, of Mississauga, Ontario, a Becker's store clerk who was shot during the course of a robbery on September 23, 1983, remains paralyzed; Nizam Ali, 18 years old, of Mississauga, Ontario, stabbed to death last Saturday while he worked the overnight shift; Nepean Police Constable, David Utman, shot to death at Bayshore Shopping Centre in Nepean, Ontario, on October 14, 1983.

Paul Chapman was fatally stabbed on the night of June 22, 1983, after being strapped into a chair while the two men accused of the crime sexually molested his girlfriend.

The increase of rampant crime is clearly evident and demands the immediate attention of all Members of Parliament. Consequently, on behalf of the 87 per cent of my constituents who favour capital punishment for premeditated first degree murder, I intend to use today's allotted hour for Private Member's Business to debate Bill C-213, which seeks to reinstate capital punishment for all cases of first degree murder.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

STATUS OF INDIAN WOMEN AND THEIR CHILDREN

Mrs. Thérèse Killens (Saint-Michel-Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, I was very pleased with the announcement made this morning by the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) at the Constitutional Conference of First Ministers, to the effect that the federal Government is now prepared to repeal Section 12(1)(b) of the Indian Act. Mr. Speaker, the House will recall that the Act discriminates against native women and their children. By marrying a white man, native women as well as their children lose their Indian status, while an Indian who marries a white woman continues to benefit from the privileges arising from his Indian status, both for him and his children. I am very pleased, and I am sure women members on both sides of the House and all the women of this country share this feeling with me today, especially on a day that is dedicated to the women of this country, namely, International Women's Day.

Mr. Speaker, I want to express my personal commitment to do everything I can to have this Act amended as soon as possible.

[English]

STATUS OF WOMEN

PARTICIPATION IN SPORTS

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Mr. Speaker, in conjunction with International Women's Day, I would like to speak for just a minute about the situation of women in sports in Canada. For too long women have been the victims of stereotyping and sexism when it comes to athletic participation. They have been discouraged from participating actively in sports when they approach puberty since vigorous activity is seen by many in our society as unfeminine. It is time this stereotyping stopped, and I hope our educators are leading the way by encouraging girls' activity in the same way they encourage boys'.

There are other problems, too, Mr. Speaker. If a young woman wants to participate in any level in sports, she must compete, first, for time and space in which to train, since access to facilities, particularly for organized sports, is a battleground between men and women. And it is men's sports which seem to take precedence when sports administrators dole out time at gyms, pools, and fields.

Women athletes are not the only ones who suffer discrimination in the sporting world. Women who wish to be coaches, who aspire to the boards of sports organizations, or who wish to be involved as senior staff in sport agencies, face roadblocks similar to the ones faced by athletes. Women deserve equal representation in all these facets of sports. And those who have the stamina and courage to seek excellence at the level of "elite" sports need the support of Canadian tax dollars to the same extent as their male counterparts. I urge the Government to improve the lot of women with affirmative action programs both in hiring and funding allocations.

BILINGUALISM

TRIBUTE TO DEFENDERS OF FRANCO-MANITOBANS' RIGHTS

Mr. Louis Duclos (Montmorency-Orléans): Mr. Speaker, the outcome of the debate in the Manitoba legislature on language rights for the Francophone minority in that province must give serious cause for concern to Canadians who favour equal language rights, a concept that is a cornerstone of Canadian unity, as it gives people with closed minds and with intolerance as their political credo cause to rejoice.

Although for some people, this debate has been an opportunity to show how narrow-minded they are and to indulge in demagoguery, others have shown remarkable political courage.

I want to express publicly my admiration for the almost heroic attitude of the Premier of Manitoba and his colleagues. I also wish to applaud the unqualified support given Franco-

Manitobans by the Federal Leader of the New Democratic Party at a recent convention of the Manitoba wing of his Party in Winnipeg, and also the spontaneous support of all my anglophone colleagues in the Liberal Caucus for the position of the Right Hon. Prime Minister on this issue.

As for the Official Opposition, we cannot question the good faith of its Leader, but the profound hostility shown by some Members of his Caucus and prospective Party candidates to Franco-Manitobans and the French language is eloquent proof that francophones still cannot depend on the Progressive Conservative Party to defend their language rights, and the Leader of that Party will do well to remember before he starts to woo Quebec voters in the next election campaign that Quebec's motto is: "Je me souviens".

MARINE TRANSPORT

CN MARINE VESSELS—PROVISION OF SAFETY EQUIPMENT FOR CREWS

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, marine workers face fatal hypothermia due to exposure in cold water, especially if forced to abandon ship at sea. Recent sea disasters such as the Ocean Ranger make stronger safety regulations essential.

Prince Edward Island employees of CN Marine sail steamships to distant drydocks each Spring when ice and weather conditions render voyages hazardous. Such employees need immersion suits that provide both hypothermic protection and buoyancy. They also need inflatable life rafts that, unlike existing lifeboats, can be launched in stormy conditions. Yet Transport Canada's regulations permit CN Marine vessels headed for drydock to carry only conventional lifeboats, and those inflatable life rafts in use are often removed from ships prior to sailing for drydock.

The Canadian Brotherhood of Railway, Transport and General Workers has lobbied since 1981 for legislation requiring all CN Marine crews to be provided with proper survival equipment. The $50,000 cost to equip P.E.I. vessels would be a small price to pay to prevent tragic loss of life. I urge the Minister of Transport (Mr. Axworthy) to update relevant safety regulations with all possible speed and urgency.

FRANCO-MANITOBAN RIGHTS

ALLEGED HOSTILE ATTITUDE OF CERTAIN M.P.S

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Lotbinière): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. First of all, I want to say that I entirely agree with the comments made by my colleague from Montmorency-Orléans, and I would like to quote here in the House a short report that appeared in the newspaper Le Devoir on February 28, 1984, which said: "According to three of the five Federal Conservative Members from Manitoba, the Ottawa resolution requesting that Province to guarantee French rights will have no effect, even if it receives the support of all three political parties."

The three Members are the Hon. Member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta), who is here in the House today, the Hon. Member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Clark) and the Hon. Member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer). According to Le Devoir, the three "also said they felt rather uncomfortable about the position taken by their Leader, Mr. Brian Mulroney." "We are not a bunch of sheep," commented Mr. Mayer. In the House, Mr. Mulroney stated that when the Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party speaks, he speaks for all members. However, the Member for Portage-Marquette revealed that at a caucus meeting, several members informed the Leader that they did not share his opinion, and that was the quote from the newspaper Le Devoir.

It seems there is now a situation where there are divergent and dissenting views. Mr. Speaker, I see one of those Progressive Conservative Members here in the House, and I would like him as well as some of his colleagues whose names I mentioned earlier to rise in the House and say whether they are for or against the rights of francophones in Manitoba. Are they for or against bilingualism? If they are against francophones and against bilingualism, I would ask their Leader to expel all three, as well as other members who refused to follow the Party's line on bilingualism. With all this dissidence and divergence of opinions, the Progressive Conservative Party is in a state of confusion, and as my Hon. colleague from Montmorency-Orléans (Mr. Duclos) so aptly said, the motto of Quebec is: "Je me souviens", and Quebecers will certainly remember the Progressive Conservative Party!

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FINANCE

EXCHANGE VALUE OF DOLLAR—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In his absence I will direct it to the Deputy Prime Minister and former Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance said, as reported in The Globe and Mail for March 7:

> I am not one spending my nights up worrying that the dollar is not at 81 cents, I can assure you . . . interest rate levels in Canada have nothing to do with the value of the dollar.

Does this indicate a new policy on behalf of the Government? The dollar today is trading below 79 cents U.S., 78.89.

The Bank of Canada rate has just gone up to 10.20 per cent, indicating that interest rates may go up shortly. In view of these statements of the Minister, and because we have had a policy for eight or ten years where it has been necessary for interest rates in Canada to be high to support the dollar, I ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether it is now official policy that the Canadian dollar can depreciate despite the inflationary pressures that would bring, and is it now Bank of Canada policy to allow interest rates to find their own level quite independently of what effect this will have on the value of the Canadian dollar?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member knows that for quite some years now the dollar has been responding to a number of forces in the market. It has not been the policy of the Government or the Bank of Canada to intervene to alter the fundamental trends in the value of the dollar. I share the view of the Minister of Finance that this present development is not a matter for alarm. We have had two experiences recently when the dollar dipped below 80 cents on the market. I do not see anything new or worrying about this development at the present time.

INTEREST RATE LEVELS

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, it is too bad the Deputy Prime Minister cannot answer a question when it is on such an important matter. If the Canadian dollar sinking to under 79 cents does not matter, if the impetus that this gives to inflation does not matter, if the fact that that keeps interest rates high does not matter, why did the Government permit interest rates to go to 21 per cent and 22 per cent just a year ago? Why are they as high as they are today, if none of this matters?

Is the Minister of Finance speaking for the Government when he says that interest rate levels in Canada from now on are going to have nothing to do with the value of the Canadian dollar? Are interest rates going to be permitted to go wherever they might, without worrying whatsoever about the effect on the value of the dollar? That is my question. That is what your Minister said.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I doubt very much whether the Minister said any such thing. I cannot see that the Minister would make a comment which the Member interprets as a declaration that there is absolutely no relationship between the value of the exchange rate of the Canadian dollar and existing interest rates. We both know that there is an interaction, but it is not the only interaction.

Every time the value of the Canadian dollar changes, it is not necessarily linked to interest rates. The Hon. Member knows that. When he is asking this question, he is obviously misinterpreting what the Minister of Finance said. I am sure that no Minister of Finance would ever say that there is no relationship whatsoever between interest rates and the exchange value of the Canadian dollar at any time in any circumstance.

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I am looking at the March 7 Globe and Mail where the Minister of Finance is quoted as saying: "Interest rate levels in Canada have nothing to do with the value of the dollar." It is in black and white, not denied by the Minister. He should not be Minister of Finance, according to the Deputy Prime Minister. It is here in black and white. I know that the Deputy Prime Minister did not set a glorious record for his successor, but his successor has plunged even deeper than the Deputy Prime Minister.

• (1420)

On October 19 the Minister of Finance said that within six months interest rates in Canada would drop by another two to three percentage points. That was five months ago. That is the kind of prophet he is. As well, he said that Canada could respond very quickly to lower U.S. interest rates if inflation remains low and the value of the Canadian dollar stays steady at its current 81-cent or 82-cent range here in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Would the Hon. Member ask his question?

Mr. Crosbie: In view of that, how can the Minister and the Government now adopt a policy that says that our interest rate levels will go wherever they like without having any effect on the Canadian dollar, and they will do nothing to prevent this from having an effect on the Canadian dollar?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I just told the Hon. Member that that is not the policy of the Government of Canada. May I repeat to the Hon. Member that, if that is his fear, then his fear is unjustified. He ought to know that in addition to interest rates there have been quite marked changes, not only in the value of Canadian currency but in the value of the United States dollar, and in the value of European currencies. That does not have very much to do with interest rates in Canada at the present time. The Hon. Member ought to know that.

STATEMENT MADE BY BANK OF CANADA GOVERNOR

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, it is very hard to supplement a lead question when we get the kind of answers we have been getting from the former Minister of Finance who is presently the Acting Deputy Prime Minister of Canada. I am really confused, Mr. Speaker, as is everyone else in the Chamber, regarding just is what the financial policy of the Canadian Government. Where does it stand in light of the Governor of the Bank of Canada's statement of November 29, 1983, which reads as follows:

—any major depreciation of the Canadian dollar at this time would be much more likely to damage than to help our economic situation in that it would be strongly inflationary in an environment where confidence that inflation is under control is still so fragile.

We are struggling with a recovery. The Minister of Finance has been talking to all kinds of economic leaders across the country, and their statements are on the record. Why has the Government of Canada not reduced the federal deficit, when doing so is the one signal that world markets, the Canadian market, and the private sector need in order to have a stable interest rate environment and to have some stability that will allow us to pick up the challenge given by the Minister of Finance in his last Budget?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): First, Mr. Speaker, a major depreciation of the Canadian dollar has not taken place. The Canadian dollar dipped temporarily below 80 cents last January and last December. That happened twice in the very recent past. It was not a major depreciation. The Canadian dollar recovered then, and precisely the same incident has occurred again. The Hon. Member cannot describe it as being either a major depreciation or as having any relationship to the size of the deficit. Neither element included in his question is relevant under the present circumstances.

ECONOMIC PROJECTIONS MADE BY CONFERENCE BOARD OF CANADA

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, so far the four answers that we have heard from the former Minister of Finance, who is the Deputy Prime Minister of the country, indicate the reason why our money is not at an 80-cent level as compared to United States currency but is now falling into the seventies. That is a direct measure, as compared to other currencies, of how well we manage our economy and how well we discipline ourselves as a Government.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Huntington: The value of Canadian currency can be compared against U.S. and other currencies. We have a 79 per cent performance rate as against other countries, and that is a fact. It is the one measure which tells us how well we are doing vis-à-vis other countries.

Can the Minister tell us what the Government will do to offset the predictions of an economist with the Conference Board of Canada who said, as reported by the Calgary Herald:

Without investment in new plant and equipment . . . there is nothing to drive Canada's economy into the mature stage of recovery—

We know that the bloom has fallen off the Canadian recovery rate. We know that recovery in the U.S. is still moving strongly ahead. What is the Government doing to create an environment that will allow us to consolidate what we have? Considering the answers we are hearing, are we going to see more inflation, higher interest rates, and a severe depression, as has been indicated by the Conference Board of Canada?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member seems to be totally unaware of what has happened to currency values in Canada, in the United States, and in Europe. If he were aware of this, he would know that for quite some time the Canadian dollar has been much stronger as compared to most European currencies than as compared to the United States currency.

If the Canadian dollar declines in value from time to time in relation to the American dollar, its historic and recent pattern has been one of strength in relation to European currencies. The Hon. Member ought to bear that in mind if he is talking about the value of the Canadian dollar as an index of our over-all performance. If it is such an index as he has just stated, then we are performing much better than most European industrialized countries. The Hon. Member ought to know that and factor it in to his rather rudimentary analysis of the current economic situation.

PUBLIC SERVICE

EQUAL PAY FOR EQUAL WORK GUIDELINES

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister responsible for the Status of Women, I would like to direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister. He will know that Canada ratified the international convention on equal pay for work of equal value in 1972, and that such legislation has existed in federal law since 1978. Yet women in Canada still make only 60 cents for every dollar a man makes. Even more damning, Mr. Speaker, is the $7,300 wage gap between men and women employees in the federal Public Service.

In view of the fact that Labour Canada released a report last month confirming that the federal Government is not enforcing its own equal pay for work of equal value guidelines in the Public Service, will the Government act immediately to reorganize Treasury Board's compensation standards to comply with equal value legislation?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, quite appropriately the Hon. Member is asking such a question on a day on which we are making International Women's Day. I think her question is quite appropriate, and it gives me an opportunity to say that the world is celebrating the achievements of women the world over, and that today is an occasion on which this Government and other Governments throughout the world can recommit themselves to the advancement of women. That is one of the objectives of the Government of Canada.

In this past decade, which has been the International Decade for Women, I think that this country and other countries have taken some very important strides. However, I would agree with the Hon. Member that much more remains to be done. If she wants to ask specifically about the particular attitude taken by the Treasury Board, then she can direct her question to the President of the Treasury Board.

Ms. Jewett: Mr. Speaker, that long homily from the stealth missile did not deceive anyone, so I will turn to the President of the Treasury Board.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER ENSURE COMPLIANCE WITH LEGISLATION

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board will also know that Labour Canada released a report last month confirming that the federal Government is not enforcing its own equal pay for work of equal value guidelines in the federal Public Service. I would ask the President of the Treasury Board if he will act immediately to reorganize Treasury Board's compensation standards, to comply with equal pay for work of equal value legislation.

Hon. Herb Gray (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the Hon. Member has confirmed the fact that federal law, under the Canadian Human Rights Act, calls for equal pay for work of equal value. As I recall, the Labour Canada report in question points out that the federal Government is far ahead of the private sector and of any of the provincial Governments in that regard. In that connection, we have been working with the Human Rights Commission to identify situations where, in spite of this principle in the law, the principle is not being applied. In recent months we have settled a number of cases dealing with substantial numbers of people to ensure that these principles are in fact being observed.

● (1430)

In line with that commitment in the law, in line with my own commitment and the commitment of the Government, we are certainly working very actively to make sure that the principle is respected, not just in its written form. In fact we are making substantial progress. We are far ahead of the private sector and other Governments, and we will continue to be ahead.

Ms. Jewett: Mr. Speaker, the Minister did not answer the question when he is going to reorganize Treasury Board's compensation standards. That is what we want to know.

HUMAN RIGHTS COMMISSION—DELAY IN DEALING WITH COMPLAINTS

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question arises directly out of the Minister's reply concerning the Canadian Human Rights Commission, because it does not have sufficient staff or resources to deal adequately with the complaints that come before it. The Minister probably knows that a complaint filed four years ago by the Energy and Chemical Workers' Union on behalf of 31 women in Glace Bay, Nova Scotia, is only now going before a tribunal. What will the Minister do, or urge the Government to do, so that, first of all, it will not sit around and wait until complaints are filed, and second, when complaints are filed, see that they are dealt with expeditiously?

Hon. Herb Gray (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, with respect to compensation standards, they are not intended to do other than provide equal pay for work of equal value. I will be very happy to examine the situation and take prompt corrective action.

With respect to the Canadian Human Rights Commission, it operates at arm's length from the Government. If the Chief Commissioner and the other commissioners want to make proposals for additional staff and resources to deal with complaints more expeditiously, to the Minister who answers to Parliament for them, I will be very happy to work as sympathetically as I can to provide a positive and swift response to this request. The request has to come from the Commission, which is an independent body. I, for one, would be prepared to respond in a swift and sympathetic manner once the request is brought to my attention.

Ms. Jewett: Mr. Speaker, I have a final supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member has had two supplementaries.

FINANCE

TREASURY BILL RATES—EFFECT ON GOVERNMENT DEFICIT

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, the Minister of State for Finance, and in view of the fact that the Deputy Prime Minister was formerly Minister of Finance.

The Minister will know that today at the Treasury Bill auctions the Government had to pay just a whisker under 11 per cent for one year money. That very fact alone militates against all low interest mortgage rates from now on. Interest rates on mortgages from trust companies and insurance companies are going to go immediately to the 12 per cent and 13 per cent level, certainly for a one-year term.

The Deputy Prime Minister will also know that the budget deficit and its figures were all based on much lower interest carrying costs on the national debt.

What action does the Deputy Prime Minister now propose with respect to the Borrowing Authority Act that is now before the House, and with respect to the deficit of the Government, in view of this enormous increase which has taken place in the last week in the cost of carrying funded debt by the Government?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, at the moment I would not believe that any particular action is justified with respect either to the Bill on the borrowing authority or any other aspect of government policy. The Hon. Member has talked about a development that is one week old, as he said. As I have pointed out, we have had similar incidents in the past which have corrected themselves. This may be quite another one of those. I do not think that the present change in the value of the Canadian dollar represents a fundamental weakness in the Canadian dollar; quite the contrary.

MAGNITUDE OF GOVERNMENT'S BORROWING DEMANDS

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, would the Deputy Prime Minister agree with Mr. Paul Volcker of the American Federal Exchange who, yesterday, said to a committee of Congress that deficits of the magnitude suggested forced interest rates substantially higher than they would otherwise be?

Would he also agree that the present borrowing demands of the Government exceed 91 per cent of estimated gross domestic savings? Will he tell the House and the country how people can hope to have a mortgage on their home, to borrow money for a business to put people back to work, with the interest rates that are now being forced upon the Canadian public?

Miss MacDonald: Try to understand it, Allan.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member asks me whether I agree with Mr. Volcker, Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, when he talks about the deficit. First of all, I should like to know what time span the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board was talking about. Was he talking about 1984, 1985, or 1986?

As I understand the situation in the United States, I think the concern that has been expressed is directed more particularly to what the authorities call the "out" years and the failure to take action on that deficit not necessarily in 1984, but beyond. If the question is put in that context, then I agree with what Mr. Volcker has to say.

ENERGY

JURISDICTION OVER NEWFOUNDLAND OFFSHORE RESOURCES—REQUEST FOR RESUMPTION OF NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Now that the legal question of offshore jurisdiction is behind us, is the Minister prepared to move quickly on a settlement of the political issues involved in the offshore? Is he prepared to take advantage of the presence in Ottawa of the Premier of Newfoundland and of the Minister of Energy for Newfoundland, and resume the talks?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that the situation has been clarified and that the Supreme Court has given jurisdiction to the national Government.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: As everyone knows, when I tried very hard a year ago to reach an agreement with the Government of Newfoundland before there was a decision in the court, I did not quit the negotiation table; it was the Minister from Newfoundland who quit.

Pending an agrement with the Province, the federal Government will administer the resources offshore of Newfoundland and make sure, because the climate will be better now, that there will be no conflict of jurisdiction. That will create a very good climate for investment.

I am very happy to have a Member from Newfoundland attached to my Department as Minister of State for Mines. He will make sure that the development of these resources in the future, pending an agreement with Newfoundland, will be in the best interests of the people of Newfoundland, and will make sure that the maximum benefit possible will go to them. When we do that, we know that it is in the best interests of Canada as a whole.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Leader! Leader!

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who aspires to the leadership of the country, would take the high road in dealing with these questions. I now give him that opportunity.

POLITICAL SETTLEMENT

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, is the Minister prepared to take the leadership and resume negotiations with the Province of Newfoundland on the basis of the necessity of a political settlement, and on the basis of dealing generously and magnanimously with one of the provinces of this country?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite ready to take the leadership; I am reflecting on that.

If Mr. Marshall and Mr. Peckford want to see me, I am available, and I always have been available. I went back to Newfoundland many times to meet with them. One time, some reporters even tried to organize a meeting when Mr. Marshall was in the same room as I was, but he did not want to talk about the issues. Everyone knows that I want to settle this problem. I always wanted to settle it, but now the court has decided. If it is federal jurisdiction, that does not mean that it is not good for the people of Newfoundland. The Government of Canada serves the people of Newfoundland too—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: —and at times, much better. That is why I say that, if they want to talk with me, I am available. I am telling the people of Newfoundland that I do not want to play politics with them.

Mr. Crosbie: Oh, no!

Mr. McGrath: What are you doing now?

• (1440)

Mr. Chrétien: I just say that it will be developed in the best interests of the people of Newfoundland, and the fact that there will be no fight between the two Governments is a positive factor for investment. Of course we will have to talk with the provincial Government of Newfoundland because it has an interest in that. I hope it will come to the point of reaching an agreement. However, I am informed—I hope it is wrong—that Premier Peckford has already said that he will not negotiate with me, and you should check with him before asking the question.

GOVERNMENT'S INTENTIONS

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question as well is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I wonder if the people across the way, who do not even have a policy on the offshore, or at least cannot make up their minds among themselves what their policy is, can be quiet. I ask this supplementary question on behalf of the people of Newfoundland—

Mr. Crosbie: Send a boy on a man's mission.

Mr. Tobin: —who are interested in hearing the Minister's answer, not like the Hon. Member for St. John's East who is interested in playing games.

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Would the Hon. Member please ask his question?

Mr. Tobin: I do not know whether it is possible, Mr. Speaker, at this stage to negotiate an agreement, but assuming that a Government which cares about co-operation, not confrontation, comes to Newfoundland, can the Minister assure this House that it is still the intention of the Government of Canada to see that, the day an agreement is negotiated, the lion's share of revenues come to the Province of Newfoundland—

Mr. Crosbie: Sit down, Judas.

Mr. Tobin: —where those resources are located?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Judas told them.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the federal Government has always wanted to negotiate an agreement which will serve the best interests of the people of Newfoundland. We have always offered some sharing in revenue. I will have to see what will happen in the next days, because already I am informed that the Premier of Newfoundland said he will wait for another Government before he negotiates.

Mr. Crosbie: Good idea.

Mr. Chrétien: He might, Mr. Speaker, have to wait a hell of a long time.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: We want Joe.

Mr. Chrétien: I have been able, Mr. Speaker, to reach agreements easily with Saskatchewan, with Alberta, and with Nova Scotia.

Mr. Crosbie: Where is John Turner when we need him?

Mr. Chrétien: How come I cannot make an agreement with the Government of Newfoundland?

Mr. Dick: You are supposed to answer questions.

Mr. Chrétien: Some questions should be asked that way. I had no problem making a deal with Premier Lougheed or Premier Devine, who are not Liberals, but who put their interest in solving problems before their political interests.

Some Hon. Members: More!

Some Hon. Members: Bring back Joe.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I assume the Minister of Energy is saying to himself: "If only the applause from my Liberal colleagues could be translated into votes at the convention. Will they love me in September like they do in May?" And I am sure the Minister wants to dismiss the gratuitous comments of the almost Minister of Youth—

Mr. Crosbie: The juvenile delinquent.

MINISTER'S APPROACH TO NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Brian Mulroney (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the importance of the matter, which the Minister has always taken seriously, in light of the judgment rendered today by the Supreme Court, can the Minister give this House the assurance that he will enter into those negotiations acknowledging that past positions ought not necessarily to apply, and that any possible decision which does result can result from positions different from those previously taken by the federal Government, and must be of the greatest benefit to the people of Newfoundland and Labrador? Can the Minister give us the assurance that he will look at this, now that the matter has been settled—

Mr. Tobin: He can't bring back Labrador City.

Mr. Mulroney: —in a brand new perspective of giving to the people of Newfoundland and Labrador the type of settlement which they genuinely need and want with regard to the offshore?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I tried very hard last year to reach a settlement. We have made two good offers to the Government of Newfoundland, which it has rejected. I guess if it wants to talk, it should come with the solution to the problem. Of course I am willing to meet with them, discuss the problems, and try to find a solution. The only preoccupation I have is to make sure that these resources are developed as fast as possible, as orderly as possible, and to make sure that the economic benefit will belong to the people of Newfoundland first. Because if we can help the people of Newfoundland better their economic and social standing, Canada will be better for that.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Chrétien for leader!

Mr. Chrétien: Again I urge the Leader of the Opposition, and the Hon. Member in the Opposition from Newfoundland, to tell Premier Peckford that the people of Newfoundland need a settlement and the political game is over, that it is the interests of the people of Newfoundland, not of the Government, which are at stake, and that Canadians want a solution. I was able to make a deal on the Constitution and on energy with the other Provinces. It is only with Newfoundland that I can never make a deal. It is a bit frustrating.

MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Brian Mulroney (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am very encouraged by the response of the Minister of Energy, and I commend him for it.

The Minister said in respect to the negotiations which must take place, and I believe I am quoting him accurately: "The resources should belong to the people of Newfoundland first". I believe that is a direct quotation. I commend the Minister on that attitude because I believe I can probably conclude from it that the Minister is sending out a clear signal to the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador, saying: "Come and meet me for early negotiations and I will not be hidebound by positions which I have taken in the past". Is that the position? If that is so, I encourage the Minister because this is genuine, co-operative federalism, and I urge him along that road. This will benefit Newfoundland and Labrador.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I said, Mr. Speaker, that the benefit from the development of the resources should first benefit the people of Newfoundland. I make a big distinction between these people and the Government of Newfoundland. The federal Government can administer the programs under federal jurisdiction which benefit the people of Newfoundland. The Supreme Court of Canada has given jurisdiction over these resources to the federal Government. It is not for me, therefore, to decide against the Supreme Court.

What we need is an agreement to make sure that the development of these resources benefits first the people of Newfoundland and, in doing that, all Canada benefits from such a deal. However, the decision of the Supreme Court is clear. It is now a constitutional reality that the offshore resources of Newfoundland are under federal jurisdiction.

STATUS OF WOMEN

NEED FOR AFFIRMATIVE ACTION COMPLIANCE

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board, and I think it is suitably asked today on International Women's Day. I believe all Hon. Members of this House know that the track record of the Liberals in terms of words but not action is clearly illustrated in their approach to affirmative action for women in the private sector.

The Minister responsible for the status of women, just two years ago said that the voluntary program "is not even moderately effective". Since the Minister and his Government have had no problem instituting contract compliance for the six and five wage restraints, I wonder if the Minister would tell this House whether or not he is prepared to introduce contract compliance immediately so that all companies with over 50 employees, which are dealing directly with the federal Government, are required to have affirmative action programs for women in place?

Hon. Herb Gray (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, this is something which I think deserves to be looked at, not just by myself but by the Minister of Supply and Services, who is the Minister in charge of the government contracting and purchasing activities. However, having said that, Mr. Speaker, I feel I should make clear to my hon. friend that when it comes to affirmative action in the federal Government itself, the program we have in place is not just a voluntary one. We are extending across the Public Service, on a phased step-by-step basis, a very strong and effective program, covering not only women but also the handicapped and indigenous people.

Last Fall I announced a service-wide target to increase substantially the number of women in the management category. Therefore, we do not have a limited program in the Public Service when it comes to affirmative action. We have a strong and effective one, and I hope it will have my hon. friend's support.

PUBLIC SERVICE—COMPARISON WITH FRANCOPHONE AFFIRMATIVE ACTION PROGRAM

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board has made it quite clear to Members of this House that there is no contract compliance in the federal Government.

Would the Minister rise in his place and respond to the stark contrast between what has happened to women regarding affirmative action in the federal Government and what has happened to francophones in the Public Service? Three years after implementation of the Official Languages Act, francophones were represented in all job categories in the federal Government, at all wage levels, proportionate to their presence in the population and the Public Service. Would the Minister agree today to introduce a similar kind of program related to affirmative action as was brought in under the Official Languages Act?

Hon. Herb Gray (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, our affirmative action program went into place last June.

Miss MacDonald: It went into place in 1975, and you have been dragging your feet ever since.

Mr. Gray: When we look at the program—my hon. friend is way out of touch. It went into place in the federal Government on a limited, pilot project basis, in three Departments. We put in place a program extending across the entire Public Service, last June. When Parliament looks at this issue three years from the end of last June, I predict we will see the kind of progress we have seen with francophones and we will be very proud of the results. I am not sure my hon. friend will be here, but those of us who are—and I think a lot of us will be here—will be very proud of those results.

Miss MacDonald: You ought to be ashamed of yourself.

NATIONAL REVENUE

TAXATION OF EMPLOYEE BENEFITS

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, my question was for the Minister of National Revenue, who has flown the coop. He must have thought today was his day off. Therefore, I will ask my question of the Deputy Prime Minister.

I have in my hands an internal report of Revenue Canada, concerning taxable benefits. The Deputy Prime Minister will remember this resulted from the Budget he brought down. This document attempts to analyse how they can wring taxes out of the average working person for such benefits as low rental housing, parking, and daycare provided by employers. The report concludes that the Department must either establish a consistent approach to the taxation of employee benefits, or vacate the area entirely. It says the Department should not continue to assess in a random and often unfair manner.

In view of the inequitable application and administration by the Department of National Revenue in its attempt to collect tax on these benefits to employees, is the Government considering withholding the imposition of taxes on these benefits until such time as it can bring forward a rational collection basis?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member will have noted that the Minister of National Revenue was in his seat when Question Period started, and was there for quite some considerable time. The Hon. Member had an opportunity to ask his question. If he wants an answer from me, the answer is no.

TAXATION OF DAYCARE BENEFITS

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that today is International Women's Day, can the Deputy Prime Minister answer on behalf of the Government whether or not it is the Government's policy to continue wringing every cent possible out of those people who are least able to protect themselves, namely, working women, with respect to taxing daycare benefits? Very often these women are the heads of single parent families. Does the mean spiritedness of this Government extend to continuing a policy of taxing these people who are attempting to contribute to society by working and producing an income for their families?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): If the term "mean spirited" can be applied to anything, it can be applied to the question the Hon. Member asked.

CULTURAL AFFAIRS

INDEPENDENCE OF CANADA COUNCIL AND CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications, who may know there is a report out of Southam News this morning that the Government intends to bring in legislation which would give it the power, through the Financial Administration Act, to erode the traditional independence of federal government cultural agencies such as the Canada Council and the CBC. If this is the case, then that of course violates the long standing principle that we should make sure our cultural and artistic life is separated and distant from political interference and control.

This is a very important matter, so I ask the Minister if the report is true and, if so, will he explain the Government's position to the House?

Hon. Francis Fox (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member knows, he will have to await the tabling of the legislation to see what is in it. We already have in front of the House Bill C-20, which explains the Government's position concerning the CRTC and the CFDC. He will see, by reading the type of legislation in Bill C-20, that it is not the Government's intention to intervene to fix program content or determine who ought to be getting grants. My position has always been that there has to be an arm's length relationship between the Government and the various cultural agencies in all matters requiring judgment on values and program content.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT—REQUEST FOR EXCLUSION OF CULTURAL AGENCIES

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Minister understands that the basic issue here is artistic and cultural freedom. What is also important to understand is that the Appelbaum-Hebert Commission strongly urged the Government and this House to make sure that any change in the Financial Administration Act would exclude cultural agencies, to ensure that arm's length treatment the Minister spoke about. Will the Minister assure this House that if there is any chance that the cultural agencies will have their autonomy diminished by the Financial Administration Act, he will move, as the Clark Government did in 1979, to make sure those cultural agencies are excluded from that control?
