are seeking what you shall do in a particular emergency, to cite precedents and to appeal to precedents which have relation to a condition of things altogether dissimilar from the conditions with which you are for the moment face to face. A great statesman whose name my historical knowledge does not enable me to recall with absolute certainty uttered a memorable aphorism in a time of revolutionary excitement and revolutionary disorder and irregularity, to the sticklers for constitutional law, and sticklers for parliamentary propriety, who insisted that they should go only on precedent, when he said: There is no use asking for precedents when you have a condition of things which is without precedent. When a man gets lost in the woods there is not much use in his protesting that he will walk nowhere but upon the King's highway. When he is in the woods the best thing for him to do is to find the shortest way out to the highway. The present Government were not in the woods it is true, but this country itself had been led into the thickest kind of a wood under the guidance of the present leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper). It was really an unprecedented condition. We were, figuratively speaking, in the woods, both financially and constitutionally, and had been led into that condition under the unskillful guidance of that hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper). I say that, under such circumstances, the only thing for the present leader of the Government to do was to find the shortest and clearest path out to the Queen's highway. That course the Prime Minister of Canada adopted. I am quite prepared to assert the propriety of his conduct in so doing. Even suppose his act had not strict legal sanction, if it were necessary to prevent the disastrous condition of things which was so graphically portrayed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), and also by my hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), it was the duty of the First Minister to avoid these difficulties and dangers. This House does not and this Government does not need any arguments in vindication of such a principle as that, even assuming the course pursued by the Government to be without strict legal warrant. But apart from that line of defence altogether, I am prepared to argue, rightly or wrongly, wisely or unwisely, skilfully or unskilfully, as this House may judge, that the Government was also strictly and legally right in the course it adopted; and as one member of the House I am prepared to take the responsibility of voting that the action of the Government has been strictly legal and regular and proper, and in accordance with the statute under which they proceeded. And, Sir, in dealing with the legal aspects of the subject, let me refer to the remarks of my honourable and very highly esteemed colleague who sits on the other side of the House (Mr. Porden, of Halifax).

There is no hon. gentleman in this House for whose legal judgment I have greater respect ; and, had he addressed to this House a legal argument on this subject, such as he would address to the Supreme Court of his province or to the Supreme Court of this Dominion, I am sure I would have listened to it with the profoundest interest. In opening his speech he promised us that kind of an argument. He said that it was because this was a legal question that he entered into the discussion of it. But I am sure that before he had been on his feet three minutes by the clock, he left the legal aspect of the question, and launched out upon the wild and shoreless ocean of political controversy and partisan recrimination. He attempted to state the question which was really the only question at issue, namely, the question what this Government, or any government in the position of this Government, should have done in the circumstances in which it found itself on the 14th of July of this present year ; and he amazed me by saying, in answer to that question, that he would not undertake to say what the Government should have done under those circumstances. Well, if my learned friend had no suggestion to make, if he had no light to throw on that crucial and burning question, the only question in the case in which the people of this country take the slightest interest, then it seems to me he had nothing whatever to contribute to the solution of the real issue now before this House. He absolutely dodged that question ; he failed to give any answer to it ; but he thought that it was a sufficient reply to ask : "Why did you hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House not think of that as a question likely to arise when you obstructed the Estimates in the session which began on the 2nd of January of the present year ?" Now, that is not a legal argument at all. That is a political argument, and as such it is a very fair and legitimate argument to use, but it has been fairly and reasonably answered over and over again. I maintain that it is entirely distinct from any legal argument that could be addressed to this House. Jane Welsh Carlyle used to say that it was the mixing of things that was the great bad ; and it is an absolute absurdity, when undertaking to discuss this question as a legal question, to import into it those political controversies to which my hon. friend turned his attention before he had been speaking five minutes. The test of the hon. gentleman's reply, as a legal argument, is this. Suppose that some hon. gentlemen had been elected to this House and had been entrusted with the administration of affairs of this country, who were in no way connected with the so-called obstruction of which he complains ; granted that it was ever so bad and improper ; waiving every consideration as to the character of that obstruction ; I say, supposing that we had sitting in the seats of power at the present moment a government altogether irresponsible for it, having had no connection with it, would my hon. friend's legal argument, such as he made, then have had any relevancy to the issue now before us ? He tells us, and he tells us truly, that the answer to the legal question can never be allowed to depend on the accident of which political party is in power. I accede to that proposition absolutely and entirely. He says that it is an accident that the Liberal party is in power in this country. Grant for the sake of argument that it is an accident. Suppose the accident had turned out otherwise, and that another party which had no connection whatever with the so-called obstruction of the late Opposition had come into power—which is among the possibilities, with which we must deal when testing a legal argument ; suppose, for example, that those good and honest men, the Patrons of Industry, had had the good fortune to sweep the constituencies of this whole Dominion and to secure a majority of the votes in this House, and had been in a position to dictate who should rule this country for the next five years ; suppose that from the 23rd of June, when the elections took place, down to the 16th of July, when this question arose, the kaleidoscopic changes in the administration had been as great, as numerous, as startling, and almost as shocking, as they were in an equivalent period before the 23rd of June ; suppose that as a result of those changes, we had in power a Government led by a man fully pledged to the Patrons of Industry, and depending upon them for his support as a political leader ; and suppose the leader of such a Government had on the 16th day of July advised the issue of these warrants ; how would my hon. friend have retaliated upon him ? He could not have charged him with having been guilty of obstruction and having brought about the condition of things which existed when these warrants were issued. He would have been obliged to deal with the question solely as a legal one, without any of the political recriminations that he threw across the floor in the course of his speech. The legal question would then have been precisely the same as it is now, and would have had to be answered by precisely the same considerations with which it has to be answered now. So that the legal proposition which my hon. friend undertook to discuss ought to be divorced from any political questions arising out of the transactions of the previous Parliament, with which hon. gentlemen opposite have mixed it, only to obscure the real issue pending before the House at this hour.

Now let me come to the discussion of that legal question myself. I know that the discussion of a legal question is apt to be a very dry and dull and uninteresting affair to this or any other assembly, and I know that we lawyers have almost to apologize for our existence and our attempts to enlighten our friends on such questions ; and

I do, before commencing, enter a most humble and abject apology for undertaking to discuss the legal question before this House, which some hon. gentlemen have studiously avoided. However, it is necessary that I should do so, in order to analyse to some extent the words of the statute under consideration, which it seems to me have been somewhat misconstrued. I am inclined to accede to the argument of my hon. friends opposite that this statute does require two conditions precedent to the issue of such a warrant as is provided for. I am inclined to accede to the argument, which was very strongly and clearly stated by the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) that, under the provisions of subsection "b" of section 32 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, you must have a case which is not only not provided for, but which is also not foreseen. I am inclined to accept that as being a fair interpretation of the statute, but my hon. friends will have to admit that it is not its literal meaning. In order to come to the conclusion they adopt, they must depart from the mere letter of the statute and put on it an interpretation which is not severely and exactly grammatical. They have to give the word "or" a meaning which is not usual to it, and convert it into the word "and." They have to do some violence to the statute, though in so doing, I freely admit the probability that they arrive at the true construction of the statute. But if my hon. friends are so generous in their treatment of the conjunction, will they not be equally generous with us when we discuss the adjective and the substantive? If they are going to ask for concessions from us when they are tithing the mint, anise and cummin, will they not permit a similar course when it comes to the consideration of the weightier matters of the law? My proposition is this, that you can take either the literal or the sensible construction of the statute. If you take the literal construction, it is quite sufficient to invoke the words of the statute in order to justify the issue of the warrants in question. All that is required is that the expenditure be unprovided for, even though it be not unforeseen. I do not assent to that as the proper construction of the statute. I think it is a literal but not a sensible construction. On the other hand, if you are going to depart from the mere literal interpretation and give the statute a sensible construction, according to its true intention, you must conclude that the expenditure in question was an unforeseen expenditure. It was foreseen in a dry, barren, literal and grammatical sense of the word. It was an expenditure which everybody could have foreseen in February or January last, but it was an expenditure as to which no human being could possibly have foreseen the circumstances which led to its not having been provided for. In that sense of the term, which is, to my mind, a fair and just sense of the term, it was really an unforeseen expenditure.

Mr. FOSTER. Is my hon. friend aware that before the Supply Bill was passed, the statement was made from the Government side of the House that the new Parliament would be called together, not before, but on or about the middle of July, so that from that time forward the House knew the whole circumstances—knew that no Parliament could meet before the 15th of July, and yet this second warrant was issued on the 18th of August?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We could have met on the 5th of July easily.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am aware of that statement having been made; but the hon. gentleman in his speech, as I heard him distinctly, admitted that Parliament might have met, and could have met, on the 2nd of July.

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all.

Mr. RUSSELL. It is not possible for me to be certain that I heard the hon. member correctly, but the same statement, if I caught it correctly, is made in the resolution tabled by the hon. gentleman, "that Parliament would probably meet shortly after the 2nd of July." In any case, I cannot concede that it was positively and absolutely certain that this House could not have met before the 16th July. On the contrary, I think it might have met considerably before the 16th July. Even if I were disposed to concede the whole point, as claimed by the hon. ex-Finance Minister, that this House could not meet before the 16th July, it is admitted that it could not have been foreseen that the House would not be able, at all events, to sit on the 16th of July and take steps to provide for the public necessities in the ordinary way, instead of applying for Governor General's warrant on that date. I do not, however, press that point very strenuously. My argument is, that this statute is applicable whenever the expenditure is wholly of an unforeseen character, in the literal sense of the term, or when, being of a kind that could have been foreseen, the circumstances that prevented its being provided for could not have been foreseen. I take it that the statute applies whenever the circumstances are such that it could not have been foreseen that the expenditure would not, and could not, be provided for when required. If that be a fair reading of the statute, I should like to know if anybody could have foreseen that this Parliament could not meet in time to provide for this expenditure. Was it an absolutely foreseen circumstance that the elections could not have been held before the 23rd June? Was it absolutely necessary that two months should elapse before the late Government was in a position to appeal to the electorate? Was it absolutely foreseen, assuming that the elections were to take place on the 23rd of June, that the late Government, after the verdict of the country had been rendered against them, would cling to their offices until the 10th of July, wholly without justification, in view of the peculiar condition of the public affairs of the country? Could it have been foreseen that the proceedings which led to the formation of the present Government would occupy further time in necessary appeals to the constituencies, which made it essential in the best interests of the country that Parliament should not come together until the 19th of August, although it had been called to meet on the 16th of July? Without any hesitation whatever, I say that in respect of these three particulars that I have mentioned, the expenditure was not, and could not have been, foreseen.

Let me go one step further, and say that, even if, as a matter of the technical reading of the statute, you cannot read it in the sense I do, the condition of things which actually had arisen brings the case within the equity of the statute. If you have one condition of things expressly provided for in the statute by express terms, and then you have another analogous condition of things which is not provided for by the express terms of the statute, and if you are able to draw the inference that, if the mind of the legislature had been directed to that analogous condition of things which is not expressly provided for in the statute, it would have taken pains to provide for it exactly as it did expressly provide for the other condition, then you are at liberty to hold that the statute, by this enlarged construction does include the analogous condition as well as the one which is covered by its express terms. Whichever way you put the matter then I contend that this was an unforeseen expenditure in the true and fair sense that the circumstances which led to its being unprovided for were unforeseen. If the legislature which passed the Audit Act—I think it was in 1878—had anticipated the very condition of things which we saw in this country on the 14th January, 1896, they would certainly have made express provision to meet that contingency—even if you do not hold that it is already covered by the express terms of the Act—whichever way you take it, the expenditure is amply and abundantly and legally justified by the terms of the statute. If you are going to read it literally, you, of course, arrive at the same conclusion by a far easier course; but if you are going to read it sensibly, equitably and according to the fair intention of the statute, and with reasonable regard to the condition of things that it was meant to cover, I say it is proper and reasonable to read it in the way I have read it.

There is only one point more that I would urge, and that is with reference to the citation which was made by the hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. McInerney) from Todd's book on Parliamentary Government in the Colonies. I am not going to say that the hon. gentleman used in any unfair way the book he then had in his hand, but I do say that if he had taken the pains to read a little more to himself, he probably would not have read any of it to the House; and if he had read a little more to the House he would have thrown a light on the discussion which would not have been welcomed by the other side. He read the passage referring to the particular circumstances of the case in which the Colonial Secretary, Earl Granville, had written a despatch pointing out that the action of the Colonial government which he was then dealing with had been at variance with instructions which had been given. I am not going to weary the House by going into a statement of the facts of the case referred to, because I know how wearisome and tedious this argument must be. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. McInerney) called attention to an expression to which it was very proper for him to call attention and which was a very forcible expression in the connection in which he read it. But he failed to read these words from the despatch of Lord Granville:

Except in cases of absolute and immediate necessity (such, for example, as the preservation of life), no expenditure of public money should be incurred without sanction of law.

That is an expression of opinion with which nobody quarrels. But here is a qualification that is of the utmost importance:

Unless it may be presumed, not only that both branches of the legislature will hold that it is unobjectionable—

That is this case exactly—

—but also that they will approve of the expenditure being made in anticipation of their consent.

Now, I want to know if that does not absolutely and comprehensively cover the case before us to-day? Is not this expenditure one that comes within this rule? Is it not an expenditure as to which it is fair and reasonable and natural to presume—as to which the presumption is practically irresistible—not only that both branches of the legislature will hold it to be unobjectionable, but also that they will approve of the expenditure having been made in anticipation of their consent. If I were making a wager—and it would be unparliamentary and improper to do so—I would give heavy odds that both branches of the legislature will hold it to be unobjectionable and will support the Government in making it without waiting for the formal consent of Parliament. Why, it must be so. If you go back to the question I referred to at the outset of these remarks and consider what would have happened—as the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) has asked, as the people have been asking and have answered without hesitation or qualification,—what would have happened if, on the 16th of July last the Government had not taken the perfectly fair, somewhat heroic, perhaps, but perfectly fair and reasonable and proper course of providing, as they did, for the public service. Was the ship of state to come to a standstill because it had a new commander? Were the crew to starve and languish; was no sail to be set, and no headway made? Was it all to be like the craft in the rhyme "Ancient Mariner":

To return from metaphor to facts, were the canal labourers and employees to be discharged? Were the railway officials to go out of business, and were we to have a strike almost as large as that inaugurated by Mr. Debs in the American republic? Was the Government to fail in the discharge of its duties as common carriers on its railways? Were the lighthouses to be unprovided for and the lights to be allowed to go out? All this must have happened and would have happened, together with a great deal of pecuniary distress and domestic unhappiness if the Government had not made the provision that it did make on the 16th July for the absolutely necessary expenditures for the public service. And yet gentlemen opposite say, if they say anything, that this is exactly what the Government ought to have done.

And the argument is put thus: If this sort of thing can be done, if these Governor General's warrants can be issued, and if the Government can go on from the 16th July to the 16th August, why not to the 16th September, to October, November, and so on through the rest of the year, never calling Parliament together at all and finding supplies by means of Governor General's warrants? That is a kind of argument that does stagger some people, but I have heard it so often, that, to me, the edge has become a little dulled. Why, if we stop to think of all the things that could be legally and constitutionally done, some of us who are as timid and as apprehensive as the ex-Minister of Finance seems to be would hardly be able to sleep in our beds. Bagehot, in the introduction to the last edition of his work on the English Constitution says, that some people would be very greatly surprised if they knew the kind of things that the Queen could do. She could disband the army and dismiss all the officers from the general commanding downward. She could dismiss all the sailors; she could sell all the ships of war and all the naval stores; she could make peace by the sacrifice of Cornwall; she could make every citizen a peer; she could dismiss all the civil servants. Perhaps it might solve the question we were discussing the other day if Her Majesty would come over to this side of the water and exercise a little of this power—and she could pardon all offenders, which would be a sweet consolation to the front benches on the other side of the House. Why don't any of these terrible things ever happen to us? Merely because of the saving common sense, the saving constitutional sense, which prevents the abuse of powers which it is absolutely necessary some person should possess in order to forward the public interests of the whole country. I think that saving common sense is in the breasts of the people of this country. We may argue about this thing all night, we may spend late hours, and burn the midnight oil; we may weary ourselves to death over this matter; but I can give my word of honour to hon. gentlemen opposite that there is not in the breast of a single farmer, or a single fisherman, or a single miner, or a single person outside this Chamber, in all this broad Dominion, the least concerned over this matter; there is not a particle of agitation over this question, there is not a particle of public apprehension. On the contrary, there is an absolute consensus of opinion upon the propriety of the step that was taken by the Government as being an absolutely necessary and proper step to be taken, in the conditions in which they found themselves; and for that reason I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that I am prepared to vote against the amendment offered by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster).

Mr. CHAUVIN. Before submitting to this House in my own language some few arguments on this question, I desire to submit one argument in English, because, I think, it is a strong one. I am not prepared to blame the Government for the first warrant. I do not think they are very guilty for issuing the first warrant. I cannot agree with my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Russell) in the opinion that this question is not a very important one. On that point I think that a better authority than the fisherman or the farmer whose opinion is quoted by the hon. gentleman is the letter of the Governor General himself. The Governor General himself thought that the question was of sufficient importance to warrant him in obtaining the advice of the Minister of Justice, even before he issued the first warrant. I have that letter in French, but it is needless to translate it into English. The letter is written by the Prime Minister to Sir Oliver Mowat, the Minister of Justice, asking his opinion about the propriety of issuing the first warrant. Well, that means that the Prime Minister thought the question was important enough to justify him in obtaining the opinion of the Minister of Justice upon the right of the Governor General to issue that first warrant. That is my answer to the statement of the hon. gentleman from Halifax that this was not an important question. But, Sir, from my point of view, I do not think the Government is very much to blame for issuing the first warrant; if anybody is to blame it is the Liberal party, because during the last session of Parliament they frustrated the wishes of the majority of this House by preventing this House from granting the subsidies necessary to carry on the public service. But that offence has been condoned by the electors. I do not mean to say that the verdict of June 23rd is an approval of the obstructive tactics resorted to by the Liberal party; but I say that the election is over now, and as a consequence of it, a new Government is in power. Now, Sir, I wish to be fair and just towards the new Government. This Government has among its members some gentlemen who were not members of the last Parliament, and were not responsible for the obstruction of which the Liberal party was guilty. When the new Government came into power they were confronted with a condition of things which had to be met, and in consequence of that condition of things I admit that the first warrant, in a certain sense, and under reserve of the arguments that I am about to present in French, was legitimate. But I am not prepared to admit that the second warrant issued on the eve of the opening of Parliament, was also legitimate, though some hon. members pretend that it is legal. Well, I do not contend even that the second warrant was neither legitimate nor legal. Hon. gentlemen before me have spoken about interpreting the statute in a liberal spirit. Well, I pretend that it is putting a most liberal interpretation upon the statute to say that the second warrant was legitimate and legal. Now, the second warrant was issued on the eve of the opening of Parliament, even on the day previous to the opening of Parliament. Perhaps, as has been contended by some hon. gentlemen, that action was according to the letter of the statute, which says that when Parliament is not in session a warrant may issue under certain circumstances. But I think the Government was not sincere in that action, because exactly on the day previous to the opening of the session they issued the second warrant, and I pretend that if that is according to the letter of the statute, it is certainly against a liberal interpretation of the statute. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, if I rise in my place, it is not that I intend to participate at any length in this debate, but it is with a view to placing in bold relief before the House a principle, that of the supreme power of the people, the principle of responsible government, which is the object of this debate. That principle, Sir, every one admits, is that which secures to the representatives of the people in Parliament the absolute control of the public money. Where is the man, Sir, who is not conversant with our historic political struggles to obtain representative government in this country? And, Sir, I may say that one of the salient features of our system of responsible government, gained after such a long struggle, is, as hon. gentlemen all know, the principle that the representatives of the people hold within their power the supply for the administration of the services of the country. Previous to responsible government having been gained, the expenditure of the people's money was controlled by the governor and by a legislative council, who were not even responsible to the people. And, Sir, it is not without a feeling of legitimate pride that I tell the House that, throughout those long years of struggle which culminated in the securing of responsible government, and in the gaining by the representatives of the people in Parliament of the undoubted and absolute control of public money, my fellow-countrymen, the French Canadians, fought to the fore. It is on record, Sir, that French Canadians stood to their guns and joined hands with the few English-speaking citizens who were opposed to the rule of English oligarchy in this country; and it was also from the ranks of the French Canadian people that sprang up those men whose fame is imperishable, who led the combatants to victory, and succeeded in giving Canada political freedom. To these men, Sir, we are indebted for the well-understood practice of free parliamentary institutions, which we now enjoy under the ægis of Great Britain.

Now, Sir, as I said in my opening remarks to the House, I hold that the Liberal party alone is responsible for the state of things prevailing here since the 1st July, 1896. On the Liberal party alone, I say, rests that responsibility, because I do not want, out of a mere desire of finding fault with them, hold the Government of the day responsible for the obstruction which occurred in this House last session of Parliament. The Government of the day is largely composed of new men who were not members of the late Parliament, and cannot, therefore, be held responsible—unless they be held jointly responsible as a party—for the obstruction which took place at the last session of Parliament. To that obstruction alone, I hold, is to be attributed the condition of things which prevailed when the new Government came into power. Indeed, Sir, the dying days of last Parliament witnessed an unprecedented fact in our parliamentary records: that of a majority of this House rendered powerless and coerced by an insignificant minority in Parliament. That majority was ready to pass the Supply asked for by the Executive for the administration of the services of the country, but the minority which, as such, was not enjoying the confidence of the majority in the country, succeeded in overriding the will of Parliament, as voiced by the majority, and in obstructing the passage of the supply asked for by the Executive to defray the expenditures of the services of the country, at least until the 1st July last. Now, Sir, the people, later on, have pronounced their verdict, and I shall not undertake to say that by that verdict they did endorse the policy of obstruction of which the present state of things is the direct outcome ; and the more so, as that topic was but seldom referred to before the people during the last election. Our opponents did not undertake to deal with that question on the hustings, being fully alive to the fact that the course they had pursued in Parliament was far from being creditable to them. The electors pronounced themselves on other issues, and particularly on a vital question which, as the hon. First Minister is well aware, was the primary cause of his being returned to power, owing to the vote of the province of Quebec, through which he holds the balance of power which constitutes his majority in this House. By reason of the policy of obstruction carried out by the Liberal party at the last session the Government of the day, when they came into power, were confronted with an extraordinary and critical condition of affairs. So critical, indeed, was the position that His Excellency the Governor General himself thought fit, in order to relieve his anxiety, to ask the opinion of the Minister of Justice (Sir Oliver Mowat), previous to acquiescing in the demand of the hon. First Minister (Mr. Laurier) who had asked to be authorized to appropriate a certain sum of money for the administration of the services of the country. I shall not vote censure on the Government of the day for issuing the first warrant, provided they show clearly to the House that they could not call Parliament together at the appointed date. If the hon. gentlemen opposite clearly and conclusively show us, resting their case on English precedents, that the Government could not call Parliament to meet for the prosecution of business on 16th July, then I say—and then only I shall not vote censure on the Government for its issuing the first warrant. But should the Government be unable to make that point, and to show good grounds for their delay in calling Parliament together on the day appointed, then I say it shall be my duty to vote censure on them for issuing both warrants. It must be borne in mind that the first warrant was issued on the eve of the day fixed for the meeting of Parliament, the 16th July, and that the second warrant was issued on the very day preceding the opening of Parliament, called together by the Government of the day.

I do not feel I can endorse the opinion of some hon. gentlemen on this side of the House who are willing to exonerate the Government from blame for issuing the first warrant, but feel that they cannot endorse their action with regard to the issue of the second warrant. For my part, Sir, I hold that the Government's action is free from blame only in so far as they can justify it and clearly show to the House that they could not meet Parliament on the 16th July. I maintain that, so far as the issue of the second warrant is concerned, I cannot but censure the action taken by the Government of the day, by reason of their having issued it on the eve of the opening of Parliament, which, to my mind, is altogether indefensible.

There is a second ground on which an attempt is made at justifying the course pursued by the Government in issuing those warrants, and, if I mistake not, it is this : that there was an urgent and immediate necessity for the Government to procure the money wherewith to meet the expenditure of the services of the country, and that, as often remarked, they have made a good use of the money thus appropriated. Supposing the necessity of the case justified the issue of those Governor General's warrants, in order to provide for the requirements of the services of the country, I say this was but another reason why the Government should have made every effort to call Parliament together on the 16th July. Were the Government able to show that they could not open Parliament on that date, I say that would vindicate their action in issuing the first warrant. Admittedly, the Government alone are to be held responsible for the delay in calling Parliament together. The Government would have met with no more opposition from this side of the House, in getting a vote of money from Parliament, than they did experience this week in having an appropriation granted for the annual drill of the militia. No sooner had the Finance Minister asked for the vote in question than it was assented to by the House, which goes to show that the Opposition does not mean to resort to a policy of obstruction. Some hon. gentlemen opposite, I regret to say, have tried to make political capital out of the fact that we, on this side of the House, as they pretended, were unwilling to give the Government a vote of money in favour of those hard-worked employees in the civil service and of those heads of families who were in urgent need of the wages they had honestly earned. Such an imputation, I venture to say, is nothing more or less than a libel on the House and on the Opposition. We, on this side, are willing to grant all just and reasonable demands on the part of the Government, and we are just as ready to concur in any vote asked in behalf of the employees in the civil service as we were to vote the appropriation for the militia. The Government would have found the Opposition quite ready to vote the sums required for the services of the country, had they seen fit to ask for them ; and in so doing, they would have avoided creating a precedent fraught with danger, and one throwing the door open to intolerable abuses of power ; they would have, at the same time, shown less indifference to the rights of the representatives of the people, and better respected the essential prerogatives of ministerial responsibility, and the principles of parliamentary control over the expenditure of public money.

The hon. gentlemen opposite also tell us that the Government are not open to blame in connection with the issue of those warrants, and why? Because, it is contended, they have made a proper and legitimate use of the sums of money appropriated under the two warrants signed by the Governor General. I cannot, for my part, endorse such a statement. Granting that the Government have made a proper use of those warrants, I say that they could not misuse them, because those sums of money were entirely affected to the payment of the services of the country, and could not be applied to any other purpose. But, Sir, I arraign the hon. gentlemen, not only for having appropriated the people's money without the sanction of Parliament, but I arraign them also on another ground: Because they have asked for more money than was required to provide for the services of the country; and, if I mistake not, they have still on hand a pretty considerable balance of the sums taken by Governor General's warrants; a fact which goes to justify our fears and impresses upon us the necessity of insisting upon a more severe control over public expenditure under the present Administration. Why, Sir, shall it be said that we are going back to the days of English oligarchy? Now, I ask the Prime Minister, how it happens that, while claiming to be the political heir of Papineau and Lafontaine, those champions of responsible government, he should, instead of joining hands with this side of the House, side with those who impugn the great principle we are advocating?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). (Translation.) Hear, hear.

Mr. CHAUVIN. (Translation.) The hon. gentleman laughs; and he also laughed last evening when told by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) that it was his duty to vote with us on this question. Were the hon. gentleman willing to remain faithful to the traditions of those great men who so highly prized the principles of parliamentary control over public money, it is with us he should side—

An hon. MEMBER. Order, order.

Mr. CHAUVIN. (Translation.)—instead of joining hands with those who have nullified the prerogatives of this House and the inalienable privileges of the people's representatives. A most sacred mandate was given by our constituents, that of watching over the good administration of the people's money. And we would no longer have any business here, should the doctrine prevail that the procurement of a Governor General's warrant is all that is required to authorize the executive to put their hands into the public treasury and thus provide for the requirements of the services of the country! Were we to tolerate such an usurpation of power, we would be unworthy of the position we occupy here, and prove recreant to our oath of office. I should deem myself unworthy of the mandate my constituents have given me were I not to champion the cardinal prerogative of this House, by speaking and voting in favour of parliamentary control over public expenditure.

For these reasons, Sir, I shall not hesitate to vote in favour of the amendment of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster).

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. Speaker, at this stage of the debate every one knows that it is almost impossible to introduce new arguments; however, I should like to add a few words to what has been already said on this side of the House in connection with the question now brought to our notice on the amendment moved by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster). We all recognize that the circumstances under which Governor General's warrants were obtained were very extraordinary, and such as are not likely to occur again. We all know also that there is no precedent to be found, nothing at all that could have guided the Administration in the course they were compelled to advise under, and we are now called upon under these circumstances on the motion of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), not to express an opinion on the subject, but to vote censure upon the Government of the day. The hon. member opened his address to the House this afternoon by imploring hon. members to consider this matter not from a party standpoint but to look upon it as independent members of the House, and arrive at the conclusion which under the circumstances we felt ourselves justified in reaching. I accept the hon. gentleman's invitation in that sense, and I propose in the vote which I will give to justify at all events to myself, the vote, and to feel that in giving that vote I am voicing my constituents upon the grounds and for the reasons which I will very briefly state.

In my view this question naturally divides itself into two branches: first, the question of policy, and second, the question of law, and if those questions are considered and dealt with, as I think they should be, separately, there will be very little difficulty, if there be legal power, in arriving at a satisfactory conclusion on the question of policy. I am not concerned, Sir, in fact I do not know why this House should concern itself, with the action of the last Parliament. We have no mandate here to condemn the last Parliament. I suppose if the proceedings of that Parliament were now submitted to members of this House they would not receive the approbation of a majority of the members, and they would not be considered from the same point of view as that taken by members of the late House. But we are not concerned with that matter. In the resolution and speech of the hon. gentleman who introduced the motion much stress is laid on the action of the last Parliament, and a good deal of the argument and much of the weight of the censure which the hon. gentleman thinks the Administration responsible for is because of the action of those hon. gentlemen, some of whom were in the last Parliament and some were not. So far as I am concerned as a member of the late Parliament, there is nothing in the least degree in anything I did of which to be ashamed in regard to what is called the granting of supplies. I always thought it was a most extraordinary proceeding on the part of the late Administration to have the presumption to come down some time at the end of January, and not to ask for a vote on account or a vote for a month or two, but to ask Estimates for the present current year. I say that hon. gentlemen did not ask for a portion of this year's Estimates, but they coolly took it for granted on the eve of dissolution that members of the House at that session would be prepared to entrust the then Administration, which was about to appeal to the country, with supplies, not for a portion of the year, but for the whole year. That was what was done. The hon. gentleman has stated in his resolution that from time to time appeals were made to grant a portion of that sum. I question that as a matter of fact. I was here at the time. The ex-Finance Minister can refer me if I am wrong, to the page of "Hansard" in which it is recorded, but I never heard an appeal made to the House for a vote on account or for anything less than a grant of supplies for a whole year. So that the statement on which the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) has based his resolution, if my recollection is to be depended upon, is not accurate, and certainly it is most misleading and most unfair.

Mr. FOSTER. It is accurate.

Mr. McCARTHY. I can only say that I never heard of it. Passing that by, because after all it really has not anything to do with the question, there can be no estoppel, to use a phrase familiar to lawyers, on the part of hon. gentlemen sitting on the Treasury benches as regards what the House did last session. The present Government were called upon to administer the affairs of the country on 13th July. They came into office on that day, and they found within a few days large sums of money were due and payable as wages to employees in the civil service, and they could not wish that the credit of the country be dishonoured. That was their position. What were they to do? Something had to be done, as I think every fair-minded man in this House will admit. They could not repeat the humiliation and disgrace with which we were more or less overwhelmed during last session, when the Government were unable to pay the charwomen, and the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) had to move the adjournment of the House in order to draw attention to the fact that the Government had so far forgotten their duty as not to make provision to pay members of this humble class of the community. If something must be done, then the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), who addressed the House in a speech this afternoon, which reflected much credit on him and the city from which he comes, very properly asked, what alternative course had been suggested by the hon. gentlemen opposite? Let me see what was possible and what was open. There was no possibility under the law as it stands now to draw without authority a Governor General's warrant, or exercise the authority of Parliament. Before the Audit Act was passed, the Government might have assumed the responsibility of making drafts on the public exchequer, and afterwards have asked Parliament to endorse their action. Possibly that might have been done a year or so ago before; but it was not possible under the Audit Act, because the Auditor General would not sanction the advance. That possibility, then, must be excluded. What might have been done? Advances could have been obtained from the banks upon the responsibility of hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches; but that would have been violating the spirit of the constitution just as much as if men had drawn public money, because it involves an obligation which the country is called upon ultimately to implement, and is just as wrong and contrary to the spirit of the constitution as it is to spend money without the authority of Parliament. So, Sir, the only possible alternative suggested is that Parliament might be permitted to meet on 16th July. Let us look at that point as practical business men. On 16th July, if Parliament had met, those seats on the Treasury benches would have been vacant, for every hon. gentleman who accepted office thereby vacated his seat. Who would have had to conduct the business of the House? What would have been the practical results accomplished? Undoubtedly a Message could have been sent down by His Excellency and placed in the hands of the Whip of the party, and he might have done the best he could to engineer the Bill through the House; but a fortnight has been occupied already in considering the business of Parliament and we are not yet through the Militia Estimates; and I should like to know under the circumstances I have endeavoured to suppose and picture what would have been the consequences with the Treasury benches vacant and with the Opposition in their present mood and temper. Then there was just that choice given to the Opposition, and no word of complaint as to the expenditure of a single dollar—and I attach to this very great importance—there was no word of complaint as to any salary paid. It is admitted by every hon. member in this House, that this money had to be paid, and had to be paid no matter what Administration was in power. It comes to the purest technical reasoning to complain and to ask that the House should censure the Administration because they resorted to a course which practically was the only one open to them, if the law permitted that course to be taken. Had indeed, Sir, these Governor's warrants been, as some of the warrants which I have had to sustain in days gone by, for unforeseen expenditure which it took all one's credulity to imagine could be classified in that category, had there been a scent of a job in the matter, then, Sir, I, for my part, would have been very much inclined to have supported the motion, and very much disinclined to say a word against it. But where it comes to be an admitted fact that this money was required, that this money was necessary, that this money had to be found in some way to prevent this country being discredited, and there was only the alternative of calling Parliament together at the very greatest possible inconvenience, with the very strong certainty that then the House would have had to adjourn from day to day and from week to week, until the members of the Government were re-elected; then, for my part, I am quite satisfied to accept the responsibility for this procedure, so far as the matter of policy is concerned.

Now, Sir, when we come to look at the legal aspect of the question—I am not going to weary the House by any long speech, and, if I might venture to say so, I think perhaps the reproach of long speeches, to which this House has become subject, is not being improved in the present session. Certainly I have never yet heard longer harangues on matters which are altogether in a nutshell, which require no historic statement, which require no disquisition, than we have had to listen to from gentlemen on the Opposition side.

Mr. FOSTER. What about your Manitoba schools speech of last year?

Mr. McCARTHY. I allude to the hon. gentleman who moved this resolution (Mr. Foster), and to the hon. gentleman from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), who addressed us with great ability, great industry and great learning on the matter last night, but which, I think, was as foreign to the subject as a discussion on the Silver Bill would have been. No person doubts the authority of Parliament and the control of Parliament over supplies. We alone, I believe, of all the English-speaking communities that have self-government, have given to the Executive this power of obtaining money by means of Governor's warrants. So far as my research has gone, there is no such authority in England, and, so far as I know, there is no such authority in any of the other colonies. Our case is one in which we have thought fit to delegate to the Executive, under exigencies mentioned in the Act of Parliament, the power to get money which the people had not thought fit to vote. But no person doubts the general proposition, and, therefore, the authoritative statement as to how, and why, and when this change was made and this strictness was imposed by the Commons in England, appears to me very far afield. But, Sir, when, as I say, we come to deal with the question of law, I confess, without the slightest hesitation, that I had always read the Act of Parliament as hon. gentlemen who have spoken on the other side, and as some of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this side, have interpreted it to the House. I had always supposed that the Act of Parliament permitted, and only permitted, the exercise of the power to obtain money by virtue of Governor General's warrants under the particular circumstances mentioned in the statute, or when that particular circumstance did not exist—namely, with regard to the construction or injury of public buildings—then, when the circumstances were unforeseen as well as unprovided for. I am bound to say that much, Sir. But what did the Administration do, and what are we, in this House, confronted with? We find the First Minister meeting this difficulty on the very day after his entrance into office, because his letter to Sir Oliver Mowat is on the 14th of July, and he appeals to Sir Oliver in these terms:

It is suggested to me that unless the civil employees are paid their regular salaries, the public service will be subjected to very serious inconveniences. These inconveniences would more particularly arise in the case of that class of employees who are wage-earners on railways, canals and other public works.

I would ask you to look into the question and to give me your opinion as to whether a special warrant can be issued to provide for the payment of those servants of the Government.

Now, Sir, that appeal was made to the Law Officer of the Crown, and the appeal was answered by the Law Officer of the Crown in an opinion given without question and without doubt:

I think the payment of the employees mentioned in your letter is "urgently and immediately required" for the public good, within the meaning of the said enactment, and that under the circumstances which have occurred and the consequent present condition of public affairs, the Governor in Council may properly on the report mentioned, order a special warrant to be prepared, to be signed by the Governor General for the issue of the amount estimated to be required.

So we have from the Minister of Justice—and I do not know what other legal authority the Government could have relied upon—we have an emphatic opinion given, that, under this Act of Parliament, there was authority to the Governor to sign this warrant. And who is Sir Oliver Mowat? Now, Sir, I do not propose to yield my own view even to Sir Oliver Mowat. But I am bound to say that I would be a pretty hardy man to stand up as a lawyer in this House, and venture to assert that the opinion of the Minister of Justice (Sir Oliver Mowat), who is certainly one of the most distinguished jurists in this country, who in all constitutional questions, or rather, in the great majority of them, in the contests that have taken place, has been found to be right against able men and against able opinion—I say it would be a foolhardy thing for any lawyer, no matter what his standing be, to say that Sir Oliver Mowat's opinion is wrong. And, when I look at the Act of Parliament, I find—as indeed is admitted—that Sir Oliver Mowat has interpreted the Act according to its literal meaning. There can be no question about that. The words literally mean just exactly what Sir Oliver Mowat says they mean. The Act of Parliament, curiously enough, has been so worded, and has been so revised and consolidated, with this word “or” in, whereas, according to the general understanding, it meant “and.” Again, Sir, it is difficult to tell any lawyer or to tell any judge that he is wrong, when he places upon a statute its plain and literal interpretation and its meaning according to its grammatical sense. I do not at all mean to say that we will not find authorities in the books; nay, many of them, when “or” is to be read for “and,” when “may” is to be read for “must,” and “must” for “may.” But, Sir, what I am bound to is this, that, in the face of the legal opinion of the Minister of Justice, where I am satisfied that the act was right, if the act was lawful and legal, I am not bound here—whatever my own view may be as a lawyer—and I do not feel that I can take the responsibility of censuring the Government for acting on the opinion of their Minister of Justice. Let me add one word to that, and it is this, and I have no doubt it is what has guided Sir Oliver Mowat.

In the old days, when Parliament was perhaps not as particular in the phraseology of its Acts as it is to-day, and when the judges took to themselves greater authority and power than perhaps we would tolerate at present, it was not an uncommon thing for judges to interpret Acts of Parliament in a sense very different from the plain meaning of the terms of those enactments. But the current of modern decisions is the other way. The current of modern decisions is that as Parliament meets yearly, and Parliament can easily remedy its own mistakes, it is not for the judiciary to say, when Parliament says one thing plainly, that Parliament meant another thing. If it were interesting to the House, as it is not, to quote law books, I could give the opinion of the Lord Chancellor of England to that effect, expressed in a recent case; and that adds to the doubts and difficulties which I have about criticising the advice given by the Minister of Justice to the Cabinet.

These appear to me to be the two questions involved in this motion. But I should add that the hon. gentleman who framed this motion—and it is certainly long enough to be an ordinary speech—has not ventured to challenge the act of the Governor General on the ground that he had not the power to do as he has done. The motion is a censure upon the policy—I ask the House to remember that—and not upon the power. After reciting matters of history, partly true and partly inaccurate, as most histories are, the resolution winds up in these words:

That under these circumstances this House is of the opinion that the issue of the said warrants was in contravention of the well understood principle of parliamentary control, an abuse of the powers vested in the Governor General in Council—

Acknowledging the power, but claiming the issue of the warrants under the circumstances to be an abuse of the power. So that we are not called upon to sit in judgment on the legal question, as the hon. gentleman himself has apparently given that the go-by, and is apparently willing to rest the censure of the Government on the abuse of the power.

I am answering the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Chauvin) under somewhat difficult circumstances. I am only encouraged to say what I intend to say by the fact that he opened his speech, which was very interesting to those who understood it, by stating in English what his strongest point was. Well, Sir, if there is a ready answer to his strongest point, which the hon. member was good enough to give us in the language I do understand, I think I may allow, as I am bound under the circumstances to allow, the remainder of the hon. gentleman's speech to go unanswered, so far as I am concerned. The hon. gentleman drew a distinction between the warrants. The warrant of July, he said, was one which he was not prepared to censure the Government for having issued. But the motion does not distinguish between one warrant and the other. The motion censures the issue of the warrant of July as well as the warrant of August; and if the hon. gentleman feels that he cannot censure the Government for their conduct with respect to the July warrant, he cannot very consistently vote in support of that motion. But it does appear to me to be special pleading of the finest possible kind to say that what was done in July ought not to have been done on the 18th of August, because the House met upon the following day. No doubt, as was admitted in the debate in 1891, when the last Government was censured by a motion moved by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) for having issued a warrant for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company on the very day preceding the meeting of Parliament—no doubt, as was conceded by all, including even the Minister who had to do with it, the issue of a warrant on the eve of the meeting of Parliament certainly required strong grounds to support it. But, Sir, are there not the strong grounds? Remember that these wages were overdue from the 15th of August; remember that preparations were being made for their payment from the 14th, and that, by reason of the circumlocution necessary in these matters, they had not culminated until the 18th; and if this warrant had not been issued, it is perfectly plain and clear that the Government would not have had the money to-day, because even to-day this House refused to allow the grant for the Militia Estimates to take more than a single step. The hon. gentleman who wants the Government condemned, himself rose in his place and refused to allow these Militia Estimates to be advanced one single stage. In point of fact, he merely consented to what he could not avoid, that is, that the House should take only one stage to-day. So that in the early days of September we have not reached a stage where we are able to pay these employees on canals and railways or carry on the necessary business of the country by means of the ordinary supplies obtained from Parliament. If, therefore, it was right to grant the warrant on the 18th of July, I am unable to discover any reasoning which would make it improper to do practically the same thing on the 18th of August, notwithstanding that the House was to meet on the following day.

For these reasons, Sir, I shall not hesitate to vote against the amendment of the hon. member for York. I do not propose to criticise the long preamble of this resolution. I desire to place my reasons on plain, clear, and definite grounds. I desire no hair-splitting in support of the vote I propose to give. The money having been required for honest and proper purposes, the necessities of the case having been such that the money could only be obtained in this way, and the Minister clothed with the responsibility of the administration of justice, a distinguished jurist having advised that there was the power to do what has been done, for my part I am prepared to take the full responsibility of voting against the resolution in amendment to the motion to go into Supply.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Speaker, it will not be expected that I should attempt to answer the legal argument of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. McCarthy). But it was said by the hon. gentleman himself at the outset that this question involved more than matters of law—that it involved also matters of common sense; and on that ground I may attempt to discuss the question. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat laid down a very wholesome rule at the outset, that is, that questions of this kind should be discussed wholly apart from political considerations, which only becloud the question, instead of making it clear. But I fear that the hon. gentleman has not been able to live up to his professions in that respect. I fear that before he sat down he attempted not only to justify his vote on this occasion, but his support of the party with which he is now so completely in accord. I am glad to know that this question is not wholly and solely a legal question, but that it has also, as was said by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), a business and common-sense side. If we commence with the power that is granted under the statute, the House must recognize that it is an extraordinary power, which, at the time it was given, it was felt should be hedged round with the greatest safeguards. It was one that must have appealed to the minds of those who were passing the Act as susceptible, at all times, of abuse, and which therefore ought to be surrounded with the greatest possible safeguards. The Act itself makes this clear. It reads as follows:—

If, when Parliament is not in session, any accident happens to any public work or building, which requires an immediate outlay for the repair thereof, or any other occasion arises when any expenditure not foreseen or provided by Parliament is urgently required for the public good—

The language is very explicit, and an example is given to make it perfectly clear what ought to come within the meaning of the Act. Why did the Act not go further, in defining the particular cases to which the Act would apply? Is it not perfectly clear that it did not do so for the simple reason that it is not possible to contain in a statute every case that might arise? But this particular example was given to indicate clearly the description of cases intended to be covered by the words "unforeseen and unprovided for" as coming within the meaning of the statute. Does the present case come clearly within that meaning of the words "unforeseen and unprovided for"? Does the latter part of the section include cases that were foreseen but were not provided for? If it does not, then the case under discussion does not come within the meaning of the words which I have quoted? But let me go further and show that this case is one that came to the knowledge of Parliament when it last sat. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken has declared that we are in no sense answerable for the acts of the last Parliament. I reply to the hon. gentleman that the last Parliament of Canada is not now on trial, but the Government is on trial. Parliaments are not perpetual but Governments are. In the words used by May, "There is no moment in the life of the sovereign in which he has not advisers." Therefore, I say that the Government is perpetual; and when the sovereign or the Governor General departs from the strict rule of law, the Ministers who advise that course are wholly responsible. It is upon that ground that a vote of censure is now proposed—not to censure the last Parliament, but the Government which has taken upon itself to advise not only an illegal but an unconstitutional act. Was this matter within the knowledge of the last Parliament? If it was within the knowledge of the last Parliament, then it does not come under the Act. No hon. gentleman will say that this is a place where hon. members met for the mere purpose of amusement. They come here to discuss the business of the country, and if Parliament failed, through a policy of obstruction, to vote the supplies last session, this Government is responsible, and those gentlemen who were called upon to form a Government cannot be disassociated from their acts when in Opposition last session.

Taking the question wholly on a common sense and business point of view, it cannot be said that they can be absolutely and entirely freed from any act of theirs or the consequences. And what are the consequences? Parliament was clearly cognizant and knew, in every sense possible, that the supplies had to be voted, that an honest and fair effort had been made to vote those supplies, and that the effort had been frustrated by obstruction. That is a matter which is perfectly clear to this House. Therefore, I say that Parliament was perfectly cognizant, it had every means of knowing, every means was placed at its disposal for the purpose of knowing, and surely no hon. gentleman will attempt to say that this was a matter wholly unforeseen and which could not have been provided for. Why, it did not involve a single item that might escape the attention of Parliament, but involved the whole expenditure of the country. Therefore, no one can seriously contend that Parliament was not fully aware of the consequences of its own acts, and every hon. gentleman who then sat in the House is in no sense free from the consequences of his conduct.

The next point is: was Parliament then sitting illegally; had it the right to consider the Estimates placed before it, and had it the right to pass the Estimates? No one disputes that. When those Estimates were submitted to the House, what was the position and course of hon. gentlemen? Why, when, upon the 28th January, about one month after Parliament had assembled, it was proposed by the then Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) to go into Supply, or in other words, to set about voting supplies for the public service, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) rose in his place and declared that it would be impossible to intelligibly discuss the Estimates then before the House, because the Auditor General's Report was not then upon the Table and in the hands of members. If that were a good reason, I am going to ask the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies), who has been in his place the greater part of this debate, what reason can he assign now for going on with the Estimates, when the Auditor General's Report, closing the 30th June, 1896, is not on the Table? If that were a good reason then, it would be an equally good reason now. If it was not a reasonable excuse then, it cannot be reasonable now. There were others who took the same ground.

Mr. CLANCY.

The hon. member for Bothwell, then Mr. Mills, took very strong ground. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies), the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mullock), and the hon. member for Yamaska, took the same ground. The hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell), whom I see in his place, also raised his voice against it. Then, the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) and the hon. Controller of Customs (Mr. Paterson) took the same ground. And a single item was permitted to be passed on that occasion, merely the salaries for the Governor General's Secretary's Office, an item of $11,000 odd. There was another stage; another effort was made by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) to further the Estimates, in order that the public service might be provided for. On the 4th February, which was not early in the session, because Parliament did not rise until the 23rd of April, it was proposed by the then Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) that Thursdays should be taken as Government days, in order that the work devolving upon the Government—mainly the passing of the Estimates and of one Bill, for the passing of which the House had met—might be dealt with. Strong objection was taken on that occasion also; and on what ground? Why, the ground was taken that it was altogether too early to propose a motion of this kind. The present First Minister (Mr. Laurier) took that ground, and he took the trouble to prepare a very long table to show that for eleven years, at least, the House had been in session from thirty-five to forty days before a motion of that kind was proposed, and, therefore, it was improper at that stage to think of narrowing the rights of private members in this House for the purpose of furthering the business of the Government. And another reason was urged. The fact that the Remedial Bill was not then down was given as a reason for not proceeding with the Estimates. Who engaged in that contention? One might have expected some slight objection to be raised, and as readily disposed of by the Government of the day. But I find that the Hon. David Mills took strong objection to the Government's proposal on the grounds I have given. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the hon. Postmaster General also took the same ground. Another was the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette). He is not a Minister, but he is a prospective Minister: he is sitting on the doorstep, he is a waiting candidate; and though he has been disappointed, he certainly had a standing in the party that gave him the right to speak with some authority. The hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr.

Lavergne) and the hon. Controller of Customs took the same ground. Now, let me turn again and see how long the House has been in session before the First Minister proposed to take two of the days of the week. I am going to ask hon. gentlemen opposite to read their acts of the past in the light of what we find in the present. Why, Sir, the House was just nine days in session when the proposition was made to take two days in the week. I am bound to say that the objection taken by these hon. gentlemen to such a course, when proposed by the late Government, was futile, idle, worthless and untenable. I am glad to say that the late Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) readily assented to the proposal of this session, to which I have just referred, in order to promote the public business.

Now we come to what may be called more particularly the constitutional side of the question, that which, apart from law, involves serious consequences as a matter of usage. Our constitution, while largely sanctioned by law, is made up of usages and customs that have been found wholesome in the past for our guidance, and where it was impossible that law could intervene or where there was no Act upon the statute-book clearly and decisively covering the case. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce asks what the Government could have done, if they had not applied for Governor General's warrants. I tell the hon. gentleman that one course was open to them, and one course only, and that was to have fairly, and honestly, and courageously met Parliament. And why was there no other course open to them? Why, Sir, what reasons could be urged why Parliament could not meet? It may be said it would be inconvenient; it may be said the time was short. It may be said the public service might have suffered or been strained during that period. I am prepared to admit that that might possibly have been the case. But I want to point out, and I hope to do so later on, that the consequences of following a different course are so serious as to entirely outweigh any danger of that kind. It was said by the hon. gentleman who last spoke, and has been stated repeatedly in this House, that a disastrous state of affairs would follow, if these warrants had not been issued. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce declared that we were, after all, to a large extent, public carriers, and that, had these warrants not issued, the Government railways would stop, and the locks of the canals would no longer open. It was also stated by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) that even the lighthouses would be no longer attended. But this seems to me to be merely idle talk. We know that that could not and would not happen. The Queen's Government must, and would go on in this country. The public service would not receive any shock from which it would not quickly recover. Why, Sir, were there no Governor General's warrants issued between the 30th June and the 11th July? The same reason would apply to the 12th of July, and the 13th of July, and so on from day to day, with just as much force and just as much logic as to the days following the coming into power of hon. gentlemen opposite and the issuing of these warrants. I admit that it was a case of great necessity. But I think the ground taken by the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) is so strong that we can well afford to admit these contentions of hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, admitting, as I do, that it would have inconvenienced hon. gentlemen somewhat to have met, they could have met, and the public service would have gone on, and there would have been no stoppage of the business of the country, as I think every one who is the least acquainted with the business of this country will acknowledge. Therefore that argument cannot be urged. But there is another thing. Hon. gentlemen assume that such and such would occur, that everything would be at a standstill, the civil servants would be in the poor-house, and it would be impossible for the public service to go on. But they had the means in their hands, they could have met Parliament, and Parliament could have voted a sum of money within a reasonable time. It is not fair to argue that there would have been obstruction; the readiness with which the leaders on this side of the House have assented to every reasonable proposition, is a complete answer to what was stated a few moments ago by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). But hon. gentlemen assuming a state of things that cannot happen, plead necessity. Now, I have admitted the necessity, but I say the necessity does not warrant in any sense the action the Government have taken. Why, Sir, let us lay down for the first time the principle in this House that on the ground of urgency an act of that kind can be committed, and you have opened the door to the widest and broadest consequences you can imagine. You absolutely place no limit upon the power of the Government the moment you plead public necessity. No public necessity can be so great, particularly the public necessity that arose under these circumstances, as to justify a violation of the constitution. I say upon that ground urgency cannot be pleaded, especially by hon. gentlemen who are the principal offenders, who brought about that state of affairs themselves, and who now come to the Governor General and ask relief from the consequences of their own act. I will go so far as to say that if the time is frittered away, if by an adverse vote, by obstruction, or by any act committed by either of the parties, or by both parties conjointly—I say even then the Government are not relieved from the consequences of those acts, and it is equally doubtful whether either this Government or a Conservative Government could go and ask for Governor General's warrants, and I do not understand that the leader of the Opposition has stated that that would have been the position of the Conservative party had they come to power. The plain fact is that in either case they should have come to Parliament, and have made the provision. They might have been inconvenienced, it is true, but the inconvenience of a political party is not to be weighed against the consequences following the violation of the constitution.

I am going to ask now whether a single reason pleaded by hon. gentlemen opposite, is a public reason? Will hon. gentlemen cite one reason advanced from the time this debate began up to this moment, that is a public reason? Every one of them is a party reason. The excuse made in the first instance that the Auditor General's Report was not laid upon the Table, was not a public reason, it was a party reason, it was an obstructive reason. So with regard to taking an additional day for the business of the Government, and taking certain days away from private members. Were the reasons then urged public or party reasons? Whether Parliament should have met on the 16th July, is wholly a party and not a public question. Whether the Governor General's warrant should be issued in order to let hon. gentlemen out of the difficulty which they led themselves into, against the will of the House and the party who was attempting to follow the constitution in providing for the public service, was a party question. I say they knew perfectly what the consequence would be, and I say these were party reasons from beginning to end. Asking the advice of His Excellency to grant these warrants is purely a party expedient.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Louder.

Mr. CLANCY. If my hon. friend has been deprived of any of the seven senses ordinarily given to hon. gentlemen, I hope he will not ask me to do the work for him. Now, Mr. Speaker, the kernel of this whole question is this: has the action of the Government—not the action of Parliament, as the hon. member for Simcoe endeavoured to argue—been of the kind that can be fairly justified in the light of law and the constitution? That seems to me to be plainly the kernel of the whole thing. It is not contended by hon. gentlemen that they are legally right. It has been admitted, both by the hon. member for Simcoe and by others preceding him upon that side of the House that it is necessary to give a literal meaning to the statute in order to justify the action of the Government. Then, if the statute is given its literal meaning entirely, and according to the advice of the Minister of Justice, it does rest upon that ground, it is a very slight one indeed, and is always open to serious doubts. I should hope that the constitution rests upon better ground: I should hope that this Parliament would act upon sounder and better grounds, and upon better security, than the mere advice of any gentleman, I care not how high his standing, either in Parliament or in the legal profession. I should hope that we would seek better ground to sanction a principle or a practice now introduced for the first time in the history of Canada, than the opinion of the Minister of Justice, however distinguished that gentleman may be. Now, Sir, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, at the close of his speech, declared in the most explicit terms that he did not want this to be taken as a precedent. The hon. member for Simcoe declared that no other case like this was likely to arise. Now, Sir, hon. gentlemen are clearly shrinking from the consequences of their position. They ask this Parliament to justify them upon two grounds, one is that of public necessity, and the other is the improbability of so extraordinary a case as this arising again. Now, I would not care to give a silent vote upon a question of so grave an importance as this. If we declare ourselves as saying that this is a proper thing to do, we shall have declared for all time in Canada, and it will be so understood, that this is a sound and justifiable practice. We are sanctioning a precedent of that kind by a vote of the House, we are giving it all the weight and authority that Parliament can give it, and the fact will be cited in the future as a case where the Government of the day was sustained by a majority of the House of Commons of Canada as having done a proper thing in regard to these warrants. Why, Sir, it will be said that a political party, who chose to refuse supplies, to obstruct Parliament, to prevent a vote being taken for that purpose, and following upon a general election, knowing that no appropriation was made for the public service, they took office and went to the Governor General and asked for a warrant, the warrant was granted, and their act was sanctioned by a House of Commons freshly returned from the country. I deny that a mandate of that kind has been given to Parliament, or that such a question was before the people, or that this is a case that can be set aside on the mere flimsy ground that it is not likely to again occur. This is opening the door, it is the first step, it is an invitation for the future, it is placing a case on the records of Parliament indicating that parliamentary government is at an end. We do so if we lay down this as a principle. No hon. member can escape from the consequence of his vote on this occasion; no hon. member can do so on the ground that no other case of this kind could arise. He cannot control the future; and I say that hon. members on both sides of the House should hesitate before they give their sanction for party purposes, for party advantage, to a course of action which will tend to destroy the principles of our constitution.

Mr. BRITTON. I desire to add a few words to this discussion before it closes. Although this discussion commenced with an appeal by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), and was followed by a speech by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), who appealed to the fairness of those who entered the House as independent members to consider this matter altogether apart from party feelings and party prejudices, we find that when an hon. member, the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), a distinguished member of this House and a still more distinguished member of the legal profession, a gentleman who is acknowledged wherever he is known to have a candid and fair mind, rose outside of fealty to any party, and on the invitation which hon. gentlemen opposite extended to him, gave to this matter his best consideration, both on the question of public policy and also as a matter of law, and came to the conclusion that he could not support the resolution of the hon. member for York, we found that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), who is for party first and all the time, began a speech this afternoon by an attack on that hon. gentleman, accusing him of trying to find a way to support hon. gentlemen on the Government benches, and having found it he announced that he had come to the conclusion that he must vote against this amendment. That does not afford very much encouragement to independent members to think independently, if a party man, such as the hon. member for Bothwell, appears to be, is so ready to charge an hon. member with want of independence and a desire to go out of his way to support the Government, when he states to the House, as the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) did, that he honestly and fairly gave the best consideration he could to this question, and treating it on the two grounds he put forward to the House, he felt obliged to come to the conclusion that he could not support the resolution. I desire to speak briefly in regard to the legal aspect of the case, and I say that even if there is any violation of the letter of the statute, which I do not in any way admit, as I shall, I think, be prepared to show has not been the case, certainly there has been no violation of the spirit of the Act which is under discussion. When any one refers to the Act, and it has been quoted so frequently during the progress of this debate that I shall not repeat it again, he will see that it was intended to apply exactly to such a state of affairs as was set forth by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) in the speech he delivered in 1891, and it was quoted no doubt correctly because no objection was taken to the quotation made by the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) yesterday. If it was intended to cover such a state of affairs as has been described as existing at the time the Government came into power, then there certainly has been no violation of the Act. In judging it we have to consider and call attention to the whole section and not to the portion of it that has been quoted, and I shall have to quote it as determining whether that state of things existed at the time the present Government came into power or not; and reading the whole section, hon. members will find that precisely that state of things did exist, and it was a time when above all others hon. gentlemen were justified in invoking the aid of the Audit Act if they ever should invoke it. The whole case of the Opposition rests on the proposition that this expenditure was foreseen. I think I am not doing any injustice to hon. gentlemen opposite when I state that their case rests upon that distinct proposition. If that was unforeseen expenditure, then the Opposition will admit that the Government were right in the course they adopted. Now, I ask hon. gentlemen to follow me in a few words I shall say in support of this point, which I want to make. It is said that the expenditure was foreseen, or, to use the words of the Act, it was not unforeseen. If foreseen, I ask when was it foreseen, by whom was it foreseen? Because I contend that to apply this Act at all and give a meaning to it, the expenditure must have been foreseen at a time when the persons who had to apply the Act had it in their power to raise the money in some other way, and that the expenditure had to be foreseen at that time and by those persons. I contend that this state of things never existed. At the time when this was foreseen these hon. gentlemen had not the power to apply the Act and provide the expenditure in the ordinary way. Hon. members on this side of the House did not constitute the Government, hon. gentlemen opposite formed the Government and they foresaw that expenditure, but when the time came to provide for it they could not do so; and these hon. gentlemen who are now in a position to provide for it, never foresaw the necessity of the expenditure in question. If that is so, then I can only supplement the argument made by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), who spoke with such force and lucidity, in saying that to all intents and purposes, applying this section as any reasonable man would apply and as a lawyer would apply it, the ground is cut entirely from the feet of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), and those who support him and rest their proposition on the fact that the expenditure is foreseen. In a sense, of course, it was foreseen. I dare say it was foreseen by the officials in charge of the department. Those who have charge of the Intercolonial Railway no doubt foresaw the expenses necessary to carry on the working of the road, and those in charge of the canals saw that certain expenditures were necessary to operate the canals. Hon. gentlemen who were on the Treasury benches at that time naturally foresaw the necessity of the expenditures and provided to meet them in the Estimates. That is the clearest evidence that it was foreseen by them, but at that time these gentlemen now on the Treasury benches were not in existence as a Government, and indeed some of them were not in the House at all. But even if they were in the House, they were not in a position to govern in the matter, and so the men whose duty it was to provide in the ordinary way never in the proper sense of the word, foresaw the necessity of this expenditure. It matters little how much of this they foresaw, if the persons who had the power to provide the money in the ordinary way did not foresee it. The hon. member for Terreboune (Mr. Chauvin) stated that he would not hold the members who were not in the House at that time in any way responsible. That brings me to the question as to whether the last Parliament did right whole circumstances connected with the member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) that we are hardly in a position to-day to sit in judgment upon the last Parliament. The whole circumstances connected with the case in the last Parliament are so fresh in the minds of all the members in this House that it is hardly worth while to review them at length. However, it may not be amiss, and I take the liberty of saying in that regard that we had perhaps better look back a little at the history of 1895. In the beginning of that year the members of the then Government never contemplated even the holding of a fifth session. They were all through the country campaigning for an election, and it was well understood by their friends and by the public that there was to be no fifth session. They went to the country making their election addresses and testing public feeling to some extent, and when they found that public feeling was very adverse to them, they at the last moment changed their minds and called a fifth session of Parliament. If I had the power of description of some hon. gentlemen opposite, or of some hon. gentlemen on my side of the House, it would be no doubt very painful to hon. gentlemen opposite if I were to describe what took place in the last Parliament. We know that there were heartburnings and jealousies amongst the members of the Cabinet, and although on the hustings they told us what a happy family they were, we know that they were anything but happy, and that the result of the fifth session in 1895 was anything but satisfactory to them. Then we had the sixth session of Parliament, which was exceptional in its character in two ways. First, because it is the only session, so far as I know, apart from the present one, which was not called for general legislation, but simply for one object; and, in the second place, it was exceptional in that it was the only occasion in the history of this Dominion that a sixth session of Parliament had been called. Now, I ask my hon. friends opposite, who are very particular in this matter, who say that the Government strained the law a little, what did they do as regards straining the law by calling a sixth session of Parliament? It was never the spirit of the law that there should be a sixth session, but they took advantage of the letter of the law, and held a sixth session, unproductive as it was of any good results to the country. The session of 1896 was remarkable, it is said by hon. gentlemen opposite, for the obstruction of the then Opposition, which prevented the Government from getting supplies. In view of what I have briefly summarized as to what took place in the country, and also during the fifth and sixth sessions of the last Parliament, and in view of the charge, since sustained, that the then Government did not possess the confidence of the country, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and I ask hon. gentlemen, if the Liberal party were not perfectly right in doing what they then did? I think I can establish outside of my own individual opinion, that what the members of the then Opposition did in refusing supplies was perfectly justifiable. I will establish it, first, by asking any candid man now on the Opposition benches—the leader or any of the rank and file—if under similar circumstances had the position been reversed, would they not have done the same thing? Unquestionably they would. But I have something further to say about that. Whatever was done by the Opposition in the last Parliament was certainly ratified by the people. That Parliament was dissolved and the electorate had an opportunity of pronouncing upon the conduct of its members. The arguments that were used all over the country during the campaign were in regard to these tactics pursued by the Opposition, and the people were asked, time and again, to refuse to have anything to do with men who were such obstructionists. The sovereign people heard all these arguments, and on the 23rd day of June they gave their decision. There was an appeal to the jury of the people and the people have rendered their verdict to the effect that the obstructionists—if obstructionists they were—in the last session of the last Parliament, were perfectly right. If the sovereign people—our masters, and the masters even of those gentlemen opposite—if they say that the Opposition in the last Parliament was perfectly right, what right have we, Parliament as we are, to say that the people have been wrong, as the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) has just said. I say that we were perfectly right in refusing supplies, and if we were right, it cannot be invoked as any argument why the present Government should or should not have been in a position to have asked the assistance of the Governor General by these warrants.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. BRITTON. Mr. Speaker, at the hour of recess, I had arrived in the history of events at the 23rd of June. Shortly after that the Government resigned and a new Government came in. The new Government accepted office on the eve of the day on which Parliament was to assemble. They found the treasury empty. They had all the duties of their offices to perform; they were new to them; they were obliged to form the acquaintance of what the pigeon-holes contained and of their official staff; they had thrust upon them at that moment all the work necessary to carry on the Government of the country. The first matter of importance to them was the matter of money for the carrying on of the affairs of the Government, and naturally enough they looked about to see how that could be raised. The first thing they would naturally do, and did do, was to look at this Audit Act, an Act admittedly difficult of construction, an Act admittedly so worded as to prevent any man, be he never so good a lawyer, being absolutely sure what its true and real construction is. In reading it and in getting advice upon it, the Government believed that it authorized them to raise money upon Governor's warrants; and if hon. members have not already made up their minds, I think they will conclude before this debate closes, that the Government were perfectly justified, both in the construction of the Act, and in the reasons which influenced them in believing that they had the authority of this Act for the use of the Governor's warrant. Now, Sir, I do not admit that this statute is limited to the narrow construction that is put upon it. I do not profess to give an opinion which must necessarily be right in this matter; but, on the other hand, I do not admit that the construction which hon. gentlemen opposite have put upon the Act is the true construction and the one that ought to be put upon it. I think their construction is altogether too narrow:

If, when Parliament is not in session, any accident happens to any public work or building which requires an immediate outlay for the repair thereof, or any other occasion arises when any expenditure not foreseen or provided for by Parliament is urgently and immediately required for the public good, then, upon the report of the Minister of Finance and Receiver General that there is no parliamentary provision, and of the Minister having charge of the service in question that the necessity is urgent, the Governor in Council may order a special warrant to be prepared, to be signed by the Governor General for the issue of the amount estimated to be required.

I submit with confidence that this section may be read thus:

Or any occasion arises when any expenditure not foreseen is urgently and immediately required for the public good..

And I am satisfied that there are lawyers whose opinion I would be prepared to respect, who would with perfect confidence and sincerity, and without any desire to be mere party politicians, give it as their opinion that that would be a perfectly fair reading of the Act. If that be so, it would follow that it would be equally a fair reading of the Act if I left out these words "not foreseen," and read it thus:

Or any occasion arises when any expenditure not provided for by Parliament is urgently and immediately required for the public good.

If that be so, then the Government were entirely within the letter of the law. I admit also that the word "or" may sometimes be, and in some cases has been construed by the courts to mean "and," and that a statute would be inconsistent unless it were read "and." But that is a long way from saying that in this case it is necessary that this word be read as "and." No judge has pronounced upon this Act, to say that this word "or" must be read as "and." I am aware of the doubts that have been expressed in reference to this matter; but I am dealing with it now as a question which the Government had in hand at the time they were called upon to raise money to carry on the affairs of this country; and I say that, dealing with it merely as a matter of construction, by lawyers in the Government, or by lawyers whom they might call to their aid, apart altogether from the opinion of the Minister of Justice (Sir Oliver Mowat), their legal adviser, it would not be going too far to say that they might read it in the way I have read it, and say that that section provided for these two cases—the one where the expenditure was not foreseen, and the other where the expenditure was not provided for by Parliament. Admitting, as I do, that the word "or" is not always used in statutes disjunctively, but is also sometimes used as explanatory of a preceding word; and has sometimes been construed as meaning "and," I say that is still a long way short of saying that this word must be so read in this case. So that it seems to me that the Government had authority for issuing the Governor General's warrant under the two branches of the statute. If that is so, or if there was reasonable ground for believing that they had authority, then what becomes of the constitutional question at this date in this new Parliament? It seems to me that the constitutional question is only put forward for some other purpose than to get the expression of Parliament on any constitutional principle for future guidance. I do not know that there is anything the present Ministry could do that my hon. friends opposite would consider constitutional. I think, perhaps, there is one thing they might have done that would be considered quite constitutional by these hon. gentlemen; that is, they might have voted the supplies in the sixth session of Parliament; they might possibly, by reason of having voted those supplies, have stayed in Opposition; and I dare say hon. gentlemen opposite would have considered it perfectly constitutional for the party on this side always to remain in Opposition. Apart from that, I am afraid it would be rather difficult to satisfy them. At the last election and before it hon. gentlemen opposite talked and acted as if they owned this whole country from ocean to ocean. It was my Parliament, it was my car, it was my everything else; and, like master like man, they were the same all through the country. In fact the Liberals had no right to say anything or to own anything, and it would be only natural to suppose that their only constitutional course would be always to remain in Opposition. Unfortunately the Opposition did not take that view nor did the people, and we have crossed sides. Why are all these precedents put forward? I submit that they are not in point. I can hardly hope to add anything to the argument of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) on that point. This is purely a question of the construction of a statute. We can endorse many of the propositions which were made by hon. gentlemen on the other side. We can endorse them when they say that it is wrong to use public money improperly and that the necessity of the public service does not justify a violation of the statute. We admit all these aphorisms. This is not a question of what the law should be, but of what it is. But if it had been put forward, by way of resolution or suggestion or anything of that kind from the other side of the House, that this section ought to be amended to provide against anything of this kind being done in the future, two questions would have arisen. First, whether it would not be proper that such warrants should issue under similar circumstances, if you could conceive a similar circumstance ever arising again. The other question is, assuming that these circumstances would never arise again, would it be proper to pass statutes to prevent Governor General's warrants issuing on the eve of Parliament. If a suggestion of that kind were put forward, very likely some of the hon. members on this side would agree. But that is not the question submitted. It is simply a question of the construction of the statute as it is, and the Government were perfectly right, acting under the advice they got and in view of all the circumstances, in taking the course they did. The constitution is not in danger; the treasury is in safe hands. There is no danger of this treasury being looted either by the Liberal Government, and that being so, the threatened danger is only threatened very remotely. The people feel that they are perfectly safe in this matter, and I would ask who it is that is raising an outcry about the constitution being in danger? Have we heard of any public meeting on the question? Have we heard it debated in the press except, so far as the press have discussed the question raised in this debate? Do we find that the men who are in trade complain of the Government having raised the money in this way? Do we find that persons engaged on the canals or manufacturing enterprises are complaining? Do we hear that merchants are complaining of their bills being paid by money thus put in circulation by the Government? Has any class complained? If we find no one complaining, why is this resolution now before the House—a resolution of want of confidence? My understanding of responsible government is that the Government is responsible to the people. They must have a majority of members of Parliament at their back. If the Opposition think they are not acting in the interests of the people and protecting the people; it is the duty of the Opposition to call attention to their conduct and see whether Parliament and the people approved of it, but in this case there is no such agitation, and no reason why anything of this kind should be done. This is a want of confidence motion, pure and simple. Now, if there is any reason for a want of confidence motion, it has certainly not appeared in public, and the public so far have not manifested the slightest interest in the matter. They desire, on the contrary, that the Government should have a fair trial and have time and opportunity to mature its policy and present it to the next Parliament.

Another objection is that the last of the Governor General's warrants was only issued the day before Parliament met. I observe, from my reading of the section that these warrants cannot issue when Parliament is in session. The Government were obliged therefore, if they issued this warrant at all, to issue it before Parliament met. If the Government had not done so then they would have been met with the difficulty which no one knows better than the members of the Opposition. We met on the 19th of August and it is now the 4th of September, and supplies have not been granted. This is in the natural order of things, under the procedure which hon. gentlemen opposite have rightly required to be gone through before supplies can be granted. If that be so, how much longer delay would there be if hon. gentlemen opposite desired to obstruct and prevent the money going into the hands of the treasury. There was no secret about this Governor General's warrant. It was issued before Parliament met, because after Parliament met, these warrants could not issue, and the employees who were in want of the money would have to wait until it suited the pleasure of hon. gentlemen opposite to grant out of their goodness and kindness the supplies for carrying on the government. There is therefore no force or point in the objection that it was only the day before Parliament met that this warrant was issued. We are a practical people. This state of things in which we find ourselves, it has been said, is without precedent. These precedents that have been quoted certainly do not apply, because no circumstances such as existed at the time of the precedents quoted exist now; no such law as we are dealing with was under consideration at the time any of these precedents were established; and therefore they are not applicable. We are dealing with a new state of things; we are dealing with a statute that is peculiarly our own; we are dealing with circumstances that were, unfortunately, peculiarly the property of the Dominion of Canada. No other country ever had such a Government as our last one: no other country ever had such a state of things as was found to exist at the dissolution of the last Parliament. And if, as is admitted, no other country has a statute like this, there is no object in citing precedents when they have no application to the peculiar circumstances with which we are dealing. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) in his address, distinguished between party reasons and public reasons. All I can say in answer to this is that the reasons the Government adopted were reasons for the public good; it seems to me, therefore, that they are public reasons, and the distinction the hon. gentleman draws, is, therefore, hardly in point. I listened with admiration to the addresses made during this debate. I think I received a great deal of instruction upon the point under discussion. I certainly listened with the greatest possible pleasure to the addresses of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) and the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Herbert Tupper). The industry and ability with which their side of the case was presented was certainly something to be admired and commended. I feel, however, that I cannot agree with the arguments they presented, and I have tried to consider this question as fairly as I can. The reasons I have given are reasons that have commended themselves to me, so that I am obliged to oppose the amendment. And further, even if not satisfied as I have been, as to the true construction of this statute or as to the construction that may be put upon it, I should have no reason to go against the Government and in favour of this amendment under these circumstances. The Government having read the whole Act, acted because they believed that this was urgently and immediately needed. The argument was addressed to the House that it could not be conceded that this money was urgently and immediately needed when some of it was for salaries payable in September. One hon. gentleman went so far as to say that the Minister of Trade and Commerce had admitted that the Government's act was in part unauthorized. I did not understand the hon. Minister to make any such admission and I shall be surprised to know that he did make it. It appears to me that the phrase "urgently and immediately needed" must be read in the light of common sense. What is "urgent" in one case cannot be said to be "urgent" in another case. "Immediately" must be differently interpreted according to the circumstance of the case. Lawyers will appreciate the argument I use when I say that these words are used in very much the same sense as the words "reasonable time" which we find used in many cases. The interpretation is a question for the jury; it is governed by the peculiar circumstances under which the words are used. "Urgently and immediately needed" is as applicable to the money required for September as it was to the money required for August. We are in September now, and we may reach the end of September before the supply for these purposes is granted. And, at any rate, it was right for a forehanded Government, a Government that did not wish to wait for the last moment so that they might find themselves in a position of difficulty, the desire to be ready for any emergency that might arise in carrying on the affairs of the Government, to secure this money on the ground that it was urgently and immediately required within the fair meaning of the statute. It has been pointed out that the hon. Minister of Justice gave his opinion in favour of the issue of the Governor General's warrants. But the hon. member for Pictou says that that was not a reasoned opinion, and therefore it is not worth so much as it would be if it were a reasoned opinion. I do not know what is meant in that sense by a reasoned opinion. The Minister of Justice cites a section of the clause and certain words of the section. Surely it is going too far to say that the Minister did not read the section and consider it clause by clause in coming to such an opinion. If we read the section and consider it clause by clause in coming to an opinion, that is a considered opinion though it may not be so expressed. And, therefore, I say it was an improper use of the word to say that it was not a considered opinion. Then we have the Solicitor General. He has made his statement to the House as a member advising the Government. And these men, acting in good faith, having considered the matter and thinking it right and proper to use their power in this way, it would be, it seems to me, a very arbitrary and unfair thing for the House to condemn them as is sought to be done by the resolution proposed by the hon. member for York.

Thus I have tried to deal with the whole case in all its aspects. To recapitulate: The expenditure was not foreseen in the proper sense of the word. If hon. gentlemen say that that word means, foreseen by Parliament, I say that the Parliament that foresaw it is composed by individuals and is led and controlled by the Government, that the Government have to present these matters for the consideration of Parliament, as it is not permitted to private members to present Government measures, and the Government that was in existence at the time this expenditure was foreseen in the sense they put it is not this Parliament, and the persons who can provide for it are not the ones who foresaw it. The men who did foresee it could not provide for it, and the Parliament that could have provided did not foresee it. As to the other branch of the statute, I say it is quite within that, for the Government were advised that they had the right to take this course, and so, it seems to me, we ought not to object to their doing it. Then the money was urgently and immediately required within the fair meaning of these words. So that on a fair interpretation I submit that the Government were perfectly right in doing as they did. Then as a question of policy they were right. The duty was upon the Government to administer the affairs of this country. They were obliged to do what was necessary, what was urgently and immediately required, in the interest of the people of the country. They did not attempt to use the money for any improper purpose. There is no attempt to cast suspicion upon them that one penny of the money was to be used except for the good of Canada. I close by trying to emphasize what was said by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) in supplementing the report of the case as given by hon. gentlemen opposite showed the House that in cases where they seemed to contravene the statute, their act would be authorized and justified so long as it was a reasonable and proper thing to anticipate that the House would, when asked to do so, vote the supply. For all these reasons I shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. DAVIN. It is somewhat strange, Mr. Speaker, that those who have defended the action of the Government have differed amongst themselves, have misstated the facts, have flung principles that they had enunciated in this House to the winds, and they interpret the Act of Parliament in a conflicting manner. Now, the learned gentleman who has preceded me (Mr. Britton) has contended, as one or two other hon. gentlemen have ventured to contend, that the clause can be interpreted as if "or" is disjunctive. Well, it is hardly necessary to discuss that here, when we have the admission from the hon. and learned junior member from Halifax that the construction placed upon that clause upon this side of the

Mr. BRITTON.

House is the correct one; and when we have the admission from the hon. and learned member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) that the construction placed upon that clause on this side of the House is the correct one. In fact I think the hon. member who has just spoken is the only one who has taken a different view, with the exception, to my great surprise, of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I must say that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, in making an apology, has said things that he had, as it were by anticipation, denounced, and he was hardly the old member for South Oxford that this House has known in the past. He did try, in a halting and hesitating way, to make the contention made by my hon. friend who has just spoken, that you could interpret that clause as if it meant that the expenditures might either be unforeseen or unprovided for. Well, if it meant that Governor General's warrants may issue for any expenditures that are unprovided for by this House, then Parliament, in passing that legislation, meant to denude itself of its most important function. Every other function of this Parliament is trifling compared with its duty to control the expenditure of the country; and if any expenditures that are unprovided for can be met by Governor General's warrants, then we should have a state of things like this, that appropriations might be brought down here to the extent of a couple of million of dollars, and that the thirty odd million dollars that would be necessary for carrying on the business of the country, and that were unprovided for, could be raised by Governor General's warrants. Now, Sir, that seems to me to be a "reductio ad absurdum." But, as I say, it is not necessary to dwell upon that view of the case, because it is conceded by men who can speak with authority, that, notwithstanding the letter of the Minister of Justice, the true interpretation of that clause is as if "or" were "and unforeseen and unprovided for." Now, it is a very peculiar thing also to find a gentleman who can speak with such evident authority as the junior member for Halifax, and who is evidently a highly instructed man, deprecating the discussion of a constitutional question because, forsooth, there is no disturbance in the country, and the public mind is not excited. Why, Mr. Speaker, is it likely that in the case of any attempt to override the safeguards of the constitution, and the safeguards of the cherished liberties of the people of Canada, and the safeguards of that great boon to the world, the British constitution—is it likely that you will find amongst the populace such a keen appreciation of the evils that an invasion of the constitution would work, that you would have public meetings, excited assemblages, with resolutions passed and petitions sent up to the House? Sir, look at the position. We are not, forsooth, to discuss this question. If the Government of Canada has done any injury to the constitution, if the Government of Canada has committed a crime and a misdemeanour against that constitution, we are not to arraign the Government here, we are not to condemn the Government, because the public mind is not excited. Why, it is one of the most extraordinary contentions, especially when made by a member of a profession whose members must know well that the constitution has not been built up, and has not been safeguarded by public meetings and excited assemblages, but by enlightened men, members of legislatures, and most of them belonging to the profession of the hon. and learned gentleman himself. Now, Sir, my hon. friend who has just taken his seat made a very extraordinary contention in interpreting this clause. He says: "The whole case rests on this, was the expenditure foreseen?" And he asks when and by whom? He says it could not have been foreseen by the present Government, and therefore the present Government need take no notice of the clause in the Act of Parliament, and we have nothing whatever to do with their conduct. Of course, the only persons who could foresee the need of that expenditure would be the Government of the time, and that they did foresee it is shown in the records of "Hansard" last year. My hon. friend from North Simcoe, who is not in his seat, made a misstatement and it is not the only instance of a misstatement of facts in his speech; and the speech of the member for Simcoe also fell far short of anything we have been accustomed to hear from him in this House. It may be stated of him as truly as of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the role of apologists for unconstitutional Ministers does not become them. Well, the need of that expenditure was foreseen, and my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster). I am in a position to say—and having said that I will pass away from it, because no doubt he will deal with it himself—the hon. member for York did make those appeals for a qualified vote, for a portion of the Estimates, that the hon. member for North Simcoe said he did not do.

Now the main argument, I take it, after all of hon. gentlemen opposite is the necessity of the case. They practically give up the construction of that clause, they practically admit that that clause is against them, and in fact the position of hon. gentlemen opposite is reduced to this: they say, what alternative had the Government? And they admit, like my hon. friend from Simcoe, that if an alternative can be stated that was within the power of the Government to take, and if they have not taken that alternative as a course preferential to invading the constitution, then the Government stands before this House worthy of the condemnation this resolution invites. Now, the hon. member for Simcoe says.

What could they do? Suppose they had met Parliament on the 16th July, as they should have done, and as they could have done.

The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) said his friend the Whip, who sits near him, might have met the House, and asked, as he should have done, or some other hon. gentleman representing the Government should have done, for a vote of credit; and he asked how would they have been treated? How has the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) treated the Government from the very moment the Finance Minister appealed to him to give him a militia vote? I believe it was passed in fifteen or sixteen minutes.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). It is not passed yet.

Mr. DAVIN. That is as regards concurrence; the vote was passed very rapidly; at all events, there has been no delay. If, under such circumstances, the Opposition refused to pass the votes asked, would not the responsibility before Canada rest at the door of the Opposition?

Mr. BRITTON. Some hon. members opposite do not believe that.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman dwelt on immediate necessity; and the Finance Minister, or whoever else asked for the warrants, must have asserted there was immediate necessity. What would immediate necessity mean? It would mean that the money was due. I say the money was not due. There are hon. members who will rise and support the Government on this occasion, and yet some members from these very benches formerly denounced dealing with public servants in any different manner than as employees of private individuals would be dealt with. I repeat, the money was not due. That money, asked for in June was not due, that money asked for in August was not due. The custom on the Hill here is to pay civil servants fifteen days before the money is earned. But I apprehend the bare fact that the custom is followed to oblige the civil servants, is not any justification for the Government of Canada invading the constitution. Outside of the men on the Hill, they are only paid as are servants of private individuals—they are paid when the money is due, at the end of the month, and in some cases not till the 10th of the following month. My hon. and learned friend from Halifax (Mr. Russell) drew a vivid picture of the wheels stopping and the public machinery no longer doing its work, and he gave us a picture of a ship and told us that the lighthouse men would have ceased working. But they are paid only quarterly, and their money is not due yet. This is the dire necessity for which hon. gentlemen opposite have invaded the constitution, and done what the resolution of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) said, usurped power which does not properly belong to the Executive, and for which there was no necessity whatever. My hon. friend from Halifax, I rather think, was unjust to the hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. McInerney). He referred to the hon. gentleman's quotation from Todd on "Parliamentary Government in the British Colonies," and he quoted my hon. friend so far as he went, and then said he did not go far enough, and he quoted the following sentence :—

Unless it may be presumed not only that both branches of the legislature will hold the expenditure itself unobjectionable, but also that they will approve of that expenditure being made in anticipation of their consent.

My hon. friend did not read far enough, said the hon. gentleman; and it is a very common practice, as you know, Mr. Speaker, being a member of the long robe, yourself, for learned gentlemen to read authorities and sometimes read judgments just so far as it suits them. But if my hon. friend had gone far enough, he would have read as follows :—

The Governor was justified in accepting, as the interpreter of the public will, a ministry presumed to possess the confidence of the legislature, but if the law required him to do one thing, and his Ministers recommended him another course, it was his plain duty to obey the law; and it would be idle to object that such obedience was unconstitutional; for the Governor is himself a branch of the legislature.

When my hon. friend from Kent was reading this authority, to my great surprise another hon. and learned friend, the member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Lount) asked whether in the colony in question the same legislation obtained. It does not obtain. What does that mean? It means that the case is stronger in Canada for the contention we make, because this legislation we are to-day discussing and interpreting, is not a clause giving license to a Ministry, but an Act restricting it in the exercise of a certain power. It restrains, it circumscribes, and it defines, and it so defines that no Ministry, as was stated eloquently in the speech delivered by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in 1891, has any right whatever for any other purpose than for expenditures absolutely necessary, unforeseen and unprovided for, to obtain warrants. And in fact, what is the marginal note to the clause in question? It is "accidents during recess." So that a state of things which comprises asking votes for all the departments and for running the whole civil business of the country was foreseen by the Ministry, which should have been allowed to provide for it: and you may just as well attempt to compress all the continent into a nutshell as to attempt to bring within four corners the extraordinary action of the Government in the present instance. It is a course that cannot in any way be justified from the point of view of constitutional precedent, or from the point of view of that common sense which some hon. gentlemen would enthroned above constitutional usage. The hon. member for South Oxford said that one ounce of common sense was worth a ton of precedents; but I apprehend, in this Parliament, when we are commencing another term, that if the Government of this country, a new Government, has taken upon itself an utterly unconstitutional position and adopted an unconstitutional course, it behooves every man who is anxious for the welfare of this country and for the dignity of this Parliament and for its efficiency, to present here the true claims of the constitution, of which we are all proud and which we all revere, and within whose bounds we roam, and be prepared to defend that constitution. The First Minister, as the head of the Government, not only in this case specially, but in his general position, has taken unconstitutional ground, and for that reason it is of more importance that in a particular case like this we should protest against it as unconstitutional. I state this in passing, merely to emphasize the point I am making, that my hon. friend has come to Parliament at this moment to ask for Estimates, and yet we have had a Speech from the Throne in which there was no legislation outlined and no explanation of policy given. There is a precedent, I grant, in British history for coming down to the House with a Queen's Speech of that character, but there is no precedent for adopting the course of the First Minister remaining all the time in the House without explaining from his place the policy of the Ministry. There is a precedent, I say, in the Imperial House of Commons, when Estimates were asked, and the Queen's Speech promised no legislation, but then the leader of the House explained the policy of his Government. The position at the present moment is, that ab initio this Government has taken up an unconstitutional position, and therefore, a fortiori, we are bound to condemn their course in regard to these warrants. I have quoted from Todd, and I want to make another quotation for the behoof mainly of the gentlemen of the long robe. I have in my hand "Thirty years of Colonial Government" by Bowdler, and during the former deadlock in Victoria of 1867-8; Lord Canterbury in a memorandum addressed to the Minister, wrote as follows :—

It is clearly the duty of a constitutional government to look to parliamentary supplies, whether annual or fixed, and to parliamentary supplies alone, for meeting the liabilities of the government; and it would be difficult to prove by abstract reasoning that the legitimate consequence, in a constitutional point of view, of the refusal of parliamentary supplies, is not the discontinuance of every service to the maintenance of which those supplies would, if available by the government, have been applied. Such a conclusion would, under existing circumstances involve the disbandment of the police, the cessation of discipline and inspection in the prisons and lunatic asylums, the discontinuance of the postal and railway services, and the complete disorganization of every branch of the public service, excepting those for which provision is made by special Appropriation Acts.

And again :

Attention has been called here to the fact that when, in 1848, one branch of the legislature of British Guiana, under the influence of the planter oligarchy, had "stopped the supplies" in that colony, the governor was positively instructed by the then Secretary of State (Earl Grey) that "he must strictly confine himself to his legal powers, and that those public services for which he was refused the means of providing must be discontinued, even if this involved disbanding the police, shutting up the hospitals, and an interruption of the regular administration of justice."

Earl Grey, one of the greatest constitutional statesmen that England has produced, wrote :

For my own part, I greatly regretted the certain increase of the difficulties of the colonists, and the great danger to their lives and property which might arise from their refusing to the government the means of meeting the charges of the civil establishment, including the police ; but I did not think that those who were determined to proceed to these extremities ought to be relieved from the consequences of their own conduct. On the contrary, I thought it absolutely necessary that they should be made to feel that we (i.e. the Imperial authorities) would not flinch from the course that we had deliberately adopted, and that they must be prepared to meet the consequences of their own measures, of which the responsibility would rest solely on themselves.

Sir, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) described the present Government as in the woods. He described them as in a fix. But, Sir, who got them into the wood ? He described them as in a great difficulty ; but who contrived the difficulty ? Why, Sir, what has happened is, that a great constitutional difficulty was created by the hon. gentlemen themselves, and then when they found themselves face to face with that constitutional difficulty, they aggravated the position and they committed a flagrant breach of the constitution in order to solve the difficulty they had themselves created. And when the hon. and learned member (Mr. Russell) speaks of the Government as having been in a position that they could not get out of, he condemns them by implication for having taken that course, if there was a constitutional alternative. I say to him, that there was such an alternative, and I will ask the attention of the House while I point out what the alternative was. To begin with, they could have met Parliament on the 16th of July. They could have asked for a vote of credit from Parliament the very day that in my opinion they broke into the constitution of this country. But, suppose they thought that would be inconvenient, what was to prevent them having a prorogation for twelve days. If they had prorogued for twelve days they could have met here with many of the Ministers in their seats ; they could have had a vote of credit then, and they could have had the civil servants paid up to the very hour any money was due them. Under these circumstances they could have avoided taking a course which if allowed to be a precedent, without the condemnation of this House of Commons, is a course capable of leading to the gravest possible evils in the future. One hon. member (Mr. Robertson) of Toronto who spoke with the authority of a great business man said that no harm had been done. Granted that no harm has been done ; granted that this money improperly obtained has been properly applied ; what is to prevent some other ministry not so perfect as the present one ; what, if we acknowledge this principle, is to prevent a corrupt ministry, after Parliament rises, going to the Governor General and raising millions of money on warrants, and probably contriving the greatest possible evil to Canada. What is to prevent such a corrupt ministry upsetting our aims for the progress of this country which we all cherish, and it may be, laying the foundation of a most reprehensible procedure which we might not be able to destroy when we had discovered it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that it is for this House to ask itself : Has there been an unconstitutional act committed by this Government ? If the House comes to the conclusion that an unconstitutional act has been committed, then I say it is the duty of every man in this House irrespective of party—in saying this I echo the appeal made from the Opposition benches in 1891 by the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who asked every man in this House to express his opinion on the constitutional aspect of a question as he brought it before Parliament—I say that it is the duty of every man in this House, to whatever side he belongs, to condemn the Government if the Government has been guilty of unconstitutional conduct. Sir, I want to refer very briefly to what the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) said in regard to the position taken by the Minister of Justice ; and I must say that I was rather surprised to hear the tone taken by the member for Simcoe in regard to the Minister of Justice. He himself declared what his opinion of the true reading of the clause in the Act was, and he told us that he differed from the Minister of Justice ; but he added : A man would be a brave man who would set up his opinion against the opinion of Sir Oliver Mowat. Sir, a man would be a brave man who might set up his opinion against that of the Minister of Justice if he were presiding as a judge. If the Minister of Justice were to go back to the bench that he once adorned, and were to pronounce an opinion, I would not take his opinion always ; but I would regard it with the greatest possible respect. I would consider him as an authority, but I would not treat his authority with any more deference than the authority of any other eminent lawyer ; and when we have eminent lawyers in this House endorsing our view of the interpretation of that clause, and have Maxwell here as an authority to confirm it, I do not think it requires an extraordinary amount of temerity to differ from the Minister of Justice when he is pronouncing an opinion, not merely as a lawyer, but as a member of a Government and a politician. And, Sir, my respect for that authority, speaking as a politician, is greatly diminished when I find that gentleman in another place, in response to questions in regard to another matter in which this Government is also concerned—questions in regard to the legal position and the legal rights of civil servants, and what they ought to do and ought not to do—speaking in this manner, as he is reported to have done :

Sir Oliver Mowat said it was only a cause for removal. The question of removal was at the discretion of the Government. He frankly admitted that in Ontario officials worked "for the common good." They had plenty of opportunity of considering what would happen them did a Conservative Government come in, but the fact was that a Conservative Government did not come in.

Sir, when a man in his eminent position talks with that levity on a subject like that, I think it is calculated to minimize our respect for an opinion which I must still contend he gives not merely as a lawyer, but in part as a politician.

Now, Sir, in the course of this debate my hon. friend from West Lambton (Mr. Lister), to my immense surprise, also eulogized the Minister of Justice in this matter. I am sorry that hon. member is not here, because I should have liked to remind him that when this Government was formed he was very free with opinions about the ability, the authority, and the complete mental equipment of the present Minister of Justice, which were not quite consonant with the high opinion that he has expressed in the course of this debate. However, that is neither here nor there. The only point I wish to make on that subject is this, that I do not think that this House should feel that the argument from authority which the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) gave us, is an argument that we should pay any attention to whatever. I do not dwell on the $7,000 vote, because I think that has been sufficiently dealt with.

Now, Sir, in 1887, when this subject was brought before the House by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), he gave as a reason for bringing it before the House that we were at the commencement of a new term, and that there were a number of new members in the House of Commons. If my memory serves me correctly, there are a larger number of new members in this House of Commons than there were in the House of Commons of 1887, and I do not think that any subject could be brought before a House containing new members which would be of more importance than questions that relate to the main function of the House of Commons, and that touch our constitutional position. I repeat again the proposition I made at the commencement of these remarks, that there is no function of this House so important as the function of controlling expenditure; and in my opinion there is nothing that should be so impressed upon all of us as this, that it is our duty to scan with a lynx eye the expenditure, and the action of the Executive in that regard. Well, Sir, I have heard remarks something like this in regard to the Executive: "Oh, they won't do this, they won't do that, they won't do the other." That, Sir, is not a position in which I have ever regarded the Executive. I have never held—and perhaps it is because I received some of my political education in looking down on the English House of Commons—I have never held that it was the proper course of a member of this House to completely efface himself before the Ministry of the day. I have never held that this House should efface itself. On the contrary, what is the Ministry? Only servants of the Crown; and not only servants of the Crown, but servants of this Parliament; and, being servants of this Parliament, servants of the people of Canada; and I say that it is our duty not only to criticise what they do, but to press upon their attention those things that we think should be done in the interest of the people of Canada; and if they will not do the things that we think they ought to do, we should, by every means in our power, force them to do them. I do not hold that it is wholesome for a Ministry, especially a Ministry just come into power, or for the House of Commons or the country, that Parliament should efface itself before them. For that reason I am glad that there are a considerable number of independent men in this Parliament, and we shall see whether these independent men will leaven public life to the extent that it was fondly dreamed by many they would do. This clause, Sir, is a lion in the path of a Ministry that would seek by indirection to accomplish either corrupt ends or ends that this Parliament had not approved of; and if Parliament relaxes the hold that this clause gives it on the Ministry, it gives up a great part of its power. If the control which this clause indicates should be exercised by Parliament is given up, and if we take the view that provided a Ministry has a majority—which seems to be one of the arguments that impressed one hon. gentleman—and can hope to get a majority in the other House, then, forsooth, the Ministry can do anything; that is not a view which I think will commend itself to any student of the English constitution. I consider that, Sir, a most dangerous view. It is a view that might give us a Ministry bent on carrying out just what its own whim would dictate, and bent upon courses that would be against the wishes of the people and against the best wishes of the country.

Now, the hon. member for South Oxford referred to the fact that previous governments had made expenditures by means of Governor General's warrants, but he did not attempt to go into the instances in which they had done so. He himself said that two blacks would not make one white. But there is another reason. I have been diligent to look at what was done with regard to those warrants, and I could not find a single case in the past twenty-five years to parallel what was done by this Government. What do you find? You find, for instance, that in order to eke the expenditure on certain works a certain sum was needed, and to obtain this the warrant was issued. But there is not a single instance of a wholesale warrant such as that we are now dealing with, a warrant providing for the expenditure in a large number of departments, and in fact a course which, if we sanction it and make it a precedent, will enable any future Ministry to entirely override the control of Parliament over the expenditure. Not merely shall we have what the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) declared an occasional invasion of the constitution, but we shall have, as in the present instance, a violation of the constitution. I consider that the resolution of the hon. member for York puts the case very clearly:

That under those circumstances this House is of opinion that the issue of the said warrants was in contravention of the well understood principle of parliamentary control and abuse of the powers vested in the Governor General in Council in the said Act and by the said Act and a usurpation fraught with danger to public property and constitutional government.

The only excuse that can be given is that the Government was in the woods and had to get out, and many hon. gentlemen seem to think that there was no alternative. I have shown that there was a constitutional alternative, that these hon. gentlemen who have admitted that if there was a constitutional alternative the Government was bound to take it, must condemn the course of the Government as an invasion of the constitution, as overriding the control of Parliament in a high-handed way, as a wanton breaking in of the very walls and citadel of our constitution, and as a course that deserves the condemnation of Parliament, and such as will have the condemnation of the country.

Mr. SPROULE. After the lengthy arguments that have been advanced pro and con, it is not my intention to delay the House long, but as I do not wish to give a silent vote, I am constrained to state a few of the reasons why I support this motion. This is one of the most important questions which has engaged the attention of Parliament for a long time, because it is at the foundation of our system of constitutional government; and a violation of one of the principles upon which that constitution is based would be very serious in its consequences. Therefore, we are bound to guard that constitution with the greatest care. What was the statute intended for? It was intended to prevent the abuse of power by the Executive, to prevent their raising and paying money in a way that is contrary to law. There is no doubt that the history of the British Empire affords instance after instance where we have had grave offences committed upon the rights of the people where there was great injustice done the Parliament of the day, where the Crown was encroaching on the rights of the people to an extent that it was absolutely necessary to provide some remedy; and we, as one of the colonial dependencies of the British Empire, have endeavoured to provide a remedy, and have embodied it in the shape of a law, under which our Government have been acting for years. The ablest parliamentarians and some of the ablest lawyers we have had in this House have given expression to their views on this question; and so far as I can read, the highest legal opinion of the House is that the act of the present Government is not only a violation of the constitution, but an illegal act. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) said that ours is the only colonial dependency which has this provision for the Executive raising and using money, and he asked what would the Government have done had they not resorted to it. What have they done in other dependencies of the British Empire under circumstances quite as difficult to overcome? They called Parliament together and got a vote of credit or they adjourned Parliament from day to day until such time as the money was provided, and no doubt the hon. gentlemen who, for the time being, control the destinies of Canada could have done the same thing. The consensus of legal opinion in the House is that the interpretation put upon the Act by the hon. members for York and Pictou is the correct one. The whole speech of the hon. member for South Oxford was an apology rather than a defence. He did not claim that he had acted in strict accordance with the law, but he said that under the circumstances, it was good policy. Now, it may be good policy to do something that is entirely illegal and unconstitutional, but it is not justification for the violation of the law or a breach of the constitution. There appears to be a difference of opinion as to how this law should read, as to whether the word "or" should be used as found in the Act or the word "and" substituted for it, but the most eminent lawyers, according to my reading, agree that it is a proper reading of the clause to read the word "and" instead of "or." According to this reading, the law requires that the expenditure should be both unforeseen and unprovided for.

Well, no one can pretend that the expenditure was unforeseen. Some have urged that the present Parliament could not have foreseen it because many of us were not members of the former House. But the point is whether the Government of that day had foreseen it. There can be no doubt that the expenditure was foreseen since an attempt was made last session to provide for it, and because that attempt was frustrated by hon. members on the opposite side of the House, who were then in Opposition, that can be no justification for the course taken by this Government. It is true that the expenditure was unprovided for, but my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has given the strongest reason why the contention that because it was unprovided for, the Government were justified in obtaining the warrants cannot hold. As the hon. gentleman pointed out, if a Ministry were in power who would not be as honest as those holding office, and who would be more venal, and who had a sufficient majority to support them, whether right or wrong, they might ask Parliament to vote only a million dollars and raise the other thirty-five millions by Governor General's warrants on the plea of urgent need. And, therefore, I think that argument cannot by any means hold good. Now, what did the hon. gentlemen fall back upon? They fell back upon excuses. They did not claim they had not violated the law; they did not claim that the Act was, strictly speaking, constitutional; but they tried to justify themselves by saying that the money was urgently needed and that this was the only way to get it. They say the country would have suffered, if they had not got it. These things are no justification. The man on the highway, who has no money, may feel that he urgently needs it; but that would not justify him in putting a pistol to the head of the first passer-by, demanding his pocket-book. But the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) says that this is the only way in which they could conveniently get the money. The only way some men can conveniently get money is to forge a note. But that does not justify the act. Nor is such an argument a justification in this case. One may devise ways and means where another man would fail to do so. But because a man charged with the duty did not see any other way to raise the money, that does not justify them in doing an illegal act. Then, hon. gentlemen say a strict and legal interpretation of the law is so and so, and that the Minister of Justice, who gives advice to the Government, is justified in advising them that they had a right to take this step. I would like to ask these gentlemen, members of the legal profession, a question. Suppose that Act applied to individuals, and there were penalties attached to the violation of it. Suppose a private individual, who had violated the law, went to these gentlemen and paid them $25 fee, would they tell him: You are not guilty:

you are strictly within your legal rights and justified in doing what you did? There is not one of these gentlemen would give that advice to a private individual. And, if it could not be correctly given to a private individual, it cannot be held proper and legitimate for a government. If a fair interpretation would not justify the act in a private individual, certainly it would not in the case of a government. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) endeavoured to enlighten the House on the subject, and I think he gave the best illustration of the old adage: When you have no case, abuse the plaintiff's counsel. He did not advance argument, nor did he attempt to give a fair interpretation of the law; the whole course of his speech was abuse of the Opposition. The hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Lount) talked around the question, without trying to grapple with it. His exposition reminds me of what the professor said when he was asked to give a definition of chemistry. He said: You take an effervescent, and add a dequescent; there will be a precipitation; that is a conglomeration and amounts to a demonstration. That was as plain to my mind as the hon. gentleman made the legal aspect of this case. The hon. member is a gentleman of high legal attainments, no doubt. But I said to a friend, while he was speaking: I believe he is afraid to put on record his legal opinion on this question, for fear that some time in the future it may be quoted against him in the House. He knows his friends have done what was unjustifiable, and, as he cannot offer a proper defence, he is simply trying to mystify his hearers. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) gave several reasons. For instance, he asked: If the House had been called together, how do we know that the gentlemen of the Opposition would have voted the Estimates without delay and trouble; we know they are not disposed to be too agreeable now, and, if they had been called together in the dog-days, what would they have done? That is a gratuitous assumption, and one that we have no right to make. We must assume that men come here to do their duty and to get through the work before them in due course. I am surprised that the hon. gentleman should make such an assumption. But he gave several other reasons that I thought about as unfair. He said: What else could the Government do? And because he could not tell what else they could do, therefore, he held that they were justified in breaking the law. I do not agree with him. He said that this was the most convenient way for them to raise the money. But that did not make it legal or constitutional. Urgent need is given as a justification. But, as I have stated, you might cite a hundred cases of urgent need, but merely to establish the fact of that urgent need is not to justify the violating of an Act of Parliament. Nor can that justification be fairly urged in this case. In this debate cases have been cited in English history where there was the most urgent need, where not only one branch, but many branches of the civil service were blocked, to the serious injury of the country. But that was not given as a reason to justify the Government in violating the law. It is said that the service of the country would have suffered, if this course had not been taken. Many people suffer because things are not done, but though the suffering were ten times as great as it is, that would be no justification for violation of the law. But is it a fact that any great suffering would result? Would any great hardship result, if the members of the civil service were not paid on the 15th, seeing their money is not earned until the end of the month? Would there be any injustice to those members of the service who are not paid until the last of the month, if they are not paid until that time? The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) admitted that, with regard to a portion of the money, the act might be illegal—some $7,000 or $10,000. That shows either great laxity on the part of the individuals charged with the duty, or a want of knowledge or desire to do right. If they were not sufficiently conversant with their duties to know that they were seeking to get money in an illegal manner, that fact is not a great compliment to their intelligence. If they showed negligence of their duty, if they overlooked it, it is equally against them as business men; and if they did not know it and still raised this money illegally, I can only say it was much worse still. Now, whatever justification there might have been for issuing the first Governor General's warrant, there is certainly, in my opinion, none for the second. It is contended by some that there would have been considerable hardship if the first warrant had not been issued, but certainly that cannot apply to the second, because the second was issued only one day before this House was called together. We have already voted, within a period of less than one hour, over $460,000 for militia purposes in Canada. Is that an evidence that the House would not be prepared to assist the Government in getting a vote of credit in case an emergency like this arose, provided it was asked for at the beginning of Parliament? I say there is no reason to believe that the Opposition in this House would not join willingly in giving the Government a vote of credit to carry on the affairs of the country, provided there was need. The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton), I think, said that if the Government had met the House they could not have got the money. Well, if the House would not have given it, there must have been something wrong; and from his standpoint he is assuming that there was something wrong, because if it was right, the House would have given it without any trouble, and I say I am justified in believing that the House would have given it, provided the Government had asked it, as a great deal of that money, and in fact all of it, was needed for payments that would accrue after the meeting of this House. I say whatever justification there may have been for issuing the first warrant, there is certainly none for the second.

Now, it seems to me there are a few reasons why we should support the amendment of the hon. member for York. First, because we should be very careful not to establish a bad precedent, and I think hon. gentlemen will admit that it would be a bad precedent if that act were sanctioned by this Parliament. One hon. gentleman has said, Oh, it is a matter of no importance, and you have no right to challenge the conduct of the Government; but the Minister of Trade and Commerce said with regard to that:

I admit frankly that the present Government assumed a grave responsibility, for which they may be rightly called to account before this House, in issuing the Governor General's warrants which they did upon the dates the hon. gentleman has referred to.

Now, he recognizes that it is the right and duty of this House to call them to account for it. The hon. gentleman gave several instances where he himself and other supporters of the Government have admitted that the very principle we are contending for now is the correct principle. Well, because the hon. gentlemen opposite did not give heed to their own arguments, is that a reason to say that the arguments are not sound? Now, hon. gentlemen who advanced those arguments—and they were advanced by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, by the Hon. Mr. Blake, by the Hon. Mr. Mills, and by several other hon. gentlemen on that side of the House—they were either wrong then, or they were right. They advanced them believing them to be right, I assume they did, because I have no right to assume that they are not honest men. They believed their arguments to be sound and applicable then to the very question at issue to-day. Now, if they were correct when they were in Opposition, they must be correct to-day when they are in power. If their arguments were correct then in condemning a government who were violating that very principle, then their arguments are equally correct to-day; and it is no justification to say that because the arguments were not heeded by the Government of the day, that therefore they were unsound. It would be stultifying their own manhood, it would be declaring that they were dishonest at the time, and that the arguments they advanced then were not sound. Now, if those arguments were sound when they were cited, I say that no stronger condemnation could be given of the conduct of the men who were instrumental in issuing those warrants than those very arguments. When men have been brought face to face with their own records, with their own reasoning, with their own interpretation of law, and they won't admit it, what conclusion can we come to with regard to them? Certainly not a very favourable one. Then I say we are justified in supporting this resolution because, in the first place, we do not want to establish a bad precedent. We know how prone constitutional lawyers are to have regard to precedents, and we know how prone judges are to have regard to precedents, and how often lawyers quote precedents as a justification for this or that. Then I say, knowing that, it becomes of great importance that we look well into it, and not establish a bad precedent, and I think many hon. gentlemen on that side of the House admit themselves that if we allowed this to go without challenge, it would be establishing a bad precedent. Certainly if we establish this precedent it will be quoted by constitutional authorities in the future as a justification for doing the same thing. Then I oppose it because I believe it to be illegal. I will not take my own interpretation of the law, but I will take the strict interpretation of the law given by the hon. member for North Simcoe, by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, by the member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), and by several other prominent legal gentlemen who, on that side of the House, have agreed with the interpretation put upon the law by the hon. member for York. Then I say it is an illegal act, and for that reason I support the amendment. I support the amendment because the act of the Government is unconstitutional, and because so much trouble has arisen in the early history of our country, and in other dependencies of the British Empire, where violations of the constitution have taken place. We are supposed to know our constitution better than those who have gone before us, we should profit by the experience of the ages, and for that reason, if for no other, I shall support the amendment. I support it because it condemns the Government for doing what I believe to be an unconstitutional act, and what I believe would be establishing a bad precedent, if we allowed it to pass without challenging it from this side of the House.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. As there are so few members in the House at this hour, I think it would be becoming on my part to move that this debate be adjourned.

The PRIME MINISTER. No, go on.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Well, Sir, the law on this subject, is as follows:—

If, when Parliament is not in session, any accident happens to any public work or building which requires an immediate outlay for the repair thereof; or any other occasion arises when an expenditure not foreseen or provided for by Parliament is urgently and immediately required for the public good; then, on report of the Minister of Finance and the Receiver

Mr. SPROULE.

General that there is no parliamentary provision, and of the Minister having charge of the service in question that the necessity is urgent, the Governor in Council may order a special warrant to be prepared to be signed by the Governor General for the issue of the amount estimated to be required.

The question before the House is whether under the circumstances that occurred it was advisable and justifiable for the Government to ask for a warrant from His Excellency the Governor General in order to cover the amounts required to pay the current salaries of the officials of the Government. The elections which have just been held took place on 23rd June last, as every hon. member of this House will remember very well. On 10th July, the late Administration handed in its resignation, that date being very shortly after the elections. But from the moment the result of the elections was known through the press we were informed that hon. gentlemen sitting to-day on the other side of the House had a Cabinet already organized, and were prepared to take the positions which were to become vacant, and also that their policy was well and carefully laid down and prepared, it having been discussed during the elections. Therefore, any further delay in the organizing of a new Government was not required, at least in accordance with the statements which appeared in the public press. A good many days were allowed to pass in organizing a Government, which to-day is not yet complete, because there is still a portfolio, which is supposed to belong to the province which I have the honour to represent, not yet filled, but that is not the fault of Parliament or of the law. If fault there be, it is the fault of the party in power. The new Government, after this attempt to organize, instead of allowing this House to meet on 17th July, as duly called, postponed the assembling of Parliament, when there was no absolute necessity for doing so. The House might have met as duly called on 17th July, and thereby the necessity of issuing those special warrants would have been avoided. Then it was through the incapacity of the Government to meet the House, as was its duty, that involved the necessity of this breach of the law in regard to the issue of Governor General's warrants. As has been stated by some hon. gentlemen, if an excuse can be brought for the issue of the first warrant, the same ground does not exist with respect to the second.

An hon. MEMBER. Yes.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I do not see why the hon. gentleman should say "yes," because the latter one was issued the day before the opening of Parliament, and within twenty-four hours the power might have been secured in due course from the proper authority. I say, that the first important act of the present Administration has been a breach of the law, and a breach that has on several occasions been condemned by leading members of the present Government.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Then it has been a common practice, apparently, on the part of the late Government.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. It has been a common thing on the part of the present Government to reproach the late Government for doing what hon. gentlemen opposite now think they are justified in doing, because they are in power. All that was bad when we were in power has become good, because hon. gentlemen are now in the positions we occupied previously; and I may say, though perhaps it has no relation to the present subject, that judging by the way hon. gentlemen are acting they not only steal our faults, but they are on the eve of stealing our old policy, and we will know after next session whether even our fiscal and trade policy has not been stolen by the other side of the House, because hon. gentlemen in getting into those seats will find them warm enough not only to accept them, but to accept our policy as well.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Then you will support them.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Yes; if they frankly and honestly adopt our policy I will give them a frank and honest support, and I believe every hon. gentleman on this side of the House will do the same. On the present occasion the Government have made a mistake; not only have they made a mistake, but they have broken the law, for they have taken from Parliament the power to vote public money and order its expenditure, and they have taken the responsibility of making an expenditure which is entirely under the control of the House. If that should be allowed, why should we meet,—why should we incur this expenditure for calling the House together to vote Estimates? If the Administration has power to get from the Governor General a warrant in order to cover not only extraordinary expenditures which may be required, but all expenses for running the machine, what is the use of having a Parliament and a legislature, and of calling upon the people to elect members to come here and transact the public business of the country. I am surprised that the first important act of the present Administration should be one that cannot be called anything else but a breach of the law. If they keep on at that rate, if they are allowed to think they are vested with power to run the country just as they please, whether it is legal or not, I am afraid, Sir, that before very long the people of Canada will have discovered that they have made a mistake in entrusting the present Administration with the reins of government. At this late hour of the night and late stage of the debate, I shall not review the arguments brought forward in the discussion of this important question, but I merely confine myself to the wording of the law, which I interpret, not as a member of the bar, but as a practical business man. Under the circumstances, I fail to see that there was any ground at all for the Government to rest its case upon in securing the money under these warrants. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I enter my protest against this action of the Government, and I will gladly support the motion made by my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). I wish to know if the Government would consent to an adjournment of the debate, as it is now after ten o'clock, and there are very few members in the House.

The PRIME MINISTER. Better proceed.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). Mr. Speaker, in this matter, which has been discussed for some time in the House, we have a question of a peculiarly important character, and one on which, perhaps, many members of the House wish to state the reasons which may induce them to vote on the one side or the other. It is only at rare intervals that such an important question can come up for discussion. It is very seldom that a similar chain of events can possibly occur, because, as has been frankly admitted from the other side of the House, the circumstances surrounding the case under consideration are altogether exceptional, and it might be a long time in the life of many of those present before there can be a recurrence of them, or before such a peculiar straining of the constitutional power of the Government could be known in this country. The taking of large sums of money by the Government through the agency of Governor General's warrants has been defended, and justified by hon. gentlemen supporting the Government, for a variety of reasons and in a variety of ways. There is one rather singular circumstance which has arisen in this debate. Although the occasion is one of great gravity, and although the Government is being charged with, perhaps, the gravest offence it could be guilty of in a constitutionally governed country, namely, that of violating the constitution and not administering, with strict regard, the laws of the country; yet, so far, the members of the Government have not seen fit—with the exception of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright)—to set up any of their own members to defend this act of theirs and to meet this attack of the Opposition. A number of their supporters have spoken, it is true, and they have possibly urged the same arguments, with perhaps as much force as they could have been urged by Ministers, yet, when students of our history come to read this volume of "Hansard," and try to reach a conclusion from this debate, they will find that these gentlemen who are charged with acting unconstitutionally and without due regard to the laws of the country, have not thought proper to defend themselves on the floor of Parliament against the attacks of the Opposition, which have been, I maintain, urged with great candour, with great fairness, and I think I may also be pardoned for saying, with great ability as well. The attack in this case was led by the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), who certainly showed that the occasion was one of serious importance. He brought his great and perhaps unrivalled powers as a debater to the service of his country on this occasion, and he made the case against the Government so strong that I am sure that every one who heard this debate must have remarked that even so practised and accomplished a debater as the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) did not show to advantage in replying to the attack made by the member for York (Mr. Foster). The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) seemed hampered, and gave every manifestation of the fact that he felt he was defending a bad cause. Perhaps it would occur to the members of the House: it would, very possibly, occur to citizens of the country who come to a knowledge of our transactions from reading the daily press, that the great discussion in which we are now engaged in this high court of Parliament, in this grand assize of the nation, as the Premier characterized Parliament, the other day—it would perhaps occur to them that this was apparently a waste of time. We find that on the Government side of the House there is a majority ready to use the force of numbers, ready to call into play what might be called its brute strength, to vote down and to repel the attack led by the Opposition. On the other hand, the Opposition are pledged by the action taken by their leaders, and by the opinions they have themselves expressed, to adhere to the position they have taken, and to persist in this trial of strength until they are actually defeated by that recourse to the force of numbers which it is in the power of the Government to use in their defence. Although we know beforehand what the result may be, and although we know that the Government have marshalled their friends to their support, and that although the arguments of this side of the House may conclusively prove that a great constitutional principle has been violated and an Act of this Parliament administered without due regard to its sense and meaning, still we owe it to our constituents and to our duties as representatives of the people of Canada, to protect, as far as we can, the basic principles of our constitution. Now, Sir, it might be argued that for that reason it was not the duty of the Opposition to persist in this attack. It might be held that it would have been enough for some representative gentleman on this side of the House to have simply stated the opinion of the Opposition, and to have given expression to the arguments which could be used against the action of the Government, and then, recognizing the fact that in the end the Government could not submit to their view, but must marshal their supporters and overcome the Opposition, by force of numbers, allow the matter to pass, being content simply with entering their protest against what has been done. But, Sir, it is not in that way that an Opposition must manage its business, or represent that portion of the population of the country that it is sent here to represent: and I may say, referring to the fact that we are discussing what is admitted to be the great, the central, the most important principle of all these constitutional principles around which our system of Government has grown up from rude and weak beginnings to that position in which it stands to-day, when the people represented in the House of Commons are so powerful, and so completely is their authority acknowledged, that one of the best and ablest speakers on the Government side of the House—I refer to the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell)—argued that we should not consider this subject at all; because, he maintained, even if in this particular the Government acted unconstitutionally, even if in this particular the rights of the Commons of Canada had been invaded, and injustice and wrong had been done, yet so strongly entrenched is the Commons of Canada in this great, inherited right of parliamentary control that even a breach of privilege or an injury done to the constitution could not be permanent, and why? Because that hon. gentleman would have gone on, if he had unfolded his argument, to say that even if such offences could occur, they would only be repeated with sufficient frequency to attract the attention of the people, and to arouse in their hearts and minds a sentiment that there was danger to their rights, and they would rally to the support of the Opposition, and drive from power any Government that was presuming too far on the support of its majority in Parliament. But, Sir, it is not proper that this act should be allowed to pass unchallenged; for if, as we on this side contend, a constitutional principle has been violated and an Act of Parliament has been strained in its interpretation by this Administration for their own convenience, then I maintain that it is our bounden duty not only to speak, but by our votes to mark in the most solemn manner possible our protest to show that even if the Government has, for reasons of expediency and policy, made up its mind to step beyond the line that marks its rights and privileges and powers, the representatives of the people in Parliament—the representatives of the minority, if I have to use that expression—are determined to direct the attention of the people to what has been done, and to make it apparent and evident that the Government of this country cannot commit such acts and hope to escape condemnation.

Now, Sir, no better proof of a bad and weak case can be found than the fact that poor or weak arguments are advanced in its defence; and when you find hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House advancing the most contradictory arguments, one gentleman answering another, and one practically tearing to tatters the arguments of another, you must come to the conclusion, if you believe in reason and common sense, that one or more of these contradictory sets of arguments are unsound and futile; and the very fact that they are set up in defence of the position the Government assume ought to be a sufficient proof to the people of the country that the Government have in this matter acted in a manner which they cannot successfully defend. Take, for instance, the argument of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). What was the wretched expedient—and I regret that I should be required to speak thus of the argument of a man whose great ability in debate is fully recognized here—what was the wretched expedient to which he was driven in defending the Government's course? He was driven to that wretched expedient, which he had to set up as his main defence, that his party had in the last session of the late Parliament resorted to an unconstitutional act, in order to deprive the Government of Canada, on the eve of dissolution, of those supplies which were necessary for carrying on the affairs of the country. A similar act on the part of an opposition in Great Britain would be called a constitutional wrong-doing. The hon. gentleman justifies the action of the Government in this instance in that act of wrong-doing perpetrated by himself and his supporters; and he was followed in the same argument by some other hon. gentlemen, in whose hands it was less unbecoming, because they do not occupy the same high position in this country as that hon. gentleman. Some of these hon. gentlemen have treated this matter with levity, and with expressions of contempt thrown across the floor at various hon. members on this side, while the majority at their back have encouraged and justified them by laughing at and contemning the efforts of the Opposition in condemning their conduct. I suppose it is not a very original observation to say that the criticism of the Government might be pursued on two different lines—first, on the line of legality of the course they followed, and secondly, on the line of the expediency of that course. The junior member for Halifax twitted his colleague the senior member (Mr. Borden) by saying that that hon. member, while professing to treat this as a legal question, had only devoted two or three minutes to the consideration of the legal question, and had devoted the rest of his time to considering the policy of the Government's course. Did not the junior member for Halifax fall into precisely the same error? He devoted a portion of his time, it is true, to the legal aspect of the question; and while I admire that hon. gentleman's legal ability, I found it exceedingly difficult to follow his argument. In fact it was so complicated that it realized to my mind that thicket in which he said the Government of this country were at one time involved. But the main, almost the only, defence has been that it was a matter of expediency, or a matter of policy; and I suppose the latter is the better word for them to use, though expediency is the honest word to use; because if their course is described justly, it must be called a course of expediency; and hon. gentlemen do well to rely on the defence that it was a policy of expediency; because the defence set up by the Minister of Trade and Commerce was set up only by wresting the sense of the statute, provided we are to be guided in determining that sense by the lawyers of eminence in the House who followed him; for, while he maintained that three different sets of circumstances were described in the statute—one, that of sudden accident, one, that of unforeseen circumstances, and one that of unprovided circumstances—under which the power of the statute might be involved, he was only enabled to do so by an interpretation of the Act as to which he was flatly contradicted both by the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) and the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). These gentlemen amply sustained the contention of the hon. member for York, who argued that in interpreting the statute, its proper sense and meaning could only be learned by treating the word "or" where it occurs as "and," and I am sure that any one who listened to the argument of the hon. member for York that if you did accept the statute in the form in which it is and did not substitute "and" for "or," you would make the whole statute practically inoperative, except as regards its first clause describing the conditions where a sudden accident or catastrophe occurred, could not fail to be convinced. If you admit that in addition to the circumstances of some unforeseen accident or catastrophe happening, causing loss which had to be met by expenditure on the part of the Government, the Government may take the same means to raise money in other cases not provided for, then you give the Government of the day free permission to draw on the treasury when it pleases. It may happen at any time that some service will not be provided for, and apparently all that is necessary is to go to the Minister of Justice and tell him that in your opinion there is urgent necessity for certain expenditure which has not been provided for; and if he is disposed to accept your reasoning, you can obtain a Governor General's warrant by virtue of his opinion. I may say that the urgent necessity of the expenditure in this case has not been attempted to be proved by any one. If you can point to the fact that through your own carelessness or neglect or indifference you did not provide for a certain service, this Government or any other Government will be in a position, provided it is armed with a Minister of Justice whose authority is as great as his interpretation of the law is poor, to draw any money it may require under Governor General's warrants. That would not be a safe position for the country to be in. The control of Parliament over expenditure is the great principle which is at the basis of a free Parliament. Without this inspiring idea in the minds of the Commons of England, without their determination not to allow the Government to spend any money without their sanction, the Commons of England would never have fought their way through centuries of difficulty and struggle to the full and free acceptance of that principle which is the right they most dearly cherish to-day. This was never better put than it was by the junior member for Halifax, when he said it was so strongly impressed in the minds of the Anglo-Saxon people that it is the corner stone of our parliamentary system and the palladium of our liberties, that even a breach of it endorsed by Parliament would fail to disturb the confidence of the people in the sense of security by which they hold that principle. That is one reason why we ought in this Parliament to give the clearest decision on that question; and it is only to be hoped that this precedent, about to be established by the followers of the Government, may soon be overruled by some later and sounder decision to be given in this Parliament. We know very well that progress is not made without certain retrogressions. We know that the tide does not advance with a steady even flow, but that it appears to retire only to advance again steadily and gradually until it covers the shore. In like manner we look upon these ebbs and flows in the advance of our parliamentary institutions as mere temporary and trifling mutations, and it is to be hoped that even if this Parliament be now imbued by the idea of policy and expediency which appears to prevail on the Government benches and the necessity to uphold party interests, to the extent of recording upon "Hansard" what we all must look upon as a most dangerous and unfortunate innovation, it will at an early day take an opportunity to show that it acknowledges its error and return to the sound principle of only authorizing the expenditure of money to carry on the business of the country, which has been raised by the Government with the sanction of Parliament in the ordinary constitutional manner. The Government in this matter, as in a great many others, is in a very unfortunate, unhappy and difficult position, one in which they deserve no sympathy from hon. gentlemen on this side. I believe that they have been led into this morass by the very fact that they allowed themselves to be governed by what they conceive the requirements of party, and during last session followed an unconstitutional course. It is sad and regrettable to see a man who has held so long the proud position which the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) has held as one of the leaders of his party, argue that he and his party were justified last session in refusing the supplies to Her Majesty, and embarrassing the then Government. Why did he take this course? Because he knew that by following that course he would derive for himself and his friends a certain amount of party advantage and place his opponents in an embarrassing position. If he did not rise to any higher idea, he was not particularly sensitive to the shame in which he stood, he was honest enough to admit frankly that no consideration of the necessities of the public business had weight with him but that the only consideration which did have weight with him and his supporters was to embarrass the Government. Was that a proper and dignified course for the Liberal party of Canada to follow? I believe that no greater humiliation shall ever come to the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce than to have it recorded that he exposed his own shame and the shame of his party by his defence in this House of their course last session, and I think that would be punishment enough. If hon. gentlemen on this side, when they occupied the Government benches, had no higher idea of their duty and responsibility, if they had no idea that their positions were for any other purpose than party advantage, they might have resorted to some expedient which would have prevented the Opposition from embarrassing them. Why, when they found themselves leading a hostile Parliament, when they found a deliberate organized conspiracy to defeat all their measures and deny the means to the Government of carrying on the administration, why should they not have used their powers and prerogative to prorogue Parliament and send these gentlemen who obstructed the business back home, and then have recourse to Governor General's warrants. They could have administered the government of the country by Governor General's warrants just as well as hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. If this country was given merely as a tool or instrument to be used by the Opposition of that day for their own party advantage and to place certain gentlemen in power, it could not have been used more shamelessly and unblushingly than it was used by the late Opposition in the last session of Parliament. And I simply say that they are going on in the ignoble course upon which they entered last session, a course which they know themselves is in defiance of constitutional usage and that wrests the plain meaning of the Act of the legislature. And for what? Is it for the good of the country;

to set up a high example of how government should be carried on in a country containing an intelligent population which can send to Parliament such men as those who have adorned this legislature from confederation to the present day? Is it to show such an example and teach such a lesson to the world, or is it simply to use this country as a means for the party advantage of certain gentlemen? Now, Sir, I maintain that in so far as the defence has been attempted on the line that the action of the Government was justifiable, because circumstances compelled them to follow this course, that these circumstances, were such as induced them to refuse to vote supplies in the last Parliament, and that they can fairly blame the late Government for creating these circumstances, is a complete failure; or, if it is a success, I congratulate hon. gentlemen on the position in which they have placed themselves in the eyes of Canada by achieving that success. But, Sir, I am sure that even if we abandon the consideration of the general principle, even if we abandon the consideration of the Act in its entirety, all we have to do is to look into some of the details of this transaction to see plainly that if these gentlemen have not acted very irregularly or followed out a course of wrong-doing, they have at least shown the utmost laxity in administering their duties as the Government of Canada. Even if we admit that they were justified in drawing from the Treasury on Governor General's warrants, such sums as would pay for certain services of the country, will that justify them in all the expenditures they have made under these warrants? Why, Sir, it was admitted here on the floor of Parliament by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that in respect of one at least of the sums they have drawn from the Treasury, their position was absolutely indefensible. And, if this Government, after all its promises of purity and good government, after having been prepared by eighteen years of discipline and eighteen years of example of how a Government should be conducted, after coming into power, within the space of a few days has done so great a wrong as that we are now dealing with, and, after the passage of another month has repeated that wrong,—can it be fairly contended, as it has been contended—that the hon. Premier of this country is a gentleman of such brilliant statesmanship? And we have heard so much of his statesmanship during the course of this contest. Can it be an evidence of his statesmanship that he has in his very first act, violated a constitutional principle, wrested the statute and done a great wrong? For we have it on the testimony of his own Minister of Trade and Commerce, delivered here upon the floor of Parliament that, in so far as $7,000 included in these warrants is concerned, the position of the Government is absolutely indefensible.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). Some of these hon. gentlemen laugh. They are good at laughing. They have $7,000 to which they are not entitled.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Has it come down to that.

Mr. BELL (Pictou.) We may not have come down to it, but we have it as a starting point, and we have it on the authority of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. And if we are not misled by the statements of the hon. member for York, when the Supplementary Estimates are laid on the Table, we shall find that we have climbed from $7,000 to many millions; and one more of those promises, one more of those illusory hopes held out to the people of Canada by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, will have gone to pieces. If it be true, as I believe it is, that the Government are involved in this Act, which certainly is going to be a bad record for them—the first blunder so far as we know, though there may be others—if they are involved in it by their own wrong-doing of last session, then it is one fine instance of retributive justice, and we may hope to see them suffer from the same cause in many cases in the future. In my mind it is impossible to defend the position of the Government, and the best proof of that is the fact that I cited when I began to address the House—that the argument of one of their supporters are answered by those of another. The Minister of Trade and Commerce in his interpretation of the law is flatly contradicted, not only by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), but by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), both of whom announced their intention of supporting the Government upon this question. If anything more were required to show that in respect of all these transactions the Government are absolutely indefensible, it would be the employment of such vague, futile, I might almost venture to say dishonest arguments as have been used in the course of this debate both in the discussion as to the legality and in that as to the expediency of their conduct. In one case they are directly contradicted by their own supporters, and in the other they have to admit wrong-doing and show such devotion of themselves to their party instead of to their country as will redound to their shame when it comes to be known by the people of this country.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Hear, hear.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). I do not think that any person who has had much parliamentary experience, would be at all discouraged by the expressions that reach us from the other side of the House. Such a one as the last we heard, is a sound proceeding from vacancy—a peculiar, hollow sound; and it could not be expected that much intelligence would be found in the neighbourhood of the organ by which it was emitted. We cannot be expected to furnish more than argument to hon. gentlemen opposite. The capacity for understanding argument, if it has been denied by the Creator—and that laughter would indicate such a state of affairs—must be supplied by some Power greater than any in this House. To one who has had Parliamentary experience—and we will get it, I suppose—it is a well understood fact that it is the privilege of majorities to laugh at, and sneer at, and deride, every effort of an opposition to stop them in their course or to point out to the country the wrong in what they are doing. But that does not disconcert us; it ought not to disconcert us. The more these gentlemen disregard the voice of reason, the more they laugh and sneer at that which is the voice of the country, the sooner they will reach that downfall in which the good of Canada requires them to be involved at an early day.

Mr. HAGGART. I would ask the leader of the House if he would consent to an adjournment, as my remarks may be somewhat extended.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, go on; if they want the ounce of flesh, let them take it.

The PRIME MINISTER. Well, if the hon. gentleman is so inclined.

Mr. HAGGART. No; I think we can agree to adjourn.

The PRIME MINISTER. I was willing, but the member for York objects to it, so I do not care.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think we had better adjourn.

The PRIME MINISTER. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if we can conclude this debate at the next sitting of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think so.

The PRIME MINISTER. I would like to have an assurance that we will.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I can only say that, so far as I am concerned, I shall be most happy to have the debate concluded at the next sitting.

Mr. HAGGART moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

The PRIME MINISTER. Before the House adjourns, I would like to move:

Mr. BELL (Pictou).

That the name of Mr. Scriver be substituted for the name of Mr. Fortin on the Private Bills Committee.

Motion agreed to.

The PRIME MINISTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 8th September, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 11) to revive and amend the Acts respecting the St. Clair and Erie Ship Canal Company.—(Mr. Taylor for Mr. Tisdale.)

Bill No. 12) to incorporate the Hudson Bay and Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Oliver.)

Bill (No. 13) respecting the Hamilton Powder Company.—(Mr. Bain.)

Bill (No. 14) to incorporate the Mather Bridge and Power Company.—(Mr. Lount.)

Bill (No. 15) to amalgamate the Ottawa, Arnprior and Parry Sound Railway Company and the Parry Sound Colonization Railway Company, under the name of Ottawa, Arnprior and Parry Sound Railway Company.—(Mr. Belcourt.)

NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE.

Mr. DAVIN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 16) to amend the Mounted Police Act, 1894.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Explain.

Mr. DAVIN. The object of the Bill is to improve the position of the officers and men of the North-west Mounted Police. It is to provide that promotion shall be made from the ranks, and that officers, other than the commissioner, the assistant commissioner, and the medical officers, shall be appointed from among those who have served in the ranks, or from graduates of the Royal Military College, Kingston. At present the officers of the Mounted Police suffer from a disability in this way; they come under the Superannuation Act, and if a man has been sergeant-major for a number of years, and who would have a good allowance if he retired from the force as sergeant-major, yet if he becomes an officer of the Mounted Police, and wished to retire a few years afterwards, he would have a very insignificant allowance. The other provision is to provide that in counting the superannuation of an officer it shall not be counted from the day of his receiving his commission, but from the time he has served in the Mounted Police.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE PILOTAGE ACT.

Mr. McDOUGALL moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 17) to further amend "The Pilotage Act."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The object of the Bill is to amend chapter 59 of the Pilotage Act. Under that section certain ports in the maritime provinces have the power to exempt from pilotage a certain class of steamships. This exemption is brought into effect at the instance of the pilotage authorities, subject to the approval of the Governor in Council. The pilotage authorities of Sydney some years ago took advantage of that provision to exempt from pilotage certain vessels entering that port. Since that time the number of vessels entering the port under that privilege has increased so largely that a great deal of the time of the pilots has been spent in meeting these vessels without any remuneration to the pilots. When coming towards the port, these vessels are required to show a white flag, and for that reason they are known as white-flag steamers; but during dark weather it is impossible to distinguish a white flag from any other, and the pilots are consequently obliged often to go a long distance to meet one of these steamers, only to find that it is a white-flag steamer. For these reasons it is considered that it would be advisable, in order to maintain the efficiency of the service, to do away with this exemption, and to impose on these vessels pilotage dues to the extent of one-half of the regular rate.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE PORTFOLIO OF THE INTERIOR.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the hon. leader of the Government if any progress is being made with reference to the appointment of a Minister of Interior. It is very unusual, I believe, for so long a period to elapse without the appointment of a Minister under the circumstances as they exist, and I think it would be interesting to the House to know if there is a probability of a Minister of the Interior being appointed at an early day.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I shall be able to give an answer to the hon. gentleman's question on Thursday.

SUPPLY BILL.

The resolution adopted in Committee of Ways and Means (4th instant) was reported and read the second time, and concurred in.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 18) for granting to Her Majesty the sum of $446,500 required to defray certain expenses in connection with the annual drill of the militia during the financial year ending the 30th day of June, 1897.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUPPLY—GOVERNOR GENERAL'S WARRANTS.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding: That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply; and the motion of Mr. Foster in amendment thereto.

Mr. HAGGART. Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on the interesting question at present before the House, brought forth by the motion of my hon. friend the member for York (Mr. Foster) in amendment to the motion to go into Committee of Supply, I do so with a good deal of diffidence, not being a lawyer, and not having had a legal training. But that is not an excuse why I should not offer my opinion as I have been a member of this Chamber for the last twenty-four years, and I ought, at least, to have a knowledge of the constitutional mode in which our country is governed. I listened to the speech with which my hon. friend the member for York introduced this motion, and I congratulate him on the eloquent and lucid manner in which he did so. I also congratulate the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) on the manner in which he supported the motion. On the constitutional aspect of the question I will not make many remarks, as I think it is admitted by every person in this House what the correct constitutional position is. I think it is admitted here, as in all English-speaking communities, that the House of Parliament should have control over the expenditure of the people's money, and that the circumstances must be most extraordinary which would justify the expenditure of a single cent of public money without a vote of this Chamber. I have been listening to the debates of this House on this subject for the last eighteen years, and I thought the principle upon which Governor General's warrants should be issued was settled beyond peradventure in this House in 1887, reaffirmed in 1891, and concurred in by both sides of the House. But, coming into this Chamber this session, I have been astonished to find that the Government of the day, who were so strenuous when in Opposition in support of the principle on which these warrants should be issued, had departed from that principle as their first act as a Government. I was astonished to find it, because, there was no necessity for it. I was astonished to find the total abandonment of principles which these gentlemen had advocated for the last eighteen years, principles which they had declared underlay the constitution of this country, principles which were most sacred and were necessary to the security of this country and its proper government. There is no principle in our constitution more sacred than that of the control by the people's representatives of the public expenditure. That principle has been admitted by every hon. gentleman who has spoken in this debate. It is one held most sacred by every English-speaking community on the face of the globe. But what do we find? We find that the very first act of these hon. gentlemen on getting into power is to throw that principle to the winds; and I venture to predict that this will be the fate of every principle which they advocated in Opposition. Their conduct reminds me of a story which I read in the papers the other day. A gentleman who was travelling on a railway train went out and stood upon the platform of one of the cars. The negro porter came up to him and said: "Sir, you are not allowed to ride upon the platform." "Why," said he, "I purchased a ticket for the Pullman, and I have a right to ride on the platform if I like." "No, sir," retorted the porter, "the platforms are only used for the purposes of getting in on." So it is with these hon. gentlemen. They use platforms for the purpose of getting into power, but no sooner are they snugly ensconced in office than they leave their platforms behind them; and I venture to predict that every act of theirs for the next five or six years will be an abandonment of some plank or other of the platform which they used in order to get into office. Look through the debates of this House, Mr. Speaker, and you will find that every leader of the Opposition, you will find that the Hon. Edward Blake, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies), from whom we have not yet had a word on the subject before the House, and you will find also that the late Sir John A. Macdonald, the late Sir John Thompson, and every lawyer of eminence in the House, were agreed as to the interpretation of this Act. But we have to-day this Government casting aside that principle, which both sides have recognized, and this they do as their first act on obtaining office. Their only defence is to wave before us the opinion of Sir Oliver Mowat. They abandon their own principles—the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Lount), the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies), and the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock)—all these gentlemen abandon the principles which they advocated during the past eighteen years, and their self-defence is the opinion of Sir Oliver Mowat, given, as the hon. member for Toronto admits, in a hurry, asked for and got on the same day, excusing the issue of Governor General's warrants—an opinion at variance with that of the most eminent legal minds in this country, and at variance with the doctrine preached by these hon. gentlemen during the past eighteen years.

What were the reasons assigned for the obtaining of this warrant. The first reason was the necessity of the case, and the unforeseen circumstances. That was the reason assigned by the hon. member for Centre Toronto. Would this House believe that at the time the request was made for this warrant, and at the time it was issued, there was not one dollar due, nor would there be one dollar required by the Government for the next fourteen days to meet the expenditure of the country. These hon. gentlemen asked for the Governor General's warrant in order to pay something which was not due, and which would not be due for fourteen days after the warrant was issued. And then we have the extraordinary admission of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), that up to the first of September last, only one million dollars was expended of the two millions obtained by means of the Governor General's warrant. That hon. gentleman told us that the 1st of September of this year—twelve or thirteen days after the House met—one million dollars was expended of the two millions which they had raised by means of the Governor General's warrants. Can there be any justification for that? Is there anything, then, in the argument of these hon. gentlemen opposite that the necessity of the case was so urgent, that the employees were without their pay, that the railways might have to stop running, that there was a contract between the people of this country and the employees in the different post offices throughout the country, and that unless this money was paid all the wheels of government would have to stop—is there anything in this argument, when the facts show that not one single dollar was due for thirteen or fourteen days after the last warrant was issued, and that twelve or thirteen days after the House met there was a million dollars of the amount unexpended? A more extraordinary reason for a Governor General's warrant being issued I never heard before. What has the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) to say to this, who was so opposed to the use of Governor General's warrants? What reason can the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) give for advising the Governor General, on the 18th August, to issue his warrant on the ground that the amount was immediately required, when not a dollar was due, and when twelve days afterwards not one cent of the amount was expended ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). You are not correct.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman then differs from the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). I shall read what that hon. gentleman said. It will be found on page 658 of "Hansard," date September 3rd. He said :

I find that, up to 31st August, 1896, we had expended a total sum of $3,268,000. I find—what is also a little significant—that up to 31st August, 1895, the late Government expended $3,900,000 ; that is to say, they found it necessary to spend about $640,000 more than we did. I am not attaching any blame to hon. gentlemen opposite for that expenditure. But the House will see in those two facts to which I call attention, there is proof that we did not unnecessarily have recourse to this extraordinary means for avoiding a great public disaster, and that we were exceedingly careful not to go an inch beyond what the necessities of the case required. Sir, of the $3,900,000 spent by hon. gentlemen opposite, and of the $3,268,000 spent by us, more than $2,250,000 were statutory expenditures, for which the authority of Parliament was not required. Of the rest, $1,700,000 expended by them, as against $1,000,000 spent by us.

The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries thus differs entirely from his colleague.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not at all, you do not understand.

Mr. HAGGART. I flatter myself that I do, but if the hon. gentleman will explain the difference, I would like to hear him.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Go on.

Mr. HAGGART. It is all very well to say "You do not understand," but it is as clear as possible. The hon. gentleman says they have expended, up to the 31st August, $3,268,000. More than $2,250,000 were statutory expenditures, for which the authority of Parliament was not required.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Oh, oh.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman may laugh. But up to 31st August there was only $3,200,000 odd spent, of which they had statutory authority for the expenditure of $2,250,000. The sum of $2,000,000 was got by Governor General's warrants, of which, therefore, only $1,000,000 was expended. The hon. gentleman may laugh, but there is no way to get out of the figures. On the 31st of August, twelve days after Parliament had met, they had $1,000,000 for which they had asked and secured the Governor General's signature on 18th August. Of that $1,000,000, I venture to say that not one-half is expended at the present time.

Yet these hon. gentlemen must have signed a certificate to the Governor General that the money was needed immediately for the wants of the country, and, on the authority of the Minister of Justice for this country, asked the Governor General to sign the warrants. That disposes of the argument of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and it disposes also of the argument of my hon. friend from East Toronto (Mr. Robertson). My hon. friend from East Toronto believes that the money was absolutely needed for the purpose of maintaining the country by paying the public employees, when the fact is that there was no necessity for such a course. Had hon. gentlemen opposite known their duty, immediately after the meeting of Parliament they would have brought down a Bill for credit, and this House would have given them a credit for a month or two without a moment's hesitation. These gentlemen swallow the principles that they have advocated for eighteen years, and for what ? Is it in order to carry on the affairs of the country ? By no means. No sensible man or men who knew the financial position of the country or who had any ability as administrators, would have required His Excellency to sign such warrants. It would have been easy, without violating the constitution, to get a credit long before it was needed to meet the legitimate requirements of the country. The argument that these hon. gentlemen relied upon was that they were driven to do what they did by the necessities of the case, to keep faith with the public contractors and to pay the necessary services of the country. But, even if this were all true, even if the money had been absolutely due and the non-payment of it would have caused great inconvenience, that was no sufficient argument for the violation of the constitution and for taking into the hands of the Executive powers which, in every English-speaking country in the world, are vested in Parliament. For the purpose of getting over a little temporary difficulty, they have actually violated the constitution of the country. I listened with a great deal of attention to the arguments in support of the contentions of the Ministry on this occasion. I listened with particular attention to arguments of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). Is it possible that this is the same gentleman who a few years ago argued in the very opposite direction ? What a complete somersault he has made in three or four years. He at one time posed as the great tribune of the people, who, more than any other in this country, stood up for the people's rights. He it was who exclaimed so clearly and precisely what the meaning of these two clauses of the Audit Act was. He was the man who stood firm and most fixed in his principles, and most decided in his enunciation of those principles. And look at the pitiable spectacle he made in replying to the argument of the ex-Minister of Finance. Do we not all remember the explanation he gave on a former occasion to show that the Act applied only to expenditures not foreseen or provided for by Parliament? But now he comes to the grammatical meaning of the word "or," and he says it is broad enough to cover the whole question, that the fact of the expenditure not being provided for was sufficient. It is only a few years ago that he said the true meaning of the clause, the meaning the courts would put upon it and the meaning that Parliament ought to put upon it, was unforeseen "and" unprovided for,—that the expenditure must be one called for by some accident such as an explosion blowing up of Militia building or the breaking away of a dam or something of that kind; or, as Mr. Blake put it, "accidents during the recess of Parliament." The very words of the Act are the best explanation of the Act. Expenses unexpectedly incurred during the recess alone justify the issue of Governor General's warrants. The attention of gentlemen opposite was directed during the last session of Parliament to the facts that would arise. They knew exactly when the elections were coming on, for that was stated by my hon. friend the present leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), and it was the more impressed upon them by the fact that they asked that the elections might be fixed a week earlier. They knew the exact time the House was to be called together, for it was announced that it would be called for the middle of July. These facts being known, the necessity for the passing of Estimates last session was pressed upon gentlemen opposite. The hon. member for Simcoe denies the statement made by the Finance Minister of that time (Mr. Foster). I would ask the leader of the Government himself to say if the ex-Finance Minister did not go again and again to him to see if arrangements could not be made for a six months' supply, or, in default of that, if the hon. gentleman would not agree to give to the Government of the country a two months' supply. The hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) in the House also made the statement which was denied the other evening by the hon. member for North Simcoe. Let me read to refresh the memory of the hon. member:

Mr. FOSTER. In the main Estimates there are two items I would like to have passed. What I want hon. gentlemen opposite to do is to make it unnecessary that the House should assemble here in July and have a summer session, which is inconvenient and expensive as well. The proposition I make to them is, if they cannot see their way to give us our working Estimates for next year, to give us at least two or three months' Estimates in order that Parliament may find it unnecessary to meet so soon. I think there is nothing unreasonable in that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is utterly impossible.

Mr. HAGGART.

Then, what becomes of the argument of the hon. member for North Simcoe, who stated, without hesitation that he knew what interpretation the courts would put upon that clause; he knew what interpretation the House had put upon that clause; he knew the consensus of opinion in 1887 and in 1891; and his statement was that the law was clear, though perhaps the necessity of the case would justify the overriding of the law, and he gives the necessity as being a provision for the amount due to the civil service which the Governor General's warrant was asked for. When I stated to this House that not a single cent of the amount was due, he said it was partly the fault of the leader of the Opposition, and of my hon. friend from York. I was sorry to hear him say that the hon. member for York had made a misstatement, because I never heard him say what was attributed to him, that it was the duty of the Government to ask two or three months' Estimates. The facts are brought out clearly now by my statement, and I defy contradiction upon the subject. There was no immediate necessity for the warrants being issued. Last session when the Government could not pass their Estimates, they were willing to take six months, or even as low as two months' Estimates. Then the position of the hon. member for Simcoe is entirely untenable. He knows what the law is, he spoke on the subject, and he has no doubt what interpretation the courts would put upon it. His only justification was that of necessity; but there was no necessity, and consequently no excuse for overriding the Act of Parliament. Now, I will venture to criticise for a few moments some of the hon. members who spoke from the Government side, and who gave some most extraordinary interpretations of this statute. There was the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Lount), and I must compliment him on his first appearance in this House, and on the clear and lucid manner in which he made his statement, which shows, I think, that he gives promise of being a great accession to the debating talent of this House. But perhaps he does not deserve so much credit for that, because his whole life is passed in advancing and defending his views, either in courts of law or in addresses throughout the country. He came to this House with a reputation, and his speech the other night well sustains that reputation. But he dealt very gingerly with the interpretation of the statute. He made a sort of excuse for the interpretation given by the Minister of Justice. He says the Minister of Justice was taken suddenly and was required to give his opinion off-hand. He was asked for his opinion on the 14th, and on the same day he gave his meaning of the statute as justifying the issue of the Governor General's warrant. Then the hon. gentleman goes on to discuss the meaning of the words "and" and "or"; and he concludes that the grammatical meaning, as the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) puts it, would be that technically they had a right to issue the warrant. I cannot understand those two views of the case. There is a clause in an Act of Parliament; if it bear two interpretations, according to the member for Halifax, you have a right to put two interpretations upon it, and to act upon them. Perhaps the reasonable construction is the one the court would put on it. There is also a technical construction which may be put upon it. The Governor General in Council may put upon it the interpretation that the court puts upon it, or they may take the technical view. I do not understand any such logic as that. It has either one legal meaning or it has not. It has no technical meaning different from the legal meaning. The interpretation which a court of law would put upon it is the interpretation that is to be followed. The Government have no option to follow either the reasonable interpretation of the statute or the technical construction. The hon. gentleman was very careful in his speech in giving his opinion as to what the true construction was; but he said that the technical construction was sufficient justification for the issue of the warrants, and he said he was confirmed in his opinion by the fact that the opinions of the Minister of Justice upon constitutional questions had been sustained, again and again, by the Privy Council in England. But I will venture to say that we have not heard in this House from any hon. gentleman, either on the Government side or on the Opposition side, saying that the technical construction which this hon. gentleman puts forward is one that any court in the land would sustain. The whole consensus of opinion in this House is that the reasonable construction of that clause in the Act is that the word "or" should be made "and." Now, I would call attention to the fact that the clause in the Audit Act is embodied in this clause, for it says that no sum of money shall be paid to any civil servant without an Appropriation Act. But the technical construction which the Minister of Justice puts upon that clause of the Audit Act overrides the distinct statement in the statute that no sum of money shall be paid to any civil servant in the employ of the Government without an Appropriation Act being first passed. I have not heard any hon. gentleman, either lawyer or layman, venture to say that this clause, technically construed, overrides that clause in the Audit Act I have referred to. Any hon. member who votes against the amendment of my hon. friend from York, knows very well that he will be voting against an express provision of an Act of Parliament. Now, I will leave the hon. member for Toronto, and deal with the hon. member for Halifax. The hon. member for Toronto justified his opinion concerning the purely technical construction of the statute, by the opinion of the hon. member for Halifax, and I would like to draw the attention of the House to a statement of the hon. member for Halifax, showing that his opinion was not based upon a technical construction of the statute. Let me read from the argument of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell). Referring to the opinion expressed by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), who introduced the motion now before the House, the hon. gentleman said:

I am inclined to accept that as being a fair interpretation of the statute, but my hon. friends will have to admit that it is not its literal meaning. * * * My proposition is this, that you can take either the literal or the sensible construction of the statutes. If you take the literal construction, it is quite sufficient to invoke the words of the statute in order to justify the issue of the warrants in question. All that is required is that the expenditure be unprovided for, even though it be not unforeseen. I do not assent to that as the proper construction of the statute. I think it is a literal but not a sensible construction. On the other hand, if you are going to depart from the mere literal interpretation and give the statute a sensible construction, according to the true intention, you must conclude that the expenditure in question was an unforeseen expenditure. It was foreseen in a dry, barren, literal and grammatical sense of the word. It is an expenditure which everybody could have foreseen in February or January last, but it is an expenditure as to which no human being could possibly have foreseen the circumstances which led to its not having been provided for. In that sense of the term, which is, to my mind, a fair and just sense of the term, it was really an unforeseen expenditure.

So the hon. member for Halifax took entirely different ground from that occupied by the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Lount). Then the hon. gentleman proceeded to present a most extraordinary argument, in which he sought to make it appear that the circumstances antecedent affected the very wording of the statute. He said:

I do not, however, press that point very strenuously. My argument is, that this statute is applicable whenever the expenditure was wholly of an unforeseen character, in the literal sense of the term, or when, being of a kind that could have been foreseen, the circumstances that prevented its being provided for could not have been foreseen.

Fancy such conditions entering into the construction of statutes, and that "the expenditure being wholly of an unforeseen character, the circumstances that prevented its being provided for could not have been foreseen." The hon. gentleman proceeded:

I take it that the statute supplies whenever the circumstances are such that we could not have foreseen that the expenditure would not, and could not, be provided for, when required. If that be a fair reading of the statute, I should like to know if anybody could have foreseen that this Parliament could not meet in time to provide for this expenditure. Was it an absolutely foreseen circumstance that the elections could not have been held before the 23rd June?

Was it absolutely necessary that two months should elapse before the late Government was in a position to appeal to the electorate? Was it absolutely foreseen, assuming that the elections were to take place on the 23rd of June, that the late Government, after the verdict of the country had been rendered against them, would cling to their offices until the 10th of July, wholly without justification, in view of the peculiar condition of the public affairs of the country?

Fancy such a declaration made by a professor of constitutional law. Would the sage of Bothwell (Mr. Mills)—I wish he were in this House now—or the late hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) have laid down such a proposition, that such circumstances were to affect the interpretation of the statute? The hon. member for Halifax proceeded:

Let me go a step further, and say that, even if, as a matter of the technical reading of the statute, you cannot read it in the sense I do, the condition of things which actually had arisen brings the case within the equity of the statute. If you have one condition of things expressly provided for in the statute by express terms, and then you have another analogous condition of things which is not provided for by the express terms of the statute, and if you are able to draw the inference that, if the mind of the legislature had been directed to that analogous condition of things which is not expressly provided for in the statute, it would have taken pains to provide for it, exactly as it did expressly provide for the other condition, then you are at liberty to hold that the statute, by this enlarged construction, does include the analogous, as well as the one which is covered by its express terms.

The hon. gentleman went on, and made an argument in reply to the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney), in which he laid down the principle, that there was no justification for issuing the warrants and for the signature of the Governor General to the warrants which had been issued. The hon. gentleman quoted in support of his contention a despatch in which the Colonial Secretary—I think it was Lord Granville—reflects very severely on the Governor General of South Australia for signing certain warrants. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) said, referring to the hon. member for Kent, N.B.:

If he had read a little more to the House he would have thrown a light on the discussion which would not have been welcomed by the other side.

But he failed to read these words from the despatch of Lord Granville:

Except in cases absolute and immediate necessity (such, for example, as the preservation of life), no expenditure of public money should be incurred without sanction of law.

That is an expression of opinion with which nobody quarrels. But here is a qualification that is of the utmost importance:

Unless it may be presumed, not only that both branches of the legislature will hold that it is unobjectionable—

Mr. HAGGART.

That is this case exactly—

—but also that they will approve of the expenditure being made in anticipation of their consent.

The hon. gentleman goes on and misinterprets the statement made by my hon. friend and the quotation made. I suppose he took it from "Todd," who only partially copied the despatch to Lord Granville on the subject; but if the hon. gentleman had read the whole despatch, he would have seen how much he was mistaken in thinking that it afforded a reply to the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney). The despatch is dated Downing Street, 30th September, 1868, and runs as follows:—

I apprehend that you cannot legally exercise a power of spending moneys without an Appropriation Act, and that you would prima facie be bound to refuse to sign a warrant sanctioning any expenditure of public money which has not been authorized by law.

But as in England, so in New South Wales, cases of supreme emergency may arise, when it may be impossible to adhere to strict and proper rule without detriment to the public interest, and when the government at home takes upon itself the responsibility of sanctioning such expenditure. Such are cases where a service voted requires more money than has been voted, or where some wholly unforeseen contingency arises of too urgent a nature to allow of the required expenditure being previously submitted to Parliament for their sanction.

Cases of this kind must be dealt with by the governor on the responsibility of his ministers, and he must exercise his own judgment upon a careful consideration of all the circumstances brought under his notice by those ministers.

I shall not attempt to give you more definite instructions upon this subject, as each case must stand or fall upon its own merits; but I should be disposed to say generally that such expenditure would be justifiable, first, on the ground of necessity, or, secondly, on the ground that it is sure to be subsequently sanctioned, joined to strong grounds of expediency, even though short of actual necessity.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) will see that Todd was speaking of a despatch sent by Earl Granville, and which was formally mentioned in a despatch of the Duke of Buckingham and Chandos on the same subject, and in which he was speaking of cases of emergency. Therefore, in order to justify the Governor General in issuing a warrant, there must not only be a case of emergency, but it must be a matter which is unforeseen, it must be an expenditure which is not provided for, and besides that, it must have the likelihood of the support of Parliament when it is brought before them for their assent. The statement of the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney) was strictly and literally accurate, and his arguments have remained unanswered in this House up to the present moment. No one has yet attempted to challenge the statement of the hon. gentleman (Mr. McInerney), that there is no power in the Parliament of Canada to justify the issuing of Governor General's warrants for the purpose of paying such sums of money as were paid out of the proceeds of these warrants. Have we heard a word from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, or have we heard a word from the leader of the Government in defence of the conduct of his Ministry. The only member of the Government who attempted to defend this most unusual proceeding was the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but let me ask, is there a lawyer in this House who will venture his reputation as a lawyer by justifying on legal grounds the advice which the Government gave to His Excellency? They shelter themselves behind an opinion of their Minister of Justice, and they say that Sir Oliver Mowat must be correct, because all his opinions on constitutional questions in times past have been sustained by the Privy Council. Let me ask hon. gentlemen, if they ever heard of Sir Oliver Mowat on any previous occasion giving an opinion on such an important subject to any legislature or to any person in Canada, without giving reasons in support of that opinion? But on this occasion Sir Oliver Mowat simply states the bald law on the question, and he does not advance a single reason in support of the advice he gave to the Minister. The hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Lount) excuses him by saying that the question was put to him on the 14th of July, and he gave the opinion on the same day, and had to do it in a hurry. Well, Sir, on a question of such importance as this to the people of Canada, and under which the control of the public moneys was taken out of their hands and out of the hands of their representatives, it is not an extraordinary thing that the Minister of Justice did not give a single reason to justify his advice. There is not, I believe, a first-class lawyer from Halifax to Victoria who would venture a written opinion in the same direction. The conduct of the Ministry was a violation of a clause of the Audit Act, which says, that no money shall be expended by any person without an appropriation being first passed by the Parliament of Canada. I believe, as I said before, that there is not a first-class lawyer in Canada who would concur in the opinion of the Minister of Justice. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) stated plainly what the law on the matter is. He did not trim about it like the member for Toronto (Mr. Lount). There is no mental reservation in his mind, and I have very little doubt myself but that the member for Toronto (Mr. Lount) knew what the law was too. I believe also that the member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) knows the law, but he told us that the clause of the Act was to be interpreted by certain circumstances which were unforeseen and which preceded this event. The House thoroughly understood what the law was on the question, because it was decided in the debates of 1887 and 1891, but the member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) told us that the policy of the case was sufficient justification in his eyes for this extraordinary conduct of the Ministers. Is it not an extraordinary admission for a representative of the people to make, that policy was to regulate the law and the constitution of this country, and that our statute law should be overridden when a question of a policy came into play? The hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) told us that when the Government came into power on a certain day, they found debts which had to be paid. Sir, his premises were wrong; for there was not a single cent due at that time, nor would it be due for twelve or thirteen days afterwards. Last session the statement was made frankly to the House as to when the elections would be, and as to the meeting of Parliament on the 16th of July, and the responsibility for not passing the Supply Bill does not rest upon the present Opposition, but it rests entirely upon the Government of the country. They refused to give six months' supply; they refused to give three months; they refused to give two months. I think the hon. gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches at this moment must know the false position they now occupy. They are wiser now; and, if they had known what events would occur, they would gladly have given to the late Government two months' supply for the purpose of carrying on the affairs of the country. No case can be cited in constitutional history, in any colony or in any part of the British Empire, of an opposition refusing to grant supplies to a government, whether it had nearly completed its term or not; while there are many examples of an opposition, though successful at the polls, coming back to the House and allowing a government in a minority to pass its Estimates. But hon. gentlemen opposite, when in Opposition, took a course which they could not justify, and the result has been the illegal act which they are attempting to justify to-day.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that I have perhaps occupied the attention of the House long enough on a subject that has been thoroughly debated already. My excuse for doing so is that the subject is a serious one, and one in regard to which our decision to-day will be cited as a precedent. Whatever Governor General's warrants were issued by the late Government, they always attempted, at any rate, to justify them on the ground that the expenditure was unforeseen and had been left out of the Estimates, as was the case in regard to the amount asked for the Inter-colonial Railway. But I have never heard an attempt made to justify the extraordinary conduct of this Government in the present instance. They say: "Oh, what harm is it. The people had earned the money, and the Government was morally bound to pay it." That is no justification at all of an infringement of the constitution and an overriding of the statute. There had been no necessity at all for such a course. These gentlemen ought to have followed the coustitutional course; they ought to have brought Parliament together and asked for a vote for a month or six weeks for the purpose of carrying on the affairs of the country; or, if they had expended the amount—which the hon. member for Picton has shown is an extraordinary course, and one which has been abandoned entirely in England—they should have come to this House and asked for a bill of indemnity. They have done neither of these things. On the contrary, they took upon themselves a direct violation of the law by advising His Excellency to sign warrants for expenditures for which there was no Appropriation Act at all; and the Auditor General signed the vouchers to the different bankers throughout the country, or cheques on the treasury, in direct violation of a clause of the statute which says that no sum of money shall be paid to any civil servant unless there is an appropriation for it. For these reasons, I hold that it is my duty to my country and in defence of what I regard as the constitutional rights of the electors of this country, to support the amendment of my hon. friend the member for York.

Mr. McMULLEN. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend at all to take up the time of the House on this question to-day, and I would not have done so were it not for the very extraordinary speech that has been delivered by the late Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart). If there is any man in this House who should have hesitated to rise and deliver a speech of that kind, it is that hon. gentleman. He declared that under no circumstances should the Governor General be asked to issue his warrant for any sum that had not been previously voted for the purpose of meeting the ordinary expenditure, and in the face of Parliament meeting.

Mr. HAGGART. I never said anything of the kind. The hon. gentleman is putting words in my mouth which I never uttered.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman finds fault with the present Government for having asked a Governor General's warrant to meet current expenses immediately maturing, in the face of Parliament meeting, and without an Appropriation Bill having first been passed for these expenditures. Now, let us see what the hon. gentleman did in 1888. In that year Parliament met on the 23rd of February. On the 22nd of February, the day before Parliament met, the hon. gentleman obtained a Governor General's warrant for the sum of $477,000 to pay the working expenses of the Intercolonial Railway. There was no appropriation previously made for that sum; not a dollar of it had been voted. I would like to know what the hon. gentleman has to say about that. Then, in the year 1893, after the principle had been established that under no circumstances should Governor General's warrants be obtained for the purpose of meeting any expenditure, unless in a case entirely unforeseen, what did the hon. gentleman do in connection with the Curran Bridge? Why, Sir, Parliament was prorogued on the 1st of April, 1893. The hon. gentleman knew—because the printed documents laid before a committee of this House, and afterwards before this House, clearly and distinctly proved—that a very large sum in excess of the appropriation had been expended in the construction of that bridge. Did he take the House into his confidence, and ask by a supplementary estimate for an additional sum to meet that expenditure? No, Sir; he kept the secret to himself. On the 4th May, just one month after the House rose, he got a Governor General's warrant for $200,000. The hon. gentleman ventures to condemn the Government of the day for doing what was absolutely necessary, when he himself kept the whole of the facts in his own mind and did not divulge them to the House, and then when the House had risen and the people's representatives had gone to their homes, he went to the Governor General and secured a warrant for $200,000 to pay that extra expense. I must say that I felt not a little amused at the dexterously worked-up excitement of the hon. gentleman, as he wrought himself, by a very laboured effort, to a fever heat of apparent indignation and sincerity over this terrible act of this Government in procuring money to pay the Government employees their wages, when he himself, if he at all consulted his memory, should have been the last man to rise in this House and make the speech he delivered this afternoon. Now, I have collected quite a number of cases in which Governor General's warrants were obtained by the late Government, and in which the obtaining of these warrants was an abuse. We know perfectly well that in 1887 they were very anxious to avoid the appearance of any increase in the Estimates. They were about to go before the people, and were anxious to show that the dawn of the new era of reduction in our annual expenditure had made its appearance, and that the people might look with some little hope to seeing their expenditure decreased in the future. What did we find these hon. gentlemen then doing? Why, Mr. Speaker, they kept in the background no less than sixteen items for which the House should have been asked for appropriations, and then, after the elections were over, they secured Governor General's warrants to pay these items. They got, by means of a Governor General's warrant, $125,000 to pay the costs of the Windsor and Annapolis Railway. They got by the same means $46,000 to pay for walks and drives and bridges at the Banff Hot Springs. They got $32,000 to pay for rebellion losses. Surely these things were well known, and could have been provided for in the Estimates submitted to the House. They got by Governor General's warrant $20,000 to pay for the Royal Commission on Railways, and

$4,000 to pay the costs of the St. Catharines Milling and Lumbering Company's suit. They also got, on the 18th February, 1887, just four days before the elections, $85,000 to pay for rolling stock on the Intercolonial. This has a very peculiar look about it. It would be interesting to know how much of that amount went into the fund for the elections that were about to take place in a few days. They got on the same day, the 18th February, by Governor General's warrants, $72,000 to pay for land claims and damages on the St. Charles Branch, besides a previous amount of $150,000, raised in the same way, or an amount of $222,000, which disappeared into this veritable sink-hole. They also got by Governor General's warrant $264,000 for the Pictou Town Branch of the Intercolonial Railway. In all they got by means of Governor General's warrants, for those three items I have mentioned, which were all foreseen, concerning which these hon. gentlemen could not possibly have failed being in possession of all the facts to enable them to come before the House to ask for appropriations to meet them, $600,000, just four days before the elections. Every one of them must have been foreseen: there was nothing to prevent the late Government from submitting the various items to the House and obtaining an appropriation, but we find that, instead, they got $600,000 by Governor General's warrants just four days before the election, to cover those items. For the franchise they got by the same means $100,000. On the 14th April, just after the House met, they got by Governor General's warrants $25,000 for the Experimental Farm. On the 14th April, they got Governor General's warrants to the amount of $422,000 to meet twelve items, and the House met on the 13th April. We find these hon. gentlemen contending that whatever Governor General's warrants might be issued before the House met, it is an abuse of power to ask them after the meeting of the House. Well, on the 14th April, 1887, the day after the House met, they got a Governor General's warrant for $422,000. Could any one conceive it possible that these hon. gentlemen, who so flagrantly violated the constitution, would have the audacity to rise in their seats and indulge in declamations against the present Government because it obtained Governor General's warrants to pay the wages of the civil servants, who are depending on their daily earnings for their daily food? It is really most amusing to listen to these hon. gentlemen, particularly the late Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart), declaim against the conduct of this Government under the circumstances. But I would ask these hon. gentlemen opposite what they would have done, if they had been placed in somewhat similar circumstances. Supposing at the late election a very considerable number of members of the late Cabinet had been defeated, but that a sufficient number of representatives on the Opposition side had been returned to give that party a majority, what would they have done? Would they not have adjourned Parliament for a month, in order to get their Cabinet Ministers elected? They could not have acted otherwise; and, had they done so, would they not have been obliged, by the necessities of the case, to have recourse to a Governor General's warrant in order to meet the ordinary expenditure of the country? No doubt they would. These hon. gentlemen, however, find fault with this side of the House for not having, during last session, granted a sufficient sum to carry on the business of the country for two or three months. Well, Mr. Speaker, we have already given our reasons why we felt it our duty not to take that course. We were fully convinced that the country had lost all confidence in the gentlemen then on the Treasury benches. We had ample evidence of that in the public press and in the expressions of opinion from public men on both sides, for the opinion was not confined to the one side. We had abundant evidence of the want of confidence in the ranks of hon. gentlemen opposite in these hon. gentlemen themselves. We believed that the people had lost all confidence in the late Government, and that, if we gave the Government license to hold power even for one month, we would be doing what the opinion of the people would not justify us in doing. The result of the general election proved that we were right. Hon. gentlemen opposite are seeking to protract this session, no doubt, for a purpose. When Parliament met, it was believed that the Estimates would be got through in a few days, and the House could then prorogue and a considerable sum of money be saved the taxpayers: but hon. gentlemen opposite have talked by the hour, and that they have done for the evident purpose of lengthening out the session and increasing the expenditure, so as to throw difficulties in the way of the Minister of Finance in cutting down the annual sum which he will have to ask the House to vote for the next year. And, before they resigned office, they loaded up the civil service with every new appointment they could possibly make. Every place where there was room, wherever they could throw a man into a position, they made an appointment, in order to raise the annual expenditure. I am sorry these hon. gentlemen did not take a leaf out of the book of the late Sir John Macdonald, who, after the Mackenzie Government came into power, instead of offering a bitter and continuous opposition and thus wasting the valuable time of the House, said: You have the confidence of the country; I am not going to interfere with you, and we are going to allow you to carry on the affairs of the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite do not appear to be disposed to do that. They are going to fight from the very start. They are determined, in every possible shape and way they can to worry and annoy the Government in their efforts to carry out what they believe to be the policy absolutely necessary in the interests of the country, and which we believe will tend to build up the Dominion. They are bound to fight against the Government from day to day and from session to session. We are quite prepared for reasonable and prudent criticism—that is all right. But hon. gentlemen are in a very awkward box in regard to criticising expenditure this session, because they are fighting against their own offspring, the Estimates which are before the House to-day, and to which the assent of hon. gentlemen is asked, being those prepared by themselves to be laid before this House. I do not mean to say that those Estimates are perfect; I never knew anything approaching perfection coming from the hands of the gentlemen who prepared them. But we know we now have a Government that will not spend a dollar voted or not voted that is not absolutely necessary. I am quite sure that the money is safe in their hands and that they will conduct the affairs of the country properly and prudently. It seemed to me that these hon. gentlemen did not require any reply after the clear exposition of the case made by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and I should not have taken up a moment had it not been for the tone of the speech made by the late Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart). I was so struck with the contrast between that speech and the hon. gentleman's own record as a Minister of the Crown that I deemed it my duty to point out that he was fighting against principles that he himself had followed to suit his own convenience when he was a Minister. The hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) made an elaborate speech on what he conceived to be a proper definition of the Audit Act. I shall not attempt to follow him because I do not claim to possess the legal knowledge to expound such an Act. But one thing is certain, in my humble opinion, and that is that the Audit Act should be carefully observed and respected by whatever Government is in power. And I think that the course adopted by the Government of the day in utilizing the powers given by that Act, as advised by the Minister of Justice, is one that will be endorsed by the electorate of this Dominion. It certainly would have reflected upon the people of Canada, not only among themselves, but in all parts of the Empire had we been obliged to let it become known that the Dominion had permitted its civil servants to wait month after month for the pay justly due them. In meeting the difficulty as they did, the Government pursued a prudent course. We know, at least rumour has told us, that a very peculiar use was made of Orders in Council during the late election. We heard that the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), then the leader of the Government, expressed the opinion that it was quite right that the Government of the day should take the public into their confidence. And as leader of the Government he did take the people into his confidence to a very large extent. He told the people from Prince Edward Island to Vancouver what the Government were going to do if they were sustained. And I have been informed that Orders in Council for appropriations for railways and public works of one kind and another, amounting to about $12,000,000, were hawked about the country as arguments to the people in favour of keeping hon. gentlemen opposite in power. There are one or two other points to which I desire to draw the attention of the late Minister of Railways. I notice that in the year 1885-86 the amount appropriated under Governor General's warrants was $3,190,243. I admit that in some cases they were used for reviving lapsed balances, but in many cases they were not used for that purpose. Now, with regard to the Government asking by Governor General's warrants for sums in excess of what was absolutely and immediately needed, concerning which a great deal was said by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart), we find that that hon. gentleman himself asked, on January 30th, 1888, for an appropriation of $305,000, the total being made up of some twelve items in connection with the Intercolonial Railway. Only about half of these were for the revival of lapsed balances. When Parliament met the hon. gentleman had still unexpended $166,000 of the amount. This shows that while he advocates now the principle that Governor General's warrants should be used only for past expenditure and for what is immediately wanted, he himself did not act upon this principle when he was Minister of Railways. But it is needless to go over the whole list. I have here the returns laid before Parliament for several years, and I could quote dozens of cases in which this power of appropriating money by Governor General's warrant has been abused, and scandalously abused. But what Act is there on the statute-books that hon. gentlemen opposite have not used for political purposes that could possibly be so used? They abused the power of issuing Governor General's warrants in 1887. Then we had a scandalous abuse of that power in connection with the Curran Bridge. But it is not necessary further to dilate upon this question. Enough has been said already to show that the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite is not to try and fasten upon the Government an act for which they should be condemned, but merely to lengthen out the debate on this question from day to day, and thereby to increase the expenditure of this session, and to make it necessary for the Government next year to ask for increased estimates for the purpose of providing for this session, as well as for other expenses for which the new Government will have to provide, owing to the

Mr. HENDERSON. It is not my intention to pursue at any length the arguments advanced by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) who has just taken his seat, and who has thought fit, in justification of the course the Government is now pursuing, to cite what he conceives to be similar cases that occurred during the regime of the Government that went out of power in July last. I think the hon. gentleman has been heard saying in this House on former occasions, that two wrongs do not make a right, and that it would be no justification for the action of the Government of which he is a supporter, simply to show that somebody else did the same thing. It seems to me that the hon. gentleman has made a complete somersault on this occasion. I think that if the celebrated Li Hung Chang, the Chinese envoy who was in Toronto yesterday, had been here, in all probability he would have listened with surprise to the arguments of the hon. member for North Wellington. No doubt he has heard of the reputation of the hon. gentleman, because it is world-wide; and it seems to me that questions like these would have been propounded by Li Hung to the hon. gentleman: "Do you approve of Governor General's warrants? How long have you approved of Governor General's warrants? How old are you?" Such questions as these, I think, would naturally have arisen in the mind of that gentleman, drawn forth by the surprise with which he would have heard the statements of the hon. member for North Wellington. I think it is scarcely necessary for me to refer to what was said by the hon. gentleman with regard to protracting the session. If I mistake not, that question was thoroughly settled and thrashed out in the Liberal caucus which was held in No. 16 the other day, where it was definitely laid down by a colleague of the hon. gentleman and a supporter of the Government, that it would be a most unfortunate thing for the pockets of the hon. members of this House, if the session did not extend beyond the 30 days. Now, having settled that question and they being the dominant party in this House, we would have nothing to do with it, and we are not in any way responsible for it. Now, it is not my intention, as I said, to follow the hon. gentleman in his arguments at any length; but a man who can argue along one line in one year, and then along a directly opposite line another year, I think, is not worthy of much attention. This session, I understand, was called chiefly for the purpose of voting supplies; and it does seem to me that for the Government of the day, with telegraphic despatch, before the House was called, to obtain by Governor General's warrant a large sum of money for the purpose of carrying on the affairs of the country, was showing scant courtesy to members on both sides of this House. What was the use of calling us together to vote supplies if the Government had made up their mind to take supplies, whether the House was willing to grant them or not? I do not purpose to discuss the legal aspects of this question; in fact, from what was said by the Minister of Trade and Commerce a few days ago, I think hon. gentlemen on that side do not intend to defend their action on legal grounds. In fact the Minister of Trade and Commerce abandoned the legal argument, and relied entirely upon what he called the common sense or business view of the question. But, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart), the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce tried to justify the Government by showing that they had not expended as much money in July and August as had been expended by the previous Government during the same two months in 1895. But I scarcely think the Minister of Trade and Commerce was fair, inasmuch as he neglected to tell the House that one very large item of the expenditure, namely, the payment of the indemnity to members in July, 1895, helped to increase the expenditure of that year, while nothing had been paid out on the same account in 1896; so that really there was nothing in the hon. gentleman's argument. He also claimed that unless a Governor General's warrant had been obtained, the whole postal service of the country would have come to a standstill. Now, I think it is pretty generally known that postmasters, carriers, and others who convey the mails, are only paid quarterly, and for that purpose no money is required from the first of July to the first of October; consequently he had no right to claim that that service would have come to a standstill unless the money had been obtained by a Governor General's warrant for the purpose of carrying it on. Then he asked, What could they do? Well, of course, it was for them to find out what they should do. They could certainly have called Parliament together two or three days sooner, or one day sooner would have been quite sufficient. If they had seen fit to call Parliament together at an earlier day to obtain supplies, it would not have been necessary for the hon. member for North Wellington to stand up in his place to-day and defend an action which he had condemned within the last 12 months, and over and over again during past years.

As the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has abandoned the legal aspect of this question, and as I have no pretension to discuss that aspect, I propose to look at this question for a short time from what we may call the business man's point of view. Let us look at it as an ordinary business transaction, and see what we can make out of it. Parliament has been given the control of the public purse of this country, no doubt, for a wise purpose, and I think it will be a sad day for this country when Parliament loses control of the public purse. I think the nearer we can adhere to the law in that respect, the better. It seems to me that the first action of this new Government in evading that law, and spending millions of money without the sanction of Parliament, is something that the people of this country, the common sense business men of this country, will not justify. These safeguards contained in the Audit Act are thrown around the public chest for a good purpose. They are intended, no doubt, to prevent an improper and excessive expenditure; they are in fact intended to protect the public chest of this country. That the public chest requires protection, we have the best evidence, especially under a Liberal regime. I remember years ago reading a letter that was written by the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, in which he pointed out clearly the difficulties that he had in protecting the public chest of this country. Now, we know what kind of a man the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie was. He was hewn out of the flinty rock, a man who had risen from the people, a man who knew what it was to be poor, like many of us, and a man who had a good idea of the duties of a Minister to protect the finances of this country. I will read an extract from a letter of the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, dated 27th April, 1875. He said:

I would like much to be relieved of the Public Works Department, but I cannot see my way to that at present. It is the great spending department, the possible great jobbing department, the department that can make or ruin a government at such a time as this when $25,000,000 are in the power of its head to spend on public works. Friends (?) expect to be benefited by offices they are unfit for, by contracts they are not entitled to, by advances not earned. Enemies ally themselves with friends, and push the friends to the front. Some attempt to storm the office. Some dig trenches at a distance and approach in regular siege form. I feel like the besieged living on my arms night and day. I have offended at least twenty parliamentary friends by my defence of the citadel.

If with a man like Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, of long experience and sterling character, the protection of the public chest was such a source of trouble, why should we be so reckless to-day as to forego the safeguards with which it has been surrounded and permit the Government of the day to take at such times and in such sums as they require money without asking the assent of Parliament? We must look somewhat at the previous history of the hon. gentlemen who compose the present Administration if we are going to take a business-like view of this transaction. Where do they come from; what have they been doing before they came here? We find that the provincial governments throughout this country have not been very economical in their administration. In the province of Ontario we have had an extravagant government. In the provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island and Quebec there have been largely increased expenditures under Liberal regimes, and we have here to-day as members of the present Government men from those provinces who have been brought up in schools of extravagance and unwarranted expenditure, who have increased the annual expenditures of the different provinces; and it may fairly be asked, what are we to expect from those men in view of their former training? Simply an increase in the expenditures of the Dominion. For provincial purposes the revenues are largely derived from Dominion sources, the subsidies of the Dominion being the chief item in each case. The fact is that provincial governments are not called upon to exercise much ability in providing supplies, the moneys being chiefly handed over to them by the Dominion, and consequently they are not likely to be careful in their expenditures. We know how it is individually. If money is easily obtained, it is very likely to be liberally expended; if it is difficult to secure, we are more likely to hold on to it. In the province of Ontario, Sir Oliver Mowat has been Prime Minister, unfortunately, for about twenty years past.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am glad to know that there is an hon. member on the other side of the House who agrees with me that it has been unfortunate for Ontario that Sir Oliver Mowat has been in power for the last twenty years.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Never.

Mr. HENDERSON. When he obtained power he found a full public chest; but a short time ago he left it absolutely empty, and he came here, for what purpose? To take charge of Dominion affairs, and, forsooth, he was called upon by the Prime Minister to advise him with respect to the legality of issuing Governor General's warrants. I think it is a fair criticism, because that is the kind of man on whose judgment the Government are to rely for justifying the issuing of those warrants. We are obliged to look into the hon. gentleman's previous history and see how he has conducted the affairs of his own province, and whether it is reasonable to expect as resulting from that gentleman's judgment an administration of public affairs that will be in the interest of Canada. When Sir Oliver Mowat came into power in Ontario, he found a cash surplus of $4,000,000 and also funds in trust to the amount of $3,000,000, they being in the hands of this Government bearing 5 per cent interest, which was paid every year to the province. Where are the $4,000,000? They have disappeared. Where are the $3,000,000 held in trust for them? Two million dollars have been drawn out in order to meet the exigencies of the provincial government, leaving but a small amount in the hands of the Dominion Government. Or to put it in another way, if the trust funds are intact, there are $2,000,000 due to the Dominion, and the provincial interest in the fund is very small. In addition, the provincial government have borrowed to the extent of $3,000,000. That money has to be repaid, and by a system of manipulating the assets and by concealing the liabilities of the province, the Government are able to show a surplus; but if we investigate the accounts and remember the manner in which they are manipulated, and at the same time consider the debt of the province—which they leave out of the reckoning because it is not at present payable,—it will be found that instead of a surplus in the treasury, there is absolutely nothing, and even less than nothing. Yet the late head of that Government is called upon to advise the Dominion Government as to the propriety of sanctioning Governor General's warrants. In the province of Ontario—I ask the attention of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) to this point—it is said that the provincial government has been a fair government and has administered the affairs of the province fairly. Many of us are too apt to think so, because we have not given that attention to the subject to which it is entitled. But as an illustration of the extravagant manner in which the Ontario government has administered provincial affairs and has not acted in the interests of the people, I will refer to only a single item, and that is the item of superannuations, which of itself should condemn that government. Under the system of superannuation, during a period of eight years from 1887 to 1895, the Ontario government paid out $555,000 and collected from the beneficiaries only $12,718. Yet the man who has administered the finances of Ontario in that reckless, unscrupulous and improper manner is here to advise the Prime Minister of the Dominion that he was perfectly right in asking the Governor General to send him by telegraph one or two millions of money, just as the First Minister may require, the Parliament of the Dominion having not a word to say about it. Let me look for a moment at what some other members of the Government have been doing in their respective provinces. While in Ontario the increase in liabilities from 1886 to 1892 was 20 per cent, during the same years the increase in the province of Quebec was actually 46 per cent under the Liberal regime. True, we have not, I believe, in this Government any hon. gentleman who was a member of a Liberal government of the province of Quebec during those celebrated years from 1886 to 1892; but if we have not, we have at least a close ally of those hon. gentlemen, one of the heroes of the Baie des Chaleurs escapade, and one who could tell us a great deal more than he will do during this session as to how there happened to be 46 per cent increase of liabilities in the province of Quebec during that period. Those are the gentlemen who are to expend the millions of money that had been obtained without the consent of Parliament. Would we on this side of the House be justified in sitting still in our seats and refraining to condemn this unwarranted attempt to procure public money? In the province of Nova Scotia they had a similar experience. In 1878 I remember reading a manifesto that was issued in order to show how the affairs of that province were conducted. I do not know who the author of it was, but it was a Liberal manifesto in the elections of that year, issued for the purpose of persuading the people of that province that the Liberal Government should be more acceptable to them than the Conservative Government. The manifesto reads thus:

The Liberal candidates should be elected because they support a Government (the Liberal Government) which spent large sums of money on useful public works, because they support a Government which during five years have spent $1,877,794 upon public works in Nova Scotia, as against only $650,288 spent by the late Government in seven years. A Reform yearly expenditure of $375,559 against a Tory yearly expenditure of $92,890.

Now, Sir, let us compare that with something of the administration of affairs in Nova Scotia in later years. We find that from 1887 to 1892, the expenditure of Nova Scotia increased under the Liberal regime 24 per cent, and that the debt of Nova Scotia had increased from $1,012,000 in 1887 to $3,138,000 in 1892, or an increase of 200 per cent. And yet these gentlemen who have been administering the affairs of this province are to-day members of the Government of the Dominion of Canada. They are the men, forsooth, who are to expend these millions of money which have been obtained under Governor General's warrants without the consent of this Parliament and without consulting the people's representatives. Is it possible that we are going to hand over the control of the public purse of this country to men who have a history such as I have given you; men who have conducted the affairs of their own province in the manner which I have presented. And not only with regard to provincial affairs, but let us see how the Liberal regime in the Dominion compared with the Conservative regime? From 1872-73 to 1877-78 the increase in five years under Liberal regime was $4,329,000 in the ordinary expenditure, being an increase of 22 per cent for the five years, or 4 2-5ths per cent per annum. Now, in the seventeen years that followed under the Conservative regime—notwithstanding the immense works and improvements that were carried on in Canada—the increase per annum was only 3 2-5ths per annum as against 4 2-5ths under the Liberal Government. During the years 1888 to 1893 the ordinary expenditure in Ontario was increased 20 per cent under a Liberal regime; in Quebec it was increased 46 per cent under a Liberal regime ; in Nova Scotia it was increased 24 per cent under a Liberal regime ; and in Prince Edward Island it increased 28 per cent under a Liberal regime, while actually in the Dominion of Canada during the same period it increased one-third of 1 per cent. Yet these gentlemen opposite claim to have superior virtue and superior honesty, and they claim that they can be trusted with two or three millions of dollars obtained under Governor General's warrants, when it would be an improper thing for the late Government to have taken even a small sum to provide for an unforeseen expenditure. I think, Sir, that the business men of the country will take a common sense view of this transaction. If the history of these men opposite tells us that they have been extravagant in the past, we have every reason to believe that they are extravagant still and will be extravagant in the future. If the history of these men tells us that they have in the past largely increased the expenditure of the various provinces, and they have depleted the provincial treasuries so that they are now at the foot of the Throne crying for more subsidies; if that is our experience in the past, will the business men of this country say that they are now to be entrusted with millions of money to expend as they see fit, and without giving any account of it to the people of this country? I believe that to be the view which the great thinking classes of the people of Canada will take. I believe that they will not look upon it simply as a sentimental question. I do not believe that they will say: Oh, you have not shown us that there is any improper expenditure, and so the matter is all right. Well, Sir, how could we show that there was any improper expenditure? We have no knowledge of how they expended this money. The Government tells us that it was obtained for the purpose of paying salaries, but I know from the figures that have been brought down that a portion of it was for dredging. Where was that dredging done? We have no knowledge of that. Was the dredging done down east, or, forsooth, was some of it done in Owen Sound harbour on that Sunday afternoon to which my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) referred a few days ago. I question if ever the country will know what was done with that money. The Government will tell us that they were not obliged to ask us for it, that we had nothing to do with how they got the money, and so I expect that next time they will tell us that it is none of our business how they spent the money. They would be equally as much justified in taking the one course as the other. I believe that the common-sense people of Canada will demand from the Government a full statement of what has become of this money, and that they will not, under the circumstances, justify in any way whatever the action of the Government in obtaining Governor General's warrants for such a large sum of money.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend until an hour or so ago to participate in this debate. There were, however, some points made by my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) which I consider worthy of notice, and I desire to crave the attention of the House for a few moments while I devote myself to the question under discussion. I was amazed at the accuracy of the knowledge of my hon. friend (Mr. Henderson) as to what transpires in Room 16. He took the House into his confidence and he informed us what decision was arrived at in the caucus of the Liberal party a few days ago. He informed us that it was decided upon that occasion that this session should be prolonged beyond a period of thirty days in order that the sessional allowance of $1,000 might be received by the faithful followers of the Ministry. Well, Sir, I happen to have been present at the deliberations of the caucus upon that occasion, and I beg to inform the House that the idea of prolonging the session was deprecated by all present. I say further that it was on that occasion lamented on the part of those who referred to the question, that there was an evident disposition, on the part of the Opposition, to prolong the session beyond the period of thirty days. The Government announced at the outset that its desire and design was to submit the Estimates to the House and to secure their passage in the shortest possible time, that it had summoned Parliament for the purpose of meeting an emergency, that emergency being the voting of supplies, and that when that emergency was met by the action of Parliament, the House would adjourn. Now, Sir, were any argument needed to show that the purpose of the Opposition is to prolong the session, I believe that argument is presented by the action of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Henderson). If anything in the shape of obstruction, pure and simple, could be imagined, it is the speech made by that hon. gentleman. He devoted a small portion of his time to the consideration of the question before the House; but the larger part of his speech was devoted to a review of the records of the various provincial governments of this country, as to their financial management, and to denunciations of the Liberal governments of the various provinces, especially that of Ontario. Well, Sir, I would like to know what the question of provincial management has to do with the question of Governor General's warrants in the Dominion Parliament. If the hon. member for Halton can point out to me the analogy that exists between the two questions, he will enlighten my mind very much, and I shall be under deep obligations to him. Perhaps I may say a word in defence of at least one of these governments. The province where I live, a province which has, without doubt, the best government of any commonwealth on this continent, or on this planet, and which has had its affairs managed with rare economy, wisdom and efficiency, under the leadership of the hon. gentleman who is now the Minister of Justice in the present Administration. The government of Ontario has never asked the people of that province for a single cent. There never has been a provincial levy in that province. Whatever moneys have been raised or expended, they have been raised and expended without the contribution on the part of the people to the finances and resources of the province of one single cent.

Mr. SPROULE. They have been selling their notes in advance.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is said that the government of Ontario has no surplus. It has a surplus to-day of millions of dollars. That government has pursued the policy of liberality. It has created institutions for the amelioration of human misery in all parts of the province. It has the finest school system on this continent. It has subsidized railways where necessary; it has given of its generosity to all worthy objects, and it has not impaired its surplus or its financial condition; and I repeat, it has never taxed its people one cent. Sir, the record of the government of Ontario may challenge the admiration of all classes in this Dominion. The record of the government of Ontario will bear scrutiny, and the man must possess a good deal of hardihood who will rise before a body of intelligent men and take the position that has been taken by my hon. friend from Halton.

My hon. friend informs us that it was an act of courtesy on the part of the Government of the day to take the course they did—an act of discourtesy towards Parliament. Well, Sir, we will review that assertion a little later on. He says no money was wanted, indeed; it was then quite superfluous to ask the Governor General to issue warrants, because the need of the money was not apparent to the hon. gentleman at all. Why, all our expenses are paid quarterly, he says, and, as we commenced with July, we did not need a single cent until the 1st of October. I suppose we have no current expenses. I suppose the wages and salaries of all public employees are paid quarterly. Well, it seems to me that the records of our expenditures show monthly expenditures. We have a report of the expenditures month by month. We have labourers, engineers and conductors on the Government railways who are paid weekly; we have the employees of various departments who are paid either weekly or monthly. There is a very small proportion of the expenditure of this Dominion paid quarterly; and the argument advanced by my hon. friend from Halton, in this respect, was entirely destitute of foundation. Then, my hon. friend proceeds to take a business view of the case, and a most remarkable business view of the case it is. I think he has undoubtedly proved to the satisfaction of this House that he is a business man of rare ability; and, if he were on this side of the House, I should certainly favour having his distinguished services for one of the business departments of the Government. It is a pity to lose the services of a gentleman so distinguished in the business line. The public chest, he says, requires protection. I dare say the hon. gentleman may have learned that fact by observation, when he was a follower of the Government that has just gone out of power; and he proceeds to read a letter written by the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie about standing guard over the public treasury, and about the necessity that existed in his day to keep at bay the cormorants who wanted to prey on the public treasury. There is, no doubt, truth in the statement, and Mr. Mackenzie succeeded most admirably in the efforts he made in that respect. He kept down the expenditure of this country to such an extent that, while he was obliged to add more than a million dollars a year to the interest charge to meet the obligations which the previous Government of Sir John Macdonald had placed upon the country, at the same time he actually diminished the expenditure by the sum of $1,400,000 between the year 1873 and the year 1878. The Government of Mr. Mackenzie carried the expenditure charged to consolidated fund from $23,316,000 in the first year of their administration, to $23,503,000 in the last year, or an increase of $186,000 during the five years. And yet we have an hon. gentleman rising in the House of Commons in this day of September, 1896, and attempting to cast aspersions upon the financial management of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie and his colleagues in office during the period in which this country was blessed with their administration of public affairs. Now, I want to call my hon. friend's attention to some details. He has indulged in general assertions and general charges, and I want to call his attention to some details which will demonstrate more thoroughly the economy practised by the Mackenzie Administration during its term of office. I take the Public Accounts for the year 1895, and I take the table commencing on page liv., giving in detail the expenditure chargeable to consolidated fund in the Dominion of Canada from the year 1867 to the year 1895; and I find that in the matter of administration of justice the expenditure was $564,000 when Mr. Mackenzie left office, whereas it was $755,000 last year. I find that in the matter of arts and agriculture the expenditure in Mr. Mackenzie's last year was $92,000, whereas in 1895 it was $216,000. I find that the expenditure chargeable to civil government was $823,000 in 1878, and $1,422,000 in 1895.

Mr. SPROULE. What has that to do with Governor General's warrants?

Mr. CHARLTON. I am answering specific charges made by an hon. member of this House against the Government of Mr. Mackenzie, of reckless extravagance and of having largely increased the cost of the government of Canada; and I am happy to see that my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) is a little restive under the statement of the facts; but, if he will possess his soul in patience, I will give him a few facts which will enlighten his mind.

Mr. SPROULE. I was amused at the way you were lecturing my hon. friend for wasting the time of the House, and then following the same course yourself.

Mr. CHARLTON. My hon. friend's friend did make a few statements which might influence a gentleman such as the hon. member for North Grey, and it is necessary to disabuse his mind of the wrong impression.

Mr. SPROULE. I am not the member for North Grey.

Mr. CHARLTON. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I ought not to have forgotten the constituency of a gentleman who has had the distinguished honour of being read out of his party.

Fisheries .....	$ 73,000	$ 443,000
Nearly five-fold increase.
Indian Affairs.....	421,000	955,000
More than two-fold increase.
Mail subsidies .....	257,000	513,000
Militia and defence...	618,000	1,574,000
Mounted Police .....	334,000	646,000
Superannuation .....	106,000	265,000
Customs .....	714,000	917,000
Excise .....	215,000	471,000
Post Office .....	1,724,000	3,593,000

And so on through the list. Our hon. friends opposite succeeded in running up the expenditure, chargeable to the consolidated fund, from $25,000,000 in 1878 to nearly $40,000,000 in 1895. So that the charges made by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) in this respect are totally without foundation, and I believe the House will agree with me in that conclusion.

Now, I wish to say a few words in reply to the statements made by the late Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart). That hon. gentleman told us that Parliament should have the control of supplies. No one will dispute that assertion. Parliament has control of supplies, and the present Government has no intention to deprive Parliament of the power that it legitimately exercises in controlling the supplies. The hon. gentleman proceeded to attempt to show that there was no necessity for the course pursued by the Government. Now, I wish to review very briefly the peculiar circumstances that existed when this Government came into power—circumstances that have no parallel in the history of the Dominion at least, circumstances calling for measures which would never be called for under ordinary circumstances, and that amply justified the Government for taking the means they did to raise the money necessary to meet the current expenses of the Administration. Last session was a very peculiar one. It was wasted, at the outset, by the wrangling and the caballing, and the conspiring, and the knifing, and the stabbing in the dark among the members of the late Cabinet, which we all know of. Seven of the strikers went out, and the then leader of the Government (Sir Mackenzie Bowell) announced that he felt like Mary Magdalen when the seven devils were cast out of her. The condition of things that existed in the last session of the last Parliament was certainly anomalous, like to which nothing has ever existed before in the parliamentary history of Canada. Well, after wasting nearly a month in this wrangling, what was next done? If the Government then desired to secure supplies, why did they not get right down to business? They did nothing of the kind, but they held the House in session and frittered away the time that should have been devoted to legitimate business in the attempt to force through a measure which the public sentiment of the country did not demand, which should have been passed upon by the people before being introduced here, which the Government had no right to introduce, and which the Opposition determined should not become law. Then, within a few days of this Parliament ceasing to exist by efflux of time, the Government attempted to secure the passage of the Estimates. No objection was made to passing the Estimates for the current year, except in the case of items, such as that connected with the Soulanges Canal, where there were evidently jobs hidden under the vote. But the Government asked for more, they asked this House to vote the expenditure for 1896-97. The Opposition would not consent. The Opposition practically said to the Government: You have no right to be sitting here at all; this House should have been dissolved; this is the sixth session of Parliament and should never have been held, it is time this Parliament was dissolved and an appeal to the country taken, and we do not propose to place in your hands the funds that will enable you to hold on for twelve months longer. We do not propose to place it in your power to defer the holding of general elections for ten months from this time. We do not propose to place that power in your hands. We propose to refuse you the funds for the year beginning the 1st July, as security for good behaviour on your part and as security for an appeal to the people at the proper time. The late Government, therefore, did not get the money they demanded and should have held the elections immediately. When the last Parliament ceased to exist on the 23rd April, the writs should have been issued the 1st May and a new Parliament elected, and that Parliament should have been convened in time to pass the supplies before the 1st July. Did the Government do that? No, they held on until at last the writs were issued, and the election took place on the 23rd of June, with the result that the Government was defeated. Did the Government then resign? No, they held on beyond the commencement of the next fiscal year: they held on until the Governor General refused to ratify 450 Orders in Council; and then, when they were kicked out of doors, they resigned at last. They resigned on the 10th or 12th July. The course which they should have pursued, when this Parliament refused supplies for the next year, was to issue their writs and have an election without delay, and there would then have been ample time for the new Parliament to have voted the funds to meet the expenditure of 1896-97. That is what should have been done, and it is what the late Government should be arraigned at the bar of public opinion for not having done. They did not do this, however, but at last they blessed the country by laying down the seals of office and went out. Of course a new Government was then formed. This new Government was not responsible for the condition of things that existed when it came into power. That was a condition which existed independent of any action of theirs. When they came into office they faced a difficult situation, and the question was, what remedy was to be applied. What, I repeat, were they to do? It must not be overlooked that the members of the new Ministry had to go back to their constituents, for this House could not be convened and go on with the transaction of business until it had constitutional leaders. Weeks must elapse before this necessity of the constitution could be complied with. But the House met at the earliest possible moment. It met so early that actually, there were two Ministers who had not met their constituents. And when it did meet, it proceeded at once, so far as the Government was able to control its action, to provide the necessary means for carrying on the affairs of the country. But before Parliament could meet, the advisers of His Excellency were confronted with difficulty, which, as I have stated, they had no hand in creating. It was absolutely necessary that something should be done immediately; the only question was how the difficulty should be met. It could not be met by calling Parliament together. I repeat that there would have been no difficulty if the hon. gentlemen opposite, when Ministers of the Crown, had issued the writs in time to elect the new Parliament and convene that Parliament before the necessity for action arose. But they failed to do that, and upon their heads must be the responsibility for everything that has followed in this connection. What was the law with reference to the action the new Government might take respecting the issue of Governor General's warrants? Why, Sir, this is an extract from the Act:

If, when Parliament is not in session, any accident happens to any public work or building which requires an immediate outlay for the repair thereof, or any other occasion arises when any expenditure not foreseen or provided for by Parliament is urgently and immediately required for the public good—

Had these expenditures been provided for by Parliament? Had the money been provided by Parliament to pay the running expenses of the Government for July, for August or for September? Not a dollar had been provided. And the law clearly declares that in the emergency of Parliament not having provided the means to carry on the affairs of the Government for any purpose, whether it was putting in a new water spout on a public building or paying the entire expenses of the Government for one, two, or three months—

—then, upon the report of the Minister of Finance and Receiver General that there is no parliamentary provision, and of the Minister having charge of the service in question that the necessity is urgent, the Governor in Council may order a special warrant to be prepared, to be signed by the Governor General for the issue of the amount estimated to be required—to tide over the difficulty. And when the First Minister, finding this difficulty confronting him, appealed to his legal adviser, the Minister of Justice, in what language did he put the case? He said:

It is suggested to me that unless the civil employees are paid their regular salaries, the public service will be subjected to very serious inconveniences.

No doubt about that.

These inconveniences would more particularly arise in the case of that class of employees who are wage-earners on railways, canals and other public works. I would ask you to look into the question and to give me your opinion as to whether a special warrant can be issued to provide for the payment of those servants of the Government.

And the Minister of Justice looked into the question, with characteristic caution and thoroughness, no doubt. He considered the question in all its bearings, and no man in this country was better able to do so. And having looked into the question, having considered it, he proceeded, as Minister of Justice, to give his views to the First Minister. This is what he said:

I think the payment of the employees mentioned in your letter is "urgently and immediately required" for the public good, within the meaning of the said enactment, and that under the circumstances which have occurred and the consequent present condition of public affairs, the Governor in Council may properly on the report mentioned, order a special warrant to be prepared, to be signed by the Governor General for the issue of the amount estimated to be required.

Now the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) says that actually, on the 31st August there was $1,000,000 on hand—the Government had called for $1,000,000 more than they needed. Well, I suppose that in the estimation of the ex-Minister of Railways that would be a rather singular circumstance; it would be quite incomprehensible to him; and I guarantee that if he had been in office there would have been no million dollars left and no ground for criticism on the part of the Opposition in that respect. The truth is that the Government had called for the sum that they deemed necessary, on the report of their deputies; and it is greatly to their credit that they have kept the expenditure within a million dollars of the Estimates, and I take it, that that is an indication of what they intend to do and that this will be characteristic of the administration of affairs under these hon. gentlemen.

When we sweep aside all sophistries and special pleading the case resolves itself into a very simple one indeed. I shall have no hesitation—it may seem singular to my hon. friends opposite, but still it is the case—in voting to sustain the Government in pursuing what I believe was the only course that was open to them under the circumstances. No other course that I know of would have extricated them from the difficulties in which they had been placed, not, as I have said, by their own misconduct, but by the action of their predecessors. While an extensive knowledge of constitutional principles is a good thing and while the quoting of the law is a good thing, common sense is also a good thing. The verdict after a common sense examination will be, an acquittal of the Government, and not only that, but to give complete approbation of the course they have pursued. I think that under the circumstances the new Government have inaugurated their career most auspiciously in tiding over this difficulty in the admirable manner they have done. I regret the course the Opposition have taken, and taken for a two-fold purpose—first, to waste time in order to prolong the session beyond the limit of 30 days, and secondly, to endeavour unjustly to prejudice this Government in the eyes of the people. It has been shown by my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) that gentlemen opposite, themselves are the greatest sinners imaginable, in this respect—that large sums were raised by them by Governor General's warrants even when Parliament was in session, or immediately after, the expenditures not having been provided for, not because they were not foreseen, but because they were of a suspicious character and would not bear discussion. I fully recognize the fact that two wrongs do not make a right. Still there is something in the preservation of an attitude of consistency; and a party that has been guilty of the most flagrant abuse of power does not show to good advantage in criticising its opponents for exercising the same power in a justifiable and proper manner. I repeat what I have already said, that this Government now in power found upon assuming the seals of office that a serious difficulty confronted them; that the difficulties that confronted them were not of their own creation; that they had been created by their predecessors through mismanagement, through failure to discharge their duties; that their predecessors should have issued writs and have convened Parliament before the expiration of the last fiscal year, as they could have done, as they had ample time to do; that, if this had been done, the means of carrying on the Government would have been forthcoming in a constitutional and proper manner; that the fact that these means were not so provided is due, not to the action of the Government now in power, but to the action of the Government that was in power and, fortunately for the country, has resigned its office. When the Government now in power came to confront the difficulty created by their predecessors, they had but one of two courses to pursue: they must either secure the issuing of warrants by His Excellency, or they must convene the House. It is evident beyond doubt that the House could not have been convened in time to meet the emergency; it is evident by the conduct of hon. gentlemen opposite that had it been convened, the time would have been wasted by the obstructive tactics now resorted to, and the difficulty made greater than it was at the commencement; and so, in pursuance of the course that was pursued, in meeting the emergency as it was met, the Government have done what they should have done; and they deserve the thanks of the country, and they deserve the approval of this House of Commons.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Speaker, just before recess I rose to address a few remarks to the House upon a subject which I consider of grave importance. At the outset I desire to say, in reply to the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), whom I regret not to see in his seat, that I disclaim the slightest intention of prolonging this debate for the purpose of extending the session beyond thirty days, as the hon. gentleman charged the Opposition with doing. I think it is an unworthy charge to make on the part of the hon. gentleman against the members on this side of the House; and I think that it comes with very bad grace from the lips of an hon. gentleman who, within the recollection of the older members of this House, and under circumstances which will be remembered, to carry out obstruction such as this Parliament or any other parliament has never known, did not hesitate to bring the Holy Book into requisition in order to prolong a discussion which led, probably, to the difficulty which we are called upon to discuss to-night. Sir, it is not the wish on this side of the House to prolong the debate or to extend the session; but we consider that, as representatives of the people, we have duties to perform, and that we would be recreant to those duties if, whether sitting on your right or sitting on your left, we did not stand up here to discuss, from our own standpoint and according to our own judgment, questions which we consider affect the interests of the people. Sir, it has been my high privilege to occupy a seat in this House of Commons, as a representative of the people, since 1873, and it is impossible for me to recollect during that time an occasion when, according to my judgment, a more violent attack has been made upon parliamentary institutions and the privileges of a people living under such a constitution as obtains in Canada. Let me say at once that my object in addressing these few remarks to the House was not so much to attack the Government as to vindicate the rights of Parliament, without which no Government could be of any use to the people of Canada. If there was any reason that could have induced me to overlook the action of the Government, it was that the money which was obtained by the warrants of the Governor General, was for the purpose of paying the civil servants what they had earned. Sir, I consider that we have in this country a civil service equal to that of any other country; and I would be prepared to go as far as possible to protect their interests, and to prevent them from suffering in the slightest degree from delay in paying them the amounts which are due them for the valuable services they render to the country. Let me say further, that in this case it is not the Conservative party which is responsible if the civil servants were kept waiting for the salaries which they were entitled to receive. On two different occasions the Conservative party when sitting on the Treasury benches during the last days of the session of an expiring Parliament, appealed to hon. gentlemen opposite to provide for these requirements, which they were in a position then to do, without making an attack such as has been made on the constitution. Hon. gentlemen know well that we asked them whether, if they were not prepared to vote the whole Estimates, they would not consent to vote whatever portion they thought desirable, but they refused, and subsequently when the responsibility of government was thrown upon their shoulders, they considered the payment of salaries to the civil servants was a matter of sufficient importance to justify them in breaking through constitutional precedents. Hon. gentlemen at that time would not agree to the proposition made from the then occupants of the Treasury benches; they were wholly unreasonable, they refused every proposal. At that time it would have been very easy for hon. gentlemen to impose such conditions on granting a portion of the Estimates that it would have been impossible for the Government to have utilized the money in a manner different from that provided by the constitution and approved by the people through their representatives in this House. The Government of that day did not, of course, expect the confidence of hon. gentlemen opposite; still those hon. gentlemen were well aware that there were constitutional rules which could not be broken and precedents which could not be violated, and yet hon. gentlemen opposite so soon as they occupied the Treasury benches acted unconstitutionally, for after refusing last session to permit the granting of supplies for the payment of the civil service, they resorted to the issue of a Governor General's warrant for that purpose. I claim that English as well as Canadian precedents indicated to hon. gentlemen the course which they should have followed under the circumstances, admitting, as stated by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), that hon. gentlemen opposite had not confidence in the then Government and were not prepared to confide into its hands money voted under the Estimates. Under constitutional precedents which cannot be controverted or ignored, hon. gentlemen opposite should have accepted the proposition made by the Government of that day, when it would not have been necessary so soon as they obtained possession of the Treasury benches to have applied to the Governor General to issue his warrant, even the very day before Parliament met. As regards the duty of hon. gentlemen opposite under English precedents, I refer the House to "Todd," vol. I, page 758, to show that when the last Government appealed to hon. gentlemen opposite to vote, if not the whole of the Estimates, that portion which was required to pay the civil service, the proposition should have been accepted. That authority says:

Votes "on account" were formerly restricted to occasions of unexpected emergency, arising out of ministerial changes, when it was desirable to place at the disposal of the Government funds for the public service without specifically appropriating the same to particular items of expenditure. In such cases it is usual to grant a portion only of the yearly Estimates, and in the following session to inquire into the expenditure thereof, in order to ascertain that it was duly appropriated to legitimate purposes. When Parliament is about to be dissolved, upon a ministerial crisis, it is obviously improper to call upon the House of Commons to vote either the full amount or all the details of the proposed Estimates, and so commit the country to the financial policy of Ministers whose fate is about to be determined by the general election. The duty of finally deciding upon these Estimates should be reserved for the new House of Commons. Meanwhile the supply of credit should be restricted to such an amount as may be absolutely required for the public service, until the reassembling of Parliament, and the vote "on account" should not be regarded as in any degree pledging the House to an approval of the entire Estimates.

I fully concur in that expression of opinion, but the case under discussion at the present time does not by any means fall under that head; it is one placed outside of those cases when the fate of outgoing ministries is about to be determined at the general elections. Todd continues:

Within the last few years, however, the practice of taking votes "on account" has become general. This is owing to the introduction of a new rule, making all grants in supply applicable only to "payments to be made within the financial year," and requiring the Government to surrender into the exchequer, at the end of the year, all unexpended balances.

This plainly indicates that without at all pledging themselves to the Estimates as prepared by the then Finance Minister, without in any way changing their views as to having confidence or want of confidence in the Government of the day, they could have consented, as we proposed to them privately across the House on more than one occasion, to have voted the Estimates required for the service for which they subsequently called upon His Excellency to issue a warrant. That is my contention, and that is the precedent which is being followed in England to-day. Further, it is the precedent which has been followed in Canada within my own recollection, for when during the time I occupied the position of Minister of Militia, the troubles in the North-west arose, Parliament voted $1,700,000 without pledging itself to approve of the expenditure or not, but it was an emergency for which Parliament considered a grant should be immediately made. A similar case could not arise in England for the reason that emergencies are there provided for in a different way, as I shall be able to show. In Canada it has been the custom for Parliament to vote money which was required to meet certain services which were not objected to by either party. The salaries of the civil servants are fixed by statute, and the Government of the day even if it chose to, could not divert the money voted by Parliament for that purpose towards any other channel. Hence it is that I charge the Opposition of last year with being responsible for all this difficulty on account of their unconstitutional action in refusing to vote supplies last year for the public service. I have quoted from Todd as to the English precedents, and in relation to the Canadian practice, Bourinot says:

Votes "on account of" particular services, now quite common in the English House, have only been necessary on one occasion from 1867 to 1891.

I think that is the instance to which I referred when I was acting as Minister of Militia, and when money was required for the purpose of meeting the expenses of the rebellion in the North-west.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

On the eve of dissolution, in case of a ministerial crisis, or at other times in anticipation of particular grants or classes of service, the Imperial Parliament has allowed votes "on account." Such a course has now become necessary every session, "in consequence of the increased strictness in the audit of public accounts and the difficulty of securing the consideration of the estimates in due time." "It is an established rule," says a high authority, "that a vote on account should involve no new principle, but should merely provide for the continuation of services which had been sanctioned in the previous year; and it is the practice not to take more than two or three months' supplies, except in certain particular cases of public emergency."

The proposition submitted by the Government last year was that the Opposition should vote a sufficient sum of money to pay the civil service during the period of time between the elections and the meeting of the House again.

"So that the committee in agreeing to vote on account are not pledged to the estimates for the year in anticipation of the opportunity to be afterwards afforded of voting them in detail." In Canada, as the fiscal year ends on the 30th June, and Parliament generally assembles in the month of January, or, at least, months before the appropriations for public service are exhausted, the necessity for votes on account can only arise under exceptional conditions. In 1891, Parliament met on the 29th of April, and it became necessary when the first of July was passed to meet the exigencies of the public service. One-tenth of the annual Estimates was passed without discussion, and included with all the resolutions previously passed in an Appropriation Act, which immediately received the royal assent. Subsequently one-fifth was voted in the same way. Finally the sums necessary to complete the amounts required for the service of the year were voted after the usual full discussion.

Therefore the course followed by Her Majesty's loyal Opposition last year is in direct opposition to these precedents, and was, as I believe, an invasion of parliamentary rights. It is so serious an invasion of the constitution, that it is our duty to bring the question up in the House, even though we should meet with the censure of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) who charges us with delaying the session. When the present Government came into power they were face to face with a great difficulty which they themselves had created by their unconstitutional course last year, and in order to overcome the difficulty they again had recourse to an unconstitutional practice to raise large sums of money which had not been provided for by a vote of Parliament. I must, at the risk of being tedious, read the statute which I contend that hon. gentlemen have misinterpreted, and I shall also read the opinions of eminent men upon that statute. I shall read the opinions of some whose absence we regret and who, from their constitutional knowledge and experience, have left on record their opinions, which hon. gentlemen who to-day for the first time in eighteen years occupy the Treasury benches, may well refer to, and learn, and be guided by. The legal authority for the issue of Governor General's warrants is to be found in the Revised Statutes, chap. 29, sec. 32, and I shall read it.

Mr. MCGREGOR. Dispense.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I should like to oblige the hon. gentleman by dispensing. On one occasion when the present Prime Minister was leader of the Opposition, I tried to dispense with reading what I thought hon. gentlemen on both sides knew, but the present Prime Minister insisted upon my following the rule, and therefore I do not think I can oblige my hon. friend (Mr. Lister) who is sitting in the Prime Minister's seat, by dispensing with reading this clause of the Act.

Mr. LISTER. I did not ask you to dispense. I shall be glad to hear you read. Do not charge me with it.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I thought you had said "dispense." The clause of the Audit Act to which I have referred, reads :

If, when Parliament is not in session, any accident happens to any public work or building which requires an immediate outlay for the repair thereof, or any other occasion arises when any expenditure not foreseen or provided for by Parliament is urgently and immediately required for the public good, then, upon the report of the Minister of Finance and Receiver General that there is no parliamentary provision, and of the Minister having charge of the service in question that the necessity is urgent, the Governor in Council may order a special warrant to be prepared, to be signed by the Governor General for the issue of the amount estimated to be required, which shall be placed by the Minister of Finance and Receiver General to a special account against which cheques may issue from time to time, in the usual form, as they are required.

Thus, in 1887, Sir Richard Cartwright admitted that the lapsed balances of votes that had been discussed in Parliament might be extended under a Governor General's warrant. Also that a legal award against the Government might be provided for in this manner. But he raised the point for discussion. The House met on April 13, 1887; and it appeared that nearly $500,000 had been paid by Governor General's warrant, bearing date 14th April, the day after the House met. He contended that the Governor General's warrant could only issue "when Parliament is not in session" as the language of the statute has it. Sir John Macdonald contended, in reply, that if the order for the money is given previous to the meeting of Parliament :

The fact that the warrant, the mere paper, is not signed until afterwards is a matter of no consequence whatever. It is like the appointment of a man to hold any office under the Crown. The moment the Order in Council says he is appointed, he holds his office, although the commission may not issue for twenty years afterwards.

Mr. Davies said :

The main objection which has been urged is not that the ministerial act of signing the warrant took place after the meeting of Parliament and after a proper Order in Council had been passed. That is a mere ancillary point, and may or may not be correct. I am disposed to think myself that if a proper Order in Council had been passed, the mere affixing of the signature of the Governor General while Parliament is in session might not invalidate it.

Mr. Blake pointed out that :

Urgency and the necessity for immediate action for the public good are the elements which give to the Administration power to act.

And as to the question of date of signing the warrant, he pointed out that :

The spirit of the Act is that of the public good imperatively requires money to be expended, in respect of which the condition of things renders it impossible that Parliament should be consulted and its consent obtained, the Government may issue special warrants for such expenditures during recess; but that cannot be said in reference to certain expenditures for which the Orders in Council were passed just before the 13th April, so late that the warrants could not be issued in time to have them out before Parliament.

In 1891, Sir Richard Cartwright laid down the general rule of interpretation thus :

It is scarcely necessary for me to point out that the obvious meaning of this clause is, that when an occasion arises when any expenditure which cannot fairly be foreseen by the department, or provided for by Parliament, is urgently and immediately required, then and then only, is it intended that such a warrant should be issued.

In the same debate, the Finance Minister, Mr. Foster, gave the statute the following interpretation :—

As to the general principle which the Government ought to pursue in regard to these expenditures, I thoroughly agree with my hon. friend. A Governor General's warrant ought not to be used except for an urgent and necessary purpose, but if an error occurs, and a branch of the public service must be stopped unless appropriations are made which Parliament would have given but for the error, there is no choice between the two alternatives. The warrant must be issued and the money must be made available.

It will be observed that although Mr. Foster alleges "perfect agreement" with Sir Richard Cartwright, his views are, like the views of Sir John Macdonald, totally opposed to those of Sir Richard, and of Mr. Davies, &c. There are in fact two separate and conflicting canons of criticism as to the meaning of the clause under which the warrants are issued. In England it is the practice to take grants on account for the civil service every year, and sometimes more than once during the session when the pressure of parliamentary affairs has prevented the passing of the whole Estimates. In urgent cases requiring immediate relief, or when, on grounds of public policy secrecy is advisable, the Government can have recourse in the first instance to the "civil contingencies" or the "treasury chest funds." Todd states the practice as follows:—

If the Comptroller General is empowered, as we have seen, to interpose his authority, and forbid the issue of any money, except such as may be asked for by the Treasury under the express authority of Parliament, how is it that the Government are able to obtain possession of the means to incur extraordinary expenditure, without a previous Act of appropriation? The wisdom of Parliament has itself provided for this contingency. "The public interests require that the Government should possess the power of incurring expenses of indispensable necessity, although Parliament may not have previously provided for them. * * * * Unforeseen events may happen, and lead to an expenditure beyond the provision made by Parliament for the ordinary service of the year; and it must be for the interest of the public, that no delay should occur in taking the necessary measures, and in defraying the expenses which such events may entail." There is, accordingly, a fund called the "Treasury Chest Fund," which is maintained for the purpose of supplying the specie required for the "Treasury Chest" in the several colonies, and for making the necessary advances for carrying on the public service at home and abroad. By the Act 40 and 41 Vict., c. 45, this fund, formerly £1,300,000, is now limited to £1,000,000. It is authorized to be employed by the Treasury in making temporary advances for any public service; to be repaid out of money appropriated by Parliament to such service, or out of other money applicable thereto. The governors of colonies have authority, in cases of emergency, to pay advances out of the treasury chest, to be made good out of votes in supply. This unavoidably occasions an expenditure, in certain cases, which has not been authorized by Parliament, but the earliest opportunity is taken to explain the transaction to the House of Commons.

There is also another fund, which was created in 1862, pursuant to the recommendations of the Committee on Public Accounts, in the previous year. It is called the "Civil Contingencies Fund," and is limited to £120,000. The Treasury are empowered to draw on this fund from time to time, to defray new and unforeseen expenditure for civil services at home, for which no votes had been taken, or to meet unforeseen deficiencies on ordinary votes. But every advance made out of these funds must be repaid out of votes to be taken in Parliament, in the following year, on behalf of the service for which such advances had been made. No expenditure whatever is allowed to be finally charged against either of these funds. The "Civil Contingencies Fund" has been set apart by the Treasury as a substitute for the irregular items previously included in the estimates under the head of "Civil Contingencies," and which had frequently to be voted after the expenditure had been incurred. The creation of this fund has been formally approved of by the Committee on Public Accounts; and there is no reason to doubt that the sanction of the legislature, which is certainly required to make it legally available for public purposes, would, if applied for, be readily granted.

I think it my duty further to refer to what seems to me to be the real key to the situation, and what to my mind explains exactly the conditions under which these warrants may be issued:

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

Or any other occasion arises when an expenditure not foreseen or provided for by Parliament is urgently and immediately required for the public good.

I know, and nobody who has followed this interesting discussion can ignore, that hon. gentlemen opposite, and some whose opinion is certainly entitled to great consideration and respect, have contended that in this case "or" does not mean "and." Well, Sir, if "or" does not mean "and" in this case, the constitution would be giving to the Government of the day a power which it could never have contemplated. It could never have contemplated to leave to the Executive the interpretation of what is provided for and what is not provided for. The representatives of the people might in their wisdom consider that certain expenditures should not be provided for; and the Government of the day might, after the session, turn around and call upon His Excellency to issue his warrant for those expenditures assigning as a reason that they had not been provided for by the vote of Parliament. So that I cannot for one moment believe that there can be a difference of opinion that to justify the issue of a Governor General's warrant the expenditure must be not foreseen and not provided for by Parliament. This is according to my interpretation and reading, in the light in which I read the discussions contained in our Canadian "Hansard," giving the opinions of men whose opinions are deserving of great consideration and respect. If the interpretation were different from what I state, then it would be impossible for me to understand that the people, as represented by their representatives in Parliament, are the sole masters of the expenditure of public money. But, Sir, questions as to the interpretation of this clause have arisen on more than one occasion and in more than one debate. In the debates of 1887, volume 1, page 258, it will be found that in that year Sir Richard Cartwright admitted that the lapsed balances of votes of Parliament might be expended under a Governor General's warrant and that a legal award against the Government might be provided for in this manner; but he raised this point, which is very close to the point under discussion to-day. The House met on April 13th, and it appeared that nearly $500,000 had been paid by Governor General's warrants, bearing date the 14th of April, the day after the House met. He contended that the Governor General's warrant could only issue when Parliament is not in session, as the language of the statute has it. The point made by Sir John Macdonald at the time will be remembered by hon. gentlemen. He agreed with the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) upon the point that the warrants should not be issued except when Parliament was not sitting, that is, during the recess of Parliament; but he said that the fact of the Order in Council having been signed previous to the meeting of Parliament was quite sufficient. He assimilated this case to the case of a man who was appointed by Order in Council to a position under the Government, but who had not received his commission, saying that the moment the Order in Council passed, this person held office, although the commission might not issue for twenty years afterwards. Mr. Davies said :

The main objection which has been urged is not that the ministerial act of signing the warrant took place after the meeting of Parliament and after a proper Order in Council had been passed. That is a mere ancillary point, and may or may not be correct. I am disposed to think myself that if a proper Order in Council had been passed, the mere affixing of the signature of the Governor General while Parliament is in session might not invalidate it.

Mr. Blake pointed out that "urgency and the necessity for immediate action for the public good are the elements which give to the Administration power to act."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Hon. gentlemen say "Hear, hear." I want to know where is the urgency. If they would substitute for the word "urgency" the word "inconvenience," I would agree with them. But where was the urgency when the Government had already received a warrant from His Excellency and when, the day before Parliament met, and before they had expended the whole amount, they asked for a new warrant from the Governor General for a million dollars? I do not think I am presuming when I say that if these hon. gentlemen had waited another day and asked this Parliament to vote this million dollars on the ground that it was required to pay the civil service, there would not have been a dissenting voice on this side to so reasonable a proposition. Let me say that I, probably from my long training as a Conservative, believe that encroachments upon the constitutional rights of the people should be guarded against in every way possible. If we look back to the noblest pages of our history, we find that men like Morin and Lafontaine, Baldwin and Howe, and the other fathers of constitutional government in Canada, made their names household words by the gallant and successful fight which they made against the encroachments of the Crown on the privileges of the people. Every student of our history knows of the difficulties that arose between the Governors of Canada under the old regime, who wished to expend the public money on what they would no doubt call their warrant, and the men whom I have mentioned who resisted these encroachments of the Crown on the privileges of the people. To-day it seems to me that we in Opposition are fighting against the encroachments of the advisers of the Crown on the rights and privileges of the people's representatives. I, for one, voicing my feelings and those, I believe, of the people of my province, declare that these great constitutional battles, which were fought upon constitutional grounds, are too fresh in the recollection of our people for us to allow this encroachment by the present Government on our constitutional rights to pass without most vigorous protest on our part. Sir, I hold that the practice which has been followed by this Government on this occasion is a most dangerous one; and in raising my voice in protest I do not do so merely for the purpose of opposing the Government or of delay—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Hon. gentlemen say "Hear, hear," but I do express my opinions frankly and honestly, and I say that my protest is not for the purpose so much of opposing the Government or of delaying, as we have been accused of delaying, the close of the session, but for the purpose of defending those rights which we hold sacred and which I, for one, will not allow to be interfered with if I can possibly prevent it. Could it be the intention of Parliament to allow the Executive to dispose of large sums of money which had not been provided for by Parliament? If that were the case, any Government could, for the purpose of obstruction, nullify the wish of the people of this country. They could wait until Parliament was prorogued, and then, following out the contention of hon. gentlemen on the other side, ask for Governor General's warrants to meet the public expenditure on the ground that these expenses had not been provided for. They could thus call upon the Governor General to issue his warrant and dispose of the people's money without the sanction of Parliament.

Mr. GIBSON. How did you pay the $100,000 to the Curran Bridge after Parliament was over?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman is more familiar with bridges than I am. I am talking of constitutional questions, and I can understand that the hon. gentleman could better discuss the bridge question than the constitutional point. I might tell the hon. gentleman something about the $100,000, but he seems to know all about it; and when the hon. gentleman addresses himself to this Parliament to enlighten it upon this constitutional question, he might, as a diversion, slip in the question of the $100,000 for the bridge. I feel a good deal of sympathy for the supporters of the Government. Through the unconstitutional method which was adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite last session, when they refused our reasonable proposition to vote a grant of money sufficient to meet the public expenditure until this House could be called together—which did not involve anything like the total estimates and did not commit hon. gentlemen opposite to any policy—they have found themselves placed in a most disagreeable position. These hon. gentlemen supporting the Government found themselves called upon to justify the unconstitutional act of the Government in paying out large sums which were not voted by Parliament and in violating the undoubted privilege of Parliament by issuing Governor General's warrants, when there was no necessity or constitutional right for so doing. I have addressed myself to that branch of the subject already, and I will not take up the time of the House by going into that question again. If hon. gentlemen were not controlled by party allegiance—and who can blame them for being so controlled in a Parliament in which party government is recognized—there would not be found one hon. gentleman who would not vote against the issuing of warrants of the Governor General and in favour of the maintaining of the privileges of this House, as provided under the constitution, properly interpreted. The exclusive right of Parliament is to initiate these votes of money; and the cases when that exclusive right can be interfered with must be jealously guarded by those who represent the people, because the opposite course is subversive of the very principles of the constitution under which we live, and which has made Canada a free and happy country. Sir, the points which we have considered it our duty to submit to the House, involve one of the greatest questions which has ever been brought before Parliament. The great principle at stake, as I understand it, is the supremacy of Parliament, as against the usurpation of its powers by the Executive. I am prepared to defend any measure that can be constitutionally adopted for the purpose of protecting the civil service against any suffering or trouble by reason of the failure to pay their salaries at the proper moment, and to achieve that end I would be prepared to overlook, to a great extent, this action of the Government, if it were not that I believe that action to be absolutely unconstitutional. It would have been proper for hon. gentlemen opposite, when Parliament met, to ask us on your left, Mr. Speaker, to consent to a vote for the purpose of meeting this expenditure. Considering the battles that have been fought on this question, session after session, and considering the strong ground taken by hon. gentlemen opposite, when in opposition, against the issuance of Governor General's warrants except in cases of absolute necessity, it seems almost impossible to believe that on assuming office their very first act should be in direct opposition to all that they had professed, when sitting on this side. This will show the people of Canada more clearly than anything can do that these hon. gentlemen are not prepared to carry out on the Treasury benches what they advocated when in opposition. I regret to have taken up the time of the House.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

but I feel strongly and deeply upon this question of the rights and privileges of this House; and, though prepared to respect the Executive and the advice given by the officers of the Crown to the Crown, I am not prepared to yield a single inch on a question involving the rights of the people, in order to accommodate views that may be entertained by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. McNEILL. I desire to be permitted to say a few words upon the subject now engaging the attention of the House. And when I do so, I hope I shall not be subject to the charge that has been levelled by the hon. member for North Wellington against hon. members on this side of the House. I hope I shall not be open to the charge that because I venture to rise in this House to say a word or two in reference to a matter of the greatest possible gravity, I do so for the purpose merely of taking up the time of the House and with the intention of increasing the public expenditure of this country. I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that the statement made by the hon. gentleman was most unparliamentary and most improper, and that it was in the option of any hon. member to rise at the time and call the hon. gentleman to order. I would not have risen to say one word in reference to this matter, were it not that the more I have considered this subject, the more I am impressed with its great importance and gravity; and I think the time of this House has been well occupied with a discussion which must have the effect of directing the attention of the people to a matter of so great moment. Before dealing further with the matter, I cannot but express my astonishment at the hon. member for North Wellington saying that he is prepared to endorse the conduct of the Government in this matter upon no other ground than that they are acting as badly as he said hon. gentlemen on this side of the House acted, when they were in power. I shall not pursue the argument further than to express the astonishment I feel at such a statement coming from an hon. gentleman of any standing on the floor of Parliament.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House to the nature of one of the precedents which is being established, to some of the arguments which have been adduced in support of it, and to some of the precedents which have crept in, so to speak, by stealth, under the shadow of the great wrong precedent which, on the strength of an opinion of Sir Oliver Mowat, the Government are setting up. And here I wish to protest very strongly against the doctrine which we have heard during this debate, emanating, I must confess, from very unexpected quarters, namely, that the Government are to be held blameless of unconstitutional action if only one of their own members, an eminent legal authority who is himself under trial before this House, can be induced, it may be by pressure from his colleagues, it may be by pressure of party exigencies, to give an opinion in favour of a course which he and his colleagues desired to pursue. That is a doctrine which I have heard with considerable surprise advanced in this House, and more especially have I been surprised at the quarters from which I have heard it promulgated. Sir, I have a very great respect for Sir Oliver Mowat, both as a lawyer and as a politician; but I venture, with all gentleness, to whisper in the ears of hon. gentlemen that it is just possible that even in the case of a lawyer, and in the case of a politician, the wish might be father to the thought. But there is another doctrine which has been promulgated, another idea which has been put forward to-day to which I utterly object—and I will refer to that now as I am on the subject of Sir Oliver Mowat. I object to the attempt which has been made during the course of this debate to hedge about the authority of his opinion with an awe and a majesty which are to dominate all legal and lay opinion in this House. I venture to say that if it were not eminently ridiculous, it would be exceedingly insulting to this House to assume that the opinion of the present Minister of Justice is not only to be held to overbear the opinion of one of the most eminent parliamentarians that has been known to Canada since this Act under discussion was placed upon the statute-book, but that it is to be held superior in authority to the united opinion, to the consensus of opinion, of all these eminent parliamentarians put together. But that is the suggestion which has been made here during the course of this debate, and, Sir, I protest against it.

Now, what is the first precedent to which I wish to call the attention of hon. members—and I especially beg the hon. members who are here for the first time to be kind enough to lend me their attention for a moment or two. What is the first precedent which we are establishing, if we do not call in question the conduct of the Government? The precedent is this, that the Executive can take power to themselves to expend public money even though Parliament has deliberately refused to grant this money. Parliament has deliberately refused to make the appropriation, and yet hon. gentlemen come down here and tell us that they have procured a Governor General's warrant for the express purpose of overriding the decision of this House with regard to the expenditure of public money. That, Sir, is what we are face to face with to-day; and I venture to say that, notwithstanding the weighty opinion to the contrary of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), it is a subject somewhat worthy of the consideration of this House, and somewhat worthy of the consideration of the people of this country. Now, we are told that the circumstances are peculiar, we are told that the circumstances are exceptional, and that that is a reason why this thing should be done. Sir, I venture to say that what we are doing is opening wide the door to abuse. The precedent we are establishing is that the Executive can sit in judgment upon the decisions of the House of Commons in reference to the expenditure of public money, can determine that this House has improperly withheld supplies, and can then vote to themselves the supplies in the Council Chamber, and with a strong hand, by means of Governor General's warrants, can take money which this House has refused. That is what we are discussing here to-night. Exceptional, hon. gentleman say, the circumstances are. The circumstances may be exceptional, but I say we are opening wide the door to abuse, and abuses will always be ingenious to frame excuses, and to say that the circumstances are exceptional. The member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), who made such an interesting and such an able speech from the ministerial side, told us that in his opinion saving common sense would be sufficient to guard the door which we are leaving open, that saving common sense would take care that no abuses enter. Ah, but, Mr. Speaker, supposing that a stronger than saving common sense comes along; supposing that party allegiance, with his heart aglow with party loyalty, comes along and brings with him saving party discipline with his cat-o-nine tails, and drives away Mr. Saving Common Sense from the gate, what then becomes of my hon. friend's safeguard? That, I am afraid, is what is being done here this night. I am afraid that party discipline and party allegiance are being brought forward to overbear saving common sense, and that if this measure is carried it will only be carried by calling in the assistance of those two powers. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that since I have had the honour of a seat in Parliament, in my opinion, I have never heard a graver question considered by this House.

Let us realize what we are doing, let us distinctly understand what we are about. If we agree to what has been done, if we allow this course which the Government has pursued to pass unchallenged and uncensured we are deliberately saying that the Government can take the money which the representatives of the people in Parliament, the custodians of the money of the people have refused to vote and can behind the back of the people's representatives appropriate it to uses they think best. Now we are told that the money has been honestly applied. I have no desire to weary hon. gentlemen, who no doubt are somewhat wearied already with this debate. While I have the authority here I am willing to leave it unread. But I will simply refer hon. gentlemen who use that argument to the words Hon. Edward Blake employed in this House in regard to such an argument, and they will find how shortly he dealt with that kind of argument. Why, Sir, it is as though some one came along and took possession of the home of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries during his absence, and by his strong hand kept it, saying he had a right to it, and when my hon. friend objected to this high-handed course of procedure it is as if the trespasser were to make excuse that he had not stolen any of his silver spoons. I ask whether my hon. friend thinks that would be a reasonable reply to his complaints that the man had been trespassing upon his estate and taking possession of his property. As the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), with his usual lucidity put the matter, two arguments have been advanced in defence of the course of the Government, one on political grounds and the other on legal grounds. I do not intend to weary the House by discussing this matter at length. I only wish to say a word so far as the political reason is concerned. It must on the face of it commend itself strongly to the approval of any fair-minded man. As I understand the contention of the Government it is this, that there being no provision made, and certain civil servants and employees of the Government being not only greatly in need of the payment of their salaries and wages but in almost dire distress and straits for the want of the necessary funds, the Government determined to pursue the course which they have pursued and to take the money out of the public treasury. Their argument is: We had to choose the lesser of two evils, and we considered that this was the lesser of the two and we adopted this procedure. That might be a very fair argument if the facts were exactly on all fours with the statement I have made, but in a moment I shall show that this is not the case. That argument proceeds on the assumption that there was no other way out of the difficulty than taking the money out of the public chest. I do not intend to elaborate this matter at length, for it has already been referred to. I say, however, that hon. gentlemen opposite have caused the difficulty, and if they caused the difficulty—where was their excuse? It seems to me that the simple truth is that the whole difficulty is caused by the conduct of hon. gentlemen themselves. I am not prepared to say that the late Government were not largely responsible for the Estimates not having been passed last session; on the contrary, I did not hesitate to say at the time that I thought they were largely responsible, I have not in any degree altered my opinion. But I say that in my opinion it is beyond the reach of controversy that hon. gentlemen opposite are solely responsible for this difficulty, inasmuch as they deliberately refused the ordinary vote of credit to be passed.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). We may be jointly responsible with the hon. gentlemen, but we are not solely responsible.

Mr. McNEILL. I certainly objected to no such vote as that to which I have referred, but, on the contrary, I always held that such a vote of credit should be passed. Furthermore, I stated that the ordinary Estimates should be allowed to pass with as little difficulty as possible. But I said then, and I say now, that owing to the course the Government pursued, I did not hold the Opposition mainly responsible for the fact that the Estimates were not passed as a whole, but I hold them responsible for the fact that a vote of credit was not granted. No fair-minded man can hold hon. gentlemen opposite anything else than responsible for the failure to allow a vote of credit to pass through this House last session. If that vote had passed, all this difficulty would have been avoided, so they are responsible for the difficulty with which we are now face to face. Further, I say that even when that difficulty arose they did not pursue the course which we should have followed in order to get rid of it. There was a constitutional course open to them—it was to meet Parliament. I am aware the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) has stated that we have no right to refer to what occurred during last Parliament. The hon. gentleman gets rid of the difficulty with a simple wave of his hand, and his doing so is only a further evidence of that magnificent courage which he possesses in debate and which has contributed so much to make him one of the foremost intellectual gladiators of our time. But I venture to say that it will be impossible for the hon. member for North Simcoe to find anywhere a dictum bearing out the statement he made in that regard; and if he were here I should like to ask him, what he would think if it were suggested provided certain eventualities had occurred, which might very well occur, that we were to be precluded from making any reference whatever to the debate on the Manitoba school question and the opinions expressed by hon. gentlemen during last Parliament. But hon. gentlemen who have been told they have no right to refer to what occurred during the last Parliament will become somewhat surprised when I tell them that on the last two occasions this question was before the House the subject was brought up by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and he introduced his remarks by references to what had occurred during the last Parliament, and he founded his argument upon those events, to which the hon. member for North Simcoe says we have no right whatever to refer. But I say to the Prime Minister that he had a constitutional remedy and he ought to have adopted it; he ought to have met Parliament and he ought to have asked Parliament for this money which instead of obtaining from Parliament in a constitutional manner, he abstracted by Governor General's warrants from the public treasury. I know it would have been inconvenient, that it might even have been dangerous from a party point of view; but party convenience and party exigency form no excuse for unconstitutional procedure. I am now speaking merely upon the political aspect of the case. This precedent which has been set up would be serious and grave enough if it rested just there. We have, however, not yet reached the most grave aspect of it. If the Government had come down to this House, and said that they were in straits; if they had explained the circumstances, if they had said that they regretted the course that they had been obliged to pursue, and had thrown themselves upon the generosity of this House, I could understand that the supporters of the Liberal Government, accepting the facts as stated, might have been willing to condone what they had done, and to support them in their course. But, Mr. Speaker, what I want to say is that the case does not rest there. What I want to call the attention of the House to, as the grave matter in connection with the subject, is this, that hon. gentlemen justify what they have done, that they say what they have done is constitutional, that they say what they have done is regular.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McNEILL. I say we are establishing a precedent which we may be very sure hon. gentlemen who advance that argument—and I see it is cheered by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries—will be quite ready to adopt in future, when their party exigencies require it. This House may mark the demeanour of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the hon. the Finance Minister in reference to that very matter. Sir Oliver Mowat has stated, in answer to the letter of the Prime Minister, that he holds that these funds may be taken for the payment of certain civil servants, in conformity with the section of the statute, and hon. gentlemen opposite act upon that, and cheer the statement that their course is constitutional. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, when he laboured, as I never saw him labour in this House before, to justify the course of the Government, was so oppressed with the gravity of the circumstance that he endeavoured to say that what his Government had done would not be a precedent. But other hon. gentlemen opposite cheered the statement that it was regular and constitutional, and I say therefore that we are establishing precedents with a vengeance, and nailing them up, and clinching them, at that. One of the precedents is, as I have already said, that the Executive can take the money which Parliament has refused, and appropriate it themselves by Governor General's warrants. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention to the conduct of the Government with regard to this first Governor General's warrant. The opinion of Sir Oliver Mowat was that money could be taken for the payment of those employees, and the first warrant brought down seemed carefully to go upon the lines of that opinion, and was confined exclusively to the payment of those employees. But what do we find the Government did afterwards? We find that they took money for the payment of "contingencies" to the extent of $29,239, which they were not justified under the warrant to expend, and they took for "miscellaneous expenditure" to the tune of $20,300. If you add to that the expenditure in connection with the Lieutenant-Governor's office in the North-west Territories—to which I specially wish to call the attention of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), if he is in the House—if you add to that this expenditure of $790, you will find that under this warrant they have expended over $50,000 of the people's money, without any warrant whatever. And yet they come here and ask that their course should be supported, because of the opinion of Sir Oliver Mowat that they might use certain moneys for the payment of certain employees. So much for the first warrant. Now let us come to the warrant of the 18th of August, and what do we find? You know, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentlemen had by this time become a little more accustomed to their position. They felt themselves a little more secure in their saddles. They had actually been in office somewhat over a month. They found it very convenient, by means of Governor General's warrant, to get hold of the public money and spend it in the way they thought best; but it strikes me they had some little trouble with our old friend the Auditor General. I do not know for certain, but I think there was a little trouble of that kind, and the hon. gentlemen found that they had been just a little too restricted in the terms of the first warrant they brought down. It did not give them quite scope enough. The great Liberal party was not to be cabbined, cribbed and confined in this sort of way. They wanted more scope, and they took it. We find, therefore, that the second warrant is not by any means confined, as the first was, to the payment of employees. Sir Oliver Mowat's opinion was certainly confined to that, but the hon. gentlemen were able to enlarge it a little, and able to regard it as giving them somewhat wider power. They read it more liberally, and they put a very liberal construction upon it, and so we find that the Governor General's warrant of the 18th of August goes very much beyond the payment of employees. We know that they had already paid away the people's money for "contingencies" and "miscellaneous expenditure," which they had no right to do, and what did they do next? They introduced into the second warrant the power to pay contingencies, in express terms, and they said:

Also for the payment of pensions, superannuation allowance, contingencies and other expenditures.

They were not to be cabined, cribbed and confined. They were going to have free scope and I say again they took it. "Other expenditures"—what did that cover? Anything that any member of the Government was prepared to say was urgent; because they dropped the "immediate necessity." All they say is that it was urgent; that is a sufficient excuse. Any expenditure of any kind or description that any hon. Minister chose to consider as urgent they took leave and power under this warrant to cover with the people's money. I want to know if there is a single member of this House who lives by the waters of the great lakes or by the seaboard who has not some public work in his constituency that he considers urgent? I venture to think there is not one. If my memory does not deceive me, if it is not a blank, I have heard my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) declare in this House that a tunnel under the ocean between Prince Edward Island and the mainland was urgently required; and I say with all gravity that under this Governor General's warrant my hon. friend and his colleagues took power to themselves to expend all the millions of money necessary for the construction of that work, if only the hon. Minister of Public Works declared it to be urgent.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). With all gravity, the hon. member says that.

Mr. McNEILL. I say with all gravity that they took the power, and I say it is impossible for any person to controvert the statement. I am glad to find that the hon. First Minister is somewhat shocked to discover what his Government has really been doing. They did not take the money, but they took the power to take it if they liked, and they have established a precedent which would enable any Government, less honest than themselves, in the future to appropriate the people's money by Governor General's warrants for any purpose they pleased, provided a Minister were found prepared to say that the expenditure was urgent. Now, I want this House seriously to consider whether, in the presence of these facts, which are incontrovertible, it is prepared to endorse the conduct which has been pursued by this Government. We have been told that this expenditure was simply for the purpose of paying employees who were in distress and required the money. Is it so? Is that the only expenditure which the Government took power under Governor General's warrant to make? I ask any independent member of this House if it be so; and if it be not so, I want to ask the independent members of this House to condemn the course that has been pursued, as I most certainly will condemn it. Hon. gentlemen opposite are Liberals. I am a Tory—I always was—I could not be anything else.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McNEILL.

Mr. McNEILL. And I am not prepared, although the Liberals may be prepared, to endorse or condone the course of the Government, who have made most dangerous inroads upon ancient privileges of the House of Commons, that lie at the very roots of our parliamentary institutions.

Now, I want just for a moment to recapitulate. I want to call attention to the expenditures which the Government took power to make under this last warrant: Salaries and contingencies; salaries, &c.; charges of management; maintenance of grounds; dredging, $14,900; Rideau Hall, $770; surveys and inspections; telegraph lines; canals, including construction, $62,100; penitentiaries, pay-list and maintenance; Dominion police; North-west Mounted police, maintenance, $10,000. And now I want to call the attention of the House for a moment to what we find has been done by this Government. We find that under cover of the warrants of the 16th of July they have taken money to defray expenditures which were not covered by these warrants—that they have taken as much as $50,000 in this way out of the public treasury. I do not charge corruption at all. I repeat, however, that they had no more right to take this money under these warrants than any hon. member of this House, or than the felon who prowls the streets. Further, we find that after they had been only a little over a month in office, they boldly threw off the mask, and took to themselves power, not only to pay the salaries and wages referred to in the Premier's letter and in the opinion of Sir Oliver Mowat, but to make any other expenditure that any Minister might consider to be urgently required. We find proof of the liberality applied to the construction of the term "urgent" in the fact that on the 18th of August—(Parliament meeting on the 19th, remember)—$7,000 are declared to be urgently required to meet payments which are not only unblushingly admitted not to have fallen due, but the services for which apparently had not even commenced at that time, and not until thirteen days after Parliament had assembled. We find that a new departure has been made, and a new construction has been placed by this Government upon the clause of the statute which gives authority to issue Governor General's warrants. Hitherto it has always been admitted that the warrant cannot be issued unless the expenditure has been unforeseen and unprovided for, and is urgently and immediately required. This Government holds that it need not be unforeseen and that it need not be immediately required. They consider themselves justified in bringing down a Governor General's warrant if only the hon. Minister of Public Works or the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals will certify that the expenditure is urgent. They hold this to be in accordance with the law and the constitution.

Now, I have purposely avoided quoting from "Hansard" to show the opinion entertained on this subject by Sir John Macdonald, who said that the whole meaning of the clause was that the expenditure was unforeseen; the opinion of the Hon. Edward Blake, who called attention to the fact that the marginal explanatory note referred to accidents; the words of the hon. gentleman, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who sits opposite me, who said that it must be both unforeseen and immediately urgent; the statement of the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) to the same effect; the statement of the Hon. Mr. Mills, and the statement on two occasions made by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce to the same effect. I have not wearied the House with any of these quotations, which are all to be found in "Hansard" where hon. gentlemen can find them for themselves. Further, I say, we find—and this is the most menacing of all—that this Government consider themselves justified under the constitution in taking these moneys in this way for the payment of foreseen expenditures, even in cases where Parliament after consideration has refused to make the appropriations. These are the circumstances with which this House is face to face to-night; and I would ask hon. members who have any regard for precedents or for the public weal, to allow their minds and memories to travel back for only a short way over the history of parliamentary institutions in this country, and just to recall what took place in the province of Quebec a very few years ago; and I would ask them to consider earnestly and dispassionately whether, remembering those circumstances, they are prepared to endorse the course which this Government has already thought fit to pursue. For my own part, I do not hesitate to say that, in my opinion, no precedents more ominous than those that have been established could well be imagined. No precedents could well be imagined that are more heavily laden with possibilities disastrous to this commonwealth.

Mr. MONK. Mr. Speaker, I trust to be able, in a few words, at this advanced stage of the debate to give some reason for expressing the motives which lead me to vote, as I intend to do, upon the question now submitted to the consideration of this House. It is a strange spectacle, Mr. Speaker, for one new to an assemblage of this kind to see what I have seen to-day. We are sent here—at least, that was our impression—to defend the interests of the people. We are sent here to see to the maintenance of the great principles which are at the basis of our political institutions; but, Sir, when, upon the very first matter which is presented for our consideration, we happen to differ among ourselves, we are told, as I have heard it said this afternoon by the hon. member for North Wellington

(Mr. McMullen) that we have entered upon a systematic course of obstruction. We are told that very far from having any intention to serve the interests of our constituents and the country at large, we are, at the very inception of this Parliament, obstructing the Government and preventing the proper administration of the affairs of this country. We are told, on the other hand, as I have heard it said repeatedly to-day, that that violation—for I will use no other expression—of a great constitutional principle, which, to my mind, has taken place, has met with the approval of both sides of this House. We are told that it has met with the approval of former Governments, just as it has, in this instance, of the present Administration. Well, for my part, I have no hesitation in saying that I disclaim—and I am sure that in so disclaiming I am but the echo of many gentlemen who sit on this side of the House—any intention of thwarting or embarrassing the Government. There is no such intention in me; but I claim the right, as a representative of the people, sitting in this House, to call in question any act of the Government which may be an infringement of those very principles in virtue of which we are sitting here to-day. Now, has there been any violation of those great principles which it is our duty to safeguard and protect? I say that there has been. There may have been in the past, there have been, to my knowledge, in the past, if not here, in some of the provinces; and there has been, in this instance, a flagrant violation of one of the most important principles of our constitution—that principle which proclaims that the people only, through their representatives, shall control and supervise the expenditure of public funds. This is no new principle. I shall not take up the attention of the members of this House by mentioning under what circumstances that principle has been affirmed and is in existence to-day in England, as it is here, but I am only stating what is well known to every student of constitutional history, when I say that the consecration of that principle has been obtained by perhaps the greatest struggle ever witnessed in the establishment of the British constitution. It is a long time ago since the principle was established in England that no tax could be levied without the consent of the people; but after that principle had been established, it took over five centuries for the people of England to have it declared by the Crown and by the Executive that the people alone, through its representatives, should, in every detail and in every respect, control the expenditure of public money. Sir, I shall not, as I said a moment ago, take up the time of the House in mentioning the incidents of that struggle; but I think every hon. gentleman here will admit that it is one of the most interesting chapters of the constitutional history of England. Sir, in Canada that struggle was, considering the change of time and change of country, as great a struggle almost as it was in England; and if we make allowance for the advanced ideas of a later period, we must recognize that, strange as it may appear, the principle then contended for has been one of the most difficult principles for the Crown to concede, and one of the principles at all times, in England as well as here, most jealously guarded by the people who had obtained the recognition of it. Why, up to 1791, we were unable to carry out that principle; and in 1791 we were only able to carry it out to this extent, that the people were able to control, through their representatives, those moneys only which were collected in virtue of statutes passed by the people's representatives themselves, and at that time the Crown remained in possession of two sources of revenue, which enabled the Crown and the Executive to defy the wishes of the representatives of the people, and delayed here for a considerable time, as was delayed in England for many centuries, the establishment of parliamentary government in the practical and real sense of the word. It was only in 1831 that we succeeded in wresting from the Crown—and the struggle was a most arduous one, particularly in that province from which I come, and one of whose constituencies I have the honour to represent—the control of those revenues which were derived under the old Stamp or Fiscal Act of 1874, and which had, during that long period, remained entirely under the control of the Crown. And even then, when we had these two sources of revenue under the control of the representatives of the people, the Crown remained independent of the people, having still a third source of revenue which enabled it to defy the wishes of the people's representatives, and delay for a considerable time, the establishment of parliamentary government. I refer to the hereditary territorial and casual revenues of the Crown, which only a few years ago—speaking from memory, I may say about 1847, but at no very distant period—were obtained control of by the people through their representatives, and complete parliamentary control of the revenue established. Now, Sir, we, in Canada, act, so far as the question which at present occupies us is concerned, under special legislative enactment. There is, strange to say, an exceptional disposition in our law which enables the Executive, under peculiar circumstances, which are mentioned in that section 32 of that chapter of our revised statutes already referred to, and which I shall not speak of further, because we know it almost by heart, to dispose of certain sums of money without the previous sanction of the representatives of the people. But what I contend is, that this disposition of the statute being exceptional—and I am not able to account for that statutory disposition, except that in its origin it was brought about by the shortness of the sessions of Parliament and the difficulty which possibly at that time existed of proceeding here as they do in England under similar circumstances—it should be interpreted with the greatest strictness, for the simple reason that it is an exceptional disposition, and, as every legal gentleman in this House knows, dispositions which establish exceptions or exemptions, are liable to the strictest interpretations, and should not be interpreted in a wide, or large, or generous sense, but should be interpreted in a strict sense only. Because, also—and I think we have an example of it in this instance—the application of that exception is liable to give rise to dangerous precedents. Difficult has been the struggle, Sir, by which we have obtained control of our revenues. Reluctantly have the Crown and the Executive given way to the people in this respect, and there is danger of sacrificing the principle for which we have contended so long, if we enter upon a course of analogy or precedent. Further, there is no principle more liable to abuse than that which is contained in the exceptional disposition of section 32 of the statute just referred to. What do we find in the present instance? I listened with the greatest attention to what seemed to me a very able argument in support of the position taken by the Government on this question—that presented by the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Lount). That was, to my mind, the best that could be said in favour of the course taken by the Government. For my part, speaking independently, had we been confined to a consideration of the warrant of the 16th July, I should have felt disposed to take the view of the hon. member for Centre Toronto. But we have the warrant of the 18th August, and it seems to me that the issuing of that warrant is an entirely unjustifiable act, and one which we cannot condone. That warrant, Sir, was not issued for expenditures which were unforeseen. They had been foreseen. As has been properly pointed out, this warrant was for expenditures which had been before the previous Parliament and had been practically refused by the representatives of the people a few weeks before the warrant was issued. Therefore, it was doubly incumbent upon the Government not to have issued that warrant, but to have awaited the meeting of the representatives of the people, then arrived here for the most part, and many of them on their way to the seat of government. But was that expenditure, whether foreseen or not, whether disposed of by Parliament or not, urgently and immediately required? I find satisfactory proof of the contrary; in the first place, in the fact that there could be no urgency on the 18th of August, just a few hours previous to the assembling of the representatives of the people, and in the further fact that a great part of that sum is still in the coffers of the Government, not having been expended. The money is there, but we are unable to deal with it. We are told, Sir, that Parliament could not assemble in time to vote these moneys. That may apply to the expenditures under the warrant of the 16th July, but certainly it does not apply to those under the warrant which issued the 18th of August, a few hours before the assembling of Parliament. We are told—and it is a very strange argument, Mr. Speaker,—that unquestionably there would have been obstruction here, had these appropriations been asked for. Speaking for myself, if these expenses, the necessity for which I do not doubt, had been set before us as soon as practicable after our meeting, I would have offered no obstruction. There is no desire for obstruction on this side of the House. For my own part, whatever may be the causes which have contributed to bring about this unusual session, I wish to say at once that I am anxious to expedite its business; and, if we cannot obtain from the Government a declaration of its policy on some of the most important questions which have been before the people during the past few weeks, if it is impossible for the Government at this stage to give us its views, why then, making allowance for them, I wish to dispose as soon as possible of the business we have come here to transact, and let the Government bring us together as early as possible next year to tell us that policy, for we require to know it. I will not deal with the argument I heard this afternoon, to the effect that, inasmuch as, under section 32, warrants may be issued for expenditures not provided for by Parliament, and as there was no provision for these expenditures, therefore the warrants could legally issue. I will not stop to consider that, because, as everybody is aware, there are conditions laid down in the section other than that of provision not having been made by Parliament. We are told that this was a special case. Sir, I put this argument side by side with the argument of an hon. member who said that we must proceed by analogy, and if this, although not a case such as provided for by section 32, is an analogous case, then we must bring it within the purview of that section. But this is not a special case, this is a case which, no doubt, has occurred before, if not here, then in some other dependency of the Empire. It is in no sense a special case, nor can we proceed by analogy. This disposition of section 32 is an exceptional one, and we cannot proceed by analogy. We were told, too, that Parliament had not lost control over the expenditure. But it has lost control, it has lost effective control, and with regard to that expenditure we, who represent the people and who have a right to control every cent of expenditure, are reduced to the role of critics, we can do no more than criticise that expenditure, find fault with it, but we cannot command it any further. Therefore, speaking for myself, I believe there is here a business principle, a principle which might guide a mandatory—to apply that argument to the warrant of the 18th of August—if he expected within a few hours the arrival of the mandator, and if, in spite of that he should undertake to provide sums not immediately and urgently necessary. Taking a business view of it, he should await the arrival of the mandator, and defer any action until the mandator had arrived. Now, viewing it from a constitutional standpoint, I think this a great question. Whatever has been done in the past, I think we should not proceed any further to sanction an expenditure of this kind unless it comes legally within the provisions set down in this section 32 of chapter 29 of our Revised Statutes. There is no doubt in my mind that if the Government provided for the issue of this warrant a few hours before the meeting of Parliament, it did so because it distrusted Parliament, and I believe it is the duty of this House to frown down such distrust. For my part, I would not have hesitated, as I said before, to give every assistance to the Government in providing for expenditures which were immediately necessary; but I object to the violation of the principle, and upon that ground alone I would vote in favour of the amendment. Sir, I think we should as far as possible proceed cautiously in spending money which has not been provided for expressly by this House. We cannot do better in a country which is governed by the same principles as those which obtain in England, than to follow the rule which they follow there, and they have no such disposition there. It is needless for me to enter into details, but there is an easy manner there, when Parliament meets, of passing measures which are called Consolidated Bills Fund No. 1, No. 2, &c., by which cases of this kind are provided for. Never in England would they admit of such an expenditure as has been made in this case by an Executive, a few hours before the meeting of Parliament, taking upon itself to dispose in this way of public money. Well, Sir, that principle to which I have just referred with regard to the issuing of warrants, has been violated in the province of Quebec more than once. I believe that it has been violated in this instance, and I think under these circumstances the sooner we modify the disposition of this section 32 or repeal it altogether, the better for the interests of the people whom we represent.

Mr. OSLER. I did not intend, nor did I wish to make, any remarks upon this question until a very recent period of this debate. When I came here as a new member I was entirely ignorant of the procedure, and entirely ignorant of the laws and the customs governing the expenditure of public money in such cases as the one we are now discussing. Had I been called upon to vote upon the question of issuing these warrants before I had heard this discussion, I think I may say without hesitation that I should have voted with the Government. The discussion, it strikes me, is very much of a legal nature, so much so that the legal members of this House have devoted two or three days to giving their views upon it, although they differ from each other. I do not understand the technical point involved as a lawyer would do, but I do not hesitate to say that had I been called upon to raise the money under the circumstances, I should have raised what was absolutely necessary in some way or another, and in the best way possible. I dare say that the issuing of the warrant in the first place was the best thing to do under the circumstances. I may here remark, Mr. Speaker, that I have been a Conservative but not an active politician. Many of my friends, my best friends, perhaps, belong to the other side of politics. For years past I have usually taken it for granted that everything the Conservatives did was wrong, and had a Conservative Government been in power and had they issued these warrants under the same circumstances, I should not have been surprised, I should have expected it as a matter of course. But my hon. friends opposite have for so long proclaimed themselves to be the righteous men, and that the Liberal-Conservatives were the men who always did wrong, that I must say it comes to me as a shock to find the first act of a Reform Government after they get into power is to issue Governor General's warrants for a sum far and away beyond all the requirements of the time and of the occasion. I understand that the money raised by the first warrant has not all been expended; and I believe that of the money raised by the second warrant, there is a large amount still in hand. It appears to me that there must be some defect in the constitution when we are confronted with a case such as the one before us, when a Government of neither party can properly raise money when Parliament is not in session. It strikes me that if we were raising money as individuals for our own purposes under such circumstances, we would raise the least amount that was absolutely necessary for the occasion. I, for one, would put aside a great many of the fine constitutional points if it came to a question of pure and simple business, and I would say, as we do in business: we must risk this, and raise a certain amount of money; but we would raise always the smallest amount absolutely necessary. It appears to me that the Government have not followed that plan, that they have gone in wholesale, asking for enormous sums which were not necessary and the payment of which, up to this date, has not been required. I can say without hesitation that if on the day Parliament met the leader of the Government had stated that money was required to pay wages and the running expenses of the country, I would by my voice, influence and vote have aided him in obtaining that money, if I had to vote against my party and every member of it. Supporters of the party in power have, from time to time, in their speeches claimed that they were the party of purity, that the money had been entrusted to them, and because it has been entrusted to them it was all right. I am very glad to be able to say that the members on the opposite side of the House in their speeches to-day have not put forward that claim; but up to to-day almost every speaker in closing his address declared: it does not matter whether we have exceeded our powers, whether we have broken the law or not, the country trusts us, we are the honest people, and the public money is all right with us. If that principle is to be adopted in this House, the members of the present Government had better stay there, pass all the laws they require, and on the last day of Parliament call the Opposition together to ratify them. In one speech after another they have assumed that the people were at their back, that they had turned out the wicked and corrupt Conservatives, and they had a mandate from the people to spend their money without being questioned by anybody. It was almost resented that a member of the Conservative party should question the expenditure, or their action in asking the Governor General to give them warrants for $1,000,000 long before that money was required. If they could properly ask for $1,000,000, there is no reason why they should not ask for $10,000,000.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Where is the Governor General in these matters?

Mr. OSLER. If you place the responsibility on the Governor General, I will absolve the Government. If the Governor General signed the warrants against the wishes and advice of the leader of the Government, then I will take my seat and say no more. But I affirm that if the first act of the Government which came into power a few weeks ago was to bite off an enormous sum of money for their expenditure without the consent of Parliament, if the position they take is that they are not responsible to Parliament, and whatever money they ask is considered to be rightly granted and rightly expended, then hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have nothing to say. I would very much rather have cast my first vote in this House on a more important question than this one; but the question has grown in importance to me as I have heard it discussed. I believe the discussion has been drawn out to a much greater length than was necessary, and I distinctly state that if by any means I can aid the members of the Government in closing this session before the end of thirty or thirty-one days, I will do all in my power to aid them to do so and to save the country the extra expenditure. We all know how easy it is to make promises and to make statements when we are not responsible for them. Members on the Government side of the House seem to me to have assumed that they have a holy mission from the country to protect the country's interests, that the country has looked to them for long years to protect the people and keep them from the grasping corruption of the Tory party. I have not been a politician, but it seems to me that for eighteen long and weary years hon. gentlemen opposite have put their policy before the country and the country has repudiated it time and again. I hardly remember the facts, because I am sorry to say I took little interest in politics as far back as 1873—

Mr. LANDERKIN. If you had taken more interest, you would have been on this side.

Mr. OSLER. But if I am right in my judgment, when the Liberal-Conservatives were turned out in 1873, and the party of hon. gentlemen opposite came into power, they did not come into power on their own virtues, but on the faults and failings of the other side. I can tell hon. gentlemen opposite—and I do not hesitate to say it—that they have not come into power to-day on their own virtues, or their own policy, or from any advocacy of a policy put forward for the benefit of Canada, but they have come into power because of the weaknesses and the failings of the Conservative party. I do not mind making that statement. I have been a Conservative all my life, and I have often told my Conservative friends that they have been wrong in many cases; but I should be very sorry to come into power not on my own virtues, not on any thing I have done, but because my opponents on the other side of the House were so weak that they were not to be trusted with the Government any longer. Every hon. gentleman whom I have heard up to-day—barring the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy)—ended his defence of the action of the Government with some such words as these; No matter whether right or wrong we are honest, and whatever we do will be sustained by the country. One member after another has risen in his place and stated: we are honest at all events, and that atones for every sin in the calendar. I think we all know that when a lady professes that she is virtuous, so virtuous, there is very good ground for doubting her virtue; and I for one have been very strongly influenced in the vote I am about to give to-night by the fact that one and all of the members on the Government benches have not defended the action of the Government because it was constitutional, and they have not taken the position which they should have taken and which they have always stated they would take, that they were so guarded in everything they did that they would not go beyond any solitary law of the constitution. They had not taken that ground at all, but they have all sat silent in their places, supposing that the country will think that they are honest, and so trust them. Well, the country have trusted you hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, but they have trusted you, not for your own virtues, but because the Conservatives were not so good as they ought to be.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. OSLER. I do not hesitate to say that.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. OSLER. I believe that it is going to do the Conservative party a great deal of good that they are in opposition, and I believe that it is going to do the country a great deal of good.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Hear, hear.

Mr. OSLER. Yes, it will do the country a great deal of good, if the members of the Government and the Liberal party give up all the cranks and the quibbles that they have been advocating for the past eighteen or twenty years, and if they honestly come forward and say that the good of Canada is the first object they have in view; and that Canada, and Canada alone, is what they will look to.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Hear, hear; Canada first.

Mr. OSLER. But the Liberal party have gone from one point of the political compass to the other. They have adopted unrestricted reciprocity and every other policy that it is possible to imagine, and time and again the people of Canada refused to trust them, no matter how bad the Conservative party were. However, the Liberals went to the country this time adopting the main plank of the Conservative platform. They told the people from one end of the country to the other: We are not going to interfere with your trade nor with your industries. I say, for one, that if they swallow all of their talk for the last twenty years, if they now adopt what they condemned as evil, and if they say they will protect Canadian industries and advocate interests of Canada, I, for one, will vote for them on every occasion they do that.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Hear, hear. We will have your vote every time.

Mr. OSLER. I hope so. But, following out by analogy as to what is thought of the woman who protests that her virtue is so good, seeing that hon. gentlemen have protested so much that they are absolutely honest, I, for one, believe that they require to be most carefully watched from morning until night. I will do my little part to watch them. I say, Sir, without hesitation, that if hon. gentlemen opposite carry out what is for the best interests of the country, and bring in a policy that is for the advancement of Canada, I will not obstruct nor object to them.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, before you declare the vote, I wish to draw your attention to the fact that the hon. member for Two Mountains (Mr. Ethier) was not in the Chamber when the question was put.

Mr. SPEAKER. Was the hon. member for Two Mountains in the Chamber when the question was put ?

Mr. ETHIER. Yes, but I only heard a portion of it.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman cannot vote.

Mr. TAYLOR. I wish also to call your attention to the fact that the hon. member for Haldimand and Monck (Mr. Montague), the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Bennett), the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Kendry) and the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. MacLaren), have not voted, and are in the House.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I was paired with the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Burnett), or I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. BENNETT. I was paired with the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Erb), otherwise I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. MacLAREN. I was paired with the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Cowan), otherwise I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. KENDRY. I was paired with the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell), otherwise I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. The hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay) has not voted.

Office of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada ..... $31,885

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This item was allowed to stand for the purpose of obtaining information as to the reorganization of the office, which the Minister of Finance stated had caused the reduction.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The cause of the reduction in the vote is this. First of all, the chief clerk, who was in office last year, Mr. Pope, has been transferred to the Department of Secretary of State. The office is still vacant. Mr. Pope's salary was $2,400, and it is proposed to reduce it to $1,800. A first-class clerkship has been dropped, effecting a saving of $1,400; a third-class clerkship has also been dropped, effecting a reduction of $400; one messenger has also been dropped, effecting a saving of $500; making a total saving of $2,900. Against this are the statutory increases, amounting to $930; making a total reduction of $1,970. These are the Estimates, as they have been prepared by hon. gentlemen opposite themselves when in office.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon. friend is aware that the late Government made a recommendation to fill the vacancy created by Mr. Pope's transfer to the Department of Secretary of State and his appointment as a deputy Minister. The late Government recommended that that vacancy should be filled by the appointment of Mr. Payne, who had filled the position of private secretary to Sir Mackenzie Bowell when Prime Minister and also to myself. The hon. gentleman is aware that there has been some correspondence on this subject. I would like to know whether my hon. friend is in a position to say what is proposed to be done with reference to that.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am aware that it was the intention of the late Government to promote Mr. Payne to the chief clerkship. I know nothing of that personally. I simply gather, from what correspondence has been exchanged and what knowledge I have been able to obtain in the department, that Mr. Payne, who is in many respects well qualified, had to undergo some special examination to qualify himself, and that he failed in the technical knowledge which was required in order to obtain the necessary qualification. Under such circumstances his promotion could not be effected under the law as it exists.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am extremely sorry to hear the statement made by the hon. First Minister, because I do not agree with his statement of the facts of the case. I think it would be better to allow this item to stand, and I would ask the hon. First Minister to have laid on the Table the recommendation of Council and all the correspondence connected with the proposed appointment of Mr. Payne. If the hon. gentleman will look carefully into the subject, I have no hesitation in saying that he will find that there has been no violation of the law in any particular, but that everything that has been done has been done exactly in accordance with established precedent. Mr. Payne was appointed to a position subject to his passing the examination, and that examination he submitted himself to, with the result that he passed on all the subjects with very much higher marks than were required in order to pass. I think the average was, if I remember correctly, something like 90 on all the subjects. On the technical paper, which was prepared by the Clerk of the Privy Council, as I understand it, very extraordinary questions were asked. I can only say that I applied myself to the Clerk of the Privy Council for a copy of the questions which he, as head of the department, had submitted for Mr. Payne's examination, but was never able to obtain them. I endeavoured to obtain them because, so far as I was informed, they were of an extremely unusual character. A large number of questions were asked of a highly technical and extraordinary character, so far as my information goes, but I was unable to obtain a copy of those questions, although they certainly should have been available. I regard this as a matter of very great importance. What took place was this. When it was found that Mr. Payne had passed a highly satisfactory examination and had shown his thorough fitness for the position, with the exception of answering these very unusual and extraordinary questions, as I am informed they were, an Order in Council was passed remedying that defect and giving a sufficient number of marks for the purpose of enabling the examination to be completed. This course had been, I am instructed, pursued on several occasions, and there can be no question of law about it, as the hon. gentleman must see, because, under the Act, the Governor General in Council has the power to alter, from time to time, the questions that are submitted by the board of examiners for these examinations. Therefore it is not a matter of statute but regulated absolutely by the Governor General in Council, and as they have the power to arrange the questions in the first instance, so they have the power, from time to time, to modify and alter these questions. Therefore it was within the power and province of the Governor General in Council to make such a modification as would enable Mr. Payne to pass satisfactorily the examination required. That was done, and a Minute in Council was prepared, setting forth the facts in general terms as I have stated them, and asking that the examination should be held, as it was held by the committee of the Privy Council, to be a satisfactory examination and to entitle the person examined to hold office. Some question of legality, as the hon. gentleman is aware from the correspondence that has already been submitted, was raised, and the Minister of Justice gave his written statement that the appointment of Mr. Payne was entirely legal, and he did this after communicating with the department. There was no legal objection to Mr. Payne's receiving the promotion to which he was recommended. Under these circumstances, it would be better for the hon. gentleman to allow this question to stand and lay upon the Table all the correspondence connected with this matter in order that it may be fairly placed before the House. I may say that I would have had some additional information here, but I was glad to learn from Mr. Payne that he had reason to believe it was decided he was to receive the appointment. I did not propose to raise the question at all. It was only in consequence of the statement made by the hon. First Minister that I felt obliged to ask him to allow this item to stand and have the correspondence down before the matter was disposed of.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I certainly have no objections at all to bring down for the information of the House all the information that is in the department. I would, however, ask my hon. friend to reconsider his demand about having the item stand. There is no reason why it should stand. The information can be brought down and the subject taken up again, either on concurrence or any other occasion. There is no desire at all on my part to keep any thing back. I would not have the hon. gentleman understand that it is my intention to give the appointment to Mr. Payne. All I can say is that there is no desire but to treat Mr. Payne with every justice and even liberality, but at the same time I must disclaim a good deal of what has been said by the hon. gentleman. It was the intention of the late Government to appoint Mr. Payne to the vacant position of chief clerk. In order to do that, Mr. Payne was required to pass the examination for the civil service. He passed his examination on general branches with credit. This is undoubted. At the same time, upon the technical subjects on which he was examined he failed. My hon. friend says that the questions put to him were unduly severe. As to that I have no information at all. I never looked at the questions. All that I know is that they were prepared by Mr. McGee, who is an old, well tried, efficient officer of the Government, and I cannot, while I have no other intention but to do justice to Mr. Payne, allow any reflection of that kind on Mr. McGee to pass unchallenged. The better way of setting the matter at rest is to have all the papers brought down, and I will see that they are laid on the Table the first opportunity. In the meantime, I would ask my hon. friend to let the item pass, and either on concurrence or on some other occasion we can discuss the matter.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My only object was to have a discussion of the matter when the papers are on the Table, but I accept the statement of my hon. friend that ample opportunity will be given to discuss it, and under those circumstances it can be taken up when the papers are on the Table. I would ask that as little time as possible be lost in laying the papers on the Table. And I may say that I felt it right, when Mr. Payne made the statement to me that he did, as to the character of the questions that a candidate was called upon to answer, I called upon Mr. McGee to ask him for copies of the papers which he had set, and the questions which had been answered, and I have never been able to obtain them. Mr. McGee said he could not find them, and subsequently he said they were in the hands of Dr. Thorburn. But Dr. Thorburn had not them in his possession, and I have not been able to get them. Mr. Payne, from recollection, has given me a statement of what these questions were, and I think my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) would be as much astonished as I was to find what a person going up for examination as a clerk in the Privy Council Office was called upon to answer—questions which, I, am inclined to think, would puzzle any member of this House to answer. However, I will accept the statement of my hon. friend that he will lay the whole of the papers upon the Table of the House, with an understanding that an early opportunity will be given to discuss the question.

Mr. FOSTER. Are all the third-class clerkships estimated for—twelve in number—filled?

The PRIME MINISTER. No, one is vacant.

Mr. FOSTER. I would say to my hon. friend that there is no use in estimating for that position, because the law does not allow it to be filled. A good rule is not to ask for a salary for a position which cannot be filled.

The PRIME MINISTER. The criticism is a just one, but it is a criticism of the hon. gentleman's own estimate. I took it as it was.

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot help that; those making up this portion of the Estimates should have struck it out.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I would like to ask whether the statement made in the public press concerning the intention of the Government to revive third-class clerkships is true?

The PRIME MINISTER. The matter has not been discussed, and the Government cannot be said to have arrived at any intention with regard to them.

Mr. FOSTER. I must ask my hon. friend if he does not think it is right to strike out this salary for the unfilled position.

The PRIME MINISTER. I think not.

Mr. FOSTER. Surely the hon. gentleman will not say that it is right to estimate for a position which, under the law, he cannot possibly fill? Surely the hon. gentleman does not set that up as a rule? If so, I do not see why we are here at all.

The PRIME MINISTER. I had taken the Estimates as prepared by my hon. friend (Mr. Foster). Whether the office should remain vacant or be filled is a question as to which I have arrived at no opinion whatever. It may be filled or it may not. At the same time, I propose to take the opportunity to fill it, if advisable.

Mr. FOSTER. But it is not within the hon. gentleman's power to fill it. If it were, I would not object. Of course, it is quite in order to estimate for an office which you propose to fill. But under the law, as it is at present, the hon. gentleman cannot appoint a third-class clerk. Therefore, this estimate will be perfectly useless.

The PRIME MINISTER. When was the law altered?

Mr. FOSTER. The session before last.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. the leader of the Government is incorrect in saying that the estimate is just as prepared by his predecessor. I have here the Estimates as first issued, and I notice there has been considerable change. But surely the hon. gentleman remembers that, the session before last, we passed an Act which abolished the third-class clerkships and authorized the Government to do the work by employing sessional writers, who were not permanent officers of the Government.

The PRIME MINISTER. But, as I understand the law, it applies to future cases, and not to existing cases. The intention was not to abolish third-class clerkships, but not to appoint any more third-class clerks.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend is quite correct. The law passed the session before last did not interfere with third-class clerks who had already received their appointment, but it specifically states that hereafter third-class clerkships are abolished, and, of course, no such appointments can be made while that statute is on the books. Therefore, the proposal before us is one to provide for a third-class clerk who, under the law, no Minister of Government can appoint.

Mr. FOSTER. Drop the salary.

The PRIME MINISTER. No; the salary is dropped on the examination.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to understand. The hon. gentleman said the salary was not dropped; now he says it was.

The PRIME MINISTER. No, no.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Has the hon. gentleman a list of the officers of his department at his hand?

The PRIME MINISTER. It seems there has been a misapprehension between hon. gentlemen and myself. This is the statement that is placed in my hand: One third-class clerkship was provided for the appointment of a temporary clerk, who afterwards did not present himself, and the clerkship was dropped.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) has twelve third-class clerks in the department.

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes, in consequence of this having been dropped.

Mr. FOSTER. I understood the hon. gentleman to say something quite different from that.

The PRIME MINISTER. That was where the misapprehension between us lay.

Department of Militia and Defence.... $45,515

Mr. FOSTER. We would like an explanation with regard to this.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). The increases, amounting to $640, are statutory increases.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the hon. gentleman a list of the third-class clerks? Are there five third-class clerks now appointed in the Militia department?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes. This proposes to make a reduction of the number of third-class clerks by one, and a corresponding increase in the second-class clerks.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman a question, if he will be kind enough to answer it, on this vote. I would like to know whether he has come to a decision upon a request which, I understand, has been made to cancel the appointment of the caretaker on the military grounds at Sussex. This caretaker is an old soldier who has a very honourable record, and is thoroughly capable. I shall be sorry to hear that he is to be dispensed with as caretaker. Can the Minister say whether any decision has been come to with regard to this matter or not?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I suppose the hon. gentleman refers to the case of Mackenzie?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. This is hardly a proper item on which to discuss such a subject; but I may say to the hon. gentleman that I am considering the subject and have not come to any decision yet.

Mr. DOMVILLE. This is not the time for the hon. gentleman to bring this up.

Mr. FOSTER. In the judgment of the hon. gentleman,

Department of the Secretary of State.... $37,412

Mr. FOSTER. Who answers for the Secretary of State?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). There are twenty separate increases, making a total of $1,000.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend knows whether there are seven third-class clerks now actually employed in the department.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I will get the information for the hon. gentleman.

Office of the Auditor General..... $27,870

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The statutory increases and one promotion amount to $1,130.

Mr. FOSTER. It strikes me there is one more first-class clerk than was estimated for in the Estimates I brought down. My Estimates provided for three first-class clerks and ten second-class clerks; the hon. gentleman provides for four first-class clerks and four second-class.

Mr. FOSTER.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There is a promotion from the second to the first-class, Mr. Kearns. It does not affect the Estimates for the current year, but it gives him the rank. I understand that he is at the maximum of a second-class clerk, and is now promoted, with a salary of $1,400.

Mr. HAGGART. Are you certain that he is at the maximum of his class?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That is the information I have, I believe it is correct.

Mr. FOSTER. I am inclined to think that he is not at the maximum of the class. If he is not at the maximum of the class, this is a promotion of a person who has been a less time in office over the head of one who has been longer in office. There may be circumstances which render that best to be done, but it is not in accordance with the general rule.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think the hon. gentleman will find that he was at the maximum of his class, but I will make inquiry, and give the information on concurrence.

Mr. HAGGART. Will the hon. gentleman make the reduction if he is not at the maximum of this class, and promise that he will not give him the promotion?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I will ascertain the facts, and then we will see what is best to be done under the circumstances.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend will see that after we have passed the item, it would be awkward to re-arrange it. We had better allow the item to stand.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not object.

Department of Customs ..... $39,987.50

The MINISTER OF FINANCE moved to amend so as to include $1,650 which may be paid to R. R. Farrow, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BERGERON. Since we are on the Department of Customs I would like to draw the attention of the committee to the fact that Mr. O'Hara, assistant collector of customs at Montreal, has been acting as collector for three or four years. I think that Mr. O'Hara is entitled to remuneration for his services as collector during those years, and I think he has made a demand on the department for payment. I would like to know whether it is the intention of the Government to put anything in the Estimates towards paying Mr. O'Hara what I think has been paid in the past to other officials in the same position. I think it would be only an act of justice.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The Controller is absent from his seat at the present time; but I apprehend that this question will more properly come up when we enter upon the consideration of the Customs vote. It has nothing to do with the inside department. No doubt some of the gentleman's friends on the Opposition benches will explain why this recommendation has been so long delayed.

Mr. BERGERON. I ask the question because I might be absent when the matter again comes up.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I will take a note of it, and call the attention of the Controller to it.

Mr. BRITTON. I desire the Minister of Trade and Commerce at the same time to call the attention of the Controller to the fact that there is an officer in Kingston who has been doing work which should entitle him to a large salary, and yet he only receives $400 a year. The late Government recommended an increase, and a provision should be made in the Estimates to give him the salary to which his rank would entitle him and what was promised him by the late Government. The gentleman's name is Deoghal.

Mr. QUINN. I am very glad to know that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has taken a note of Mr. O'Hara's case, and I hope it will receive the favourable consideration of the Controller of Customs. Mr. O'Hara did the work of collector at Montreal, although he only held the position of assistant collector. He performed these duties for over two years, during which time all the responsibility connected with the position rested upon him. I understand that the salary for a collector was voted each year by Parliament, so that the country will not suffer by the payment to Mr. O'Hara of the collector's salary between the time of the death of the late collector and the appointment of his successor.

Mr. WALLACE. I think the practice has become nearly obsolete of officers occupying temporarily the position Mr. O'Hara occupied receiving an increase of salary equal to that of the officer appointed by statute. In my opinion and from my knowledge of officer O'Hara he was very amply paid for his services at $2,800, which he received.

Mr. QUINN. I think the salary of the deputy collector was only $2,400.

Mr. FOSTER. I observe that an extra first-class clerk at $1,700 is entered under this head; and no explanation has been given. The Estimates, as submitted, were for five first-class clerks, and now six are asked. I should like an explanation in regard to the extra first-class clerk and a statement of the salary he was receiving previously.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I understand he is a transfer from the Post Office Department, and so there is really no increased expenditure involved.

Mr. FOSTER. Who has been transferred?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Mr. Blakeney.

Mr. GIBSON. I almost expected that some hon. gentleman opposite in looking after their friends might have brought up the case of Hugh Murray, of Hamilton, acting collector of customs for a long period in that city to suit the convenience of the Government. He is in receipt of a very small salary, and it suited the late Government to call the collector down to Ottawa to act as commissioner here, leaving Mr. Murray to perform, not only his own duties, but those of collector. In this connection I might mention another gentleman, Mr. Bartle, of Niagara Falls. The office of collector at Niagara was kept dangling before the eyes of applicants for a long time, and meanwhile this gentleman discharged the duties of collector not only to the satisfaction of the Government but to the public as well. I hope the claims of both those gentlemen will be considered as well as those of Mr. O'Hara, whose claims have been ably brought before the House by the member for Centre Montreal.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If these claims are to be dealt with, they should be all put on the same footing. I know of the two cases to which the hon. member for Lincoln and Welland (Mr. Gibson) has referred as being equally deserving of consideration with the case brought to the attention of the committee by the hon. member for Montreal.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think the suggestion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce is a sound one, that this discussion would more properly come up at a later stage, when the Customs vote is under consideration.

Department of Inland Revenue ..... $37,150

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). There has unfortunately been a mistake in preparing this estimate. Last year's estimate show 11 second-class clerks. When Mr. Clemow joined the department as private secretary, he had a right to a second-class clerkship, and I asked that the Estimates should therefore show 12 second-class clerks. It was decided, however, to take the Estimates prepared by the late Government, and accordingly the number is reduced to 11. I find, however, that one clerk has been struck out, and the number reduced to 10. I call attention to this matter and I hope in the Supplementary Estimates this matter will be corrected and another second-class clerk added.

Post Office Department ..... $199,120

Mr. FOSTER. It is nearly half-past twelve, and after such a long debate, perhaps my hon. friend would not insist upon going any further.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Is the objection to the Post Office vote because we are asking $5,000 less than you did?

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman said that there was one second-class clerk dropped, but it appears to me that there is an increase of one.

THE MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. There are four employees less in the department and there is a reduction of between five and six thousand dollars.

Mr. SPROULE. When we were discussing the Customs estimates the hon. gentleman said that the reason why there were 13 clerks instead of 12, was that one was transferred from the Post Office Department, but it now appears as if there was one added.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I understand the transfer was made by the late Government and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) would know more about it than I do.

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot remember, and I am not Minister of Finance at present.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). There has been no addition to the staff of the Post Office Department under the new Government. The present estimates are some $6,000 less than the estimates presented in June last by the hon. gentleman himself. There are actually $4,385 less than the expenditure ending June 30th, 1895. That deduction is made up by vacancies caused by death, resignations, promotion, superannuations and transfers.

Mr. HAGGART. The Minister must see that there is an actual increase in the expenditure of the Post Office Department. He cannot appoint any third-class clerks under the new law, and therefore there is an apparent reduction, but it will be made up in another way by appointing writers.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. There has not been a single appointment to the staff since I took office.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does the hon. gentleman propose to appoint occasional writers under the present statute?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am not in a position to state at this moment what I contemplate. I intend to know as much as I can about the department before I come to any conclusion.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I thought perhaps the hon. gentleman had made up his mind.

Sir HENRI JOLY DE LOTBINIERE.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have not made up my mind as to what is to be done until I know more about the strength of the department.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman has made provision for an extra messenger.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I made no appointment since I took charge of the department.

Mr. INGRAM. Some of the papers in the western portion of the province have reported that there is an intention to change the deputy head of the department and the name of Inspector Spry of the London division has been mentioned in connection with the office. Is it the intention of the Postmaster General to take Mr. Spry as his deputy?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have had that matter called to my attention, but it is in no way authoritative. I have never contemplated any change in the deputy who appears to me, so far as I can judge, to be eminently satisfactory. I have found him thus far able to give me most efficient and loyal service.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. In the Estimates that I brought down last year there were six messengers estimated for, and it has been generally thought that these were enough to do the work. Has my hon. friend got a private messenger of his own, or how is it? Surely my hon. friend is not going to inaugurate his economical reign by increasing the number of messengers.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. There were seven messengers provided for in the Estimates of 1895-96, and there are seven messengers provided for in the Estimates for 1896-97.

Mr. FOSTER. That is very true, but I will give the hon. gentleman another fact. There were six messengers provided for in the Estimates I brought down for 1896-97, and the hon. Minister of Finance has prayed grace for these Estimates on the ground that they were the ones I brought down. This number my hon. friend has increased to seven. Does he need one more, or is this a new appointment?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. There has been no appointment made in my department since I assumed office, except my private secretary.

Mr. FOSTER. I will give my hon. friend another fact. I find that there were only twenty-three packers estimated for in my estimate, while he has twenty-four. We must also have an explanation of that.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Will my hon. friend allow me to ask him a question? Did he estimate for the number of officials he actually had in the department at the time, or did his estimate represent that he had six messengers when in reality he had seven?

Mr. FOSTER. I was estimating for 1896-97. If I only estimated for six, we only had six, and only six were necessary. But here is the professor of economy, and he wants another messenger and another packer, and he will not explain why.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think the real explanation is that the hon. gentleman, on the eve of the election, thought that he would show a little economy, and he presented those Estimates, but never passed them in the House.

Mr. FOSTER. And the difference between my hon. friend and myself is that I practiced the economy which he had been preaching for eighteen years, and when he comes in he puts on an extra packer and an extra messenger, and he will not explain why he does so. If the Minister does not understand his own department, it is not our fault.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman is not correct in saying that there is an increase. There is no increase. He left in the department that number of officers. They are there now. I have not taken upon myself to remove or dismiss any. That is the state of affairs. The hon. gentleman is not fair when he talks about an increase. He says that last session it was proposed to do with six out of seven packers. Whatever he proposed to do, that is not the strength of the staff as he left it. I have taken the staff as I found it, and am asking for a reduction. Perhaps I may have to, but I do not want to do anything unkind or unnecessarily harsh, and am simply asking for estimates to carry on the staff as it is. It will be my duty to learn all about the requirements of the service and perhaps to reduce the staff.

Mr. WALLACE. There is, apparently, a new man as messenger and another as packer, because these two men are down at the salary of $300, and if they were beginning the second year of their service, they would be entitled to the statutory increase of $40.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). It may be that in the estimates of last July the ex-Finance Minister provided only for six messengers and three packers, and I am quite prepared to give him the credit of being economical in the matter of messengers and packers. My hon. colleague, however, has simply taken the estimates of last year, and there is no increase.

Mr. FOSTER. If the Postmaster General is taking the department as he found it, how is it he is appointing two new men? If these men had been here before, they would be entitled to $340, instead of $300.

Mr. SPROULE. The Postmaster General ought to let this stand, for his statements do not agree with what is in the Estimates. He is providing for two additional clerks over last year, and he frankly admits that he has not been long enough in the department to know anything about it. It would be only reasonable for him to let the item stand until he gets the information required.

Mr. FOSTER. Can the hon. gentleman really make the appropriation? Under the law passed the session before last, messengers come under the class of writers, and should come under contingencies. He is estimating for men he cannot appoint. He takes great credit for economy, but in the contingencies he is asking for $3,800 more for clerical assistance than was asked last year. He must drop these two men at $300, because, under the law, he cannot appoint them.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not propose making any new appointments.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, explain to the Committee how the hon. gentleman is taking the minimum salary, if these men had been there before.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If these men had been temporarily employed and were in the department when he came there, he cannot estimate for them as permanent employees, but should estimate for them under contingencies.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have simply taken the staff as I found it, and am asking Parliament to carry it on at its present strength until I deem it advisable to make some changes. Last year, seven messengers were paid for and twenty-four packers.

Mr. FOSTER. In the Estimates passed last year, I estimated simply for six messengers and twenty-three packers. I am certain that I did not intend, neither did the Postmaster General of that time intend to strike off the list any one who was in the permanent service. Therefore he could only have provided for those who were eligible for permanent appointment under the law—those that were permanent before. That is carried out by the statement of the present Postmaster General when he asks provision for seven messengers and 24 packers—one extra in each case. I say that under the law you cannot make permanent appointments to the writer's class, and therefore you are putting into the Estimates a clear impossibility.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There can be no doubt of the accuracy of the statement of the Postmaster General when he says that these parties are there. At the same time it is quite obvious that the appointment cannot be made in this way, but if it is desired to provide for one more packer and one more messenger that can be done out of the contingent vote. The hon. gentleman can retain them if he desires to do so. We are losing time in this discussion.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. We are.

The CHAIRMAN. Shall this item be adopted ?

Mr. FOSTER. No, Mr. Chairman ; we cannot pass an estimate for an appointment that simply cannot be made.

The PRIME MINISTER. Here are the Estimates for the previous year and I find that they cover seven messengers and 24 packers. Therefore the only argument made by the ex-Minister of Finance is that this was the law and the officers were there, but in the Estimates brought down by him last winter, he contemplated the appropriation not for seven messengers but for six and not for 24 packers but for 23. Evidently the late Postmaster General contemplated dropping one. The previous year there were 25 packers, but one was dropped. The only point the hon. gentleman can make is that the new Postmaster General is not so economical as he intended to be.

Mr. FOSTER. No ; that is not it, and when the hon. gentleman is more used to the working of the department he will see that his theory is not in accord with the facts. There is another explanation which I think the Postmaster General will find is the correct one. During the year one of these messengers may have been promoted to the position of a third-class clerk, thus leaving a vacancy. When the Postmaster General of that day and I went over the Estimates, we found only six messengers. As under the law it is impossible to appoint a messenger on the former basis, we estimated, not for seven but for six. If there was another he would come in the writer class and would be provided for in the contingencies. My memory cannot hold all these things, but I think this was exactly the case—that one messenger and one packer were promoted.

The PRIME MINISTER. That may be the explanation ; but the other may be the explanation also.

Mr. FOSTER. Let that item stand. There will be nothing so far as I am concerned argued except these two points alone, and when the item comes up again we can get the information.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. We will give it on concurrence.

Mr. FOSTER. No ; that will be too late.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. You have often asked us to wait for information until concurrence.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The point the hon. gentleman makes is that this is in a form contrary to law. If so, I do not see why the item should not be allowed to stand until the Postmaster General learns the facts about it, as he can do in five minutes on communicating with the department, or else provide for these two, one packer and one messenger, out of contingencies.

Mr. FOSTER. Here is another proof of what I have stated. In the last Civil Service report—that of 1895—there are actually six messengers and twenty-three packers, the names being all given.

The PRIME MINISTER. I do not see that this is conclusive ; but we will let the item stand.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Is the whole item open ?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, but I do not intend to raise any point except with regard to these two.

The PRIME MINISTER. The whole discussion is to be confined to these.

Department of Agriculture ..... $49,282

The PRIME MINISTER. Let that stand ; the Minister is not here. We can take up the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. FOSTER. I have always seen it in the committee that when we have had a long debate and the committee has sat late and made good progress with the Estimates, it is usual for the committee to rise.

The PRIME MINISTER. Pass Marine and Fisheries and then we will rise.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not ready to discuss Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Take the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. FOSTER. No ; the Minister is not here. I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The PRIME MINISTER. The ex-Minister of Agriculture suggests that we should pass the item for the Department of Agriculture. I do not see why we should not do so.

Mr. MONTAGUE. With regard to that, I want to say that the saving—something like $6,000—is due to the late Government and not to the present Government. The whole saving was effected under the late Administration, except $500, and that was effected by transferring a messenger, who had been in the Secretary of State's Department, but was transferred to the Department of Agriculture, and has now returned.

Resolutions reported.

The PRIME MINISTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.55 a.m. (Wednesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 9th September, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 19) respecting the Georgian Bay Ship Canal and Power Aqueduct Company.—(Mr. Maclean.)

Bill (No. 20) to change the name of the Hull Electric Company to the Hull and Aylmer Railway Company, and for other purposes.—(Mr. Devlin.)

Bill (No. 21) to incorporate the Columbia Telephone and Telegraph Company.—(Mr. Bostock.)

Bill (No. 22) to amend the Act incorporating the Eastern Trust Company.—(Mr. Borden, Halifax.)

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden) moved :

That an order of the House do issue for a copy of the report of the Commandant of the Royal Military College at Kingston for the year ending 30th June, 1896, and a letter from the commandant dated 15th August, 1896, and also a copy of a letter from the Board of Visitors of the Royal Military College dated the 18th of Sept., 1895.

He said : These papers were asked for informally by the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale), who was the Minister of Militia in the late Government, and I laid them on the Table last night ; but I am advised that this formality is necessary in order to bring them properly before the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would ask the hon. Minister if he would be good enough to lay on the Table the letter addressed to the commandant of the Royal Military College, which led to his resignation. I would ask also if he would be good enough to have these papers printed.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. With regard to the letter to which the hon. gentleman refers, I may say that it is a private letter addressed by Major-General Gascoigne to Major-General Cameron, and after consulting my colleagues, I considered it not necessary to bring that letter down. There is nothing in it but what is implied in the reply. It is a private letter, and so stated in the letter itself, and I do not think it would be advisable to lay it on the Table. As to the papers being printed, the Government desire that they should be printed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think the House will at once perceive that a letter addressed by an official of the Government to another high official, informing the latter that it is necessary for him to tender his resignation, cannot be considered as a private letter, and should be laid on the Table. It is impossible that the House should have a question of that kind before it with so important a document missing. That letter is a notification to a high official that his services are to terminate within fifteen days, and the hon. leader of the Government must see at once that such a letter ought to be produced.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The question would rest with the General himself. Surely if he wrote a private letter, it must be considered private. The character which the General gave the letter is that which must be accepted by this House, as far as I can see.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon. friend will at once see that if that letter be a communication from the Government of which he is the head to a high official informing him that his services are to terminate within a few days, it is impossible that it can be made a private communication by the writer marking it as such. If it be necessary to ask General Gascoigne to remove the privacy of the communication, I trust my hon. friend will do that, but certainly the record is not complete without that letter.

The PRIME MINISTER. With due deference to my hon. friend, if the General, in writing this letter, made it private, the intention of the gentleman who wrote it ought to be consulted. I do not know that it may be of such a character after all that it might not be brought down, but the only thing which impresses me at this moment is that the General who wrote it considered it private, and its privacy ought to be respected by the House, unless there are good reasons to the contrary.

Mr. TISDALE. I think the hon. First Minister ought to consider the request of the hon. leader of the Opposition. I may say that I made the motion at the request of General Cameron, a gentleman that I have not the honour of being acquainted with. He telegraphed me, however, and asked that these papers should be moved for, because he wished to have the whole record before the House. He reiterated this wish to me after I had had a conversation with the hon. Minister of Militia, when the latter suggested that perhaps, under all the circumstances, it would not be well to press for the papers, and I repeated my request, and the hon. gentleman promised to bring the papers down. There is an important principle involved in this of serious and far-reaching consequences to members of the militia force. In my opinion, it is the contents of a letter, and not the fact that it is marked private, that should have weight with the Minister in deciding whether to lay it before the House or not. Any statement made by the commanding officer or any other gentleman of a nature that required official action could not become a private communication simply by having the word "private" written across it. It is essentially an official communication and not private by its nature. I quite agree with the hon. Prime Minister this far—that it is very desirable that private letters shall not be brought down, unless there is a reason for it. But I do not agree that all letters are private because you write "Private" on them; if their contents are such that upon them official action is based, in what position would it put militia officers, were the mere writing of the word "Private" on the letters to be a bar against those letters being laid before Parliament? A letter may be sent containing a charge or a criticism intended to be the basis of official action, and yet by writing "Private" upon it the basis of the action taken is withheld from Parliament. I do not know that that is the case in this instance, because, as I say, I know nothing of the correspondence in question. But I rise simply to call the attention of the Government to the principle involved. I submit that the leader of the Government, or his Minister, can judge as to the nature of the contents of the letter, and if the hon. gentleman and his colleagues say that the letter is private and that no official action was taken upon it, and that action was taken upon wholly different papers, I think there could be no objection raised to the refusal to bring the letter down, because we must be very careful about violating private confidence. But I think, on reflection, the hon. gentleman will agree with me that even though a letter has written across the face of it the word "Private," if it contains information for the guidance of the Administration, upon which official action is taken, it would be an intolerable doctrine that such a letter should be withheld. It would mean that an officer might be condemned without his having an opportunity of knowing the nature of the charges against him. It cannot be contended that a document is private, when it is intended as a basis for departmental action, and when action is taken upon it. But by keeping its contents private, the person interested is deprived of answering. I would suggest that unless the Government can say that this letter of criticism, information or whatever it may have been, was not the basis of action, it should be treated as a public document.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the result of the letter marked "Private" and written by the Major General commanding the forces in Canada, was the resignation of General Cameron.

on. I understand also that it was stated in that letter that within fifteen days General Cameron should send in his resignation. Now, Sir, I venture to express the opinion that the Imperial Government would never have permitted a proceeding whereby a person accused could be prevented from knowing the charges brought against him, by marking the letter so charging him and written to him "Private." I go so far as any gentleman in this House in favour of maintaining as absolutely sacred the privacy of private correspondence. But I also venture the opinion that if that letter was considered by the Minister in charge of that department as a private letter, then, as Minister, he should not have acted upon it nor have permitted the resignation upon a letter which could not be brought down and placed upon the Table to enlighten Parliament, as Parliament has the right to be enlightened upon the circumstances which led to the resignation of the commandant of the Royal Military College. I know not whether charges were brought or were not brought; it is sufficient for me to know that a high official in the service of the Government, an official in charge of one of the greatest institutions in the country—for I claim the Royal Military College to be such—has felt it advisable to send in his resignation. I claim that upon a letter marked "Private," it was not within the authority of the Minister to permit the resignation to take place without being prepared, upon his responsibility, to enlighten Parliament upon the reason which induced the Major General commanding the forces to write that letter, and the reasons which, upon that letter, induced the commandant of the Royal Military College to resign. If it be necessary to obtain from the Major General commanding leave to remove from that letter, the expressions that confined it to privacy, that should be done immediately. For I think it places the Department in a very false position to permit a man who has occupied the position that General Cameron has occupied during so many years, to leave the service, when the only reason that can be given for his leaving the service is that a letter was written to him by the officer commanding the forces, which letter cannot be produced because the Major General commanding considered that, for his own purposes, or for any purposes, it would be better to mark that letter "Private." It is not within the scope of the departmental officials to act in that way and to use their own judgment in withholding from Parliament information which is indispensable to enable Parliament to form an opinion upon what has taken place.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). I should have hoped that there would be no difference of opinion across the floor of the House on a matter of this kind. I think it is well understood that it is competent for one gentleman to write to another in a manner which absolutely precludes the letter being made public, and the mode of doing so is well understood, as between gentlemen. If an official in the military service was complained of, and if the question of his leaving his office was under discussion—the facts of this case I know very little about—I should not assume it to be a very great crime for an officer of the department to write to a friend a communication and mark it "Private and confidential." The friend to whom the letter is written, I understand, can accept it as such and treat it as such, if he chooses. He can, on the contrary, decline to accept it as such, and in doing so he can make his wishes known, in which case an official letter can be sent in the usual way. I know nothing of the facts, but I should regret extremely if the rule is laid down that no gentleman in one of the great departments could write a private and confidential letter and mark it such, without danger of having it published in Parliament.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION LANDS.

Mr. DAVIN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 23) to amend the Dominion Lands Act. He said: The object of this Bill is to relieve from an inconvenient position a number of persons in the North-west Territories and elsewhere, who are known there as ranchers. These gentlemen have cattle and horses, and they are generally located in parts of the North-west Territories unsuitable for agriculture, but suitable for ranching; nevertheless they claim that under the Dominion Lands Act they cannot get a homestead unless they perform what is called cultivation duties. I am able to say authoritatively that in some instances to ask them to go into arable cultivation would be simply a futility. Now, it is to enable such persons having a sufficient number of cattle and horses, and having a certain amount of fencing, and having erected habitable houses, with stables and outhouses capable of housing a certain number of cattle, and who have lived the prescribed three years upon their homestead—this is to enable such persons to get a homestead. I may say that I think myself that under the Act as it is now, the Minister of the Interior could probably give such persons a homestead, but as a fact these gentlemen claim that the Act had not been read in that way, and that the homestead is only given them as a matter of grace. In going over my constituency at the last election I found large numbers of men, men with hundreds of cattle, and having regular barracks in the way of outhouses, men with large properties, and yet they could not get a homestead. I said to them: If you had brought the matter to the Minister's attention, or brought it to my attention and allowed me to press it on the Minister, the chances are that you could have got a homestead under the Act; but they claimed they could not. Any way, there can be no harm in placing them in the position in which they think they are entitled to be placed. Then there is another clause in the Bill providing that in the case of a homesteader who had served in the Mounted Police for five years or more, that time should be counted as one year in performing his duties. That would not be a very large concession, either, because, owing to the arrangements that exist at present, and during the last six months, a constable is allowed to make an entry, and the six months is allowed to count; so that a further concession would be given to them under this Bill, of six months in regard to time.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

"LA CANADIENNE."

Mr. LEMIEUX asked:

Whether the Government are aware that the cruiser "La Canadienne" was placed at the disposal of the Conservative candidate in the county of Gaspé, at the late general election?

Who gave instructions to Commander Wakeham of "La Canadienne" to convey the Conservative candidate, Dr. Ennis, to the Magdalen Islands?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). 1. No. 2. No instructions are to be found in the department, but Commander Wakeham has been written to and instructed to send a report on the facts, and by whose authority he acted. His report has not yet been received.

RAILWAY RATES COMMISSION.

Mr. OLIVER asked:

Has the evidence taken by the Railway Rates Commission been published? If not, why not?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The report of the commission, together with the evidence, was laid on the Table of the House. The report was ordered to be published, but the evidence was not published, because, as I understand, the question of the publication rests with the Committee on Printing, and the evidence was not ordered to be printed by them.

POSTMASTER AT WARDSVILLE.

Mr. CALVERT asked:

Who is the postmaster at Wardsville, Ont.? When was he appointed, and what is his salary?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The postmaster is D. A. Simpson. He was appointed on the 3rd July, 1896. His salary is $270 a year.

CAPT. FAGES, OF BATTERY "B."

Mr. LANGELIER asked :

Did Captain Fages of Battery B, in garrison at Quebec, receive instructions from the Militia Department, requiring him to have entered, on the electoral lists of Quebec Centre for the Legislative Assembly of Quebec, the names of more than eighty militiamen forming part of the said battery ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). There is no record in the department referring to the subject.

PUBLIC WORKS IN GASPE.

Mr. LEMIEUX asked :

Whether the following letter is to be found in the archives of the Department of Public Works :—

Public Works Department,
Ottawa, Canada, May 11, 1896.

Dear Mr. Joncas,—In your letter of May 5, you ask me to send you a list of the petitions for public works in the county of Gaspé, made by or through you during last session, and in reply I beg to say that the records of the department show that you made application on behalf of the following works, for the sums set down opposite each item :—

Grand Pabos—Removal of boulders in harbour .....	$ 500
Grand Pabos—Repairs to wharf..	800
Ste. Anne des Monts—Addition to pier .....	12,000
Barachois de Malbaie—Construction of breakwater.....	16,000
Percé—New wharf .....	35,000
St. Adelaïde de Pabos—Extension of wharf .....	6,000
Grande Rivière—Shed on wharf....	1,000

These several items were to be submitted to Council before the presentation of the Supplementary Estimates to the House, but, as you know, the obstruction offered by our opponents to the progress of all Government measures prevented the presenting of the said estimates and the consideration of the items providing for the several works in which you take an interest, and the execution of which you have represented to the Government as a matter of urgency in the interests of your constituents.

Believe me, dear Mr. Joncas,
Yours truly,
(Signed) ALPH. DESJARDINS.

L. Z. Joncas, M.P.,
Gaspé, Q.

2. At what dates has Mr. Joncas, ex-M.P., made the above-mentioned demands ?

3. Have these demands been made in writing, and can they be traced in the archives of the Department of Public Works ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1. No. There is no copy of that letter in the department. 2. Application for Pabos was made by letter of 23rd March, 1896, No. 170003 departmental files. That for Ste. Anne des Monts was first made in February, 1892, and renewed on the 22nd February, 1893—10th April, 1894—14th April, 1895—and 18th January, 1896. The applications for Barachois de Malbaie were made by Mr. Joncas on the 17th April, 1895, and 25th October of the same year. Applications for wharf at Percé were made on the 16th March, 1894—the 6th May, 1895—and 18th January, 1896. The application for shed on Grande Rivière wharf is of the 23rd March, 1896. 3. The applications in question are in writing and are filed in the archives of the department.

FISHERY OFFICER AT PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

1. Whether William C. Hobkirk, of Charlottetown, P.E.I., has been appointed to any office in the Department of Marine and Fisheries since the 11th day of July last ?

2. And if so, has he been appointed by Order in Council ?

3. Has the appointment been made to fill a vacancy or has a new office been created ? What is the nature of the said office and the salary attached ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). 1. Yes. 2. Yes. 3. Mr. Hobkirk has been appointed overseer for Queen's County, and discharges the duties of such officer as well as those formerly discharged by some special guardians in Queen's County. Fishery Overseer, $200 per annum.

INDIAN INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS.

Mr. OLIVER asked :

How many Indian industrial schools are there in Manitoba and the North-west, established and supported by the state ? What are their names and locations ? What did they cost to build and establish ? How many pupils are there in total attendance ?

Mr. DOBELL. In Manitoba and the North-west there are ten Indian industrial schools, established and supported by the state. Their names and locations are as follows :—Brandon, two miles north of the town of Brandon ; Elkhorn, in the town of Elkhorn, Man. ; St. Boniface, one mile from the town of St. Boniface and two miles from Winnipeg ; St. Paul's, at Middlechurch, Man., six miles from Winnipeg ; Battleford, one and one-half miles from town of Battleford ; Qu'Appelle, four miles east of Fort Qu'Appelle and twenty-four miles from the town of Qu'Appelle ; Red Deer, Sec. 14, Tp. 39, R. 29, on Red Deer River ; Regina, four miles from town of Regina ; St. Joseph's, twenty-four miles from town of Calgary, at the mouth of High River. The cost of building and establishing these schools is as follows :—Brandon, $30,943.40 ; High River and Qu'Appelle, $42,500.44 ; Red Deer, $41,396.49 ; Regina, $46,986.40 ; Elkhorn, $19,432.66 ; Rupert's Land, $34,990.87 ; St. Boniface, $20,052.80 ; Battleford, $6,023.38 ; Calgary, $10,203.00. In the case of the Battleford school, it should be explained that the building was transferred to the Department of Indian Affairs from the Public Works Department; and in the case of the Calgary school, that it is now in course of construction, and the amount stated is the cost up to date. The cost of the High River and Qu'Appelle schools is given in one item, as the outlay on the building is so shown by the Public Works Department. For the purposes of this reply, the cost of building and establishing is made to include the cost of building and equipping, and the salaries paid the staff of each school for the first year of operation. The total number of pupils enrolled at the schools is 985.

THE RAILWAY COMMISSION OF 1894.

Mr. OLIVER asked :

Has the evidence taken by the Railway Commission of 1894 been published by the Government? If not, will it be, and when?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I judge by the answer I gave to a previous question on the same subject it would perhaps have met this inquiry. I supplement my previous answer by stating that I am advised this matter is in the hands of the Printing Committee.

CUSTOMS SERVICE AT KING'S COUNTY, P.E.I.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's) asked :

When was Mr. Francis Gordon Forbes appointed sub-collector of Customs at Annandale or Grand River, King's County, P.E.I.? Has he since been performing the duties of that office? What salary is due him, or had it yet been paid?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). Francis Gordon Forbes was appointed sub-collector of Customs for the outport of Grand River, by Order in Council, dated 15th July, 1896. He has not been paid any salary as yet.

ST. ANDREW'S RAPIDS.

Mr. MACDONALD (Winnipeg) asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to place in the Estimates, or Supplementary Estimates, a sum for the construction of a lock or locks at St. Andrew's Rapids on the Red River of the North?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The matter is one which concerns the expenditure of too large a sum of money to be considered for the present session, but will be looked into with attention during the recess.

GRAIN STANDARDS.

Mr. DOUGLAS asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to revise and improve the grain standards for the province of Manitoba and the North-west Territories during the present session?

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). Does the hon. member mean to ask whether the Government intend to revise and improve the classification of grain or revise and improve the manner of selecting the standards, interpreting the existing classification. If the former, then it may be stated that there has been no urgent request from those interested to change the present classification. If the latter, it is not deemed wise to change the manner heretofore in vogue on the eve of the marketing of a new crop, whatever course may be deemed expedient thereafter. As to "revising and improving the standards"—as the question stands—the Government has no powers, the standards should be fairly representative of the crop, and it is the business of the board appointed under the Act to see that they do fairly represent it.

POSTMASTER OF ST. JOHN'S SUBURB.

Mr. LANGELIER asked :

Is the Government aware that Sylvio Demers, postmaster of St. John's Suburb, Quebec, took from the said office a letter which had been mailed there addressed to Lefebvre & Co., of Montreal, by Flood & Gelly, of Quebec, and gave the same to a citizen of Quebec; if so, is it the intention of the Government to take proceedings against the said Sylvio Demers, and if so, what proceedings?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). On the hon. gentleman's question appearing on the Notice paper, prior to which time the Government had no knowledge of the matter referred to, inquiry was made, and the Government learned that on the 18th December last, one Mr. L. Bertrand wrote a letter, signed by himself, at the office of Messrs. Flood & Gelly, and handed it to Mr. Flood to be posted at the St. John Suburb post office, as the above mentioned firm of Flood & Gelly were interested in the subject of the letter. A few minutes after Mr. Flood had posted the letter, Mr. Bertrand went alone to the St. John Suburb post office, and on representing to the postmaster of the office in question he had made a mistake in mailing his letter to Lefebvre & Co., Montreal, which he minutely described to the postmaster, the latter handed it back to its author, Mr. Bertrand. The postmaster at St. John's Suburb, when called upon to explain his action, stated he did not think he was acting contrary to the regulations of the department, and he was of course severely reprimanded for his breach of duty in the matter. As to what action may be taken the same is under consideration of the Government.

"LE COURRIER DU CANADA."

Mr. LANGEЛИER asked :

1. Is the Government aware that during the late elections a large number of copies of "Le Courrier du Canada" were sent from the Quebec post office to persons who were not subscribers to the said paper, without any postage having been paid on the said paper ?

2. Is it the intention of the Government to take steps to mete out punishment for this abuse ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The Post Office Department has been informed that copies of "Le Courrier du Canada" were sent from Quebec post office to non-subscribers free of postage, and is making inquiries into the correctness of the statement.

POSTAL FACILITIES AT BRANTFORD.

Mr. HENRY asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to consider the advisability of establishing free postal delivery in Brantford or in cities of over 14,000 inhabitants this session ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The matter is under the consideration of the Government.

GOVERNMENT BUILDINGS AT BRANTFORD.

Mr. HENRY asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to provide in the Estimates, this session, a sum of money sufficient for the renovation and the making the needed improvements to the Government buildings at Brantford ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The matter is under the serious consideration of the Government.

BRANTFORD DRILL HALL.

Mr. HENRY asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to provide in the Estimates a sufficient sum of money for the building of a granolithic sidewalk around the Brantford drill hall, as arranged by the Militia Department under the late Administration ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I submit that the question is not in order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER. It contains an assertion as to a statement of fact which the Minister need not admit in answering it.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. If the hon. gentleman will amend his question by leaving out the concluding words "as arranged by the Militia Department under the late Administration" I will reply to it.

Mr. HENRY. Very well ; I will ask the question without those words in it.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I beg to say that the matter is now under the consideration of the Government.

INSOLVENCY LEGISLATION.

Mr. GILLIES asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to introduce legislation respecting insolvency, during the present or next session ?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). It is not the intention of the Government to introduce any legislation respecting insolvency during the present session. The question of what legislation it will be expedient to bring down next session has not yet been considered.

SOULANGES CANAL—BRIDGES.

Mr. LANGEЛИER asked :

1. Whether tenders were asked for more than once, for the construction of the bridges on the Soulanges Canal ?

2. What are the names of the parties who tendered and the amount of each tender each time that tenders were asked for ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Yes, tenders were asked twice for bridges on the Soulanges Canal. The following are the names of parties tendering the first time with the amount of each tender :—

The Central Bridge and Engineering Company .....	$33,355 60
Robert Weddell .....	33,000 00
Imperial Bridge and Iron Works (A. Rousseau) .....	48,160 00
The Hamilton Bridge Works, "A" .....	50,000 00
" " " " "B" .....	41,688 00
Canadian Bridge and Iron Company .....	36,576 00
Dominion Bridge Company—
Superstructure, design 1 and turn table "A" .....	32,974 00
Superstructure, design 2 and turn table "A" .....	37,306 00
Superstructure, design 3 and turn table "A" .....	35,790 00
Superstructure, design 4 and turn table "A" .....	35,070 00

The following are the names of parties tendering the second time with the amount of each tender :—

Imperial Bridge and Iron Works....	$48,157 00
Dominion Bridge Company .....	33,700 00
Canadian Bridge and Iron Company.	36,397 00
The Hamilton Bridge Works .....	49,655 00
The Central Bridge and Engineering Company .....	36,664 00

CONSOLIDATED FUND, 1896.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

What amounts have been received and paid respectively on account of Consolidated Fund for the year 1895-96, as ascertained up to September 1st, 1896 ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Amount received from 1st July, 1895, to 31st August, 1896, $36,509,712.60. Amount paid from 1st July, 1895 to 31st August, 1896, $36,713,549.19. These figures are necessarily incomplete and represent what has gone through the books of the Finance Department up to and including 31st August, 1896.

RAILWAYS IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. OLIVER asked :

Is the Government aware that the fact of the Calgary and Edmonton and other North-west railways not having completed the selection and registration of the lands they have earned, enables them to escape school and statute labour taxation, although no such exemption was contemplated when the grant was made to them ? Is it the intention of the Government to compel these companies to complete the selection of their lands forthwith, so that they shall be compelled to bear their fair share of the burdens of education and public improvements in the Territories ?

Mr. DOBELL. The Government has recently become aware that several of the North-west railways have not yet completed the selection and registration of the lands they have earned. The Government proposes very carefully to consider this question with a view of determining how far the public interest justifies the early application of the principle of compulsory selection.

Mr. OLIVER also asked :

When will the exemption from taxation on Canadian Pacific lands in the Territories expire ?

Mr. DOBELL. Clause 16 of the contract between the Government of Canada and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, executed at Ottawa on the 21st October, 1880, and confirmed by the Act 44 Victoria, Chapter 1, contains a specific provision as to the period of time during which the lands of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company which are not either sold or occupied shall be free from taxation for twenty years after the grant thereof from the Crown.

Mr. OLIVER also asked :

Is the Government aware that the fact of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company holding in reserve a right of selection of public lands on account of grant enables that company to block land grants in the Territories to any railway company to which it is opposed and to practically block construction by such railway companies unless it receives a cash subsidy ? When does the Government intend to compel the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to complete their selection of lands on account of grant ?

Mr. DOBELL. The Government is not aware of the fact of the Canadian Pacific Railway holding in reserve a right of selection of public lands, or that the company was blocking land grants to other companies to which it might be opposed, but the Government will make inquiry into the subject. The selection of the company's land grant is being rapidly proceeded with.

MAGDALEN ISLANDS LOBSTER HATCHERY.

Mr. LEMIEUX asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to establish a lobster hatchery on the Magdalen Islands ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). Not at present.

MAGDALEN ISLANDS LIGHTHOUSE.

Mr. LEMIEUX asked :

1. Whether the Government is aware that a shipwreck has recently taken place on the Magdalen Islands ?

2. Is the Government aware that the lighthouse service on the Magdalen Islands is entirely insufficient ?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to improve the service and to provide in addition thereto a life-saving station ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). 1. Yes. The British barkentine "William Geake," 277 tons, from Barbadoes to Montreal, with a cargo of molasses went on shore at Bull Rock, Bryon Island, on the 2nd of August last, and was reported a total loss. The master reported that the vessel became disabled and drove ashore. No lives were lost. 2. No. The Government is aware that the lighthouse on Entry Island is not located where it can be seen to the eastward, but proposes to remove it to a new site next season. 3. Yes, by the change referred to. The subject of establishing a life-saving station at Magdalen Islands has not received consideration, as no representations have been made as to its necessity.

GASPE COAST ROAD.

Mr. LEMIEUX asked :

1. What sums have been expended by the Dominion Government since 1891 for the maintenance of the coast road in the county of Gaspé ?

2. Is the Government aware that the said road, which serves also as a mail route, is in a dangerous condition in many places ?

3. What sum do the Government purpose to expend this year for the maintenance of this road ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). 1. For a number of years past a grant of $300 has been made by this department towards keeping up the Maritime road in the county of Gaspé, the grant being conditional on the voting of a similar sum by the province of Quebec. The following sums have been paid since 1891, viz:—$1,285. 2. No representations have been made to this department as to the dangerous condition of the road. 3. No application has been made for any grant and consequently no decision has been made to expend any sum, nor will be until the department is assured that the Quebec government will contribute its quota.

THE SUPERINTENDENT OF SAULT STE. MARIE CANAL.

Mr. DYMENT asked :

1. Is the Government aware that Mr. Boyd, superintendent of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, was away from his duties for a month just previous to the late elections ?

2. If so, was he away with the consent of the Government ?

3. Did his salary go on while absent ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The Government is now aware that Superintendent Boyd of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal was given leave of absence during June last by authority of the late Minister of Railways and Canals, Mr. Haggart. He was away with the consent of the late Minister of Railways and Canals. His salary did go on while absent.

THE NORTH-WEST REBELLION— MONUMENT AT TORONTO.

Mr. CLARKE asked :

1. Has the Minister of Militia received a memorial from the executive committee of the North-west Monument Committee asking for a grant to aid in liquidating the debt now remaining on the monument recently erected in Queen's Park, Toronto, to the memory of the volunteers who fell in the North-west Rebellion of 1885 ?

2. Is it the intention of the Government to comply with the memorial of the committee, and to make provision in the Supplementary Estimates for a grant ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. Yes. The sum of $1,000 was voted for this purpose last year, and this amount was paid on the 29th June, 1895. 2. The memorial of the committee is now under consideration by the Government.

BRIDGE AT QUEBEC.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked :

Would the Government be disposed to aid, in a substantial manner, any persons or company who would undertake the construction of a bridge over the St. Lawrence at Quebec ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). When any responsible persons or company submit to the Government that they are prepared to undertake the construction of a bridge over the St. Lawrence at Quebec, the Government will be disposed favourably to consider the project, with the view of determining how far it should receive material assistance.

MANUFACTURERS AND THE TARIFF.

Mr. McCLEARY asked :

Has the Government, or any member thereof, issued a circular letter to the manufacturers of Canada asking for information in reference to the tariff ?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). No circular letter to the manufacturers of Canada asking for information in reference to the tariff has been issued, but I believe that certain information has been asked for from some of them with respect to what products they manufacture.

THE POST OFFICE AT RIMOUSKI.

Mr. FISET asked :

Has Gideon Beaulieu, contractor for the post office at Rimouski, notified the Government that he was unable to complete his contract at the original price ?

If so, when did the Government take possession of the work done, and what was the value at that time ?

What amount has been paid to the said Beaulieu on this contract ?

Has the Government retained from the amount due the said Beaulieu a sufficient sum to meet the claims of the workmen and supplies unpaid by him ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1. No. But the difficulties he had in carrying on the work and the fact that he left a large amount of wages unpaid which had to be settled by the department out of the amount due to him satisfied the department that he could not get the work done for the amount of his tender. 2. The department notified Mr. Beaulieu on the 13th May, 1896. At that time the value of the work done was $3,651.53. 3. The total amount paid to Mr. Beaulieu in connection with that contract is $3,290. 4. The department has paid out of the balance due to Mr. Beaulieu and the security deposited by him the wages due with the exception of those due to his clerk Mr. Boissinot. It is not the practice of the department to undertake the payment of the supplies purchased and left unpaid by the contractor. Only the wages are looked after.

MR. J. J. CAMPBELL IN NORTH ONTARIO.

Mr. RICHARDSON asked :

Why was Mr. J. J. Campbell, of the Indian Department, sent up to North Ontario during the by-election there, which preceded the general election ? By whose authority was he sent, and from what fund were his travelling expenses paid ?

Mr. DOBELL. The records of the office show that Mr. Campbell was sent on departmental business by direction of the then Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, and his travelling expenses were paid from the appropriation for contingencies.

BREAKWATER AT CHAPEL COVE, N.S.

Mr. GILLIES asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to provide, in the Supplementary Estimates during the present session, for the construction of a breakwater at Chapel Cove, L'Ardoise, Richmond County ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). It is not the intention of the Government this session.

PORT CREDIT HARBOUR.

Mr. FEATHERSTON asked :

Has the attention of the Government been called to the following article in the "Conservator," published in Brampton, county of Peel :—

No longer in the hands of a Company.—Given to the Government, who will turn it into a Harbour of Refuge and make necessary improvements.—Welcome news for the people of Port Credit.

Toronto, June 19.—It is learned to-day that Port Credit harbour which has been owned and controlled by a private company, has been handed over to the Government, and that needed improvements will be made at once. Port Credit will in future become a harbour of refuge, a fact which will be learned with pleasure by the people of that village and district. Frequent applications have been made to the Government for assistance in repairing and maintaining the harbour, but without success. The reason given by the Government for its stand in this regard, was the fact the harbour was owned by a private company. Now that it is public property reasonable outlay can be made.

Is there any truth in this report ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The attention of the Government had not previously been called to that article. The harbour of Port Credit has not been transferred to the Government.

HARBOUR OF REFUGE AT LITTLE METIS.

Mr. Fiset asked :

Is the Government aware that, two or three weeks before polling day in the county of Rimouski, explorations were made with a view to construct a harbour of refuge at Little Métis, and a branch line of railway to connect the harbour with the Intercolonial ?

If so, by whom were these orders given ? How many engineers were employed ? Has a report been made on this matter, and what did the explorations cost ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Mr. Desjardins, then Minister of Public Works, issued an order for the execution of a survey at Little Métis on the 25th May, 1896, the survey being for the purpose of obtaining an idea about the possibility of establishing at that point a harbour of refuge. The survey was under the direction of Mr. Eugene Lafleur, one of the engineers of this department, who had as assistants Mr. T. J. Charbonneau and Mr. Ed. Labelle as chainman. Mr. Lafleur has not yet sent his report, as the survey is not yet completed. It is the intention of the department to have that survey completed. The total amount expended on that survey was $456.15.

PORT STANLEY, ONT., HARBOUR.

Mr. BEATTIE asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to provide in the Supplementary Estimates to be brought down this session for the dredging and improvement of the harbour at Port Stanley, Ontario ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The question is under consideration.

THE SUPERANNUATION OF CIVIL SERVANTS.

Mr. WILSON asked :

1. Is it the intention of the Government to have an Act passed at the present session, or at the next session, to abolish the superannuation of civil servants and abolish the fund ? 2. If not, is it their intention to pass such legislation, either at the present or at the next session of Parliament, that will make the superannuation fund self-sustaining ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). It is not the intention of the Government to introduce any legislation at the present session on the subject of superannuation. The whole matter is receiving careful consideration.

GALOPS CANAL.

Mr. WOOD (for Mr. Reid) asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to proceed with the enlargement of the Galops Canal at once ? Have the contracts been let, and to whom ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The matter of when further contracts for the enlargement of the Galops Canal will be let, is under consideration. No new contracts have been let for this work.

ADVERTISEMENTS FOR PRIVATE LEGISLATION.

Mr. CLARKE asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to make provision that all advertisements for private legislation for the present session of Parliament shall stand good for the next session?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). It is not the intention of the Government to depart from the existing rules in that manner.

PORT ALBERT HARBOUR.

Mr. CAMERON moved for :

1. A copy of all reports of the engineers of the Department of Public Works as to the conditions and requirements of the Port Albert harbour made within the last ten years.

2. A statement in detail, with dates, showing all amounts voted by Parliament for the improvement of said harbour.

3. A statement showing how much of said sums were expended under contract, and how much otherwise and how, when expended and to whom paid.

He said: I desire specially to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) to this important public work. I am aware that the hon. Minister knows a little of everything, and a good deal of most things, but I am afraid he does not know very much about Port Albert harbour. Now, I wish to inform him that Port Albert harbour is situated twelve miles north of the important city of Goderich. It is a very important place. It is twelve miles to the nearest railway station, and it is the outlet to one of the very best sections of the Dominion—one of the very best farming sections, composed of a population of thrifty and large farmers, and, I am glad to say, prosperous and progressive farmers. It is the only outlet they have, except by driving over fairly good roads, a distance of twelve miles to reach the market. Port Albert harbour was not very long ago the outlet for that section of the country. There were small vessels plying through the lower lakes, and these vessels could enter the harbour. Of late years, however, they cannot do so. The hon. Minister knows that the Dominion Government assumed this harbour as a public work, and he knows that the Dominion Government, on more than one occasion, by a vote of Parliament, appropriated certain sums for the improvement of Port Albert harbour. He knows—or if he does not, I know—that upon the eve of every general election for the last ten years the chief engineer of the department was sent in hot haste to the harbour, and was in a position to assure, or, at all events, did assure, the farmers of the locality that, if they would only return a Conservative candidate, the Port Albert harbour would be improved. Almost every session preceding any election, there was something in the Supplementary Estimates for the improvement of that harbour, and just, I think, before the election of 1891 and the by-election of 1892, the same thing was repeated, just as it has been on the eve of every election for the last ten or fifteen years. Well, that would be all well enough, if the sums voted by Parliament were properly expended in the improvement of the harbour, but they were not. Sometimes the work was let by tender, and sometimes it was done by the day, and the hon. Minister knows how the public money, as a general rule, is absolutely wasted, when expended in the latter way. The last appropriation made by the Government was in the neighbourhood of $10,000, which, it was supposed, would have effected the complete restoration of Port Albert, and so it would, had the money been properly applied. A man by the name of Nevin was the contractor. The works failed, not, I am bound to say, through any fault of Mr. Nevin, because when he had a portion of the pier ready to sink, a terrific north-west storm arose, and his cribwork was all carried away. He had to abandon the contract, and a considerable portion of the appropriation made by Parliament was expended by the Government in this work, with the result that the recommendation of the engineer of the department entirely failed. The engineer recommended that the department should extend the north pier a distance of 200 feet and the south pier the same distance, and dredge out the harbour to a depth of 12 feet. The north pier was successfully constructed, but the south pier was not constructed at all. What the people desire, and what they expect the progressive Minister of Public Works to do, is to extend the south pier the same distance as the north pier and complete the dredging of the harbour. If the hon. Minister of Public Works will undertake to do that, there will be no applications during the next twenty years to Parliament for any further expenditure of money to improve the harbour. This may be looked upon as a work of trifling importance, and possibly in a Dominion and national sense it may be, but from a local point of view it is a work of the greatest possible importance. It is the desire, not only of friends of the Administration, but of supporters of the Opposition, who, however, if the Government behave themselves rightly, will be no longer their enemies, to have this work done. I have letters from the strongest Conservatives in that district, all of whom are of the opinion that it is the bounden duty of the Government to complete what the late Government undertook, but ineffectively carried out. I am told by competent authority that $5,000 will complete the cribwork, and a few weeks dredging will give 12 feet of water, which is sufficient for all purposes. I appeal to the hon. Minister of Public Works, as a public-spirited man who does not desire to favour one locality more than another, not to forget the important harbour of Port Albert.

Mr. CLARKE.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The papers asked for by my hon. friend (Mr. Cameron) will be brought down. I thank him for the very valuable information which he has conveyed to me and to the House. I recognize completely the importance of the ports he has mentioned. A pretty large sum of money has been expended at Port Albert, as the hon. gentleman has said. As far as I have been able to ascertain, $28,000 has been expended there. My hon. friend has stated that pilgrimages to Port Albert took place on many occasions on the eve of general elections. Well, the general elections are over; but I may tell him that I have made up my mind to visit every public work in Canada, as far as I am able to do so, so that when I rise in my place to speak about these works I may know what I am talking about. As soon as time will permit, I will accept the kind invitation my hon. friend has extended to me, and will visit Port Albert. I know that the port of Goderich also requires repairs. I know that public money has been wasted there also. My hon. friend has spoken about dredging. Perhaps the House would allow me to say that my department is very short of dredges. There are calls upon me every day for dredging, because the water is falling in our lakes and rivers. I am perfectly ready to carry on dredging, but to do so we must have dredges; and when my Estimates come before the House, perhaps, if I am supported by the House, I may get an appropriation for more dredges. I fully realize the importance of making and repairing ports and harbours. My hon. friend has said that a large sum of money has been wasted. Well, time will prove if his assertion is altogether right. I am very much afraid it is right. I may take this opportunity to state to the House that when I was sworn in I called my chief engineer into my office and asked for a statement about our wharfs and breakwaters. The statement he submitted to me was to this effect, that to put these works into a good state of repair would require about a million dollars. Works which, if they had been repaired in time, would have cost not more than $2,000 or $3,000, will cost now from $10,000 to $50,000. Perhaps I might have waited for another occasion to make that statement, but perhaps it is as well that the House should know that many of these works are in a dilapidated condition. We must do one of two things—either let a great many public works that we count as our assets be destroyed or else repair them. If you do not spend the money which is necessary to preserve these works against the storms of the fall, I am very much afraid that next year you will have to spend a very much larger amount. Had I had money, I certainly would have begun work before now.

Mr. McNEILL. As the hon. Minister has referred to dredging, I would just like to call attention here to a matter that perhaps he has already heard of, the great need for dredging at the very important port of Southampton. I would not refer to this were it not for the fact that life is in danger owing to the condition of things existing there now. There is a very considerable fleet of fishing boats at Southampton, and a large number of people employed in fishing operations. Owing to the fall that has occurred in the waters of our great lakes, the water on the bar in the harbour at the mouth of the Saugeen River has become so shallow that it is only with the greatest risk to life that the fishermen carry on their vocation. When a gale of wind, or even any considerable wind is blowing there from a certain quarter, the sea rises upon the bar and it is impossible to come in without risk to life.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Perhaps the House will allow me a word in reference to what the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) has said. A deputation called upon me a few days ago about the work referred to, and I told them I would have a survey made. It is a great pity that in years past my hon. friend did not insist a little more upon this work being done. I am very glad indeed that he has given me the information, and I can only say to him that the survey of the harbour will be made.

Mr. McNEILL. Perhaps I may be allowed a word of personal explanation. I do not think I can blame myself for not having been insistent in this matter in times past. And I may say, in justice to the late Government, that they sent a dredge there, but the dredge was not able to do the work. The nature of the material to be removed was such that the dredge was not powerful enough for the work.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. And it stopped.

Mr. McNEILL. It stopped. I would ask the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), as I asked his predecessor, to send a more powerful dredge.

Mr. McMILLAN. I would like to say a word with regard to Bayfield harbour. I importuned the late Government for five or six years to attend to this work. I got promises every year, but the work did not receive the necessary attention. This is a very important harbour, especially to a number of fishermen who ply their vocation from the Bayfield River. Seven or eight years ago there was a breach made in the North pier. It was repaired, but in a very inferior manner. It was repaired by means of piles, instead of by building on top of the old wall, which was perfectly good. The first storm that came up drove the piles across the river. Let me say that this is a very important harbour, but at present a large number of fishermen are not able to enter it. In rough weather, instead of going to their own harbour, they have to put in to the harbour of Goderich. I hope, when the Minister of Public Works comes up and views Goderich and Port Albert harbour, he will also come down and see Bayfield harbour, and I will accompany him, if he will let me know when he is coming. I may mention that before the last election a letter went up there from the Department of Public Works, promising the people that $12,000 would be spent on that harbour. The election has passed, and the harbour has not been repaired, nor have any steps been taken to that end. I hope, therefore, that the Minister of Public Works will consider Bayfield harbour along with the others.

ATLANTIC AND LAKE SUPERIOR RAILWAY.

Mr. FAUVEL moved for :

Copy of the correspondence between Hon. E. J. Flynn, Premier of Quebec, and Sir Charles Tupper regarding the Atlantic and Lake Superior Railway; also copy of correspondence between the said Hon. E. J. Flynn and the present Administration regarding the same railway.

He said: I desire to say a few words in support of this motion. The population of the united counties of Gaspé and Bonaventure is 47,710. The late Administration gave as a bonus to the Atlantic and Lake Superior Railway, amalgamated with the Baie des Chaleurs Railway, the sum of $620,000. Prince Edward Island has 210 miles of railway, costing $3,750,565, and the province has only a population of 108,891. Now, Sir, we demand equality in this country, we demand to be treated in the same manner as other portions of the country. It has been part of the financial policy of the Government to construct railways for the general benefit of the country; but I may say that in many instances large subsidies have been granted to various railways, and the money has been spent in a reckless and a shameful manner. The history of the Atlantic and Lake Superior Railway affords a glaring proof of such waste of money. On the 29th April, 1884, this House, led by the late Administration, voted a sum of $300,000, not for the construction of the Baie des Chaleurs Railway, not for the construction of the Atlantic and Lake Superior Railway, but for the construction of a branch of the Intercolonial Railway, starting from Matapedia, in the county of Bonaventure, and running toward Paspébiac, a distance of 100 miles. Now, I say that if the late Administration had had at heart the interests of the population of Gaspesia, one of the oldest counties in Quebec, indeed of the whole Dominion, they would have spent the money on that railway as a Government work, instead of handing it over to speculators, who were then members of this House of Commons. $300,000 was a handsome vote, and they should have continued it the following year with another subsidy to be spent in constructing a branch of the Intercolonial Railway. Then, I may mention the railway from Truro to Sydney, I believe a part of the Eastern Extension, which is 217 miles long, and passes through the counties of Antigonish, Richmond, Cape Breton and Victoria, having a population of 77,000 only—210 miles of railway built at a large expense to the country for that small population. In the last election, my opponent received a promise, in the shape of a letter from the late Administration, and I believe the ex-Minister of Railways himself gave that letter, stating that the department would run trains on the Caraquette and on the Atlantic and Lake Superior branches at the expense of the Government. It was merely a political dodge, I am sorry to say.

Mr. HAGGART. I will correct the hon. gentleman at once. There is no such letter in existence, sent by the ex-Minister.

Mr. FAUVEL. Does the hon. member mean to say that there is no letter from the Hon. E. J. Flynn to the late Premier of Canada, asking that the Atlantic and Lake Superior Railway should not be taken over by the late Government? The public press has so stated on more than one occasion, and it has never been denied by the late Administration. The inhabitants of that portion of the country have a right to redress. We do not wish for more than our share of the public money, we do not wish to get what is not our own. Large sums of money are spent on canals in the western portions of this Dominion, but in the province of Quebec we have no canals except in the western portion of the province, while in the eastern portion of Quebec there is not a single mile of canal in existence built by public money. Therefore, I say that a population of 47,000 are deprived of their quota of the public money that is spent on public works; and I now rise in my seat, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of that population, to protest against the injustice. I say that, following out what was said in this House a few days ago by the hon. member for Pictou, the Government should take over these railways that are now in a state of bankruptcy, and run them as a part of the Intercolonial Railway. I admit that what the hon. member for Pictou said the other day is the right thing to do with these existing lines, which are manipulated by companies who are virtually in a state of bankruptcy, such as the Caraquette Railway, and the Atlantic and Lake Superior Railway—I do not know anything about the Temiscouata Railway, which he mentioned—but these should be taken over by the present Administration and run as part and parcel of the great Intercolonial Railway trunk line. It will be remembered that last session, or the session before, a request was made by the Atlantic and Lake Superior Railway Company, asking that a certain amount of bonds, which were then being floated on the London market, with the interest thereon, should be guaranteed by the late Administration; and I believe there was a promise to that effect. It was a mere wildcat scheme, got up for the purpose of duplicating another line of railway, which to-day does not pay expenses, much less a dividend. The Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway pass through the granary of Canada, and see how their shares are quoted on the market to-day. For a number of years the company has paid no dividend, and, although the road is in fair condition, it appears impossible for the company to pay any dividend, the reason for which I do not know. But I hold that any company coming here and asking a subsidy from Parliament and that the Government should guarantee interest on the bonds to be sold in the market, should not receive favourable consideration for their application.

Mr. MARTIN. I should like to call the attention of the House to a remark made by the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Fauvel), who has just taken his seat. The hon. gentleman alluded to Prince Edward Island. He stated that there had been spent on the Island over $3,000,000 for the construction of 211 miles of railway. I am aware that some hon. gentlemen are under a misapprehension as to the amount of money that was spent by the Dominion Government on the construction of those railways in the Island. I may say that it is true we have 211 miles of railway on the Island, but of that number the Dominion Government constructed a very small number indeed—if my memory serves me right, less than 10 miles—the remainder, about 200 miles, having been under construction by that little province before it entered confederation, and paid for entirely out of the resources of that province. If the hon. gentleman only wishes this House and the Government to do for his people what has been done by the Government for Prince Edward Island, I must say he asks for very little indeed, he asks for less than nothing. I do not wish to detract from the arguments which the hon. gentleman used in support of the enterprise which he so ably advocated, but it is time that the minds of members of this House should be disabused of the idea that the Dominion built the railways in Prince Edward Island. When the motion which I have on the paper is reached, I shall have an opportunity to refer to this matter, and I shall deal with it in such a way that hon. members will no longer be under their present delusion in regard to this railway expenditure in Prince Edward Island.

Motion agreed to.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. MAXWELL moved for :

Copies of all petitions or memorials presented to the Government on the subject of Chinese immigration.

He said : Mr. Speaker, I deeply regret that my first venture in addressing this House should be in connection with such a subject as this, but as I have received a mandate from my constituents I feel under obligation to bring it before this House for consideration and to press it as plainly and yet as strongly as I possibly can on the attention of the Government. One circumstance makes this question a little peculiar, and that is that it particularly belongs to the province of British Columbia. I wish in some measure there were Chinese in all the provinces, because I am sure I would then speak to a more sympathetic audience than I do to-day, hon. members generally not knowing very much about this question. But in spite of this fact, though there is not a Chinese question in Ontario, Manitoba, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island or even in Quebec, though I notice from the Montreal "Gazette" a few days ago a great many of the citizens of that important city have begun to be alive to the fact that they have more than enough of those distinguished gentlemen and that some restrictive measure must be brought into existence or there will be another British Columbia practically in the province of Quebec. In spite of that fact, I think I may appeal to members of the House, and especially to members of the Government, not to look at this question from their point of view, but from the point of view of those concerned. We the citizens of that western province, notwithstanding our province is rich and fertile, perhaps far beyond the wildest dream of the wildest imagination, yet hope you will regard us out there as you are regarded, namely, that we are striving to the best of our efforts to make that portion of Canada a place that will be a home for a happy, contented and prosperous class of people. Sir, one thing encourages me in bringing this question before the House, and that is that it is not a party question : that is to say, there is nothing of the Conservative or what you may call the Liberal element in it whatever, but it is simply a question on which the large majority of the people of British Columbia are agreed. During the late contest both Conservative and Liberal candidates were pledged up to the hilt so far as this question is concerned, and I believe if my opponent had been elected in my place, he would have done to-day what I am trying to do, and perhaps with more ability. However, I am also encouraged with regard to this question by the favourable consideration which the Premier has promised me for this question, and I hope that what I may say will strike a responsive chord in his generous heart, and that, together with his Government, he will do something towards helping the people of British Columbia to free themselves from what may be called a growing evil. If my opponent in the late election said what was true—and I have no reason whatever to doubt his word—then the hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) is likewise pledged to the consideration of this question. In fact, it was stated upon the public platform during the last election that the then Premier was prepared to deal with this question in sympathy with the wishes of the people of British Columbia. I may then take it, Mr. Speaker, that so far as this House is concerned, there is nothing of a party nature in the question, and that as we try to solve what may be regarded as a knotty, delicate subject we will approach it simply from the standpoint of citizens interested in the development and in the prosperity of the people of Canada. To some, my position on this question may seem a little strange; that is to say, most people today who take a broad view of things are in deep sympathy with what is called the brotherhood of man. I do not for a moment deny that doctrine on the floor of this House. I assent to it with all my heart. I believe that the time is coming, it is now on the wing though it is yet far distant, of which our Scottish bard has so sweetly sung:

When man to man the world o'er Shall brithers be and a' that.

But, I hold that the claim which the people of British Columbia make through their representatives does not in any way clash with what is now justly regarded as one of the noblest dreams ever conceived by the mind of man. I may say, that when I went to British Columbia six years ago, I went there prejudiced against the Chinese agitation. In the sincerity of my heart I believed the opinions of some of the distinguished men in this country, who thought that Chinese immigration would give a glorious opportunity to the church to christianize them. I was kindly disposed towards them. I have no ill-feeling towards them yet, but when I began to come in contact with the trouble—because there is a very serious trouble in connection with the matter—when I began to realize how these Chinese gentlemen affected the moral and material interests of our own Canadian people, then, I found that it was our self interest to do all the justice to our own people that we possibly could. I unhesitatingly say, from observation and contact, that as things have been going on and as they are going on at the present time, we are doing a positive injustice to those who are bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh. I heard the Premier say not long ago—and, Mr. Speaker, I desire to congratulate him on obtaining his present honourable position, and on the high vantage ground which he now holds in our political life. I am glad that after breasting the blows of circumstance he now “can shape the whisper of a Throne and mould a mighty State's decrees.” I heard from his lips not long ago the statement: that self preservation was the law that we are bound to observe. I assent to that doctrine. It is only through self preservation that any one of us can attempt to feel and act the impulses of what is called altruism or the higher life. We must protect our own people. The land is theirs—I do not think that is a strange doctrine to preach on the floor of this House—the mines are theirs, the fisheries are theirs, the opportunities are theirs, and I do not think it is a wise policy, yea, I think it is a narrow-minded policy to fill the land with semi-barbarians, and to drive out our own people who ought to possess these things, and who if they possessed these things, would make both themselves and Canada the pride of the whole earth.

Now, I want to state very briefly what has been done in regard to this Chinese question. This House of Commons is exceptional because of the greatness of the number of new members, and I therefore wish to remind hon. gentlemen that this is not the first time that the question has been brought before this honourable House. As far back as 1884 a commission was appointed by the then Government. That commission was composed of the Hon. Mr. Chapleau, the Hon. Mr. Gray, Judge of the Supreme Court of British Columbia, and the secretary of the commission was the distinguished and poetical member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). Previous to that a motion had been made in the House to the following effect:—

That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to enact a law prohibiting the incoming of Chinese to that portion of Canada known as British Columbia.

That motion was withdrawn on a promise being given by the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, on behalf of the Government that a commission should be issued to inquire into and report upon the whole subject of Chinese immigration. It may not be amiss to state that one of these things which brought this question to the crucial point, was the unfortunate compact that was made by the then Government with Mr. Onderdonk who built what was called the Onderdonk section of the Canadian Pacific Railway. He represented that it was absolutely necessary to import Chinese in order to construct that portion of the railway. It was likewise a part of the compact that after the railway had been constructed, these Chinese should be sent back again to China, but unfortunately the promises both of the Government and of the contractor were not carried out, and instead of being sent back to China as they ought to have been, they were let loose upon British Columbia, and to that we may trace a great deal of the trouble that has arisen in our province in regard to this Chinese question. At the opening of the commission to which I refer, the Hon. Mr. Chapleau (the Chairman) said:

British Columbia has repeatedly by her local legislature and by her representatives in Parliament, solicited the executive of Parliament of Canada to enact a law prohibiting the incoming of Chinese to British Columbia.

Now, I want to say that the Hon. Mr. Chappleau in making that statement, said the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. That is still the opinion of a large majority of the people of British Columbia. But what I want to say is this : that commission brought in a report. I have read that report and it is to my mind one of the most outrageous reports that ever was presented to this honourable House. Our local legislature and the federal members from British Columbia, had represented what the people wanted, and yet this commission—on the strength of what evidence, I cannot possibly make out—bring in a report almost to the effect that the Chinese were a blessing to British Columbia and that the more they had of them the better it would be. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that that report in no way voices the sentiment of British Columbia. While there is a great deal of evidence in that report the greater portion of it is simply the evidence of men who were interested in having the Chinese there, and so far as the mass of the people were concerned, they were not represented on the commission as they ought to have been. If they had been properly represented, the evidence would have been so overwhelming that the commission would have reported in favour of what had been demanded by the representatives of British Columbia.

Now, I just want very briefly to state some of the arguments with regard to the Chinese. There is what is called the moral argument. I do not want to bring this question up in the House in this public way, nor would I pretend to say that the whites are altogether clean and pure. I know that we have our vices as well as the Chinese, but there is this difference : that while our vices, so to speak, are controlled, and moulded, and influenced to some extent by the higher forces of civilization, not to mention Christianity ; the vices of the Chinese are dominated and influenced by the lower forces of barbarism. I need not tell this House that the Chinese are universally addicted to opium ; that they are inveterate gamblers ; that they are grossly immoral. These things are so well known and authenticated that I do not wish to dwell upon them in this Chamber. I might mention also, that according to the evidence which has been produced in several countries, the Chinese are mostly members of secret societies, and that the law of these societies is the law which they are compelled to obey. We have leprosy out on the coast in connection with the Chinese. How it came we do not know ; but at considerable cost to this country we have had to get hold of these lepers, we have had to transport them to an island, and at the present moment, I understand, they are being supported by the Dominion Government.

From the Chinese we are in constant dread of a return of what may be called the small-pox scare. A few years ago, the small-pox cost the city of Vancouver, the city of Victoria and the provincial government each thousands of dollars, and paralyzed the whole trade of the country as long as it lasted.

It may be true that the Chinese are not as bad as they are represented to be ; but no self-respecting people care to have the scum of Chinese life dumped right into their midst. It may be hard for me to tell what influence these Chinese may have upon the moral life of the people. But I ask hon. gentlemen to think of the lowest classes of Chinese being dumped in tens, fifties, hundreds, or thousands, into their midst, and doing such things as we know they do, and then to say that they will not affect the moral life of the people. For us to imagine that these people have not a deleterious effect upon the people among whom they live, would be to imagine something not true to common experience. Our children to-day are becoming familiar with their gambling dens, their opium-smoking, and their filth ; and I ask you, should not the higher moral concerns of the people take precedence of all monetary considerations ? We white people may not be perfect ; I agree that we are not ; but when you have a stream whose source is filth, and which flows over beds of long accumulated filth, flowing into the moral life of our people, it stands to common sense that our moral life will become more and more contaminated.

It may be true that the Chinese are industrious. I will grant that for the time being. It may be that they perform services which are useful. But I ask you this : Will it pay Canada to fill British Columbia with thousands of men who are the off-scourings of the jails and the lowest life of the Chinese ? What will Canada gain, if she accomplishes the lowering of the moral tone of her own citizens ? I say we ought to face this question ; and if I were not what I am, I would press it home with still more earnestness than I am doing to-day. But I ask you to say, with the people of British Columbia, that moral considerations are of more concern to the people of Canada than a mere question of dollars and cents.

There is another aspect of this question, that is, the labour aspect. This is the essence of the whole question. Put in common language, the question of the Chinese is the question of bread and butter. If you feed three Chinamen, you take the bread out of a white man's mouth ; you close up a home ; most likely you drive a family out of the province altogether. I have read very carefully the evidence that has been adduced on this subject, and the gist of that evidence is this. British Columbia wants cheap labour ; Chinese labour is cheap labour ; therefore, the more Chinese cheap labour we have in British Columbia, the better it will be for the development of that province. Now, there is no more reason why we should have Chinese cheap labour in British Columbia than there is that we should have it in any other part of Canada. Our mines, our forests and our waters are surely rich enough to pay white men white men's wages in British Columbia as well as in any other part of Canada. Some men who are in favour of having the Chinese in British Columbia, talk as if our necessities were exceptional. They are no more so than those of any other part of Canada. You have your public works in different parts of Canada; but who raises the cry that you must have Chinese labour to build those public works? You have accomplished things in other parts of Canada such as we have never attempted in British Columbia, and yet you are always able to employ white men and pay them white men's wages; and I say that British Columbia is far more able, according to her recognized wealth, to employ white men and to give them such wages as will enable them to live in comfort, peace and plenty in a glorious province, which God has wonderfully endowed. Sometimes in this evidence you will read that one of the reasons some men have for favouring the Chinese is that they are so docile, that is to say, they think there is something advantageous about a Chinaman because he just does what he is told to do. Now, I know that there is a great difference between the docility of a Chinese slave and the docility of a free white man. The difference is that some of those people want men to work for them whom they can swear at, and, if their temper be at the boiling point, whom they can kick. Thank goodness, no white man will ever stand such treatment; and it augurs a very low standard of morality and of humanity, when a master makes it a boast that he likes men whom he can kick, better than those whom he cannot; and that is practically the case with the Chinese. You also hear it remarked that there are no strikes among Chinese workmen. No; and why? Because the Chinaman is simply a machine in the hands of the boss, who can do with him just what he pleases. I do not want to go into the question of strikes; but this I will say: Why make a distinction in favour of British Columbia? Masters and men have their strikes in Ottawa, in Montreal, and in Toronto; but, after they have fought the question out, they agree to begin again on quite harmonious terms; and I can assure you that the men who have made England, Scotland, Ireland and different parts of Canada, are quite good enough to make British Columbia all she ever hopes to be. Sometimes you hear, as I have heard over and over again from the employers of labour out there, "Oh, the white men are so bad and discontented that we cannot get on with them; and the Chinese are so good, and contented, and happy, and they just do what we want them to do." Now, I would not malign any class. The white man may be bad enough; he may have his mistakes, his vices and his faults; but, bad as he is, he is a thousand miles ahead of the Chinaman who comes from the jails of China. Hence I say: like master, like servant: where you have a bad master, you will have a bad servant. Let our capitalists be good men, and let them treat their employees kindly and sympathetically, and in British Columbia, as everywhere else, these men will do their best in the interest of their masters and their country.

We object to these Chinese because they do not become citizens among us. I do not know that we want them to become citizens; but they, on their part, do not evince any desire to become citizens, either. They leave China for the purpose of making a little money, and, after they make it, they desire to return to China. If they should die before they can return to China, their bones are sent back to the homes of their forefathers. They object to paying taxes. We have in British Columbia a poll tax of $3 per head for educational purposes, and the Chinese, to escape that tax, will lie like troopers. Our chief objection, however, to the Chinese is that they take away the bread out of the mouths of the white population. Sometimes it is represented that three Chinamen make work for one white man. The very opposite is the case. Take the question of servants. It is the desire of every city no doubt to have capable, fine-looking servants, and I suppose you all know that the Chinaman takes the place of the servant girl. It stands to common sense that if he is employed, she cannot be; and where one Chinaman is employed, it means that a servant girl is out of employment, and to be out of employment means for that girl poverty, perhaps starvation, and worse than all it may mean that she may be driven to a life of shame in our great cities. Think what servant girls mean to the community. They patronize the stores, they help to fill the churches, and from this class a great many young men obtain the wives that are to sweeten and brighten their homes. What then does the employment of a Chinaman signify in the community? It means nothing, absolutely nothing. He is what we, out in British Columbia call a "sucker," taking in all he can get and giving out nothing or as little as possible. It is not difficult to see which of these classes is the best for British Columbia.

Then look at our fisheries. Take, for example, our canneries. I do not want to say a single hard word so far as this question is concerned, and you will get to know by and by of the immense importance of these canneries and the immense amount of money which is going into the pockets of a great many people in British Columbia from our fisheries. Go into these canneries, and you will find that every man employed there is a Chinaman. You will find hundreds of thousands of them swarming up and down during the fishing season. Will any sensible man tell me that the employment of so many Chinese does not keep white men out of work, yet that is what we are asked to believe by those who are in favour of the admission of Chinamen. It stands to reason that if thousands of Chinamen are employed in our province, white men cannot be getting the employment which they have the right to expect and which they ought to demand.

Go to our mines, and see the immense riches there, and you will find hundreds and hundreds of Chinamen employed in these mines. In some of the pits, you will find more Chinamen than whites.

Take our market gardeners. In market gardening the Chinese are a great success, but what does this mean? It means either that the white gardener has been driven out or that he is bordering on starvation. Why? Because the Chinaman can live like a hog, on the swill of the hotels. It means that what is a profit to Chinamen would be death to the whites; they live on the refuse, on the swill, and they grow rich on what would be starvation to a white gardener's family, so that there is no class in British Columbia to-day more opposed to Chinamen than our market gardeners.

Civilization and christianity have taught man to take a higher level in this life. They have taught him to have a home for himself, to have a wife who will brighten his struggle for existence, to have children perhaps who will fill his home with their merry prattle and songs, and wherever you have these, you have what indicates prosperity. The more white men are employed, the more white homes are in existence, the more is every industry benefited; and the fewer of these you have, the more will all legitimate business suffer. On the other hand, the more Chinamen you have, the less stores and industries will flourish; and the more you introduce those barbarians, the more you introduce barbarianism and drive out christianity and civilization. And so, in the name of my fellow citizens I appeal to this House that you, in your wisdom and righteousness, may help us in some way to get rid of this great evil, and that you will by your actions proclaim, so far as the future is concerned, that you are on the side of your Canadian brethren and are determined to give them all the facilities and advantages which this magnificent country can furnish them.

Just one word more, and I have done. The United States have had to deal with this question. The legislatures of that country poohpooed the agitation and the desire of the working classes, but riots broke out in Nevada and Oregon and different other states and at last as the culminating act of the efforts of these statesmen the Geary Act was passed, which is simply an act of prohibition. I may also refer to the struggle which took place in New South Wales on this question. But instead of wearying you with the Act which has been passed in connection with that struggle, I will simply say that the law is there that each Chinaman entering New South Wales has to pay a per capita tax of $500. So far as British Columbia is concerned that is the demand that I have to make to-day, namely, that the per capita tax be raised from $50 to $500. With all due respect to Li Hung Chang that is our opinion, and we ought to know the conditions of the country a great deal better than that distinguished gentleman. You may ask why do we demand an increase of this per capita tax. We ask it in the first place because the $50 tax has proved insufficient to prevent this immigration and the influx of Chinese is going on as fast and furious to-day as it ever did in the history of the country. The cause of this is chiefly, first, Tyhees or Chinese bosses. These men are comparatively rich, and they make a profit on importing their fellow countrymen into this Dominion. They pay the $50 tax and furnish all the necessaries required to these men, and then they become their slaves until they have paid out in toll what has been advanced. Any legislation, so far as the imposition of a per capita tax is concerned, must be legislation which will prevent these Tyhees bringing in their countrymen in order to make them slaves and at the same time fill up this country. Another thing which has been against us in this matter is the Canadian Pacific Railway line of steamships. I do not want to say a word derogatory to that company or to their steamers. I feel as proud of their magnificent vessels as any man in this Dominion. Their vessels are indeed a credit both to this country and to the company that owns them. But we must speak the truth with frankness and soberness. You know, Sir, that that company receives an annual subsidy of $60,000, and from the province of British Columbia an annual subsidy of $14,000. I do not object to that, but to this I do object. If you go on board any one of these steamers, you will find them manned by Chinese sailors, and filled with Chinese firemen, waiters and cooks and other servants. In fact you would almost fancy you were in a Chinese town. Now, I put this question to hon. members. Is it fair that the people of Canada should contribute from their substance to the support of a magnificent line of steamers in order to enable this company to employ Chinamen to run these ships? I think the people who man these ships should be taken from the people who contribute the money. Should not these positions be given to Canadians? I know that there are many who would be glad to fill them, and I think we are making a modest demand when we ask that these steamers should be utilized for the benefit of the people whose money is subsidizing them. But I may be asked will not this mean total prohibition. I cannot say whether it will or not, but I tell you sincerely I hope it will. I hope sincerely that this tax will have the desired effect of preventing any more Chinamen from coming into British Columbia or Canada.

I now want to answer those men who cry out for cheap labour.

Now, I grant that we must have cheap labour of some kind; but I hold that there are enough white men in Canada to do this labour and they can do it as well and as cheaply as any body of Chinamen possibly can. What number of Chinamen have you in British Columbia? According to the last census we had 10,000 Chinamen there. But I suppose hon. gentlemen are aware that census returns are not to be depended upon. In the course of the investigations of the commission of 1884, it was admitted that there were 18,000 Chinamen in British Columbia. During 1892, 3,278 came into the province. Altogether, I believe I am well within the mark when I say that there must be in British Columbia at the present time about 20,000 Chinamen—one-fifth of the whole population. Suppose we grant that cheap labour is absolutely indispensable, and even that Chinamen are needed to do it—have we not enough Chinamen in the country already for this service? Are not 20,000 enough to do all the cheap labour necessary for the development of the province of British Columbia? There may be objections to expelling those that we have among us, and I do not press that point. But I say, knowing the facts of the case and anxious to do justice to all interests that are concerned, we have enough and more than enough Chinamen for all the industries of British Columbia that many require their services.

Now, let me say in conclusion that this is a burning question. The people of British Columbia are deeply interested in this subject. I will not say that they are indignant, I will not picture them before you as boiling over with righteous wrath. But this I will say—that hope deferred maketh the heart sick. I appeal to the Government and I say to them with all earnestness, now is the time for them to enshrine themselves in the hearts of the people of British Columbia, a people as honest, as industrious, as good as may be found in any part of this magnificent land, this Canada. Answer us according to the desire of our hearts and we will make you a province that will be the brightest gem in the coronet with which the fair brow of Canada is encircled to-day. We want to fill that land with honest men and bonnie lasses. We want to fill it with a people who have respect for our laws, who will become citizens of the country in which they live and who will be the strong support of Canadian and British institutions. Deny us and let these people come in, let them fill our industries in the future as they have done in the past, and you will give us such a condition of things as that which Goldsmith has so painfully described in "The Deserted Village." But answer us according to the desire of our hearts and we will give you a province which will be as Robert Burns described his native Scotland:

Beloved at home, revered abroad.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I would not like this motion to pass without at least one man saying something against the views expressed by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maxwell). Of course I am not as well acquainted with the facts as the hon. gentleman is, but on the general principle that should control every government in a free land, I have to say that it would be a retrograde move for us to pass laws to keep these people out on the ground that they are Chinamen. There is but one acre out of every hundred of the arable land of Canada cultivated. For myself, desiring that this country shall have population—the only means of wealth—I am willing that Chinamen as well as others shall come in. And if the people of Canada can, as stated by the hon. gentleman, compete with these people, there can be no danger in admitting these Chinamen here. It is very well to say that we can compete with them and then try to keep them out by legislative prohibition. That is an admirable way of showing our ability to compete with them. It is true, we have very few Chinamen in the province from which I come, but I have seen these people in the United States, and I have listened to the clamour against them by the people of that country; and I know that many of them have good qualities which we might profitably follow. But there is another point—there is no such embargo as is now proposed laid upon the people of Great Britain when they go to China, and the same complaint is made by the people of China as is made by the people of Canada with respect to the Chinese. If you go to China you will find the complaint made by the people there against the British that they go to China and make money and then return to Great Britain to spend it. I will say nothing of the festivity attending the visit of the eminent Chinaman who is now in our country, but I was glad, at least, that we did not lay on him the embargo we had laid on the rest of his countrymen. I appreciate the difficulty that the people of British Columbia have to encounter in competing with these people who work so hard and live more cheaply than other people do. But that is an incident of immigration to every country, and the people must learn how to compete with them. If we say that because these men are thrifty, and because they labour hard therefore they are to be kept out, we recognize in a practical way the very vilest of all systems, protection; we declare that the people of this country must be protected.

Mr. BERGERON. Hear, hear.

Mr. FRASER. That argument is so irresistible that even an hon. gentleman like the member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) sees the force of it. I admit that if you are going to make an exclusion Bill, it must be by imposing a fee of $500 and not $50. I admit also that there ought to be stringent regulations against the importation of these people simply for the purpose of getting them to work for outside task-masters. The Government will never make much out of this, but our degradation will be complete. I can fancy a man rising in the British Parliament and proposing that people from China or from any other country should be kept out of Great Britain. England competes with the whole world, and every man is free to go there and compete with those who are already there. I think we should be following a very bad example if we copied the legislation of the United States in this respect instead of copying England. We did follow the example of the United States in other things. We adopted their miserable system of protection, a system that had been discarded by Great Britain, and we followed them also when we put the duty of $50 upon Chinamen. I remember a man in British Columbia who did not like to have people coming in from our provinces down by the sea. When I was speaking of the fact that the largest province in this Dominion, containing an area of over 400,000 square miles, had only between 80,000 and 100,000 people, not more than is found in some counties of this Dominion, I remember a man standing up, and what do you suppose was the remedy he proposed at a public meeting? Because they could not compete successfully with the miners that came there from the lower provinces, he submitted, as the best solution of the difficulty, that a tax of $50 should be imposed upon every man who went from the lower provinces into British Columbia. That was his solution, and an easy one it was, because if you keep out those who can compete favourably with us, there is room for a man who is dependent on the assistance that the Government gives him. Well, there is the difficulty antecedent to all others. I think we must make up our minds that the Chinaman, and the Japanese, and all others, ought to be allowed to come to this country if they want to, and engage in honest toil, and help to build up the country. Our gates are not by any means wide enough open to the people from other lands. How are we going to fill up our country? Are we going to wait until the people of the kinds that we prefer chose to come in here? Then they will not in increasingly large numbers. But there is a greater question underlying this. Much has been said against the Chinaman because he comes here as a Pagan. So he does. Well, Sir, have we come to this, that the Christian influences and the moral forces at work in Canada, are not able to take those men as they come into Canada, and make them somewhat nearly what they ought to be? Has civilization in Canada come to be such a failure that we must protect ourselves, not only as against the labourer, but against that class which is now under discussion? I know there are difficulties surrounding the admission of these people, I know they do not make as desirable citizens as some others. What then? We must accept them, and we must bring to bear upon them the best moral and spiritual forces in the country, to make them better. We are all in this world children of a common Father; and I would dearly love that we should get hold of the idea that it is a duty we owe to the Chinaman and to every other emigrant who comes into this country, to elevate him and benefit him. It may be said that he comes here as a mere contract labourer. So he may, and so he may go away; but even his sojourn here, be it ever so short, ought to be made a means of benefiting him. Now, in the Island of Trinidad there was a large number of coolies who went there and settled, and what did the philanthropists and Christians do? Did they try to exclude them? No, but the various churches took hold of them—and I speak now particularly of the church of which I am myself a humble member; they sent missionaries to Trinidad amongst those coolies, they opened schools and instructed them, and what was the result? There is now a native ministry among those people. They have been raised, they are better wage-earners, they do better work, and there they remain. But if, perchance, he goes back to India at any time, you have the satisfaction of knowing that you have elevated him, that he has undergone a process of civilization, and he goes back to India a man better prepared to become a citizen of that country. I believe that is the condition of things in Canada, and I would not myself—and I am now only speaking for myself—I would not like that we should proceed any further with this matter. I see a difficulty in going back upon the legislation that now exists in Canada. Surely we should stop now, and go no further. What have both parties been calling for? They have been calling for more people. What have we been spending millions for? To bring immigrants into the country, and with a failure that is astounding. I am sure this proposition of the hon. gentleman is not one of the best methods of helping on a work that every man in Canada who loves his country, ought to have primarily at heart. We must learn to do with the Chinaman just what we do with every other man that comes into the country, we must try to make the best of him, and we must try to make the best of the state of things that exist in Canada to-day. But to exclude them altogether is to give up our claim that we are able to compete successfully with them, and it is to acknowledge that we are not able to make them better. Now, Sir, these being my views I could not for a moment agree that this resolution should pass, though it were merely to take the sense of the House upon the question. I do not believe that it is the better sense of this House. I believe that even in British Columbia, while they may feel the difficulty presented by the hon. gentleman, I know those noble people will appreciate the fact that this difficulty must be overcome by forces from within, and then it will be solved. In respect to the employment of Chinese by the Canadian Pacific Railway does not the fact that the company employ them, prove that they are capable workmen. The company carry on business on a commercial basis, and care only to employ those who will perform the work to the best advantage. It may be hard, but must we not be able to surpass these celestials. And that is a difficulty that we must overcome in some way. Canada will become great only when she will have learned the lesson of opening her doors wide to all nations; and when Chinamen have learned the good-will that Canadians bear them, when they have learned that they can come here to a better country than their own, they will appreciate the advantages, and it will be found that many of them, instead of going back to their native land, will become industrious and hardy citizens of this country. There is a marvellous adaptability in the Chinaman to the situation in which he is placed, and I believe that if, instead of discouraging him in this way, we took pains to encourage him, there would be no desire of placing a resolution of this kind upon our records. Why, Sir, we have heard of the distinguished man from that country who recently arrived upon our shores; and I say that the very questions he put—that man born and brought up in a civilization so different from ours—I say that the very questions he put, showing such an intimate knowledge of passing events, and of the public men of Canada, should satisfy us that a country that can produce a man like him is a country whose population we may safely allow to come to Canada, and who, if properly treated, can be trusted to become good citizens. My hon. friend from Vancouver has stated his objections, and his arguments are very good from his point of view; but I trust that no step will be taken in that direction. It would be a retrograde step; and I believe that the people of Canada are ready to allow the Chinaman to come, and are willing to treat him well, to make him a good citizen; and he will help to build up this country, an end that we all desire to obtain.

After Recess.

LI HUNG CHANG IN CANADA.

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir H. Joly de Lotbinière). Mr. FRASER (Guysborough).

Speaker, I desire to ask a great favour from the House, I may even say, a personal favour, but I will not occupy the time of hon. members for more than two or three minutes. I had the honour of being chosen by the Government of Canada to go as its representative and meet Li Hung Chang, the Viceroy of China. I have spent some time with him in friendly intercourse, and I have heard him express the gratitude which he entertains and which he acknowledges for the hearty hospitality shown him in our country. Let me tell the House that almost the last words he said to me before I took leave of him were these: "Do not abandon us—do not abandon us." I told him I would not abandon his countrymen. He is about to sail from Canada, the hearty cheers with which we greeted him still ringing in his ears. To-morrow he will see in the papers the attack brought against his country to-day. Mr. Speaker, I do not in any way desire to comment, or to say whether that attack was just or unjust; but I appeal to all the members of this House as Canadians to give me the chance of showing that a Canadian can keep his word. I want him to know before he sails next Monday for Asia that when I said I would not abandon him, I meant to keep my word; and when I am allowed, by the rules of the House, to open my mouth on this subject, I shall seek to dispel that dark cloud which is now hanging over the reputation of the countrymen of the Viceroy, who was welcomed so heartily by us only yesterday. I merely ask the House for permission to make this statement in order to let him know before he leaves this country that when the time comes for me to speak, when the rules of the House allow me to speak, I shall endeavour to clear, as far as lies within my power, the reputation of his countrymen; then it will be my duty to do it, and I will try and do it. I thank hon. members with all my heart for the kind indulgence which has been shown to me.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 10) to confirm an agreement made between the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Gibson.)

Bill (No. 11) to amend and revive the Acts respecting the St. Clair and Erie Ship Canal Company.—(Mr. Tisdale.)

Bill (No. 13) respecting the Hamilton Powder Company.—(Mr. Geoffrion.)

Bill (No. 14) to incorporate the Mather Bridge and Power Company.—(Mr. Lount.)

Bill (No. 15) amalgamating the Ottawa, Arnprior and Parry Sound Railway Company and the Parry Sound Colonization Railway Company under the name of the Ottawa, Arnprior and Parry Sound Railway Company.—(Mr. Belcourt.)

HUDSON BAY AND PACIFIC RILWAY.

Mr. OLIVER moved second reading of Bill (No. 12) to incorporate the Hudson Bay and Pacific Railway Company.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will be kind enough to explain the purport of the Bill.

Mr. OLIVER. The Bill is the embodiment of an idea held by a gentleman named Nelson, who has been connected with the Hudson Bay railway enterprises for some years, and it is practically the same Bill as was brought before the House last session. The Bill received its second reading, and I think passed the Railway Committee, but by some mistake it was not passed through the House. It provides for the incorporation of a company to construct a railway from Fort Churchill, on Hudson Bay, to Prince Albert, then to Calgary, where it would join the Canadian Pacific Railway, with a branch to Manitou Lake in the Saskatchewan district at or near Edmonton. There is also provision for a line from Fort Churchill to Lake Athabasca.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There will be opportunity for full discussion before the Railway Committee.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

DAIRY PRODUCTS ACT (1893).

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry) moved second reading of Bill (No. 2) to amend the Dairy Products Act (1893).

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Would the hon. gentleman explain?

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). Mr. Speaker, this Bill has been before the House for the last three sessions and I did not think it was necessary to offer very much explanation concerning it. It has, however, been somewhat amended by inserting a schedule setting forth the manner in which those interested have to get a certificate from the Dairy Commissioner of the Agricultural Department. I may refresh the memory of the House by stating that there was a very strong demand from cheese buyers in England that Canadian cheese should be branded. They sent a memorial to Canada stating that our cheese was placed upon the English market under misrepresentation, as it was sold as being made in a different month from that in which it really was made. For instance, July cheese was placed on the market and sold as September cheese. We export a large quantity of our cheese to Bristol, and I hold in my hand a memorial signed by the leading business men of that city asking for legislation in the direction proposed by this Bill. As the House, and country know, there was considerable alarm about this matter some time ago throughout Canada owing to reports which appeared in the English agricultural journals, and which reports might have been very injurious to the cheese industry of Canada. I am satisfied that the House is favourable to this legislation. When I brought the matter to the attention of Parliament before, hon. gentlemen on both sides expressed approval of it and I am quite sure that the majority of members in this new House will endorse the opinions of their predecessors in that regard. I have copies of circulars which were sent out to cheese manufacturers and to the patrons of factories, and they have sent in replies favourable to this Bill. I have also a copy of a circular sent out by Professor Robertson, the Dairy Commissioner, which suggested that there should be a certain brand or mark giving the day of the year merely, and although the form of the mark was put on the circular, and the suggestion placed very clearly before them, yet they expressed themselves as more favourable to the form of branding set forth in this Bill. I need not point out that the cheese industry is very important in this country, and that it is well worth our while to try and satisfy the people of the British market who buy from us. We export between $14,000,000 and $15,000,000 every year, and I believe that over 99½ per cent of that is sent to Great Britain, the remainder going to the United States, Newfoundland and the West Indies. If anything takes place that will cast suspicion upon our Canadian products on the British markets, it would be found to be very detrimental to us, as the people of the United States have already experienced. Our cheese trade has increased over 1,000 times what it was 30 years ago. In 1860 the United States exported 124 times as much as we did, but now we export twice as much cheese as the United States. I may state that we sent our circulars to the manufacturers and farmers asking their opinion as to what was best to be done upon the lines of this Bill which provides that the cheese should be branded with the month and the day of the month, and the registration number of the factory, so that whether this cheese was found in London, Bristol, Liverpool, or in any part of the world, you could tell the spot where it had been manufactured, the concession, township, lot, the post office, the name of the manufacturer, &c. This makes the working of the Act very simple, and will obviate the necessity of any expenditure for employing inspectors. Out of 430 replies received to our circular from the province of Quebec, there were only eleven against the principle of the Bill, and out of 348 replies received from the province of Ontario there were only 33 against it. The grand total of answers received was 778, and there were only 64 against it in those two important provinces. So that there were only 8 per cent of replies against the proposition. Although the actual number of answers was 778, yet these answers represented a great deal larger number who are interested in the cheese trade, because some of them were from presidents, secretaries, and treasurers of cheese-making companies who spoke for those whom they represented and who were interested in the manufacture of cheese. The cheese manufacturers and the farmers of Canada are strongly of opinion that fraud is being perpetrated upon them, and if we do not try to prevent this feeling, they will continue to feel even more strongly that their interests are not being attended to. I am happy to say that a few who objected to the provisions of this Bill in the commencement are now strongly in its favour. I will cite a couple of facts to show the progress and improvement in quality the Canadian cheese has made. Canada made 195 cheese entries at the Philadelphia exhibition in 1876, and obtained 49 awards, or 25 per cent awards on the number of entries made. In Chicago in 1893, Canada made 847 cheese entries, and obtained 736 awards, or 86 per cent of the awards on the number of exhibits. In addition to that, the quality of the cheese exhibited at Chicago by Canada was so excellent, that the standard had to be placed so high as to almost bar the United States exhibits from receiving any award. The House will see the danger that there would be to our cheese trade if something is not done to protect this country from such an attack as was made upon us a year ago by the "North British Agriculturist." We were much alarmed about that attack at the time, and I think we were justly alarmed. Perhaps it would be as well for me to give the opinions that have been expressed and the resolutions that have been passed on the subject of this Bill in different parts of this country by prominent men who thoroughly understand this business. I have here the evidence of Mr. Ballantyne, who is prominently connected with the cheese industry in western Ontario, and who is well known all over that province. He gave evidence before the committee of this House on this subject, and expressed himself as being strongly in favour of branding cheese with the date of its make, saying that he had always done so himself, and had no trouble in placing his cheese favourably upon the market. Some people undertake to say that there is a prejudice against July cheese, and others contend that July cheese is in some cases better than September cheese. In either case, is it not well to mark the cheese with the date of its make before it is placed on the market? I do not think any substantial argument has been advanced against this proposition. Now, I will give you a resolution that was passed in Ontario in 1895 on this subject. At a meeting of the Dairy Association of Western Ontario, at which were present over 800 representative factory men and farmers from the whole province, the following resolution was passed :—

Resolution passed by Dairymen's Association of Western Ontario, at Stratford, on the 15th, 16th and 17th January, 1895 :

That in view of the facts that recent reports would seem to indicate that Canadian cheese made during one month has been sold on the British market as the make of another month, therefore, be it resolved, that this Convention of Dairymen, assembled in the city of Stratford, would strongly recommend that such regulations be adopted and such laws be enacted as would compel our cheese factories to brand on each cheese the date and name of the month upon which the cheese was made.

The Dairy Association of the province of Quebec, at a meeting held at St. Hyacinthe in the same year, endorsed the resolution of the western association. Here is another resolution that was passed a short time ago by the Dairymen's Association of Western Ontario :

Moved by Hon. Thos. Ballantyne, Stratford, seconded by George Hatley, Brantford, and resolved, That this convention of dairymen assembled in the town of Woodstock would strongly recommend that such regulations be adopted and such laws be enacted as will compel our cheese factories to brand on each cheese the date and month upon which the cheese was made, and also the word "Canadian," but that no registered number nor trade mark for each factory be put upon the cheese, as we think it would result in complication and injury to the cheese trade of Canada.

What is objected to here is accepted in nearly every other section of the country, as the proper thing to do, so that every factory will stand on its own merits. It is generally felt that it will improve the standard of the cheese, when each manufacturer knows that he will be held responsible for the product of his own factory. Professor Robertson is favourable to this registration, as is also nearly every man to whom I have spoken on the subject.

You see the result of our inquiry, so far as western Ontario is concerned. I will now deal with the position of the province of Quebec on the subject. It has been said in some quarters that the people interested in this business in the city of Montreal were opposed to this proposition. I certainly understand difficulty. It has also been alleged that I said something last year reflecting on the people of Montreal; but my remarks are in "Hansard," and no man can find one word in them reflecting on the people of Montreal or the business men who are trading in cheese. I never even mentioned Montreal in my speech on the occasion referred to. At a meeting held in Montreal on the 29th of May, 1895, the following resolution was proposed and carried un-animously :—

That in view of the meeting to be held in Ottawa on Friday, May 31st, 1895, of the Select Standing Committee of the House of Commons on Agriculture and Colonization, for the purpose of securing an expression of opinion from the various Dairy Associations of Canada, this association hereby places itself on record as strongly in favour of the branding of the date of manufacture on all cheese made in Canada, such being the unanimous wish of the entire cheese trade in Great Britain, and further that this Association's Committee on the subject do proceed to Ottawa to attend the meeting mentioned above.

Now, here is another resolution which I consider a very important one, adopted by the Executive Committee of the Dairymen's Association of the province of Quebec on the 25th of February, 1896 :

Moved by Mr. Milton McDonald, M.P.P., seconded by Sydney A. Fisher, Esq., and unanimously resolved,—

1. That the Executive Committee of the Dairymen's Association of the province of Quebec, on being informed of the introduction by the Honourable the Minister of Agriculture of a Bill concerning the branding of cheese, desire it to be known :

(a.) That they are of opinion that the branding of the month of manufacture should be compulsory on both butter and cheese.

(b.) And further, that they consider this resolution as conveying the opinion of the great majority of the 1,400 members of the Dairymen's Association of the province of Quebec.

(c.) And that a copy of the above resolution be transmitted to Major R. R. McLennan, M.P., House of Commons, Ottawa.

This is a resolution moved by a leading gentleman and M.P.P. in that province, and seconded by Mr. Fisher, who is now in this House and Minister of Agriculture. The Minister of Agriculture, therefore, was evidently favourable to this proposition then, and I have no doubt he is favourable to it to-day. I have here a number of letters from people in Quebec and Ontario, in favour of this Bill, but I shall not take up the time of the House by reading them. I may say that I have spoken to the Minister of Agriculture of the province of Quebec, and that he expressed himself strongly in favour of the branding and registering Canadian cheese. I have also letters from the president and secretary of the Dairymen's Association in the province of New Brunswick, strongly endorsing the branding of the date on the cheese manufactured in this country. All the people from whom I have communications are strongly in favour of this measure. I cannot understand the objection to branding the date of manufacture on the cheese except on the ground that there are men who desire to place on the market cheese which has been manufactured in the month of July and representing it as being that manufactured in another month. Would it not be fair and honourable to pass legislation compelling us to mark the cheese so that purchasers would know exactly what they were buying. I think that I have the support of both sides of the House in this matter. I have not met any hon. gentleman in the House who could show any just reason for not branding our cheese in the way I suggest. I have representations and memorials by the dozen from Great Britain and this country in favour of this measure, which I might read to the House, but I do not think it necessary. I have read some of them before, and I am satisfied that hon. gentlemen will accept my statement when I say that I am prepared to place evidence before them which would prove beyond a doubt that the business men in the old country and in this country are in favour of this change. Out of seven or eight hundred answers from people who were consulted about this legislation, only eight per cent offered any objection at all, and in many cases the objections were not to the principle, and in others they came from parties who were personally interested in preventing this legislation taking place. Now, no matter what representations to the contrary may be made, a great deal of this cheese is kept in cold storage for some months. It is out of the hands of the manufacturers and into the hands of the speculators, who keep it until they can get a higher price. The farmer profits nothing by this, but believes that if this cheese were placed on the British market every month, it would be out of the way and better prices would rule in the spring of the year. It is kept, however, until fall and sold as a make of late date, and so much is kept that there is too much put on the market in the spring and prices are lowered, which is largely the cause of the low price received by the farmer at that season. Then so much is kept in the early season and such a quantity placed on the market in the fall that the price is equally affected at that time. A short time ago the price of cheese jumped up very suddenly, which shows that there is no strong prejudice against the July make. Parties who object to this Bill explain that the cheese made in July is better than that made in September, owing to the quality of grass, climate, atmosphere and other causes. Well, if that be the case, why should there be a prejudice against July cheese; and if such a prejudice exists, would it not be better to brand the July cheese and show the British people what a good quality we can manufacture in that month, and in this way dissipate that prejudice? The fact is, Mr. Speaker, there is no such prejudice; and if it be proper for us to place our products on the market without misrepresentation, there ought to be no objection to the measure I propose. The farmers throughout this country believe that this is in their interest. They want such legislation, they ask for it, they believe in dealing honestly, they know the British market is an important one, they know it would be ruinous to them if they lost it, they are the men most interested in this legislation, more so than we in this House are, and why should they be refused this measure of justice they so earnestly demand. Out of four or five hundred consulted in the province of Quebec, only eleven expressed themselves against it, and these were no doubt influenced by some of the men who tried to influence the late Government against doing this measure of justice. We are supposed here to legislate in the interests of the people, and I do not believe that any man in this House will try to deprive our farmers and cheese manufacturers of the justice I desire to extend to them. I do not think it is necessary for me to deal with this subject at greater length, for I am confident that both sides of this House will do what is just and right.

Mr. McMILLAN. This Bill is in the right direction. I am perfectly convinced, and have been for a considerable length of time, that it would be in the interests of the farmers to have their cheese branded with the date of manufacture. I do not propose to give any names, but may say that some of the best manufacturers and most prominent cheese-buyers believe that this should be done. As an evidence that we have been asked in times past by the people of Great Britain to do this, I may say that in 1895, the Dairy Branch of the Boards of Trade of both London and Bristol issued a circular to the cheese-makers, asking them to brand the date of manufacture upon their cheese.

This Bill is in the interest of the farmers and of the cheese-makers and of all others concerned. It is of the utmost importance that when our cheese are ready they should be put upon the English market at as early a day as possible, and it is also of the utmost importance that the buyers should know the day of the month on which the cheese was made. There is a phase of this question that we have hardly ever dealt with. While we have a large number of factories that make very superior cheese, we have some factories that make an inferior article; and I am afraid that when the cheese is not branded, the poorer qualities are bought and mixed with the superior article and put upon the market. And it would be in the interests of our best cheese-makers that our cheese should be branded not only with the day of the month, but also with the name or initials of the factory and the province. This would put the cheese-makers upon their mettle, as any cheese of inferior quality could be traced back to the maker, and it would also cause those conducting factories to be more careful in choosing their cheese-makers and in encouraging them to put a first quality of goods upon the market. When these experts from Montreal and other places were brought before the Agricultural Committee, it was clearly shown that cheese were kept over and branded with a different month than that in which they were made. That is certainly against the interests of the whole trade. If our cheese is to retain its high reputation in the English market, it must be by honestly and squarely putting our goods upon the market on their merits, so that when the cheese is of first-class quality, the buyers may know where to send again for the superior article. It was stated before the committee that our July cheese is often better than August, and often as good as September. Whether that is so or not, let our goods be placed upon the market for what they really are. The request for this Bill comes from all classes of people interested. In the province of Ontario, twice, I think, at the Dairyman's Association this matter has been brought up and without a dissenting voice they have declared that our cheese should be branded before being put upon the English market. I was in one of the departments the other day when a request was received from the country that the Government should take action in order to have the cheese branded with the month and the day of the month. Samples of our cheese are often taken from the retail shops for analysis. But it is found almost impossible to trace cheese of doubtful quality to the factory in which it was made. I think the country owes a debt of gratitude to the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) for his persistency in bringing this matter before the attention of the House, and I hope that every one who wished to favour the farmers of the country will support this Bill. A great many steps for the benefit of the farmers are proposed. This is one thing that will benefit the farmers a great deal and will not cost the country a cent. It may be said that this will disturb the cheese trade. But, if so, it will only be for a short time. I see it is one of the provisions of the Bill that the measure shall not come into force before January 1st, 1897. Before that time all cheese already bought will be worked off, and then the trade will take a new start under the law requiring the branding system to be carried out. I hope the Government will favour this measure and will have cheese branded with the month, the day of the month, the initials of the factory and the name of the province.

Mr. SPROULE. We have always shown a desire in this House, when a wish is expressed by any large class of people for legislation in their own interests, to grant that legislation, if possible. The great difficulty in many cases has been to ascertain the feelings of those interested with regard to the matter engaging attention. In this case we have had the strongest evidence that the people interested want some such Bill as this for the request for it has come from every class of our own community that is at all interested, as well as from the buyers in the old country who represent the consumers there. When this subject was being agitated about two years ago, the Agricultural Committee sent out about 2,000 circulars to representatives of the different classes interested, asking whether they desired such a Bill to become law or not. The almost unanimous reply was that they desired some such measure. I am sure that at least 90 per cent of the answers were in favour of the Bill. These answers came from the patrons of cheese factories, from manufacturers, from buyers and exporters and others connected with the trade. Then the buyers on the other side of the Atlantic have declared that some such law is needed because it has been found that cheese made in the worst season of the year is sometimes held over and then represented as having been produced in a better season. The buyers state that if this system is not stopped the reputation of our cheese in the British market will be destroyed. The purchasers in England represent the consumers there. It has been a most valuable market to us, out of which we have made a great deal of money. A large development has taken place in this trade during the last 25 years, and it has reached such proportions to-day that we cannot afford to let it be jeopardized by failure to make such provision as the hon. member proposes. Now, there is a difference of opinion as to what should be put on the cheese, but when we come to work out the details, I have no doubt we will be able to agree. It is held by all that we should put on the word "Canada" so that our cheese may not be confounded with the United States cheese. That is a matter of great importance. Then we should have put on the cheese the month in which it was made. Some say the day of the month, but it is believed by many that that would be going too much into details. Then there should be a number on the cheese by which the factory in which it is made can be ascertained, and the purchaser can ascertain from what factory it comes by inquiry in the department, and can get more of the same make if he desires. I think it is sufficient that we should make known where the cheese is made, and also the month in which the cheese was made, together with the number of the factory by which it is made. If these things are put on the cheese, I think it is all we should do. I see this Bill provides for the name of the factory, the province, the county, the parish, the lot, section and range, the nearest post office, the name of the owner, &c. In my opinion that is entirely too much to put on the cheese.

Mr. TISDALE. The hon. gentleman is mistaken, the number is to designate all that.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the three things I have mentioned are all that is necessary to put on the cheese. Now, we have of late years been adopting in this country a mode of ascertaining the minds of the people upon public questions, that is, by the referendum, or plebiscite. In my opinion there can be no more direct plebiscite than the questions that we sent out to the cheese manufacturers in a circular some two years ago. The answers are as direct as they could possibly be, and over 90 per cent of them have urged very strongly that this Parliament pass such a Bill. Some have gone so far as to blame the Government because they did not pass a Bill, and many think that such a Bill should have been passed long ago. I am sorry the hon. member who brought this Bill before Parliament two years ago, did not succeed in having it crystallized into law. In my opinion it would have done much good, and the earlier we get it now the better. The present Government have shown, as I think, an honest desire of helping the agricultural class in every way they can, and this is one way in which they can help them materially without any cost to the country. Therefore, I trust that they will assist the hon. member for Glengarry in passing this Bill through the House.

Mr. DAVIN. I have great pleasure in supporting the second reading of this Bill. I will, however, suggest to the hon. gentleman that when we get into committee there is a slight verbal change which should be made in the interest of the North-west Territories. As the section is worded, it only provides for branding the names of provinces on the cheese. It will not be news, I am sure, to the hon. gentleman who has this Bill in charge, to be told that in the North-west Territories we produce the best butter in Canada, and some of the best cheese; and I would suggest the verbal change that the letters "N.W.T." be branded on the cheese from that section of the country.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

PROTECTION OF RAILWAY EMPLOYEES.

Mr. MACLEAN moved the second reading of Bill (No. 4) for the better protection of employees of railway companies. He said: The Bill which I have the honour of bringing before the House to-night is similar to the one I introduced two sessions ago. It is introduced by me at the request, not only of the railway men who live in my constituency, but of the railway men throughout Canada. There is to-day in session in Ottawa a convention of railway men representing six thousand employees who endorse this Bill and desire it to become law. It provides, in brief, for two things: that after the year 1900 every railway company in this country shall provide all their trains with, first, an automatic coupler, and second, an air brake. We know now that the great loss of life of railway men in this country and in the United States, has been owing to the absence of these two things; and so strongly has this been realized in the United States, that they have passed a similar law and it is now in operation, and three years from this time the railways there must provide automatic couplers and air brakes on every train. The railway men in this country think it only just, and think it is in their interest, that they should have a similar law here. The only objection to this Bill, so far as I can gather, is made by railway companies, and it is to this effect, that if they are compelled within four or five years to change the equipment of trains, they will be at the mercy of the men who own the patent on the air brake and on the automatic coupler. But I am told that if they are given five years in which to make the change, they will not be at the mercy of the companies who own these inventions, and that if they equip a certain number every year, the amount of money they will save from the loss of their cars and engines, and the money they will save from having to pay for the loss of life, will make up what it costs them to change the equipment. But what is more to the point is this, that the Intercolonial Railway, which is owned by the Government of this country, has recognized the necessity of changing their equipment, and are doing it now. Last session when we had this Bill up, the representatives of the Canadian Pacific Railway attended the Railway Committee and informed us that the Canadian Pacific Railway had appropriated $300,000 for this very purpose, at their last annual meeting; and I believe that the Grand Trunk Railway is similarly disposed. If that is the case, we do not wish to introduce any legislation that would be harsh in its workings on the railways, but we desire to give them a fair opportunity to convert their equipment on the lines of this Bill; and I hope that the Government and the Minister of Railways—and I am sorry he is not in his place to-night—will see his way to making a declaration that they recognize the principle contained in the Bill and will assist in having it become law. The Bill is certainly within the jurisdiction of Parliament; it has been very carefully drawn, and while it has not been approved by the railway companies, they say they have no opposition to it on other grounds than that to which I referred a few moments ago. That being the case, I hope the Bill will get its second reading to-night and be referred to the Railway Committee, where any improvements may be made, and that it will become law this session. I have brought this question up three or four years, and I have called the attention of Parliament to the demands made by the country for improvement in our railway legislation. I have brought up on several occasions Bills in the direction of improving our railway laws. So far we have made very little progress; but this is a new Parliament. We have here many new members, fresh from their constituencies, and in the late elections these railway questions were discussed; and that being the case, I trust Parliament will seriously consider, not only this Bill I now propose, but other railway Bills which will be submitted at an early date, and I specially ask the leader of the House and the Minister of Railways to let the country know what the intention of the Government is in regard to measures of so great importance as this measure, of which I have now the honour of moving the second reading.

Mr. DAVIN. This matter is one entirely in the hands of the Government. If this Bill passes its second reading, then there will be a motion submitted and adopted, to refer it to the Railway Committee, and we know that the wishes of the Government will obtain in that committee. In 1891, I had a Bill on the Order paper, including, among other provisions, like provisions to those in the first two clauses of the present Bill. The Bill passed its second reading and went to the Railway Committee, and out of the Railway Committee it did not come very successfully. Once a railway Bill gets into the chops of the channel of the Railway Committee, the private member in charge of it is pretty helpless, unless the Government signify their intention of taking hold of the measure. So, unless the Government will take this Bill up, I am afraid the hon. member for York (Mr. Maclean) will have very little chance of seeing it passed into law. But, as that hon. gentleman said, we have a new Parliament and a new Government, and, as the leader of the Government has spoken more than once before the elections on railway matters, perhaps he will declare the policy of the Government. If the Government will take up this Bill, there will be no difficulty in passing it through its second reading, sending it to the Railway Committee, bringing it back to this House and sending it triumphantly on its way. I have much pleasure in supporting the Bill of my hon. friend.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I quite remember, as was stated a moment ago by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), that this Bill has been more than once before Parliament already, and I remember, as well, that on every occasion it elicited more or less opposition from the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale). I do not know, as now we have a new Parliament, and that hon. gentleman sits on the other side of the House, whether he is still of the same opinion, or whether he has changed his opinion. So far as the Government is concerned, I will surprise nobody in regard to this matter, if I say that the Government does not think it advisable to make this a Government measure. It is a question on which there is a good deal to say on both sides. I fully apprehend and recognize that the motive of the Bill is purely humanitarian, and that motive alone is worthy of consideration. On the other hand, the great railway corporations have shown that there are to the carrying out of this idea several objections which cannot lightly be set aside. The best suggestion for dealing with this question is the one made by the mover of the Bill: to have it referred to the Railway Committee. That is the best place to have the question thoroughly threshed out. I apprehend that the idea which is at the basis of the Bill is a right one after all, and that, sooner or later, it will become law. The question, in my estimation, so far as I understand it, is whether the time has arrived when such legislation should be placed on the statute-book. The Railway Committee, I repeat, is the best place where this subject can be threshed out, and so I assent to the second reading of the Bill, with a view to having it referred to that committee.

Mr. TISDALE. I have no objection to again state the reasons why I oppose this Bill, but it will not be necessary to repeat the lengthy remarks I offered on a former occasion, because they will be in the recollection of some hon. members of this House. On the last occasion this Bill was introduced I opposed the principle. I quite agree with the suggestion thrown out by the leader of the Government, that the Railway Committee is the better place to fight out this issue, if it has to be fought out again. The whole principle of the Bill was very carefully considered on a former occasion, not on the Bill introduced by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), but on a Bill introduced by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey). Regarding that Bill, the Railway Committee had no less than three meetings, and that occurred only one year ago. The feeling of a large majority of the members of the committee, after full discussion had taken place, was in opposition to the Bill. The two principal reasons why I think it is not desirable to adopt this Bill are these: In the first place, the provision respecting automatic couplers is, as was shown to the committee, largely in the interest of gentlemen who have such devices to sell. The great railway corporations of Canada and the United States, between whom there is a constant interchange of traffic, and accordingly the adoption of a new system in one country ahead of its adoption in another country would cause serious inconvenience, have their own mechanical experts to examine improvements, and so soon as it is demonstrated that a certain device will save life or property, then the companies adopt it. They have men who understand these subjects thoroughly. It is in the interest of the companies themselves, and this is a stronger force than any proposed legislation, to adopt the latest kind of couplings or other inventions as soon as possible. The reason that can fairly be urged against the other provisions of the Bill is that this would be an interference with the heads of all the departments of these railway companies, from the general manager down, and an attempt to deprive them of their own judgment of their skilled assistants. My experience is, and it is experience of every business man, that it is better to bring employer and employee together, and seek to induce the great railway corporations to adopt improvements, rather than to attempt to force their adoption by legislation passed from session to session. I shall not make any very lengthy remarks, because the matter has been extensively discussed in this House, and as has been remarked, we had it before us so long ago as 1891. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) would seem, judging from his remarks, to say that when these Bills go before the Railway Committee they are throttled here. Well, I can say, Mr. Speaker, after nine years experience as an active member of the Railway Committee, that things that ought to pass there cannot be throttled. I reject the argument of the hon. gentleman, and if I were to express my own sentiments I would probably use a stronger word than characterize it as an argument. That Railway Committee is a credit to this House and to this country. Its capacity, its fairness, its fearlessness are such that any country in the world might be proud of it. I am speaking now as a member of the Opposition, and I shall preserve my high opinion of the Railway Committee until I get good reasons to change it. If the hon. the leader of the Government had not asked me to express my opinion here, I would have waited until the Bill got to the Railway Committee, when I would offer any remarks which I had to make on it. If the Bill goes to the Railway Committee, I believe it will get fair play there. I appeal to hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House who have been members of the Railway Committee—and I appeal to them more strongly because there are so many new members here—to endorse my opinion of that committee. I speak from my own knowledge as an active member of it, and I say that no tribunal in Great Britain or in the United States or in any free country is more independent, more fair, more honest and outspoken, and more just than is the Railway Committee of this House of Commons.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer a few remarks in regard to some of the arguments of my hon. friend (Mr. Tisdale). In the first place, I regard the principle of the Bill as correct. I cannot agree with the hon. member (Mr. Tisdale) that as soon as railway companies find these inventions valuable for saving life and property, they will adopt them without compulsion. The principle obtains all over the world of compelling people by legislation to protect life and property. In mills and factories it is provided that there must be fire escapes, and that there must be protection of machinery, and all such legislation as that is in the line of compulsion, because it has been found that where employers of labour have to incur certain expense, they will not voluntarily adopt those precautions. So it is with the railway companies. There is no doubt that many railway companies are employing these devices to-day, and the air brake, we know, is found more or less upon every railroad in Canada. But at the same time they are not using it to the extent they ought to for the safety of employees. I do not regard it as out of place, that the law should compel railway companies to do this, any more than I regard it as out of place to compel manufacturers to erect fire escapes and to place guards on their machinery. We know that human life is being sacrificed almost every day, and that families are left in mourning and distress, and so far as we are aware, that is because in a great many cases railway companies will not incur the expense of supplying these modern appliances. If you give the railway companies a reasonable time to provide these equipments I do not see how it can be at all improper that we should force them to do so by law. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Tisdale) says that most of these devices are patented, and that therefore this legislation would place the railway companies at the mercy of the patent owners. Why, the railway companies are buying out the patent rights to-day, and if as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tisdale) says, the railway companies are ready always to adopt any device that is found valuable, the fact that the invention might be patented ought be no hindrance whatever to adopting it. We should not allow a small outlay to stand in the way of the protection of life and property. There is no doubt that this might be an inconvenience to the railways, but at the same time it would be a great advantage to the employees of the road, and to the travelling public. If we pass this legislation and give the railway companies time to make the changes, I have no doubt that in a short time they will themselves see the desirability of carrying out the law. I know that the railway people have so expressed themselves before the Railway Committee. They have not objected to the Bill very seriously, and they have agreed to provide most of the appliances set forth in the Bill; although they have conceded that somewhat reluctantly it is true. I believe that we could go the whole length of this Bill without doing them any great injustice.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the business that comes before our Railway Committee, and I refer to it only because the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tisdale) has left the impression on this House, and through this House on the country, that every question is considered independently by that committee, and that the result is a fair verdict of what would be the opinion of members of that committee individually. That has not been my experience, and I have been on that committee for 18 years. It is a fact that in that committee, as in every committee in this House, and sometimes in the House itself; where large interests are at stake, where large corporations have their friends there, and take that interest in their own business which they ought to do; make a canvass of the House to try and secure as much opposition to it as possible;—not improperly in some respects because they try to convince the members by argument—but they can always have their friends together there, they can always have the exponents of their views well to the front; they are able at all times to get the ear of the Government, because they are large corporations financially, commercially and otherwise; while on the other hand, the independent public have not their forces arrayed in such a way as to make out their case as strongly as these corporations. Therefore, many questions that come before that committee are dealt with, and decided in a way that I have often thought, if the independent judgment of the members were allowed to be exercised with regard to it without any of these influences bearing upon them, the verdict would be entirely different from what it has been in many instances. Therefore it is not improper that we should draw attention to it, and when it comes before that committee that we should fight it out as best we can. We do think sometimes in that committee that Bills are throttled, Bills which would be valuable to the country, and which would serve the purpose aimed at when they were introduced in the House, if they were allowed to become law.

Mr. LISTER. Mr. Speaker, I cannot allow the statements made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) to pass unchallenged. In the first place, he publicly states in this House, that the members of the Railway Committee are not impartial; that they are influenced—

Mr. SPROULE. I made no such statement whatever, and I do not wish the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lister) to attempt to say that I used language which I did not.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) said that members of the Railway Committee were partial, where the interests of large corporations were involved.

Mr. SPROULE. I never used the word "partial," or "impartial" either.

Mr. LISTER. And, he furthermore said that members of Parliament were exponents of railway companies. He said that members of the Government were influenced.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. As I understand the rules of this House, when an hon. member denies having made a statement, the hon. gentleman has a right to accept the denial, and no hon. member of this House has a right to attribute words to another hon. member that he did not use.

Mr. SPEAKER. Of course, the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) will accept the statement of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) as to any language he used on the floor of the House.

Mr. LISTER. I accept the ruling of the Chair, of course, in all circumstances. I keep my own ideas, however.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member must frankly accept the statement of the hon. member for East Grey.

Mr. LISTER. Certainly, Mr. Speaker, I will do so, if you so rule. My hon. friend went on to say—and perhaps he will deny this—that if the independent judgment of the members were allowed to be exercised, the decision of the Railway Committee oftentimes would be different. Now, I want to say here that I agree entirely with the statement made by my hon. friend from South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) in the opinion that there is no committee of the House of Commons more independent than that same Railway Committee; and I have no hesitation in saying, as one who has attended regularly the meetings of that committee, and taken an active interest in its work, that, so far as I can remember now, it has always acted in the best interests of all parties, regardless of particular interests; and I think that the statements of my hon. friend who last spoke unjustly reflect upon the action of that committee. I challenge the accuracy of those statements. Of course, I will leave the late Government to speak for itself. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, what sort of influence has been brought to bear on the late Government. I do know, as a matter of fact, that that Government has been guilty, very often indeed—and no doubt the hon. gentleman speaks by the book when he says so—of most extraordinary transactions. I cannot say what influences the railway companies of this country have brought to bear upon the members of that Government, either collectively or individually. It is not for me to say; I can only conjecture. The hon. gentleman probably can speak from knowledge of the facts; and when he gets up in this House and tells Parliament and the country at large that that Government has been improperly influenced by large railway corporations to allow legislation to go through this House that otherwise should not have received its sanction, we are bound to accept his statement.

Mr. SPROULE. I object to the hon. gentleman attributing such language to me. I did not say that the Government was improperly influenced by railway corporations or any other corporations, or the committee either.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman says he made no such statement. I am bound, Mr. Speaker, to accept the ruling that you have already made; and if the hon. gentleman says that he did not make the statement, notwithstanding the fact that I recorded it when it was made, I am bound to accept his denial. Members of the Government have been influenced, we are told—these are the words. I say this is the most grave charge that can be made in Parliament against the late Government. I say it verifies and justifies to the fullest the charges that have been made by the party on this side of the House when in Opposition, that that Government has been sacrificing the interests of the people of the country for the benefit of the railway corporations of Canada. Is it possible that a gentleman so faithful to the party which he has been following for so many years—which he had to leave for a short time, though he has gone back again—is it possible that a gentleman so deep in the confidence of the late Government, could make such a statement as this? Can it be questioned? I say, Sir, that it is the most remarkable statement I have heard while in Parliament by a supporter of a political party supposed to know the inside workings of the Government of which he was such a supporter, and to which he was so near. I think it is unfortunate, for the hon. gentleman's own sake that, knowing this for eighteen years, he has supported the Government and has never taken the public into his confidence. It is almost incredible that a gentleman should get up in this House and charge the Government of which he was a supporter with having been influenced by railway corporations to pass laws not in the interest of the people of this country, and that he should have kept that fact in his own bosom for eighteen long years, and never have taken the public into his confidence.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. LISTER. I am in order, I hope, physically and every other way. Now, I think that the hon. gentleman who has introduced this Bill is entitled to the thanks of a very large, important, influential and respectable section of people, the railway men of Canada. The hon. gentleman introduced this Bill once or twice before; but, unfortunately for himself, perhaps unfortunately for the interests involved, he did not introduce it, or at least did not press it, until it was too late in the session to have it passed into law or thoroughly and properly considered. The Parliament of Canada has a right, so far as lies in its power, to protect the lives of the railway men, whose lives are so imperilled every time they go out on a train. The Bill which my hon. friend has introduced is certainly in the right direction, and I am glad to congratulate him on having introduced it thus early in the session, thus enabling Parliament to give it that proper care and consideration which the importance of the measure deserves. My hon. friend is probably aware that the difficulties which railway companies have contended in the past have been in the way of carrying out the reforms proposed by this law, have been to some extent removed. The chief difficulty heretofore has been that one car would be of a certain height and another car of a different height, so that it was impossible to put on the couplers provided for in this measure. But under the law of the United States, as it is to-day, all railway companies whose cars run in the United States are bound within a certain time to have the cars of equal height. So that the difficulty which the railway companies complained of heretofore is now obviated, inasmuch as the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway, whose cars go into the United States, have to comply with the law of that country, which requires all railway cars to be of uniform height. The difficulties which confronted the railway companies in applying a patent coupler have thus been removed to a certain extent by that law, and I can see no reason why a similar law should not be passed by this legislature. I can see no reason, moreover, why the patent coupler should not be applied to all cars belonging to railway companies in Canada. It is time the old brake should be abandoned. This Bill provides for an air brake. So far as I have been able to see, there are no great difficulties in the way of applying an air brake to a freight train any more than to a passenger train, and the statistics prove that many of the most serious accidents which happen to railway employees are due to the old brake. These employees are exposed to all sorts of weather. They have to do their work from the top of a car, under most perilous conditions, and I do not think that the railway companies are called upon to do too much if the legislature compels them to apply an air brake, because the application of that brake will save many honest men's lives. I think that the Bill is one which should be well considered by Parliament. I think that these men who are interested in having this legislation placed upon the statute-book should have an opportunity of being heard. I think the railway companies should also have an opportunity of being heard, and I have no doubt that the Railway Committee will take proper steps to inform itself as to what should be done and what difficulties stand in the way. I do not see any sound reason why the provisions of this Bill should not become law, both in the interests of the railway men of Canada and the railway companies themselves.

Mr. OLIVER. I would like to say a few words in support of this Bill and in reply to the hon. gentleman who spoke on the other side. It seems to me that when he puts the question of the rights of the railway companies against the lives of the citizens of this country, no matter to what side the railway companies should lean, there can be no question as to the side this House should take. Let the railway company take care of its interests, but this House is charged with the interests of the citizens of this country. It is an established fact, that there is from day to day and year to year great loss of life on the railways of this country—and there is much greater loss incurred than is generally known, for it is a well established fact that accidents on railways very frequently do not get into the papers. This House has certainly a duty to perform, and the property which is involved appears to me but a small part of the consideration compared with the lives that are at stake. If it is a fact that the condition of the railways in the United States at present is not favourable to this law being adopted in Canada, the other argument holds that when the United States puts in force the law that it has already adopted, it will be just as necessary that Canada should adopt the same law; as it would be perhaps impracticable or difficult to have different law here from that of the United States. We know that in the United States large corporations have certainly quite as great an advantage in dealing with legislative bodies as they have in this country, and if in that country they are compelled to adopt means necessary for the safety of life and limb, that is one of the things in which we will be justified in following the example of our neighbours, although I am not one of those who hold that in the United States everything is right. Where they set a good example, it certainly would be poor policy on our part not to follow it, especially when the circumstances almost compel us to follow whether or no. As to the good will of the railway companies prompting them to act in the interests of their people; although the experience of the hon. gentleman who has spoken may have given him reason to speak in that way, the experience of most of us who have had to deal with railways, is not in that direction. We do not find that they pay much attention to our interests. We find, in fact, that they do not seem, in many cases, to consider their own interests. We find that they do not even protect themselves when they are not protecting us, for they might go further in protecting us and thereby help themselves. This is so far from being a matter that we can leave entirely to the self-interest of the companies that it is the last matter we can possibly leave to their self-interest. I do not know what has been the fate of this Bill in the past, but it certainly seems to me that it reflects very little credit on the gentlemen who sat in the last Parliament, and particularly those who were on the Government side, if they refused to allow such a Bill as this to become law, particularly for any reason that has been advanced against it to-night. I am not a railroad man myself, and most of us here are not, but if the second reading of the Bill is agreed to, then it goes to the Railway Committee—which is something so fearful and wonderful and mysterious. But at any rate, it is a committee whose business it is to make perfect any Bill which is submitted to it, and see that the clauses of the measure carry out the idea on which it is founded. That being the case, the least we can do is to send this Bill up to the Railway Committee, which is one of the largest committees of the House, and the responsibility will rest upon us who are in favour of the Bill, and who are on that committee to see that it will go through that committee and be put through this House. It is a strange way of dealing with the matter to say that because this or the other committee did not do its duty, it will not do it in the future. These committees are composed of members of the House, and if any committee does not do its duty, it is a portion of the House which has failed in its duty, and the responsibility is on the members of that committee just as much as if they had failed to do their duty in this House. This is a case of life against property, and there is only one course for hon. members who, in this House, are supposed to represent life rather than property, for it was votes and not accumulations of wealth that sent us here. We are put here by the people, and it is our business to protect the interests of all classes of the people, including the railroad men, and even if the interest that is against them is a railroad corporation.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

ALIEN LABOUR.

Mr. TAYLOR moved second reading of Bill (No. 5) an Act to prohibit the importation and immigration of foreigners and aliens under contract or agreement to perform labour in Canada. He said: Mr. Speaker, this Bill, as printed, is the same as the Bill that I introduced in 1890, and is an exact copy of the law in force in the United States against aliens and foreigners. When I first introduced it, it was referred to a committee to collect evidence and report. That committee met, called witnesses from the different provinces, examined them, and made a report, which reads as follows:—

Your committee find, on examination, that this Bill is similar in all respects to a Bill passed by the Congress of the United States in 1885, and amended by that body in 1886.

Your committee have had before them witnesses from different points along the frontier, and find from their evidence (copy of which is annexed hereto) that the American Alien Labour

Law has been enforced in such a way as to compel many of our people to relinquish their employment in the United States, or to remove with their families, and reside there permanently, while citizens of the United States are permitted to work in Canada every day, and to return to their homes on the American side of the frontier at night, without interference from the Canadian authorities.

Your committee recommend that the attention of the authorities at Washington be directed to the oppressive application to Canadians of the American Alien Labour Law, and to allow of such representations being made, and to afford time for its due consideration, recommend that further consideration of this Bill be postponed until next session; and if some suitable measure for granting relief to Canadians from the grievance complained of be not passed in the interval by the American authorities, then your committee recommend that a Bill dealing with this question be introduced next session, and taken into consideration.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

GEORGE TAYLOR,
Chairman.

In the following session I introduced the same Bill, but correspondence was then in progress between the Canadian Government and the American authorities at Washington with the view to having the Alien Labour law amended so as to make it less objectionable to Canadians. These negotiations, as I understood, have terminated, without the Americans withdrawing or relaxing their law in any way. On the contrary, they have so amended their law as to make it very much more objectionable. I have here a copy of the amended law, and I will just read one section. I propose, if this Bill is, as I hope it will be, referred to a special committee, to amend it in such a way as to make it acceptable to the House. This clause of the American law will be embodied in this Bill:

Be it enacted, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled.

That it shall be unlawful for any citizen or resident of the United States to enter into contract or agreement, express or implied, with any alien or aliens to perform labour or service of any kind in the United States; and all contracts or agreements, express or implied, made in the United States or any foreign country, by or between any citizen or resident of the United States, and any alien or aliens, prior to said alien or aliens having acquired a permanent domicile in the United States, shall be deemed misdemeanours, and shall, on conviction, be punishable by a fine of one thousand dollars, or by imprisonment for one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment, for every such offence.

The PRIME MINISTER. When was this passed?

Mr. TAYLOR. Last year. As the law now stands, it is impossible for a person to perform labour for pay in the United States without first becoming a resident in that country. I have received a letter dated St. Catharines, 7th September, 1896, which reads as follows:—

Mr. Taylor, M.P.

Sir,—I must congratulate you on bringing forward your Alien Bill before the House of Commons again. Hoping you will carry it through this time. At Niagara Falls and Buffalo, DeBarry has made it a misdemeanour for a Canadian to go there and apply for work.

Yours respectfully,
JAMES BROWN,
Box 46, St. Catharines.

I have also received letters from two large lumbering firms in the west. One of these is from Hamilton, and is as follows :—

Hamilton, Ont., Feb. 13th, 1896.

Mr. Taylor, M.P.,

Parliament Buildings, Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—We notice you are bringing in an "Alien Labour Bill," something on the lines of the American Alien Labour Law, and hope you will succeed in getting it through the House during the present session as it is but just and right that these laws should work both ways or not at all. We are making square and waney timber in Ohio and Michigan and could supply 500 Canadian axemen if allowed to do so, and would prefer them to the men we are forced to take over there as the Canadians are natural timber makers and the Americans are not, but we are prevented from giving a single Canadian employment on our export timber over there, while the Americans are natural saw-log men and hundreds of them are employed in Canada, particularly in the Parry Sound district, Muskoka, Algoma and Nipissing, and many of our best Canadian axemen are left home idle when we could give them employment at $50 per month for six months of the year if permitted to do so. * * * * * Should you desire any further information, we would be pleased to furnish all the particulars that our experience has brought to our notice, and are sure every timber man in the Dominion will give you any assistance they can, as they all know the injury it is to our Canadian workmen to be deprived of the privilege of getting employment in the United States, while the Americans have free access to any employment that is going here. Hoping you will be successful in preserving for our workmen equal chance with the United States workmen.

Yours truly,
J. & W. FLAT.

I have another letter of a similar character from a firm in Simcoe, Messrs. McColl & McBirney. When I introduced this Bill, it had very few sympathisers, from the fact that the Alien Labour law of the United States had not been enforced against Canadians so rigidly as it has been in later years. The evidence collected in this report proves that in some places, particularly in New Brunswick, hundreds of Americans living in the United States come across into Canada, perform their day's labour and return at night, while not a single Canadian can go over from our side to work for a single day, and any who attempt to do so are driven home. That was the evidence brought out there, and so all along the line. I think this Bill should be referred to a special committee of the whole House, in order to amend our law so that a foreigner, in order to perform labour in Canada, must have his domicile in Canada. All along our frontier, Americans who sleep at home in the United States and eat breakfast there, may take their dinner with them and perform a day's labour in Canada, and go home again at night; while the same privilege is not accorded to Canadians who go there to work. Since introducing this Bill this session, I have received letters and petitions from labour organizations all over the country, complaining of this injustice. When it was first introduced, it appeared to have very few sympathisers in the House, but to-day hon. gentlemen on both sides have asked me if I intended to go on with it and press it to a conclusion this session. My answer has been, Yes. This is not a party question, and should not be treated as such: it is one to protect the workmen of Canada and should receive the support of both sides of the House. I have been promised that support, and I propose to press the Bill to a conclusion, if the majority of the House are favourable to it.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I fully acknowledge the great importance, or, at all events, the relative importance, of the Bill which has just been explained by my hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Taylor). I must say at once that as far as the principle of the Bill is concerned, I think it is in some respects objectionable. It is certainly at variance with those views of public contracts and the comity of nations which should exist amongst civilized nations. On the other hand, I am fully conscious, also, that in all the border towns in Canada there is great discontent now prevailing, and prevailing with cause, as to the operation of the Alien Labour law which exists on the other side of the line. The principle of the law which exists on the other side of the line, is exactly the same as the principle of this Bill; in fact, the only reason which can be adduced by the hon. gentleman, or by anybody, for supporting such legislation, is that it is altogether of a retaliatory character. I suppose that my hon. friend would not press this Bill, if the American authorities were willing to withdraw their Bill. I must say that I quite agree with him that the character of the American legislation is very unfriendly and very offensive to us. It cannot be defended upon any principle that I know of. For my part, whenever I come into contact with gentlemen having any—I will not say authority on the other side—but having any view of their own on the legislation which prevails in that country, I have never failed to tell them that in my estimation this law is a blot upon the legislation of the United States. Well, if such a law is a blot on the legislation of the American nation, there is no escaping the conclusion that, if we adopt the same principle, we impose a similar blot upon our own legislation. It is true that people are sometimes constrained to do, in self-defence, things which they would not do otherwise. I may say that, from that point of view, I am, to a large extent, in sympathy with my hon. friend who introduced this measure; and it may be that we may be forced, simply as a measure of self-defence, and to protect our own labourers, to resort to a measure similar to the one which is now advocated. Everybody must also admit that in the town of Windsor, for instance, or in any border town, when a Canadian labourer goes to the other side of the river and is forced back simply because, as a Canadian, he has been engaged by an American contractor, it is certainly galling to him if an American labourer is brought back and finds work in Windsor. Therefore, I am disposed to view with some favour the Bill of my hon. friend. But I will claim the privilege of asking him not to proceed further at the present time. The hon. gentleman has stated, what I was not aware of, that correspondence has taken place between the American authorities and the Canadian authorities upon this subject; and, before the hon. gentleman proceeds further with this Bill, I think it would be advisable for the Government to look into this correspondence and see whether it is not possible to avoid such unfriendly legislation. But if, after having taken cognizance of this correspondence, we find there is no way of escaping the conclusion to which my hon. friend has arrived, I will give him every opportunity at the next sitting of the House to press his Bill, if he thinks proper. Therefore, I will move the adjournment of the debate.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I quite agree with the hon. leader of the Government as to what he calls the great relative importance of this measure. There can be no doubt at all that, situated as Canada is, with some five millions of people along side a great population of seventy millions or thereabouts, all the advantages of reciprocal intercourse across the border are eminently on the side of the larger population, and the hardship is very much greater when the smaller population are denied in the adjoining country the advantages which are freely offered to the citizens of the United States in Canada. I am sure no person who is at all aware of the circumstances which have been brought under the notice of my hon. friend the mover of this Bill (Mr. Taylor), can fail to be impressed with the very great temptation that is presented to the Canadian Parliament to adopt legislation which shall, so far as possible, protect the people of Canada from the injury that is inflicted upon them by the free entrance of American citizens into Canada for the purpose of performing labour of every description without let or hindrance, while the Canadian, on the other hand, when he crosses the border, is met with exclusion. I must say that that is legislation of an intolerable character, and is calculated to inspire a very strong feeling of retaliation. The hon. the First Minister says, and says truly, that the existence of this legislation is a great blot upon the statutes of that country. I quite agree with that sentiment, and I feel that it is legislation that is unworthy of so great a country as the United States; but I do not quite agree with my hon. friend that it would be an equally serious blot upon the legislation of Canada, if we passed a similar measure in order to protect ourselves from the great injustice to which Canada is now subjected. It is one thing for a country to initiate and enact legislation of that kind, and a very different thing for the parties who suffer under that legislation to enact similar legislation in order to protect themselves. But I feel very strongly that all retaliatory measures ought to be avoided, and that it is perhaps not the wisest way of obtaining that which we all desire, namely, friendly and cordial relations with the great people alongside of us. Under the circumstances, while I feel legislation of this kind would be quite justifiable on the part of Canada, I agree with the suggestion of the First Minister, that every means for the removal of this difficulty by diplomatic intercourse should first be exhausted. I am quite certain that my hon. friend and the Government will address themselves to that task in the most earnest manner, and I hope with success, and that the Parliament of Canada will not feel itself impelled to adopt a course that seems absolutely indispensable in the protection of the interests of our people. I trust, therefore, that my hon. friend the mover of the Bill will accept the suggestion of the First Minister, that the Government shall be allowed full opportunity for using their utmost exertions to remove this difficulty that is attempted to be met by this measure before it is necessary to proceed with it further.

Mr. TAYLOR. I may just say that I propose to offer a suggestion to the First Minister, and if it is not accepted by him, I will accept his suggestion. My idea was this, that the Bill might be referred to a special committee, which might look into the legislation, and not necessarily proceed with the Bill, while at the same time the Government would be conducting their inquiries and looking over the correspondence which has taken place. I also propose to modify the Bill and limit it to one section, which would read something like this: All foreigners or aliens before they perform labour in Canada for any person or persons for salary or other remuneration shall be a bona fide resident of Canada, and shall be domiciled and have residence here during the time of his or her employment. I think a simple Bill embodying that proposition would cover the whole ground. I will suggest a committee of two members from each province to be appointed to look into American legislation, with instructions to frame a Bill on this line or some other, and to report to the House at a later session, as the First Minister stated he thought it inadvisable that we should proceed this session. I desire to refer to another matter, and it is this. We have had a good deal of difficulty on the River St. Lawrence in the section known as the Thousand Island district. The American authorities, acting under the Alien Labour Law, refused our oarsmen permission to ply to and fro between their parks, and would not allow them to row Americans who came there for pleasure, rest and fishing; in fact they would not allow them to take tourists in their boats from the American side into Canadian waters to fish.

Mr. LISTER. You settled that by issuing a proclamation.

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, I issued a proclamation. I sent word to the hotel-keepers on the American side that if this state of affairs was going to continue, American visitors could not fish in Canadian waters.

The PRIME MINISTER. That was an abuse of the law, it was not enforcing the Alien Labour Law.

Mr. TAYLOR. The result of the proclamation was that a deputation went from Alexandria Bay and Clayton to Washington, and made representations that if their guests were not allowed to fish in Canadian waters, they might as well close the hotels; and so instructions came from Washington to permit a violation of the law and not prevent Canadians going over to the American side. Negotiations were opened a year or two ago between the American and Canadian Governments to have an international park established between Kingston and Prescott as a common fishing resort among the islands, which would be open to the people of the United States and Canada as well, and where there would be no enforcement of the Alien Labour law. A deputation of Congressmen came to Ottawa, and met the Minister of Marine and Fisheries with a few representative men, and a basis of agreement was drawn up and entered into under which legislation was to be passed by the Canadian authorities and the American authorities, and one of the conditions stipulated in that agreement was that the Washington authorities were to withdraw the enforcement of the Alien Labour law within the district named, between Ogdensburg and Cape Vincent. The gentlemen from the United States said it might be possible to get an amendment to the law to apply simply to that section of our country, but the idea of repealing or meddling with their Alien Labour law was impossible, for such a measure could not be passed through Congress. The result is that although an agreement was then entered into between the Canadian authorities and the American authorities respecting the fishing at the International Park, the legislation to be passed, which was an amendment to the Alien Labour law, has not been passed by Congress in regard to that territory, and I doubt whether it ever will be passed. I offer this suggestion to the First Minister: If he will permit this Bill to be referred to a special committee, that committee might be moving conjointly with the hon. gentleman, and while he was carrying on negotiations, they might decide on this Bill in some amended form or another Bill covering the point to which I have referred. If this proposition is not acceptable to the hon. gentleman, I will readily yield to the suggestion made by him.

Mr. WALLACE. I think the suggestion is one that will not meet with the approbation of the people of this country. We have been waiting long, and on every occasion we have waited and expostulated with the authorities of the United States they have made their laws more stringent. It will be remembered that when the Alien Labour law was passed, it was stated it would not apply to Canada. It has applied to Canada, and the interpretation put upon it from time to time either by the legal authorities of the United States Government or by the Government officials administering the law on the border, have been more stringent each year. I think it has now reached that stage when waiting will not do any good. As to the proposition made by the Prime Minister, that negotiations will probably take place between the two Governments, and those negotiations will perhaps tend to remove the difficulties occasioned by this Alien Labour law, in my opinion the negotiations would be more effective and more productive of good results if the United States authorities found we had an alien labour law on the statute-book, identical with their law. As it stands now, we can only go to them and threaten, declaring that if you do not remove this law we will place a similar law on the statute-book of Canada; but if we had that law on our statute-book to-day we would be in a different position. As the leader of the Opposition has very properly stated, it is a different question adopting retaliatory legislation of this character by one country, and another country adopting similar legislation in self-defence. We are proposing to adopt it in self-defence, in protecting our men along the boundary, and in order to maintain our dignity as a great nation. For these reasons I consider the time has now arrived when Canada should place a Bill of this kind on the statute-book of the country. I am glad to see that the Premier and the leader of the Opposition are practically agreed as to the desirability of something being done, if not to-day at the next session of Parliament; and as the Government do not propose to pass any legislation this session, and as next session will be called very shortly, it should be clearly understood by this House that if negotiations are not conducted with good results before next session, Parliament will be prepared to pass a law to protect our Canadian citizens, and one comporting with the dignity of Canada.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not think those hon. members who are interested in this proposed legislation can complain of the spirit in which the First Minister has met the proposition of my hon. friend. It is not merely in the towns immediately along the border that there is a strong feeling on this matter. One hundred and forty miles away from the border, in towns like Moose Jaw and others on the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway in the North-west Territories, there is the strongest feeling existing. Hon. gentlemen will understand how this is the case when I state that we have coming along the railway line from the United States, brakemen, conductors and employees of American railways working in Canada; and the moment that any of our Canadian citizens residing in towns on the Canadian Pacific Railway get down to the American border, that moment they are not permitted to earn money below the line. It is of course barbarous legislation. If we did not know it to be the fact, it would be incredible that an enlightened people like the people of the United States should be guilty of placing it on their statute-books. But if there is that barbarous legislation, and if our Canadian citizens are treated as they are; then if we are convinced that the people of the United States are determined to cling to this barbarous legislation, it will be for this Parliament as a matter of retaliation—while disapproving of the principle underlying such legislation—and as a matter of justice to our own people, to enact some such legislation as my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) proposes.

Mr. TISDALE. Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt from the slight attention I have given to this matter, that probably a Bill like this would interfere with the favoured-nations clause under which no doubt the United States have some rights, although perhaps something could be suggested to meet the case. I understand from the remarks made by the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition, that practically the Bill is to be deferred to another session.

Mr. TAYLOR. No, not another session, until the next meeting of the House.

Mr. TISDALE. The leader of the Government made a very reasonable request when he asked, that if there was any correspondence on the matter he should have time to look into it. If some friendly solution of the difficulty is not made with the United States, I would go as far as any man in this House in the direction of the principle involved in the Bill. I am quite satisfied that next session some law could be devised that will not interfere with any existing treaties.

Mr. TAYLOR. What treaties?

Mr. TISDALE. The favoured-nation clause in treaties with other countries in Europe, to which the United States would be entitled.

Mr. BERGERON. There cannot be any such thing. They have passed a similar law against us.

Mr. TISDALE. I think the amendment with regard to the residence might meet the difficulty. I agree with my hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace), and I am afraid that this House will have to deal with the matter. I regret it, because the people of the United States have not listened to the warnings of the discussions in this House, and which discussions have been of a very friendly character.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Mr. Speaker, I am very much gratified to know that the leader of the Government is so fully impressed with the importance of the subject under discussion. To all those members who represent frontier counties, it is a matter of more than ordinary importance. I might illustrate that by citing one case. The legislature of New York decided to erect a public building on their side of the River St. Lawrence. I know as a matter coming under my own observation, that Canadian artisans and mechanics who went across the river to obtain employment were sent back, and they were so carefully guarded to the water's edge, that they were placed on the ferry boat and watched until they left the shores of the United States. Strange to say, and in marked contrast to that conduct; the Ontario government erected the same kind of a building, an asylum, a distance of about fourteen miles from the American asylum, and American artisans and mechanics came across to the Canadian side, and were allowed to work on the Canadian building in competition with Canadian mechanics. This is a case which brought the matter very forcibly to my mind, even since the subject was under discussion before this House in 1891, when the matter was fully gone into. I rise more particularly for the purpose of impressing upon the First Minister this fact, which perhaps he has considered. It was the consensus of opinion on the part of all those who took part in the discussion when my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) first introduced his Bill in 1891, that it was not in the minds of the legislators in the United States to enforce this law in the spirit in which it was enacted. If we read the second clause of the Bill introduced by my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor)—which is exactly similar to the clause of the United States act, except that the word "American" is substituted for "Canadian"—we find that the spirit of the Act was directed against contracts made for the importation of foreign labour into the United States. Here is where the United States have, in my humble opinion, interpreted this law contrary to its spirit and its meaning. A man who goes from this side of the river to the United States in search of employment finds himself denied employment. That I have known to be true in the case of Mr. DuBarry the officer of the United States government at Buffalo. But, failing to convict him for an offence under this Act for simply going over there to get work, they come at him in this way. If he returns home to his family on a Saturday and remains over Sunday, they say when he goes into the United States again that he has entered in pursuance of a contract previously made. The point I wish to press on the First Minister is this, that in the event of any negotiations taking place between his Government and that of the United States, which I think would be right and proper, I think the interpretation of the law which the United States officers have placed on the Act itself ought to be brought more particularly to the attention of the United States Government; and, unless there is some spirit of hostility, which I would fain believe does not exist in the United States, against this country, I think some good might be done in that direction. What we are aiming at is not the existence of the law in the United States against any other nation: because it is not enacted in any spirit of retaliation against Canada—it is enacted against the whole world: and if we could represent to the Government at Washington that that harsh interpretation is not the proper one—as, apart from my own judgment, I am informed by many Americans with whom I have talked on this subject that it is not—this Government would be accomplishing a desirable purpose without enacting legislation, which I admit would be attended with a great deal of difficulty. With regard to the amendment which the hon. member for South Leeds says has been enacted by the United States Congress, I saw the same authority that he has referred to, that is, the newspaper report; but I did not know that the law had been passed. If it has, so much the worse; but it does not render any more difficult the task which I humbly suggest the leader of the Government might undertake in his negotiations with the Washington Government. That this is a serious matter to all of us is admitted. That is shown by the report alluded to by my hon. friend who introduced the Bill. The serious part of it is that many hundreds of workingmen have left this country and become citizens of the United States by compulsion. I can only express again my gratification that the leader of the Government has been so favourably impressed with the spirit of this Bill, and I can commend the course of the hon. member for South Leeds as one likely to meet the sense of the whole House and country.

Mr. McCLEARY. Mr. Speaker, I sincerely hope that the Bill which my hon. friend from South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) has introduced to-night will not be side-tracked, as it has been in former years, and our workingmen and artisans still continued in the humiliating position of being refused a day's work in the United States, while United States workingmen and artisans are allowed the free use of our country to obtain work. I represent a county which is, I presume, affected by this question as much if not more than any other county in the Dominion. Not only are our workingmen and artisans refused admittance to the United States—that is not the grievance of which we so much complain; but the work which our workingmen and mechanics should have is taken from them by the contractors and workingmen who come across from the city of Buffalo or the city of Niagara Falls, and work during the day and cross over to the United States again at night, while our mechanics are denied any similar opportunity among our neighbours. I should be sorry to have to go back to my constituents and tell them that I had sat in a Canadian Parliament which had refused to give to our workingmen the protection to which they are entitled in this regard. I just rise to say that I hope this matter will not be dilly-dallied with or delayed, but that our workingmen and mechanics shall receive at the hands of this Parliament the consideration which they have a right to expect.

Mr. MACDONALD (Winnipeg). It was my intention to have spoken at considerable length on this subject, for it is one on which I feel so strongly that had not my hon. friend from South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) introduced this measure, I should have felt it my duty to have introduced one couched in similar terms. As the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has pointed out, this is not a question that affects merely border counties, but it also has a very great effect on any place that is a railway centre, even though it may be removed many miles from the border. For instance, take the constituency I represent, the city of Winnipeg. From that city the Northern Pacific Railway runs to the United States. At first the Canadians and Americans employed on that line in various capacities, as conductors, locomotive engineers or otherwise, had exactly the same rights and were treated in exactly the same manner. But now the Canadians find themselves heavily handicapped; for, while the Americans are allowed to take any train that may be given them, whether in the United States or Canada, the Canadians, while allowed to cross the line, are only allowed to do so under such disadvantageous conditions as render it almost impossible for them to do the work. You can hardly understand what a feeling of discontent such a state of affairs arouses and must continue to arouse if it is allowed to exist for any length of time. I was glad to hear my hon. friend the First Minister say that he agreed to a very great extent with the spirit of the measure we are now considering; although he appeared to fear it on the ground that it might involve retaliation to a certain extent. I must confess, so far as I am individually concerned, that the word "retaliation," conveys no terrors to me whatever. Personally, I am strongly in favour of the utmost freedom of labour. I should like to see the boundary line between us and the United States, in so far as labour is concerned, wiped out altogether. I should like to see the state of affairs that used to exist restored—to see our people free to go and work in the United States if they found they could get a better wage there than in Canada, and to see the citizens of the United States allowed to come to Canada and work on exactly the same terms as our own people. But unfortunately that state of affairs no longer exists. It has been done away with by no act of the Canadian people, the Canadian Parliament or the Canadian Government, but by the action of the American Congress. I must say that personally I would be strongly in favour of giving the Americans a dose of their own medicine in this respect: because I do not understand why—to use the humble phrase—what is sauce for the goose should not be sauce for the gander. I believe it would cause a much more contented feeling among our people if they knew that in this respect they were placed on exactly the same footing as the citizens of the United States. However, as I understand the First Minister to say that negotiations will be entered into with the Government of the United States to see if this unfortunate legislation cannot be removed, or at any rate be so modified as to remove the grievance under which our people are at present suffering; and as I further understand that if such negotiations fail, some measure of this sort will receive the support of the Government, so that our working classes shall no longer be allowed to remain in the disadvantageous position they at present occupy; and as I find that my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition—who, like the hon. leader of the Government has had more experience of matters of this sort than I have had—is of opinion that the desired result may be better brought about in this way than by pressing the Bill. I heartily concur in the proposition that the Bill be allowed to stand.

Mr. DYMENT. I was not aware, Mr. Speaker, that this question was coming up to-night, and consequently shall not attempt to discuss it at any length, but I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without adding my voice to that of the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) on behalf of the Canadian workingman. With the permission of the House, I would like to read a portion of a letter which I received from a gentleman, at Sault Ste. Marie, a few days ago. He says:

I took a walk along the canal yesterday with the view of finding out the number of Americans who are working on this side and living across the river. As you are aware, there is now in course of erection a residence for the superintendent of the canals. On making inquiry we found that there were nine men working on that building who cross over to the American side, night and morning, and bring their dinner in their baskets. The corner and other cut stone is being manufactured also over the river. There is also a large hotel just starting opposite the Bank of Commerce, to cost about $10,000. The work of masonry is being done by an American. These are only samples of what is being done all the time. If our men were treated in the same way we would not object, but when our men go over the river to work they are ordered out of the town. We trust that no time will be lost in stopping this thing.

Now, we have been waiting and waiting, with a good deal of patience, for the labour law of our neighbour to be amended in some way more favourable to us, but, so far as I am concerned, patience has ceased to be a virtue with regard to this matter, and I think, if we are to have any semblance of protection in this country, it ought to be given our workingmen. If not during this session, I hope that in the coming winter session, a Bill will be passed through this House, giving proper protection to our workingmen, or at least putting them on the same footing as the American workingmen occupy on the other side.

Mr. GANONG. Representing, as I have the honour to represent, a constituency lying along the American border, I should not feel that I had done my duty unless I expressed to some extent my sense of the situation in which we find ourselves at present. While I do not agree with the mover of this resolution that it should be pressed this session, I hope that it will receive due consideration in the future when I shall be able to support it. I cannot do so at present, and I will give you the reason. During the late campaign, in our county at least, we were advised that if the Liberal or Reform party got into power, we should have such reciprocal trade relations with the United States as would be most desirable for both countries. In view of this pledge, I do not wish to ask the Government to put themselves in a position in which it might be brought forward that we had passed any resolution that would cause any friction. I do not wish them to be hampered in any way. I came here as an independent Conservative, working, I trust, for the best interests of Canada, and I wish to see this Government have as free hand as possible to adjust, if possible, the trade relations between the two countries. I believe that in our county to-day and the bordering county of Washington in the State of Maine, the citizens of both countries represent as nearly as possible the great brotherhood of man, or as nearly as it can be done under different flags. We have the most cordial relations with each other, social and otherwise, so that I cannot wholly agree in what the hon. member for South Leeds said with regard to the condition of things in New Brunswick. He had, however, some basis of fact for his statement. A few years ago a United States agent was sent to the city of Calais to look into the labour question. I believe that one of the principal employers of labour in that city, who employed labour from the Canadian side, was fined $1,000. That was the only action taken at that time. Without question it would be better for our community to have a more liberal labour law on the other side for there are probably 500 Americans working on our side of the river, when there are probably not over 100 Canadians working on the American side. We have some of our citizens who have gone to the United States and taken the oath of allegiance in order to be able to run fishing boats over to Canada and obtain fish. Most of the hon. members of this House know what that oath means when taken by a British subject. However, some of these Canadians do not seem to have lost their desire for Canadian citizenship, for they came over on election day—30 of them—and voted for the Reform party, and took the oath. That may be good law—I am not prepared to say whether it is or not—but there is a chance of its being ventilated in the courts before long. I do not wish to put any stumbling block in the way of the present Government, for down along the border we know just what we have to deal with. Some of the hon. gentlemen in this House, who live further away from the border, may not realize what a task it will be to obtain reciprocity. But coming in contact, as I have, with the people of New England and the Northern States for the last twenty years, I think I can as well judge the pulse of that population as any man in this House. When I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that right down within sight of the Union Jack, and where we could hear the reverberations across the St. Croix River, the Hon. J. G. Blaine gave vent to utterances which I shall read to the House, as indicating to some extent what our hon. friends opposite will have to meet when they attempt to obtain reciprocity: In 1888, during the campaign, Mr. Blaine came to the city of Calais and delivered a brilliant address to the Republican party in which he used these words:

Beyond the frontier, across that river, our neighbours choose another government, another allegiance. They are subjects of Queen Victoria, they are loyal to Her Majesty. They live under a foreign flag. They do exactly as they have a right to do. I neither dispute their right nor envy their situation. It is their right to choose for themselves, as it is our right to choose for ourselves. But I am opposed, teetotally opposed, to giving the Canadians the sentimental satisfaction of waving the British flag, paying British taxes, and enjoying the actual cash remuneration of American markets. They cannot have both at the same time. If they come with us they can have what we have, but it is an absolute wrong against the rights of American citizens that millions of men who owe the United States no allegiance, who have no part or lot with us, who are not of us, but choose to be foreign with us; it is an absolute wrong for Congress to say that they shall have exactly the same share in our markets and the same privileges of trade under our flag that we have. So far as I can help it, I do not mean that they shall be Canadians and Americans at the same time.

There is no middle place for Canada. For she must be either incorporated with our own union or be deemed a foreign country. It is for Canadians to say whether they choose to be treated as brothers or as strangers.

Now, in view of these facts, I do not wish to put any hamper or obstruction in the way of the Government obtaining these relations which they so gladly anticipated. I even met our hon. friend the late member for our county (Mr. Gilmour) in this city the other day, and I judged that he had come here to congratulate the Government on having obtained reciprocity; for during his campaign he gave us to understand that just as soon as these good Reformers got into office, that moment a special train would carry delegates from Washington, and there could not be found a train fast enough to carry these delegates from Washington for the purpose of obtaining a reciprocity treaty from us. These are the reasons why, at present, I wish to leave the matter in the hands of the Government.

Mr. PRIOR. I do not propose to say many words with regard to this matter, because I think everything has been said already. But I do wish to say that I am heartily in accord with the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) in introducing this measure. That hon. gentleman has persistently brought forward this measure before the House. He has told us that the American nation are guilty of great tyranny to our workingmen and I think that the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) has well earned the gratitude of every mechanic and labourer in this Dominion for his endeavour to see that justice shall be done to them. He has shown us that not only are Canadians not allowed to go across to work in the United States, but that, if they persist in doing so, they are not merely ordered away, but, if they remain, are liable to fine and imprisonment. I think that a great many hon. gentlemen in this House must have had the same experience in their constituencies that I have had in mine in meeting with men who have suffered at the hands of the Americans in this regard. I have met men who have moved away with their families from British Columbia to some portion of the United States, with the intention of getting work there. But when they obtained work, as soon as it was found that they were not American citizens, they were ordered away. I say that is rank tyranny. And, though the First Minister says that the principle of retaliation is altogether wrong, still, I cannot say that I do not believe in it myself. My personal feeling is that if the Americans are aggressors in a matter of this kind, it is the duty of the Canadian Government to retaliate in some way or other in order to obtain justice and fair-play for our workmen. It may be that the smoother course would be better than retaliation, but we have in so many other instances found that, when that was tried, it was of no earthly use, that they paid no attention to it, that I have come to the conclusion that the only thing to do is to pay them back in their own coin. But, though I am individually of the opinion that this Bill is a good one and would have the effect that is wished for, still, when gentlemen of the experience of the hon. the First Minister (Mr. Laurier) and the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) state that it is far better to try other methods, I must bow to that superior knowledge and experience. The hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood) stated that the Bill that was passed by Congress was not aimed alone at Canada, but at the whole world. That does not, to my mind, do away with the necessity that exists for Canada to look after herself. However, I sincerely hope that the Government will think it its duty to look into this matter most carefully, and, if possible, allow a committee to be formed to look into the question, and I sincerely trust the hon. member for South Leeds will not allow the matter to drop, as it is one of the very greatest importance to a large number of the citizens of Canada.

Mr. CLANCY. I fully recognize, Mr. Speaker, the difficulties attending a Bill of this kind. The proposition of the hon. the First Minister was, in a sense, reasonable; but I think that perhaps my hon. friend from South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) also has a large measure of reason on his side. I am sure that the House will recognize fully the difficulties of retaliatory legislation. We must all recognize also that a measure of that kind is of the nature of a last resort, and I am sure that both sides of the House, on a question of this kind, can afford to lay aside all party squabbles and all consideration of party advantage. Now, the question the hon. gentleman is pressing is not one of a purely sentimental character, of real hardships that have been suffered under the operation of the very illiberal and very harsh and unfriendly law of the United States. I might refer to cases of hardship that have come under my own knowledge. Living close to the boundary line and not far from the city of Detroit, some cases of special hardship have come under my notice. I have known vessels to go there loaded with lumber, and not a single Canadian workman was allowed to take part in unloading the cargo. The moment the vessels reached the docks, American workmen take hold and discharge the cargo. I hope the First Minister will see to it that this Bill gets its second reading and that a committee is appointed to draft a Bill that may be brought before the House next session. This will in no sense interfere with the proposition made by the First Minister and the leader of the Opposition. It will in no sense show an unfriendly feeling on the part of Canada to allow this Bill to take one stage and afterwards to be put into the form that will be given it by a committee. If the negotiations referred to by the First Minister should fail, nothing is lost; if they should not fail, but if the most desirable result should be brought about by friendly negotiation, so much the better. In the meantime I feel disposed to assist my hon. friend in pressing the Bill this session, in so far as having a committee appointed, and deal with it, with the understanding, at least, that it shall be subject to the approval of the House and that it shall take no stage that will in any sense interfere with the negotiations which have been undertaken by the Government.

Mr. MCGREGOR. I am glad that the Bill has been introduced, and glad also to hear from the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition that the matter will be taken up. I live in a border city, and I am free to say, so far as negotiations between the labour on the Canadian side and labour on the American side, it is reciprocal. We send from our side six or seven hundred persons across to Detroit to work. They board and sleep on our side, and are Canadians. The Americans send about 150 to 200, who work in Canada. So far, as I have said, the trade has been reciprocal, and I hope and trust that, when the Prime Minister has had time to look into this matter carefully, negotiations may be brought about, with the result of putting on the statute-book a law that would be more satisfactory to both parties. Not only is there this reciprocity in the city I live in, but there are other cases. A mile and a half above is the town of Walkerville, which has the same advantages. A ferry boat leaves every ten minutes, and the traffic goes backward and forward, some of the people even taking their dinners on the opposite side from that on which they work. We have also a town of about 1,700 or 1,800, the town of Sandwich. People cross from there also, and are not molested in any way. Once in a while we have a difficulty because of some stranger coming in from a distance, but so far as our own people are concerned, we have reciprocity in trade relations between the two sides. But if the Americans should interfere with our people, as it is said they have done in other places, I will gladly favour the Bill, with some modifications made in it before it passes.

Mr. HUGHES. I would like to ask the First Minister if his intention is to have the Bill dropped entirely this session, or merely to ask for an adjournment for a few days.

Mr. BENNETT. I do not rise for the purpose of discussing the principles involved in the Bill introduced by my hon. friend from South Leeds (Mr. Taylor). I wish to say that I am, on general principles, heartily in favour of introducing legislation on the lines laid down. But I have risen for the purpose of emphasizing what has been said by the mover of the Bill in reference to the effect produced on the lumbering interests of this country. Along the north shore of the Georgian Bay the Canadian lumbering interest, as regards the employment of Canadian lumbermen, has been greatly affected in the past five or ten years, owing to what, in my view, and the view of a large number of people in the province of Ontario, has been the policy of the local government and of the Dominion Government also, in permitting the exportation of logs from Canada to the United States, and which has resulted in carrying in its wake the introduction into Canada of a large amount of American labour. While I do not maintain that the employment of men has been exclusively from the American side, still the better positions in the lumbering camps have been given to men coming from the United States, and as a result those wishing to work in the woods on this side have been debarred from participating in the best positions that were in the gift of those employing labour. But not only in the matter of taking logs from the woods, but also in the manufacture of timber upon the shores of the Georgian Bay, a large number of Americans have built mills there, and it is within my own knowledge, and must be within the knowledge of every person who has been about those mills, that a large number of the men employed in such concerns are Americans coming into this country and working the best part of the season, and then returning to their homes. As I understand the law of the United States in this regard, Canadians are debarred from going to the other side and there seeking permanent employment without first having taken the oath of allegiance. Now, if this is correct, as I think it is in many states, it is a case of hardship that our men going over there should be forced to foreswear their allegiance to this country, while on the other hand Americans are permitted to come here and participate in the labour afforded in this country, and which should be given to Canadians if at all possible. As to the proposition made by the First Minister that the Bill should not be proceeded with now, but that it should stand until the next session, I would rather favour the proposal that the Bill should go to a special committee to be named by the House, and the gentlemen composing it should fortify themselves with facts and figures, so that when the House next meets we would be in possession of a great deal of information which cannot be acquired as speedily next January as in the delay that will intervene between this session and the ensuing session. I trust, therefore, that the Bill will go to a special committee, and that the gentlemen composing it will feel it incumbent upon themselves to acquire all the information they can, and place it before the House at the next session.

Mr. BENNETT.

Mr. HENDERSON. In my opinion the time has come when some action must be taken along the lines laid down in the Bill of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor). I think in self-defence we are compelled to do so. In the county which I have the honour to represent, I know that the feeling along that line is growing very strong indeed. Not only are the Americans endeavouring to regulate labour and to prevent Canadians from going to their side to work, but they are interfering in another matter which has come to my notice recently, and which seems to be fully as serious. As the First Minister intends to look into this matter, I would like to draw his attention to the fact that during the recent election an attempt was made to interfere materially with the political affairs of this country. There are many people owning property here, but who are living at the present time in the United States and working there; and it was no unusual thing in the section of the country in which I live, for men who had the franchise in my county and were living in the state of New York, to receive letters signed by the immigration agent in the state of New York, telling them that in the event of their coming to this country to vote at the general election, they would be prohibited from returning. I do not say that this was done at the instance of the Liberal party, or that the influence of Mr. De Barry was secured in this matter by the Liberal party; but it did not come to my notice that these letters were sent to any but Conservatives. I will read a letter received by a constituent of mine who formerly resided in the village of Acton, who is an owner of property there, but who at the present time is living in Buffalo. I believe going to school there. He was notified by Mr. De Barry in the words following:—

Buffalo, June 20th, 1896.

My dear sir :

I have received a list of names of parties who work in this State and are about going to Canada to vote in the coming Dominion elections; your name appears on the list.

Now I would advise you to remain where you are as steps will be taken to prohibit you returning to New York State, should you go to Canada and cast your vote at this election.

Yours very sincerely,

J. DeBARRY.

Now this was not the only elector that was interfered with on that occasion. I am aware of others who intended to come to the county of Halton to vote, who had a perfect right to come, and who were prevented from coming entirely by the receipt of this letter, thinking that if they did come, the threat here contained would be carried out, and that they would be deprived of their positions on returning again to the city of Buffalo. I think this is a matter of so much importance that in any negotiations this Government may have with the United States Government, it would be proper for the First Minister to draw the attention of the authorities at Washington to what I think was a very undue interference with our political rights.

The PRIME MINISTER. With reference to the question asked me a moment ago by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Hughes), I may repeat what I had occasion to say. I believe in his absence, that I thought it advisable to ask the House not to press this Bill any further to-night in order that the Government may satisfy itself as to the nature of the correspondence which intervened between the late Government and the American authorities, and to see whether any hope can still be entertained of coming to a satisfactory settlement of this question with the American authorities. If, by the correspondence which has taken place, we have to come to the very painful conclusion that nothing more is to be expected from the American authorities, but that they will persist in maintaining upon their statute-book a very unfriendly law, then in my estimation there will be nothing left for Parliament to do but to adopt the measure proposed by the hon. member for Leeds.

Mr. HUGHES. This session ?

The PRIME MINISTER. Certainly. But if, on the other hand, there is reason to believe that further negotiations would operate to induce the American authorities to retrace their action and take a more friendly attitude, then, of course, when the question comes up again, I would ask the hon. gentleman to defer it until the next session. Now, I come to the suggestion which has been made by the hon. member for Leeds, and supported by some hon. gentlemen on the other side, as to the appointment of a committee to investigate this question. Well, I must say to my hon. friend that I do not see that there is any necessity for such a committee.

Mr. TAYLOR. I meant a committee to prepare or amend the present Bill.

The PRIME MINISTER. The object of the committee might be, first, to investigate the facts, as was suggested by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Bennett); but there are no facts to be investigated, so far as I am aware, which are not sufficiently well known to enable us to take any action. The only question is whether the American law is to be maintained or not. If the American law is to be maintained, I feel that we should have this measure. The hon. gentleman says a committee should be appointed to inquire into the matter and settle the provisions of the Bill. I differ with the hon. gentleman on that point. I am very strongly of the opinion,—and I place myself in the judgment of the House—that if we are to adopt this measure, which will be a retaliatory measure, its terms should be word for word with those of the American law. That is the best way to deal with the matter, for the Americans cannot complain if we apply to them an identical measure of justice or injustice. Therefore, there is no use in having a committee to settle the terms of the Bill. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Macdonald) said that retaliation had no terrors for him. I do not agree with that sentiment. I think retaliation is always a measure to be deprecated; but there are occasions when retaliation, which we all must deprecate, becomes a necessity for a nation which has a sense of its own dignity, and I believe such an occasion will arise if the American authorities persist in keeping on the statute-book this law, which is certainly a most unfriendly law.

Mr. HUGHES. It is not my intention to speak at any length, but I think a misapprehension prevails among hon. members sitting on this side of the House as to the intention of the First Minister. I understand his intention is to inquire into the subject during the next few days, and if satisfactory evidence cannot be adduced that the American government are friendly, to allow the Bill to proceed this session. Any number of arguments could be adduced in support of passing the present Bill, if the Americans do not repeal their law. Negotiations might possibly result in this, that after a settlement has been arrived at between the Washington authorities and the Dominion Government in regard to such a law, difficulties might arise under some State law, as was the case with the canal regulations. I suggest that in any negotiations carried on, the First Minister should inquire into this matter and see that it is placed on a proper basis.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not think any misapprehension exists on this side of the House. I am inclined to think the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) was not present during the whole of the debate. The understanding was a very clear one, and the proposal of the First Minister was this: That the Bill should not proceed any further, but remain over till next session, and thus give the Government an opportunity during recess of opening those friendly and diplomatic relations with the United States that we all hope will avoid the necessity of proceeding with this matter. The suggestion of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Tisdale), that a special committee be appointed for the purpose of acquiring information and investigating the subject, would fail in its object, because we all anticipate a very short session, and the moment the session was concluded the functions of the Committee would be at an end, and so nothing would be obtained in that way. We are all of the opinion that the best mode of dealing with the question is that suggested by the First Minister—to exhaust every possible means of diplomacy with the United States, and failing to secure a satisfactory result, then we would be in a position that even the great country alongside of this Dominion would see that we had no alternative but to fall back on a measure that we were most unwilling to resort to it if it could possibly be avoided.

Mr. TAYLOR. When the First Minister is looking into the correspondence, which he will no doubt find in the archives of the Secretary of State, I trust he will ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to show him the correspondence that took place between that department and the deputation that came from Washington, because the Alien Labour law is referred to in connection with the International Park arrangement.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The PRIME MINISTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 10th September, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 24) to incorporate the Hudson's Bay Canal and Navigation Company.—(Mr. Boyd.)

BEHRING SEA COMMISSION.

Mr. PRIOR. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask the hon. the First Minister whether he can give the House any information as to whether the Government has received any confirmation of the reports which have appeared in the papers with regard to seizures of Canadian vessels in the Behring Sea by American authorities. Also, whether the date has been fixed for the meeting of the commission appointed to settle the claims of the sealers. Also, whether the Government have already appointed counsel to appear on behalf of the Canadian sealers.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). With respect to the report which has appeared in the papers as to the seizure of some Canadian vessels, I may say that the information of the department is just exactly that which has been published—nothing more nor less. With respect to the date on which the commission will sit, we have no intimation as yet of any agreement having been arrived at, but no doubt the date will be a convenient one for both countries—early this autumn. The question of the appointment of counsel is still under consideration. I have had communications from gentlemen who have claims, stating that they intend to employ private counsel of their own, if that were not inconsistent with the wish of the Government. I have replied that the Government certainly could have no objection to anything of the kind, and that, no doubt, the counsel appointed will act in unison and conjunction with the Government counsel, although, necessarily, the counsel appointed by the Government will have control of the case.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH GOVERNOR GENERAL—PORTFOLIO OF THE INTERIOR.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I beg to lay upon the Table some further correspondence on the subject of the motion that was carried the other day, calling for the correspondence between Sir Charles Tupper and His Excellency the Governor General. The other day, my attention was called to the portfolio of the Interior. Well, I am not prepared at present to say definitely when the portfolio will be filled, but it is the intention of the Government to offer it to some gentleman from the North-west. At present, however, there are good reasons, in the public interest, why some further delay is desirable.

RIGHT HON. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I suppose we must be thankful for small favours. The information is not very complete, but the hon. gentleman, I hope, will be in a position at an early day to state exactly what the Government propose to do in this regard. I rise, however, at this moment, to call the attention of the First Minister to a statement in the "Mail and Empire" newspaper, coming from the special correspondent in Montreal, which I read with the greatest possible regret, and I am quite sure that the First Minister will be only too glad to be afforded the opportunity of setting the matter right. In the "Mail and Empire" of 9th September, the following appears from the special correspondent in Montreal:—

According to "La Patrie," the Liberal organ, Mr. Chamberlain will not visit Canada because he knows very well that Mr. Laurier will have nothing to do with him or his Imperial schemes. Mr. Laurier is not looking after the interests of Englishmen.

I take it for granted that this statement is entirely unauthorized, and does not in any respect reflect the views or opinions of the hon. First Minister. But I felt it was really important that a distinct statement should be made, giving emphatic contradiction to a statement of this kind in a paper which professes to be one of the strong supporters of the Government, as I felt that it was calculated to do very great injury to Canada. I may be permitted to say that there has been no public man who has held the high position of Secretary of State for the Colonies for many years, who is more devoted to the interests of the colonies, and to whom Canada is more indebted, than the hon. gentleman who now occupies that position. I will take this opportunity also of saying that there never has been the slightest foundation for any imputation upon the entirely impartial attitude which that right hon. gentleman has occupied in regard to political affairs in Canada. It is quite true that I had the honour conferred upon me of being invited to form an Administration, and did receive the personal congratulations of that right hon. gentleman and of a number of other gentlemen who had either been Governors General of Canada, or held the position of Secretary of State for the Colonies; but I may say that, so far from there being anything out of the way in this, I received the same congratulations from the Under Secretary of State who served under Lord Ripon. I had the warmest possible congratulations from Sir John Loug, who is well known to hon. gentlemen opposite as being a very strong Home Ruler and supporter of the late Government, of which Mr. Gladstone was the head, and who now sits in the House of Commons. I may say that during my residence in England, I never took the slightest part in any question which was a party question in England. Whatever political questions I had to do with, they were entirely distinct from party. On a score of occasions or more, I refused invitations to dinners which were of a party character, either on one side or the other. I felt that it was my duty to Canada, which I then had the honour of representing, to entirely abstain from anything during my position as High Commissioner, which would, in the slightest degree, partake of a party character. I may say more, that from the day I went to England down to the time I returned to Canada, I enjoyed the most kindly relations with the prominent leading men of both the great political parties; and, if there is one gentleman more than another with whom my relations during my tenure of office were of the most cordial and personally friendly character, it was the distinguished head of the great Liberal party, Lord Rosebery. From the time I went to England down to the time I left, I had the most constant, and, I may say, personal relations with that distinguished nobleman. I may say, also, that there was no gentleman occupying the position of Colonial Minister during my tenure of office, with whom my relations were more intimate, and upon whom I felt always that I could more confidently rely for everything that could be done in the interests of Canada, than the Marquis of Ripon.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but of course he is aware that at this stage of the proceedings, as at any other stage, no debate can be held without a motion being before the Chair. Of course, it is usual to allow the leaders to explain matters of public business, or to allow any hon. member to ask an urgent question. It is, however, understood that we must not allow debate in this informal way. We assume that the hon. member will conclude with a motion which will bring his remarks in order, and will give any other hon. gentleman an opportunity to speak if he so desires.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I shall have great pleasure, Mr. Speaker, in concluding with a motion. I have taken the earliest opportunity of drawing the attention of the First Minister to this matter, as I have felt that it was one of the very greatest importance. I was explaining the hearty and cordial co-operation I have always received from the Marquis of Ripon when he held the office of Colonial Minister. I may say that I had occasion to bring strongly to his notice on one occasion—with my colleague from Australasia—the question of cable communication between Canada and Australasia, in which the late Government took a great interest. I also took occasion to confer with that distinguished gentleman when he was Secretary of State on the fast Atlantic service. He manifested the heartiest desire to do everything in his power to meet the views of the Government of Canada. But it must be remembered that the Marquis of Ripon, when Colonial Minister, was the representative of a party which had a very small majority in the House of Commons. Therefore, however desirous that hon. gentleman was to meet our wishes, as I know he was in regard to these questions, he was not able to take the same prompt and efficient action that he could have taken had he had a large majority at his back in the House. I felt bound to say this in justice to the Liberal Administration, who were not less anxious than the present Administration to meet the views of the Government of Canada. As soon as the present Administration was formed, I took the opportunity of waiting upon the distinguished gentleman—(regarded as one of the most eminent statesmen in Great Britain and holding a very strong position in the Cabinet)—who accepted the seals of office as Colonial Minister, with regard to two questions of a Pacific cable and a fast Atlantic service. I represented to that right hon. gentleman as strongly as I could the importance the Government of Canada attached to this measure, and the great interest that it possessed as affecting the interests of Canada and those of the Empire as well. I was fortunate enough to obtain the hearty support and concurrence of the Rt. Hon. Mr. Chamberlain, and, at an early day, he was in a position to inform me, that he was prepared to take up both these questions and to give them a hearty support. And, after further communication, he gave me to understand that Her Majesty's Government would be prepared to supplement the grant given by Canada of £150,000 a year for ten years by contributing in the proportion of about one-third the amount that might be required. He stated, however, his opinion that it was absolutely necessary that new tenders should be called for, as it might be found that the service could be obtained for a less amount. I mention this on the present occasion to show to the House and the gentlemen opposite what I regard as the gratitude—as the good feeling, to say nothing less—due to the present eminent Colonial Minister for the hearty way in which he entered into measures which he believed would be for the benefit of Canada and which were being pressed upon him from that point of view. But, while giving that hearty approval and co-operation to the measure to which the late Government attached the greatest possible importance, no action on the part of the right hon. gentleman ever indicated that he was disposed in the slightest degree, to depart from that strictly impartial position in regard to the two great parties in his country that, during my tenure in office in England as High Commissioner, has always characterized the action of the representatives of both great political parties there. Had not this matter received some notice from the press, I should not have felt it necessary to refer to it. With the exception of the communications which have been made public between the Rt. Hon. Mr. Chamberlain and myself, which were confined to a personal expression upon his part when I assumed the position of First Minister in Canada and a communication sent to me through the Governor General upon my retirement from the office of High Commissioner, when he was good enough to express the views that he entertained with regard to my services to Canada and to Great Britain, I am able to say that there never has been the slightest communication, direct or indirect, between myself and that right hon. gentleman which is not known to the hon. Prime Minister now. The communications I had with the Colonial Office through the present High Commissioner with regard to the fast Atlantic service, and a communication which I received after my retirement from office, and which I placed in the hands of the Secretary of State, with reference to a British subject who was undergoing imprisonment abroad, were the only communications between that right hon. gentleman and myself. I felt it due to him, I felt it due to Canada and to the interests we all have in this matter to say that there has never been the slightest ground for the imputation that the present Colonial Minister, the Right Hon. Mr. Chamberlain, manifested in the slightest degree any preference or partiality for one or other of the great political parties in this country. I feel, therefore, that my hon. friend the First Minister will be only too glad to have the opportunity of disclaiming anything so coarse and insulting to a gentleman who has always shown in every relation the greatest desire to advance the interests of Canada. I may refer to the occasion on which I had the honour of being a colleague of the right hon. gentleman when appointed one of Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries at Washington. I can bear testimony to the zeal which he showed for the interests of Canada without which it would have been impossible to reach the satisfactory conclusion that was reached in the Atlantic treaty of 1888. On every occasion throughout his career this right hon. gentleman has shown, so far as I am aware—certainly in everything that has relation to Canada—his readiness to do anything that he could to promote Canadian interests irrespective of party. Under these circumstances, I felt that the hon. leader of the Government would be only too glad to have the opportunity of explaining any statement that would indicate that the people of Canada did not appreciate the evidences the right hon. gentleman has given of his anxiety to promote everything that he had reason to believe to be for the best interests of Canada. I move that this House do now adjourn.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). If my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition had been in the country some twelve months ago, he would know now that the newspaper "La Patrie," published in Montreal, is not and has not been an organ of the Liberal party; he would know that about twelve months ago, under my own signature, I declared that "La Patrie" was not an organ of the Liberal party, and did not reflect the views of the Liberal party. At that time the "Mail" newspaper had thought it advisable to attack me for a letter which I had written, and stating that in so doing I had shown myself a slave of the hierarchy. Now, it suits the same newspaper to represent the "La Patrie" as an organ of the Liberal party. I have only to repeat now what I have stated all along, that my views are well known in the country at large, and especially in the province of Quebec, and the views held by "La Patrie" are not the views which I have been advocating ever since I have been in public life. I am very sorry to hear and to know, in fact, that Mr. Chamberlain is not to visit Canada while he is in America. I hoped that he would come, and I still hope that some day, sooner or later, and sooner than later, he will yet visit this country. It is not perhaps out of the way for me to say that we in Canada acknowledge that in Mr. Chamberlain the Colonial Office has one of the ablest men that have presided over it for many and many a day. Though we may not agree in every particular with some of the views of policy he is said to entertain, still I think the ideas which he has expressed in the Colonial Office for the development of the Empire are views which, I have no hesitation in saying, must meet with strong commendation in all Canadian hearts. Now, with regard to the statement which the hon. gentleman made a moment ago, when he went out of his way, perhaps, if he will pardon me for so saying, to defend Mr. Chamberlain against any imputation of a desire to interfere in the late elections, I must say that if there has been an imputation of that kind entertained by anybody, the blame does not rest with Mr. Chamberlain himself, but rather with the hon. leader of the Opposition. For my part I am quite sure that Mr. Chamberlain knows too well what his duties are in his own office, ever to have desired, however remotely, to interfere in the late elections, or to indicate any semblance of a desire to interfere with them. When Mr. Chamberlain wrote a letter to my hon. friend on the occasion of his being called to the Premiership of Canada, it was a letter of a friend to a friend, of a gentleman to a gentleman, expressing no views, I am sure, but the views of Mr. Chamberlain himself, and not the views of the Colonial Minister, upon the appointment to a high office of a gentleman who had been associated with him in public life for many years in England. But, Sir, I think it was not altogether in good taste to publish that letter. It was a private letter, and its publication rather indicated a desire on the part of some one to bring the name and the office of Mr. Chamberlain into the late election. For this, I think, if anybody was to blame, it is not the gentleman who wrote the letter, but, I am sorry to have to say so, it was rather the gentleman who permitted the publication of the letter.

Mr. McNEILL. Might I be allowed to ask the hon. gentleman whether any attempt has been made on the part of the Government to induce Mr. Chamberlain to visit Canada?

The PRIME MINISTER. I am sorry I cannot give any answer to the question of my hon. friend, but if he will do me the honour of calling upon me at some time, I will perhaps be able to satisfy him.

EMIGRATION TO BRAZIL.

Mr. BERGERON. I will take advantage of this occasion to ask the attention of the Government to a very important matter contained in a despatch which I have just received, stating that the steamer "Moravia" of the Brazilian line, is now in the port of Montreal, and that agents of that line are trying to engage peasants from the country to go and work on the coffee plantations in Brazil. I am also asked in this despatch whether the Government have taken means to protect our people, and to dissuade them from going there, or to ascertain whether the engagements which are made are binding. The steamer leaves on the 15th, and rumour has it that hundreds of Canadians have been engaged to go by that vessel to Brazil. I will lay the despatch before the Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, hoping that they will take the matter into consideration, if they have not already had their attention drawn to it.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I am not aware that the attention of the Government was ever called to this matter, and it is now brought to my notice for the first time. What action the Government can take in the matter, I do not see very plainly at this moment. Every Canadian is at liberty to go wherever he pleases; though I must say that I would count it part of the duty of the Government in some way or other to inform Canadians that they would make a great mistake to go to Brazil to settle. Canada is a far better country for them than Brazil, and every attempt should be made on our part to show them that they have everything to gain by remaining in this country; and especially to show them that they would do well to look very carefully into the truthfulness of any inducements held out to them to go to Brazil.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I think what has given rise to the telegram is a report I have seen in newspapers that the English Government has taken pains to warn the subjects of Great Britain against going to Brazil on account of the unsettled condition of the country, and the manner in which they have been treated there. Having that in view, I think it would be well for the Government to notify all parties that the condition of things at present existing in Brazil is not healthy for foreigners.

Mr. CHARLTON. It would be well in this connection, I think, also to lay the fact before the public that the Italian Government has taken measures to warn Italians against emigration to Brazil, and are taking further measures to prevent emigration to that country from Italy. Under the circumstances, the action of the English Government and the action of the Italian Government indicate that it is important that our people should be deterred, if possible, from making the mistake of going to that country.

Motion to adjourn, negatived.

SUPPLY—CASE OF J. K. LAMBERT.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. DAVIN. Before you leave the Chair, I wish to call the attention of the Government to the case of J. K. Lambert, in Regina. I think it is important that we should be in a position to take any statements that are made by the members of the Administration, as I am ready and forward to take them, as statements upon which we can entirely rely, especially when those statements are statements of policy. We have had in this House statements from leading members of the Administration as to the course that would be pursued in regard to persons in the employ of the Government. Now, I have to bring before the House a case of a humble man employed as a caretaker, against whom there is no charge whatever that he took any part in politics. I am sorry to see that the Minister of Public Works is not now in his place; but that hon. gentleman told me there was no charge whatever against this man of having taken any part in politics. And he said to me that if I were to take a certain course, some result that might be desirable to myself might take place. To that I do not refer further. But here is the fact, that this man was dismissed, and what I find to have been the case is this: there is a political committee at Regina, which gave his name into the department, and he received some time after 21st August, this notice:

21st August, 1896.

J. J. Lambert, fireman, Court House,
Regina, North-west Territories.

I am directed to inform you that your services in connection with the Court House at Regina will be no longer required after 31st August.

E. EWART, for Chief Architect.

This, of course, will seem a small matter as compared with anything affecting higher officers; but the fact that this man is a humble man is no reason why this House should not take notice of an act which I declare, on my responsibility as a member of Parliament, I believe to be an act dictated by political vengeance. This man, I can say, as I told the Minister of Public Works, took no part whatever in politics. The Minister said: I have no charge against him on that head, that he took any part whatever in politics. Yet he has been dismissed. The Minister said to me that he was informed that there was nothing for the man to do. The position of fireman in the court-house at Regina is this, that he is in the employ of the Government all the year around, but is only paid during the winter while at work, and of course if those persons in Regina who have charge as to whom should be employed and who should not be employed told the Minister of Public Works that there was nothing for this man to do, they were simply punning on the peculiarity of his office and deceiving the Minister, and if under such a deception he was led to dismiss this man, then he should restore him. I hope in the face of the statements that fell from the Controller of Inland Revenue, from the Whip of the party, from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and in fact from all hon. gentlemen who spoke from the Treasury benches as to what would be the policy adopted, that no man would be decapitated who had not shown himself an offensive partisan, we shall not be treated, even in the case of a humble individual who occupied the position of caretaker of the court-house at Regina, to having the word of promise held to the ear and then broken in action.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Mr. Speaker, after I had been sworn in as Minister, I thought some rule should be applied to my new office. I asked the chief of every branch to prepare a statement for me of the number of employees, the number of men who were wanted and the number of men who were not wanted. I must say at once that I rested for the time being implicit confidence in the chief of every branch; I had not time to go into the details of the cases, although I took as much precaution as a man could do in the case. I found this man Lambert had no employment for the time being, and I dispensed with his services. I do not regret it, and I propose to follow the same course everywhere else—wherever I find a man having nothing to do I will dispense with his services. I have found in my department dozens and dozens of men who have nothing to do, and I hope no hon. gentlemen on either side of the House will ask me to take any one of them back. I have had very strong pressure from friends made on me. It is not a pleasure to dismiss public servants. I have dispensed with the services of men whose relations have been Liberals and who are themselves Liberals. I did not instruct the chiefs of my department to inquire into the political leanings of any man, but I instructed them to prepare for me lists of men numbered according to merit. When twenty men are employed and only ten are wanted I remove the ten who are the bottom of the list, and I think no business man would do otherwise. The chiefs of my departments may have made mistakes, although I must say that, after having looked carefully into the cases of which complaints have been made to me since, I have generally found that my chiefs have been loyal to me and loyal to the public interest. I will inquire further into Lambert's case, for I have no feeling against him, I do not know the man. Although since the hon. gentleman called on me I have received a letter that Lambert is a strong partisan, at the time his services were dispensed with there was no complaint against him. I dispensed with his services because I found out that he was a man who had nothing to do, and who I thought was overpaid. My hon. friend has said since that he was not under pay. I think some of my officers told me he was under pay; at all events, I dispensed with his services as I have done elsewhere. I will inquire further into the case, and if injustice has been done I will certainly repair it.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Post Office Department..... $199,120 50

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I may say on behalf of the Postmaster General, who is not here at the moment, that the point taken by the ex-Finance Minister is well taken, and I propose that there be six messengers and twenty-three packers.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). I applied to my deputy for information in regard to this matter, and I was informed it was a clerical error on the part of the clerk who made up the schedule. I move that the item be reduced by $600.

Resolution, as amended, agreed to.

Department of Marine and Fisheries..... $55,980

Mr. SPROULE. Is there any change in this vote?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). There is a change, owing to the superannuation of the late Deputy Minister, Mr. Smith. His salary was $3,600, and he was superannuated, and Mr. Gourdeau, the accountant, was appointed in his place. Mr. Gourdeau's salary was increased $850 by that appointment. Then, the late Government appointed one of the first-class clerks to the accountant's position, and Mr. Cunningham to the position of assistant accountant, and another gentleman to the position of second-class clerk. These promotions amounted to an increase of $1,250. But, owing to the superannuation of the Deputy, there is an actual decrease of $2,420, as compared with the Estimates brought down last year. There was a clerk put in the Estimates without any name, and I do not ask the House for that appointment.

Mr. SPROULE. There seems to be an increase of one in the number of technical officers. Why was that done?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is no change made whatever. They stand exactly as they were brought down by the Finance Minister last session.

Mr. SPROULE. There were five technical officers before, and there are six now. Either the Estimates are wrong, or there must have been some change made.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There were six provided for in the Estimates of last session, and there are six provided for now.

Mr. FOSTER. There is an increase in the number of technical officers. There was an increase of one in the Estimates I brought down last year, but there was no opportunity of explaining to the House why the increase was made.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, the late Government added another technical officer in 1895-96, and they brought down the estimates for that officer. I have not had time to make a thorough examination to see if I could dispense with any of them, nor do I know that I have the power, unless I superannuate them.

Mr. SPROULE. Nevertheless, there is an increase, and we have never had any explanation of it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. A young gentleman was appointed there by the late Government. He is one of your own friends. He is the son of a member of this House. I have to provide for him; but, if you want me to strike it out, you can do so, and I will dismiss him. I am assured, however, that he is a good officer, and that he is discharging essential duties. I do not want to discharge him, but if the House will not vote the sum, I will have to do so. I can give his name, if hon. gentlemen insist upon it.

An hon. MEMBER. Give his name.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Mr. Tyrwhitt.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, there is no disgrace nor harm in that.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not at all.

Mr. FOSTER. My impression was that it was Professor Prince who was put among the technical officers.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is not Mr. Prince, at all. Mr. Prince's salary was proposed to be raised by my predecessor, and I did not think it fair that I should interfere with that. I accepted my predecessor's recommendation in that respect.

Mr. SPROULE. It does seem to me that it is not sufficient for the Minister to say that these Estimates are just the same as those brought down last year, and give that as a reason why they should be accepted by this House. The Estimates of last year were never explained to the House, and when we make inquiries, it is not a proper answer to say that the Estimates are the same as were brought down last session. The Minister in charge of the department ought to know why these changes are made.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think the request of the hon. gentleman is perfectly fair and reasonable, and I shall be most happy to give him all the information I can. When I entered the department I went through each branch, and I talked to my deputy with respect to the number of officers employed, with the view of ascertaining whether any reduction could be made in the interest of the public service. I have the name of each officer now in the department, and so far as I am able to judge, I would not be justified in asking the House for a penny less than is asked for in these Estimates. I made the casual remark that my predecessor had come to the conclusion after several years' experience that he could not make a reduction. I admit that that fact is not a justification for me, and I am willing to answer any and every question the hon. gentleman asks me with respect to any branch of the department. The name of one of the technical officers was not on the list, and therefore I did not read it, but when asked to give it I gave it.

Mr. MADORE. I would ask the Minister why there is an increase in the salary of the Commissioner of Fisheries. I see that the salary for 1895-96 is $2,000, while for 1896-97 it is increased to $2,200. I do not see why there is an increase in this salary when there is a decrease in almost every other item.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I tried to explain a little while ago that when I came to make up the estimates this year I called for the estimates submitted by my predecessor in office. I found that he had decided to increase the salary of the Commissioner of Fisheries by $200, which had been done after consultation with his predecessor, Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper. Finding that both my predecessors had come to the conclusion that the services rendered by Prof. Prince should be recognized by this increase, I did not feel that with my short experience in the office I would be justified in asking the House to strike it out.

Mr. FOSTER. And I think, when he looks into the matter, he will be still less inclined to strike it out. Prof. Prince is not only an educated scientific expert, but a thoroughly practical man as well. He is a graduate of scientific institutions in the old country, he has been here about four years, and he has certainly made himself master of the fisheries of Canada. I do not think $2,200 is too much for a man of that kind.

Department of Public Works..... $52,090

Mr. SPROULE. I see an increase in the number of second-class clerks from eleven to fourteen. Will the hon. Minister give us some information as to the necessity for that increase?

Mr. SPROULE.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). There is no increase over the late estimates, which I took from my predecessor as I found them. As the House knows, I have in my department a great number of temporary employees. The late Minister, rightly I believe, thought that we should put an end as far as possible to the system of temporary employees, and appoint deserving men as permanent employees; and for that reason he asked for this increase of three in the number of second-class clerks, which was granted. I understand, by his late colleagues, I am not responsible for that change in any way.

Mr. SPROULE. Were the additional second-class clerks appointed by promotion in the ordinary way, or were new men taken in?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Only one of these second-class clerkships has been filled. My secretary has been appointed to one of them, and the two others are still vacant. I intend to give them to the most deserving men.

Mr. BERGERON. We have seen in the papers lately that the services of a good many of the employees of the Public Works Department have been dispensed with—I understand, because there was no work for them at this season of the year, and there was no use keeping men doing nothing. But I want to ask the Minister if, when the Estimates are voted, and there will be more work in the department, he will be disposed to take back those employees, if they have given satisfaction to the department, and there is nothing against them?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There are two or three classes of men whose services I dispensed with. I hold in my hand statements that have been prepared for me, but I hope I will not be questioned too much about the names, though I am prepared to give them all. I have dispensed, under the reports of my officers, with men who were unfit, but I do not want to do any harm to these men by giving their names. They were not, on the report of the chief of the department, found fit for public duty. Other men I dismissed who were good men, but for whom there was no work, and for whom there will be no work, I am sure.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend has said that he is not responsible for the Estimates because he took them from his predecessor. Let me tell my hon. friend that he cannot get rid of the responsibility. He is responsible for everything he recommends.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. Do I understand my hon. friend to say that he has not dismissed any permanent clerks ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Not one.

Mr. FOSTER. How many second-class and third-class clerks are now on the pay roll ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have twelve second-class clerks, but two of the positions are vacant.

Mr. FOSTER. Does he include his private secretary in those ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes ; I propose to put my secretary into the second class.

Mr. FOSTER. Will he get the $600 allowance as well ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. He will not get the whole, but I must say that my private secretary is a gentleman who, in Montreal, was earning as much as he is earning now. He is a strong stenographer in French and English ; and I must say that since he has been here, I would not do the work he has done for the same amount of money.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not finding fault with my hon. friend, but we used to be strongly criticised for making our private secretaries second-class clerks. If the hon. gentleman's secretary does his work well, he should be well paid, for a good secretary does pretty nearly as much work as the Minister. With reference to the other two vacancies, my hon. friend has estimated for them in order to fill them later.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I may be in a position to make permanent men who deserve to be permanent, and for this reason I left these two vacancies.

Mr. SPROULE. If the hon. Minister found so little work to be done that he could dismiss so many officials, how is it he finds need for two more second-class clerks ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have dismissed a certain number of men who ought never to have been there, but there are good men in my department who are not permanent. I have thirty-seven or thirty-eight employees who are permanent, but I have a considerable number still of temporary employees. In my opinion, when a civil servant has worked from year to year, his position, if he is a good man, should be made permanent. I think that the late Minister was wise in making provision for men who may be promoted. I have got men in the service to-day who are not permanent, and I propose to make two of them permanent.

Mr. MONTAGUE. From what vote were these temporary men paid last year ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If my hon. friend will look at page 50, he will find three items, namely, to provide for salaries of engineers and draughtsmen and clerks, Chief Engineer's Office, this year $46,000, last year $51,000. To provide for salaries, architects and clerks, Chief Architect's Office, last year $28,200, this year $22,500. To provide for salary of staff telegraphic service, last year $3,500, this year $2,900. Out of these items the temporary employees are paid.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The reductions principally are mainly in the technical staff.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I found a large number of men there who should not have been there.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman has informed the House that so far as the ordinary staff is concerned he proposes a reduction of $960.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. On one item I propose a reduction of $8,000, and on another of $6,000.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Those are technical offices.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. They are engineers, draughtsmen and so forth. My hon. friend will find elsewhere a reduction of $25,000 in what may be called the Ottawa service.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I would like an answer to this question. Is it not the fact that several Ministers in the late Government employed more than one private secretary ? As I understood it the Minister of the Interior had two and the Minister of Finance had two, one in his office and one at his house.

Mr. FOSTER. That would be for me to answer rather than the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte). I had two private secretaries for a portion of the time, and I could have had six if thereby I could have done my work better. The point of criticism was whether the $600 was exceeded. It was not.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. Minister tells us he has reduced expenses by cutting down the estimates for engineers, draughtsmen and clerks, presumably because he is dispensing with the services of temporary men. How does he account for the increase of $3,100 in the salaries of the permanent staff ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am sorry I did not make my statement clear. It is no use trying to make the House believe that I am making an increase. I hold myself responsible—I must do so—for the increase that my predecessor made. The reason for this increase is that I will take deserving men from the temporary list and put them in position of second and third-class clerks.

Mr. BERGERON. Not third-class.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I might take a man who is in the third-class and put him in the second-class, and so on. In that I wish to be free.

Department of Railways and Canals... $44,062 50

Mr. HAGGART. Will the hon. Minister say who the second and first-class clerks in his department are now?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I have sent for a list of the clerks now in the department. The statement I have before me gives the clerks at the time that the Estimates were introduced last session. I know of no change. Certainly there has been no change since I took office. The first-class clerks are Mr. F. A. Dixon, Mr. Neil Stewart—

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman need not read the list. He will understand the object of my question. Some time ago I moved for a return of the Orders in Council approved by the Governor General and not yet brought down. There were some recommendations made by the late Government for the appointment of second-class clerks and I want to know whether they have been carried out or not.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Not having been in the House at the time, I was not aware that such a motion had been carried, and it has not since been called to my attention until now. I will ascertain what the hon. gentleman wishes to know and let him know at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask why it is that there are nine third-class clerks estimated for here, while there were only eight according to the first series of estimates.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The first estimates passed the Council in January, 1896, prior to the coming into operation of the Act which did away with the third-class clerkships, and on the 31st December, 1895, an additional third-class clerk was appointed at a salary of $450—a Mr. Gleason, I believe. The late Minister was not proposing, as I understand, at the time he submitted his estimates, to make provision for all the third-class clerks he had in his department. The appointment of Mr. Gleason was made by Order in Council transferring him from the Department of Agriculture to the Department of Railways and Canals.

Mr. FOSTER. Then the hon. gentleman had on the last of June, nine third-class clerks in the department?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Quite so—and has now.

Mr. TARTE.

Mr. HAGGART. I did not understand the hon. gentleman's explanation in answer to my question and will be glad if he will read the names of the second-class clerks.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have told the hon. gentleman that I have sent for the list, thinking it might be called for, but have not it at present.

Mr. HAGGART. Can the hon. gentleman tell me whether all the second-class clerkships in the department are filled or not?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am not certain as to that, but no appointments have been made since I came into the department, and the employees remain, as I understand it, as they were when the department was presided over by my hon. friend.

Mr. HAGGART. When I was in the department there were two or three vacancies among the second-class clerks. I recommended that they should be filled, and I want to know if they have been filled. If the hon. gentleman is not able to give us the information, perhaps the item had better be allowed to stand.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have filled no vacancies.

Mr. HAGGART. I understand. But the hon. gentleman cannot tell me whether those positions which I recommended should be filled have been filled or not. The item had better be allowed to stand.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We shall have no objection to let the item stand, but perhaps it would serve the hon. gentleman's purpose as well if the information were given on concurrence.

Mr. HAGGART. It will not suit me. The hon. gentleman does not understand the point at all. It is impossible to discuss the question on concurrence. I wish to know at this stage, and I am willing to pass every part of it but one item. Or, if you will allow me to have an opportunity of discussing it on any other item.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If it is the understanding that the vote is passed barring that item, we will accept the suggestion, and give the hon. gentleman the information.

Mr. FOSTER. That is rather irregular. It won't retard the matter at all. Just let this stand, and go on with the others.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It is understood that we are not passing it, but when we reach it, that is the only portion remaining to be debated.

Department of Geological Survey..... $50,475

Mr. FOSTER. As this department belongs to the Minister of the Interior, we will let them all stand. Our arrangement was the other night that they should all stand until the First Minister made his declaration. But I have no objection to taking this one. When an item of $50,000 is asked from the House, it is usual to have explanations as to details, if there are any changes.

Mr. DOBELL. There are no changes. I am prepared to bring down the names of all the officers of that department, and their salaries. There are only the statutory increases.

The Department of Trade and Commerce ..... $8,762 50

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). The numbers are the same. The change here is made by the promotion of one third-class clerk to be second-class clerk, and there are a couple of statutory increases. I observe that my predecessor asked for $9,562. I only propose to ask for $8,762.50. The difference of $562 over last year's Estimates, is made up by the statutory increases I have referred to, and the promotion.

Mr. FOSTER. I think it would be opportune to ask the hon. gentleman a question or two as to this department. I do not wish to worry the department with quotations, but I have them under my hand, sundry and numerous. Amongst these quotations I could name certain spicy and strong ones from a certain gentleman who used to occupy the seat I am occupying to-day on this side of the House. I remember that he took strong grounds against there being such a department at all as a Department of Trade and Commerce, that he thought it was altogether unnecessary, something as bad as the fifth wheel of a coach; and he was very pressing and curious for information as to what this particular department would do. But he was certainly of the opinion that it needed no deputy, and that one or two clerks would be quite sufficient to dance attendance upon the Minister, and do what little office work there was. He was also very curious to know on what lines this new Minister and his department would be projected. Now, I would like to ask my hon. friend for information. Of course, times have changed, and the season is not as it was at that time. My hon. friend when he made these strong criticisms, was looking forward to a time when he might be one of an incoming ministry, but when that happy time should come, my hon. friend did not expect to occupy the Department of Trade and Commerce—at least I take his own assertion for it, and the promise made by the Prime Minister. His own promise to his constituents was, as I understand, that he would be Finance Minister, and I am quite sure there was a promise by the First Minister that no one in all the wide Dominion could possibly be looked upon as Finance Minister outside of my hon. friend who now occupies the subordinate position of Minister of Trade and Commerce. Now, does my hon. friend propose to ask, in all seriousness, that the House should appoint a deputy and a lot of clerks for an office of this kind which he thought a few months ago was entirely unnecessary? And will he also tell the House upon what lines he proposes to work? I think we must have full explanations. There has been such a complete turn-around that my hon. friend must perform again for the fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, or tenth time, the grand act of swallowing himself.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I do not see, Mr. Chairman, what the hon. gentleman's remarks have to do with the item under discussion. I venture to tell the hon. gentleman that I think he will find that I will be able, after a few months' residence in the office, to show that I can find work for a deputy, and for the very small staff, as I am bound to say it is. The hon. gentleman, or his predecessors, have attached some work to this department in connection with subsidies, steamship subventions, and some other matters in connection with the development of trade and commerce, which will certainly afford work for the two, or three, or five, or six men who are attached to it.

Mr. FOSTER. There were some five or six contracts under way.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. And there will be, I hope, under our Administration, something done to promote the commerce of Canada.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, that is what I would like to have the hon. gentleman explain.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I think we will succeed in doing something if the hon. gentleman will possess his soul in patience. I know he is very unhappy in his present seat; I know he and his colleagues sit on thorns. I remember perfectly well what our old and late esteemed colleague, Mr. Rymal, said once of the hon. gentlemen when they were robbed of office. All I can tell him is this: We will endeavour to carry on the Government of this country on, I think, a little better and happier lines than those on which the hon. gentleman and his colleagues carried it on six months ago. I think we will be able to show a few months hence how the commerce of this country can best be developed.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend has hardly given much information to the House. He has very ingeniously tried to stave off the effect of his words of a few months ago, very ingeniously tried to put a screen up between his position then and his position at the present time, but he has not said one word to the House as to what he proposes to do. He says he has five or six contracts to look after, and five or six clerks to look after them, or one clerk to a contract. My hon. friend must see that when he is asking the House to give him this money to spend, it is not sufficient to say: Oh, give me the money. I think I will find something to do with it. He must tell the committee when he is asking for money what he proposes to do with it. Now, my hon. friend, after having been a working member in a Government, and after having been eighteen years on this thorny seat—my hon. friend spoke from experience, I suppose it was thorny when he sat here, but it is very soft, as far as I am concerned—but my hon. friend must have matured views, and he must be able to give them to the House. What does he propose to do?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I have already stated what I propose to do, and I am not disposed to indulge the hon. gentleman with any further information on the subject.

Mr. FOSTER. That is very good. My hon. friend is cultivating the virtue of silence, taking the position of a man who looks wise and says nothing. My hon. friend cannot escape from the position that he never proposed to take so inferior an office as the Department of Trade and Commerce, an office which he vilified and ridiculed with all that mastery of English which he possesses, an office which he declared to be totally unnecessary. My hon. friend now, a few months afterwards, sits down at the command of the Prime Minister, who has given that other place to one more worthy of it than himself—he sits down now and takes the despised position, and then coolly asks the committee to give him money, without saying what he proposes to do in that office. If the hon. gentleman had said nothing about the matter before, it might have been different; but he was so plain and so clear in announcing his opinion that the office was entirely unnecessary, that there was no work to do, and he was so clear on this point that the House and the country have intense interest in learning what the hon. gentleman will find to do there. If it is so unnecessary as it was a few months ago, the hon. gentleman should not ask the House for this appropriation. If this office is necessary, surely the hon. gentleman should, with his superior wisdom, vouchsafe to the committee explanations as to what he proposes to do. I hope hon. gentlemen will not cast the responsibility of defending their actions, as it has been the practice in such a large degree this session, on the shoulders of hon. members sitting on the back benches, who have been engaged in throwing bombs over the heads of Ministers, projectiles which did not hurt them, but were intended to hurt the Opposition.

Mr. FOSTER.

Ministers are responsible; they should explain their policy, and not leave that duty entirely in the hands of hon. gentlemen behind them. If the hon. gentleman has nothing to say, and prefers to sit in silence, the House and the country will form their own opinions in regard to the whole matter.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is quite clear that the ex-Minister of Finance would rather be a doorkeeper to a government than occupy a seat in opposition. He evidently feels the position to which he has been relegated by the people, and he feels his present position a very unpleasant one. The hon. gentleman has entered into an extended criticism of the Department of Trade and Commerce. I can well remember, when the question of creating it as a separate department was before the House, the Government were pointedly asked as to what would be the particular duties assigned to that Minister. We obtained but very scanty information from hon. gentlemen opposite, who then occupied seats on this side of the House. It was quite clear that the office of Minister of Trade and Commerce was not created because the necessity presented itself for establishing a new office, but simply because there was a gentleman who wanted to get some position, and the office was created for him. Hon. gentlemen divided up the duties of the several departments, and certain duties were assigned to the Department of Trade and Commerce. No doubt those duties have given the hon. Minister some work to do. The hon. gentleman claims that we challenged the propriety and prudence of creating that office. We did so, because there was no intimation given to the then Opposition as to the duties the Minister would have to perform. It was then thought by the Opposition that the office which had been created would be a comfortable and easy resting place for an hon. gentleman who is now a Senator. No doubt the office was created for that purpose. But, if, in considering the work of the different departments, the Government find that they can utilize this position to the advantage of the Dominion, there can be no doubt but that the position of Minister of that department will be kept in existence. If, on the other hand, it is found that a prudent reduction can be made, the office may perhaps be abolished. I am quite satisfied that the interests of the country will be safeguarded by the present Administration, either by continuing or abolishing the office. The Government, however, cannot be expected to attend to all these matters at once. It was announced, at the opening of Parliament, that the business would be confined to passing the Estimates, and that the Government did not intend to introduce any new legislation. Hon. gentlemen opposite surely must allow hon. Ministers time to warm the seats left by hon. gentlemen opposite, and look around to see what reductions or changes are desirable to promote the well-being and prosperity of this country, and I am satisfied that changes necessary to promote the interests of the Dominion will be carried out. In the meantime, the duties devolving on the Minister of Trade and Commerce will be efficiently performed and in the public interest, and possibly the performance of the duties may redound to the general well-being of the people. The hon. gentleman at present occupying the office will, no doubt, render efficient service to the public, notwithstanding the belittling remarks made by the ex-Finance Minister, and it may possibly prove that this department is one of the most advantageous to the interests of the people of this country.

Mr. SPROULE. I am sure the committee will regret that the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) was not made Minister of Trade and Commerce, because he has manifested great anxiety to give all possible information and to add a little advice as well, all of which is very refreshing. This, moreover, is done without salary, and it is, therefore, all the more interesting and agreeable. Would the Minister of Trade and Commerce give information to the committee as to the necessity for adding $1,100 to the Estimates proposed last session? If there was little work to do, more economy was needed, as an increase of salaries seems scarcely compatible with the work there appears to be to do.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I would just remark to my hon. friend that, upon entering my office, I found my predecessor had recommended the appointment of two additional second-class clerks at $1,100 each. It appeared to me that one additional second-class clerk would be sufficient for the purpose, and I reduced the estimate by $1,100. The sum asked for at the last session was $9,562; the sum I ask is $8,762. The promotion was recommended before I entered the office, and I did not feel disposed to stop it, particularly as the party likely to be promoted is declared to be a gentleman well up in statistics, and likely to be of very considerable use in his advanced position. But I will point out to hon. gentlemen opposite that, so far from having taken all that was expected to be taken, I have taken one second-class clerk less.

Mr. SPROULE. That information, of course, is quite appropriate, and is certainly appreciated. But there seems to be something wrong in the Estimates, because the Estimates placed the amount for the last year at $8,200, and for the coming year at $8,762.60.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The latter is my estimate. The estimate for the former year was $9,562.

Mr. DAVIN. This is one of the offices that was discussed at the last election, and which it was declared would be abolished. It is disappointing to my constituents, both those who voted for me and those who voted against me, especially those who voted against me, to find that, after the asseverations made that this superfluous position would be done away with—

The PRIME MINISTER. Is it disappointing to you, also?

Mr. DAVIN. It is disappointing to me, because, of course, I attach the greatest reliance to any statement made by the Prime Minister, and his statement was that more economy would be practised. During the elections the changes were rung on reductions in the number of Ministers, on reduced expensio in the Government, on reductions in the civil service, and promises were held out that such reductions would materially affect the taxation of the country. It is a great disappointment to find, not only that the position of Minister of Trade and Commerce has been retained, but that the hon. gentleman who denounced that ministerial position, is comfortably ensconced in it, but yet does not care to defend it.

Mr. TAYLOR. I should like to inquire from the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he has addressed a circular to the boards of trade, to manufacturers and to the importers of Canada, to ascertain their views regarding any probable reduction or increase in the tariff.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. No; no circular was addressed to manufacturers, as I mentioned yesterday, asking their views with respect to the tariff. A circular was addressed to the various boards of trade requesting suggestions from them as to the best channels in which the trade of Canada might be extended and developed; and I believe some information was sought by officers of the department from certain manufacturers with respect to the quantity of their production, but they were certainly not consulted with respect to reductions in the tariff or on any questions connected with the tariff.

Mr. FOSTER. I am sorry to see my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) taking refuge in that superior sort of silence. I know he feels badly under all the circumstances.

Mr. GIBSON. Not half so badly as you do.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gibson) not get so mad.

Mr. McMILLAN. I do not think he has exhibited so many moments of weakness as you have.

Mr. FOSTER. A number of hon. gentlemen over there seem to be getting angry, following the example of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. If the Minister does not give us any idea of his policy, we shall have to ask him some questions, and I suppose he will be courteous enough to answer them. I had hoped he would give us a comprehensive view as to what position he would elevate his department into. The only explanation of his not doing so is that he knows nothing about it, that he was looking after a different department in which he was thoroughly 'au fait,' and which he could answer for at a moment's notice, but having been placed in this obscure and unexpected position the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) has nothing to say as to what he will do. He vouchsafes to the committee the very important information that if we give him the money now, by and by, he will be able to do something. But the hon. gentleman ought to know whether or not he is able to do something before he gets the money. Necessity is always a prime element in asking for a parliamentary appropriation, and it is the duty of the Minister to explain what the necessity is. May be, the hon. First Minister would take up the role, and tell us what it is proposed to do in this new Department of Trade and Commerce, which both he and my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) most strongly deprecated and most strongly ridiculed only a few months ago in this House.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). My answer is very simple. Did the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) think the office useful or not? Will he answer that?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, I will answer that. But, before I answer it I want to tell my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) that he and his brother Ministers are taking most childish ground.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. I want to say frankly what I think. They are taking very childish grounds, when, after eighteen years of finding fault with everything the Liberal-Conservative Ministry did, after saying for eighteen years that everything that Government did was wrong and there was nothing right; then when they come into power they swallow at one great gulp all these strong denunciations. And when we ask them for explanations they are as dumb as oysters, but after a while they venture to get up and say: Well, you did this. Why that is the very thing you found fault with while you are in opposition. You said, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce himself said, that there were too many departments of government. You said, and your Minister of Trade and Commerce said, that this was one of the too many departments. You said that anyway, if the department was created it should not have a deputy head, and that there was nothing to be done in that department which the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs could not just as well do. The leader of the House at the present time, together with several of his Ministers, stated this over and over again. But now when you take the reins of office, you put in just as many Ministers as we did, and when you are asked to define the reason why you have thus changed your ground, your answer is: Well, you did it; do you not think it was right? But hon. gentlemen opposite sit on the Treasury benches to-day because they said they would not do such a thing if they were in power. They told the people of this country that the late Government were creating useless expenditures, were multiplying offices, were adding to the expenses of civil government, and they promised that when they came into office they would make a change. You have got into office because you stated that. You stated it broadcast in this country from one end to the other, and now that you have worked yourself into power on that propaganda you adopt everything that we have done. You take and place the present Minister of Trade and Commerce where you said you were not going to place him, having passed him over for the position of Finance Minister, and you put him in that office which you yourself, and he himself, declared was an office which was unnecessary, and which was of no use to the country. And when we ask: whether you propose to continue it, and whether you propose to elevate it from the useless and unimportant office you said it was, you get up and you simply ask: did not you have such an office as this? What do you think of it? I submit to my hon. friend that that is not satisfactory.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman has fairly now given to the House, and I thank him for it, the motive and the spirit which animates him. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) told us that in our campaign we condemned everything the late Government did, and that now we approve of everything they did. Well, Sir, we did not condemn everything they did, but we condemned a great deal of what they did.

Mr. FOSTER. You condemned this.

The PRIME MINISTER. Very well, I will take the statement of my hon. friend. Suppose we did, what could we do? Have we not to obey the law? Here is a law which has created a great department of state, and whatever the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) would do under the circumstances, it is our deliberate intention to carry out the law as we find it, until it is amended by Parliament. When this department was formed there were many things which I stated ought to be done in connection with it. When I called my friend the Controller of Customs (Mr. Paterson) to take the portfolio, I stated under my own signature in the public press, that it was the intention of the Government to reconsider the whole system of the Trade and Commerce Department. That is our intention now. But at the same time that I stated that, we have stated over and over again that it was not the intention of Government to introduce any legislation during the present session; that this session was called simply to vote the Estimates. Since there is a Department of Trade and Commerce established under the law, I must ask every fair-minded member in this House to vote the money necessary to carry on this department. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) says that we have condemned everything the Conservative Government did, and that now we are swallowing everything we have condemned. Well, Sir, I hope we shall never be guilty of such moments of weakness as that. While it is open to the Government either to approve or condemn at the present time, I place myself in the judgment of Parliament and in the judgment of the country when I say: whatever views we may have as to the present organization of the Government, as to whether there are too many departments or not, as to whether we should introduce the pruning knife or not, yet we have stated that we shall not ask for any legislation this session, that we shall only ask for Estimates to carry on the Government, and I put it to any fair-minded man on either side of this House or in any part of the country, whether it is right that we should be asked to introduce legislation now, when we have no time to do so. Why, Sir, two of the Ministers were only elected after this session opened. Under such circumstances, I ask can any fair-minded man blame us because at the present time we are not able to introduce measures of reform, even though we think reform advisable. Next session, if we are not prepared with this or any other item of our policy, the hon. gentleman can fairly criticise us. But I repeat that this session was called only for the purpose of voting the Estimates; and, whether rightly or wrongly, we have taken the Estimates prepared by our hon. friends opposite. I again ask the hon. gentleman, does he believe that the Department of Trade and Commerce is useful? He will not answer that. I will answer it for him: he believes it is useful. He created that department himself; he asked Parliament to vote for it; and if we abolished it at the present time, he believes we would commit a great error. I do not care what his judgment may be in the future; but at the present time he is not fair in asking us to lay down any other policy than the policy for which this session was called.

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend could set forth a non possumus, he would be perfectly right in the ground he has taken. He says the Government called this session for one special purpose; but it was within their power to introduce legislation if they wished. It was within their power this session to introduce an Act to do away with useless offices if they thought fit to do so. If they did not think fit to do so, it was not on grounds of public necessity, but on grounds of party convenience. My hon. friend is on record as saying that this was a useless office; he is on record as saying that we have too many departments; he is on record as having written to the Controller of Customs, pledging himself—and that before Parliament had voted on it at all—that he would be paid $7,000 a year and be raised to the rank of a Cabinet Minister. And now he says: I am not ready; party convenience does not allow me to be ready yet to state my policy with reference to these matters; and consequently I am not going to introduce any legislation. The hon. gentleman says that two of the Ministers were not elected till after Parliament met. Whose fault is that? Certainly not the fault of the Opposition. It is the fault of the hon. gentleman himself. He might have chosen his colleagues earlier, and had the elections earlier. My hon. friend cannot shelter himself from the inconsistency of having declaimed for five years against the departments, the constitution of the departments of the Government, and against this one in particular, and yet coming down here and asking for a vote for that same department, and doing it without vouchsafing to the House one single item of information as to the policy he proposes to follow in regard to it.

Office of the High Commissioner—Contingencies, etc ..... $11,200

Mr. FOSTER. I would suggest that the hon. member for North Wellington should have something to say about this.

Mr. McMULLEN. I will say this with regard to the office of High Commissioner. I certainly hope the expenses connected with that office will be reduced. I believe they can be, and I look forward to that being done. In the meantime, while it is necessary to provide for the gentleman who now occupies that very distinguished position, I do not think it would be right to detain the House by entering into a criticism at present. But I believe this department and every other will receive due consideration at the hands of the Government; and, if hon. gentlemen opposite will only possess their souls in patience, they will find that very considerable reductions can be made, and they will no doubt be delighted when they find how economically the Government now in power can handle the affairs of this country. If the ex-Finance Minister will cultivate a little patience, I hope his seat, to which he is relegated for a number of years, will be more comfortable in a little while.

Mr. FOSTER. I have heard that expression used so often, "possess your souls in patience, we cannot make the reduction now," that I would like my hon. friend to give me a definition of it. Is it to be coterminous with the occupancy of the Government benches by the present Government?

Mr. McMULLEN. We intend to do something different from what my hon. friend did when he intimated some time ago to this House that he was going to reduce the tariff. He sent a delegation through this country—the Controller of Customs and the Controller of Inland Revenue; and he himself and Mr. Angers went to the North-west to find out what changes should be made in the tariff. He was not able to tell us what he was going to do; he wanted the people to tell him what to do. Then he came down to Parliament with a large number of reductions in the tariff; but when the manufacturers expressed their indignation at the proposed changes, the hon. gentleman declared that a lot of them were clerical errors, and he put the old duties back again. The mountain in labour brought forth a mouse. I hope nothing of that kind will be done by this Government.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not intend to detain the committee long, but I feel that it would be only right that I should take this opportunity of saying that whatever reductions the Government may find it in their power to make in the public expenditures, I think a careful examination will bring them all to the conclusion that it would be very unwise to reduce the expenditure connected with the High Commissioner's Office. I may remind the committee that the first gentleman who was appointed to that office, with the same salary and emoluments that now appertain to it, Sir Alexander Galt, after holding the office for some time, refused to continue in it because he said the provision made for the office was not sufficient to enable him to discharge its duties efficiently. The Government, being unwilling to ask for an increase on the amount that had been provided, namely, $10,000 salary and $4,000 contingencies, were reluctantly obliged to accept that hon. gentleman's resignation. He resigned solely and distinctly upon the ground that he could only retain the office of High Commissioner and efficiently discharge the duties connected with it, unless the Government would materially increase the salary. I believe that the more attention the Government give to that office, the more satisfied they will become of the importance of continuing it and having it filled, as it now is, by a gentleman of high character, position and ability. I am quite certain that a most careful and critical examination of the expenses connected with that department will bring the Government to the conclusion that they would not be acting in the public interests if they made any reduction.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I am bound to say that the results of the expenditure on this office have not been satisfactory. I felt very much humiliated the other night at the public dinner given to Lord Russell when he and his friends said that people in the old country knew nothing about Canada. I submit there is something wrong when men of broad education, such as those, know nothing about this country. There is a very striking letter published in the papers, written by a clever gentleman from my province, Mr. Eaton, in which Mr. Eaton finds that the ignorance regarding Canada in England is so great that he, a Conservative of the Conservatives, advises Canada to become independent. He mentioned, for example, a journalist over there asking if Nova Scotia was one of England's possessions. A gentleman from Montreal told me that he was in Liverpool or Manchester one evening among a crowd of people who were listening to an agent employed by some American railway companies, discussing the United States and this country. He spoke of Montreal as a little village inhabited by Indians and French. Mr. Eaton asked permission to speak, which was given him, and he told the crowd that it was a shame for Englishmen to know so little about their own colony and be so easily deceived, and he then went on to tell them what kind of a country Canada is. As a matter of fact, there is little information about Canada in England, although we have spent large sums of money for the purpose of making our country known. Perhaps we have not been spending enough, but certainly we have spent a good deal for a country of our population. Perhaps the fact that so little was paid the High Commissioner may be the reason why so little is known of Canada in England. If not enough is paid, let the amount be larger, but the plea put forward by the ex-Premier was not that it was not large enough for the purpose but that the High Commissioner could not live on it there, and of course, I suppose, could not travel. The late Government were always claiming that they were going to bring out people from the old country to this, and for this purpose they had agencies established all through the great centres on the other side. One thing is certain, Canada must be made better known in the motherland. It is very sad to know that not only the capital but the people of England find their way to the United States when we should have them here; and I, for one, would not begrudge any reasonable expenditure to remove the ignorance that exists regarding this country in England and make Canada better known as a field for investment and immigration, and thus bring to our country the best elements in the world to become citizens in our great and wealthy country.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I had the honour, like the hon. gentleman, of being present at the banquet to which the hon. gentleman has referred. I did not understand the Lord Chief Justice of England to express his views regarding the complete ignorance of the English people concerning Canada in the way in which the hon. gentleman seems to have understood him. I understood him to say that the knowledge of Englishmen of Canadian affairs and the resources of Canada was continually increasing, though he admitted that for a long period of time the English people had been sadly ignorant of the resources and capabilities of this country. I think that Canadians, especially those who occasionally visit England, must admit that so long as Canada remains an important portion of the Empire, it is quite out of the question that she should not be represented by a High Commissioner. If the hon. gentleman expects that the High Commissioner is going to travel round and educate 38,000,000 or 39,000,000 of Englishmen for a salary of $10,000, I could readily understand that he would call upon the Government, of which he is an important supporter, to consider whether the High Commissioner should not be paid a little more. Though I am strongly opposed to the present Administration, yet, if the High Commissioner is to be entrusted with the education of the English nation, I would be quite prepared to support the Government in increasing his salary by a good many thousand dollars, and I do not think he would then be paid too much. But even if that increase should take place, it would be quite impossible for the High Commissioner to do anything more than attend to the business that is continually being transacted between England and Canada. I am prepared to say that I do not believe that the High Commissioner is paid sufficiently for the position he occupies. His first duty is to represent his country in a manner worthy of it.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I differ a little from some hon. gentlemen with regard to the results brought about by our having a High Commissioner in England. I have thought that, probably, the difficulty is not so much in the salary as in the man. The expenditure has been a large one. It is stated that the salary is nominally $10,000. But we know that there is an extra vote of $2,000, and that practically the High Commissioner gets a salary of $12,000. The salary may not have been too high, but the Commissioner has been too high—I think that is where the fault is. If we are to have a man there, he should be one who will mix more with the masses and less with the aristocracy, a man who will make his influence felt among the people whom we wish to draw to this country. I believe you could find such a man in the ranks of the Liberals; I believe we could have more effective service by having a Liberal as High Commissioner than by having an old foggy Tory. We know that we had a Commissioner in Paris, and we used to have fights over the vote to pay him. It was discovered that for several years—I think it was four or five years—the total result of the mission of that man in France, who was getting about $4,000 a year, was that he succeeded in getting one woman to emigrate to Canada. And yet the Government kept on paying him $4,000 a year and other expenses. For these positions we want practical men, who will do practical work, and we have not had that kind of men.

Mr. DAVIN. I wish to say one or two words on this vote.

Mr. FRASER. Hurry up.

Mr. DAVIN. I may say to the hon. gentleman that I think he is not likely, by making such remarks as that, pertinent or otherwise, to further progress in this committee. I will take the liberty, on any item that comes up, to express the opinion of my constituents, and any criticism that is called for from me as a member of this House. I deprecate, and I believe the country will deprecate the position taken by hon. gentlemen on the other side. Their position seems to be this: Now we are in power, these offices that we attacked as extravagant while others were in power, we intend to maintain, and you are in no position to criticise, because you supported the men who filled or favoured these offices in the past. I hope we are not going to see any great party in this country, after having for a series of years attacked certain expenditure in opposition, when they get into power cynically declare that they will make no reduction and no reform. And I say here that the country will be disappointed, and especially the western country, so far as I know, it will be disappointed, if hon. gentlemen who have made promises so persistently and so definitely, do not accomplish something in the line of their various promises. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) referred to what was said by the Lord Chief Justice of England at the banquet—

Mr. FRASER. And others.

Mr. DAVIN. I had the honour of being at the banquet, but I did not understand that anything that was said indicated that the High Commissioner, or the High Commissioner's Office in the past had failed to do an educating work that would tend to get rid of the ignorance that my hon. friend, I think, exaggeratedly, described. The office of High Commissioner would be a very extraordinary one, indeed, if it was expected to remove the ignorance—but only the comparative ignorance—that has existed in England. I differ from my hon. friend in his opinion. He seems to think that the ignorance is dense and unrelieved. My opinion is that in England there has been a constant increase of knowledge concerning Canada, and that that increase is going on, and that anybody who has kept track of the conduct of this office by the late High Commissioner and his predecessor, could not fail to see that these gentlemen had done the very thing that my hon. friend who has just spoken (Mr. Somerville), says should be done. They have gone about the country, they have interested themselves in everything that took place in England in any way relating to Canada; and no man who is accustomed to read the English papers, could have failed to see that these gentlemen kept Canada constantly in evidence in the old country. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Somerville), if I understood him, said the very contrary to-day of what I have heard from him in the past. He does not seem to think now that too much money is spent on the office of High Commissioner. He seems to think now that it is not so much the money but the man, and that the High Commissionership has failed to achieve its object because he was what he calls an old foggy Tory. Well, Sir, nobody acquainted with the magnificent abilities of Sir Alexander Galt, nobody acquainted with his capacity for filling a quasi-ambassadorial position, as this is, should have committed himself to any such proposition as that. I will not say anything here about the way the present leader of the Opposition discharged his duties in the office of High Commissioner, because it is not necessary: his record in that office is so recent that it is not necessary for me to say one word about it. His action was so successful as to defy adverse criticism. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman rather adumbrates a picture than paints one, as to the type of man that will succeed as High Commissioner. He thinks an occupant of that office should be more democratic, and says that in the rank and file of the Liberals the right man may be found. As Lord Byron said about a poem of Wordsworth that was sung in regard to a very interesting subject:

He that saw the poet in his glory
Conceived the bard the hero of the story.

I could not help thinking that when my hon. friend was eulogizing that undefined Liberal in the ranks of the Liberal party who was to be so affected, that he must have had himself in view, and that he would be successful as High Commissioner. Well, Sir, I quite agree with him, that in any great function like that it is not merely the salary that is to be considered, although we have to look very carefully to the amount: and I have no doubt that when my hon. friend is promoted to that high position, he will discharge his duties with a more democratic flavour, probably, than they have been discharged in the past. But whatever democratic flavour may attach to his action in that position, I greatly doubt if either he or any other member of the Liberal party can show more energy, more zeal, more activity and more attention to everything that could further the interests of Canada, than have been shown in the past by Sir Alexander Galt in the first place, and in the next place by the late incumbent of that high position.

Mr. DAVIN.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not rise at all for the purpose of defending the present Government and the present Prime Minister from the attack that was indirectly levelled against him and the Government by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Somerville). When the hon. gentleman complained that all who had been appointed High Commissioners were men of the wrong stamp altogether, he, of course, condemned the course of the present Prime Minister, of whom I thought he had been an ardent supporter, when he continued in office the present High Commissioner who had been appointed by the Conservative Government. I do not think, either, that it is necessary for me in this House to say one word in defence of the present High Commissioner. I think he is a gentleman who has commanded the respect and the admiration of hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House, and I am surprised that there was to be found any single member in this House who would have thrown a stone at him or at his reputation.

But what I did wish to say, and only for a moment, is this, that I should be very sorry indeed if this House were to suppose that there had not been a very marked and a very remarkable increase of knowledge in England with respect to Canada. I think it would be very unfortunate that the idea should go out of doors, or should prevail in the minds of hon. members of this House, that such a dense condition of ignorance with regard to Canada exists in England as one would naturally conclude from listening to the remarks that have fallen from the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser). I regret as much as any other hon. member of this House that more is not known in England about Canada; but I know also that there has been a most remarkable increase of knowledge with regard to this country in England as compared with the knowledge which existed only a short time ago. I visited England in 1892, and I was astonished to find how much more was known then of Canada than had been known when I was over there previously. Day by day, and almost hour by hour, one might say, the public mind in England is being more turned towards this country, and I venture to say that never since the people of England have taken an interest in Canada, have they taken so warm an interest as they are doing at this moment. When I hear hon. gentlemen get up in this House and talk about some suggestion that Canada should become independent, whatever that may mean, because the people of England do not know more about our affairs than they do now, why, I must say that for my part I deprecate remarks of that kind very much on the part of any hon. member of this House. The remarks that were made by the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall), I think, were perfectly correct, and apropos, to the effect that what was required in England was simply the education of the young people with regard to the great outlying possessions of the Crown. It is quite impossible that that knowledge which we all desire to see can be found in England with regard to Canada, and Australia, and South Africa, unless it is imparted in the schools to begin with. You want to go to the root of the matter, and you want to endeavour to induce those who have the control of the educational system in England, to take hold of this great and important question. In order to spread the knowledge that ought to be possessed by every British subject in every part of the Empire with regard to all parts of the Empire, you want to get those who are in authority and have control of education in the mother country, to take that question up, and to have a careful instruction of the young people in the public schools with regard to the resources of the Empire. Until that is done we never can expect that the people of England will know as much about our affairs, and as much about the affairs of our friends in Australia and South Africa, as they ought to do. But to suggest that this can be done from the High Commissioner's office, is, I think, a little too absurd. Certainly the High Commissioner may endeavour to bring that view before the minds of the governing classes in England, and endeavour to get them to take the question up. But further than that, and further than the High Commissioners have gone already in the way of instructing public opinion in England, I do not think they can very well go. So far as I am concerned, if the important office of High Commissioner in England requires, in order that it shall be maintained, and that the duties connected with it shall be efficiently discharged, that there should be a larger appropriation for the purpose, I shall for one gladly support any proposition of that kind, provided the necessity for it be made evident.

Mr. LISTER. I may say in answer to the hon. member who has just spoken—(Mr. McNeill), that it may be quite true that within his particular circle in the old country, people may know something about Canada. But it is equally true that should a Canadian go to the old country, he is put down at once, not as a Canadian, but as an American. The people of England do not appear to distinguish between people from the United States and people from Canada.

Mr. McNEILL. They put him down as an American because he is an American.

Mr. LISTER. Yes, and he is a Canadian, too.

Mr. McNEILL. Certainly.

Mr. LISTER. Whether this office is necessary, I do not intend to discuss at all. Suffice it for me to know that the office has been in existence for a great number of years. I think I am well within the mark when I say that long before, and up to the time that the hon. leader of the Opposition became the incumbent of that office, the duties were as well discharged as they were since that hon. gentleman took the position. Sir, the people of this country may well complain that the office has been an expensive luxury to Canada; they may well say that that office, although it may be necessary, although it may be in the interest of the country, may be carried on at a less expenditure than it has been. I remember well that I was in Parliament at the time the leader of the Opposition was appointed to that office, and while I was not in the secrets of the party, it was pretty well understood throughout the country and in the House, that at that particular time the late Sir John A. Macdonald wanted to get rid of the late incumbent of the office, but the inducements were not sufficient, and so the importance of the office was increased, increased in many other ways as well as in point of salary. It was then made $10,000 a year as salary, with all the other things appertaining to the office, a free house, taxes upon salary paid, furniture and rent paid, with $2,000 a year for travelling expenses. Even the champagne glasses that were used upon the table of the hon. gentleman, were paid for out of the treasury of this country. There was actually a charge in the account for the winding up of a clock in the residence of the High Commissioner for Canada. Sir, all these things have come out, and the people of the country were astounded, they were amazed, at the charges that were imposed upon Canada in connection with that position.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is quite mistaken. There never was any such charge—no charge for winding the clock.

Mr. LISTER. I beg pardon. If the hon. gentleman will turn up the Auditor General's report, he will find it. It was unearthed by the hon. gentleman who has just entered the House (Mr. McMullen), either in the House or in the Public Accounts Committee.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I understand the hon. gentleman to say that there was a charge of that kind in connection with the High Commissioner's residence?

Mr. LISTER. Will the hon. gentleman say that there was no charge for winding up the clock in the office?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not speak of that.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman was appointed to the office. I have never heard, and I have never tried to find out what were the particular duties of the High Commissioner in England. No doubt the records show that the hon. gentleman travelled over France and Spain and other countries, but I never found anything accomplished by the High Commissioner. We heard two or three sessions ago that the High Commissioner went to Southampton, took off his coat, pushed his hands into a supposed diseased carcase, and declared there was no pleuro-pneumonia. These are the duties performed, so far as the public know of them. The Government found an excuse for establishing the office. What was the excuse? We were told that whereas we had to pay large sums of money to negotiate public loans, when the High Commissioner was appointed this would form a part of his duty, and in this way money would be saved to Canada. It is hinted—I do not know with how much truth—that the High Commissioner did on one occasion negotiate a loan, and it is said that a very considerable commission was kept by the High Commissioner for the negotiating of the loan. That may be true or false—that is the statement.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have no hesitation in saying that the hon. gentleman is abusing most grossly his position as a member of this House. He knows that the only person who ventured outside of this House to make that charge was served at once with a criminal process, and that the newspaper in Montreal, the Montreal "Herald," promptly made the amende honorable, and the hon. gentleman knows that against the party in the city of Halifax who made that charge criminal proceedings were instituted against him, and that case is now before the courts. The hon. gentleman is grossly abusing his privileges as a member in venturing to reiterate a foul, lying statement, in regard to which I took the most prompt and effective measures to bring the parties to justice. The statement that I made, in connection with any loan for the Government of Canada, one single farthing in any shape or way is the most unfounded falsehood any hon. gentleman could make.

Mr. LISTER. Of course, the hon. gentleman says that he has never received any consideration whatever in connection with any loan he negotiated for the people of Canada.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman made that statement. All I know is this, that there is a matter of a good many thousands of dollars in connection with a loan negotiated in England that has never been satisfactorily accounted for by the late Government. And I know moreover this, that while the hon. gentleman says he has taken proceedings in Halifax for the prosecution of the man who published the statement, that case has never been brought to trial. Of course, until it is brought to trial, we have no right to prejudge it; we have no right to say what defence will be made. The hon. gentleman says now that the charge made is unfounded. Of course it is our duty to accept the answer of the hon. gentleman and the explanation that he has made here. But, Sir, as I have said, that trial has never taken place.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to say that I have taken the most prompt measures possible down to the present moment to press that matter to a conclusion.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman will allow me; there is another point brought up, that should be either substantiated or withdrawn. The hon. gentleman has made a special and a general charge. He has said that with respect to the loans issued by the late Government there is a large charge in connection with one or more of them that has never been satisfactorily explained to the House. The impression which the hon. gentleman desires to leave, and which he did leave, was that there was a corrupt transaction in connection with a loan. He cannot stay there; he must substantiate what he has stated or withdraw it.

Mr. LISTER. I do not purpose to be dictated to by the ex-Finance Minister either in the House or out of it—and I think the hon. gentleman must not be ignorant of it. The people of the country generally believe that in connection with certain negotiations involving loans in the old country satisfactory explanations have not been made.

Mr. FOSTER. Then I ask the hon. gentleman to specify the loans. I have been Finance Minister from 1889 on. I want to know if that statement includes any loan I issued in London. The hon. gentleman must specify.

Mr. DEVLIN. The country regrets you ever were Finance Minister.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman probably will have an opportunity—

An hon. MEMBER. Answer his question.

Mr. LISTER. I shall not be interrupted by you, Sir. The hon. gentleman will have an opportunity, no doubt, before very long—

Mr. FOSTER. But I want the opportunity now. I do not want to lie under an imputation of that kind and have it go abroad to the country, and then for the hon. gentleman instead of specifying his charge, to tell me that some time I shall have an opportunity. It is a base thing to do.

Mr. TAYLOR. I will just say this—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order.

An hon. MEMBER. Order, order.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. What is the point of order raised by the hon. gentleman?

Mr. TAYLOR. If I cannot address the committee, I will speak to a point of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. A question was put to the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), and I suppose he has the floor now.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The other hon. member (Mr. Taylor) rose, and he is now addressing the committee.

Mr. TAYLOR. I was going on to say this, that if hon. gentlemen opposite expect to get the Estimates through, they will have to repress their supporters behind them. This item will not pass until the hon. gentleman who made that statement either retracts it or comes down with a definite statement in regard to the ex-Finance Minister, or any other item in the Estimates, even if members stay here three months. If hon. gentlemen are going to undertake to blacken the character of the late Government by insinuations regarding loans—

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I call hon. gentlemen to order.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) is not speaking to the point of order.

Mr. TAYLOR. I was not speaking to a point of order. If it was argued that I had not the right to speak, I said I would speak to the point of order.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). What is the point of order?

Mr. TAYLOR. The point of order I raise is this, that the hon. member for Lambton has made an accusation or insinuation that he does not attempt to prove.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). That is not a point of order.

It being Six o'clock, the Committee rose, and the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again in Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. LISTER. Mr. Chairman, when the Committee rose we were discussing the items in connection with the office of High Commissioner in England, and I was attempting to point out to the committee that the reasons given by the Government for increasing the salary and increasing the expenditure of that office had entirely failed. We were told at that time that the High Commissioner's services would be utilized in the way of negotiating loans for Canada, and that the brokerage charge and commissions that had formerly been paid by the Government for this service, would be saved to the country. I pointed out that it was stated that only one of those loans had been negotiated through the instrumentality of the High Commissioner, and that all the other loans had been negotiated in the usual way, namely, by brokers employed by the Government, to whom the usual commission was paid. I pointed out that there was since a rumour that the reason the Government did not continue to do the business in the way contemplated was that the High Commissioner had negotiated a loan and that he had charged brokerage. I also stated that that charge had been made by a newspaper in Halifax, and as the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) says he demanded a retraction of the charges in that article; but, as a matter of fact, I believe the editor refused to retract, and the consequence was that criminal proceedings for libel were taken against him. Those proceedings I believe are still pending, and the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) says that the charge made by that paper, and the rumour that he had charged commission upon the loan negotiated through him, are utterly foundationless. I am bound, Mr. Chairman, to accept the statement of the leader of the Opposition unreservedly. That is his statement made upon the floor of this House, and it must be accepted by me here, at all events, until the criminal proceedings have been terminated one way or the other.

The ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) thought proper to take exception to a statement which I made, namely, that he was unable to account as to whom brokerage charges for the negotiations of a late Canadian loan had been paid. I desire to say to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), that I have a distinct recollection of his being unable to give that information; but that in making that statement, I did not want it to be understood in any sense that I imputed any personal corruption to him at all. Nothing was more remote from my intention or idea, so far as that is concerned. I wish it to be understood, however, that he as Finance Minister did not give the information as to the brokerage paid by the Government for the negotiation of that loan. Now, my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), who is not in his seat now—

Mr. McNEILL. Yes, he is.

Mr. LISTER. I beg your pardon. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) took occasion this afternoon to speak in the most fervent language of the virtues and the great services that the ex-High Commissioner (Sir Charles Tupper) had rendered to the country.

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend will excuse me. I believe that the ex-High Commissioner has rendered very great services to the country, but I was not referring at all to the ex-High Commissioner (Sir Charles Tupper), but to the present High Commissioner (Sir Donald Smith).

Mr. LISTER. Oh, you were not referring to Sir Charles Tupper.

Mr. McNEILL. I was referring to a remark which had fallen from an hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Somerville), which was a reflection on the conduct of the leader of the present Government.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I can only say, Mr. Speaker, that the remarks I made with reference to the High Commissioner were not intended to refer to the present High Commissioner (Sir Donald Smith) at all, but to the ex-High Commissioner, the gentleman who now leads the Opposition in this House.

Mr. McNEILL. I can only say, Mr. Chairman, that the remarks of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Somerville) were applied to all the High Commissioners who had been nominated by the Conservative party.

Mr. LISTER. Well, Mr. Chairman, so far as the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) is concerned, a change indeed has come over the spirit of his dreams within the last five or six months. He has certainly changed his views as to the ex-High-Commissioner within a very recent period. If I remember correctly, the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) delivered a speech during the last session of this Parliament which reflected very, very severely upon the ex-High Commissioner (Sir Charles Tupper), and in order to show how a man's mind will turn, and how people may be come hypnotized, so to speak, it will be interesting to the House to know how the hon. member (Mr. McNeill) viewed the ex-High Commissioner, only last session. If time permitted, it would be interesting to the House to know how it was that such a change has come within such a short time. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) said last session :

I say that the course he (Sir Charles Tupper) has pursued since he came here, goes to show that he is utterly unfit to be the leader of any party in a constitutionally governed country.

Well, Mr. Chairman, if I remember correctly we are a constitutionally governed country, and for a considerable number of days past we have been discussing the constitution, and gentlemen on the other side, including my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), proclaimed that the constitution was shattered and torn to pieces on account of the Governor General's warrants. He continued :

I say unfit to be the leader of any party which has any respect for itself.

Yet we find the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) to-day supporting a leader who, on the 2nd day of April last, he said :

—was unfit to be the leader of any party which has any respect for itself, or the leader of any House that has any respect for itself.

If the information which I have just received is correct, that hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill), who to-night spoke so fervently and so feelingly, and who appears to be so loyal to the leader of his party, on the 2nd day of April last used these words :

Mr. McNEILL.

Any hon. gentleman who has no more consideration for the conscientious differences of members of his own party than the hon. gentleman has shown, is, I say, unfit to be the leader of a party. If ever there was a time when it was necessary for a man to show something of his gifts of statesmanship in the leading of a party, this is the time. If ever there was an occasion when a leader of a party utterly failed to show those necessary gifts, the time is now, and the leader is the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House.

So far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is necessary for me, surely in this House, or before the country, to repudiate the insinuations that the hon. gentleman has made with regard to my desire for a seat in the Senate. That matter has been before this House already. The hon. gentleman's leader has written a letter with regard to that matter, in which he has stated the very opposite of what the hon. gentleman has endeavoured to insinuate here to-night. Whether that was so or not, whatever the character of the hon. gentleman may happen to be here in Canada, whatever views the people of Canada may happen to hold of the hon. gentleman's record as a public man, I venture humbly to believe that they hold a view of my public record rather different than that which the hon. gentleman has endeavoured to instill into the minds of the people to-night. Since I have had the honour of a seat in this House, I do not think any hon. member on either side will say that I have done anything derogatory, either to my position as a member of this House, or as a member of the Conservative party in this House. I wish I could say as much of the hon. gentleman. He has not been here very long, but he has been here long enough to do what I believe is disgraceful to the party of which he is leader ; he has been here long enough, Sir, to give a solemn pledge in writing that a certain resolution, which was amended to suit himself, would receive his cordial support in this House ; he has been here long enough, after having given that statement in writing, to speak over and over again to the gentleman to whom he gave that written pledge over his own signature, promising him his support to the resolution when it came up in the House, and he has been here long enough to get up in this House and falsify the pledge he gave, by deliberately opposing the resolution he promised to support. I hope, Sir, that so long as I have the honour of a seat in this House, no such disgraceful record can ever be urged against me. I should be ashamed, Sir, I should hide my head, I should wish leave this House and to retire into private life, if such a statement could be truthfully made against me. The hon. gentleman knows what the facts are. The hon. gentleman is here, and he can contradict what I say, if he pleases ; and I will sit down and give him an opportunity to do so, if he can do so.

Then the hon. gentleman did sit down. He went on :

I have his letter, and his letter has been read in this House ; and, if the hon. gentleman can give any explanation of the course he has taken in that regard, any explanation which will persuade hon. gentlemen that he has pursued an honourable and straightforward course in that regard, I shall be very happy for the sake of the party that he unfortunately leads.

One can scarcely believe that these words were uttered by the hon. gentleman who rose in his place and spoke so eloquently of the services of the hon. gentleman whom he now follows. Now, Mr. Chairman, so far as this matter is concerned, I think my view has always been that the expenses of the establishment in London could, in the interests of the country, be cut down. I believe they should be cut down, and I believe the Government in power to-day, in the performance of the duty they owe to the country, will, in this case, as in every other where it is possible, be found exercising that economy which they promised to the country they would exercise. I firmly believe that the Government of the day will be found carrying out the promises they made to the people, and giving to this country an honest and economical administration of public affairs.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Chairman. I imagine that in the history of the Parliament of Canada this is the first occasion on which a few words uttered by the leader of the Opposition in support of an estimate submitted by the Government, have been made the basis of an elaborate attack upon him. I am at a loss to know what this means. I cannot understand it. It is a course so unparalleled, so utterly at variance with what we have been accustomed to in this Parliament, that it puzzles one to arrive at any conclusion as to what it all means. There is only one thing that occurs to me on the spur of the moment: that is, that the Government, having made a motion to go into Supply, instead of raising any question on any motion—and hon. gentlemen know that there are a number of questions that require ventilation—the Opposition were prepared, at the suggestion of the Government, to go into the Estimates without loss of time, and to assist the Government, as far as they could, in expediting the business of the House. Well, Sir what happens? An hon. member who has taken a very prominent part in the transactions of this House for many years, gets up and makes an altogether unprovoked attack on the Opposition, who have shown a desire to facilitate the public business. Was the hon. gentleman acting on behalf of his friends around him who are anxious that this session should not terminate within thirty days? I put it to the committee whether any exhibition has taken place in this House which was more obviously a waste of time or an unqualified obstruction of public business, than that which the hon. gentleman has been guilty of. There was no necessity for his reading from the pages of "Hansard" for the purpose of dragging into this discussion an unfortunate collision which took place between the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) and myself. Nobody regrets more than I do that in the heat of debate that unfortunate collision occurred, and I have no doubt that in the heat of that unfortunate collision the hon. member expressed himself more warmly than in ordinary circumstances he would have done.

We recognized that that hon. gentleman was just as conscientious in the course he took in obstructing the measure which we believed it our duty to press, as we were in pressing it; and the antagonism which existed between the leader of the party in the House of Commons and a section of the party who differed from us on that unfortunate question which led to those unpleasant exchanges of views on both sides. Why should the hon. gentleman drag in that matter, which is entirely unconnected with the question before the House? He does not mean to say, I suppose, that gentlemen who have acted in opposition to one another, gentlemen who may have spent many long years in determined opposition to one another, are never to become associated again. What does he say to the presence in this Cabinet of the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell)?

Mr. LISTER. He left your party on account of its corruption.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman knows that my hon. friend from Quebec West, if he will allow me to call him so—because we have always been friends—for many years conscientiously differed from the party with whom he is now associated, and was regarded as one of the strong, active and energetic supporters of the Liberal-Conservative party. I have always regarded the hon. gentleman in that light, and was always proud to have his support in every possible way for the party with which I was connected. I do not complain that that hon. gentleman, for reasons best known to himself, should have felt it his duty and his right to give his support to the gentlemen now on the Treasury benches, and to become a member of that Administration.

I have not challenged that right; but I say that if the fact that gentlemen have been led by active warm debate and discussion to express opinions strongly in opposition to each other, is to prevent their ever acting together again, I think the hon. gentleman will find that it will hardly do for gentlemen on that side to take that position. There can be no question that public interests very often compel gentlemen who have acted in strong antagonism for years to become associated and identified in the same party and work together. I do not intend to take further time in connection with this matter, but I may ask since the hon. gentleman is adopting the course here tonight of obstructing the Government, for his conduct is the most pure and palpable obstruction that this Government has met with since Parliament assembled.—I say unhesitatingly there has been no action on the part of any member of this House that has been so calculated to obstruct the progress of public business—what can be his reason? It looks as if he were alarmed, when he found the Opposition ready to facilitate the Government in carrying through the public business, lest this session would not go over the thirty days, and therefore he must make an entirely unprovoked attack on the Opposition of this House for the purpose of protracting and preventing business being done. I am not certain that that was the case. I think perhaps there is another reason. Every one knows that the hon. gentleman has been smarting keenly and complaining bitterly of the fact that he was overlooked. Every one knows that no hon. member in this House has felt more keenly the indignity that has been placed upon him by the Government of the day passing by his long continued services on the floor of this Parliament and going to a gentleman who never sat inside of these walls to take the place which he ought to have taken in the Cabinet. Is it possible that it is this smouldering wrath on the part of the hon. gentleman against the Government for having overlooked his services which has led to this unprovoked obstruction of public business? Let me give the hon. gentleman a little advice and a suggestion, which may be useful to him in the future. The hon. gentleman has been content to do the humblest and most offensive and most unjustifiable work that was ever done on the floor of this Parliament. For long years he has consented to be the scavenger of his party. For long years he consented to lower himself, and what I regret infinitely more, lower and degrade the character of this Parliament, by pursuing just such unworthy courses as he has pursued to-night. He has ventured, when sitting in Opposition, to assail the Government of the day and the members of that Government with foul, baseless innuendos.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. LISTER. Let him go on.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I say innuendos of a most damaging character, which he dare not outside of this House commit himself to for a moment. The hon. gentleman sheltered himself under his prerogative of member of Parliament, to utter the most scandalous libels upon hon. gentlemen where he knows he is safe and protected from retaliation—protected from being placed in the dock, as he would be if he ventured to give these scandalous innuendos that measure of belief on his part, which would enable him to be dealt with by the criminal law of this country. The hon. gentleman found that that is not a very paying service. He has found the men against whom he levelled these attacks still enjoying the confidence of the people of Canada to an extent that he can never hope to enjoy it. He has found that, while these attacks and these innuendos have passed by without inflicting the slightest injury upon their object—these attacks which, I repeat, were not only degrading to himself but calculated to degrade the character of this

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Parliament as it has never been lowered by any other hon. gentleman in this House—he himself has been passed by just as completely. What has been the result of these attacks? Why, the Government in whose behalf he apparently took this course of conduct on the floor of this House were ashamed to associate themselves with him as a Minister of the Crown. I tell the hon. gentleman that if he wishes to attain that great object of his ambition at some future day, he had better conform more to the practices that are customary among gentlemen in the Parliament of the country than pursue such a course as he has constantly committed himself to and as he has ventured to pursue to-night. There never was, in the history of Parliament, a more unjustifiable, disgraceful, unwarranted attack upon any hon. gentleman in this House. The hon. member got up here and by innuendo made a charge of gross corruption and malfeasance of office—a charge of having profited by loans put on the market by the people of Canada, a charge of the most disgraceful character, although he knew that the instant it was made, the newspapers that made it were instantly brought to book, and those who did not tender a frank apology, as was done by more than one paper, were subjected to criminal proceedings and the matter placed before the courts. I instructed my counsel, who are present in the House and know the truth of what I say, to proceed as vigorously as possible; but the party proceeded against, on one pretense or other, obtained postponement from time to time, and has prevented the issue being tried as promptly as I desired. The parties who were guilty of this libel against my character knew that all they had to do was to place me on the stand and examine and cross-examine me, and they did not do it. Under these circumstances, there has never been an instance, in this or any other Parliament, in which a gentleman, in such a case as that, came forward and took the responsibility of making an insinuation of that kind, knowing that he was sheltered by the privileges of Parliament from being prosecuted, as he would be instantly, if he dared to make outside of this House the statement he made here.

I do not want to assist the hon. gentleman in obstructing public business, but as he has raised the question—and a very important question it is in my judgment—that it is the duty of this Government to cut down the expenses of the office of the High Commissioner in London, I would fail in my duty to Canada if I did not give the House some reason why I think such a course would be most unjustifiable. The position of High Commissioner was instituted by the Government of Canada, and an Act passed fixing the salary at $10,000 a year for the services of that officer with contingencies of $4,000 a year for house rent, fuel, light, carriage expenses and things of that kind. That is the position to-day. The hon. gentleman ventured to say that before I would accept the office, I insisted upon an increase of the salary and emolument. The statement is as foundationless as all the other statements the hon. gentleman has ventured to make. What happened was this? When the Government felt that they could not ask Parliament to increase the salary and contingencies of that office beyond $14,000 a year, and the late lamented Sir Alexander Galt declared that he could not afford to hold the office unless the salary was increased, I consented to accept the position at the same salary as that of my predecessor, Sir Alexander Galt.

It was found that during the incumbency of Sir Alexander Galt, at one time he was occupying lodgings in one part of London, and at another time in another part of London. When I came to enter upon the duties of the High Commissionership I suggested to the late lamented Right Sir John A. Macdonald that it would be as well to pay interest as rent and that it was desirable that the High Commissioner for Canada should have a fixed residence, so that every Canadian coming to London, high or low, rich or poor, however humble he might be requiring the services of the High Commissioner, might know at once where he could find him at any hour of the day or night. Under these circumstances the Government decided to purchase a house and furnish it for the use of the High Commissioner, and they charged against the contingencies payable to me $2,000, and brought the contingencies down from $4,000 to $2,000, giving me a furnished house instead of the payment provided for the rent of a house, and the balance of the contingencies were expended under the law in the same way as they had formerly been. No increased expenditure was incurred, and during my incumbency of the office, which commenced in 1883, either here or there, the duties have been discharged to the best of my ability. All I can say is that no officer of this Government ever endeavoured more conscientiously and more untiringly to perform the duties of his office and to do everything that it was possible to do to promote the interest of Canada and to meet the wishes of Canadians of all parties and all classes than I have done. The hon. gentleman would insinuate that the salary paid to Sir Alexander Galt has been increased and that it ought not to be increased. Now, in the first place, no increase has taken place; and, in the second place I will detain the House a few moments while I call attention to a return laid upon the Table of this House last session in answer to a motion by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) I think. This return says:

In accordance with your instructions, I have caused to be prepared a statement, year by year, of the various correspondence between the Privy Council Office and the High Commissioner's Office in London, from its establishment on the 1st May, 1880, to the 1st January, 1896.

I may state that Sir Alexander Galt was first appointed and that I became High Commissioner in 1883. The following is the table referred to:—

Year	No. of documents.	No. of folios
1830	32	77
1831	47	121
1832	110	210
1833	246	486
1834	669	1,335
1835	657	1,635
1836	1,229	3,487
1837	1,188	2,772
1838	952	2,607
1839	849	2,661
1840	726	3,468
1841	1,223	4,041
1842	1,773	5,808
1843	1,120	3,089
1844	1,509	5,799
1845	1,304	4,423

It will be observed that this shows only the increase of communications between the Privy Council here, and the High Commissioner's office in London. The return goes on:

The following statement shows the amount saved in salaries and allowances to the High Commissioner during the several periods when Sir Charles Tupper, Bart., filled that office without salary:—

From 30th May, 1883, to 20th May, 1884, at $12,000 per annum.....	$11,934 24
From 27th January, 1887, to 28th May, 1888, at $12,000 per annum.....	15,813 70
From 15th January, 1896, to 15th March, 1896, at $12,000 per annum.	2,000 00
	$29,747 94

During the whole of this period, from 1893 down to the appointment of the Hon. Sir Donald Smith, the office was under my management, and expenses were saved to the extent given, during the time which I held the office of Finance Minister and had the supervision of the office under the able management of Mr. Colmer.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). But you were in Canada.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes; I was in Canada during the session, and in London during the summer.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. You were drawing full pay as a Minister?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I was drawing full pay as Minister of Finance, but nothing as High Commissioner, and thus the salary of High Commissioner was saved. That is the very point to which I was drawing the attention of the House.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. And we had to get an Act of Parliament passed to enable you to sit in the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not think the interruption of the Postmaster General is justified; it relates to a different question altogether from that we are discussing. Unless he also wishes to join his friends in the back benches in obstructing the business of the House. I trust he will allow me to proceed. The hon. gentleman must not forget that we have changed sides in this House.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I don't think the hon. gentleman has discovered that yet.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have so much pleasure in seeing the hon. gentlemen there that it quite reconciles me to the cold shades of Opposition. Now some, like the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Lister), seemed to think that there is nothing to be done by the High Commissioner and that the salary ought to be decreased. I would draw his attention to the following in this return which was laid upon the Table of the House :—

The following cablegram being of so much importance, I reproduce it here in full :—

Silver coinage since 1883, nominal value, £389,000 ; actual cost, £294,207 ; profit, £94,793. We were able to reduce mint charges in 1883 from five to three per cent, equal to a saving in the period mentioned of about £7,000. Copper coinage, nominal value, £37,400 ; actual cost, £13,103 ; profit, £24,297. Prior to 1880 coinages arranged through Morton, Rose, on commission ; details Finance Department.

There was in connection with this a statement of the correspondence in detail pointing out the great importance of the subjects dealt with. Now, if the House will permit me, I will draw attention to the importance of having a High Commissioner in London. I took up the morning "Times" one day at my breakfast, and I found that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had introduced a Bill into the House of Commons to raise the charge on all foreign and colonial debentures from 2s. 6d. to 10s. per cent, a very important change. I took that matter up, and got all my colleagues from the Australian and South African colonies together. We had interviews with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who was then Mr. Goschen, and, after a number of very interesting discussions with him, that Bill was amended in such a way as to relieve the colonies from the increased charge of 7s. 6d. per cent. The hon. gentleman knows that at that time we were in the habit of putting a large amount of our loans upon the market in the form of debentures, and he will at once see the importance of being on the spot and in a position to protect the country in a question of that kind.

Take another question of great importance to Canada and to every British colony—the right to invest trust funds in our securities. At present, by law, that cannot be done. That measure was taken up, and it was prosecuted by myself and my colleagues from the other colonies in the most energetic and determined manner, until a committee was appointed, on which the Lord Chancellor was represented, the Bank of England was represented, Canada, the Australian and South African colonies were represented, the Treasury was represented, and the Colonial Office was represented ; and, after a full and elaborate discussion lasting for months, the committee unanimously reported a Bill to be submitted to the Imperial Parliament, removing that disability from the colonies and giving us the great advantage of having our securities used for the investment of trust funds, a thing that would give at once immense value to our securities. That Bill, however, was not introduced, for the reason that just at the time the Chancellor of the Exchequer had agreed to submit this Bill to Parliament, that unfortunate condition of financial affairs occurred in the Australian colonies that led us all to the conclusion that it would not be a very opportune time. I draw the attention of the House to the efforts that were made, and which all but succeeded, and which have paved the way to future action, when the credit of Australia is restored, as I trust it will be at no distant date, to its former pitch ; and the credit of Canada, as every hon. gentleman knows, stands infinitely higher to-day than it did on that occasion. Now, Sir, why should the hon. gentleman single me out as an object of attack for having accomplished for Canada that which never had been accomplished before for any British colony in the history of the British Empire? What did I do, Sir? Why, every one knows the vital importance, not only to the credit of Canada, but to the financial interests of Canada, of being able to put our loans upon the British market at the lowest possible rate. When I occupied the position of Finance Minister in this House for two sessions, I was entrusted with authority to negotiate a loan of four million pounds sterling on the London market. Immediately on the rising of the House, believing that the time was more opportune than it would be later on, and without even going to take leave of my constituents, I hurried to London and took that question up, and succeeded, as I say, for the first time in the colonial history of Britain, in putting a 3 per cent loan on the market in London. Well, Sir, what was the result? The result was that such was the credit of Canada that we succeeded in getting twelve million pounds sterling offered for the four million pounds we asked, and we got an average price of £95 1s. per cent on that occasion, and those 3 per cent debentures were subsequently put upon the market by my hon. friend the late Minister of Finance, and they have been away up to 106, and are in that neighbourhood to-day. Now, Sir, hon. gentlemen may think that all this is very easy, and that there is no necessity of having a gentleman of ability, and industry, and devotion to the interests of Canada, in a position to deal with great financial interests that are concerned on occasions of that kind: but I think that the result proves that there was an advantage in having a representative in London, when the things occurred to which I have referred. And yet, Sir, those services rendered to Canada, which most Canadians would be proud to recognize, whether they came from a political friend or a political foe, are made the basis of an unfounded and slanderous attack upon the character of the man who performed them.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

I do not intend to detain the committee further than to say a few words on this occasion about the staff in the High Commissioner's office in London. The head of that staff is Mr. J. G. Colmer, a gentleman of the highest ability and of the most untiring industry; and, though I have said before that I have a high regard for the civil service of Canada, I do not believe there is a man to be found in that service, more devoted, more able, or more untiring in his efforts to benefit Canada than Mr. Colmer. I may mention also that when I was named by the Board of Trade of Sydney, in the county of Cape Breton, to represent them at the late Congress of Chambers of Commerce of the Empire, I was unable, of course, on account of the duties that then devolved upon me, to undertake that representation, and they asked me to name a gentleman upon whom they could rely, who would effectually serve them on that occasion. I named Mr. Colmer, and Mr. Colmer, as hon. gentlemen who have followed these proceedings in England know, took part in that discussion in a way that reflected great credit upon Canada. I dare say that hon. gentlemen all know that the "Statist" offered a prize of a thousand guineas, and asked Lord Salisbury and Lord Rosebery to name the person who was to decide the merits of the competitors, and they named the Marquis of Lorne. Mr. Colmer wrote an essay in competition for that prize, and was awarded 500 guineas, or one-half of that prize. That prize was offered on a question of great importance to the people of Canada, a question upon which I am glad to know all parties in this House concur, and that was in relation to the best means of bringing about preferential trade. Now, Sir, I say that not only Mr. Colmer, but every one of the small staff in the office of the High Commissioner, are gentlemen of great ability; they are almost all shorthand writers, they are all good correspondents. Not only is the business done in the most thorough and efficient manner, but these gentlemen are often there until a late hour, in order to overtake the work of the day without increasing the expense. I feel bound, therefore, to say to the House that there has been no department of the public service administered with more efficiency than the High Commissioner's office, and that every gentleman in it, from the highest to the lowest, is unwearied in his devotion to the interests of Canada. I regret to have been obliged to take up so much time, but, as this vote was challenged by gentlemen behind the Government—although I am happy to say that no gentleman on this side challenged it—I feel bound to say, in defence of this estimate, and of the policy that the Government are pursuing, that they would, in my judgment, inflict a most serious injury upon the best interests of Canada, if they failed to see that the office of High Commissioner is filled by a gentleman of great ability and experience, as we all know is now the case; and they would be making a great mistake, if the emoluments of that important public service were in the slightest degree impaired.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman to-night has excelled himself. He has been utterly regardless of facts; he has pursued his usual course of vomiting forth vituperation and abuse of everybody about him. He claims, as he always does, that he is the great man, that he is the man who made Canada, and the inference to be drawn is that when he passes away Canada will sink into utter insignificance. The hon. gentleman took this occasion to charge the Government side of the House with obstruction, simply because a few members on this side thought proper to question the propriety of the Estimates prepared by hon. gentlemen themselves. The hon. member has taken occasion to make an attack upon me. He has stated that I was disappointed because the leader had not thought proper to take me into the Government. I desire to say to the hon. gentleman to-night, as I have stated before, that there was no desire on my part to be taken into the Government. That matter was left entirely with the leader of the Government, and every member of this party is satisfied with what he did, and the hon. gentleman in pursuing these tactics is pursuing his old game. How dare that man, above every man in this country, attack any man for corruption or extravagance. How dare that hon. gentleman—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. TISDALE. The hon. member has no right to address an hon. gentleman except by an appellation different from "that man."

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. It is the duty of every hon. gentleman to address the Chair.

Mr. LISTER. I repeat again—

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, that was not the point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. What was it?

Mr. FOSTER. The point is this, that any hon. gentleman speaking in the House ought to refer to another hon. gentleman as the hon. gentleman, or as a member of the House, and he should not use an opprobrious epithet—"that man," or "how dare that man." I do not think that is respectful or in order.

Mr. LISTER. I say, how dare—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman will have to address the Chair, and at the same time when he speaks of an hon. gentleman in this House, he must speak of him as an hon. gentleman.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Withdraw.

Mr. LISTER. In obedience to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, I will call the hon. gentleman the hon. gentleman from Cape Breton, which I think he represents. How the hon. member for Cape Breton, above every man who sits in this Chamber to-day, could have the audacity to get up in this House and charge any hon. gentleman with impropriety passes comprehension. How dare the hon. gentleman from Cape Breton rise and in the presence of this House and before the country use an epithet with respect to myself such as "the scavenger of the Liberal party." The hon. gentleman knows that I have sat in this House for fifteen years, and I want to tell him to-night that coming into this House with 345 majority, I was returned by 1,485 at the last election.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I should like to know what the hon. gentleman means by 345 majority.

Mr. LISTER. That was my majority at my first election.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. First election where?

Mr. LISTER. Fifteen years ago.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I misunderstood him.

Mr. LISTER. I want that hon. gentleman to understand that I regard the good feeling of my constituents more than I do his good feeling, and those constituents, commencing by giving me a majority of 345, have increased that majority at every election, until I stand here to-day by virtue of the magnificent majority of 1,485 votes.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. May I ask the hon. gentleman how many candidates there were?

Mr. LISTER. Let the hon. gentleman when he makes such charges across the floor remember that if this country is debauched, politically, he more than any man living in Canada to-day is answerable for it. If there is any man living in this country to-day who has debauched Canada, that man is the hon. member for Cape Breton who sits in this House to-day. The people believed it. He appealed to the country on the 23rd June. He appealed to the people, having prophesied in this House that his Government would be returned; but he was defeated by an enormous majority, who turned the party out of power, they hope so long as the hon. gentleman lives at all events. What do we find? I came into this House in 1882. This party had charged that corruption was going on in the public service. The charge was made over and over again at every election. The hon. gentleman rose in the House and as fervently and as earnestly as he has done to-night denied the statement, and said there was not an atom of truth in it. I believed the duty was thrown on me, with other members, to unravel and expose to the people of the country the terrible extravagance and corruption which we knew was going on. I took that to be my duty to the people of Canada. I undertook it, knowing that such a man as he would call me the scavenger of the party.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. TISDALE. I rise to a point of order. The same question as that on which the Chairman has already ruled the hon. gentleman out of order is involved.

Mr. LISTER. I will place myself in order. Mr. Chairman, if the hon. gentleman will allow me. I knew when I undertook those investigations in 1891 that such hon. gentlemen as the hon. member for Cape Breton would in after years assail me as he has done to-night; but I assumed the responsibility, and in the interest of my country I went through with those investigations and it is not to be wondered at that the hon. member for Cape Breton should rise and assail me in the way he has done. I know the people of Canada approve of what I have done. I know that the people of Canada are at my back, and knowing that, I care not for the vituperation of the hon. member for Cape Breton (Sir Charles Tupper). I do not give one snap of my finger for what he says. I know that I have the sanction and approval of the people of Canada, and I am here to-day to defend myself against the hon. gentleman or any of his friends who may assail me. What are the facts? Sir, up to 1891, these people, charged upon the hustling with demoralizing Canada and debauching our people with the most flagrant corruption that ever was found in the British colony, had the hardihood to deny it. I knew it to be true, and I went to work in the face of almost insuperable difficulties, surrounded by a majority of men who were bound to support the Government through thick and thin, and I pressed on these investigations day after day, week after week, and month after month, until it was proven that the late Government and its followers, and its civil servants in the different departments, were saturated to the very core with corruption. And, Sir, because in the interest of good government in Canada, I took upon myself that responsibility, and because I proved the hon. gentlemen corrupt as I knew I would, I am to be assailed in this House as the hon. member for Cape Breton (Sir Charles Tupper) has thought proper to assail me to-night. He has asked me why I should bring up the matter in reference to the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill). Well, Sir, it is incredible that after three or four short months, the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) should have so changed his opinion about his leader, and be found singing his praises here to-night. Does the hon. gentleman think for a moment that I object to their reconciliation? No, I am glad to see them shake hands. I knew they would; I knew that my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) would never leave the party no matter what he said. But, fortunately for Canada, there are Conservatives who believing in the utter corruption of the Conservative party have thought proper to leave it. Sir, we welcome these men to our ranks. For men who believe that the policy of a party is bad, and who believe that the party is corrupt, there is no odium attaching to them because of their leaving that party and joining men whom they believe to be purer and better able to govern the country.

The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) above all others should not talk in the way he has done to-night. Why, he came into this House from Nova Scotia with the reputation of a corrupt politician. The very man whom he afterwards took into his Cabinet, Mr. McLelan, compared him with a man who is sitting in a coach with false hands, and while he exposed the false hands he had his real hands in the pockets of his fellow-passengers. And what more? Prior to the last general election we saw the hon. gentleman going through Canada trying to buy up the electors by wholesale. He goes down to the Island of Prince Edward immediately before the elections, and he proposes to spend two millions of dollars there. He goes to Manitoba and he goes to the Territories, and he proposes to spend other millions there. And what for, Mr. Chairman? Simply to capture the votes of the electorate of the different provinces. Think for a moment of the position which he put himself in. When the Manchester Canal was being built, if Rosebery or Salisbury were to have gone to the constituencies in England, and said: This is a great public work deserving of public aid, and if our Government is returned to power we will give you £10,000,000; if they had said that what would be thought of them. Why, Sir, the Liberal and Conservative press alike in England would have indignantly denounced the party leader who would try to bribe the electorate in such a manner as the hon. member (Sir Charles Tupper) has attempted to do in this Dominion. But in spite of all his efforts, the indignant electorate of Canada ejected him from power. Perhaps the hon. gentleman thinks that I am smarting under the indignity he says has been done to me. I repeat, Sir, that the members of the Liberal party are prepared to stand by the eloquent and pure man who leads that party to-day, and they are prepared to yield to, and to submit to his wishes whatever they may be. We are not like the party over there. There are not three or four sections of this party. It is a united Liberal party pledged to stand unitedly by its leader.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman tries to blame the Liberal party for wasting the time of this House. Look at the position of hon. gentlemen opposite for a moment. Here are their own very Estimates submitted by them to this House last session. Here we find the ex-Finance Minister, the leader of the Opposition, and other members of the party, catechising the Government as if they were ignorant about their own Estimates. Sir, the motive is manifest. These gentlemen are wasting time. What was there in the lengthy debate the other day? Nothing, Sir, and even if there was, they themselves have violated the law at least fifty times within the last ten years. Mr. Chairman, I hurl back at the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) the insinuation which he has tried to convey against me. My services to this country have been appreciated by the people, and if there is a desire in Canada to-day that Government shall be more pure than it was, that is largely the result of the investigations of 1891. I made charges against the then Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart), and hon. gentlemen opposite voted down a request for an investigation. I proved many charges against these gentlemen opposite, but they were whitewashed by their friends in this House. Sir, these investigations of 1891 have had a salutary effect in this country, and I believe we shall never see again—at all events not for many, many years—such a condition of moral depravity as we have seen during the regime of the Conservative party.

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. Chairman, I do not for one moment, Sir, propose to endeavour to emulate the language of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lister) who has just addressed the House. But, as the hon. member has done me the great favour of referring to me on two occasions this afternoon, I think it perhaps right that I should say a word in explanation of the position I hold. If the hon. gentleman or any other hon. member of that party supposes that because I differed from the policy pursued by the leaders of the Conservative party last session I am any less a Conservative than I have always been, I desire these hon. gentlemen to remove that false impression from their minds with as little delay as possible. It seems to me somewhat remarkable that the hon. member who is so anxious to facilitate the business of this House should have travelled altogether outside of the four corners of the question we were discussing, to drag in a subject that had nothing whatever to do with it. We were not discussing the question as to whether the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition is or is not an admirable leader of the Conservative party. No one had said anything with reference to that matter. The question of the High Commissionership was before us—the question whether the hon. leader of the Opposition had discharged efficiently his duties as High Commissioner. No one regrets more than I do the incident that occurred during the last session of Parliament; but it had nothing whatever to do with the question we were discussing here to-night. The hon. gentleman, however, unable to find any kind of argument in support of the position he had taken with regard to the High Commissionership, passes off and drags in another question altogether. And all this was in order to facilitate the business of this Chamber. Now, I am glad to see that my hon. friend has been so carefully studying any remarks I have had the honour to make to this House, whatever they may have been. So far as those remarks are concerned, which he has done me the honour to quote here to-night, I will venture to hope, at least, that he will find in them no expression which a gentleman might not use on the floor of the House; and from that point of view, I would most respectfully recommend them to the still further consideration of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, it may not be time spent uselessly if I review briefly what has taken place within the last two or three hours in this House. What were we doing? We were asked by the Government to go into Supply, they having from time to time expressed a very great desire to pass the Estimates and terminate the labours of this session. This afternoon, when they asked us to go into Supply, the Opposition consented, without any motion, without the least attempt to take up time in discussing even important matters, and the House went into Supply. I put it to the House, and I put it to the country, who will read the remarks made during the afternoon, if anything was said on this side of the House on the items which were passed—and a great many were passed—which was not germane to the question that was being considered. When my hon. friend who sits beside me (Sir Charles Tupper) rose to make a perfectly apt and proper comment with reference to one of the items we were discussing, the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister), who acts as the knocker-out for the party opposite, suddenly arose and commenced a violent attack upon my hon. friend—an attack not in the way of open and honest statement, but in the way of insinuation, almost stating in ex-

Mr. McNEILL.

PLICIT terms that my hon. friend had been guilty of that worst of all crimes—putting a loan for his country on the market, and making money for himself improperly in connection therewith. If the hon. gentleman does not rearrange what he said this afternoon when “Hansard” comes before hon. gentlemen to-morrow, they will see that that insinuation was made. Now, if the hon. gentleman did not wish to obstruct, if hon. gentlemen opposite were actuated with the simple desire to get through the business of the House, has it come to this, that if an hon. member on this side rises to make a perfectly gentlemanly and apt comment on an item that is being discussed, an attack must, forsooth, be made upon him? If that is to be the course of intimidation and menace, for I care not how old a politician is or how long he may have weathered the storms of battle, it is not a nice thing for his public honour to be impugned in that way in the House of Commons and before the country, with the representatives of the press present to waft the sayings of the hon. gentleman to every part of this Dominion. And so, when the hon. gentleman arose, his statements seemed to be in the line of a stated plan of campaign, that whenever a gentleman rises on this side to comment on or discuss the question under review, he must be subjected to a calumnious attack from hon. gentlemen opposite. Is that to be done? Are we to hear for the thousandth time hon. gentlemen opposite going away from the question under discussion, and launching out into tirades upon hon. gentlemen on this side as men above all things corrupt, and insinuating things ten thousand times worse than they have proved or attempted to prove. If that is the case, hon. gentlemen may find that there are two sides to the question. In the first place, is it a fair way to conduct the business of the House? There are times when recriminations will take place. In the heat of political battles we know that men will call up the records of each other. But for an hon. gentleman in cold blood, when the question under discussion has nothing to do with them, to launch out into charges and epithets such as the hon. gentleman has indulged in, is not consistent with the dignity of a deliberative assembly. Will the hon. gentleman retract what he said this afternoon or not? He has not had the manliness to state that he did not mean what he said. He comes, after having been ear-wigged by the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and others, with a carefully prepared statement insinuating everything charged this afternoon—not having the manliness to say that he did not mean it. As if nothing had occurred, he reads a perfectly cool and carefully-balanced statement, which he had prepared, and then goes on with the discussion of the item under review. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman has not done all he should do. When hon. gentlemen take up “Hansard”

to-morrow and read it, if he does not change what he said in the afternoon, the hon. gentleman will be represented as having stated that other Ministers have placed loans upon the markets, and have profited by those loans.

Mr. LISTER. No.

Mr. FOSTER. He insinuated it. He almost stated it in as many words. Mark you, Sir, when I asked him to specify, when I said that it was hard for a man to lie under an imputation of that kind and asked him to specify the loan that was implied in his statement, the hon. gentleman had an opportunity to say that he did not mean to insinuate anything improper. Did he do it? No; but he said, "The hon. member will before long have an ample opportunity to answer the charge;" as if he had the charge bottled up and intended to spring it on this House at some time when it suited his own pleasure; and I, forsooth, a humble individual, but one whose honour is something to him, must stand before this House and the country while the hon. gentleman dangles his charges and his insinuations until it suits him to bring them before a committee of this House and try them out. I am within the cognizance of this House, if that was not the tenour, and if those were not the words, of my hon. friend opposite who has just taken his seat. Now, he said not one word after recess with reference to that, except that he did not mean to insinuate that there was anything corrupt in what I did, but that I was asked somewhere about some loan as to the charges and expenses, and that I declined to answer, thus implying that there was something in the loan that was not allowed to see the light of day, and consequently I kept my mouth closed. I ask the hon. gentleman to specify the loan and the charges, I ask him to specify the time and the place, when every explanation was not given as to the charges upon any loan which I have placed upon the market. Now, Mr. Speaker, these things do not make for the credit of Parliament, and they do not make for the common courtesies and the proper amenities of debate; and I tell my hon. friends opposite that, if it is to be a settled part of their programme that every day, and almost every hour, they are to rise and revamp these old charges, when questions are before the House that do not call for them at all, so far as I am concerned, the war will be carried into Africa. But it would be much better that we should conduct business in a different manner. My hon. friend (Mr. Lister) then began to castigate the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) with respect to something which had no reference at all to the business before the House. He read a debate in which the hon. member for Bruce had made some statement regarding the hon. leader of the Opposition. Well, that was a small thing to do, and a childish trick that any one could do. Why, if I chose, I could do something in the same line to-night. I could read statements, which I have under my hand, that the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) made with reference to his present leader—most amusing statements, most cutting statements, which that hon. gentleman has never retracted. And I might read a counter-statement made by the First Minister himself in 1884, when he retaliated on my hon. friend in a very sharp and biting manner. But that would not count for anything. It would simply mean that these men had different opinions at one period of their history, and that they had subsequently changed those opinions. The only thing a public man prizes in this country—and he does not get much else—is his reputation and character for honesty. I say that neither on one side of the House nor on the other ought we gratuitously, by insinuation or otherwise, to assail and throw doubts upon the public honour of men who are trying to serve their country. If a man does wrong, and another knows it, let that other bring his charge manfully, and have it tried out, so that the innocent may be able to prove his innocence. But this charging by innuendo, by implied and veiled assertion, continually thrown out, and which, on the wings of a partisan press, is spread from one end of the country to the other, leaves its sting of poison in thousands of minds, who know neither one of the parties. That is some thing like the assassin's work, and the sooner hon. gentlemen abandon it, the better. I want to emphasize this point. If the Government wish to see the business of the House carried through—and I am not saying this by way of menace in the least—I do ask them that, when we are discussing the Estimates, we may keep to what is germane, and leave the character and the reputation of honourable men where it ought to be, and not, by implied assertion and innuendo, try to set current in the world what men dare not state by specific charge and attempt to prove.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). I do not rise for the purpose of prolonging this debate or indulging in what must be felt by hon. gentlemen on both sides to be useless recrimination. Those who know my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Foster), know how perfectly harmless his little moral lectures are. We have listened to them in this House the last fifteen years, almost in the same words. His moral lectures are as harmless as his undisguised threats, and the Government do not propose to deviate from their course because of any such lectures or threats. They propose to try and carry through the Estimates, by giving all explanations that hon. members can reasonably ask for. We are perfectly aware of the strength of the Opposition in prolonging debate, and have an evidence of it in the undue prolongation of this debate in which hon. gentlemen opposite have seen fit to indulge to-night. I am in the judgment of the House, when I say this. After the little sparring which took place in the afternoon and the explanation of my hon. friend from Lambton in the evening, the matter might well have been allowed to drop. We had a charge made by my hon. friend against the leader of the Opposition, which that hon. gentleman denied in the most emphatic terms, and then we have that denial accepted most unreservedly by the hon. member for Lambton.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, no.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, whether my hon. friend did not accept the denial unreservedly; and, when an unreserved acceptance is made, the hon. leader of the Opposition ought to know, as an old parliamentarian, that it was his duty to accept the withdrawal, just as it was my hon. friend's duty to make it. The matter might well have been allowed to drop at that point, but for one hour we had to listen to oft-repeated statements, which have been made on every platform of Canada, of what my hon. friend did when he was High Commissioner.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Was that germane to the charge that the office was overpaid and the service valueless?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not want to be too critical. I know my hon. friend's leaning to extended and prolonged statements, but I venture to say that, with his ability, he could have comprised all he had to say within five minutes. Then we had a speech from the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), with reference to some statement made by the hon. member for Lambton, of which he complained. What was that statement? My hon. friend from Lambton simply said that there were certain charges for discount and brokerage and management in connection with a loan, which had not been satisfactorily explained to him, and he declared that, in making this statement, he did not imply any charge of corruption or wrong-doing. In this he was exercising his legitimate and perfect right of criticism as a member of this House, and the matter should have been dropped. We have had recriminations enough, and I am sure such recriminations do not add to the dignity of the House; and I appeal to hon. gentlemen whether, at this late hour we might not be allowed to proceed with the Estimates. We have had explanations on both sides, we have had personal encounters across the House which have been listened to with some amusement, and now that it is all over, let us get to work.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. DAVIES.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). I am perfectly aware that hon. members can prolong this debate, but let it be understood that there shall be no evasion before the country. I was long enough in Opposition to know the powers of the Opposition; and I am prepared to recognize them and to sit in my seat quietly and let hon. gentlemen talk. I know that hon. gentlemen can waste from now until two o'clock and make very able, and some of them very brilliant speeches, but the business of the House will not be proceeded with. There is no public question debated. Let us get on with the Estimates. If any estimate is brought before the House that provokes criticism or calls for comment, let that criticism or comment find voice. But, if not, I appeal to hon. gentlemen as business men, after what has been said and done, let us get on with the business of the House.

Mr. McNEILL. I am quite sure that on neither side of the House is there an hon. gentleman who would less desire deliberately to misrepresent me than the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Davies), and I am quite sure that what he said with regard to myself he said in the most perfect good faith. When he said the whole matter had passed, but that I referred to some matter of difference—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I said I did not object to the hon. gentleman's criticism on that.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman said that the whole matter would have been over with when we came back from dinner, but that I had made reference to—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, no; you misunderstood me.

Mr. McNEILL. I just wish to say this—that my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Lister) made the statement that I referred to the hon. leader of the Opposition in the course of the remarks I had made before dinner, and I got up to say that I had done nothing of the kind. And then, instead of accepting my denial, the hon. gentleman went on to quote at length this speech which he had been studying and which I commend to his consideration still further. I think my hon. friend will see that I had nothing whatever to do with prolonging the discussion.

Mr. TISDALE. I regret very much to hear the remarks of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I am quite prepared to give the hon. gentleman credit for proposing to carry on these Estimates on the line expressed by my hon. friend. But he must consider what started this disturbance. I want to say this in all seriousness—I have never obstructed the proceedings of the House, and I do not propose to obstruct the passing of these Estimates, and when gentlemen opposite bring in good measures I will support them. But the hon. Minister did not put this matter in such a way that I am prepared, as a humble member of this House, to sit still and refrain from expressing dissent. If he had said one word in the way of putting responsibility upon the gentleman who, he cannot deny, started this disturbance, or if he had disavowed the action of his supporter in going out of his way to say a thing that to say the least of it—because I do not propose to go into it further, because he has been well answered—would have been better left unsaid; it would have been much better, and I would have desired, for my part to go on as rapidly as possible with the Estimates. But when the hon. Minister rises and coolly and deliberately ignores statements, which he could not gainsay, by my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) as to the way in which this disturbance arose and intimates that he is going to hold us up to the country as obstructing the business of the House, I think it is too much, and I confess that I feel it not a little. For my own part—and I appeal to my past record—I have never attempted to obstruct and I do not propose to do so now. But I shall not be afraid to stand up to say what I deem it my duty to say because the hon. Minister makes such a statement with regard to us, without one word of disapproval of the gentleman behind him, who caused all this discussion, and not only that but prolonged it by speaking two or three times and by failing to take back any of his charges; for his pretended—and I use the word advisedly—his pretended taking of them back was almost worse than the original charge. We had the ruling of the Chair. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Lister) is an old parliamentarian and that is the reason that I insisted—as I very seldom have done—upon a point of order; for when an old parliamentarian willfully and deliberately persisted in charges which must lead to disturbance, no cry to the country that we are obstructing business justifies us in remaining silent. I do not think it would be fair or manly for us to allow this debate to terminate without disavowal and some assurance to us—because we have rights, and when gentlemen who are opposite were on this side I often had a great deal of sympathy with them in the position they took in these matters, though I am not prepared to do as they did in unduly prolonging the debates—that hon. gentlemen behind the leaders, and hon. Ministers themselves will not provoke these discussions. I think I understand the feelings of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and I can say that we will not tolerate this sort of attacks without replying to them. If hon. gentlemen will give us assurance that they will stop these attacks, as they can do, though I understand that at times they are not to be held wholly responsible for them, it will be easy to confine the debate within the limits it should be confined to. Just one word more. We hear gentlemen opposite say frequently that these Estimates are our Estimates. Now, to a certain extent that is quite proper. The Minister of Public Works to-day, in discussing his Estimates, was fair about that; he did not try to shirk the responsibility of the Estimates because we prepared it, but he did say quite properly. There are certain things in the department I have not had time to master; there are so many clerks of one sort and another, and I have not had time to get the statements of those officials under me. I am sure that the Ministers themselves will not consider that our criticism has been unfair. If we can avoid such discussions as we have had, I think we should try to do so, for they are very regrettable in every way. I believe that the Ministers themselves do not approve of this sort of discussion any more than hon. gentlemen on our side. I do not think they will object to reasonable discussion such as the one that has taken place about the Governor General's warrants, and which, whatever may be thought upon it upon each side, was a matter of much importance, and is worthy of challenge and debate. But these recriminations, these attacks, are most regrettable. I say it was an attack, and a most unjustifiable one, because it was neither the time, the method, the place, nor the proper way to make it. In addition to attacking the leader of the Opposition, the hon. gentleman went further and attacked the whole Conservative party. He went back into questions of so general a nature that you would hardly use them in a campaign speech, let alone in Parliament. I will even go so far as to say that if every hon. gentleman on this side got up and replied to that attack, it would be serving that hon. gentleman right who made it. I am not going to say it would be right to detain the Cabinet Ministers, if they show that they do not approve of such conduct. But I must say that I regret that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) rather attempted to justify the hon. gentleman instead of trying to pour oil on the troubled waters. I think his own remarks were rather in the line of justifying the hon. gentleman who caused the disturbance, and who naturally raised party feeling by his aggressive language. I think if he had said a little more in condemnation of his friends on that side of the House, probably the debate would not be so prolonged.

Mr. TAYLOR. Before you left the Chair at six o'clock, I rose to a point of order. I made the statement that the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) had charged our respected leader and the ex-Minister of Finance with corrupt and dishonourable motives. I raised a point of order, it was then six o'clock, and you ruled that there was no point of order. The point I raised was that the hon. gentleman should retract, inasmuch as the leader of the Opposition and the ex-Finance Minister had repudiated the statement, and you ruled that there was no point of order in it. I would have appealed from your ruling, had it not been six o'clock. I want to know now, as a member of the House in Opposition, if this ruling is to prevail, if an hon. gentleman on that side can charge members on this side, and ex-Ministers, with dishonourable and dishonest motives; and when they have repudiated the charge. I want to know whether it should not be retracted? The hon. member for West Lambton came in at eight o'clock, after having been taken by the throat by the Premier, by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and by the Finance Minister; he came in with a carefully prepared statement. But he has not yet retracted any of the charges he made against either of these two other hon. gentlemen. I stated then, and I repeat now, that this item will not go through until a full and ample retraction is made. As the ex-Minister of Finance has said, when you read "Hansard" to-morrow you will find that the statements he made have gone broadcast, that these two hon. gentlemen have been guilty of dishonest and dishonourable transactions, and that the Chairman has ruled that the hon. gentleman who made the charge has nothing to retract. Now, I claim that it is the duty of the Government, if they want these Estimates to pass, either to make themselves a full and ample retraction, or to require a retraction to be made by the hon. member who made the charge.

Mr. SPROULE. I think it is always regarded in the country that the conduct of the House of Commons may fairly be taken as a proper example for others to follow, either in debate or in committee. We have rules and regulations laid down to govern debate, and we are expected to observe them, not only as members of the House of Commons, but as gentlemen in our conduct towards each other. In the discussion which took place this afternoon upon the Estimates, I think there was no disposition shown on this side of the House to interfere with the progress of business. The questions asked were proper ones, were reasonable ones; they were asked decorously, and in many instances we got replies in the same spirit. But at an unfortunate moment an hon. member on that side of the House saw fit to diverge from the course of the debate, and make insinuations against hon. gentlemen on this side of the House that would not be allowable outside of this Chamber, that would not be tolerated by one gentleman to another without a full retraction. Now, that hon. gentleman, I regret to say, is in the habit of doing this, and he has never shown a disposition in this House to act the part of an hon. gentleman whose duty it is to retract statements when they are denied by the hon. gentlemen against whom they are made, and when he is called to order by the Chair. Up to six o'clock the hon. gentleman made no effort to retract. There is no doubt that his insinuations, if believed by the country, would be very detrimental to the character and standing of some hon. members of this House. People would believe that these gentlemen are corrupt beyond anything that ever was known in Canadian parliamentary history, and that they were not fit to remain members of Parliament, or even to associate with respectable people. These innuendos were uttered and these insinuations were made, and when a denial was given by the hon. gentlemen against whom they were hurled, they were not retracted in the manly way which the amenities of debate required. Now, what can we think of the character of an hon. gentleman who does that? What does Shakespeare say of such a character:

He who steals my purse steals trash.

But he that filches from me my good name
Robs me of that which does not enrich him
And makes me poor indeed.

I see the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) laughs in derision. Shakespeare, the great artist, represents such a man as lower than a sneak-thief, who would take your purse in the street. Is this the man the hon. gentlemen is prepared to defend? Is the language used here to-day such language as one member should use to another under the rules of Parliament? I think it is far from it. It ill becomes any hon. member to make such charges, and a retraction of the insinuations made against the two hon. gentlemen should have been made by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) before six o'clock. Did he do it? No. After eight o'clock he accepted the ruling of the chair, and said, "I conform to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, as I am bound to do;" or in other words, he would do what he was compelled to do. But following that charge, a short time afterwards declared that the hon. member was the most corrupt politician that ever came from Nova Scotia. Is that in harmony with what we consider the amenities of Parliament? Again, he said that the same hon. gentleman was one of the most debauched politicians who ever sat in this House. A man would be more than human if he could sit still in his seat and hear such accusations without trying to repel them. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries in an apologetic tone addressed the House, and in a half hearted way justified what had been done by the hon. member for Lambton, and endeavoured to draw a red herring across the path by making it appear that the Opposition were resorting to obstruction when they were endeavouring to defend their characters in this House.

Such action ill became the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and hon. members on this side of the House expected he would act differently. While I have no disposition to retard the progress of business, I cannot sit still and hear those irrelevant and offensive insinuations, remarks and innuendos reiterated without in some way trying not to retaliate, because I do not propose to retaliate, to keep within the amenities of debate and do what is fair and just towards hon. members on this side of the House. We have an important duty to perform, namely, to criticise the Estimates. I can appeal to the House and the country that so far we have not gone beyond the bonds of fair criticism. We have dealt fairly with hon. gentlemen opposite, for we have felt that hon. gentlemen opposite have been charged for only a short time with the responsibility of administering public affairs and could not be expected to have mastered the details of the various departments, and it appears to me that we have a right to expect courteous replies to our inquiries, and in fact we have been kindly disposed towards hon. gentlemen opposite and have allowed items to pass that under other circumstances would not have been allowed to pass so rapidly. Sometimes when we have asked for explanations regarding items we have been told that the Estimates were prepared by our friends, and that we should be satisfied. Although these may be the Estimates of our own friends to a large extent, they never were examined by Parliament to such an extent that members were enabled to make inquiries and obtain necessary information. But hon. gentlemen have assumed the responsibility of defending those Estimates. If those Estimates were wrong, it was their duty to have them corrected. It is not in my opinion a poorer reply to make that because those Estimates were prepared before hon. gentlemen opposite came into office, we must accept them as they are. If so, I would suggest that we pass the Estimates en bloc and save time, or only criticise items in which a difference appears between the Estimates submitted last session and those now before the committee. But as I understand the position, hon. gentlemen opposite have become responsible for the Estimates before the House to-day, each Minister for his own department and the Ministry for the Estimates as a whole, and we are entitled to ask for such explanations as are necessary, whether the amount asked is right or wrong, much or little, and whether it is going to be properly or improperly expended. That is all we expect; we do not wish to delay the work of the House, but we expect to receive replies courteously from hon. gentlemen as becomes Ministers of the Crown. We do not expect that every few minutes some hon. member will rise and abuse this side of the House when we ask these questions in all courtesy and fairness, and I hope it will be a long time in the history of this Parliament before we see another exhibition such as that presented before six o'clock.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would not have troubled the committee with any remarks on the subject that has occupied so long the attention of the committee except for a reference made by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) respecting an alleged charge contained in a Halifax newspaper against the leader of the Opposition. The hon. member for Lambton either did not know the facts—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. This discussion has gone far enough, and this is a proper time to stop it. I ask the hon. member to speak only to the item. There has been a charge of insinuation made by an hon. member of this House, but that charge has been withdrawn. I think it is time the committee got down to business and discussed the item now under consideration, and I will ask hon. gentlemen to confine themselves to a discussion of the item.

Mr. WOOD. I rise—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. That is my ruling.

Mr. WOOD. I rise to make a suggestion to the Deputy Speaker, having had some experience in the Chair, and it is that all attempts at stifling discussion in the past have proved dismal failures, and the best way of expediting business and preventing motions, which can be made by any member of the committee at any time, is to allow this debate to go on so far as possible without checking unnecessarily any statement made by an hon. member in the course of it. I undertake to say that there will be nothing in the nature of opposition or undue obstruction, for I do not approve of that in any case.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Give them plenty of rope.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I should like to inquire, Mr. Chairman, whether you intend to prevent the hon. member for Halifax replying to a statement made by the hon. member for Lambton in this debate, a very important statement, which the hon. member for Halifax is in a position to speak to authoritatively.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I understand that complaint has been made against the hon. member for Lambton that he made charges against some members of this House. That hon. member has withdrawn the charges he made.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. That is my ruling. Consequently, I think the discussion has already gone too far, and we must now confine ourselves to the item under consideration, and I will not allow any discussion outside of that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then I move, seconded by Mr. Foster :

That the Committee do now rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Chairman, if I had been allowed to proceed one moment ago, I think you would have seen, Sir, that it was not necessary to interfere, because I was about to address myself, not to the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Lambton (Mr. Lister) before Six o'clock, but to the alleged explanation which he made when the House resumed after recess. The statement which the hon. member (Mr. Lister) then made was that a charge had been made in a newspaper in Halifax respecting the hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), in somewhat the terms which he (Mr. Lister) used. The hon. member (Mr. Lister) cannot have investigated very carefully the newspaper article in question, nor the legal proceedings which were taken in consequence thereof, or he would have found out this: when legal proceedings were taken, the editor and the proprietor of that newspaper were the very first to disclaim that they had made any charge. Their defence was, in the first instance, that they had not published the charge, and we had to call every printer in their establishment, and to call experts all over the city of Halifax, and to occupy the time of the court for between two or three weeks before we could establish the fact of the publication at all. Their defence, when they did come to open it, was, not that there was any justification for the charge, but that they had a right to publish it in the public interest, whether it was true or not, and counsel for the hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) publicly challenged them in the course of that investigation to prove that charge, and publicly offered by his counsel, in open court, to give every possible facility to them, if they should see fit to set up the truth of that charge as justification. They did not take any step in the course of these proceedings which indicated their willingness to accept that challenge, but they sought rather to defend themselves on technical grounds, first, that publication had not been proved, and second, that, under a clause in the criminal code, they had a right to publish this charge in the public interest, whether it was true or not. I think it would have been better for the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) to have investigated that fact a little more fully before he saw fit to make in this House the statement which he did make in regard to it. I understood from some remark of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lister) that he insinuated that the proceedings in that prosecution had been delayed at the instance of the leader of the Opposition

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER.

(Sir Charles Tupper). I wish to repel that insinuation in the most emphatic terms. The prosecutor's case was closed some time ago, and the reason that the proceedings have not been brought before the higher court is due to the fact that the cause is now pending for the purpose of putting in whatever evidence the defence may require to produce. That is the fact so far as these proceedings are concerned, and that fact is within my own personal knowledge.

Now, I do not desire to unduly criticise in any way the remarks which the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) has made, but I do venture to think that, if every member of this House saw fit to indulge in tirades such as we have been favoured with from that hon. gentleman, the public business of this House would be very much obstructed. It would be easy for all of us to give way to our feelings sometimes and to indulge in recrimination of this kind, and I suppose that every member of this House is more or less capable of doing that very thing. So far as I am concerned, and whatever the provocation may be, I do not intend to indulge in it. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Lister) did me the favour, on a former occasion, to refer in somewhat strong terms to myself, but I shall not attempt to answer him now. He did me the honour to state that my address to the House resembled an argument in the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman must not refer to a previous debate.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). No, but it has been done several times in this House, and it has not been ruled out of order. I have known that rule before I came to the House, and since I came here I notice that it has been much more honoured in its breach than in its observance. I think the hon. member (Mr. Davies) must be as well aware of that fact as any other member in this House.

Now, I have the honour to belong to the same profession to which the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) belongs, and I have had the honour to meet a great many representatives of the bar of the province of which he is so distinguished a member, and I regret to say that I cannot return the compliment which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lister) has bestowed upon me. I have heard a great many very eminent counsel from Ontario address arguments to the highest court of appeal in this country, and in no case did those arguments, in tone, in style, or in character, in the least resemble any remarks which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lister) has ever seen fit to address to this House in my hearing. The hon. gentleman has ventured to say that he is a member of this House of some fifteen years' standing. If, after fifteen years in this House of Commons, which is supposed to improve the tone and the morals of hon. gentlemen, he makes such an exhibition as he has made on various occasions since I have been here, I am almost tempted to inquire what must have been the style of the hon. gentleman's remarks, when he first came into this House. I do not think, Sir, that incidents of this kind add to the dignity of this House, and I must say that, in common with some other members, I was a little disappointed at what seemed to me the somewhat flippant manner in which the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Daives) treated this incident. An incident like this, which certainly tends not to increase the dignity of this House, is not, I think, to be described by a Minister of the Crown as a "sparring match." I do not believe that is a proper term to apply to it, and I think the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) might very well have taken a course which would have added a little more to the dignity of the House than by using the remarks which he has seen fit to offer. I have ventured to take up the time of the House to this extent, only because I thought it necessary, in view of what I personally knew of the case to which the hon. gentleman from Lambton (Mr. Lister) referred to after dinner, to-night.

THE MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I presume the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) does not intend to press his motion.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Carried.

THE MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. For what purpose should the motion be pressed? The object of it has been accomplished, I understand.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER. I moved the adjournment in order to test the sense of the House as to the attempt of the Chairman to interpose his ruling and establish a precedent of this kind. Past experience in this House is that an attempt on the part of the chairman of a committee of this House to introduce the closure at pleasure, and to stop discussion when he, in his judgment, thinks fit, is a course that an Opposition discharging its duty as it ought to discharge it, is bound to take notice of. I do not hesitate to say that if the opportunity had been denied, as the Chairman was disposed to deny it, I should have felt it necessary to appeal from that ruling to the Speaker of the House.

THE MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I wish to ask the hon. gentleman does he propose to test the opinion of the House on this point?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

THE MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the hon. gentleman does, it is just as well for us to know it. I understand that the hon. gentleman said he had a certain object in view.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER. I think the object has been attained. A very important statement has been made, in reference to the charges which were made, and which were ruled to be withdrawn, but to an incident connected with that charge which had not been withdrawn—a statement which it was necessary should come from the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden). That object having been attained, I am willing to withdraw the motion.

Motion, that the Committee rise, withdrawn.

MR. TAYLOR. Then, I have been waiting for the hon. member for West Lambton, or some hon. Minister for him, to retract in full the insinuations and direct charges he made against our leader and the ex-Minister of Finance before dinner. This has not been done. Unless it is done, I will move that the committee rise.

MR. FOSTER. I see that the hon. member for West Lambton is again in his place. He has stated that he did not wish to impute any corrupt motive to me in the charge which he made this afternoon, and which he repeated to-night. I now ask, as a mere matter of fairness to him, that he will leave the general ground, which it is so easy for him to take, and do me the kindness of specifying what loan he refers to, what information I refused to give, and the occasion on which I refused to give it. He has not taken away the onus when he simply states that he does not impute a corrupt motive. He has left the insinuation and the charge that I kept in the dark what I ought to have revealed, and I would like the hon. gentleman to give me the opportunity, by making a specific statement, so that I may look into the matter, and be able, if I think it necessary, to make a statement to this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Speak now.

MR. FOSTER. Then, the hon. gentleman proposes to leave myself and the House in the dark completely on a general charge, which, if it does not imply direct corruption, implies that there was something I wished to conceal. I leave it in the judgment of the House and of all fair-minded men if that is gentlemanly and proper treatment.

MR. TAYLOR. I move that the committee rise.

MR. McMULLEN. I appeal to you, Mr. Chairman, whether a second motion of that kind can be made.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER. I would say to my hon. friend that that motion is not in order, a similar motion having been just made and nothing having since intervened.

MR. TAYLOR. I just wish to say to my hon. leader that if I understand parliamentary rules, his motion was that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again, while mine is that the committee rise.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I rule this motion out of order.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think the only motion competent to my hon. friend to make is that the Chairman do now leave the Chair.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). I do not know what motions have or have not been made; but I think I went through a parliamentary experience of this kind, and I have no objection to giving hon. gentlemen opposite the benefit of it. I think it was published, when we were discussing a very important matter some years ago, that the same motion cannot be made twice in succession; but the hon. gentleman may move that the committee rise and report progress, and if that is voted down, he may move that the committee rise; so that, if you want to know how to obstruct the business of the House, you may continue motions of that kind alternately as long as the physical endurance of the committee will permit.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. With all respect to my hon. friend's experience, the correct motion, I believe, is that the Chairman do now leave the Chair.

Mr. TAYLOR. It is not necessary even to make that motion. We can discuss the question. The hon. Postmaster General has joined in the insinuation that members on this side of the House are bent on obstruction.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I did not either join in it or suggest it.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman said that if hon. gentlemen want to obstruct, they can go on moving motion after motion. That insinuation was made by hon. gentlemen opposite when they knew that the question had been discussed in caucus, and that they had decided that the session should not close within 30 days.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no; take it back.

Mr. TAYLOR. I will not take it back. Hon. gentlemen on that side of the House have admitted that it was discussed. I say that from the commencement of the session every disposition has been shown by the Opposition to close the session within the shortest space of time possible. If any obstruction has been raised, it has been raised on the other side of the House, as it was raised this afternoon, first by the hon. member for North Wellington, and then by the hon. member for West Lambton. The day has been more than half occupied by hon. gentlemen sitting behind the Government making charges which were foundationless, and then refusing to take them back, and apologizing according to parliamentary rules. The hon. member for West Lambton apologized after dinner for the charges or insinuations he had made against hon. gentlemen on this side; but he has not in my opinion made that full and ample apology which is due to those hon. gentlemen to whom he imputed dishonest and dishonourable motives; and until that is done, I do not think it would be fair to those hon. gentlemen that this item should be allowed to pass. That hon. gentleman being now in his place, and having been requested by the hon. ex-Minister of Finance to do the thing that is honourable, when he does so the passing of the Estimates will go on as fast as the members of the Government desire. But until the retraction is made as fully as it ought to be made, I do not intend that the items shall be allowed to pass. I move that the Chairman do now leave the Chair.

Mr. TAYLOR.

Motion negatived: yeas, 51; nays, 75.

Governor General Secretary's Office..... $13,500

Mr. FOSTER. What is the meaning of the foot note on page 12:

From the amounts appropriated for the contingencies of the several departments there may be paid (in addition to the amount, $600, authorized by the Civil Service Act or otherwise), a sum not exceeding $600 each for the salaries of the private secretaries of the several departments, and of the Solicitor General and Controllers of Customs and Inland Revenue, when the persons appointed are not at the time of their appointment members of the permanent Civil Service of Canada; further, that such sums may be paid notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Is that an increase? The amount now allowed is $600.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I am quite sure the hon. gentleman would not ask any private secretary to assume the functions of that office for $600 a year. Our hon. friends opposite have in most cases taken their private secretaries from the departments, and the $600 was given them in addition to their usual pay.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Is it the intention to take private secretaries from the outside and allow them $1,200 a year?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We do not expect in all cases to take our private secretaries from the permanent civil service, and we certainly ought to be allowed the privilege to bring in from the outside gentlemen who hold close and confidential relations with us, when we do not feel warranted in taking them from the civil service as at present constituted. In some cases, we may take our private secretaries from the civil service, and in these cases shall be free to use the allowance of $600 in addition to the usual pay.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. As the law stands, all the salary that a private secretary can receive is $600 a year. It is perfectly true that a person in the civil service may be appointed private secretary and have that allowance of $600 in addition to his usual pay, but the result of this change is to change the law by raising the salary of private secretaries from $600 to $1,200. That is rather a startling change.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I can see at a glance that it is much preferable for a Minister to select his private secretary from the service, but if he does not, and if there is not a vacancy in the service in which to put him, all he can pay his private secretary is $600 under the law. I think it would be better to estimate for a second-class clerkship than to make this innovation.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The practice followed by the late Government was to take the private secretaries from the permanent staff. He would be generally a second-class clerk, and if you added the $600, you would have the salaries of your private secretaries ranging from $1,200 to $1,700. And it was not put plainly and squarely before the House as it is in this case. Take my own department, for instance. There was no vacancy to which I could appoint a man. I have either to take one of the existing officials in the office and make him my private secretary, or ask for this special grant, or in some way try to get around the Act. We thought that the last course was imprudent and improper, and that it was better, as there was no vacancy, to let the private secretary have a salary of $1,200, which was less than was paid to most private secretaries under hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. FOSTER. While this has some commendable features, it is not to be forgotten that it allows the appointment of fourteen or fifteen clerks more than are in the establishment at this time. Heretofore, to give a secretary what was considered a fair salary he was made a third, or, sometimes, a second-class clerk, and given besides $600 or some portion of it. I can see the force of what is now proposed, because we have no power to appoint third-class clerks. If this plan were not taken, I suppose that what would be done would be what I understand my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works proposes to do—to appoint his secretary a second-class clerk giving him the minimum salary of that position and also whatever portion of the $600 the hon. gentleman pleases, which, I suppose, would be the whole. Under the circumstances, the matter of economy may be fairly well provided for. Is it perfectly saved by the clause that the extra $600 or any portion of it shall not be given to any man in the service?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes.
Contingencies—Queen's Privy Council for
Canada ..... $ 7,900

Mr. FOSTER. I notice a change in the form of this estimate, and I would like to ask why it is adopted. Hon. gentlemen who have been in the House for a considerable time will remember the persistent criticism made on this side because the contingencies, instead of being voted in a lump sum, should be divided into their component parts, so that the whole amount of the contingencies could not be used, say, for clerical assistance, but that there should be a fair estimate made of what each of these would probably cost. I thought there was a good deal of force in that criticism and I adopted the suggestion, so that, for the last three or four years these estimates for contingencies have been divided in that way. Now I find that hon. gentlemen opposite in some of the departments are lumping "sundries" with "clerical and other assistance." In this case the Minister would have the power to employ clerks up to the amount of $4,900. That is not the best thing for a Minister, I think, because when money is available, he is always open to urgent applications. I would like to know why these items are combined in this case.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The general rule adopted was to make three items—"clerical and other assistance," "Printing and Stationery," and "sundries." I notice that in the case of the Privy Council the amount of this is divided into two items only. I confess I can give no reason for it. I think it is a mere accident.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I notice that as compared with the first series of estimates brought down, there is an increase of $300, the total being $7,600 instead of $7,900 as it is here. Where does that increase come in?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If the hon. gentleman thinks the point of importance I would ask him to wait until the Premier is present. But this is a very little baby, and I think the explanation might be postponed until concurrence.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have no objection.

Department of Militia and Defence..... $7,100

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would ask that this be allowed to stand until we can get the decision of the Government—unless the Minister of Militia is prepared to give it now—as to whether they will bring down Major General Gascoigne's letter to the Commandant of the Royal Military College. This is a matter of supreme importance, as every hon. gentleman who will look at it dispassionately will see.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am quite willing that the item should stand.

Department of the Secretary of State.... $5,500

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would ask that this item also be allowed to stand. I propose to ask the Department of Secretary of State to make provision for the services, the very valuable and efficient services of a clerk who performed a large amount of work in the Secretary of State's department, who had not passed the examination, but who was willing to do this work subject to being paid after having passed the examination. This gentleman, a very experienced man whose services were absolutely necessary in the work of the department was willing to run the risk of having his remuneration left over until he had made himself eligible for payment by passing the examination. Under these circumstances I would like to see some person who would be in a position to answer for the Secretary of State's Department, that that matter would be favourably considered.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Will the hon. gentleman state the name?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Blount. He is the gentleman who is appointed by the Speaker to act as my private secretary.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The item might pass, and there could be a special item in the Supplementary Estimates.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Of course, we cannot enlarge this; it might come in the supplementaries. We have undertaken to pay the $600 extra to each of the private secretaries out of contingencies, and in most cases contingencies have not been enlarged, because it was thought the amount was sufficient to enable us to pay the $600. But in this case it was felt the $600 could not be met without some corresponding increase, and we have added half of it to contingencies.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman would undertake favourably to consider the case I have stated, and bring it under the notice of the Secretary of State, I would be obliged to him.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I will promise the hon. gentleman to inquire; I can go no further than that.

Mr. FOSTER. Who is the private secretary of the Secretary of State?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Mr. Kehoe.

Mr. FOSTER. He is not a civil servant?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think not.

Mr. TAYLOR. He is a reporter on the "Free Press."

Contingencies—Office of the Auditor General .....$ 3,500

Mr. SPROULE. There is an increase of $500 for clerical and other assistance; could the hon. gentleman tell us why this is?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I may reply, but I am afraid the hon. gentleman won't accept it as a good reason that this amount was placed in the Estimates by my predecessor, and I am advised that in that department the previous appropriations were found to be short, and the increase was necessary.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Contingencies—Department of Finance and Treasury Board ..... $6,800

Mr. SPROULE. There is an increase of $350 for clerical and other assistance; what does that mean?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The reason is the same as in the case of the Secretary of State's Department, that is to say, the provision for the private secretary will make an extra charge on that item, and we have increased it. But we have reduced it in sundries, so that both appropriations remain the same.

Mr. FOSTER. Who is the private secretary in this case?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My own private secretary is Mr. C. B. Burns, barrister-at-law. He is not a member of the civil service.

Contingencies—Post Office Department...$ 44,000

Mr. MONTAGUE. There seems to be an increase here of $4,000 in clerical and other assistance over the estimates in the first series.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The estimate is for the staff as it was left by the hon. gentleman, and as I find it. The hon. gentleman remembers there was a reduction in the estimates for civil government by a reduction in the staff. I find that the late Government, in the last year, after those estimates were passed, made some eight additions to the staff, making an increase of some $2,200.

Mr. FOSTER. Could my hon. friend say in what those increases were made. Were they in temporary help?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. This is the strength of the staff, as it was left by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MONTAGUE. There was spent last year $20,500, that is, they had the advantage of getting the whole amounts up to the end of the fiscal year.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not think you appointed them until the close of the year.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The sum asked for in the first series was $18,800.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The following are the classes:—Temporary employees, 48 at 400 each; 1 at $320; 2 at $1 a day; 15 at $300. Then add the statutory increases of $15 each on the 48, and 4 at $7.50. Then for a number of vacancies in the third class, promotion, messengers and packers, $1,700. That is the staff as it is to-day.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend will see that he is not quite meeting the point. Temporary help is help which was not added to that department, but continued longer than the thirty days. We appointed, so far as my recollection goes, no temporary help to go longer than the end of the fiscal year for which we were making the Estimates. There was no appropriation for the fiscal year 1896-97, and consequently that temporary help was not appointed except for the end of the term.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. They were not dismissed.

Mr. FOSTER. That may be true. I desire, however, to state the practice of the department and of the Treasury Board. The permanent temporary help is appointed twice per year, on 1st December and 1st July. So that on 30th June all temporary help really lapsed in so far as appropriations and appointments were concerned, and although a great many recommendations came over to the Treasury Board, they were all kept back awaiting an appropriation to be made. So on 1st July there were no appointments necessitating $5,200 extra. The only ground on which this money can be asked is that it is necessary for the work of the department. Although hon. gentlemen opposite take great credit for a decrease in the main Post Office estimates, they have added $5,200 to the item of contingencies under clerical help alone. Hon. gentlemen opposite were very strong in their denunciations of the unnecessary number of civil servants employed on the Hill. I find, however, that the Estimates brought down provide for exactly eight clerks less than were provided for before, this being the result in a total of 811 clerks employed in the permanent service of the departments.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Does the hon. gentleman include what he calls permanent temporaries?

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all. I repeat that in a total of 811 clerks, hon. gentlemen opposite have made a reduction of only eight. So when the extra amount of $5,200 for clerical help is divided up, giving $300 to each clerk, hon. gentlemen opposite will employ a larger number than last year. In a word, the Estimate provides for a larger number of permanent and temporary clerks on the Hill than was ever before known in the history of the country.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) states that the number has been decreased by eight; but he omitted to mention that the number will be increased by 17 private secretaries, thus making a net increase of nine. With respect to the estimate for the Post Office Department: in 1895, $18,900 was required for clerical and other assistance; this year $20,500 will be expended, which of course is very extravagant, but the Postmaster General has increased that amount by $3,500. I should like an explanation, as it is necessary to practice economy.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman will see that the item was passed the other evening, under civil government, for the Post Office Department, involved a reduction altogether of $4,300. The resolution now before the committee involves an increase of $1,700.

Mr. WALLACE. That is on printing and stationery, but I am talking about clerical assistance.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman says I am increasing the expenditure in the department. If he refers to clerical assistance, I desire to say that I understand from my deputy that the increase is on account of the reduction in the other items, that there have been changes in the staff under recent legislation. I am now dealing with the staff as I find it. The ex-Minister of Finance says the staff was increased in 1896, and that increase was intended to be terminated on the 1st July, and he gave the committee to understand that the reduction had taken place, and also that I assumed office on 1st July. I did not assume office until 13th July, and up to that time the previous Government had not shown any disposition to change their policy by discharging temporaries. Those men were on duty, and they are there to-day. I repeat that while I am led to believe that the staff in my department will in the public interest require to be reasonably reduced, I want to be allowed to proceed in an intelligent way, and not with cruelty or harshness to anybody concerned. I have not had an opportunity of studying the needs of my department, and so I have not felt at liberty, in justice to those in the service, to summarily dismiss them because some one said they were not required. If hon. gentlemen wish me to act in a harsh way, let them proceed with their criticisms. Those men had been in the department thirteen days in July. What do hon. gentlemen opposite want me to do?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman will not stifle criticism by using the threat that if his department is criticised, he will dismiss employees. The country will judge as to the hon. gentleman's action with respect to dismissals, and hon. members are here to criticise the Estimates. I wish to commend to the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver), who voted for the Government because he wanted economy carried out, and also to the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), who is a great stickler, the fact that this great effort of the new Government to economize has resulted in an actual increase in the permanent and temporary employees on the Hill.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. If the hon. ex-Finance Minister or any member of the late Government is sufficiently familiar with the Post Office Department to say that the present staff will stand a reduction of so many men, I will consider the matter with a view to at once reduce this vote.

Mr. FOSTER. All I have to say is that I am not here as adviser of the hon. gentleman as to the number of men that should be employed in his department. He has to assume that responsibility.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I will take it before the money is all spent.

Mr. SPROULE. The suggestion of the Minister is hardly justifiable or defensible. If the ex-Minister of Finance said that this vote should be reduced by a certain amount, and the Minister forthwith reduced it, he should be dismissing men whether they were efficient or not. I agree that the hon. Minister should have time to consider where the reductions could be made, and thus do justice to the civil servants and to the department. The criticism was mainly directed, however, to the statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite before they came into office that such reductions could be made without injury to the service, and now when they are in power, they find they cannot be carried out.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is a little too previous; you must give us time.

Mr. SPROULE. We are not objecting to give you time, nor so far as I am personally concerned, am I saying there are too many in the service. I think it is wise that you should look into the matter carefully, but I think it unwise that the Government before they came into power should make injudicious criticisms with regard to those departments, and now be under the humiliation of admitting that they did not know anything about it.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We are not admitting that we did not know anything about it. We found a number of gentlemen in our department appointed by our predecessors and we could not dispense with them without at least inquiring. An hon. gentleman has remarked that we added our private secretaries to the expense of the department. Well, I suppose if we wanted to pursue an ungenerous course, I might say that an officer of my department should be dismissed to make way for my private secretary. That would neither be fair nor generous in my opinion. We ought not, therefore, be charged by hon. gentlemen opposite with adding that large number of officials to the service.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. SPROULE. The private secretaries hitherto have done some work in the department in addition. If you take in 17 or 18 new private secretaries who have nothing to do but act as private secretaries, you are adding so much more to the service.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The duties of a private secretary to a Minister are very laborious, and generally speaking if a private secretary attends to his duty as such he has very little time for departmental work.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No time at all.

Mr. SPROULE. I am not objecting to the additional vote, but I am pointing out that additional officials are asked for, and that additional expenses are being incurred by those gentlemen who condemned the large number of civil servants when they were out of power.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The only alternative would be that we should dismiss the gentlemen appointed by our predecessors, and we do not wish to dismiss them without inquiring into their efficiency.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not wish you to do that at all.

Mr. FOSTER. The Finance Minister would not follow precedent if he did.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I suppose we could put it on the ground of efficiency in the public service, and do it.

Mr. FOSTER. Certain conditions of the law would have to be fulfilled before you could do that.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It is provided to pay these private secretaries out of contingencies, and we might ask the Government to promise that when vacancies do occur, instead of appointing new men, they should appoint their private secretaries.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The effect of that might be to give to some private secretaries a larger income than the Minister might desire. They would then become members of the permanent services.

Contingencies—Department of Agriculture ..... $14,500

Mr. MONTAGUE. I wish to say a few words which I would have said on the general estimate in connection with this department, but which I did not say because the Minister of Agriculture was not present. He is not present to-night, but the item is a small one and I do not wish to ask to have it stand, so I prefer to say what I have to say, and to ask the gentleman who is now leading the House to call the attention of his colleagues to it. There is a rumour which I have seen given currency to, that a gentleman who is at present in the Department of Agriculture as Deputy Commissioner of Patents is about to be retired, and another gentleman appointed to take his place.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What is his name ?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Pope is the present occupant of that position. He is a gentleman who has been a long time in the service, and if the Government felt like retiring him upon a superannuation allowance, there could be no possible objection to that. Indeed I may say that was the policy which I had the informal authority of Council to pursue, after I had explained the position of the matter in connection with that gentleman: but it was only upon this condition: that if he were superannuated no appointment should be made in his place. I think the experience of the department has shown clearly, that the deputy of the department might well be asked to occupy the dual position of Deputy Minister and Deputy Commissioner of Patents as well. That is a return to the old system, and I would strongly urge hon. gentlemen, if they do retire the present Deputy Commissioner of Patents, that instead of making a new appointment they would pursue the policy which the late Government intended to pursue, and appoint—with some small additional remuneration if you like—the Deputy Minister of Agriculture for the time being to be Deputy Commissioner of Patents.

I would also call the attention of the Government to the fact that there was a reduction proposed by the late Government in connection with the Department of Agriculture. These present Estimates, the contingent, for 1895-96, being $16,500, it was proposed by the late Government to ask only $14,500. If the hon. gentleman refers to the main Estimates, he will find that the late Government affected a saving of about $6,000 in them, and in contingencies about $2,000, both of which are to be credited to the late Government, and not to the present Government.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We are not claiming any credit to ourselves.

Mr. BERGERON. We are voting a large amount of money for printing and stationery, and I think the people of this country will be very glad to know how this printing and stationery is acquired. There is something for every department; but one would imagine that one department might be charged with the buying of all that is required for all the departments. I would be very glad if the Minister would explain whether this is obtained by tender, whether the contract is made each year, or for how many years, and whether the paper is bought from some of the paper factories in this country or is imported from abroad. If I am not mistaken, a good deal of the paper is imported, though I am told we have in this country paper factories which will compare very favourably with any foreign factories.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I understand that a very considerable portion of the paper is purchased in this country, but some portion is imported. I believe no new contracts have been made, and the arrangement now existing is the one that has existed for some time past. If the hon. gentleman wishes additional information, he will find in the Auditor General's Report a very detailed statement of these expenditures.

Mr. BERGERON. It is not for myself that I want the information. I would like to have it brought out in Parliament, so that it will go to the public. I had a conversation some time ago with some gentlemen on this subject, and I found that there was generally complete ignorance in regard to it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I suppose this Government will pursue the practice of the late Government of letting these contracts by tender.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There has been no change at all.

Mr. BERGERON. I would not object if I found that the Government was buying its paper from our factories in the country instead of importing it. I notice that the paper in the trunks we get at the beginning of each session is mostly imported. I understand also that the inks have been bought from the same house for many years. If that could be changed, and we could get equally good ink in this country, I think it should be got here.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. (Mr. Tarte). I know that we buy in Canada the greatest portion of our paper.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. Minister of Finance will ask the Queen's Printer for a statement which he gave to me a little while before the late Government resigned, he will find it to give very succinctly what my hon. friend has been asking for. I had the curiosity to get that information, and I asked the Queen's Printer for the statement; and the reasons he gives for the present arrangement will be found to be very satisfactory. It is impossible to get all the paper that is wanted in this country, simply because some qualities are not made here, and have to be imported. But all that we could get here has been got.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I will obtain the statement, and will be happy to show it to the hon. member.

Contingencies—Department of Trade and Commerce ..... $5,600

Mr. FOSTER. I think I shall have to ask my hon. friend to allow this to stand. There seems to be an ominous increase here.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The increase of $600 is represented altogether by the salary of the private secretary, an item we have already discussed.

Mr. FOSTER. Who is the private secretary?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Mr. O'Hara, who I believe is not a civil servant.

Mr. HUGHES. May I ask where he comes from?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I have not the pleasure of knowing what part of Canada he comes from.

Mr. HUGHES. That is what I want to know—does he come from Canada?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes, he comes from Kent County, Ont.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I want to suggest that when this item comes up again, the Government ought to be able to make an announcement of their policy in regard to this department. We have had it given out in the ministerial press, and definitely stated by members of the Government themselves, that they proposed to raise the two controllers to the position of Cabinet Ministers, with the same salary, of course, as the other Cabinet Ministers. Is it the intention when they do that, to retain the department of Trade and Commerce? We ought to know this.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If the hon. gentleman wishes to press the question, I shall ask him to hold it over until next session; but, if the matter is in a position to admit of a direct reply, I will call the attention of the Prime Minister to it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. One plank of the platform of hon. gentlemen opposite was a reduction of the number of Ministers, and this department was especially mentioned as one likely to.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. A good many of these good things which we hope to accomplish, we shall have to allow to stand over until next session.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I hope the remark of the hon. gentleman is not an expression of his wish that they may push the Minister of Trade and Commerce out of his place.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Hon. gentlemen opposite have made vigorous efforts for many years to push out the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but they have not succeeded in doing so.

Mr. MONTAGUE. We did not succeed half so well as the hon. gentleman who formed the Government.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman has not had the comfort of seeing him pushed out yet. The hon. gentleman will not have that comfort. If my

Mr. FOSTER.

hon. friend from South Oxford does not hold this position in this Government which he formerly held under a Liberal Administration, it is a matter of his own choice; and if I hold the office of Finance Minister, I hold it with that gentleman's most cordial good-will.

Mr. FOSTER. After that explanation, I ask the hon. gentleman to allow that item to stand, as I have something else to say with regard to it.

Item allowed to stand.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. As it is now very late, and we have done a good deal of business, I think the committee might rise.

Resolutions reported.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.40 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 11th September, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY—
REPLY TO THE ADDRESS.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows:—

ABERDEEN.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I beg to acknowledge with thanks the Loyal Address which you have adopted in reply to the Speech with which I opened the session.

I receive with satisfaction your assurances that the Estimates for the current year to be laid before you will be respectfully considered.

Government House,

Ottawa, 8th September, 1896.

CONTRACTS FOR MILITIA CAMP SUPPLIES.

Mr. BEATTIE. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Militia to a recent occurrence in the city of London. The military camp for No. 1 District is now being held there, and I find that in giving contracts for supplies required by the men, the usual custom has been departed from. Instead of tenders being advertised for in the usual way, friends of the Government have been called in and given papers and asked to tender in a private way.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am inclined to think that the hon. member, on the calling of the Orders of the Day, is not entitled to bring up any controversial matter, and it seems to me that he is doing so. I think he must seek some other opportunity, which, no doubt, will soon present itself, to bring the matter up.

RESIGNATION OF THE LATE GOVERNMENT.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the hon. leader of the Government if he has been able to lay upon the Table of the House the supplementary papers relating to the correspondence with the Governor General?

The PRIME MINISTER. I am sorry to say that these papers are not quite ready. I hope to be able to bring them down this evening. If not then, certainly they will be brought down on Monday.

RESIGNATION OF MAJOR GENERAL CAMERON.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. May I ask the hon. leader of the Government whether he has considered the question, to which I attach very great importance, of laying upon the Table of the House the letter from Major General Gascoigne which elicited the resignation of the Commandant of the Royal Military College?

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes. The Government have no objection to the letter being produced. But we consider that this is a letter passing between two eminent British officers, and the moment they agree to have the letter brought down, it will be brought down.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 18) for granting to Her Majesty the sum of $446,500 required for defraying certain expenses in connection with the annual drill of the militia during the financial year ending the 30th June, 1897.—(Mr. Fielding.)

SUPPLY—MILITIA SUPPLIES.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. BEATTIE. Before the House goes into Supply, I wish to call the attention of the Government to the course that is taken in the city of London in furnishing supplies to the military camp for No. 1 District, which is now being held in the city of London. On former occasions the supplies for that camp had always been advertised for, and let by public tender. I find, Sir, on this occasion that that rule has been departed from. The supplies have not been advertised for by public tender, but on the contrary the friends of the Government have been called in, and forms have been handed them, and they have been allowed to tender in a private way. When a Conservative applied for tender papers he was informed that his name was not on the list, and that there were no papers for him, and he could not get them. Now, Sir, that has happened in three or four different lines, for meat, for fuel, for groceries, and all these different items have been contracted for in that way. In one instance I know where a Conservative, not having been able to get the papers, made out a tender for meat on a blank sheet, and sent it in, and I believe it was half a cent a pound less than the price for which the contract is awarded to-day. Now, Sir, that is only a sample of a piece of political jobbery on a small scale. If it is going to be carried out in large matters, I do not know what we may expect.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It has been carried out for the last eighteen years.

Mr. BEATTIE. I beg your pardon. Heretofore in every case the supplies, not only for the camps, but for the barracks, have been advertised for by public tender in a public way, and I can prove that. Under the late Government a Reformer had the contract for bread, and has had it, I believe, for the last two years, and another had the contract for groceries. And not only that, but an alien who is not a voter, an American, at one time had the contract for groceries. The House was informed the other night that the contract for these supplies would be let by tender in the usual way, and I would like to know why the Minister has thought proper to depart from the usual custom.

Mr. GIBSON. I am glad my hon. friend from London (Mr. Beattie) has brought this matter up, because I have had a little experience in connection with the camp that is about to be held at Niagara. Under the late Government the tenders were forwarded in the usual way, by the usual officers, and they reached the hands of the friends of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, in the usual way. When intimation was given that a camp was to be held, friends of my own who wished to tender for supplies came up to Niagara and called upon the man who had the distribution of these forms for tenders, and found that they were all in the hands of the Tories, and not a Liberal was allowed to tender for any goods for the camp at Niagara. I was fortunate enough, however, to get the Government to send forward their form of tender, so that friends as well as opponents of the Government might have a fair opportunity of tendering for those supplies. I am very glad that this matter has been brought up and so lustily cheered by my hon. friend from the county of Welland who sits behind him (Mr. McCleary). He knows how these things were done under the regime of the hon. gentlemen whom he supports, and what nice fat contracts for timber for canals and other things he got at fancy prices. I am glad to see him cheering now, as showing that he is glad to see things being continued in the same way as in the past. I remember well when he said how proud he was of the late Minister of Railways and Canals, of the leader of the Opposition, and of other gentlemen of the Conservative party. Why, of course, such favours would make any man loyal to the Tory party. I am very glad to hear my hon. friend from London say that the contract for groceries had been given to an alien. An alien has no vote, as I understand it, and consequently he cannot be said to be a friend of the Government.

Mr. BEATTIE. Excuse me, I did not say it had been given to an alien.

Mr. GIBSON. Why should not an alien tender?

Mr. BEATTIE. I did not say an alien had it.

Mr. GIBSON. You mentioned an alien. What did you say?

Mr. BEATTIE. I said that on former occasions the contract had always been let by tender, the Conservative party had allowed any man to tender, and that in fact a Reformer who is an alien had the tender lately—not this year—under a Conservative Government.

Mr. GIBSON. The Conservative party took good care that no Liberal ever got a contract in the last eighteen years, to my knowledge, whether by public or by private tender. I think the hon. gentleman from the city of London has, perhaps, been shown that the party who is in power now have been far less considerate for their friends than the party which the hon. gentleman supports. If the present Government had been as considerate for their friends as the Conservative Government were for their friends, none of the Tories residing in the several districts would have had an opportunity to tender for supplies. But an opportunity was given to them, and forms were sent from the department here to people who had been in the habit of distributing these supplies before. I found that the mode of getting hold of these forms for tenders was something like this: one gentleman really intended to tender, and perhaps there were half a dozen forms on which five or six other people might be given a chance to tender. This man would get his other five friends to go down to the office and get their forms of tender, but never intending to put in a bid. Then when the parties who really wished to bid for these supplies went to the office and asked for a form of tender, they were quietly told that the forms were all gone, but in order to give some colour of competition another put in a bid. I am delighted to have this opportunity of explaining how the late Government have been looking after their friends in the Niagara district. Now, let me say that I think it is the right of every man on either side of the House, when the party he supports is in power, and all other things are equal, he should be given the contract. All other things being equal, I should give the preference to my friends and not to my political opponents. My hon. friend from London has had some military experience, he holds the rank of major, and I would like to have him state now, from his political experience in the city of London and from his experience as a military man in that district, if he can name one Liberal who ever received a contract for the supply of goods to the camp in that district, during the whole of the time that he has been connected with the militia there.

Mr. BEATTIE. In reply to the hon. gentleman—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman cannot make another speech, but he may answer a question.

Mr. BEATTIE. I was asked to give a name. Johnson Bros. hold a contract to-day, and have for the past two years, for the supply of bread to the permanent corps stationed in London. They are the most bitter Grits in the city. If the hon. gentleman wants more names, I can give him some.

Mr. McCLEARY. I can hardly understand why the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) should make the attack upon me he did a moment ago, particularly as that hon. gentleman himself has grown fat and rich out of public contracts practically let without competition. I want to hurl back in the face and teeth of the hon. gentleman the insinuation he has thrown out that the firm of which I am a member have received, at the hands of the Conservative Government or any other Government, one dollar's worth of supplies for which we did not have to compete with other dealers in our line of business. I defy the hon. gentleman to prove his assertion.

Mr. GIBSON. Give me a chance.

Mr. McCLEARY. The hon. gentleman will have plenty of chances to prove the assertion if he can. I know he cannot, and he knows himself that he cannot. The firm to which I belong have supplied for some years back the material required for repairs on the Welland Canal, but we have never yet got those supplies without competition with every one in the same line of business along the canal or living numbers of miles away from the canal. Advertisements were inserted in the Toronto and local papers, and in competition with all Ontario for those supplies, he had held the contract for some years. My hon. friend has referred to the camp at Niagara. I live near that camp, and I know something about it. The hon. gentleman must be aware that tenders were asked for by the department this year, and those tenders were to be opened in Ottawa at the department last Tuesday. But there have been some supplies required, as I understand, for which tenders have not been called for publicly as they might have been. There were tenders put in for carpentering work, of which my hon. friend may know something. A certain Conservative put in a bid for the work. One of my hon. friend's supporters in the town of Niagara, went to a Liberal, who had put in a bid as well, and told him that this certain Conservative tenderer was the lowest, and if he would do the work for the same sum he would get the job. Of course the Liberal friend said, "All right. I will do it."

Mr. GIBSON. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. McCLEARY. The man showed an official letter from Ottawa: he told the Liberal who tendered that as he was a supporter of the hon. member for Lincoln he would get the job, and he got the job. Hon. members are aware that in tendering for supplies to the Niagara camp offers were received from Liberals and Conservatives alike, and Liberals have frequently been awarded the contract. This is a fact of which I am well aware. The hon. member was very unfair in his attack on me this afternoon. The Liberal party has always declared that the Conservative party did not act on principle in considering tenders, and letting contracts, and hon. gentlemen opposite, if they wanted to live up to the principles advocated by themselves when in Opposition, and when they attacked the Conservative party for their administration of public affairs, should have come out openly and manfully and advocated impartial tendering for those supplies. When the papers are brought down, hon. members will be able to learn how, why and where contracts were let for supplies to the Niagara camp as well as to other camps.

Mr. INGRAM. I feel surprised at the hon. gentleman declaring that the policy of the Government was to grant contracts to Liberals only. I have always understood that the practice was to give the contract to the lowest tenderer. Having had some experience in this line—

Mr. LANDERKIN. No doubt, for a number of years.

Mr. INGRAM. Having heard what my hon. friend from London stated as to the way in which tenders are granted, I desire to say this, that previous to the declaration of the Conservative Government that No. 1 District camp should be held in London, the camp was held in different places, but the late Government decided that it should be held permanently in London. In 1891 the camp of Military District No. 1 was held at St. Thomas. I know that a number of tenders at that time were put in for furnishing supplies to the militia, including bread, meat and other articles, and I was then told by the Minister of Militia that the lowest tenderer would receive the contract. I was not told that the lowest tenderer or any tenderer would receive the contract because he was a Conservative, but I was simply told that the lowest tenderer would in any case receive the contract. I am sorry indeed to hear that hon. gentlemen opposite have changed their policy, as is evidenced from the statements made by the hon. member for London. If that is to be the course pursued, it is well that we should understand it. If not, I should like to hear from the Minister of Militia. I do not understand that the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) is called on to speak for the Government, but in my opinion, they should speak for themselves.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The invariable practice followed by the Department of Militia during the several years I was Minister was that all supplies should be given out on tender. Tenders were asked for. I have never known since the time I took an interest in militia matters any time when the supplies for the camps were given out without tenders being called for. This is a practice which is altogether new, as the hon. gentlemen will ascertain by referring to his own department, and if a change has been made, it is a departure as regards the practice in the Department of Militia. At times it was found inconvenient, from the fact that tenders were sent in from a distance from where the camp was held, but even then we considered it necessary that supplies should be made to the various camps on tenders called for and opened in the Department of Militia. I am quite correct in saying that there is not one instance within my recollection where that rule was departed from.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The late Postmaster General limits his observations to supplies for militia camps. I happened to be present when investigations were made under oath before the Public Accounts Committee as to the methods adopted for supplying the militia with clothing, when it was found that hundreds of thousands of dollars and even millions of dollars of contracts were given without public tender. The hon. gentleman may shake his head. I challenge him to state the contrary. The system the hon. gentleman adopted has been the occasion of gross frauds on the public treasury. He submitted an application to a few favourites, perhaps three manufacturers in Montreal, to supply the department with militia overcoats. The hon. gentleman knows that I am speaking by the book when I tell him that in the department he has left the letting and reletting of contracts without tender has been the occasion of loss to Canada of hundreds of thousands of dollars. When I come to give figures, as I shall in the near future, hon. gentlemen will find the amount of the loss occasioned by departing from sound principles. At this very day, what have we to do? Every day in the department it is cancelling frauds committed by my predecessor in the department which I preside over.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman who has addressed the House has distinctly charged fraud.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I charge fraud. I will give an illustration.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman wishes to charge fraud against an hon. member, he should specify the hon. gentleman, and then the matter could be dealt with by the House.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I will give hon. gentlemen an illustration, and they will see whether I was right or wrong.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) in speaking as he has just done, has charged me with fraud. I say that the hon. gentleman is in the habit—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MULOCK. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron) is speaking to the point of order.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. He is arguing the point.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am speaking to the point of order. I say that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) is in the habit of making statements on the floor of this House which he cannot—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. The hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron) in speaking to the point of order, must be careful not to get out of order himself.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I do not wish to be out of order, but I say that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) in making the statement which he did, is altogether out of order and should not be allowed to make it.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) of course will not make a charge of fraud across the floor of this House, against another hon. member.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I said it was a fraud against the country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) considers that the Postmaster General has made a charge of fraud against him. I wish the hon. the Postmaster General to make it clear that he has not made that charge, and if he has made it, to withdraw it. The hon. the Postmaster General of course may state what facts he considers affect the public interest in the discharge of official duties.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. My first remarks were addressed to the methods—

Mr. FOSTER. Chair.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am about to put myself in perfect order if you will allow me. My first observations were directed to the practices of the member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) when he was Minister of Militia. My subsequent remarks had no reference to him or to his practices. The remarks I made in which I referred to fraud, had reference to the system of re-letting and letting mail contracts, and the sentence in which I made that statement was, if I recollect rightly, as follows: That my predecessors in office—

An hon. MEMBER. No, you said my predecessor.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I said my predecessors.

Mr. FOSTER. You said my predecessor.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I said my predecessors in office. I said I will give you an illustration of whether it is a fraud or not, and I said that my predecessors in office had by their method of procuring the discharge of part of the public service, occasioned frauds upon the public service of the country.

Mr. FOSTER. I rise to a point of order. I want to know whether the Postmaster General is or is not bound to obey the ruling of the Chair, which was that the hon. gentleman should withdraw his remark.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). That was not the ruling of the Chair. The ruling of the Chair was that if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) had intended to convey the impression complained of, he was bound to take it back. The words of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) were: That the system of administration by his predecessors had led to the bringing about of fraud on the country.

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) made no charge of fraud against any hon. gentleman opposite.

Some hon. MEMBERS. He did.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the whole difficulty would be settled by the Postmaster General saying that he did not, as he says he did not, charge the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) with fraud. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) attacks the system he is at perfect liberty to do so, and the hon. gentleman can put himself in order by doing that.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Mr. Speaker, you have quite appreciated, Sir, the manner in which I desired to express myself. I say, and I repeat it, that the result of my investigation has convinced me that the system—we will say the system, for I am not saying that any hon. gentleman for personal gain did these things, although I say that they resulted in an injustice to the country—I say that the system entailed the expenditure of far more public money than was necessary for the public service. It may have been strong language to use, and perhaps I should not have used language so strong as calling it fraud. But, it would be regarded in a court of equity as a breach of trust if any trustee should misapply trust funds and expend a larger amount than was necessary for the proper discharge of the trust. In that sense I used the term, and in that sense I believe it is parliamentary. I said I would give an illustration, and I had it in my mind at the time to do so. I said, that day after day it has been my duty to cancel contracts that have been made, for small sums in their way, but nevertheless to cancel them, because I had reason to believe that they had been let without regard to the true spirit of the law, without tender, and at improvident prices. I proposed to quote this illustration. One of my last administrative acts to-day before coming to this Chamber was to give instructions for the cancellation of a contract, let many years ago but renewed from time to time, in favour of a man named Morrison for carrying the mails between Point Tupper and somewhere in Cape Breton. This man was paid $9,000 per year for the contract, which has been going on for years, notwithstanding that there are in the department offers to carry out that service for $2,700 per year.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. And, Sir, there is a report of the post office inspector recommending the cancellation of that contract let at $9,000 a year, and there is the offer to carry out that contract for $2,700 a year. That report of their own official has been before the department for a very considerable period of time, I do not know how long, and no attention has been paid to it. We have been paying $9,000 a year for that little transaction which could have been done for $2,700.

Mr. CALVERT. Mr. Speaker, I must confess that I was a little surprised at the remarks made by the hon. member for London (Mr. Beattie). A few days ago I had a communication from a friend in London, asking me to interview the Minister for the purpose of endeavouring to get him an order for the furnishing of some supplies. In order to accommodate my friend I laid the matter before the Minister of Militia, and the Minister informed me that no supplies would be purchased unless under tender. Then, in connection with the Postmaster General, a friend wrote asking me to endeavour to have this contract continued for delivering the mail from Melbourne to Middlemiss. It is only a matter of $150 a year and he wished to have it continued without tender. I laid that matter before the Postmaster General and he also informed me that no contract would be continued without tenders. I am consequently greatly surprised that the hon. member for London (Mr. Beattie) should say that the Government are in favour of giving contracts to their friends without tenders.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). Mr. Speaker, I was not present when this discussion was started, but I understand that an hon. gentleman has complained that some irregularity has taken place in the department over which I preside, in the giving of contracts for supplies for some of the camps. If the hon. gentleman had given me notice that he intended to bring this matter up to-day—as he ought to have done, but perhaps as a young member he is not aware that there is such a custom in the House—I would have been able to give him the information which he wants. I may say to him, however, that no departure has been made, so far as I know, from the rule of the department. I will tell him further than that: That everything that has been done by me has been done under the advice, and by the advice, of the officers of my department and so far as I know in every case, the contract has been awarded at the lowest prices offered to the department. I shall be very glad indeed to give, when the Estimates of my department come before the House, all the information required with reference to these contracts. My hon. friends on the other side of the House must not be disappointed, if under the new regime, the Liberals of Canada get a fair chance. I am not going to make any unpleasant reference to the regime of the gentlemen who preceded me in this department, but I must say, that they must not be disappointed if in future, Liberals, at least get a fair show with Conservatives. I shall make it my business to see that they do. But my Liberal friends will not expect from me, nor will they receive, anything more than fair-play.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am sure no person can find any fault with the statement made by the hon. Minister of Militia. It would be very hard indeed if under a Liberal Government the members and supporters of the Liberal party did not receive fair-play; but the hon. gentleman will remember that when the House consented to give the vote for the militia service, it was distinctly stated that the supplies required in connection with the expenditure of that money would be obtained by tender and contract. Now, the hon. member for London (Mr. Beattie) has made a statement to the House which, if it be well-founded, shows that the pledge made to the House by the hon. Minister of Militia, and upon which this money was granted, has been departed from. The hon. member for London states distinctly that these supplies were not asked for by open tender and contract. I do not make an important point of that, however, because it may be that the time was short, and that it was not convenient to do so. But if it be true that a party was prevented from getting a contract because he was a Conservative, though his tender was at a considerably lower price, this is a statement of very grave import, and one that deserves the most careful consideration of the Minister and of this House. I think the hon. Minister owes it to himself that he should investigate that statement, and be able to state to the House on a future occasion what the facts of the matter are. I can understand certain cases in which supplies may not be obtained by public tender and contract. There may be cases in which certain persons are in the habit of supplying certain articles, not as middlemen, but directly to the department, and in which that course may be adopted without injury to the public service, because it would prevent middlemen coming in who are not in a position to furnish the supplies themselves, but who would levy on other parties from whom they would be obliged to obtain them. But if it be the fact that parties are to be prevented on account of their politics from competing fairly and openly for the furnishing of supplies, that is a very important question, and one which I am sure the Minister of Militia will feel it due to himself to meet frankly and fully.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I would point out to my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition that it would greatly save our time and conduce to shorten these discussions if hon. gentlemen like the hon. member for London would state to the Minister, whose proceedings they propose to impugn, what they intend to do. The hon. leader of the Opposition knows that no mortal man can carry in his mind all these details, and a great deal of time would be saved by hon. gentlemen giving notice. I merely make the suggestion in the interest of proceeding with our business.

Mr. BORDEN (Kings.)

Mr. DOMVILLE. My hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) displays a great deal of righteous indignation, stating that he never heard of letting contracts without tender. Let me call his attention to the celebrated case of the farm in Sussex which was bought under his administration for military drill, and for which $7,000 was paid.

Mr. LANDERKIN. How much was it worth?

Mr. DOMVILLE. It was worth more money. It was a good purchase. I will give credit where credit is due. I merely wish to point out what the hon. gentleman who now finds fault did in the same line. That farm, which cost $7,000, was leased away without tender for seven years for $25 a year. That is within my actual knowledge, and I state it without fear of contradiction. I know that the hon. gentleman is very apt to contradict things, but the proof is not far off. The very hay on the farm was this year sold at auction, standing, for $300 odd by the man who leased the farm. The farm was leased to this man at $25 a year, because he was a political adherent of the hon. member for York, and one of his strongest friends. When I was supporting the other Administration this man was my strongest friend; but like a great many around him, he was a Liberal when it suited him to be a Liberal, and a Conservative when it suited him to be a Conservative. Nor did the matter end there. The hon. gentleman placed a caretaker on the farm, a sergeant in the militia, at one dollar a day, besides allowing him $180 a year to pay his lodging in a house in the neighbourhood, when he could have obtained a cottage for $50 or $100, and the man is still there for the moment under that pay. I do not hesitate to say that that farm could have been leased away for $300 or $400 a year. The former Government also undertook to build a house on the property for this caretaker. All this was done under the direction of the member for York.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The member for York next.

Mr. FOSTER. I scarcely know, Mr. Speaker, who has charge of the House. Sometimes I think it is the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin).

Mr. GILLIES. I was considerably surprised at the statement of the Postmaster General this afternoon, in reference to the mail contract existing between Port Hawkesbury and the town of Sydney, and I wish to draw his attention for a few moments to that matter. I will not dwell on this at as much length as I otherwise would, or as I may when the papers are brought down. I am quite sure that when the hon. Postmaster General made the statement he did this afternoon, he did so in pure ignorance of the facts; and if the statements made by him are based on any representations made to him, then I venture to say that the information communicated to him was a thorough misrepresentation of the facts.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). Made to me by my deputy.

Mr. GILLIES. I do not care from what source it came, I make bold to say there is no information in the hon. gentleman's hands that will warrant him in making the statement that the service could be performed by any responsible party for $2,700 a year. If there is any information in the Postmaster General's hands to warrant him in making the statement that the service between Port Hawkesbury and Sydney can be performed, as it is now and has been for the past thirty years, at such an amount as $2,700, I will be content to withdraw the statement I now make. I may be permitted to tell the Postmaster General the facts. When I came here in 1891, I found the matters were existing then precisely as they are now. Mr. Morrison was the contractor for the mail service between Port Hawkesbury and Sydney, a distance of over a hundred miles, and he performed that service daily each way. The Postmaster General shakes his head, but he will permit me to know better about this than he does. The service goes through my county some sixty odd miles and through the adjoining county some thirty-four miles. That service has been performed since 1860, when a daily mail was established over the route, and the firm of Lindsay & Co. were the contractors, of whom Mr. Morrison was a partner. They had the contract from New Glasgow to Sydney, and when the railway was completed to the Straits of Canso. Mr. Morrison took the stage line from Point Tupper to Sydney at a subsidy of, I think, $5,700. It was performed by a two-horse stage line, once each way daily. In 1890, after the railway was opened, most of the travel went that way; but inasmuch as the railway was no accommodation whatever to the territory covered by this stage line, it was considered advisable and necessary that this stage line should be maintained for the accommodation of the people on the southern side of the Bras d'Or Lake, without which they had no means of communicating with the railway, particularly upon the close of navigation. The stage line was continued, as it is now, but Mr. Morrison, having made his calculations under the conditions then existing—that is before the railway was opened—tendered at $5,700 for the service, because he carried all the passengers. After the railway was opened, however, they took away the passenger traffic, and the contractor was running into ruin. These facts were represented to the department, and a temporary arrangement was made, by which Mr. Morrison was to continue his service daily each way for $9,000 a year. This went on a couple of years. In the winter of 1893, some time before Morrison's term of contract was up, the whole service was offered by tender. Every newspaper in the eastern part of the province, and I believe every newspaper in Cape Breton, had advertisements for this route. Notices were posted up in every post office from Point Tupper to Sydney calling for tenders. The tenders were filed in the Postmaster General's office, and there were only two to perform the service as required. One was for $7,000, filed by Mr. McInnes, of Hawkesbury, who afterwards was unable to find the security which the department required, and the other tenderer was Mr. Morrison, the present contractor, for the sum at which he had been performing the service for years past. There were two tenders, one for $7,000, of Mr. McInnes, who was unable to find security, and the other was Mr. Morrison's, who did find the security. The department accepted the tender of Mr. Morrison, it had no other alternative, and from that day to this the service has been performed daily between those two points, a distance of over 100 miles, from Sydney to Port Hawkesbury, according to the strict letter of the contract as to equipment and distance to be covered per hour, &c. Where, then, is the fraud? Where are the tenders to do the work for $2,700. Why were they not on hand when the tenders had been advertised for weeks and weeks? My hon. friend will agree that great caution must be exercised in letting large services of that kind, which have to be performed with good sturdy horses and coaches and equipments necessary for the successful carrying out of the service. It is not every man who owns a broken-down horse by the wayside, or a broken-down carriage, who should be given the contract for a service of that kind. The department very wisely demands that good and sufficient security be supplied for the fulfilment of the contract. Mr. Morrison furnished the security, and he was the only one of the two who did so; and there was not the slightest fraud perpetrated on the country. I do hope and trust that the Postmaster General will pause before cancelling a contract for a service that has been so satisfactorily performed. The hon. gentleman must at once see that a wrong has been done some one by the remarks he has made. Since the Postmaster General has stated that the papers will be brought down, I trust they will be brought down immediately so that the House will have full information on the matter. And I assume that the hon. Postmaster General, since he was so specific in his statements and seemed to be so certain of their accuracy, must be speaking from information contained in public papers and that he will lay these papers forthwith on the Table of the House.

Mr. FRASER. It will be within the recollection of hon. members who were members of the last Parliament, that I brought this matter up. I did so at the urgent request of some of the best people of the county represented by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gillies).

Mr. GILLIES. At whose request? Who are they?

Mr. FRASER. I will tell the hon. gentleman who one of them was. He was a very important man in the county, who was going to oppose the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gillies), but through the intercession of the leader of the Opposition, who went down there, matters were smoothed over and the way prepared for the return of the hon. gentleman. This gentleman was a Conservative of the Conservatives, and had at one time represented the party in this House. This matter of carrying these mails became a public scandal. Why, more was given to Mr. Morrison for carrying that mail than was given previous to the building of the Intercolonial Railway, when the mails were carried from Point Tupper to Sydney. And it all arose from the fact that Mr. Morrison found it convenient to change from being a strong Liberal to being a strong Conservative and a supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite. Contemporaneously with his change of faith, came a large addition to the amount he received for the carrying out of this contract. And the hon. gentleman will find, when the papers are brought down, that only three or four days were given to all the parties in Cape Breton to tender for carrying the mails on this route, and that the only other man who tendered was bought out. For all practical purposes, it may be said that no opportunity was given to any person except Mr. Morrison to secure the contract. It will be found, also, that this gentleman, when he went into provincial politics, found it convenient to get the Government to transfer the contract to his son, who was not then living at home, and he carried on the work, notwithstanding. The coach used to carry the mails and passengers and to have three or four horses, but, for three or four years past these mails have been carried by a single horse. And so bad was the whole transaction, that the post office inspector of Nova Scotia, previous to the incoming of the present Postmaster General, reported in favour of calling for new tenders. The inspector, Mr. McDonald, is a strong Conservative, and was an official under the late Government, but he is a fair man. It is a very strange thing that, when the inspector reported that the contract should be cancelled and new tenders called for, the late Government did not take action. If that kind of thing is to go on, then I mistake the temper of this Government and of this Parliament. It is very well to say that the contract cannot be carried out for less than the sum now paid. It can. Responsible parties say it can be done for less, and actually offer to do it for less. Is it well to pay $9,000 for a mail route that previous to the building of the Intercolonial Railway cost only $5,000 or $6,000? I speak from memory, and am not sure of the figure, but, at any rate, the amount was much less than the $9,000 now paid. And it must be remembered that almost all the mails that go to Sydney are carried on the Intercolonial. Another reason why this contract should be cancelled is that it covers the whole roof. Anybody who knows anything about Cape Breton, knows that to carry the mails on the railway to Sydney and bring them out from Sydney towards Loch Lomond would not only be much cheaper, but also much better, because the parties on the eastern end of the route along which Mr. Morrison goes, would receive their mail earlier. Moreover, everybody knows that, when you break up a mail route into shorter portion than this, you get the work done more cheaply, because then the man doing each part of the work can stay at his own home, thus saving expense.

Mr. GILLIES. You want a one-horse arrangement.

Mr. FRASER. That is what you have now: but, following the other plan, you would have three or four horses, according to the number of portions into which the route was divided. It is better to have a distance of 100 miles traversed by four stages than to have one poor laggard horse crawling over the route. Such waste as this is a direct injury to the public service. I know many places in my own county, and all over Nova Scotia, where little post offices are wanted. In one place they have a school and there are a hundred people living there, and they have to travel six miles, over a very poor road, to get their letters. Would it not be much better to have a small post office there, and, if no better arrangement could be made, to have a man carry the mail? I do not know the parties who have offered to carry out this contract for $2,700, but I have it from responsible men that a contractor can be got to do it for $3,000 at the outside. It seems to me the Postmaster General takes the right way to find out the truth. By cancelling the contract and calling for new tenders under such circumstances as will give all who desire to do so, an opportunity to compete, he will ascertain what the work can be done for. The hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Gillies) rises and says there must be some explanation, and tells the Postmaster General that he knows so much more about it than the hon. Minister does. But the fact remains that the post office inspector for Nova Scotia, whom everybody knows not to have Liberal leanings—except, I am bound to say, that he will do what is fair—reports that it can be done for $3,000. I ask hon. gentlemen is it not plain that the Minister is doing right? If it is found that the work cannot be done for less than $9,000, it will be well enough to continue the present arrangement. I have no feeling in the matter whatever. Papers on the subject were sent to me, and I brought the matter before the House.

Mr. FOSTER. This discussion strikes me as being a little unfair to the House. The Postmaster General has access to certain official papers, he has gone over those papers, he has had the report, as he says of his deputy, and he has taken action upon that. Now, he comes down to the House and pitches into a member on this side, and into the Opposition generally, for what he denominates fraudulent practices in connection with the carrying on of post office contracts under the late Administration. He has the advantage, himself, of having studied the official papers, of having had the report of his deputy; and probably the hon. gentlemen sitting behind him may also have had the advantage of access to those papers. He brings this matter into the House, and tries to influence the House by this attack, and by his quotations from those papers and his decision upon it, and he has not had the courtesy to lay those papers on the Table of the House. Now, I submit that that is not fair to the House. My hon. friend has no right to refer to official papers unless those papers are where other members of the House can see them; and I ask my hon. friend now if he will lay those papers on the Table of the House while this discussion is going on.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I was not aware that the hon. member for London (Mr. Beattie) proposed to open up a line of argument of this kind, and it is by the merest accident that I rose to my feet to reply to the assertion made by the late Postmaster General. He began by alluding to his practice in the Militia Department, and happening to know that the practice he referred to had not been his practice, I ventured to take part in the discussion, and I was called to order by the hon. gentleman when I had asserted that public moneys had been squandered. Having been challenged for it, I then, for the first time, thought of the illustration to make good my statement. Therefore, I claim that it was from no lack of courtesy, but simply because of the unexpected manner in which the point came up, and I was not prepared with documentary evidence. I will take steps at an early moment to produce all I have in the department in the way of evidence on this subject.

Mr. FOSTER. I think it is not quite—

Mr. SPEAKER. Is this on a point of order?

Mr. FOSTER. It is.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think it is quite clear that when a Minister refers to public documents which are in his department, he should, at the request of any hon. member, lay them before the House on the first convenient opportunity. I do not suppose the Minister carries them about in his pocket. I would also say to the House that I have not interfered in this discussion because I did not wish in the slightest degree to limit the undoubted rights that every member of the House has to speak upon almost any public question, on the House going into Supply. But I would point out the great inconvenience to hon. members on both sides, of discussing a question when the papers and documents relating to it are not before the House. A great deal of time is wasted, statements are made over and over again; and all I can do is to ask hon. members, when they exercise their privilege of discussing a public question on a motion to go into Supply, to remember these things. I would also suggest to the hon. member from London (Mr. Beattie), who opened this discussion, that it would probably be better, if possible, to notify a Minister of his intention to bring up such a question in order to avoid confusion, and in order to attain finality in the matter—although I admit he has a right to raise this question on Supply. But there are matters of this kind which have to be left to the discretion of hon. gentlemen.

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot find fault with the course you have taken, but it seems to me that an even view of events would have led you to ask the Postmaster General to be kind enough to put the papers before the House when he makes the charge.

Mr. McMULLEN. I rise to a point of order. I wish to know if the hon. gentleman has a right to speak a second time.

Mr. SPEAKER. I understood the hon. gentleman was raising a point of order.

Mr. FOSTER. I have not spoken yet; I am speaking on the subject of the papers.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman from York has not yet spoken upon this subject.

Mr. FOSTER. I asked a question across the floor of the House once, but I have not spoken. All I was doing was to point out how utterly lacking in courtesy it was on the part of the Postmaster General to make the attack without bringing down the papers; but I am not disposed to press that unless the Minister of Militia presses it in the case of my hon. friend from London (Mr. Beattie). But that is not the chief point. I wish to point out how utterly lacking in constitutional rule and what is fair in debate, it is for a Minister of the Crown to come straight from his office, where he has had important papers which, as he says, will constitute a case of fraud on the part of the late Administration, and when that subject-matter is not under discussion at all, but an entirely different matter, to take the pith and substance of those papers, and his decision, and upon them to launch an accusation of fraud and wrong-doing against hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and against my hon. friend behind me who has just spoken. We cannot well discuss matters under conditions of that kind, and I have never yet seen that done in the House. My hon. friend must see, when he comes to think of it, that it was not fair to the House for him to have made that charge. The point of propriety which I intended to elaborate, Mr. Speaker himself has stated already. All I need to do is to show what is laid down by Bourinot on that matter :

It has been laid down by the highest authorities that when a Minister of the Crown quotes a public document in the House, and founds upon it an argument or assertion, that document, if called for, ought to be produced.

Mr. Speaker points out that it would be extremely inconvenient for an hon. Minister to carry the archives of his department in his pocket ; but when my hon. friend came primed with a charge to make against this side of the House, he should have the papers with him, and should have put them on the Table.

But it is allowable to repeat to the House information which is contained in a private communication

That, however, was not a private communication :

When such private papers are quoted in the House there is no rule requiring them to be laid on the Table. The rule respecting the production of public papers, quoted by a Minister of the Crown, is necessary to give the House the same information he possesses, and enable it to come to a correct conclusion on a question.

Now, going from that, I want to say just one word with reference to the string of assertions that were made by the hon. gentleman who represents the county of King's (Mr. Domville). The only and sufficient answer to that, I am going to put in the form of a request to the Minister of Militia and Defence that he will bring down all the papers connected with that lease, and lay them on the Table of the House, as I am sure he will do without my making a formal motion. Those papers, when they are perused, will enlighten hon. gentlemen as to whether the member for King's was right in his assertion that the only consideration for the leasing of that $7,000 lot in the military grounds at Sussex, was $25 per year, and whether the lease was for seven years. As those papers are not down, I do not propose to go any further into that subject, except merely to say that I think when the papers are down, and the circumstances are laid before the House, the House will see one of two things, either that the hon. member for King's is very unfortunate in the accuracy with which he gets together his information, or is very unfortunate in his method of expressing what he thinks.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I was very fortunate in getting King's County.

Mr. LISTER. I think this an opportune time to call the attention of the Postmaster General to the condition of facts of which he may or may not be aware, as to the letting of contracts for the carrying of mails. Speaking for my own county, I can say that every mail carrier in that county is a supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite. I desire to call the attention of the Postmaster General to the way in which the late Government have let the contracts for carrying the mail, at all events in that county, I do not know what the system may be in other counties throughout the Dominion. Contracts are let without advertisements. A form of notice calling for tenders is sent to the postmaster of the particular place, and the public at large know nothing about it. The notice is posted up in the post office, and my information is that upon some occasions it has not been there more than a few minutes, or possibly one hour, when it has disappeared. The result of that practice has been that friends of the local postmasters through the country have received the carrying of mails, while practically no tenders have been invited. I desire to point out to the Postmaster General that even in a matter of small contracts it would pay the Government to give public notice through the press, so that every person may receive notice, when tenders are called for any particular service.

Mr. FOSTER.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The law requires it.

Mr. LISTER. Then, the law is not carried out. The only way the law is attempted to be carried out is by sending notice to local postmasters and the posting of such notices in the post offices, where few people, as a rule, see them. People have written to me over and over again to ascertain when certain contracts would expire, because they had learned that such contracts had been awarded without tender. I hope, in the interests of the public service, the Postmaster General will take this matter into consideration, and, if he does so, no doubt justice will be done to people who desire to perform these services, and at the same time a very large sum in the aggregate will be saved to the people of this country.

Mr. McNEILL. This discussion arose, I think, by reason of some remarks that fell from the hon. member for London (Mr. Beattie), and the question that was before the House and was being discussed, was whether or not the present Government were pursuing a certain line of policy. That line of policy, it was thought by hon. members on this side of the House, would be a very improper line of policy to pursue. We are met by the Postmaster General with the statement: "You're another." I think that the country will expect some different answer from that. I believe, if it be the case that the Government which has been lately defeated at the polls, has been guilty of improper conduct, the people will consider that to be no excuse for the pursuing of a similar policy by hon. gentlemen who have just got into their places. So far as I am concerned, I wish to say this, that I opposed my own party when I considered they were wrong, and I am certainly not going to support hon. gentlemen opposite when I think they are wrong. I am here to give hon. gentlemen opposite no obstruction and no factious opposition. I am here, on the other hand, to give a fair and honourable support to measures which they introduce and which I believe to be good measures. I am here, as I have said before, to support principles and not men. I am a Conservative, and I naturally expect the principles which will be advocated from this side of the House will commend themselves to my approval rather than principles that will emanate from the other side of the House; but when hon. gentlemen opposite pursue a course of policy which they cannot defend otherwise than by saying that their opponents have done something equally bad, that, to my mind, will be no defence of the policy they are pursuing. That is the only defence which has been set up here to-day. I understood from the Postmaster General that the case he referred to was a case of renewal of contract. The statement made by the hon. member who has personal knowledge (Mr. Gillies) shows that it was not a renewal of contract, and the statement of the Minister falls to the ground. I do not wish to discuss that question, because I do not think it is right to discuss it, and the hon. gentleman probably had no desire to be unfair and was betrayed into introducing this subject into the debate, but if he was not betrayed into doing so and did it deliberately, it was a very unfair thing to do, because, as the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) stated, it was altogether unconstitutional, and in the face of it, it is impossible to conduct discussion fairly upon subjects such as the hon. gentleman has introduced, unless the papers are on the Table.

An hon. MEMBER. Louder.

Mr. McNEILL. An hon. gentleman calls "Louder." I do not occupy a great deal of the time of the committee. That hon. gentleman is not likely to save time by rudely interrupting an hon. member who is honestly, and fairly, and in a spirit of kindness discussing questions across the floor, as I am trying to do at this moment. But, if the hon. gentleman desires that special kind of controversy, he will get lots of it.

An hon. MEMBER. Louder.

Mr. McNEILL. We are not inclined to be dictated to by gentlemen of the calibre of the hon. gentleman who has just interrupted me. He may consider that as evidence of statesmanship—I was going to say of nascent statesmanship, but it has been so long about growing, I am afraid that, if it has not budded before now, it will not develop, and I cannot, therefore, call it nascent statesmanship. It will never grow. Whatever may have been the cause of the interruption, it was not very courteous, and was not that kind of interruption which will assist the hon. gentleman's friends in getting their Estimates through the House more rapidly than would otherwise be the case. I wish to say, once for all, that my desire is to give no factious opposition to hon. gentlemen opposite. My desire, on the other hand, is to give every fair and reasonable support to measures they may introduce which I believe to be for the public welfare, but I will never accept as an excuse for improper conduct on their part the statement that hon. members on this side of the House, when they were in power, did something just as bad.

Mr. QUINN. It seems to me that hon. gentlemen are wandering away from the original subject under discussion. The hon. member for London (Mr. Beattie) very properly, I think, directed the attention of the Minister of Militia to a course pursued, as he said, in the city of London, and which, from some information I have received, is being pursued in other parts of the Dominion where camps are being held. The excuse offered by the hon. member for London was that it might be quite true that such things were being done, but they had been done on former occasions by the Conservative party, when it was in power. The Postmaster General seems to find that a good defence, and he referred to what he called a gross outrage concerning the carrying of mails to some place in Cape Breton. Now, there is one thing that must strike the hon. members of this House in connection with these two explanations, and that is, the prompt action of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) in the "you're another" defence, and the prompt manner in which the Postmaster General points out another injustice that is being done by him, for the purpose of covering up the one which is charged against the Department of Militia. In other words, the Postmaster General does not hesitate to tell this House that having formed an opinion, on ex parte statements made by some individuals unknown to this House, whose names are not brought before this House, on evidence which he does not think fit to bring before this House; having formed an opinion in this way he is prepared to do an act of injustice to a man who has occupied the position of a public contractor for years, and he has offered that as a justification or an excuse for the injustice which is to-day being done in the Militia Department. That seems to me to be not only an illogical, but to be also unfair and unbusiness-like way of dealing with the question which has been brought up by the hon. member for London (Mr. Beattie). The Minister of Militia has said that it is not usual for hon. members to bring up subjects of this kind without first giving notice to the Minister under whose department the matter comes. I did not know as a young member that such a thing was necessary. I thought that an injustice of this kind was a matter with which the people of this country had to deal, and not a Minister in his private office, and I believed that if such an injustice has been done, it was the duty of any hon. member to whose notice such a fact came, to bring it before the House, in order that a public explanation might be given for the benefit of the people of this country.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn) will allow me to interrupt him for a moment. When an hon. gentleman brings an accusation against a member of the Government, he does it, I presume, with the hope that the member of the Government so accused will be able to make a satisfactory explanation. Now, if the member does not give notice beforehand he cannot expect to get as full an explanation—or perhaps not a sufficient explanation at all—as he would if he extended the courtesy to the member of the Government beforehand, of telling him that at a certain time he proposed to bring a certain matter up. That is the reason why it has been customary in this House to inform a member of the Government that some explanation was to be asked with reference to the manner in which matters were being conducted in his department.

Mr. QUINN. My only object in mentioning this was to say, that I do not believe that my hon. friend from London (Mr. Beattie) intended to make a personal charge against the Minister of Militia. But, what he did intend to do, and what I think he had a perfect right to do, was to draw the attention of this House to the fact that contracts had been awarded in the city of London for the supplies for the camps about to meet there; without public tenders being called for. That is not a charge against the Minister of Militia. I do not think that my hon. friend (Mr. Beattie) means that the Minister ever intended such a thing to be done, but I wish to say now, that strict inquiry has been made, not only in London, but in the other camp centres, Kingston and Montreal, for the purpose of discovering—and I think it has been discovered already—if a system could not be adopted in these places for the purpose of giving contracts to the friends of the Government. The question is not: whether this course had been pursued by the Government which was lately defeated. Hon. gentlemen opposite pretend that they have succeeded to power—as one hon. gentleman said the other night—not so much on their own merits, but on account of the irregularities which existed under the late Government. Are these irregularities to be perpetuated by the present Government? Is the same course to be followed by this great Reform party which they denounced when followed by the Conservative party? What was the object of the people of this country in throwing out the Conservative Government and bringing in the Reform party? Was it to leave the giving of public contracts in the condition in which the Reform party alleged they found it at the time they came into office, or was it to give the present Government an opportunity of bringing in these measures of reform which they had been boasting about for so many years? Now, Mr. Speaker, I hope it will be the last time, that when a charge is made from this side of the House, or an inquiry made from any part of the House as to misconduct or supposed misconduct on the part of any officer or any department; I hope it is the last time that we shall hear the answer given from the Government benches: We are doing simply as you did before. The Government should remember that they pose as a reform Government, and that great reforms shall be expected from them by the people; reforms which will ameliorate, or improve at any rate, in some way the administration of such public matters as the giving of contracts by public departments.

Mr. TISDALE. Before the motion carries there is a matter that I feel it my duty to bring to the attention of the House, and I also wish in that connection to ask the Minister of Militia to bring down some papers. I find in the "Globe" newspaper of yesterday the following:—

When the political campaign was at its height and when the late Government was on the outlook for election funds contracts were granted by the departments in the most irregular manner. The Militia Department, for instance, renewed a number of contracts and made others extending from one to three years with parties for militia clothing. Among those who got these contracts were Mr. Shorey, of Montreal; Sanford & Co., Hamilton; Mr. Boisseau, of Toronto, and a Peterborough firm, the manager of which was a Tory candidate in one of the Peterboroughs. The questions as to the legality of these contracts have all been referred to the Minister of Justice and he has decided that the department had no power to grant such contracts. They will, therefore, be annulled. One of the contracts was made to commence July, 1897, a year ahead.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there are two important matters in that statement. One is as to the annulling of important contracts in the Militia Department, and the other is the allegation of corrupt dealing in some manner in the letting of these contracts by the Militia Department. I propose to give a denial to the one part, and then I propose to ask the Minister for the production of some papers, and if he is willing to postpone the discussion until we get these papers, it will, I think, much shorten the discussion of this matter. In regard to the contracts, I wish to say that they were neither let in an irregular manner nor at an irregular time. We asked for tenders in the usual way and the tenders were brought in, and the contracts awarded while my predecessor (Mr. Desjardins) was Minister of Militia. That applies to the contracts given to the gentlemen named in this statement. There were other contracts for supplies, which came into the office and which were awarded by the officers of the department while I was there, but the tenders for which had been called for before I was Minister. The Hon. Mr. Desjardins and the officers of the department had awarded the other contracts, and I signed them. The officers of the department are the same now as they were then, and I think they properly discharge their duties. They have the confirmation of both Administrations at all events. They have been some time in the department and I believe that probably the hon. Minister (Mr. Borden) found them of such a character that he has retained them. I asked my deputy and the other officers who have charge of opening the tenders, the Board of Control, and they told me before I signed the contracts, that they were in proper order and had been awarded to the lowest tenderers in the usual way. Of course I was entirely new to the department and had presided over it but for a short time. Under these assurances, which I believed to be correct, I signed the contract. With regard to the other contracts which were awarded during my time in the department, a list of them was sent to me by my deputy, and he said that the invariable practice of the department was to award them to the lowest tenderers, and he asked me to put my initials in such places as I saw fit in that connection. I did not know the name of a single gentlemen in the contracts which I awarded, and I do not know the politics of any of the gentlemen to whom the contracts went. I simply put my initial upon the lowest tender and returned it to my deputy, who subsequently prepared the contracts. I asked him the same question, if they were in the form that had been usual in the department, and he assured me that they were, and I signed and executed them. These are the whole circumstances. The contracts were awarded at the usual time. I understand, that is at as early a date as possible after the close of the session of Parliament. The reason of that, I believe, is that if the contracts are for one year, the money is on hand, having been voted by Parliament. In this particular case the money had not been voted; but if the contracts had not been made and executed it would have been impossible to get the supply of clothing and other articles which it was necessary for the department to get. I make that explanation, and I do not propose to protest any more about it, because these are the facts. I make this statement in justice to the department, to the party to which I belong, and to myself, and in order to give the proper information to the country. Now, I want to ask the hon. Minister of Militia if it is true that these contracts have been annulled? If they have been, I wish to ask him without any more formality if he will bring down promptly the tenders, the contracts, the opinion of the Minister of Justice, and all other papers or letters connected therewith. If the hon. gentleman will kindly do that at my request, I would suggest that any further discussion of the question be deferred until the papers are here. Then we can take it up and have one discussion on the whole matter. The papers will develop such facts as will put the matter properly before the country.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). With the permission of the House, I will briefly reply to the statement of the hon. gentleman. It has been usual, I think, in the past for Governments to require a regular motion of the House to be carried ordering papers before they have been brought down. I know that our predecessors have been in the habit, very properly I think, of sheltering themselves behind that rule. This is the second or third occasion this session on which I have been asked by my predecessor in office, without motion, to lay papers on the Table of the House. I have complied with his request, and I have no objection in the present case, so far as I can see at this moment, to bringing down all the papers he asks for. I may say, however, that when I came into the Militia Department I found that some large contracts had been let—one for three years from the 1st of July, 1896, and another for two years beginning the 1st of July, 1897—for clothing which was not required, which my officers informed me would not be required until after the 1st day of July, 1897.

Mr. TISDALE. I would call my hon. friend's attention to what I said, because I am sure he does not wish to be unfair. I said that except for denying any charges of corruption, I did not propose to discuss the matter at present, and I ask him to pursue the same course until we have the papers before us. He can see at once that if at this time he makes statements with regard to what led to the action that has been taken by his department—I do not know what that action has been—I might have said something about the contracts. But if the hon. gentleman will oblige me by keeping within the rule, it would save discussion until we see the papers.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The hon. gentleman asks me a certain question. He wants to know if certain contracts have been annulled, and he wants me to say why I have taken the course which I have. I will not delay the House very long; but I think it is only fair for me to state the circumstances which led up to the action that has been taken. I was going on to say that those contracts were let without tenders, having been asked for by public advertisement. Notices were sent to several individuals, who were asked to tender; but the public press never contained any advertisement of these contracts; and at least a dozen leading men in Canada who deal in the same class of goods have called on me since I came into office, and have stated that they never heard of tenders being asked for, and knew nothing about them, although they had been anxious to get an opportunity to tender. When I found the contract for the supply of clothing after the first day of July, 1897, I thought that was an extraordinary condition of things, and I said at once to the officers of my department that I thought that contract ought to be annulled. My deputy advised me not to take any action without first consulting the Department of Justice; and that is what led me to send the contracts and all the papers over to the Department of Justice for their opinion. The Department of Justice have had the matter before them for some weeks, and within a few days they have sent a carefully prepared opinion to the Militia Department stating that that department had no authority whatever to make any of those contracts; and upon the strength of that advice I have proceeded to annul the contract which agreed to supply goods after the 1st of July, 1897. I take this further view with regard to the three-year contract. The opinion of the Department of Justice, which is very clear and distinct, is that the Department of Militia had no power to enter into a contract for three years, or even one year, unless the money was voted, and that, had the money been voted for one year, the contract would be good for that year. Now, although the money was not voted, I am giving the contractors the benefit of the first year. I assume that the money will be voted this year, and we are actually receiving the goods, as they are required, and I propose to accept the contract from 1896 to 1897, subject to the will of Parliament. I shall be very happy to bring down the papers.

Mr. TISDALE. With the consent of the House, I would like to say a few words with regard to this contract. I make no objection whatever to the very proper remark of the hon. Minister. Of course, so far as I am individually concerned, I had no responsibility in the matter, for it had been arranged before I took office. I took office in the heat of the election campaign. All I propose doing at this time is that business men will understand that you can contract for three years at considerably less than for one year, and that is at all events one justification of what was done. And, to avoid the legal difficulty to which my hon. friend has referred, each contract contains the clause that, unless the money is voted, it falls to the ground. As my hon.

Mr. BORDEN (King's).

friend has kindly consented to bring down the papers without further notice, I shall defer any further comment until then.

DISMISSALS FROM THE INTERCOLONIAL AND MARINE AND FISHERIES DEPARTMENT.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Before the House goes into Committee of Supply, I wish to call attention to one or two matters as briefly as possible, so that, when we come to deal with the items to which they relate, there may be no unnecessary delay. On the 28th of August, I called attention to some of the dismissals that had taken place in the county of Pictou on the Intercolonial and also in connection with the Department of Marine and Fisheries. I asked the hon. gentlemen who had charge of these different departments, to kindly take a note of the facts, and have an inquiry made, so that, when the subject was next brought up, they would be in a position to speak with accuracy as to what had been done and what steps, if any, had been taken subsequently. I want particularly, as we are making some progress in Supply now, to call attention to those cases again. I want to call attention to the cases of Roderick McLeod and Roderick McLean, who were working on the Intercolonial and were summarily dismissed and others put in their places. No charge was made against these men, and no reason was given for their dismissal. The other cases had reference to the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and I will mention them, so that the hon. colleagues of the Minister in charge of that department, who is not now in his place, may bring the matter to his notice. I wish now to call the attention of the Minister of Railways—who also, I observe, is not in his place, and whose colleagues, no doubt, will advise him—to certain other dismissals on the Intercolonial, not particularly in the county I have the honour to represent, but mostly in the county of Antigonish. While the men who were dismissed from service might technically be called temporary hands paid from day to day, they were practically permanent employees. I shall give their names, and the years when their employments began:

John G. McDougall.....	1880
R. McLean .....	1882
Hugh McPherson .....	1884
D. A. McDougall.....	1887
James Landry .....	1888
John Morrell ..	1888
D. R. McLean.....	1890

These men held comparatively humble positions on the Intercolonial, but nevertheless are entitled to the same treatment as any other Government officers, high or low. So long as they did their duty faithfully, the same care and caution should be shown in removing them and the same fair treatment given them as to others who hold more important positions. I am informed that these men were removed in this way. I do not make the statement positively at this stage, but merely want to give the hon. gentleman in charge of the department the opportunity of carefully looking into them. The information placed in my hands is to the effect that these men, who were employed on the tracks, and whose services are dispensed with every year from some time in December until April, as not being necessary, were employed on the track in connection with the repairing of bridges and fences and work of that character, and have been employed in that way permanently since the years respectively I have mentioned. They were laid off, as it is termed, for the first time in that season, since their services had been employed, at the end of July, and the only reason for their removal was that there was no work for them to do. That would seem, at first, quite reasonable, but it is extraordinary that every other year, considering the nature of the work, these men were continually employed. What has happened? According to my information, after being laid off for a few weeks, other men were employed in the place of these men, who have done no wrong and who are not offensive partisans, and who are not charged with any offence. It was supposed, and no doubt correctly, that they voted, as they always have done, for the Conservative party, but no charge has been suggested against these men that they were, in any sense, negligent of their duty or even active workers in connection with the political party with which they sympathize. But I am informed that the places of these men have been filled by men who voted Grit at the last election, and who were recommended by the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac). Of course the hon. gentleman will see in "Hansard" just what I have stated. But since he is in his seat I may say that my object in mentioning this matter is that when we reach his department in Supply there may be no delay in finally discussing this subject. The hon. Minister of Railways has given, as far as I know, no evidence of a desire to deal in a harsh way with the employees of the Intercolonial. I believe the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) is responsible for the action—so far as responsibility goes—respecting the bridge men at Pictou, because it happened while he was Minister of Railways that, without reason assigned, these men were turned away and two Liberals put in their places. My point is this—and I hope I do not misunderstand the Minister of Railways' own ideas of what is proper under the circumstances—these men who have served on the Intercolonial, whether engaged by the day or the month or the year, who have served the public for a period long enough to have become practically permanent men, are entitled, no matter whether their position be high or low, to equal treatment all around.

That is to say, these men should not be capriciously discharged; they should not be discharged because they did not vote the Liberal ticket or anything of that kind, but should be recognized as coming under the rule laid down in a previous discussion that there shall be satisfactory evidence that they were offensively partisan before they shall forfeit their positions. In fact, I claim the same treatment for these men as is to be meted out to other officers in the public service; and I do not think that the hon. Minister, when he looks into this matter will desire to make a distinction against these men because they happen to be paid by the day, if they have practically won the position of permanent officers. I would like also to call the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to a case that has been brought to my notice and that may come up at a later stage, so that he may answer any questions with regard to it. I refer to the case of the lightkeeper at Port Medway. I find that the Liverpool "Advance," a paper, as the hon. gentleman knows, in sympathy with the Government is pressing for an investigation into the dismissal of the late lightkeeper, and pressing, practically, for the dismissal of the present keeper. I would like the hon. gentleman to look that up when it is convenient, as the probability is that the question will be asked whether he contemplates taking any action in this case.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's). While this matter is before the House, I will take the opportunity of referring to some dismissals on the Prince Edward Island Railway, which, as I am informed, are of the same nature as those that have been referred to. Section men who have been on the road for years, some, perhaps, temporary hands, and some regular hands, have been dismissed. But whether temporary or regular they have been so engaged on the road now that they have become efficient men. They have large families depending on their earnings, they have no other occupation for the support of their families and nothing is charged against them except that they polled their votes for the Conservative party. They were not men who took an active part in the election in any way or could be called offensive partisans. They merely recorded their votes, and for that they have been dismissed and men not so competent put in their places. Now if this principle is to be followed and people who have given good and faithful service to the country are to be dismissed in this way without any charge being brought against them, the results must be injurious to the public service. One case that has come under my notice is that of a section man at Cardigan, Prince Edward Island, named, I believe, Livingstone. This man Livingstone has a large family and is dependent altogether upon his earnings on the road for their support. And now, without a moment's warning and without any good cause that I can learn, he has been sent about his business. There is another case also, that of Alexander McConnell, at Georgetown, also a section man. Without notice and for no cause except that he polled his vote for the Conservative party, he is dismissed. Wm. McDonald at the same place also has had notice to quit, as well as others I might name. As to this last named man, I am not aware that anybody even knew how he voted, so little part did he take in the elections. And yet, on the supposition that he did vote for the Conservative party and for no other reason that I can learn, he has been dismissed and another man put in his place. If this principle is to be acted upon in every case and dismissals made in this way, I fear that some day it will lead to reprisals of the same kind, a thing which is much to be deplored in the public interest. I could also refer to other cases of men in other portions of the Prince Edward Island Railway, who have been dismissed in the same manner as those I have mentioned. But I do not wish to take up the time of the House, and merely refer to the matter now because it has been brought before the House. I understand that notices have been sent to other officers in other departments of the public service asking them if they had taken part in the late elections and, I suppose, calling in question their right to do so. I think that it is nothing but right that, if it is charged against an officer that he has taken an offensive part in elections, he should have an opportunity of explaining whether he did or not, instead of being summarily sent about his business as in the case I have mentioned.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words. I do not see the Minister of Agriculture in his place so I suppose it is not likely that the Estimates for his department will be taken up to-night. But there is a matter upon which I think the Government ought to be prepared to give us very full information when we come to these estimates. Some little time ago, when the Minister of Agriculture, after full consultation with the officers of my department and upon their report, I decided to re-organize the veterinary service of the Dominion. In agreement with the report, a number of gentlemen were appointed in the various counties of Canada to act as the local officers of the department for the purpose of protecting our flocks and herds from disease. I understand, though my information is not definite or positive on that point, that these appointments have been annulled. My information is only definite with reference to a few. I have concluded that it cannot possibly be for the reason that these gentlemen took a prominent and offensive part in the election, that they have been notified that their services will not be required. Some of the gentlemen to whom

Mr. MACDONALD (King's).

I refer were warm and ardent supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite ; so I conclude that the Government, on the representation of the present Minister of Agriculture, had decided to change the policy in connection with veterinary surgeons. If so, I think, before we pass a vote for quarantine, the Government ought to be prepared to give us the fullest information with regard to their decision on this question.

Mr. DAVIN. In regard to the matter brought up by my hon. friend, I may say that just before coming down to my parliamentary duties a rancher out north of Regina came in and told me that his herds were all tainted by some disease that he did not understand, that he had been to Mr. Creamer, who had been one of the men appointed by the Agriculture Department to look into these matters, and that Mr. Creamer told him that his position had been cancelled. I at once telegraphed the Minister of Agriculture, who did take some action in regard to my telegram, but whether successful, I do not know. I think he got a veterinary from the Mounted Police to attend to it. But I would say that I do not think that in that vast territory you can depend safely upon a veterinary surgeon from the Mounted Police to attend to all the cases that may arise in regard to our herds in the North-west Territories. The matter brought up by my hon. friend from Haldimand is a very important one to us in the Territories.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Salary of the Deputy Speaker..... $2,000

Mr. FOSTER. I think we ought to have some explanation in reference to this matter from the leader of the Government. If I remember rightly, when some years ago it was proposed by the then Government to appoint a Deputy Speaker, there was a very decided expression of opinion by the then Opposition, at the present time the Government, with reference to the necessity for such an office, it being held, I think, by the great majority of the party that such an officer was not necessary, that the expenditure was a useless one, and that it was not advisable to load up the taxpayers with a salary of $2,000 a year when we could go on as formerly, and when an hon. gentleman from either side of the House could temporarily take the Chair or preside over committees. Is this an instance of the conviction that comes after a change from one side of the House to the other? Is it the policy of my hon. friend now to hark back upon the assertions and the strong arguments of a few years ago? It seems that now they are convinced that our way was the better way?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I have no hesitation in giving to my hon. friend a very frank answer, all the more frank and sincere because he never heard me utter a word in any place or at any time against the office of Deputy Speaker. There has been, I know, in the ranks of our party, and perhaps also in the ranks of the Opposition, some differences of opinion as to the advisability of appointing a Deputy Speaker. The hon. gentleman having appealed to me, I will give him the views which I always entertained. I never said a word in my life against the appointment of a Deputy Speaker. On the contrary, being a strong admirer of the British constitution in every particular, I thought it was always well to keep as close to it as we could; and as the bulk of business in a country like ours is fast increasing, the conclusion, I suppose, has been come to that although at one time the office of Deputy Speaker was not thought to be necessary, at the present time, in view of the increasing business, and of the example of the mother country, we are justified in trying the experiment, or rather continuing it for some time to come.

Mr. FOSTER. I am glad my hon. friend has expressed so frankly his individual opinion. I imagine that as leader of the Government, he has brought those recalcitrant members who were so outspoken against this appointment into a proper state of discipline. I congratulate him on coming to this conclusion, as I think it is a wise one. I was rather sorry, however, to hear that one of the grounds upon which he proposed to carry out the policy was the increase of business. That may not only mean in the duties of a Deputy Speaker, I suppose, but it may also mean an increase in the Estimates from year to year.

The PRIME MINISTER. I must tell my hon. friend that I am too modest a man altogether to accept the compliment which he has paid me of having brought recalcitrant members to my way of thinking. We have seen so illustrious an example of that kind of influence before, that I do not think I can accept his congratulations at all.

House of Commons—Salaries..... $72,012 50

Mr. SPEAKER. The increase of $600 is made up in this way: There are thirteen statutory increases of $50 each, $650; a decrease of $50 on account of the retirement of the assistant law clerk, and his successor's salary being $50 less, making a net increase of $600.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Does this include the messengers' salaries?

Mr. SPEAKER. No, the higher offices.

Mr. FOSTER. In this set of officers coming under this estimate, have there been any dismissals since Mr. Speaker has taken his place?

Mr. SPEAKER. No, there have been no changes or dismissals.

Expenses of Committees, Sessional and extra Clerks, &c..... $13,600

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would like to ask what officers have been dismissed who are paid under this item, door-keepers and messengers, for instance?

Mr. FOSTER. To make the question inclusive, as we are now upon the vote for expenses of committees and for sessional and extra clerks, I wish also to ask for information. The committee would like to have a statement from the Speaker as to any dismissals of sessional clerks or extra clerks that have been made and the reasons for those dismissals, and also whether or not the places which have been made vacant have been filled, and whether it is proposed to fill them.

Mr. SPEAKER. On entering upon my present position I found there 25 sessional clerks and five sessional translators. The report of the Committee on Internal Economy adopted by the House, I think, in 1884, and approved by hon. members on both sides of the House, fixed the number of sessional clerks. Before that time, I believe the number had been very largely exceeded, and it was considered by a special commission which looked into the matter that it was a scandal that so many sessional writers were appointed. It was thereupon decided to reduce the number of sessional clerks to 25, and of sessional translators to five, or a total of 30. It was also practically decided to place these men on the permanent staff. That was the position when I was elected Speaker. I felt this, that the officers of this House ought to keep out of politics if they wished to retain their positions, and of those men to whom I referred there were four who frankly admitted to the Clerk of the House, who shared the responsibility with the Speaker in this matter, that they had actively engaged in politics.

Mr. FOSTER. Four of which class?

Mr. SPEAKER. Sessional clerks.

Mr. FOSTER. Four of the 25?

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes, of the 25. Those men were not re-engaged. One gentleman did not admit to the Clerk that he had actively engaged in politics; but complaints were laid before me against him, and I investigated the complaints, and then he admitted to me that he had been actively engaged in politics during the late Dominion elections. I suggested to the Clerk that he should be dismissed, and he was dismissed.

Mr. FOSTER. Will Mr. Speaker give the names of those clerks?

Mr. SPEAKER. The name of this clerk whose case I have investigated was Béchard.

His place has been filled by a gentleman of the name of Cloutier.

Mr. FOSTER. And there are four others ?

Mr. SPEAKER. They were Chagnon, Desrosiers—who were from Quebec—while Aubé was from Ontario—Béchar, from the county of Kent, Ont., who is replaced by another French gentleman ; and then there was Letson.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Who did not admit his offence guilt ?

Mr. SPEAKER. Mr. Letson did, but Mr. Béchar did not admit the offence to the Clerk, and I investigated his case, and he admitted to me that he had taken an active part on the stump. I considered that was sufficient to disqualify him from being a servant of the members of the House, who politically, certainly, differ.

Mr. MILLS. Of course the new men are not active politicians.

Mr. SPEAKER. If it is brought to my attention that they are active politicians they certainly will be dismissed. I desire also to state that there are at least three other clerks against whom complaints have been made to me, but so far I have not been able to satisfy myself that the evidence is sufficient to dismiss them. If it is so, I shall dismiss them ; if not, I shall not. That is the position in respect to the sessional clerks.

Mr. FOSTER. If Mr. Speaker would not think it too much trouble I should like him to give an answer to two questions. One is, for what length of time are the sessional clerks paid ? Another is, are they supposed to be here twelve months in the year, or are their duties confined to the time when the House is in session ?

Mr. SPEAKER. They are paid by the session, at so much per day.

Mr. FOSTER. And after the session they go to their homes.

Mr. SPEAKER. I assume, however, that they have the character of permanent clerks, who have a right to come back here if they do not misbehave themselves.

Mr. FOSTER. The course of proceeding may be all perfectly right, but undoubtedly it is a sort of Star Chamber proceeding. Those poor fellows were hauled up either by letter or personally before a high court judge of the Star Chamber and put through their facings, and when the evidence submitted appeared to be sufficient to justify the Speaker in dismissing them, the order was given : "Off with their heads." They are after all officers of the House, and it seems to me that so far as those men are concerned the House has a right to know what was the charge brought against each of them and the evidence on which they were severally dismissed. It certainly was not on the ground of malfeasance of office. I want to make that point plain before the House. Those men are simply paid for attending on members of the House while the House is in session, it may be two, three or four months, and they have the rest of the year for themselves. They can engage in printing, in carpenter's work, in digging potatoes, in writing for magazines, in working on newspapers or in any other pursuit. I do not see what the Speaker of the House has to do as to what those men outside the session follow as their profession or do as their daily work, provided they do not make themselves objectionable on the point of morals or something of that kind, which would make it inadvisable for them to be employed in the service. Does the Speaker, and in fact do members of this House mean to subscribe to the principle that because they employ a man and pay him by the day for a period of, say, three months in the year, and the clerk maintains his character and reputation but takes it into his head to espouse the cause of any political party, he has not a perfect right to do so ? He may, however, in the course of his peripatations have even said something particularly offensive to a member of this House, and that hon. member might object to being waited on by a man who had personally offended him. That would have great weight with me in deciding the matter. But nothing of that kind occurred, for they have simply done what every citizen of this country has a right to do without being fined for it, that is exercised the right of franchise, and given a free expression of their opinion so long as they do it in decorum and as gentlemen should. But, to say that this House, and Mr. Speaker, are to hold Star Chamber inquiries over men of this kind, and deprive them of the rights of citizenship, is something that I will never subscribe to. I do not believe that the doctrine is right, and I think it is a small thing for this House, and for the Speaker of this House to be engaged in. If they have said anything offensive, if they have done anything against the laws of the country or offended against good morals, then dismiss them. But, when they are not employed in this House, if they chose to support their political party and to do so in an inoffensive and gentlemanly way, in the name of goodness what fault ought we find with them ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Has my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) always acted on that ?

Mr. FOSTER. Your hon. friend has always acted on that, and I hope always will. My hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) may smile an incredulous smile if he pleases, but I am on record before the country so far as that is concerned, and I propose to act on that principle in the future as I have acted upon it in the past. We believe that according to

Mr. Speaker's view he has done exactly what is right, but after all it is only the opinion of one member of this House, dealing with officials who are the servants of the whole of this House, and is it not right that we should have a statement as to what these men were charged with, and the evidence upon which they have been beheaded. That at least ought to be placed before this committee so as to satisfy us that a proper course was taken in their discharge.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to ask, whether in the case of the officer who did not admit himself to be in fault, there was any formal inquiry, or how was it conducted?

Mr. SPEAKER. There was no such officer.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I understood the hon. the Speaker to say, that in one case he inquired into, the officer had not admitted his guilt.

Mr. SPEAKER. The officer did not admit it to the Clerk, and when I inquired into it he admitted it to me.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In that case was there any records of the inquiry, or was it merely a conversation?

Mr. SPEAKER. It was a conversation. I sent for him a number of times.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will the hon. Speaker say what the charge was, and what the admission was?

Mr. SPEAKER. I will presently. I think I should explain what I consider to be the position of the sessional clerks. From what I could ascertain from inquiries I have made, we have to go back to the year 1878, the last year of the Liberal Administration. A very large number of sessional clerks were appointed, as I understand, then. When the Liberal Administration was defeated and the Conservative Government came into power in 1879, a still larger number of sessional clerks were appointed; the old ones were turned out and a new set were put in. That was the practice at any rate in these matters. They were considered as simply put there temporarily according to the terms of their employment, and there was no permanence whatever in the matter.

An hon. MEMBER. They were turned out for political reasons.

Mr. SPEAKER. They were turned out without any cause whatever. The cause was the change of Ministry. I understand from the debates of the House that Speaker Blanchet complained bitterly to the House, that he had been overridden and overruled, and was forced to appoint nearly one hundred officials of that kind. The officers of the House tell me that there was no place to put them, and some of them were put down in the vaults. That became such a scandal, Speaker Blanchet felt it to be a scandal, and the members of Sir John Macdonald's Government, I believe, felt it to be a scandal, that they wanted to have that system stopped. They appointed a special commission consisting of the Clerk of the House—

Mr. FOSTER. When?

Mr. SPEAKER. About 1882 or 1883. That special commission consisted of the Clerk of the House, Mr. Courtney, and the late Deputy Minister of Railways (Mr. Trudeau). They considered the evidence, reported it to the Committee on Internal Economy, and reported in favour of reducing the number to 25, and five translators. Although they said nothing in their report about these being put on a permanent footing, still, the observations of Mr. Blake and others in the House, and the statement made by the Clerk of the House, led me to feel that it was clearly and distinctly understood from that time forward, that they were to be put on a permanent basis as officers of a department. There has been no change of Government from that time until the present, and the thing went on, vacancies were filled in the ordinary manner when they occurred, and all of them I have no doubt were filled by persons appointed for political reasons. The position I had to face was this, and if I am wrong the House will probably censure me, and if I am right the House will, I suppose, sustain me. I was glad indeed to be able to treat these officers as a permanent staff, because I felt that their permanent position would promote the efficiency of the service of this House, and promote a sense of responsibility amongst them. I thought, and I think now, that if any of these gentlemen, the servants of both sides of this House, had chosen to take upon themselves the responsibility of active interference in an election, in favour of one side or the other—

Mr. FOSTER. In favour of one side or the other?

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes, in favour of one side or the other, they would be unfit to be the servants of the House, and unfit to be trusted by us all as we have to trust them. I have taken that view. The position to which the House has done me the honour of electing me places me in a sort of judicial capacity, and I hope I will always be found to occupy that position worthily. So in this matter I felt that my view of the case was the correct one. I have been greatly assisted in coming to that conclusion by the views of the Clerk of the House, who is the head of this department—the Speaker, of course, has to approve of appointments or dismissals, but the Clerk really makes them, nominally at least. My view of the situation coincided absolutely with his. I believe that his opinion is the right one, although perhaps some hon. members have probably thought I was not taking the right view. At any rate, I have resisted all pressure that might have been brought upon me to take any other view of the case. Four of these gentlemen admitted to the Clerk that they had taken an active part in politics.

Mr. FOSTER. What had they done ?

Mr. SPEAKER. They admitted to him, and they withdrew from the position. He reported to me so. There was one gentleman who did not admit that to him, namely, Mr. Bechard, of Chatham. I received complaints that he was very actively engaged in politics. He denied in a general way that he had engaged actively at the last election in the county of Kent, Ont. Then I further inquired and I got some particulars. I got a statement that he had made a strong speech on the school question at a political meeting in that county.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Did you get the speech ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, sit down.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have a right to ask that question, and I shall ask it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Hon. gentlemen opposite may seek to interrupt me, but I have a right to ask the question, and I will have something to say on the matter.

Mr. SPEAKER. I wish to answer the hon. gentleman's questions. I got the substance of the speech in a general way, and I found it to be a strong political speech on the school question. I sent for the gentleman himself, and he admitted to me that he had made that speech at that public meeting against the member who now sits for that county, I thought, whether rightly or wrongly, that that was a sufficient ground for his ceasing to act as a sessional writer for this House ; and, while I have the honour to have the responsibility of dealing with these matters, subject to the direction of the House, that is the stand I propose to take.

It being Six o'clock: the committee rose, and the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

SECOND READINGS.

Mr. SPEAKER.

Bill (No. 22) to amend the Act incorporating the Eastern Trust Company.—(Mr. Borden, Halifax.)

Bill (No. 24) to incorporate the Hudson's Bay Canal and Navigation Company.—(Mr. Boyd.)

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Expenses of Committees, Sessional and extra Clerks ..... $13,600

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I listened very attentively to the remarks of the hon. the Speaker, and I think some hon. members of the committee did not altogether appreciate either the position of the Speaker or the rights of the committee in regard to the item now under consideration. My interruption was not received with favour by hon. gentlemen behind the Speaker, though I am quite sure the Speaker himself saw the force of it, though he may not have concurred in the point which occurred to my mind, and which I proposed to submit for the consideration of the committee. In the first place, I agree with the hon. the Speaker in much of what he said touching the previous discussions and the position which sessional clerks should hold ; and, in order to prevent a deterioration of the staff, there seems to be, as he put it, a consensus of opinion in previous sessions that this office should be regarded as a permanent office ; so that, in that sense, the office was made more important. The permanency of the office seems to me to give those officers who may have incurred the displeasure of the powers that be, perhaps a clearer right to careful inquiry and due consideration before that permanency is destroyed. I did not think, and I do not now think, that the idea the Speaker suggested in regard to the manner in which these charges should be considered, was a very wise one. The hon. the Speaker, for instance, constituted himself a court of inquiry ; and, without any record, and rather hastily, as it seemed to me, proceeded to decapitate all those officers who did not willingly and without a murmur go to the block and submit their heads, and, when the hon. the Speaker mentioned, as a strong feature of the case, that one of these officers, the officer whom he tried, had made a strong speech, I ventured to ask the hon. gentleman, as was my right, whether he had read the speech. The very object of my question was apparent after what I had said. I wanted to ascertain, in order to have the subject more fully considered and discussed, how much care had been taken by the hon. the Speaker in this cursory investigation, or this very summary proceeding ; and, as far as I understood the hon. the Speaker, he had not read, or did not say he had taken the trouble to read, the speech ;

but, from the substance of it, which had been communicated to him, he was able to say that it was a strong speech. I think the rule laid down by the Speaker is hardly in line with the opinions expressed this session in regard to what should constitute an offence by a public servant during the elections. The hon. the Speaker intimated that the charge in this case was that this officer had been actively engaged in the last election. If the hon. gentleman correctly expressed himself, it seems to me that is going a great deal further than the majority of Ministers ever claimed to be their right and duty to go, in dealing with officers in the various departments. The position, however, of these officers, it seems to me, is a much stronger one, so far as their electoral rights are concerned, than that of officers in the service proper. What is their position? Outside that feature of it regarding permanency, namely, their right to come to this House every session without fresh appointment, it is clear that their services are required by the country for only a short time during the year, and during the remainder of the year they are their own masters in every sense of the word. During that time they are not servants of this House, not in the pay of the country, but are free men, with rights as complete as any man in the country with regard to electoral matters. If I were to sum up my view as to how far these officers of the House are under control after their sessional duties are over, I would say that the only length to which we could fairly go would be to see that in their intercourse with public men, in their conduct generally, they should conduct themselves as decent, respectable citizens. To say that they cannot make strong speeches and express their views as lustily and as often as they please, seems to me to be laying down an extraordinary position with regard to officers in that position, at a time when they are not the servants of this House in any particular. I trust therefore that the idea which Mr. Speaker seems to entertain with regard to his duty, as representing the House, towards these officers, will not be supported by hon. gentlemen on either side. It would be interesting if the committee were informed as to how much truth there is in the statement that most of these men were first condemned and tried afterwards. I am told that this particular officer was summoned into the presence of the Speaker after it had been intimated to him that his position was gone.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman's information is entirely incorrect.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am very glad indeed that it is, and I accept your statement, Mr. Speaker. The statement I made came to me at third-hand that, after the official intimation had been received by this officer, his conversation with Mr. Speaker took place. Now we have not the speech, we have not even the subject of the speech that was considered so improper for an officer of this House to make, when not engaged in his official duties and practically not under pay. Perhaps if the rule laid down by Mr. Speaker is to be adopted, namely, that such an officer has no right to be actively engaged in an election, Mr. Speaker may consider it unnecessary to read the speech, because the very fact of making it was proof of activity during the election. I, for one, dissent as strongly as possible from that rule. It is a cruel rule, suggested in this House for the first time. I cannot find a single case where an officer of this House, since 1867, has been discharged because, when Parliament was not sitting, he took an active part in politics. Certainly the reference of Mr. Speaker to the course followed in 1879 and after that will not help, because a careful examination of the debate shows clearly that the justification then given for the dismissal of certain officials was, rightly or wrongly, on another ground, and that was their incapacity. I cannot remember a case where there was a charge made that an officer had been actively engaged in an election.

Mr. McMULLEN. I can give one, and that is the case of the two translators of "Hansard," who were charged with having taken an active part in an election; and were dismissed at the instance of Lieutenant Governor Chapleau.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I remember that case, and it is one that would not in the slightest degree make me change my views. The charge in that case was not that these gentlemen had been actively engaged in political warfare, but that they had been most grossly abusive and offensive to a Minister of the Crown during an election, and I am not defending extraordinary conduct of that kind. I was careful to qualify the rule that I ventured to suggest to the committee, by keeping such a case in view. That is not the charge in this instance. The charge which came to the knowledge of Mr. Speaker, and with which he dealt, was that of activity in the last general election and making a strong speech on the school question. I trust we will not make a rule of that character, which will render reprisals difficult to avoid in the future. The sense of the country is against anything of the kind. I therefore object to the principle laid down by Mr. Speaker, and I venture to protest strongly against that system of examination and inquiry. An officer holding a position regarded as permanent, who comes to his duty session after session, is certainly entitled to have, and the House is entitled to have, in the case of an investigation that would warrant his dismissal, a very clear and concise record of the offence, so that the judgment which Mr. Speaker exercised, in the first instance, should be more carefully and accurately reviewed by this committee. The right to review no one can question.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). There is a misapprehension about the civil service of Canada in this whole discussion. It would be well for us to understand the different position that exists in Great Britain. Up to the year 1864, no official in Great Britain was permitted to vote, and the reason was that up to that time, the officials were appointed simply as in Canada for political purposes. In 1864 a commission issued, and then, for the first time, the civil service of Great Britain was put upon the footing on which it now is, namely, that there are no appointments made by the government to any service except after a rigid examination, and the appointments are given to the candidates who have the highest points. After that rule was adopted, there was no reason why these civil servants should not be permitted to vote. So far as certain officials in Canada are concerned, that would be a wise rule. If we had the rule that exists in Great Britain of appointing no one to the public service unless he passed the examination, our civil servants ought to have the right to vote. But such a thing in Great Britain as a member of the civil service, or any man holding a position under government, going to a public meeting and making political speeches is unheard of.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I was not referring to the civil service proper.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I know that, but I was only showing the different positions in England and Canada. If the same rule applied in Canada as in Great Britain, I should strongly support the position that our civil servants should all have a vote, but I would then draw the line, as it is drawn in Great Britain, at their appearing on the platform and taking an active part in elections. I would do it, in the first place, in the interests of the civil service. We want that men appointed in this country to do the business of the country shall have the respect of the community. And the moment a man becomes a partisan he loses to a great extent the respect of the community—

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I beg you pardon. He loses the general respect which is necessary to enable him to carry on the business of his office to the best advantage. Suppose that an office-holder is a Liberal, and that he takes an active part in the elections. Will he be regarded by the Conservative electors with the same respect as would be the case if he confined himself to his duties? There must be a feeling on the part of every Conservative that this official is paid by Liberals as well as by other members of the community. In the second place, this is a thing that ought not to be permitted, for this reason: an official goes on the platform; there is no shorthand writer to take down what he says, and consequently you can never get an accurate statement of what he says.

Mr. QUINN. Then, why dismiss him for what he says?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I would avoid the difficulty of ascertaining what he says on the platform, by forbidding him saying anything on the platform. Is not the sensible rule to adopt that which has been adopted in Great Britain, which prevents the official from appearing on the platform at all? What is the ground of appointing a public official? Are they appointed because they belong to this party or that party? The only rule that ought to be applied is that of efficiency, and not party service.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Hon. gentlemen opposite laugh. They never thought of such a thing before. The only idea they had in making an appointment was to give these offices to men who had done good party service.

Mr. BENNETT. That is not regarded in Ontario at all.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I regret that the hon. member (Mr. Bennett) did not listen to the homily of the hon. gentleman from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), who laid down the proposition—a very correct proposition—that it will not do to say, in answer to a charge of wrong-doing, that the other party did the same thing. Much less will it do to say that the Ontario government, with which we have nothing to do here, does the same thing. While I agree with the hon. gentleman from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), that it is no answer to say that the other party did the same, still I admit that whoever says that, ought also to be ready, if he has given his vote and influence for the action in question, to say. Well, I cannot say anything, for I assisted it. But I say that there should be no such thing in the public service as men becoming active partisans. I would give every man freedom of opinion and freedom to cast his vote. If a man is capable and gained his position honourably—and that ought to be the case always; in fact, these appointments ought to be gained under a system of competitive examination—that is all that should be asked of him: he should be free to hold his own opinion and to act upon it. I have sometimes thought that what the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) said, was true—that as, in our present situation, whatever party is in power, it is natural that strong partisans should be appointed to office, none of these men should have votes. That, as I have said, was the rule in Great Britain up to 1864. While I am not ready to go that far, much can be said in favour of that view. I know it is difficult for these strong partisans, when appointed to office, to throw aside their party feelings all at once. A case occurred in my own county, which I have previously related to this House. I met at a public meeting an officer of the Government who spoke strongly against me. After the meeting, I suggested to him that it was not quite the correct thing for a civil servant, who was paid by all the taxpayers, to take such a strong part in politics in favour of one side. His answer was: I was appointed by the Government, and I am a servant of the Government; I will take my official life in my hand and work for the Government. Will it be said for a moment that a man who takes that position should be retained? Does any one believe that such a man will not do more for a political friend than he will for a political opponent? Suppose a judge in a court of law said: I was appointed by the Liberals, and I am the servant of the party that appointed me. Would any hon. gentleman on the other side feel that he could safely go before such a judge in an election case? In a smaller degree, every man who occupies an office under the Government becomes a judge. Take the case of a fishery officer. Two men are found violating the law, one a political friend and the other a political opponent of the officer. Will it be said, if that officer is a partisan and takes a strong position in elections, that he will treat those men with the same even-handed justice? Surely not. We must distinguish between the American and the English systems: I think the American system is abominable—simply dismissing every man without any inquiry because he was appointed by the other side. But, on the other hand, we must not, in our circumstances, take extreme ground on the other side and keep civil servants in office simply because they have been appointed. There seems to be a feeling on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite that they must make an appeal on behalf of these men because they feel that many of them have been doing what they ought not to have done in the elections. If these men take their political fortunes in their hands, and, though appointed to do justice to all, will go upon the public platform as politicians, pure and simple, they thereby impair their own efficiency as servants of all the people, and must not complain if their services are dispensed with. I know the difficulties a candidate has had to face in my own county. There are officials who have gone to men who were appointed under the Mackenzie government previous to 1878—there are only a few of them—and said: Unless you vote for the Conservatives, you will be dismissed. The officers thus threatened have come to me and told me that they had to vote Conservative or lose their offices. I have a letter giving a curious instance of the interference in the election by a public official. There is a schooner that leaves one port in my county and goes to another. She clears as she goes out, and upon her return back again the captain enters the schooner as having returned. A telegram comes from a strong Conservative official at the point she touched to a strong Conservative official in the place where the schooner was owned, saying that captain so-and-so had left without clearing. The captain was ignorant, he thought, and perhaps did not know the law. He goes to him and says: That vessel is going to be seized, you will lose your vessel, but if you vote against Fraser there will be no proceedings taken against you. Well, Sir, that is cheered on the other side as being the correct thing to do, and still they raise their voices against putting a man out that does the like of that. That was no ordinary case. This was a man who was at once a fishery officer—

Mr. MILLS. . I thought it was a fish story.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). The hon. gentleman would understand better if it was. He was a fishery officer, he held the post office, and he was also collector of customs; in fact, he was three rolled into one. Now, he did not go on a public platform at all, but his act was as bad as if he had gone on the public platform against the candidate. Now, the distinction that must be made is this: that a man appointed to any position is a servant of the public, and he must attend to that work alone. As to the case in point, I think Mr. Speaker has acted correctly. If it is more to that man to be a politician than it is to be here for three months, then let him be a politician. He is a free agent. We must remember that a clerk of this kind comes into contact with both Liberal members and Conservative members. Sometimes he is a short-hand writer, and he writes for members on both sides, and of necessity has to do work that may contain many things political that the member for whom he is writing would not like to be known except to himself and his friends. I think the rule is a safe one, and ought to be observed. I know there are difficulties on account of the number. For myself, I am not inclined to be very harsh. I know that in the county I represent, where there are a large number of postmasters, there is but one man who made himself especially obnoxious. I know others who, in conversation with their friends, were against me, I know they voted against me, but they had a right to do so. But when a man is chairman of a Conservative committee in the district in which he lives, canvasses from house to house, and tries to make an impression against a candidate because he belongs to a secret society which is objectionable in the eyes of those who do not believe that secret societies are right, then I say I will ask the Government to investigate the matter, and I shall do what I can to remove a man like that. But a line must be drawn. I do not believe in indiscriminate dismissals. I do not believe in venting our feelings upon a man because he has solid convictions; but the solid and better a man's convictions are, if he is in a public position, the less he is going to say about them. He will understand that his first business is to the state whose servant he is, and that the exercise of his right to vote ought to be enough for a man who to-day is serving under one Government and to-morrow will serve under another.

Mr. DAVIN. I would like to understand my hon. friend. When he says of a man who is in an official position that the stronger his convictions are the less he will say about them, does the hon. gentleman mean less on a public platform or less in private life?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I regret I did not make myself understood by the hon. member. The stronger the convictions of a man who is, in a public position, the less he is going to say about them in his relations with the electors with whom he comes in contact. I did not mean to go into the privacy of the family. I do not want to inquire into the discussions that take place between a man and his wife about candidates and political parties—I mean in his public relations as a citizen. Now, I believe this will be found to be correct, that the stronger, the healthier and more manly are the political convictions of a servant of the public, whether he be Liberal or Conservative, the less he will talk about them. He will exercise his citizenship by voting in a manly way, but he is not going around to say much. I know that many of the men who say most at elections to assist their party do so with the thought that they are laying the foundation for promotion, and they afterwards come to the party that they assist and ask to be promoted on the ground of having rendered political services to that party. Having been appointed in the first instance on account of their political services, they think they will serve their interests by continuing to render such services. Now, that is all wrong. I trust that ere the term for which we are elected shall expire, we will have taken an advanced step on the line of civil service reform; I trust there will be less appointments than formerly on account of political leanings. I know one Liberal official in the county I represent to-day holding an office of some importance, namely, the position of postmaster. His father held the office for thirty or forty years, and this man, who had received his position thirty years ago, was, without his consent and against his protest, reduced from a salary of $30 to $16 a year, while the man who held the office next to him, and who is a Conservative, continued to get his $30. The Liberal was told. You will have to take $16 or nothing, and he said, Take away the office. But they could not get along without the office, he was the best man, and so what did they do? The mails continued to come to his place, and he was reduced from $30 to $16 all that time. It will be understood by hon. gentlemen that the officials are quite a political force in the county, and if they were permitted to become active politicians, any one can see how much influence they may wield. They have each their fathers, and mothers, brothers, sisters, brothers-in-law, and sons-in-law, and so on all through the county. I think the judicious view taken by Mr. Speaker is the correct one. I maintain that any man who draws a public wage ought to feel that it is a public wage and not a party wage, and he should act accordingly.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have almost been convinced by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) that I have gone too far in trying to keep politics out of the staff of sessional clerks of this House. I have made an earnest and serious attempt to eliminate politics from among the officials of this House. The hon. member for Pictou does not seem at all to appreciate the efforts I have made, but his criticism of the course I have taken is very severe indeed. I want to remind the hon. member that there is no law which makes the sessional clerks permanent. I will read to the hon. member the report of the Internal Economy Committee of the House of Commons on the whole question of the sessional staff, and the report was adopted by the House:

Resolved, That one or two of the senior clerks on the permanent sessional staff be appointed to take charge of the extra writing staff at a salary of $600 each.

That is the permanent sessional staff.

Resolved, That the three remaining clerks on the permanent sessional staff be continued as at present at $400 per session.

That is the permanent sessional staff.

Resolved, That five extra French translators be employed during the session at $4 per diem.

Resolved, That 25 extra sessional clerks be employed as at present at $3 per diem.

There is nothing there that binds the Clerk of the House and the Speaker, who have control of these officers, to treat them other than as sessional officers, as officers holding office from session to session. When this report was received by the House there was a general expression of opinion that hon. members were gratified that those appointments were so limited, and at the same time that the positions were made more of a permanent character. The Clerk, who is the head of the department, is very desirous that the staff should have a permanent character. It is no doubt very much in the interest of the service of the House that it should be so, and I was perfectly willing, when I was elected Speaker of this new Parliament, to consult with him and to take that view of the case. But my efforts have not been appreciated in the slightest degree by hon. gentlemen opposite. They know perfectly well that every single one of those clerks was appointed by their political friends for political reasons; and although I have stood out against my political friends and have stated that I wanted to increase the efficiency of the service of the House and treat the clerks as permanent officers, I have not received the slightest encouragement from hon. gentlemen opposite. On the contrary, what I have most carefully done, and what I am ready to justify, has not met with any encouragement from hon. gentlemen opposite. What has been done? Four of these clerks have been by the Clerk of the House told that for reasons which had come to his knowledge, that they had been interfering in politics (which they also admitted) they would not be reinstated. One of those clerks, only one out of the whole of them, has been found guilty by me of actively interfering in politics by addressing public meetings against an hon. member of this House. I have held, and I shall continue to hold so long as I am Speaker of the House, that this disqualifies a man from properly performing his duties as an officer of this House. I will back up the view of the Clerk and endeavour to prevent this branch of the service being a political branch. But if hon. members do not desire it, I am perfectly willing to resign that responsibility, and let the majority of the House entirely control the appointment of sessional clerks. So long, however, as I hold the position I do, unless the House directs me to the contrary, I propose to act as I have done in any future cases which come before my notice, and I wish no misunderstanding on the point whatever, that I shall act exactly as I have done in the case that has been under discussion.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I really must express my astonishment that Mr. Speaker, a member of this committee, should have allowed himself to be so worked up into a condition of excitement.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. And further that any hon. members in this House should accord to him the applause which generally a party leader receives. I was guilty of no discourtesy to Mr. Speaker, unless it be discourteous for a member of this committee to express his opinion in regard to the treatment of the officers of this House, and it seems from the excited speech of Mr. Speaker that he demands the exclusive right to deal with officers of this House, and he will not receive criticisms, at least at my hands, without resorting to what seems to me very nearly a threat—that he would change his action and deal very harshly and cruelly with officers to whom he thinks he has been exceedingly kind. The kindness consists of this, so far as I understand the hon. gentleman, that he cut the head off the only officer who appeared before him, and the Clerk cut the heads off the other four.

Mr. SPEAKER. There have been complaints made before me respecting half a dozen other cases.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I consider each case should stand on its own merits. I dealt with only one case. Mr. Speaker has referred to the Clerk of the House. I need not remind him that that sort of defence is something like a Minister sheltering himself behind his deputy. He has to deal with each case, and whether Mr. Speaker dislikes it or not, I shall respectfully attempt to give my opinion as to the treatment extended to these officers. I did not discuss any case but one, because that case sufficiently illustrated a principle, and without intending to use language which would be offensive to any one I took that case as an illustration of what I think an erroneous principle, and I devoted a few minutes to discussing it.

Mr. SPEAKER. I desire to say, in reply to the hon. member, that the reason why I mentioned the name of the Clerk was because by rule 110 the Clerk is brought into the matter in this way:

The Clerk shall employ, at the outset of the session, with the approbation of the Speaker, such extra writers as may be necessary, engaging others as the public business may require.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We were not discussing the employment by the Clerk of any one under that rule; but the dismissals by the Speaker of officers of the House. So the rule has no application to the case. I referred to one case, and I propose to keep to it, in order to enter my protest against that treatment being accorded to any man, be he guilty or innocent. That was the first objection I had to the procedure. Again, I objected most strongly to the rule which Mr. Speaker laid down as his guide, and it has nothing to do with the answer that Mr. Speaker has given me, that was that he had been exceedingly lenient and by no means severe or harsh, but that if he got intelligence from the House he would in future adopt a different course. I am sorry he has taken the suggestion in that way.

Mr. SPEAKER. I hope the hon. gentleman is not anxious to misrepresent what I said. I stated that I would not act differently, but that I was prepared to leave the whole matter of these appointments to the House.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The tone of the hon. gentleman may have misled me; it was a tone of excitement; he was cheered by party cheers. I was speaking simply for myself as a member of the committee on a point which I consider an important one, and which certainly is a particularly important one to officers in the public service. After all, what I am fighting to-night for is the adoption of a sound principle—and it has been deemed so by leaders on both sides of the House—that if you want to have efficient officers you must have definite rules, so that the officers may govern themselves accordingly, not capricious acts, and changes suddenly made and without notice, yet which would take away at one fell swoop a position in which a man had proved himself to be a useful and necessary public officer. Again, Mr. Speaker took me sharply to task as to the question of permanency in these appointments. I had not said it was the law but that it was necessary or desirable to treat these clerks as permanent; I had accepted Mr. Speaker's opinion. I had accepted his statement as to the expression of opinion on both sides of the House, viz: that it was in the interests of the public service that these temporary positions should be practically permanent; that is, that those officers should come, session after session, to fulfil their duties so long as there was no good reason for dismissing them. I have observed, however, that the Speaker has not given us any case which would have weakened the position that I so strongly took, when I said that there had been no precedent for this treatment of an officer. He has given us no precedent to show that an active part taken by an officer of this House when not paid for doing any work for this House, and when not on duty, was an offence for which he should be dismissed. This is a departure laid down by Mr. Speaker, so far as I know, for the first time. The debate in 1880 shows that I was warranted in saying that it was a vicious system to frequently change officers of this House, whether they be permanent or temporary. Every old member of this House knows the inconvenience caused by changing even the pages, and in far more important cases than that, it goes without saying that officers of experience are the most useful to the House. That is, however, a selfish aspect, and I was proceeding from the point of view of the justice of the case. I was claiming for these officers a fair trial before condemnation, and objecting to the rule laid down by Mr. Speaker, that activity in politics on the part of our officers, after their sessional duties are performed, should be considered an offence.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I want to oblige the hon. gentleman by giving him just such a precedent as Mr. SPEAKER.

he requires. I wish him to understand that I did not applaud the Speaker of the House in the declaration he made, because I candidly confess that I was not entirely satisfied with it. I understand that there are 25 sessional clerks, and as matters now stand I believe that 20 of these were appointed by the Conservatives and only five appointed by the Liberals. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to want the whole earth. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker was not bound to take the very liberal and generous view he did take, and had he erred a little in the other direction there would have been ample justification for him. I found on a neighbour's desk a newspaper containing an extract from a speech delivered in this House in former years, and I shall take the liberty of reading it. A few years ago a gentleman by the name of Wade was a sessional clerk in this House. I understand that a distinction is drawn here, and perhaps properly drawn, between an officer of the Government and an officer of Parliament. The hon. gentleman himself (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has drawn that distinction, and he says that these are officers of the House. If that be the case I take it for granted that interference on one side or the other is equally objectionable. In 1887, Mr. Wade was summarily dismissed from the office of a sessional clerk in this House; the very character of office we are now discussing. I find that when complaint was made about that, the hon. gentleman who is now leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) made a statement in the House which I shall now read. Sir Charles, in reply to Mr. Jones, said:

I am sorry to say that he (Mr. Wade) so far forgot the position he occupied as to go out and take a prominent part in holding public meetings and denouncing the Government of the day.

Now, that is what practically was done by the gentleman whose case we are discussing.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He spoke on the school question.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not care whether it was the school question or any other question. The point is that this sessional clerk went out and took his place on the public platform and denounced the Liberal party.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not the Government of the day.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman is too logical to draw a distinction between speaking against the Government of the day, and against the party in Opposition. Sir Charles Tupper continued on that occasion:

I think there is no gentleman in this House on either side who will say that any public officer holding any office under the Government or Parliament should adopt such a course, or if he does adopt it that he should be retained in the public service, if we are to carry on public affairs in the way in which, I am sure, hon. gentlemen would like to see them carried on. There is no doubt that public officers, especially under the ballot, have a perfect right to go to the polls and record their vote for or against any person, as they may please, or as they may consider it their duty, but I do not believe any gentleman in the House will sustain any public officer in going out and taking an offensive course in reference to the Government of the day, whoever may be in power.

Now, the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) takes the point that if these officers behave themselves during the session of Parliament, we have nothing to do with what may happen during the recess.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I qualified that.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I understood that to be the view of the hon. gentleman, but he says he qualified it. The view laid down by the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) was, that this House has a right to take notice not only of what happens during the session, but of what happens in recess, as respects the officers of the House. And, when Mr. Wade went beyond the bounds of what was regarded as prudence and took the stump in defence of one party and attacking another, the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) laid down the rule that he should be dismissed.

I accept the view of the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) and I am willing to have that principle applied not only to sessional clerks but to the service generally. No man shall be interfered with in his right to vote, but I say that if a man, being a public officer, chooses to go beyond that; if he chooses to exercise the right of citizenship to the extent of going on the stump and discussing party questions—I will not draw the line between a proper discussion and an improper discussion, because I say that if he is a public officer he has no business there at all—if he goes on the stump and takes his place in the ranks of his party, he must be content to take the fate of his party. If it shall suit the pleasure and generosity of the winning party to continue him in office they may do so; but if in the exercise of stern justice they dismiss him, then according to the rule laid down by the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) he has only received justice.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I hope that on this very important question the two sides of the House are going to come to a common understanding. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) subscribes to the doctrine I have laid down in that speech. He accepts that, as the rule and guide to be pursued by all parties in this country in relation to public officers. Now, Sir, I adhere to every word that is contained in that statement, and I only ask the Government of the day to follow the lines that are laid down there, and I shall be perfectly satisfied. I draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Finance to two points contained in that statement. The one is that the party was guilty of publicly denouncing the Government of the day.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Is he at liberty to denounce the Opposition?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will come to that in a moment. I draw a distinction between that and the denunciation of the Government of the day, because there is a certain amount of official impropriety in a public officer denouncing the Government under whom he is serving; but I do not make that an important distinction. But the word "offensive" completes the category, and fixes the conduct of a public officer as warranting his dismissal. I do not ask the present Government to retain in the public service an officer who has been guilty publicly of taking an offensive part, whether in relation to the Government of the day or in relation to the Opposition. The public official who goes on the platform and takes an offensive part against either of the two great parties, cannot hope to escape dismissal. I, therefore, hope that we have got pretty near a point of agreement on this important question. A public official, as the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) has stated, enjoys a perfect right to maintain his opinions, to vote, and to freely express the opinions he forms, so long as he does so in a perfectly respectful manner; but, if he goes out on the platform and takes an offensive part against either of the great parties of the country, I do not blame the present Government, if they say: You have chosen to take your official life in your hand, you have adopted a course of such indecent assault on the party now in power, that we are not able to retain you in the public service. I did not rise for the purpose of continuing the discussion that took place while I was not in the House; but I have learned with pleasure that a leading member of the Administration, the hon. Minister of Finance, sees eye to eye with me on this important question, and that the sound policy which I laid down on that occasion, is likely to be carried out by the Administration.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I trust that the hon. leader of the Opposition did not understand me as saying for one moment that I thought an official should be free to go on the platform, because I did not. My language was specific, that he might hold his views, or vote, or express his views by saying, "I am a Conservative," or "I am a Liberal;" but I drew the line at canvassing or going on the public platform.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). I want to say a word in this debate, and only one. I decline to subscribe to the distinction which the leader of the Opposition draws between the Government and the Opposition.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not attach much importance to that.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He did not, but I wish it to be clearly and distinctly understood what is my personal view of the matter. I do not think it is the right of an officer employed by the Government to take an offensive part against the Opposition of the day, any more than against the Government of the day.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We are entirely agreed on that.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am glad that the hon. gentleman agrees to that. I decline to acknowledge that it is the right of any public officer to canvass against either the Government or the Opposition. I frankly and fully acknowledge the right of any public servant to hold what views he pleases, and to vote for whom he pleases, and when he pleases, without being called to account. I decline to go one step further. In the province from which I come, outside of those in the permanent service, who, I am proud to believe, have learned the lesson of the duties of a public officer, the great bulk of the officers of the Government are the men who carried on the political work of the Conservative party. Talk about the North-west. Sir, the Intercolonial Railway, with some few exceptions, which I cheerfully recognize, is a hot-bed of political propagandism. The bitterest and most offensive partisans to be found in Canada are to be found in connection with that road.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to say—and I know the Intercolonial Railway pretty well—that I believe the party now in power received more support from the employees of the Intercolonial Railway than the late Government.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I perfectly acknowledge the hon. gentleman's right to entertain that opinion; but some of us possess a knowledge which justifies us in holding an opinion quite the contrary. I believe the vast majority of the workmen on the Intercolonial Railway desired to vote in favour of the Liberal party; I have no doubt that 75 per cent of them desired to vote for the Liberal party; but I know that the leading officers of the Intercolonial Railway did not scruple to use every power they possessed to force, and compel, and dragoon these workmen to vote against the Liberal party. It is impossible, as the hon. gentleman must see, for a political party to submit to that without making inquiry into those cases that come within the term offensive partisanship, and exposing them. What have we seen since this Government came into power? Among all the thousands of employees on the Intercolonial Railway, there has not been a man discharged, except the two temporary workmen whom the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has talked about.

Mr. FOSTER. Not in Prince Edward Island?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Certainly in Prince Edward Island; and I trust, for the credit and honour of the Government, that a good many more will be dispensed with. I do not want to name any man. I hope they will have a fair trial; but it is impossible for me to live in a small place like Prince Edward Island without knowing that those men were offensive, hateful partisans. I cannot use language to express it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is going to try them.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the hon. gentleman had seen men on the platform, as I have seen them, and had known men to canvass from house to house, and had absolute proof that they walked into the round-house and other places and threatened workmen with dismissal, if they dared to vote for the Liberal party, he would perhaps share the views I entertain at present. I am not blaming the workmen; I am blaming the superior officers who acted in this way. I hope they will get a fair trial, and I hope they will get, as the hon. Minister of Finance said, what they do not desire—justice. Now, I think we have approached nearer than we did at the beginning of the session towards the true rule that should govern us in dealing with public officials. I repeat, I will never be a party to interfering with any man, directly or indirectly, in the free and untrammelled exercise of his vote; but, when he goes beyond that and canvasses from house to house, attends committee meetings and speaks at political meetings, he gambles for his place, and, if he loses, he must take the consequence, and take it with a good grace.

Mr. MCGREGOR. I have listened with some interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) about discharging men who hold office. The hon. gentleman heard the pleadings of Mr. Coste and Mr. Wigle about a lighthouse keeper whose son had voted against Mr. Lewis Wigle. For that reason the hon. gentleman took the lighthouse from that man, and gave it to a man named Pettypiece. Now, you can go a little further than that. There never was a more despotic man in his dealings with the Government officials in our county, in the history of this country, than the hon. member for Pictou himself. In the Customs service, the late Controller of Customs (Mr. Wallace) took from us the only Liberals we had. Out of 28 or 30 men employed in our county as custom-house officers, there were three Liberals, and these were discharged without evidence and without any fault on their part, and three Conservatives were put in their places. If the hon. gentleman wants the names I can give them. There was Mr. Watson, a life-long Liberal, and Mr. Chevalier, a man about 55 years old, who was discharged, and a man some years his senior put in his place. Then, Mr. Brown, a very active and efficient officer at Essex, was discharged also, and a man brought from the east to take his place at a higher salary. In Mr. Watson's place they appointed a man named Stokes, nominated by the hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Roome), and they brought another man from St. Thomas to take the place of one of these men who had been dismissed. Had these men been guilty of any fault, had there been any charge against them, it would have been different, but there was none. They were discharged without an hour's notice. They were simply told that at the end of the month they would get their pay and would not be required any longer. My hon. friend, the late Controller of Customs (Mr. Wallace), will say that they were not required; but if so, why were Ponting, Stokes, and the man from St. Thomas brought to our county to take the places of these men? That being the case, while Mr. Wigle might have been a great friend of the hon. member for Pictou and while Mr. Coste might also have great influence in having Mr. Hackett's lights taken from him, we think it was unfair and unjust to have taken these lights from Mr. Hackett simply because his son voted against Mr. Wigle.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Of course the hon. gentleman does not expect me to remember off-hand these particular cases. I dismissed a great many officers, but I dismissed them all for cause. I challenge the hon. gentleman to find in the Marine Department, which is now open to him, a single bit of evidence to support the charge that I dismissed one officer in the whole Dominion of Canada because he voted for the Liberal party. He does not mean to say that in the case of Mr. Hackett, who had a peculiar contract with regard to lights which he owned or rented—

Mr. MCGREGOR. No.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Whose case was altogether exceptional—

Mr. MCGREGOR. Not at all.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Surely the hon. gentleman does not pretend that Mr. Hackett was dismissed from the service on account of political reasons.

Mr. MCGREGOR. Nothing else under the sun.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman persists, I shall ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) to take a note of the case, and submit, without formality of motion, the papers on the subject, because the hon. gentleman speaks with feeling, and I am sure he will be the first to apologize after reading the papers.

Mr. MCGREGOR. There are no papers. Mr. Coste simply came down, and the department discharged Hackett without any report or inquiry.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman must restrain himself until my suggestion is complied with and the papers are brought down.

Mr. MCGREGOR. There are no papers. Mr. Coste came down and the next morning Hackett was discharged.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I think that this discussion with regard to the civil service will be productive of a great deal of good in the future. I think that after Parliament has declared what course should be pursued by the civil servants in the discharge of their duties and the exercise of their franchise, and the opinion of Parliament becomes known among the army of civil servants that are to be found from one end of the Dominion to the other, and who have been nearly all appointed by the Conservative party, much good will be accomplished. The Conservative party have ruled this country for the last eighteen years, so that there are very few Liberals occupying positions in the public service in any part of the Dominion, and I am not surprised that the Conservative party should put up this fight in defence of the men who have fought their battles for the last eighteen years in every constituency in the country. It is well known that in almost every constituency in the Dominion, the civil service officials have, in many cases, been the most active workers for the Conservative party. Is it, then, to be wondered at that the Conservative party, now in Opposition, should strive to keep these men in their positions? Is it to be wondered at that the men who, after the Liberal party were defeated in 1878, repealed an Act of Parliament which carried with it several hundred appointments, and repealed it for no other purpose but to discharge the men who had been appointed to office by the Liberal Government, and who, after they had repealed that Act, re-enacted it in a very short time and appointed their own friends to the positions from which they had ousted the Liberals, should strive now to keep their friends in office? We know that the Conservative party, in this and every other country, think they have a divine right to rule, but they have discovered, since the last election, that they have no such divine right, in this country at least, and they are wilting under the idea that they are going to lose the services of thousands of those civil servants who have been their active partisans in the past. I say that the new rule laid down by the leader of the Government is a rule that ought to be strictly enforced, namely, that an officer of the Government—I do not care whether he is an officer of this House or of the inside or outside service—who chooses to take his official life into his hands and work for either one party or the other—I do not care which—ought to be dismissed. We had an illustration of this in the past, which has been referred to by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), when Mr. Chapleau, who was then Secretary of State, took into his own hands the dismissal of officers of this House, translators of the debates. He declared that they had acted offensively in public meetings and that he did not want to be in the position of having to meet these men in the lobbies of the House. The Conservative party, on that occasion, sustained Mr. Chapleau and those men were discharged. I contend that, in the present instance, the Speaker of this House has perhaps leaned too much toward the Conservative party in the decisions he gave in regard to these sessional officers. These officers are merely temporary clerks, who can be removed at any session by the Speaker and Clerk of the House. The Conservative party have been in power for eighteen years, and these men have enjoyed the sweets of office for that time, and it is time some other persons came in and had some of the sweets of office. I contend that it is our turn now. I contend that all the offices which are not permanent, and are at the command of the Speaker of the House and the Liberal party, ought to be filled by Liberals, and I say that Mr. Speaker would have been justified if he had dismissed every one of these temporary officers. There is a great deal made out of the statement that these men have knowledge of the work they have to perform. Why, they only perform clerical services, copying and writing out documents, and any man with a liberal education can discharge those duties. Is it to be supposed that any technical education is required to discharge those duties? The idea is absurd. You could get thousands of men in this country who are capable of stepping into the offices filled by these sessional writers and discharging their duties just as efficiently as the men who now occupy those places—perhaps more efficiently. A new broom sweeps clean. If you get new sessional clerks to replace men some of whom have been there for eighteen years, they would probably work better and harder than the men who have got into the way of putting in their time in discharging their duties. I, for one, declare my opinion that Mr. Speaker did not do his full duty. He ought to have discharged every one of these men and filled their offices with men favourable to the party that secured a triumph in the last election.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I know it is hard for Conservatives to feel that they are losing their influence, that they now occupy the benches that we filled for so many years: but they must realize that they do not rule this country any longer but that the Liberals rule it. I concur in the statement that has been made that any permanent officer in the inside service or in the outside service, who has discharged his duty faithfully, who has refrained from interfering in the politics of the country, who has not written newspaper articles against the Opposition or against the Government, ought not to be disturbed. But I say that every man who has been a partisan in the past, every man who has written newspaper articles against the Government in this country or against the Opposition—I do not care which—and any man who has taken a part in the discussion of public questions and shown that he is a partisan and therefore unfitted to occupy a disinterested position in the public service, ought to have his official head cut off. And that at once, without any delay. And I say that the Government will be sustained not only by their supporters in this House but by the great majority of the electors of the Dominion if they pursue such a course as this.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. This is probably the first time within the recollection even of the oldest member of this House that a speech such as the one which has just been delivered has been heard in a Parliament enjoying institutions that we in Canada enjoy. I should not have been surprised to hear such a speech if I had been sitting within the halls of the congress of the United States. According to the hon. gentleman's views, the change of government must be followed by a change in the civil service of this country.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I do not wish to be misrepresented. I never said anything of the kind.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I do not know what the hon. gentleman meant to say—

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I will tell you what I did say, if you will allow me. I said that any permanent officer in the inside or in the outside service who attended to his duties and discharged them without interfering in political matters ought to be retained; but any civil servants in either of these services of the Government who interfered in the politics of this country ought to be allowed to depend upon politics for his living.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. This explanation of the hon. gentleman convinces me more strongly than ever that I was perfectly correct in my interpretation of what he said. The hon. gentleman went beyond that and said that he regretted that Mr. Speaker had not gone beyond what Mr. Speaker considered he should have done and, instead of dismissing one of the servants employed in the House, had not dismissed every one of them. He said with a frankness which we ack-knowledge to be a characteristic of the hon. gentleman: For eighteen years the Conservatives have been in power, and is it not now time that our friends should replace those that were appointed by the Conservative Government? And, though he did not say so in so many words, his whole speech meant: You cannot dismiss too many of the old civil servants to make room for the new ones.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I do not wish to be misrepresented; I do not wish to have words put in my mouth. I did not say that civil servants ought to be dismissed; I was speaking of temporary clerks.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman referred to the precedent when Sir Adolphe Chapleau, then Hon. Mr. Chapleau, was Secretary of State and occupied a seat in this House. According to my understanding of the two cases, there is no similarity at all between the case which has been discussed here and that of Mr. Tremblay, who was, I believe, a reporter occupying a position on the "Hansard" staff at that time. Mr. Chapleau's charge against that gentleman as a civil servant was not that during recess he expressed his opinions on political matters, but that he had gone out of his way to attack him (Mr. Chapleau) personally as a Minister of the Crown. I agree that if you can establish a charge of personal offence offered by a civil servant to one of the members of the Government, the Ministry would be perfectly right in insisting upon his removal from office.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then you will vote for the dismissal of the translators, I suppose?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Their trial is not finished.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They have admitted their guilt.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. What has been the case as submitted to the House by Mr. Speaker, the first commoner of the country? The hon. gentleman, in the most judicial spirit explained the case as he believed it should be laid before the House, and said that the officer in question had been dismissed because, on one occasion he had expressed his opinion upon the school question. Where is the terrible attack upon either of the great political parties in this Parliament in the fact that this gentleman expressed an opinion upon a most important question that was discussed in this House? Why, the hon. leader of the House must remember that when he sat here as leader of the Opposition several of his own friends expressed an opinion absolutely antagonistic to his own upon that question. Why should it be thought when one of the employees of the Parliament of Canada, which itself was divided upon this question, went out as a citizen during the period of time when his services were not required in the House and expressed his views upon the question, that he had done that which justified his dismissal? There is no similarity between that case and that of Mr. Tremblay, who had gone out of his way to personally attack one of the members of the Government. I believe that in the interests of the two great parties who divided public opinion in this country we should not for one moment desire to follow the example of the American people in these matters. The civil servants should feel that, like every other citizen, they have the right of expressing their opinion upon public questions, and I believe it would be a sad day for Canada, if either party consented to permit civil servants for one moment to believe that a change of Government, whether it occurs after eighteen years or after a shorter period, would result in the dismissal of the men who had given the best years of their life to the civil service.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman has pleaded very hard on behalf of Ministers of the Crown. He thinks that, if a civil servant attacks a Minister of the Crown, he ought to be rebuked and dismissed. I would like to know, from the hon. gentleman, if private members of Parliament are to be subjected to abuse, and criticism, and bitter opposition by civil servants, while Ministers of the Crown are to be protected from such attacks? Is that what the hon. gentleman means?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Not at all. The distinction I pointed out was that, in the case of Mr. Tremblay, he was charged with attacking offensively one of the members of the Government. The hon. the Speaker says that the other gentleman was dismissed because he expressed his opinion upon the school question.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not want to be misunderstood. I say that he expressed his opinion on a public platform against the member who sits in this House for that county, and attacked his vote on the school question. He was not merely expressing his opinion, but he took the public platform and attacked a gentleman who has since been elected to this House, for his vote in the House on the school question.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I would like to call the attention of the hon. member for Cape Breton (Sir Charles Tupper) to one incident. In 1878, I think, the same question came up that comes up to-night, and it was in connection with the Intercolonial Railway. He found that it was not practicable to run that great work, when it was being handled by Mr. Brydges, who is now dead, and Mr. Luttrell. He knew, to the cost of his party, that he was handicapped in every position he took. I joined him, as he will admit, in getting rid of those gentlemen as quickly as possible, in order that the Intercolonial Railway might give efficient and loyal service to the Government of the day. Now, I do not say this offensively, but merely to recall his memory to the matter. I feel strongly myself, irrespective of either side of the House, for New Brunswick and the people I represent. Those who have used every effort against us, those who have kicked us when we were down, those who have treated us in the most ungenerous and unfriendly way, should not to-day ask mercy from us. I, Sir, never asked any mercy. I feel, Sir, not as a Christian—I am afraid I am not Christian enough to submit to their dictation in the future.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I am afraid I have not the attributes of gentlemen who call themselves Christians, gentlemen who will go behind the door to do what they won't do in front of it. But I say that we should replace those people who are active partisans, by other men. Now, my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) laughs. I have seen him laugh, and I have seen him on occasions when he did not laugh, when the burning question was no joke. But I do hope, nay, I believe, that the country will demand that we take energetic action in this matter. I have only one vote in this House, but I represent a county that I am proud of; I represent a county that knows when it has got a good man. I represent a county, Mr. Chairman, that, in the days when the Liberal-Conservatives were in power, returned one of the only three members from the province of New Brunswick to support the Liberal-Conservative party, and they got little satisfaction for what they did. That same party stands behind me to-night, and I am free to give my opinion here that every man who has made himself offensive, who has said the most disgraceful things about the leader of the Government, who did not hesitate to revile him and my friends—I say, I believe the country will justify the Government in dismissing such men from office at once.

Mr. CLANCY. I am sure we can afford to discuss this question in a calm and dispassionate way, particularly because it involves, to some extent, the conduct of the presiding officer of this House. I am not sure that the heat that has been imported into this debate upon the other side of the House, is a very striking evidence of the strength of their case. Now, I happen to have some knowledge of one of the cases mentioned in this debate, namely, the sessional clerk who was discharged on the alleged ground of having taken, not an offensive part in the election, but of having gone upon a platform and discussed the school question. The leader of the Opposition laid down the right doctrine some years ago, and it seems to be unreservedly assented to

by the Minister of Finance this evening. He quoted some remarks made by that hon. gentleman at that time, and he appears willing to lay it down as a rule. I am willing to give the broadest assent to that rule this evening, and to have our friends throughout the country judged by it, and to take the consequences of its operation. Now, let me come to the case. I hope, Mr. Speaker will not take in bad part what I am going to say, but he is, necessarily, from his position involved in the case, and his acts are subject to the approval of the House. While he has unlimited powers of appointment and dismissal of the officers of the House, he is at all times subject to the approval of the House. Now, let me briefly state the case of this dismissal. A man named Béchard, who resides in the township of Dover, an elector in the county of Kent, is charged with having engaged in a political contest by making a speech upon one occasion. Now, while there are concurrent powers with the Speaker and the Clerk as to dismissals of officers from the House there is only one power of appointment, and the action of the Clerk, in all matters, must always be subject to the approval of the Speaker. Now, Mr. Béchard is alleged to have engaged in the campaign before the 23rd June, and some days before the assembling of this House—I am not sure but it was some weeks, Mr. Béchard received a letter from the Clerk of this House, which letter I have seen, telling him that his services were no longer required. It would, perhaps, be well, at this stage, to inquire on what information the Clerk of the House acted at that time—whether this man was dismissed for having taken an alleged part in the election, or whether it was upon the ground of inefficiency in the performance of his duties as a servant of this House. The House was not in session, and the latter could not be the reason; therefore, it must have been upon the sole ground of having taken part in the election. Now, it is proper that this House should know what was the information upon which the Clerk of the House took the action that he did. I am perfectly satisfied that the Clerk of the House had no disposition to hunt out such cases. I am also within the case when I say that Mr. Speaker, if we are to judge from the utterances of some hon. gentlemen, has been placed in a most unpleasant and trying position. The violent speech delivered by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Somerville) indicated the pressure that must have been brought to bear upon him, and in his position the hon. gentleman deserves and needs the sympathy of both sides of the House. This officer, Béchard, came from the county of Kent to Ottawa before the Speaker was elected. The rule was very properly laid down some years ago that the position of the Speaker of the House was a continuous position. Accordingly Mr. White was Speaker at the moment when this clerk received notice of his dismissal. Mr. Speaker has stated that no notice of dismissal was sent to Mr. Béchard. I assent to that statement. I do not believe the hon. gentleman had any knowledge of the transaction, but I wish to point out the vicious system carried out here by which, through the pressure of hon. gentlemen, the Clerk was forced into writing letters of dismissal.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I appeal to the hon. gentleman on this point, and I wish to say to him that it has not been customary in this House before to make a violent attack on an officer of the House such as the Clerk of the House.

Mr. CLANCY. I am not making an attack on the Clerk of the House. I hold that he had no means of knowing the facts, and that his action was taken on account of undue pressure brought to bear on him by hon. gentlemen opposite. I hope the rule will not be laid down that the Clerk has the right to dismiss officials, not for improper conduct in regard to their duties, but on grounds similar to those alleged against Béchard. That officer came to Ottawa, not having received any notice from Mr. Speaker White of his dismissal. He very properly assumed that he was still an officer of the House, the late Mr. White remaining Speaker until the House assembled and a new Speaker was elected, and therefore he thought he was not bound to take notice of any complaint made before a meeting of the House. Béchard came here, and after being employed eight or ten days in the service he was summoned, I understand, to the office of the Speaker. I am not finding fault with this action. Mr. Speaker had a right to make inquiry, and if he found that this young gentleman had been engaged actively in the contest, and had taken an improper part in the elections, the fact should be brought to light. It was quite proper to ascertain whether he had given utterance to any violent or offensive language. But this young man had discussed the school question in a very moderate and proper manner. He was invited on one occasion to go on a public platform, and he mildly stated his views on the school question or some other issue, but he did not say a word offensive either to the candidate or to the Liberal party. I hope the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries will not attempt to give a colouring to my remarks so as to make it appear that I made an attack on an officer of the House. We are now perhaps laying down the rule as to the individual with whom the authority of dismissal lies as regards some of the officers of this House. This action, I repeat, was not taken at the instance of the Speaker, but was due altogether to undue pressure being brought to bear to secure the dismissal of officials without any inquiry being made into their conduct. It is not pretended that Béchard had any trial, or that he appeared before any one in this House having the right to hear the case before receiving notice of his dismissal. His dismissal was simply due to pressure being brought on the Government of the day. I deeply sympathize both with the Speaker and the Clerk. In both instances I am not prepared to charge the slightest misconduct, but any one can plainly see that the machinery set in motion to secure his dismissal rested with hon. members, and such action cannot be safely adopted by this House as a rule, for Béchard was not properly treated because he was dismissed practically before the House assembled.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not propose to say a word more in regard to my own action on the Béchard matter. I have explained it to the House, and there I propose to leave it. But the hon. gentleman has spoken with respect to an officer of the House who is not able to defend himself, and I wish to say a word in that regard. The Clerk of the House feels most strongly upon the question of keeping politics entirely out of the staff of the House. He has authorized me to read an extract from some observations on this subject he laid before me as soon as I became Speaker. This is what he said :

I may add that these men have always understood from me that they are not employees of the Government of the day, but of the House—and that political partisanship in any shape should be punished by their removal. So strongly have I felt in this particular that I took it upon myself to notify several men that they should not return at the present session, inasmuch as I had ascertained from reliable authority that they had taken an active and improper part in the general elections. The officers and clerks of my department should have no political bias whatever.

The Clerk stated that he had notified several sessional clerks that they had been charged with taking part in the elections: that Béchard was one of them, and he had suggested that if that were true, Béchard had better not come here. Béchard came here; he reported himself to the Clerk, and denied the charge utterly, whereupon the Clerk told him to go on with his duties. Ten days or so afterwards, when called upon, he did not deny the charge, but admitted it, and he was dismissed. That is the action of the Clerk. He had nothing to do with the dismissals. He properly notified these men, and several that he notified did not come at all, because they admitted it. Therefore, I think it was rather unfair for the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) to make an attack upon the Clerk of this House.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Apologize.

Mr. CLANCY. My hon. friend asked me to apologize, but if he will allow me to explain, it will quite answer the purposes of an apology. I stated that Mr. Béchard had received a notice of dismissal, and that is true. I say further, that it is no attack upon any official of this House to lay down the rule, that a person charged should have at least a chance of answering that charge. What is the case as stated by the hon. Mr. Speaker? It is that the Clerk of the House had discharged Mr. Béchard upon evidence that he thought reliable.

Mr. SPEAKER. I did not suggest that the Clerk had discharged Mr. Béchard. I said he had done what he says in this letter he did:

So strongly have I felt in this particular that I took it upon myself to notify several men that they should not return at the present session, inasmuch as I had ascertained from reliable authority that they had taken an active and improper part in the general elections.

Mr. Béchard denied that he was guilty, and he came here and got his pay for the time he was here.

Mr. CLANCY. To have written to an official of the House that his services were no longer required, was a dismissal in the strictest possible sense of the term.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Clancy) a little misunderstands the case. I understand that the Clerk of the House drew Mr. Béchard's attention to the fact that he was charged with having taken a very active political part in the elections. He came here, and stated that such was not the case, and the Clerk instructed him to go to his office. The Clerk had nothing to do with his dismissal afterwards. That is the statement as made by the Speaker, and I believe it is correct.

Mr. CLANCY. The case is this as I understand it, and it seems to be perfectly clear. The Clerk wrote to Mr. Béchard telling him that he had information that he had taken an improper part in the election, and following upon that, he told him that his services were no longer required. I do not doubt in any sense that the Clerk felt that his information was quite sufficient in warranting him to do that. However, this young man came here and he denied the charge and he was permitted to go on. But the four other persons charged took the Clerk's letter as a complete dismissal, and did not come to the House requesting to be continued in the service. I wish to point out that the letter in the first instance to Mr. Béchard was a complete dismissal. It was so accepted by the other four, and they never came back.

Some hon. MEMBERS. They pleaded guilty.

Mr. CLANCY. It is perfectly clear that in the first instance Mr. Béchard should have been asked to come here, and the other four should have been asked to come here and show if they could that they had not taken an improper part in the election.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to take any part in this discussion had it not been for the remarks made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) as well as the few remarks made by the hon. gentleman from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). Representing as I do the south riding of Essex county, I have had considerable experience of the dealing of the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) and of the precedents and practices which he and his friends laid down while in power. They compare strangely with the views and the opinions which they are advancing to-day when they are in Opposition. While the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), if I mistake not, was Minister of Marine and Fisheries there was one David Girardin, of the Island of Pelee, who was fishery officer, and who was compelled with a small row boat to guard Pelee Island, 21 miles in circumference. North Harbour Island, 16 miles away, East Sister Island, 12 miles away, and Middle Sister Island, 20 miles away. The hon. the Minister sent his inspector to the Island of Pelee. He was drunk in two hours after he arrived on that Island, and he made a report that Mr. Girardin had not made any seizures, and therefore that he was incompetent and unfit for the position which he held. The officer, Mr. Girardin, had asked for some kind of assistance in order that he might capture American poachers. He received none whatever, and the only excuse the then Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) had for dismissing that man—apart from having a suspicion that he might possibly be favourable to the Liberal party—was the fact, that he was not able with a small row boat to catch a fishing schooner that could travel from 12 to 15 miles per hour. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has disputed the facts concerning the Hackett case. Mr. Hackett is a resident of the constituency which I have the honour to represent, and I repeat here that there was no charge against Hackett. There was never a charge made against him by any public official or private individual, but he was guilty of the grave and serious offence that it was suspected that his son had voted for the Liberal party, although Hackett, the father, had not voted for the two previous elections. There was still another reason for Mr. Hackett's dismissal, and that was that a political party heeler of the hon. gentlemen opposite, who had done the party's work in that section of the community, wanted a job, and consequently Mr. Hackett was put out and Pettypiece was put in. But that is not all. In the Island of Pelee in 1895, Mr. Walters, an appointee of hon. gentlemen opposite, who was landing waiter at the north dock, and O. D. Fox, who was landing waiter at the west dock, and who only got the small sum of $50 per year or thereabouts, were suspected of being favourable to myself, and were dismissed. They were not political canvassers. I venture to say that neither of them ever took the political stump, nor even hardly canvassed a vote in their lifetime. If I mistake not, they were both appointees of hon. gentlemen opposite, but because they were suspected of being favourable to me, they were both put out, and a man put in who was scarcely able even to write his own name. I have sat as a new member in this House for the past twenty days, and I say that it has become nauseating to a large number of the members, to hear hon. gentlemen opposite prate about what should be done, and about what is honest and fair treatment to mete out as between man and man. Hon. gentlemen opposite know that they only considered two things when they were in power. One was, that if a Government official was opposed to them he was discharged, and the other was, that they appointed a political heeler of their own, irrespective of the man's qualification for the office. These are the facts so far as they relate to the constituency which I represent. In the last political contest in my constituency, the best workers that hon. gentlemen opposite had were men who went up and down the side lines, by day and by night, men who are the proteges of hon. gentlemen opposite, and who were appointed to office on the express condition that they should do their work in elections. The member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) sets forth here to-night that the proper principle to be carried out is, that an investigation in each case should take place. I suppose that if a man is capable of standing upon the public platform and making a gentlemanly speech on behalf of the Conservative party, the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) would consider that such a one had not taken an offensive part in the contest. I think I can see sufficiently far ahead, and read sufficiently between the lines to know, what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) means. The hon. gentleman knows what a very dear political friend of his was guilty of in the last contest. He is afraid in regard to this friend that his political head may go into the waste basket, and so he rises in this House to put in his spike in order to save that friend if he can. I refer to Mr. Killacky, who is assistant collector of customs at the port of Windsor. Mr. Killacky comes from West Kent adjoining the constituency of the member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy). If I mistake not Mr. Killacky stumped for the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy). The hon. member received the benefit of Mr. Killacky's services—

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. COWAN. Then if he did not go to the constituency of the hon. member for Bothwell, he got along the edge of it and the fringe of it, whenever the opportunity offered.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. COWAN. The hon. gentleman knows that if Mr. Killacky did not do so in the federal contest, he did so in the last provincial contest in which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) was engaged. Mr. Killacky, as the hon. member for Bothwell knows, was the candidate of the Conservative party in 1891. Mr. Killacky was appointed on the 11th May to the position of assistant Collector of Customs at the port of Windsor. He was to take possession of his job on the 1st of June. He stumped for Mr. Ball, the opponent of the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell), and he stumped along the line of the constituency of Bothwell. If I mistake not, he was in the constituency of Bothwell. At all events, he derived advantage from the political work he did. Although he was to take possession of his job on the 1st of June, he did not take possession of it until the 25th of June; he was in that position only five days; but he filled out his pay-sheet for the full month, and hon. gentlemen opposite paid him for the services he rendered. If we are to submit in this country to Government officials going on the stump in the interest of a political party, working five days out of thirty, and then drawing full pay, then I say there will be great and serious disappointment from one end of this Dominion to another.

Mr. INGRAM. The hon. member for North Essex (Mr. McGregor) led this House to infer that the late Government discharged a number of Reform employees of the customs department in Windsor, for the purpose of putting Conservatives in their places. Now, I would like to draw the attention of this committee to a few facts. Mr. Chevalier, who was stationed at Belle River, is a strong Reformer, who never missed an opportunity of taking an active part on behalf of the Liberal candidate in Essex. This gentleman was taken from Belle River, and placed in the custom-house at Windsor at a higher salary. Mr. Watson was a customs employee at Windsor, and so was the other gentleman the hon. gentleman mentioned. He also referred to the case of a person who went from East Elgin to Windsor two or three years ago. As far as Mr. Yearsley is concerned, he has proven himself to be an efficient officer, and has given entire satisfaction to the department. The hon. gentleman must not accuse the Conservative Government of displacing Reformers, and putting Conservatives in their places. I simply rose to correct these statements, because they were unfair statements to make to the House, and not borne out by the facts.

Mr. DAVIN. I want to say a very few words in regard to this matter. It seems to be understood now that we have got thus far, that a man may hold strong opinions, he may vote, he may express those opinions in the strongest manner in private—

Mr. MCGREGOR. Not at all.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, we have had that laid down by high authority in the Government; but he must not on the public platform express himself offensively.

An hon. MEMBER. No, nor canvass.

Mr. DAVIN. In my own constituency up to the present time two men have been dismissed, though they have never taken the least part in politics. They have been faithful public servants; there is not a single charge against them of having taken a part in politics; and now that we know that a man may hold an opinion and vote, and if he takes no part in politics he is scathless in the eyes of hon. gentlemen opposite, I hope these two men will be re-appointed. Now, I want to say one or two words in regard to a case that has been referred to in this debate, and to call attention to an opinion given upon it by the hon. leader of the House. The charge against the translators who were dismissed in 1888 was that they had been guilty of personal and offensive language in regard to the Hon. Mr. Chapleau; and the hon. the present leader of the House (Mr. Laurier), who took an interest in those gentlemen, in the course of an eloquent speech which preceded the resolution in regard to them, laid down opinions which in my opinion are just. In describing the offence the hon. leader of the House said:

In fact, the complaint which was made against them is not in reference to their services as officers of this House, but the charge is that they went out of their proper sphere of action and grossly insulted some members of this House.

After reading the charge, the hon. gentleman said:

Now, I must say at once that it seems somewhat singular, and it is, I think, improper that officers of this House should be allowed to engage actively in politics. I have no hesitation at all in making that statement, but if these gentlemen declare that they took an active part in the political campaign, they also declare that in doing so they had the sanction of this House. They state that the House had appointed the translators of the debates—I am not yet speaking of the other officers of the House, but of the translators only—with the understanding that they should be allowed to take part, not only in political campaigns, but in active politics in all circumstances. This matter came up incidentally in 1884. At that time it was stated, without contradiction from any quarter, that the translators of the debates were permitted to be engaged in active journalism, and, therefore, to engage in politics.

Then he went on to refer to the position taken by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) when the question was discussed in 1884:

Mr. DAVIN.

On that occasion the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who was a member of the Debates Committee, spoke, I must say that the matter came up upon the question of increasing the salaries of the translators, and the hon. member for Norfolk stated that he was opposed to an increase of salaries, because the translators were actively engaged as newspaper correspondents. He said:

I felt myself that there was no justification for granting an advance to the translators, most of whom are here acting as newspaper correspondents, and would be here whether they held translators' situations or not.

Later on in the course of the same speech, the hon. leader of the House distinguished, and very properly distinguished, between the position of the reporters and the position of the translators:

The official reporters stand in a completely different position from the official translators, because the reporters have been made permanent officers of the House and they cannot engage in any other work; their services are at the disposal of the Government after the session, and their appointment expressly says so; but the translators are appointed to translate the debates and nothing else, and no one knows better than the hon. gentleman, who is Chairman of the Debates Committee, that it was always understood that during a part of the session they could engage in any other work they choose to engage in. Therefore, there is no parallel between the two classes of officers.

On another occasion, the reference to which I have not at hand at present, but which I distinctly remember, the hon. gentleman differentiated the position of the translators entirely from the position of the reporters, holding that the former were free to do what they chose outside of the session. I cannot find the reference at present, but I have a distinct recollection of the statement, and at some other time, if this question should come up, I shall be able to find it. As this illustration has been referred to by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron), I thought it would be just as well to put before the House what the charge was, and also the position taken by the leader of the House on that question. Let me repeat what I think it is of very great importance to the public service and the country at large that we should have a principle laid down on which public officials are to act, and according to which they are to be treated. When a Government lays down certain principles of action to be followed in the management of the various departments, there should be no exceptions to the rules of conduct thus laid down. In my own constituency, two humble men, one a teamster and a man who took no part in politics whatever, but who was, I believe, a Conservative, and who, I have a strong impression, voted for me—

Mr. SOMERVILLE. If he did, he saved your election.

Mr. DAVIN. Therefore, I should be doubly grateful to him; but the man never took any part in politics or on the platform, and never canvassed. And in the case of Mr. Lambert, to whom I referred the other day, he also never canvassed or took any part in politics; and so I hope that with regard to these two men, the rules laid down by hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches, will be followed out. Speaking generally, I think the opinions which fell from the Finance Minister, are opinions that commend themselves to gentlemen on this side of the House, and it would be well if those enlightened views are carried out. The vengeful spirit shown by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Somerville) lent wings to his eloquence. I have often heard the hon. gentleman in his dithyrambic moods in this House, but never heard him rise to such an imperial flight as he rose to when calling for vengeance on these unfortunate men. I hope that no such appeals as these will be listened to by the Government. No doubt, after such a fight as we have had, hon. gentlemen may find it difficult to turn a deaf ear to such appeals, but I would recall to them what was said by their leader, when he was at the head of the Opposition, and when the case of the French translators was under discussion. I remember the hon. gentleman making an appeal to the then Secretary of State (Mr. Chapleau) not to be carried away by the spirit of vengeance, and not to let such a spirit guide his ministerial conduct.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken, referred to the fact that two of his supporters had been dismissed from office. I wish to call attention to the fact that the Minister of Public Works intimated to that gentleman that these men had been dismissed from office because there was no work for them to do. If the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) supposes that the new Government is going to keep in its employ men who have no work to do, he is very much mistaken. Does he want this country, to pay for the services of men for whom the Government cannot find employment? The hon. gentleman has no ground whatever for complaint, and it is wrong, on his part, to ask the Government to retain men in their service for whom they have no work.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman has misrepresented my position and also what the Minister of Public Works did say. What the Minister of Public Works said was that he dismissed Lambert, under the impression that there was no work for him to do, but I understood him to take this position, that he would inquire into the circumstances, and, if he had dismissed Lambert under a mistaken impression, he would restore him. In regard to the other case, that of a man named Young, he was not in the Public Works Department at all, but in the Department of Interior, and he was dismissed on the morrow of the election, and a member of the Liberal party put in his stead.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think it would have been well had the Opposition accepted the statement made by the hon. Premier, a few days ago, that he would deal generously with the members of the civil service. But we can see that, no matter how generously he may deal with the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite, he is to be attacked and misrepresented, as he has been by my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Davin). The hon. Minister, the other evening, told him that the man he had referred to had been dismissed because there was nothing for him to do, and he added that if, on inquiry, it was found that injustice had been done, he would do what was right. Could anything be more frank and satisfactory? But to-night the hon. gentleman takes up a long time in referring to this dismissal.

Mr. DAVIN. I was just referring to it, and am quite satisfied with the position as it is at present.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Hon. gentlemen opposite cannot expect the Premier and his followers to be more than human. With the statement made by the First Minister that he did not intend that anybody should be dismissed without good cause, they ought to be perfectly satisfied. This discussion has gone so far that, if we were to follow the precedent laid down by the late Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), there would be very few members of the civil service left. It may be true, for all I know, that there was some sufficient reason for dismissing the four men in North Essex: but I must say, to use the hon. gentleman's own language, it is very peculiar that the only four men in the county of Essex who were Liberals, should happen to be dismissed. And the statement of the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. McGregor) that there was no investigation and no opportunity given them to defend themselves and that they were men of good character, who attended to their duties, their dismissal seems still more peculiar. It will be hard to convince any one that they were dismissed for any other reason than because they were Liberals, or suspected of leaning in that direction. When the present leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) took office, in 1878, he declared that he could not take the responsibility of holding the position he did, unless he dismissed from office the leading men on the Intercolonial. Any person must feel that a Minister taking charge of a great department as the hon. gentleman the present leader of the Opposition did at that time, if he had not confidence that he had the loyalty of the men holding the highest positions in his department and in connection with the great public works, would almost be justified probably in making the change which he stated he had to do before he could conduct the department to his satisfaction. And I am sure the members of the Opposition must feel, after several days discussion of this matter and after the Ministers have declared that they are anxious and willing that every man in the service, from the Deputy Minister to the lowest in the department, should have an opportunity of proving his faithfulness and loyalty to them that the subject has been exhausted. They do not take the position taken by the leader of the Opposition at the time I have referred to and declare that they will summarily dismiss these men because they happen to be members of a party to which they do not belong. With regard to this matter, we have the evidence, which has been made public in Ottawa during the last few days and which is probably taken more notice of than what anybody in this House may with regard to the subject. We found representatives of the great labour organization in their meetings publicly declaring in regard to this matter that they wished every man in the employment of the Government should have an opportunity of defending himself if a charge was made against him. That is only fair. They went further, these men who included in their ranks both Conservatives and Liberals—a majority of them Conservatives probably—and representing 6,000 or 7,000 of the workingmen of Canada. They said they had no defence to offer for officials in high positions who were guilty of interfering with the men voting as they wished to vote. If that is the position of the representatives of the railway organizations themselves, hon. gentlemen opposite ought to be satisfied with the generous treatment these officials are receiving from the leader of the Government and his colleagues, for it is well known to every man on either side of this House that prominent officials did take a very active part in influencing the votes of the men. These men knew it themselves, and that is the reason they in their councils referred to this matter and declared that they did not desire to defend leading officials who undertook to coerce or influence improperly the votes of the men under them. And I think that every true Canadian must be inspired with the same feeling, that every man, no matter what his position may be, has the right to exercise his franchise freely without influence from those who are in official position over him. I think that those who do seek thus to influence Canadian citizens ought to be punished. After the declarations of these men and after the declaration of the Premier the other night, it seems to me unfortunate that we should spend hour after hour and day after day over such trifling matters. The Premier made a declaration. It was time enough to find fault and criticize and misrepresent and abuse this gentleman and his colleagues when he had failed to carry out the declarations he made to Parliament and to the country. The hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe

Mr. SUTHERLAND.

Caron) said he did not want us to follow American precedents in these matters. I quite agree with that sentiment. I think the Government would be quite justified in taking the precedent of the Conservative party while in power. If hon. gentlemen opposite would agree to that, we might put an end to the discussion. But I do not think that they are anxious that this Government should follow that precedent. For my part, I think it would be unfair, as I have said, to treat the members of the civil service so harshly. It would not be just to many men in the service who have conducted themselves properly. I agree with what has previously been said that those officers who have taken an active and improper and offensive part in politics must take the consequences. I cannot for a moment agree with the declarations made here that the Government party is in a different position from the Opposition. I contend that when the Parliament is dissolved all the candidates in the constituency, no matter which side they are on are equal, and the man who is being paid out of the taxes of the people has no more right to abuse a man on one side than he has to abuse a man on the other side. Parliament having been dissolved the candidates of the Government of the past have no better standing, so far as the civil service is concerned than those who happen to be running in the interest of a previous Parliament. I feel that in the interest of all these gentlemen who hold these positions—and I suppose the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite hold ninety-five per cent of them—it would be better that an opportunity should be given to the Government to carry out the policy that has been declared by the leader rather than to bring about by recrimination and improper attacks a feeling that I would not like to see existing in this country between the party in power and the members of the civil service.

Mr. FOSTER. I think it would be a pity, if, after this lengthy discussion, preceded as it was by consideration of the question of dismissals a few days ago, we should not get somewhere where we could understand each other and understand thoroughly the principle which is to be adopted in these matters. All that we want, I think, is that there should be definiteness and uniformity. This discussion has been with regard to the officers of the House, who occupy a different position in this respect from the general membership of the civil service. We had statements from different prominent members and from his honour the Speaker with reference to the principle to be followed with reference to this business. Now, any one listening dispassionately and calmly must have noticed that there was not uniformity in the enunciation of the principles upon which the practice is to be based, and that, in the next place, there is not a definiteness such as would put an end to the discussion and let every man know just about the principle which is to be carried out. The confusion is in the minds of some hon. gentlemen themselves. Take my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. He read a statement made by Sir Charles Tupper some years ago as to the principle which would actuate him and which did actuate him and actuated the Government of which he was a member in making certain dismissals. In that statement—I call the hon. Minister's attention to this fact—two principles were laid down. One was that a civil servant should not be allowed to denounce the Government of the day. I am not going to make any distinction between his denouncing the Government of the day or denouncing the Opposition of the day. But he went on a platform and denounced one of the political parties. Now, the second element that ran through it was that he not only denounced them, which in itself has an element of violence, but he was also offensive in his canvass. Now, the Minister of Finance said: There is a rule, it was laid down in 1878 by Sir Charles Tupper. That is the very thing we are arguing for, and upon which we propose to proceed to-night. But before he sat down the hon. gentleman undertook to lay down the practice which should actuate him, and departed from that rule in both particulars. Whilst he assented to that as a theory, when he laid down the rule of practice it was this, that he would allow a man to vote, but a man should not canvass, and a man should not go upon the platform nor express his opinions publicly with reference to either party, whether he was entirely guiltless of denouncing anybody, or whether he was perfectly void of anything like offensive language. Now, everybody sees that these two cases are as wide apart as possible.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not at all, they are on all fours.

Mr. FOSTER. I state again that the principle we contend for is this, that a civil servant is first of all a citizen of this country, and has a right of citizenship. We have not by law or by practice robbed a citizen of his rights when we have given him a salary to do the country's work, whether for the whole year or a short period. A citizen, to be a full and perfect citizen, ought to have opinions of his own, and he ought to be free to express them. The statement of Sir Charles Tupper was that this man's opinions were not only expressed, but they were expressed in denunciation of a party, and expressed offensively. Now, is there not every difference between those cases? The leader of the Government shakes his head as if in negation of that sentiment. Let me state a concrete example. Here are two men, both citizens and both civil servants. Both hold their opinions from a party point of view with reference to the best policy of the country to pursue, as every good citizen ought to hold. One of these men goes about his business, performs his work to the perfect satisfaction of the state. He holds his opinion as to the best policy in the interest of the country, and expresses that opinion as a gentleman should, in his private conversation, in his public conversation, in letters that he may write, and in speeches that he may make, and he does that without offence.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Without offence, does he?

Mr. FOSTER. What does my hon. friend find fault with?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That when an official, as I know dozens of them, at the head of a department undertakes to express opinion in that way, he consciously and knowingly influences the votes and opinions of the large body of subordinates who are under him, and he does it for the purpose of influencing them.

Mr. FOSTER. I am going on with my argument. I suppose that when any citizen holds an opinion, he has a right to express it, and in so far as the weight of his opinion and the scope of his expression go, he influences his fellow-citizens. I suppose that a man who is an officer of a Government has a right to do the same. I am talking of a man who expresses his opinion in a manly, honest, courteous and calm way, without denouncing anybody and without in any way being offensive.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Or intended to influence the election?

Mr. FOSTER. Why, how can a citizen express his opinion unless it is intended to have its effect?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That is it.

Mr. FOSTER. You must not take away that primary right of a good citizen of the state simply because the state employs him to do certain work for it.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. As in the case of a judge?

Mr. FOSTER. We have argued that, and my hon. friend knows that there is no analogy at all between the case of a judge and others. Why does not my friend and his Government pass a law to have every civil servant put in the same position as a judge, and disqualified to vote? They do not do it, consequently they do not hold that opinion. Now, I have tried to describe one person. Here is another civil servant who holds his opinion just as strongly, and goes upon a public platform to express it, writes letters, talks to his friends. But in doing that he is violent, he denounces the party whose policy he does not believe in, and does it in an offensive manner. Does my hon. friend the leader of the Government say there is no difference between these two men ?

The PRIME MINISTER. A difference in degree, that is all.

Mr. FOSTER. Then I have my hon. friend receding from his position of negation, and saying there is a difference in degree. Now, my contention is, and I think it was the contention of Sir Charles Tupper in 1878, that the dismissal took place then because the man denounced one of the parties of that day, and did it offensively. He comes under the second category and not under the first. Now, are we to understand that the Government are going to take the policy laid down by my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), whom I do not see present, who held the opinion that not only had a civil servant a right to hold an opinion, but he had a perfect right to express it.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. What are you thinking about ?

Mr. FOSTER. Because there is no unanimity on that side of the House. If the dictum of the member for Guysborough was taken, that a man has a right to his opinion and to express it—

Mr. McMULLEN. By marking his ballot.

Mr. FOSTER. That was not the expression of the hon. member for Guysborough, that was not the meaning he intended to convey. If the dictum of the member for Guysborough is subscribed to by the hon. gentlemen opposite, then we have nothing more to say.

Mr. FLINT. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman what is his opinion of a civil servant who joins a political committee and canvasses during the election against either party ?

Mr. FOSTER. I can easily answer that question, because I stand upon a certain principle, namely, that you ought not to depose a man from his citizen's rights so long as he does the duty properly which the state puts upon him, and carries out the duty of a citizen decorously and temperately in expressing his opinion, and I say that he has a right to enforce his opinion by talking to his neighbours. That is the answer, and it flows directly from a principle. If you do not stand on principle, of course you cannot answer the question.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Does my hon. friend say that the Conservative party have acted on that principle ?

Mr. FOSTER. I say that that is the line upon which Sir Charles Tupper's statement went explicitly.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Does my hon. friend claim that the Conservative party have acted upon that principle during the later years of their rule ?

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, I do.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Well, I am amazed.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, it does not take much to amaze my hon. friend.

Mr. LISTER. It is your ox that is now being gored.

Mr. FOSTER. It does not depend upon whose ox is gored. I say that is the rule that was laid down in 1878, and it is the rule upon which the Conservative Government has acted. Hon. gentleman may find an occasional instance in which that rule appears to have been violated. But there are two sides to every case, and one man's statement does not dispose of the case from an ex-parte point of view. Now, with reference to the case that is before us, we have not the least evidence that Mr. Béchard, or any other of those sessional clerks went beyond a fair and courteous expression of opinion on the public questions of the day. Mr. Speaker has heard the case, and has decided that he should be dismissed, but he has not given the evidence to the committee. While we have every desire to agree with the judgment of Mr. Speaker, he is yet one man, and it is not unfair that the speech upon which the hon. gentleman decided his action, the substance of which he thinks was objectionable and which he used as a reason and a cause for the dismissal of the man, should be presented to the House. Why should it not be presented ? It does not mean that we do not believe in the judgment of Mr. Speaker ; but this man Béchard is an officer of the House, and the evidence on which he was dismissed at present lies in the breast of Mr. Speaker and is not known to members of the committee. It is not unreasonable that the speech complained of should be laid before the House, so that this committee may know on what kind of evidence he was dismissed. If we could come to an understanding, in five minutes time the leader of the Government could dispose of this question so far as the principle is concerned. He could state it to this House definitely.

Mr. MCGREGOR. Don't you do it.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman feels dubious ; he does not like the leader of the Opposition to go into the matter.

Mr. MCGREGOR. We want to treat you exactly as you treated us, neither more nor less.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The hon. gentleman has stated that he wishes evidence with regard to the language used by Mr. Béchard in the speech in question. I should like to ask if there was any evidence offered with respect to the speeches delivered by the translators who were dismissed because they were offensive to Mr. Chapleau? I remember the circumstances, and there was no statement made as to the language used by those men, but there was only the statement that they were offensive to Mr. Chapleau. If there was no evidence required then, how is it that the ex-Finance Minister requires evidence at this time? He was quite ready to vote at that time that the men should be dismissed; now he wants evidence.

Mr. MCGREGOR. Béchard was working in the constituency for six weeks.

Mr. FOSTER. My recollection in regard to circumstances connected with the dismissal of certain translators is not perhaps so fresh as that of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Somerville), who may have looked over the record; but I imagine if the matter is looked into, it will be found that there was a conclusive statement made.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The statement of Mr. Chapleau.

Mr. FOSTER. The words themselves were heard and were stated to the House. To-night we have not a single word stated that is alleged to have been uttered. We have nothing but that Mr. Speaker saw a speech, from the substance of which he thought it was sufficient to cause dismissal, and he consequently dismissed the man.

Mr. SPEAKER. I did not say I had read any speech. I was told that this clerk had delivered a speech. I asked if a speech had been delivered and as to its character, and Béchard admitted that he had on a public platform at the last elections opposed, on the school question, the men who represents that county in this House, and that is why I thought he should be dismissed.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, we have got down to something that is clear. The principle on which Mr. Speaker acted is this, that if it is stated to him, and that statement gains his belief, that a man has opened his mouth on a public platform and opposed the policy of a certain party or upheld the policy of another party, that is evidence sufficient in his mind, without taking into account the character of the speech, to dismiss the man.

Mr. SPEAKER. That is very nearly my view. I did not, however, say a speech for one political party or for another; but I hold for a public officer to take part in a political campaign against candidates for this House, whether rightly or wrongly, unfit that officer to serve this House.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no desire to misrepresent the hon. gentleman, but I simply wish to get at the facts of the case. Stripped of all its verbiage, is not the statement this—that it was made evident to Mr. Speaker, and was afterwards admitted by the man himself, that the man had gone upon the platform and had explained his views with respect to the school question—

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). He made a political speech.

Mr. FOSTER. And those views were in opposition to the candidate who is the present member.

Mr. MCGREGOR. He canvassed the constituency, from house to house, for six weeks.

Mr. FOSTER. Is not that a fair statement of the position?

Mr. SPEAKER. I have made my statement distinctly two or three times.

Mr. FOSTER. So I think Mr. Speaker agrees to that. Béchard had strong views, or certain views at least upon the Manitoba school question.

Mr. MCGREGOR. And on every other question.

Mr. FOSTER. We are taking the evidence that Mr. Speaker has given to the committee. Béchard appeared on a public platform, and expressed his views. Those views were not in accord with the views advocated by the candidate who is at the present time member for that county. On that state of facts being made known to Mr. Speaker, he decided that Béchard should be dismissed.

An hon. MEMBER. He was right.

Mr. FOSTER. The principle on which he has proceeded is this: that whenever a person in the employ of the Government, whether partially or for every day of the year, goes on a public platform and expresses his views on any public question which is in dispute at the time, he is to be dismissed from the service. My hon. friend the Prime Minister nods his approval of that doctrine. The simple thing to be given to a civil servant is to vote and to keep quiet.

Mr. LAURIER. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, we have it plainly and clearly that the Prime Minister and the Liberal party intend to go on this principle, that henceforth and so long as they have power, every civil servant in this country who has done anything more than simply vote and vote quietly is liable to be dismissed from his office. That is the statement. I thank my hon. friend for having come down at last to what is clear and definite. I have no hesitation in saying that I dissent from that principle and any practice founded on that principle, and I do it because it is not treating the civil servant fairly as a citizen of this country. The hon. gentleman takes that view. He is going to carry out that policy, and I leave his policy and his views with the country. They will be discussed and widely discussed. I simply state my dissent from them, and I say on behalf of the civil service and good citizenship that that is not a principle which the Liberal party should adopt and endeavour to carry out in this country or in any other. The principles of Liberalism as I have read them :

Mr. SOMERVILLE. What do you know about them ?

Mr. FOSTER. I have not boasted every other hour that I am a Liberal of the old school, and of the English school, but I think I do understand, by reading and by experience of Liberal principles, and also of Liberal practice. But for Liberals who believe in the freedom of the individual and in the freedom of the citizens of the state—for them to apply the gag rule to every citizen who takes a dollar in the employ of the country, and for them to tell such a man : You must be mum ; you can vote, if you like, but you shall be a mere cypher in the body politic ; you must not express your views—for them to lay down that principle is certainly extraordinary. Under that rule, any one who happened to whisper to his neighbour that he thought one policy was right and the other policy wrong, leaves himself liable to dismissal. That is the rule that the hon. gentlemen wish to have adopted, and they do it because the great body of that compelling cloud which started from Vancouver about the same time as the hon. gentleman from Nanaimo (Mr. McInnes), is coming onwards to Ottawa, demanding that it should have its share of offices. That compelling cloud has already begun to gather in this city. It is close to the Ministers. It is behind them and about them every day that they live, and they felt that they are not powerful enough to stand on a broad, comprehensive principle, but that they must give way to the compelling cloud which is close by.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The case that we have before us is the case of a man named Béchard. He was an employee of this House, but he was not a permanent employee. It is admitted that he took part in political contests, and that he made a speech.

Mr. MCGREGOR. Yes, and canvassed.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That is a clear case. My hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) has just said that he belonged to the English Liberal school—

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I thought he wanted to be that.

Mr. FOSTER. I must correct my hon. friend. It was the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) who sits in front of him, who I said was the one to proclaim that he belonged to the Liberal school, to the old English Liberal school. But my hon. friend the Premier, in 1884, had very strong language to say about men—

Mr. FOSTER.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order,

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman had very strong language to use about men who were not born Liberals ; for he declared his sentiment, that no man who was not born a Liberal could be a good Liberal.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Whatever may be the school of my hon. friend (Mr. Foster), the facts of this case are very clear. We have before us the case of a man who has admittedly taken part in a political contest. We have heard a great deal about the practice of this and of that party. Perhaps it would have been well, at the beginning of this debate, to look a little into what the book says on this subject. A man may be a great man in the opinion of some hon. gentlemen, but I take it that the books and the authorities are not, after all, very bad things to look at. Well, Sir, what is the law on this subject ?

Mr. FOSTER. It is generally made by men.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, and able men at times. If you look at Todd, vol. I., page 612, you read as follows :

The most important rule of modern times in regard to the civil servants of the Crown is that whereby they have been divided into two classes political and non-political, of which the former is supreme and the latter subordinate. Speaking of the latter class, namely, the non-political officers of the Crown, Todd says :

Their exclusion from the political arena is the price they pay for their tenure of office, being virtually that of good behaviour.

I do not want to weary the House by a long speech, but it seems to me that the quotations I have read, and the one or two quotations which I intend to read, are the clearest evidence that my hon. friends on the other side of the House have been wrong in this matter from the very start. We have discussed this question on two or three occasions, and hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have laid down the rule that a public officer can take part in a political contest, provided he is not offensive. Well, Sir, what does the authority say about that interference ? At page 630, Todd says :

But while every Government must necessarily possess the abstract right of dismissing any of its servants who may hold their offices during pleasure whenever they consider that such a step is required by the exigencies of the public service, it has nevertheless been recognized as a rule that persons holding non-political offices under the Crown should only be dismissed for incompetence or misconduct. Dismissals on other grounds are highly objectionable and inexpedient, more especially if they spring from political considerations. Doubtless an active interference in politics, on the part of a non-political office-holder, would be a case of "misconduct" sufficient to justify his dismissal.

Now, listen again, Sir, because the word "offensive" has been used a great deal in this debate :

It is a well understood rule of constitutional government that all such functionaries should abstain from taking an active part in a political contest observing a strict neutrality therein.

Is there anything clearer under the sun than that—"observing a strict neutrality?" Sir, it seems to me that, when a man makes up his mind to go into the public service, he should also at the same time make up his mind that he is not going to be a politician. As far as I myself am concerned, I must say that I entertain most liberal views on that question ; but, if the views that have been offered on the other side of the House were going to be put into operation, I am very much afraid that not many of the civil servants of the day could be consistently kept in office by us. I have found in my department—I have the written evidence of it ; I have the clearest evidence that nearly every one of my employees has been, to a large extent, active political partisans. Partisan may not be the word. I mean to say that nearly every one of my employees has interfered ; but I want to draw a broad distinction. I know that a great many of the civil servants have been obliged to interfere against their will. With these men I have no quarrel. I have evidence that men in high places have gone to my department, and have insisted on my employees doing things against which their feelings have revolted, but which they were obliged to do. For instance, what did I find ? I found that $500 had been charged to dredging in the city of Ottawa. I said, "How is this ? What dredging has taken place in the city of Ottawa ?" I inquired into the case, and I found that a man high in position had gone to my department and insisted that a number of men should be employed at any cost ; and that so-called dredging was simply the removal of a small building, which you may see to-morrow morning if you like. I have no quarrel with my employees as to that, because they were ordered to do it. But I say this—and the House, I am sure, will agree with me—that a public employee who takes the stump without having received any orders from the Minister, and makes himself obnoxious, has no right to expect, if the political power against which he has fought comes to power, to be retained in office. Although I must add immediately, speaking for myself alone, that perhaps on many occasions it would not be wise to dismiss men who have interfered in politics. There are able men in the civil service who may have made mistakes. My hon. friends opposite have been long in power ; I have been pretty long with them myself ; and public employees have been brought up in the idea that they were free to interfere. To-night we have heard my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance stating that they were perfectly free to interfere. Well, Sir, drawing the line between what is fair and what is not fair, I say that this Government is prepared to deal liberally but at the same time fairly with the public service. I hope that the civil service will not take the law from my hon. friend. It would be a great mistake on their part to do so. We are prepared to deal liberally with them, but we expect to be served loyally by them. I speak the more freely on this point, because in my own department I have no complaint to make so far. Allow me to say one word more. It seems to me that each Minister should have some discretion. The manager of a great corporation, when he takes charge of its work, makes changes. Take, for instance, the case of Mr. Hays, who has been entrusted with the administration of the Grand Trunk Railway. He has made changes, and it seems to me that a Minister of the Crown should at least have the same liberty. How can I be held responsible to Parliament for my administration if I am not free to choose my own servants ? I could read the book again to show that this is the law. The Ministers should be free to choose their own employees. In that choice they must of course be guided by the English rules, which my hon. friends opposite should adopt. My hon. friends are not doing to-day what they should do. They are trying to raise the feeling of the civil servants against us. It is not fair. If the civil servants were to take the cue from them, there would be a kind of revolution in our public service—a revolution which we should not desire, because, as I have said, we have a great number of good public servants. I would not have taken any part in this too long debate had it not been for the unholy rules that have been propounded on the other side of the House. The civil service, if it is going to be efficient, must be independent of both political parties ; it must belong to the House and to the country, and not to one political party.

Mr. McNEILL. I have heard with very great pleasure very much of what has fallen from the hon. Minister of Public Works. I think he has expressed himself very fairly from many points of view. But there is one consideration that I would like to impress upon the minds of the Government with regard to this matter. It is this : that when the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat says that the members of the civil service have been taught to believe that they may take reasonable part in politics, he gives away, in my opinion any excuse there might be for dismissing men who have taken part in politics inoffensively. If the hon. Minister says, as he did say, that the present members of the civil service have been taught by the Conservative party that they may take a reasonable part in politics, then I say as he himself has said, that surely it would be a very harsh thing and a very unfair thing to dismiss those men for doing not only what there is no rule against their doing, but what they have been taught for eighteen years they were at liberty to do. I am glad to see the Minister of Public Works bow his head in acquiescence with what I say. In view of the fact that there has been in this country no distinct rule whatever notifying the civil servants that they had not a right to take a reasonable part in politics, to dismiss any civil servant because he did take an inoffensive part in politics would be a great act of injustice.

Mr. LISTER. Inoffensive ?

Mr. McNEILL. I used the word inoffensive because a distinction has been drawn by the hon. Minister of Public Works between the case of a man who modestly, quietly and inoffensively expresses his views on politics, and the case of a man who loudly, abusively and offensively takes part. I simply put the thing from the point of view of British fair-play and justice, and I ask hon. gentlemen opposite to endeavour to place themselves in the same position as that of a civil servant, who has, for eighteen years, been lead to believe that he might take a part in politics without doing anything to endanger his position.

Mr. LISTER. He was badly informed.

Mr. McNEILL. It does not matter whether he was or not, it was the information he had, and I agree with the hon. Minister of Public Works in considering that this is a matter which ought very strongly to weigh with the Government. There never has been in this country any such rule as that quoted from Todd, namely, that civil servants are not allowed to interfere in politics. That quotation from Todd, therefore, is altogether wide of the mark. If the Government, or both sides of the House, determine that civil servants should take no part in politics whatever, and that they should not even vote, well and good, let it be so understood. If, on the other hand, it is understood that they may vote and do nothing more, that they must be careful even in expressing their opinion to their neighbours on political matters, let it be so understood. Let it be understood that a civil servant is not to open his lips on politics, and that, if he does and it is brought to the notice of the Government, he will receive his dismissal. But it is difficult to draw a line in the matter. From my point of view, I think that, from the views that have been expressed by hon. gentlemen opposite, by far the best thing to do, in the interests of the civil service, would be to say that they could not vote and should take no part in politics whatever. Short of that, I do not see how any civil servant is to be safe, if the rule which some gentlemen, sitting behind the

Mr. McNEILL.

Government, on the back benches, have urged, is to be put in practice.

Mr. FLINT. Has the hon. gentleman heard any hon. gentleman on this side of the House, from the beginning of the debate to this moment, say that civil servants should not be at full liberty to express their views privately on any occasion whatever ?

Mr. McNEILL. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman what he means by privately. Are the civil servants to go round privately from house to house and discuss privately with those they know, what ought to be done in the coming election ?

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The last speaker said that the Government had educated the civil servants for the past eighteen years into the belief that they had a right to take part in elections.

Mr. McNEILL. I did not make any such statement. I said that the Minister of Public Works had said so.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. It is a fact that for the last eighteen years civil servants have been educated by hon. gentlemen opposite to believe that they had a right to take part in the discussion of public questions on the platform and in the press ; but, while these hon. gentlemen permitted their followers to take that course, they insisted that the Liberals should not express their opinion on public platforms under any circumstances. The hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) shakes his head, but I can bring to his recollection one instance which proves the correctness of my statement. He will remember that, when the late Sir John Macdonald led the House, Mr. Ratté, an official of this House, made speeches in Carleton, and Sir John Macdonald discharged him as soon as he discovered that he had done so. It is all right for the Conservatives to maintain that civil servants shall have the right to speak, and write, and act against the Liberals, but when they come to find out that a civil servant has exercised the privilege of going on the platform and speaking on behalf of the Liberal party, then the leader of the Conservatives is the first man to kick him out. I do not believe it is well to say that we are justified in doing a certain thing because men on the opposite side did the same in former years. I do not rest my case on that at all, but I say that the interests of the public and of the civil servants themselves is that they should be prevented from taking such action ; and I hold that the man who speaks in favour of the Government, has just as much right to be suspended as if he spoke in favour of the Opposition. I agree with the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), that it would be a good thing for the civil service of this country, if they were not even permitted to vote. I know that there is a large number of civil servants in Ottawa who would prefer not to vote at all, just for the reason stated a few moments ago by the Minister of Public Works. They have been compelled to vote to keep the late Government in power for years, against the desire and opinion of many of them that it was high time they were turned out of office. They were driven to support the late Government because they were afraid their positions would be lost if they did not. I think that the civil service will understand, after this debate is closed, that they must, whether Liberals or Conservatives, keep their skirts entirely free from any discussion in public with regard to one party or another, and they will then be in a position better than now to discharge the duties of their office. I certainly think it would be better if they had no vote at all.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not at all wish to suggest that a civil servant should be dismissed for anything he might say on the platform. It may be that the person to whom he referred made himself an offensive partisan.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think it is only right that I should say to the committee, before the item carries, a word with reference to the speech of the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Cowan). He made a very forcible speech on entirely erroneous information. Not only do I challenge the accuracy of the information upon which he bases his attack upon my administration of the Marine Department, but I also desire to resent the very serious reflection upon his predecessor (Mr. Allan), who never lifted once his voice, that I remember, on behalf of Mr. Girardin, or attacked the late inspector of fisheries, Mr. Kerr. I think it was, of being drunk on duty. That was stated across the floor by the hon. member (Mr. Cowan) for the first time; and, on behalf of my predecessor, as well as on my own behalf, I wish to challenge the information on which the hon. gentleman based his rather heated statement.

Mr. TAYLOR. I hope there will be no charge made from one side of the House against the other of having obstructed business, for I think this debate has been about equally divided. I merely wish to say that when, fourteen years ago, I came to this House, I found here an officer of the House whom, I am sorry to say, we do not see here to-day. That gentleman was, in my opinion, and, I think, in the opinion of every member of this House, a servant who rendered valuable services to the members of this House, and whose absence to-day puts us all to considerable inconvenience. I refer to the tonsorial artist, Mr. Napoleon Audette. I think he was employed as a messenger, but had his quarters below, in the lower part of this building. He is not there to-day, and I would like to know for what reason he has been removed. I never heard of his having spoken on a public platform or taken part, offensively or otherwise, in an election.

Mr. McMULLEN. He shaved too close.

Mr. TAYLOR. I know I have to go away down town to get him to perform the shaving operation upon myself, and, while there, I see members of the other side of the House there as well. I believe that every hon. member regarded him as one of the best officers of the House, and everybody had a good word for him. I would like to know why he has been removed and why somebody else has been put in his place, as I understand to be the case, although I have not been down to see, because I have followed my friend Napoleon to his quarters down town, at considerable inconvenience to myself.

Mr. CLANCY. I wish to make an explanation, in view of what has been said. The Government of the day have laid down the rule that any civil servant who engages in election contests is unfit for a position in the service. I wish to call the attention of the Government to the case of Mr. Cloutier, who has taken the place formerly occupied by Mr. Béchard. I desire to call attention to the fact that Mr. Cloutier was an active partisan and spoke against the late Government, as I contend he had a right to do, and he was appointed for the very reason that he was a partisan.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman will allow me to say that if statements of that kind concerning Mr. Cloutier, now that he has been appointed, come to my knowledge and are proven, he will be dismissed.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would like an answer to my question.

Mr. SPEAKER. The gentleman is not a sessional clerk, and the question will come up more properly in another item.

Estimate of Serjeant-at-Arms as approved .....$33,832 50

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I wish to take this opportunity to draw attention to this matter of the messengers. I understand that the approval in regard to this matter rests with the Speaker of the House. I had the pleasure of nominating a messenger from the county of Cumberland, from Advocate Harbour. I speak of Mr. Edson Morris, a young man, and son of a very respectable farmer in that place. I am quite sure that every member of the House who has come in contact with Mr. Morris will say that his duties were discharged in a very efficient, attentive and courteous manner. Members will recollect that he occupied the position at the doors of the Speaker's apartments. Of course I was absent for a long time while he continued to perform his duties here, but I recognized him at once as the person at the door of the Speaker's apartments, and he must be well known, therefore, to hon. members. He received this note, dated 14th July, 1896 :

I am directed to inform you that unless notified to the contrary, your services as sessional messenger will not be required at the approaching session of Parliament.

Yours truly,
L. DUBE,
Chief Messenger.

I wish to know by what authority the chief messenger of this House, whose salary is now under the notice of the committee, on the 14th July, before the Speaker of this House was elected, notified an officer of the House who had performed his duties in a satisfactory manner that he was not to come here. I do not go into the question whether Mr. Morris supported the late member for the county of Cumberland (Mr. Dickey) or not. It may be that if he had a vote he gave it to Mr. Dickey, but I am quite sure that it would be done in a quiet, orderly and civil way. I am satisfied he took no active part in the election.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think I can explain to the House exactly how that occurred and can show that it was a proper thing to do. A letter of that kind was written to all the sessional messengers I believe, on that day. At that time the messengers of the House—the whole staff of messengers and pages—were under the control of the Serjeant-at-Arms, alone, as there was no Speaker. I happened to be in Ottawa at that time. It had been mentioned in the press that I was likely to be the Speaker of the House. The chief messenger and the Serjeant-at-Arms mentioned to me that it was the practice to send a notice of that kind out at the opening of new Parliaments. Here is a copy of the notice that was so sent on the 2nd March, 1874, at the opening of the new Parliament :

Sir,—I am directed to inform you that you are not required to attend as messenger unless ordered to do so. By order.

Your obedient servant,
A. LEROUX CARDINAL,
Chief Messenger.

I find that the practice was repeated on the 14th January, 1879, in these words :

Sir,—I am directed to inform you that unless notified to the contrary, your services as sessional messenger will not be required at the approaching session of Parliament.

Yours truly,
D. W. McDONNELL,
Serjeant-at-Arms.

Now, this notice was shown to me unofficially ; but the Serjeant who was responsible for the matter, I suppose out of courtesy, told me that he had been in the habit of doing it, that he had authorized it to be done and approved it : "By Order, Approved, Henry R. Smith, Serjeant-at-Arms." That is the notice sent out by Mr. Dubé on the 14th July. Although I had no voice or control in the matter any more than any other member in the House, I thought the reason he gave a very good one, namely, that it would be a pity for all these messengers to come up here unless they were going to be re-employed. He said he had been in the habit of doing it, and that is the reason he did it. I think he was wise in doing it. I thought so then, and I think so now. Now while speaking about that, I want to say that when I became Speaker, one of the very first things I had to do was to see that the staff of messengers and the staff of pages were at once put in good shape. I took up the matter and spent a great deal of time and pains in carrying that out. I felt the importance of it, and I carefully took advice in every individual case of the old men who were on the list, and the elder boys who were on the list of pages. I consulted with the Serjeant, who is the responsible officer of this House, and with the head messenger, and the head pages, as to the fitness and qualifications of the subordinates, and I acted upon their advice. I nominated some twenty-one of the old messengers, and I think eleven of the old pages, and I think I have selected a staff which is exceedingly efficient. It has been so reported to me. As to the messengers, and as to these boys in this Chamber, I hope the hon. members will find that they are going to have a very good service. Of course in the case of the pages, a great many boys become too old to be reappointed. Some two or three of them that were here last year, from my personal knowledge were not efficient, and they had to go. In their appointment I acted upon the general principle which has been adopted by all Speakers, that of appointing children of widows, or of people who would be benefited by the little sums these boys would earn. But I have always been careful to try and appoint boys who were fit for the service. As to the servants, I may say that none of the permanent servants were changed.

Mr. FOSTER. That does not refer to the eight permanent messengers, the door keeper, and the permanent messengers of the reading room.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have here the printed list. There were thirteen on the messengers' staff, and none were removed. The night watchman was not removed, the carpenter was not removed. Then as to the others, I took the advice of the permanent officers of the House, the Serjeant and others, and I acted upon my best judgment. I feel I am responsible to the House, but I don't think I should be criticised as to the qualifications or otherwise of those gentlemen.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker has satisfactorily explained. I frankly admit, what occurred to me as an anomaly, that before the election of a Speaker this communication should have been sent, and he has given a sufficient reason to justify it. But I fail to see any reason why the messenger whose case I have brought under the notice of the House, Mr. Morris, was not called upon subsequently to resume his duties, which I believe he had faithfully and courteously performed for several years. No explanation has been given why he should have been omitted. I would like to inquire if there was any charge against Mr. Morris, or what was the reason that prevented his being called upon to resume his duties?

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not want to say that there was any specific charge against any specific man. Mr. Morris was appointed in 1886, he had performed ten years of service; and while it did not make him any the worse, it did give him a good share of the messengers' pay. However, I do not remember Mr. Morris's case in particular. I went over the old list with the Serjeant and the Chief Messenger, and I appointed the best men on that list, on their advice. Special reasons were given for not appointing some of them, though I cannot remember any special reason in the case of Mr. Morris.

Mr. FOSTER. Was there any special reason why Mr. Patchell was left off, who had been for fifteen years a messenger in the employ of the House, and had always performed his duties well?

Mr. SPEAKER. There was a special reason, which I can tell the hon. gentleman.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It could not be political, for he was a Liberal.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My attention has also been called to the case of Mr. Samson, doorkeeper. He was one of the permanent messengers, I believe.

Mr. SPEAKER. No, he was only sessional.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not know as much about him as others do, but as he requested me to refer to his case, I would like to know if there is any reason why he was not continued.

Mr. SPEAKER. There was a special reason reported to me in the case of Mr. Samson. I remember it distinctly, and I can tell the hon. gentleman what it was. Mr. Samson was good enough to threaten me that the matter would be brought up in the House, which I see has been done.

Mr. FOSTER. Was it a political reason?

Mr. SPEAKER. Not at all.

Mr. FOSTER. Nor in Patchell's case?

Mr. SPEAKER. No.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Was there investigation in the case of Samson?

Mr. SPEAKER. There was no investigation at any time, I acted on the information given me by the officers.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. My attention has been drawn to the case of Mr. Coffin, who was employed, I think, in the basement, and who had been a civil servant for eighteen years. I should like to know if there was any complaint made against him, or any special reason why he was left out when the messengers were called upon to resume their places. There was also a man from the district which I represent, Mr. Charles Guérard. I remember well when he came into the House as a messenger, and the older members of the House will remember him as being one of the most faithful, respectable, and hard-working messengers we had. We had very few messengers from Quebec, and I thought that Mr. Guérard should have been kept in his position unless there was strong reasons to warrant his dismissal.

Mr. SPEAKER. These two gentlemen were in the position of Mr. Morris. I cannot remember the particulars in their case, as I do about Patchell and Samson. The permanent staff reported against them.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It seems at first blush that a man who has been for eighteen years in the service, should not be dismissed without some strong reason, if he has faithfully performed his duties.

Mr. SPEAKER. They were not reappointed. All this was done before I was Speaker. Certain of the messengers were not reappointed and 21 were reappointed, and those who were not reappointed were left off for some reason, but I cannot remember the reason in each case.

Mr. SPOULE. Something occurred to-night which has taken place for the first time in my experience in this House, and it is an occurrence which I very much deprecate. When Mr. Speaker made an explanation with respect to how he managed the business entrusted to him—it seemed to me a very fair and reasonable explanation and appeared to show that he had endeavoured to do his duty faithfully, and there was no reason to complain, at all events in my opinion—there was a demonstration of applause from the Government side of the House when the hon. gentleman sat down. I have heard several Speakers of this House on an occasion like the present give explanations with respect to the way in which they have discharged their duties, but they were always received by hon. members on both sides of the House with silence and respect, as they should be. It should be remembered that the Speaker of the House represents one side no more than the other side. There has been no reason to complain of the conduct of Mr. Speaker, and I should be very sorry to believe that an impression has been created on this side of the House that the hon. gentleman was not otherwise than what a Speaker ought to be. With respect to the messengers and pages, I hope there will be a fairer distribution of patronage in the future than there has been in the past. I have been a member for eighteen years, and I have never succeeded in getting on even a sessional clerk, messenger, page, or a civil servant about this House. The large percentage of these employees are taken from the Ottawa district, some from the province of Quebec and the maritime provinces, and a large portion of Ontario is entirely overlooked. I do not care who controls the patronage in my county, but I claim it has a right to a share of that patronage, whether exercised by a Reform member or by any other party.

Resolutions reported.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

RESIGNATION OF THE LATE GOVERNMENT.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I should like to ask the leader of the Government if he has laid on the Table of the House the additional papers he was good enough to tell me he expected to produce, to complete the correspondence in regard to the matter respecting the Governor General.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I am sorry to say that I have not been able to lay the statement on the Table to-day. It will be ready for Monday, but I will send an advance copy to my hon. friend to-morrow.

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not quite catch the statement the leader of the Government made with respect to the letter which elicited the letter from the Commandant of the Royal Military College, and which I understand he intends to lay on the Table of the House. I ask if he will endeavour to take measures to have that letter laid on the Table, as the correspondence is incomplete, and I am sure if the hon. gentleman will read the Commandant's letter he will find it of a character that makes it absolutely necessary to the consideration of this question that we should have the letter that was sent by the direction of the Government, I presume, and which elicited the Commandant's letter. Will the hon. gentleman take measures to obtain that letter and place it on the Table of the House? I cannot imagine any possible reason why it should not be produced.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I have read that letter and my colleagues have read it, and the Government have no objection that the letter should be placed on the Table of the House. But this letter is a private letter addressed by General Gascoigne to General Cameron. We consider we have not the authority to compel the production of a private letter from one gentleman to another. But, if General Cameron and General Gascoigne have no objection to the production of this letter, the Government is certainly quite willing to place it on the Table of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that General Cameron is most anxious that the letter should be laid on the Table of the House. He considers it absolutely due to himself that that letter should be produced, and I would like to ask my hon. friend if he would endeavour to obtain the consent of General Gascoigne, if he thinks that is necessary for the submission of the letter.

The PRIME MINISTER. I think it would be more proper if the communication were to come from General Cameron himself to General Gascoigne, than from the Government to General Gascoigne. Since General Cameron has no objection, let him signify his willingness to General Gascoigne, and so far as the Government is concerned there will be no objection at all that the letter should be laid upon the Table of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.10 a.m. (Saturday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 14th September, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

COMMITTEE ON LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved :

That a Select Committee composed of Messieurs. Bain, Borden (Halifax), Bourassa, Caron (Sir Adolphe), Clarke, Davies, Davin, Foster, Flint, Fraser (Guysborough), Laurier, Lount, McNeill, Monk, and Scriver, be appointed to assist Mr. Speaker in the direction of the Library of Parliament so far as the interests of this House are concerned, and to act as members of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the Library; and a Message was ordered to be sent to the Senate to acquaint their Honours therewith.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 25) to amend the Act respecting interest.—(Mr. Quinn.)

EMIGRATION TO BRAZIL.

Mr. BERGERON. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the hon. the Premier if there has been anything done in respect of the matter to which I called his attention the other day, and towards preventing any of our people from making engagements with the Brazilian authorities, or rather with persons who call themselves authorized to engage people in Canada to go to that country. I see by the Montreal "Herald" of this morning that about one thousand people are booked for the voyage. They are all married people; the agents will not accept unmarried people, probably because they fear they would not remain very long; and they engage only married men, and women and children. In view of the fact also, as mentioned by the same paper, that great efforts have been made by the British and Italian Governments to prevent their people from going to Brazil, I would like to ask the Premier once more whether anything has been done with the object of preventing our people from joining that unfortunate class who have been there before but who, with the exception of those who have left their bones in that country, have returned through the assistance of the governments of the various countries.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I thank my hon. friend for calling the attention of the Government to this matter. The Government have done everything they thought advisable to do in order to prevent Canadians from leaving this country for Brazil. We have given instructions to the immigration agent at Montreal to communicate with intending emigrants, and to warn them of the danger to which they are exposed. Hearing that efforts are being made especially among the French Canadians in the parishes of the diocese of Montreal, we communicated with the episcopal authorities of Montreal, advising them to communicate with the curés, and to ask them to warn their people against the dangers which emigrants to Brazil are incurring.

INTERCOLONIAL TIME-TABLE.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Railways if he has done anything in regard to the matter to which I called his attention a few days ago, respecting the inconvenience to which the people of the whole district of Quebec are subjected under the present dispositions of the Intercolonial Railway time-table. I would like to know if he has made any inquiries upon the subject.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I may say that upon being informed by my hon. friend that complaints were being made in respect to this matter, I at once forwarded an inquiry to the proper quarter, and as soon as it comes to hand, I will communicate the information to my hon. friend.

DUTIES UPON MALT LIQUORS.

Mr. CHARLTON asked :

What was the total amount of excise duties collected upon ales, beer and spirituous liquors, in Canada, for the fiscal year ended 30th June, 1896 ?

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir H. Joly de Lotbinière). The duty accrued upon spirits for 1895-96 amounted to $4,011,287.56; upon ales and beer, including brewers' license fees, $6,747.74. But as it is doubtless the intention of the hon. member for North Norfolk to ascertain the whole excise duty collected on potable liquors, it may be stated that the duty on malt from which the beer is produced amounted to $781,554.56; making in all an aggregate revenue of $4,799,589.86.

THE MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

Mr. DUGAS (for Sir Adolphe Caron) asked:

Is the following report which appears in the newspaper press of Canada correct:—

"That Mr. Greenway declares that no settlement of the Manitoba school question will be made which will in the slightest degree interfere with Manitoba's determination not to have separate schools, and that he is coming to Ottawa to have a further conference with Mr. Laurier on the subject."

If this report is correct, when will this "further conference" be held?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). In answer to the question, I beg to say that I know nothing of the intention of Mr. Greenway, or of his declarations. The Government have received no information of the intention of Mr. Greenway to come down to have a further conference with the Government.

CAPTAIN ALFRED FAGES.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked :

Did Captain Alfred Fages, of the Military School at St. Johns, P.Q., obtain leave of absence in order to go and vote at Quebec on 23rd June last? If so, what was the duration of the said leave?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I would ask the hon. gentleman to allow the question to stand. We have asked the Deputy Adjutant General of the district for information respecting it.

ADVERTISING ON THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked :

1. Whether tenders were asked for during the month of February last for the privilege of selling newspapers, fruit, &c., on the several trains of the Intercolonial; whether the tenders mention also the privilege of placing advertisements in the several stations, and if not, why was the said privilege included in the contract?

2. Who has the contract for the sale of newspapers on the branch of the Intercolonial between Truro and Sydney?

3. How much does he pay?

4. When was the contract awarded?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Tenders were invited by newspaper advertisement dated 5th February, 1896, and received on 19th February, 1896, for selling newspapers, &c., &c., on the trains of the Intercolonial Railway. The advertisement inviting tenders did not mention the privilege of placing advertisements in the several stations. It was not considered as a necessary part of a contract for the privilege of selling newspapers, fruit, &c., &c., on the trains, &c., &c., and did not form part of the contract. Mr. George L. Hannington has the contract for selling newspapers, &c., on the Intercolonial Railway between Truro and Sydney. He pays $750.00 per annum. The contract was awarded in February, 1896.

SALE OF NEWSPAPERS ON INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked:

1. Who obtained the contract for the sale of newspapers, fruit, &c., on the Intercolonial Railway, from the 1st October, 1894, to 1st October, 1895?

2. Did the party who secured it pay the price of the contract?

3. What amount did he pay?

4. Was the contract renewed with the same party from 1st October, 1895, to 1st October, 1896?

5. If so, what was the price and were tenders called for?

6. Was the contract cancelled in the interval, and if so, why?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). F. W. Cunningham received the contract for the sale of newspapers, &c., &c., on the Intercolonial Railway from 1st October, 1894, to 1st October, 1895. Yes. He paid the price of the contract. He paid $4,015.00. Yes. Contract was renewed with the same party from 1st November, 1895, to 1st November, 1896. The price was $4,015 for the year. Tenders were not invited. Yes. The contract was cancelled in the interval on account of the contractor failing to comply with the conditions of the contract.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked:

1. Who has the contract for the sale of newspapers, books, fruit, &c., in the stations of the Intercolonial Railway between St. John and Halifax?

2. When does the said contract expire?

3. How much does the contractor pay?

Mr. CHOQUETTE.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). No person has the contract for selling newspapers, &c., at the stations between St. John and Halifax.

GANANOQUE DRILL SHED.

Mr. SPROULE (for Mr. Taylor) asked:

Is it the intention of the Government to place a sum in the Supplementary Estimates for the purpose of purchasing a site on which to erect a drill shed in the town of Gananoque? Is it the intention of the Government to proceed with the removal of the old shed from the site on which it is at present located, and which has been sold and conveyed to the corporation of Gananoque for school purposes?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I beg to say that both these matters are receiving the serious consideration of the Government.

EXPORTATION OF HAY.

Mr. QUINN asked:

Is it the intention of the Government to aid in any way the exportation of surplus hay this season? If so, how? If not, why not?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). The Government have not as yet received any communication on the subject, and the matter has therefore not been under their consideration.

LOCK 2—LACHINE CANAL.

Mr. QUINN asked:

1. Is it the intention of the Government to proceed with the construction of lock No. 2, Lachine Canal, this winter? 2. If so, will such work be done by contract or by day labour? 3. If by day labour, will the system of eight hours per day be followed?

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that there is a mistake in the question as printed. It should be Lock No. 1 and not Lock No. 2.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I may inform the hon. member that the whole question of the construction of Lock No. 2 on the Lachine Canal is under consideration. Nothing has yet been determined upon in respect to it.

Mr. SPEAKER. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn) wish to have the question changed so as read "Lock No. 1"?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If so, the hon. gentleman will have to allow the question to stand until tomorrow so that I may answer it.

Mr. QUINN. Very well.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question is allowed to stand, it being understood it refers to Lock No. 1 and not Lock No. 2.

FISHWAYS IN TWO MOUNTAINS.

Mr. ETHIER asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to cause fish runways to be constructed on the North River, in the counties of Argenteuil and Two Mountains, between St. André and St. Jérôme ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). The Government is now considering the question of the propriety of taking immediate action with a view of having fishways constructed on the North River, counties of Argenteuil and Two Mountains. The department in 1895 decided that fishways should be constructed and served the usual notice required by the Fisheries Act, but on investigation it was found that the form of fishway prescribed was unsuitable to the locality and would prove ineffectual, and action was then stayed.

THE "HARD-PAN CLAIMS."

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness) asked :

Has any money been kept in reserve by the late Government for the payment of outstanding claims—known as "hard-pan claims"—in connection with the building of the portion of the Intercolonial Railway east of Grand Narrows, Cape Breton ? If so, what amount ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Blair). Yes. The amount kept in reserve was $1,200.

THE ISLAND OF ANTICOSTI.

Mr. MILLS (for Mr. Kaulbach) asked :

1. Was any complaint made to the Government of Canada or to the Fisheries Department that Mr. Henri Menier, owner of the Island of Anticosti, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, claimed jurisdiction over the three-mile limit around that island ? If so, what is the nature of the complaint ?

2. Was any inquiry made into the matter by Commander Wakeham, or other officer of the Government ?

3. If any report has been received, what is the nature of that report ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). 1. Yes. That the schooner "Bessie A" while fishing in the inshore waters off the west point of the island was ordered to leave by the captain of the steamer "Savoy" on the ground that Mr. Menier claimed the exclusive right of fishery within the three-mile limit. 2. Yes, by Commander Wakeham. 3. That the warning off was done without Mr. Mercier's orders and owing to a misapprehension on the part of one of his employees, and that Mr. Menier makes no claim to exclusive fishing rights within the three-mile limit.

THE THOUSAND ISLANDS.

Mr. SPROULE (for Mr. Taylor) asked :

Have the Government withdrawn the unsold islands in the River St. Lawrence (known as the Thousand Islands) from the market ? If so, is it the intention of the Government to purchase them from the Indian Department and set them aside as a public park ?

Mr. DOBELL. The Acting Superintendent General of Indian Affairs was advised that the government of Ontario had in contemplation a proposition for the purchase of a number, if not all, of the unsold islands in the St. Lawrence River between Kingston and Brockville, for public park purposes ; and pending consideration of the subject the islands have been withdrawn from sale.

BRIDGES IN BEDFORD TOWNSHIP.

Mr. SPROULE (for Mr. Taylor) asked :

1. Has a petition been presented to the Government from the municipal council of the township of Bedford, in the county of Addington, Ont., asking the Government to rebuild the Fish Creek and Birch Creek bridges on the Green Bay Road, in said township of Bedford ?

2. Has an officer of the Department of Railways and Canals made a report on the same ? If so, did he recommend that the work be proceeded with ?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to rebuild the bridges at an early day ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. Yes, the municipal council of Bedford have petitioned the Government to rebuild Birch and Fish Creek bridges. 2. Yes, an officer of the department has reported on these bridges. No, he did not recommend that the work be proceeded with. 3. No, it is not the intention of the Government to rebuild these bridges, as it is not considered the damage has been caused by Bob's Lake Government dam.

ISLANDS IN STONY AND CLEAR LAKES

Mr. LANG asked :

1. Are the islands in Stony and Clear Lakes, in the county of Peterborough, under the jurisdiction and control of the Dominion Government ?

2. Were they ever surveyed, and, if so, what is the number and acreage of each of the several islands in each lake, the cost of survey of each island and the total cost of the survey of the islands in these lakes ?

3. Have any of them been disposed of ? If so, to whom, at what price, and under what conditions ?

4. In whose hands was the sale of these islands, if sold, placed, and what was the cost in connection with such sales, if any ?

Mr. DOBELL. The islands in Stony and Clear Lakes, in the county of Peterborough, are under the control of the Dominion Government, as trustee for the Indian owners. 2. They were surveyed. Haslett's survey, which covered the west end of Stony Lake, including Clear Lake, shows that there are 75 islands therein, and that their total acreage is 668 acres 2 roods and 38 perches. Hewson's survey, which covered the east end of Stony Lake, shows that there are 94 islands therein, and that their total acreage is 319·32 acres. The total cost of the survey of the islands was $1,298.10. The cost of the survey was not apportioned among the islands. 3. Some of them have been disposed of. The only condition of sale was the payment of the purchase money in cash. 4. The sale was in the hands of the department's regular lands agent. His remuneration is 7½ per cent on all sales effected by him.

THE STEAMER "EMPIRE."

Mr. LANG asked :

Is the steamer "Empire," used by the superintending engineer of the Trent Valley waters, the property of the Dominion? If so, when was it acquired and from whom, and what was the cost and what has been the total expense for operating the steamer since its acquirement? What is the size of the steamer, and of what material is it constructed, and what has it cost for repairs?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Yes, the small tug "Empire" is the property of the Government. It was built by the Government in 1886. The cost was $2,100. The Government has been at the expense of operating since built. The size is 50 feet long, 10 feet beam, 5 feet draft. She is constructed chiefly of oak. It has cost for repairs about $50 a year.

THE LAKEFIELD DAM.

Mr. LANG asked :

Has the dam across the river at the village of Lakefield, county of Peterborough, been assumed by the Dominion? If so, from whom was it obtained? What was the amount of compensation, the date of transfer, and the amount of expenditure for the maintenance and repairs since its acquirement by the Government? Is there a caretaker, and, if so, when was he appointed? Who is he, and what is the nature of his duties, and what is his salary?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Yes, the old dam at Lakefield was assumed by the Dominion Government in 1883. It was obtained from R. C. & W. G. Strickland. The amount of compensation was $5,000. The date of transfer was 31st December, 1883. The amount for repairs and maintenance since it was assumed by the Government is $3,527. Yes, there is a caretaker. He was appointed in the year 1886. He is one John Dinwoodie. His duties are to take care of the dam, by regulating the water, chopping ice, and looking after the wharf. His salary from the Railway Department is $240 per annum, and $150 from the Public Works Department for looking after the boom.

TRENT VALLEY CANAL.

Mr. LANG asked :

Has any person or persons been appointed to value the lands in the county of Peterborough acquired for the purpose of the Trent Valley Canal? If so, what lands, with number of lot, concession, have been conveyed under such provisions, from whom purchased, and the monetary consideration, and what is the name of the valuator or valutors, and the amount of their remuneration?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). There have been persons appointed to value the lands, but the appointments were made by the late Government. As to the second clause of the question, I think it would be somewhat inconvenient to furnish the information my hon. friend desires, in the form of an answer to the question; but, if he will allow me, I will furnish him with the details in writing, and, if he desires that the information should be submitted in any more formal manner to the House, he can move a resolution for that purpose.

Mr. LANG. That is quite satisfactory.

CUSTOMS DEFALCATIONS AT PETERBOROUGH.

Mr. LANG asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to have a thorough and complete investigation, by an expert officer, of the books, &c., in the office of Her Majesty's Customs at the port of Peterborough, so that, as far as possible, the defalcations of the late collector, C. H. Clementi, may be ascertained? Did the Government obtain any security from the collector when appointed to the office? If so, what was the nature of the security? Is it good for the amount stated therein? Is it the intention of the Government to institute criminal proceedings against the late collector for his systematic robbery of the moneys of Her Majesty's Customs?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). A very careful investigation of the customs revenue collections at the port of Peterborough has been already made by an experienced officer, and a further investigation by a competent officer will be made, if necessary. The late collector, C. H. Clementi, was appointed to the office by Order in Council, dated the 18th December, 1890. A bond, bearing date the 14th January, 1891, for the sum of $4,000, was executed by the said collector and two sureties. The value of the bond has not been determined. The Department of Justice is instructed to take proceedings for the collection of the amount recoverable under the bond, and the question of other proceedings is under consideration.

BRIGADE STAFF OF LONDON CAMP.

Mr. TISDALE asked :

What officers were selected by the D. A. G. Military District No. 1 to compose the brigade staff at London camp commencing 8th September instant, and recommended by him for approval at headquarters? Was any change, and, if so, what, made in this list and upon whose recommendation and for what reason?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). The officers recommended by the Deputy Adjutant General, Military District No. 1 to compose the brigade staff at the London camp, which assembled on the 18th instant, were as follows:—Camp Commandant, Lieut.-Colonel Smith, D.A.G.; Supply Officer, Lieut.-Colonel Jas. Munro, 22nd Battalion; Camp Quartermaster, Lieut.-Colonel John Irwin, 26th Battalion; Inspector of Musketry, Lieut.-Colonel John Stacey, 25th Battalion; Brigade Major, Capt. Dennison, R.R.C.I. This staff was approved, but Lieut.-Colonel Stacey and Capt. Dennison were made Brigade Major and Inspector of Musketry, respectively instead of as recommended. This change was made on the recommendation of the General Officer Commanding, for the reason that the corps comprising the camp are armed with the Lee-Enfield rifle for target practice, and that, as they are not familiar with this rifle, it was necessary that the officer most conversant with it should be made Instructor of Musketry.

FISHING IN LOWER RIDEAU LAKES.

Mr. WOOD (for Mr. Frost) asked :

Has the attention of the Government been called to the following paragraph which appeared in the Smith's Falls "Echo" of 2nd September :
"Considerable alarm is felt by those who are interested in Lower Rideau Lake by the announcement that the owners of Long Island, a joint stock company, are endeavouring to get hold of the lake as a fishing preserve."

Have the Anglers Inn Company, the owners of Long Island, made overtures to the Government as indicated in this paragraph? Are any negotiations now in progress by which Lower Rideau Lake will be handed over to them as a fishing preserve?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). The attention of the Government had not been called to the paragraph quoted by the hon. gentleman until the hon. gentleman put his question. No such overtures have been made, and no such negotiations are known to the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

FREDERICTON BRIDGE COMPANY.

Mr. McMULLEN asked :

Have any steps been taken to collect the interest overdue by the Fredericton Bridge Company, and if not, why not? If any move has been made, what has been done? If no move has been made, when do the Government intend to move in the matter?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The usual demand for payment of interest due by the company has been made. Beyond that the Government has not been in a position to take up the subject for lack of time.

LAND GRANT TO CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. OLIVER asked :

1. What amount of land has been granted from the Crown to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company?

2. When was the grant made?

Mr. DOBELL. 1. The original area of land granted to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, under the provisions of the Act 44 Victoria, chapter 1, was twenty-five millions of acres, which was reduced by 6,793,014 acres under the provisions of the Act 49 Victoria, chapter 9. 2. The date of the original grant was the 15th February, 1881, being the day upon which the Act was assented to by the Governor General, and the statute under which the reduction was made was assented to on the 2nd of June, 1886. The area for which letters patent have issued to the company or the company's assignees up to the end of the month of August of this year is 1,359,727 acres. These patents are usually issued from the Crown direct to the people to whom the company dispose of the land, and before patent can issue the mortgage created by the Act 51 Victoria, chapter 32, has to be paid off in so far as it affects the land to be conveyed.

WILLIAM MCGIRR.

Mr. DOUGLAS asked :

For what purpose was Mr. William McGirr, of the Indian Department, sent to the North-west during the recent elections? Under whose authority was he sent, and from what fund were his travelling expenses paid?

Mr. DOBELL. Mr. William McGirr of the Indian Department was sent to the North-west during the recent elections. What the real purpose in sending him is not known to the Government. There is an official record in the department on file to the effect that McGirr was instructed to proceed to the St. Peter's Reserve to effect, if possible, a settlement between certain white men and half-breeds and the Indians, of the claims preferred by the former to lands included within that reserve. He was sent under authority of the then Superintendent General of Indian Affairs; and his expenses were paid from the appropriation for civil government contingencies.

CHIGNECTO SHIP RAILWAY COMPANY.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

Has the Chignecto Ship Railway Company made any application to the Government recently? If so, what is the nature of it? What action, if any, will be taken upon this application?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). A representative of the company recently had an interview with a committee of Council, and asked that the subsidies granted to the company some years ago should be revived. The matter has not yet been determined by the Government.

MOOSE JAW.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

Whether the attention of the Government has been called to the following resolution, a copy of which was sent last February to the Government :—

Moose Jaw, Assa., February 3rd, 1896.
Council Chamber of Moose Jaw.

Moved by Councillor Wellington, seconded by Councillor Grayson, and

Resolved, That the council of the municipality of the town of Moose Jaw record with pleasure the action you have taken in calling the attention of Parliament to the position of the Dominion Government in relation to the town site of Moose Jaw.

The interest held by the said Government has been a burden on the ratepayers.

The growth of the town has been checked by the high price placed on the lots.

The taxable property is kept at a minimum by the exemption of the Government interest and the rate correspondingly raised on the ratepayers who, by their labour and improvements are adding to the value of the Government holdings.

The Canadian Pacific Railway, the Government and the trustees have received a large sum through the sale of lots, and the only revenue realized by the town from this source has been the one-fourth interest of the trustees of the North-west Land Company which is taxable.

In asking the Government to relinquish their claim you are hereby assured of the unanimous support of the council representing the town of Moose Jaw in your efforts in their behalf, and their hope is that you will be successful in righting a wrong that has retarded the growth and burdened the present settlers of the town.

Passed in Council, the 3rd day of February, 1896.

(Sgd.) O. B. FYSH,
Town Clerk.

To N. F. Davin, Esq., M.P., Ottawa.

Whether it is the intention of the Government to take such action as will relieve the municipality of Moose Jaw of the grievance referred to in the above resolution ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The attention of the Government has not been called to any such resolution. My hon. friend says a copy of that resolution was sent to the Government. I must say that no record of it can be found in the department.

PEMBROKE SOUTHERN RAILWAY.

Mr. MACKIE asked :

1. Is there any record in the Department of Railways and Canals of any letter or letters written by the late Minister to the Hon. Peter White, just prior to the last general election, respecting a bonus to be granted to the Pembroke Southern Railway ?

2. What are the contents of said letter or letters ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

3. Is there any other correspondence in said department respecting said railway bonus, and, if so, what is the nature thereof ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). There is no record whatever in the Department of Railways and Canals of any letter having been written by the late Minister of Railways and Canals to the Hon. Peter White, just prior to the general elections, or at any other time, respecting the bonus granted to the Pembroke Southern Railway. There is some other correspondence in the Department of Railways and Canals respecting the said bonus.

IMPORTATIONS FROM THE AUSTRALIAN COLONIES.

Mr. COPP asked :

What was the value of goods imported into Canada from the Australian Colonies for the years 1890-91-92-93-94-95-96 ?

What was the value of goods of Canadian produce exported from Canada to the Australian Colonies during the years above mentioned ?

What amount of subsidy has been paid by the Dominion Government during the years indicated (showing amount for each year) towards steamship lines running between Canada and the Australian Colonies ?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The following is a statement showing the value of goods imported from Australia and entered for consumption in Canada ; also, the value of goods the produce of Canada, exported to Australia during the undermentioned fiscal years ending on the 30th June :—

Years.	Imports.	Exports.
1890 .....	$205,396	$471,028
1891 .....	169,065	582,377
1892 .....	264,783	436,153
1893 .....	217,817	284,926
1894 .....	143,317	320,952
1895 .....	113,242	414,924
1896 .....	197,918	513,875

The returns of imports and exports make no distinction as to the different Australian colonies, all being reported as imported or exported to or from Australia. In answer to the third question, the subsidies paid in years ended 30th June, were as follows :—

1894 .....	$121,666 67
1895 .....	121,666 67
1896 .....	111,527 79

One trip not complete until July, and, therefore, made chargeable to 1896-97. No subsidies prior to year ended 30th June, 1894.

JOINT FISHERY COMMISSION.

Mr. GILLIES moved for :

Copies of all papers, letters, despatches and international agreements that passed between or were entered into by the British, Canadian and United States Governments referring to or respecting the appointment of the Joint Fishery Commission ; also for copies of all reports made by the commissioners respecting the rules and regulations under which fishing will be prosecuted in contiguous waters, and in waters of the open sea commonly resorted to by fishermen of the United States and of Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, coming from a province that sends 25,478 men down to the sea in ships and boats to prosecute the industry that forms the basis of this motion, men who pass weary days and nights on the bosom of the mighty deep, and who draw their living from the depths of the ocean; belonging, as I do, to a Dominion that employs 70,700 men in this same very hazardous, dangerous and precarious calling, and representing as I do a county that sends 2,500 men down to the salt waters that encircle our iron-bound coast, from which they seek to wrest a living, I feel justified in presenting to the House the motion which you, Sir, have just read. When I came to this House, in 1891, the hon. and senior member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) then held the position of Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and I had the pleasure of discussing with him the question to which I now draw the attention of my hon. friend the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies). And I may say, at the very outset, that I am very pleased to find that that hon. gentleman has been selected by this Government to fill that honourable position, and I do trust that, while it be either the good or evil fortune of this Dominion to be governed by hon. gentlemen opposite, that hon. gentleman will, I am quite sure, during the currency of that period, whatever length of time it may be do honour to the distinguished position which I am glad to see him under the circumstances fill. And I am quite sure from his personal knowledge of the industry that engages the attention of our people down by the sea, that he will do them every justice in his department. As I have said, when I came to this House, in 1891, the hon. member for the county of Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) held the position of Minister of Marine, and it was my privilege and pleasure to draw his attention to the matter to which I now ask the kind attention of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies), that is, to the question of fishing in contiguous waters and also in waters that are extra-territorial. Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper entered into my suggestions in this regard with a readiness that was to me most helpful and gratifying. I am quite aware that regulations governing the prosecution of fisheries in those two waters, namely, those that are contiguous and those that are extra-territorial, can only be brought about by the joint co-operation of the several governments, Canadian, British and American. With the view, therefore, of bringing the matter to the notice of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries of those days, I tabled the following question in 1894:—

Have the Government entered into negotiations with the United States, by correspondence, or otherwise, with the view of entering into a joint agreement by which the system of purse-seining, seining and trawling, now pursued beyond the three-mile limit with such damage and injury to the fishing grounds upon the Atlantic coast, may be rendered unlawful and prohibited in future by the joint action of the two governments.

To that question, the then Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) replied as follows:—

The Government has entered into a convention with the United States, which, though not dealing specifically with the subject of purse-seining, seining and trawling, contemplates a general investigation, which is now proceeding, which will deal with the subject to which the hon. gentleman refers in his question. Of course, no action will be taken until the commissioners have reported.

That was the answer of the Minister at that time, and he told me, in conversation on the subject, that after I had brought this question to his notice, a year or two before this, he immediately entered into correspondence with the home authorities and the authorities at Washington, which culminated in the appointment of two joint commissioners, namely, Dr. Robert D. Rathbun, commissioner of the Fishery Department at Washington, a man holding a very distinguished position in his own country and regarded in his line as a very eminent authority; and Commander Wakeham, an equally eminent authority in our country, commissioner for the Dominion. These two gentlemen were appointed joint commissioners to draw up regulations under which fishing can be carried on in contiguous waters in the great lakes, and under which purse-seining and trawling on the Atlantic coast beyond the three-mile limit may be prohibited. Last session, I caused the following question to be put to the then Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the hon. member for Victoria, N.B. (Mr. Costigan):—

Have the commissioners of the joint convention of the Government of Canada and the United States completed their investigation into the subjects submitted to them for examination and to report upon? If so, does their report suggest that an arrangement be entered into between both governments for the purpose and with the object of preventing and prohibiting purse-seining and trawling beyond the three-mile limit upon the Atlantic coast? If the report has been completed, has it been submitted to Her Majesty's Government of Great Britain and that of the United States, and what action is likely to be taken thereon? If the work of the commission has not yet been concluded, when is their report expected by the Government of Canada?

To this the Minister (Mr. Costigan) replied:

The commissioners appointed by Her Majesty's Government and that of the United States, under international agreement, have, it is understood, completed their investigations and are at present engaged in the preparation of their report for submission to their respective governments. The action to be taken on the report or reports, is provided for in the agreement, as follows:—

The two governments agree that so soon as the report of the commissioners shall be laid before them, as aforesaid, they will consider the same, and exchange views thereon, to the end of reaching, if expedient and practicable, such conventional or other understanding as may suffice to carry out the recommendation of the commissioners, by treaty or concurrent legislation on the part of the respective governments or the legislatures of the several states and provinces, or both, as may be found most advisable; but nothing herein contained shall be found to commit either government to the results of the investigation hereby instituted.

Then the Minister (Mr. Costigan) went on to say:

It is impossible to say when the report might be communicated to the Government of Canada, or what suggestions may be contained; but it is understood that it will be communicated to Her Majesty's Government, and that of the United States, in June next. The scope of the inquiry includes the whole question affecting the fisheries in contiguous waters, and in waters of the open sea, commonly resorted to by fishermen of the United States and of Canada.

That answer, Mr. Speaker, covers the whole ground of the motion, namely, that the commissioners so appointed were to deal with the fishing regulations under which fishing in contiguous waters and in the waters of the open sea should be carried on. And, as the then Minister said, that the reports of these commissioners was expected last June, I assume that the work has been completed and is now in the hands of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies). However, I may, perhaps, be permitted to refer very briefly to the extent of the industry with which I am now dealing and which, I am sure, my hon. friend (Mr. Davies) must be so anxious in every way to foster and assist. We have the most extensive sea fisheries in the world. The eastern coast of the maritime provinces extending from the Bay of Fundy to the Straits of Belle Isle has a shore line of 5,600 miles. British Columbia alone has a sea coast of 7,181 miles, or double the extent of that of Great Britain and Ireland put together. These are the ocean fisheries, and when we consider their vast extent and with proper care and protection their practically inexhaustible richness, the value of this our great heritage cannot but arouse within us a feeling of pleasure and healthy pride as patriotic Canadians. Now the whole area of the salt water inshore fisheries is about 15,000 square miles. This is in addition to the extent covered by our fisheries of the great lakes, which embrace an area of some 72,000 square miles, not including the lakes of Manitoba and the Northwest. These figures may appear dry to the House, but they also must appear striking. They show over what a vast territory my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries presides and what close attention the interests covered by that territory demands. Now let me deal, very briefly indeed, with the value of these fisheries. Take the Island of Cape Breton alone and consider how immense is the fishing industry there, though prosecuted in many respects, in a very crude way. The annual catch of fish in the four counties of Cape Breton alone amounts to about $1,200,000, nearly as much as the whole annual catch of the great province of Ontario, and nearly double the annual catch of the province of Manitoba. The county that I represent, although territorially small and one of the smallest territories in point of population in the province of Nova Scotia, had a catch last year of something like $450,000. These figures are culled from the reports of the Department of Marine and Fisheries and are therefore authentic. In my own county alone we have 75 vessels and 1,305 boats engaged in this industry, manned by something like 2,500 men. The returns now in the hands of the Minister show that the value of the fisheries for the whole eighteen counties of Nova Scotia is something like $7,000,000, nearly one-third of the value of the fisheries of the whole Dominion of Canada. Now, Mr. Speaker, if we consider for a moment the advance made by way of development in this industry in the past few years, we must be struck with the rapid progress made in it. It is really a matter of surprise that, hampered as the people are with many difficulties—storms upon the coast, harbours inadequately provided, and other causes that I need not mention—such rapid strides have been taken in the prosecution of this industry. We can understand what has been done only by a comparison of the figures. In 1870 the total value of the fisheries of Canada was $6,500,000. In 1894, which is the last year for which the returns are available to me, the value of the fisheries was something like $21,000,000. That is the industry had gone up in value something like over 300 per cent in 24 years. When we consider the astounding fact that in the Dominion of Canada there are about 350,000 people dependent upon the fishing industry—about one-fourteenth of the whole population—we have a clearer conception of the importance of this industry to us, and we see that no matter how great attention we bestow upon it, our efforts will not be misspent. The fact that every great country in the world is a maritime country should spur us up to make a great effort in this direction. England owes her greatness and her impregnable navy largely to her marines that are recruited from her vast army of fishermen. She finds her fishery marine a splendid nursery from which to draw her naval forces. Take France, the greatest maritime country on the continent of Europe, and what is her policy? Why, Sir, every possible and almost every extraordinary encouragement is given to and bestowed upon this industry. Every quintal of fish that is caught for foreign exportation is bonussed by the national treasury to the extent of 10 francs each, almost the value of the fish itself. She does this in order to produce a class of men from which to man her ships, and that she may have resources to draw upon at any time to man her navy. This is only by the way, but I say again that this deserving and hardy class of our population have a claim upon our best consideration.

I may be permitted while upon this subject to mention the treaty of Washington, with which my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is more familiar than I am, inasmuch as he himself took a prominent part in connection with the commission which resulted from that treaty. The inshore fishing privileges of the Dominion of Canada on the Atlantic coast were valued at $4,500,000 over and above all other treaty concessions awarded us by the Convention of 1871, for ten years, and experts say that that sum was far below the real value, and that if fuller information had been obtained at that time and laid before the Halifax commission before which my hon. friend appeared in a professional character, the award would have been very much larger than $4,500,000 for the privilege of access to our inshore fisheries. Now, when we remember that we received that amount paid for such privilege during ten years, besides the right to send our fish and fish oils into the United States market free, I was considerably surprised, indeed, I regretted very much, to see the statement of the First Minister in that unfortunate interview, as I must call it, with the correspondent of the Chicago "Record," when he spoke of giving the United States access to our inshore fisheries on consideration of our being allowed to send fish and fish oils free into the United States market. I thought that was a most unfortunate admission on the part of the Prime Minister, in view of the value of our fisheries as settled by the Fishery Commission at Halifax. He apparently had forgotten the fact that even as long ago as twenty years it had been decided that these inshore fisheries were worth to us in ten years the sum of $4,500,000 over and above the privilege of sending our fish and fish oils in to the United States duty free. It is to be deplored that he had not given some deserved thought to this immense industry before declaring his willingness to have it given away and destroyed by a foreign nation. But I am willing to assume and to believe that the Prime Minister made that statement without a due examination into the facts, and that when he has more closely studied the question in the light of past events and future possibilities, in other words, when he will learn something about it, he will, I trust, insist upon our having our full rights in that respect. I may remind the House in this connection of a statement made by the late Mr. Mackenzie, in the year 1877, when addressing a meeting in the west. The Halifax commission was then sitting to ascertain what amount we should be paid by the Americans for the privilege of using our inshore fisheries for ten years, and Mr. Mackenzie, in addressing a meeting in a western county, spoke very disparagingly of the negotiations that had been concluded at Washington, out of which this Halifax commission had grown, and from which we got this $4,500,000 award. He stated that he himself did not hope that the country would be benefited to the extent of a single dollar from the investigations of the Halifax commission, and he was sorry the country was being put to the unnecessary expense of that commission. That is, if Mr. Mackenzie had his own way there never would have been a commission at Halifax, there never would have been a $4,500,000 award, there never would have been one dollar bounty paid our fishermen. But in a short time Mr. Mackenzie found that he had been mistaken, and that the Dominion of Canada was to receive this large sum I have mentioned. He has spoken without a due investigation of the facts, and I am quite willing to assume and to believe that the Prime Minister, in his interview with the correspondent of the Chicago "Record," also spoke without due consideration of the interests involved. I say again that I am pleased to be able to bring this subject before the House of Commons to-day, and I will be glad to have the views of the Government upon this matter, that so vitally concerns a class of people that are so closely identified with the prosperity of our Canadian nation.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I am pleased that the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Gillies) has brought this question before the House; and although I should like to say a few words upon it, I think it is almost unnecessary for me to do so, seeing that my hon. friend has gone into the question so thoroughly, and has shown conclusively that it is a subject that deserves the close attention of the Government. I may say that soon after the opening of the session, when this interview between the Prime Minister and the correspondent of the Chicago "Record" was brought to the notice of the House, I regarded the statements made by the Prime Minister with some considerable alarm, in view of the fact that I have a large number of fishermen in my constituency, and in view of the importance of the fishing industry in the province of Nova Scotia. It seemed to me that the statement made by the Prime Minister was rather liberal, considering the value and importance of our fisheries. The First Minister is reported to have said that:

The simple process of give and take should be applied in any arrangement made between the two countries in respect of the fisheries, whereby not only the ports but the inshore waters of both countries should be thrown open to the fishermen of both on equal terms, and the markets for the fish of the two countries made equally free.

Now, with regard to the inshore fisheries. Mr. Speaker, they are the most important fisheries to the people of the maritime provinces, and I speak from knowledge of the province of Nova Scotia, particularly the eastern portion of it. As the hon. member for Richmond has said, our fisheries in Nova Scotia are worth about $7,000,000 a year. The fish is almost all caught within the three-mile limit, or very near it; and when we consider the importance of that industry to the people who live upon and in the immediate neighbourhood of those waters, it is evident that the question should receive the serious consideration of the public men of the country before they make any proposition to give away such a valuable property to a foreign country. I feel from what I know of the people of the United States that they strongly desire to secure admission to our inshore fisheries, and I am satisfied there is no way in which they could amply compensate the people of this country if we gave them away those rights. Hon. members who have given attention to the fishery question well know that the North Atlantic states of the United States are the states in which the bulk of the fisheries of that country are carried on; but the whole fisheries of the United States, with a population of 65,000,000 people aggregate only $45,000,000, while the value of the fisheries of Canada, with 5,000,000 of people, are of the value of over $21,000,000. If we look where those fisheries are being prosecuted and what states are credited with this value, we find they are the North Atlantic states; and further, that those who follow the employment of fishing in the eastern states secure the bulk of the catch around the maritime provinces and the coast of Newfoundland, and particularly around the eastern portion of the province of Nova Scotia. In view of the difficulty we now have in protecting our fisheries within the three-mile limit, when the people of the United States sail around our shores, as they do, and take inside of our three-mile limit, a large quantity of the fish they obtain, notwithstanding that we have a tolerably effective protective service, the importance of protecting our fisheries is apparent, although it is impossible for any Government, with the amount of money at its disposal for the fishery protective service, to make that service as efficient as the requirements of our inshore fisheries demand. If we were to make any arrangements with the people of the United States by which they would be allowed to enter our inshore waters for the purpose of prosecuting the fishing industry, the result would be that for every hundred dollars our people would be able to use in prosecuting the fisheries the people of the United States would use one thousand dollars, and for every man we could put on our inshore fisheries within the three-mile limit, the Americans would place five or ten men, because they know the great value of our inshore fisheries. That is the reason why I am glad the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Gillies) has brought this question so prominently before the House. The value of the fisheries of Nova Scotia, which is placed at $7,000,000, represents a very large sum of money and constitutes a considerable portion of the income of the people of that province. If our inshore fisheries were thrown open and the Americans allowed to prosecute the fisheries within the three-mile limit, with the destructive appliances they now possess, in no other way could equal injury be inflicted on the interests of the people living along the coast of the maritime provinces; and I hope that the First Minister and his colleagues before laying a basis for any proposition with our neighbours, the people of the United States, respecting the fisheries of the two countries will inquire to the fullest extent into the interests of our own people, will learn the extent to which they are making their living out of this industry, and the extent to which it is possible for the fishermen of Nova Scotia to be deprived of the advantages of our inshore fisheries in the event of any arrangement being made with our American neighbours. I do not wish to detain the House, but I considered it to be my duty as representing a constituency where a large number of fishermen prosecute this industry, to offer these few remarks in support of the motion submitted by the hon. member for Richmond.

Mr. KAULBACH. The papers asked for, such as copies of all papers, letters, despatches and international agreements that passed between, or were entered into by the British, Canadian and United States Governments respecting the appointments of the joint fishery commission, also for copies of all reports made by commissioners respecting the rules and regulations under which fishing will be prosecuted in contiguous waters, and in waters of the open sea, commonly resorted to by fishermen of the United States and Canada involve a question of no small moment and of no little importance to the maritime provinces. Coming as I do from Nova Scotia, and being largely interested in the fisheries, the export of the fish product alone in that province, as compared with the rest of Canada, being in the neighbourhood of 50 per cent, and representing a county, of which I am justly proud, very largely engaged in that industry, I feel it my duty to ask the indulgence of this House for a few moments. I am heartily with any Government that will foster and promote the industry of fishing, and that will encourage our hardy race of fishermen, who contribute so much to the prosperity and wealth of this country.

Since the treaty of 1818 as respects our fisheries on the Atlantic coast (save the periods under the treaties of 1854 and 1871) the desire has been expressed by our American neighbours for the use of our Atlantic fisheries in common with ourselves; but a disinclination was shown by the late Conservative Government to favour such a desire. It is to be hoped the present Government will follow the example of its predecessor and never think of bartering such rights no matter what the circumstances may be that present themselves.

I must say my confidence in this respect was considerably shaken by a report appearing some short time ago in the "Globe" newspaper, an organ of hon. gentlemen opposite. It was from the correspondent of a Chicago paper called the "Record." The "Record" correspondent says, as alleged to be the words of the hon. the leader of the Government, as follows:—

"Some years ago, when considerable friction had been created by the North Atlantic fishery troubles, I took an opportunity to say that the question should be adjusted in a friendly manner, becoming an enlightened and friendly people, by the simple process of give and take, and I do not see now why an arrangement should not be made resembling that effected under the treaty of Washington in 1871, and the treaty of 1854, whereby not only the ports but the inshore waters of both countries were thrown open to the fishermen of both on equal terms, and the markets for the fish of the two countries made equally free. That, it seems to me, would be the sensible way of settling the fishery question. The North Atlantic fisheries would be more valuable to the United States and Canada alike if some such arrangement were adopted."

The hon. leader, when the question was put to him by the ex-Minister of Railways as to whether the statement so reported was correct, answered: "It is substantially correct." I sincerely hope the hon. leader will recognize the injustice such a course would entail to the fishermen and the industry in Canada, and refrain from such a course, for were our rights to be interfered with in this way, our fishing industry would be all but blotted out. My hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Gillies) referred to purse-seining, which some years ago was prosecuted to a considerable extent by American and Canadian alike to the detriment of both countries. However, an arrangement was made between our Government and the government of the United States whereby that mode of fishing was suspended, because of the injury it caused. Of late years purse-seining has again been resorted to by the people of the United States, not by our fishermen. It would, I think, be well that the hon. leader of the Government, conjointly with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, should endeavour to arrange with the government of the United States for the prevention of this system of fishing undoubtedly very detrimental to fish sizes. The fishing industry has been greatly fostered by the late Government in the way of bounties and otherwise which it is to be hoped the present Government will carefully recognize. By the treaty of 1818 our fishing rights were very wisely protected. The treaty of 1854 gave these fisheries, together with the trade of the country, conjointly to the Americans; the waters of our shores to be used for the time in common with ourselves. But the Americans thought proper to abrogate that treaty in 1866, and then it was that we were placed in what we considered at the time a very unfortunate position. We felt as if we were out in the cold, not having the market of the United States for our fish. Placed as we were then and feeling our unfortunate position, as it were, and not knowing what the ultimatum might be, we struck out for ourselves, feeling satisfied that there was something bright in store for us. We then arranged for an interprovincial trade which resulted in the British North America Act. When that was brought about we felt that we were masters of our own situation, having our own waters to fish in, and being entirely independent of the Americans. Having the exclusive right of the inshore waters of the maritime provinces, and feeling as I stated that we were masters of our own situation, and to catch all the fish needed for the United States market as well as for our own and shipments for abroad, we believe that in time we can, with the advantages we possess, cause the Americans to understand that they cannot come to our shores and catch the fish as successfully as we can ourselves. The reason of that is, that they are prohibited—unless the present privilege of the modus vivendi is continued—from getting their bait. If they were deprived of this privilege we would be able to keep the deep sea fisheries as well as our other fisheries entirely in our own hands. Of course the Americans have the privilege of fishing outside the three-mile limit, but it is impossible for them to catch fish unless they have the bait. True it is that for a certain short period of the year they can catch bait on the banks, but that occurs so seldom that were it not for the privilege of getting bait under the modus vivendi they would be at such a disadvantage that they would feel inclined not to be engaged in the industry at all, as it would not be to them a profitable investment. This is proven by the fact that the fleet of fishing vessels owned in the New England states is growing less numerically, year after year.

As a reconciliation to American fishermen the modus vivendi was brought about, and under that we are giving them privileges which they would otherwise not enjoy. However, that privilege was only extended to them with a view of their only having it for a year or so until some arrangement could be made between the United States and Canada. That arrangement has never been arrived at, although efforts have been made by the late Government to induce the government of the United States to come to some terms in that direction and give us access to their markets. The Conservative Government when in power always had in view the rights of the fisheries of the maritime provinces, and they guarded those rights so carefully, that I feel now, representing, as I do, a county engaged so largely in that industry, that it is part of my duty to ask the Government to be careful before they in any way interfere with the rights which so properly belong to us, to consider Canadian interests. I do not wish to trouble the House, further than to say: that if that industry is interfered with by any adverse action on the part of the present Government, the fleet of fishing vessels of which we are now so justly proud, and the men who man them, as well as the implements employed on the shore for their capture, namely, the boats and other tackle, will be sacrificed, as the Americans would in all probability enter in and take possession, build their own vessels, man them, fit them out with their own equipments, frequent our shores and capture our fish in such quantities that really the market of the United States would be of little service to us. Under the circumstances, I would ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) to have this important industry and our rights constantly in view, and do nothing but what will tend to promote this as pre-eminently more important than any others. Coming as the hon. gentleman does from a maritime province he must necessarily have an interest in the fishing industry, and I trust that he will exercise such due care and discretion in connection with the disposal of our fishery interests as will cause every one in the maritime provinces—it being a question of deep concern to the whole Dominion as well, to feel that we have at present a paternal Government willing and anxious to look after those interests just as carefully as the late Government had been doing.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). Mr. Speaker, the subject on which my hon. friends have addressed the House is a deeply interesting one to us all, but more particularly so to us who come from the maritime portions of the Dominion. I can hardly say, however, that my hon. friends (Mr. Gillies and Mr. Kaulbach) have kept strictly in view the motion before the House. They have travelled pretty far afield and have discussed the general question of the fisheries, and as to how they should be protected; questions which I do not understand to be involved in the motion which my hon. friend (Mr. Gillies) brought before us. That motion has a distinct reference to one branch of the fishery service, and to one only. My hon. friend moves for all the papers in connection with the appointment of the joint fishery commission between Her Britannic Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States some years ago. This commission, as he knows, was the outcome of a delegation which went in 1892 from this Government to the government at Washington, and discussed the relations which existed between the Canadian Government and the United States government. Among other questions discussed, was this one relating to the fisheries—the question whether we could stop altogether, or at any rate to some extent limit, the destructive methods of taking fish in the territorial waters of both countries, in the waters contiguous to both countries, and in the extra-territorial waters of both countries, in which the fishermen of both countries were engaged in common fishing. The United States government appointed Professor Rathbun, of the United States Fishery Commission, as their commissioner, and the Canadian Government appointed Commander Wakeham as our commissioner. These gentlemen entered upon their duties in 1893; and from time to time they have been engaged in prosecuting the necessary inquiries to enable them to make a report. The convention or agreement between the two countries provides that, in so far as they concur, their report shall be a joint one to both governments; that, in so far as they shall not be able to concur, each shall make his report to his own government; and that, after these reports are presented, the respective governments will interchange notes, and endeavour, if possible, to finally reach a conclusion as to the basis on which an international agreement may be come to. I say that since 1893 the joint commissioners have been engaged on their commission, and, as the hon. gentleman knows, the scope of that commission is a very large one. It covers questions which require investigation, not only on the Atlantic seaboard, to which my hon. friends have especially addressed themselves, but also on the lakes lying between the two countries, and in the waters adjacent to British Columbia. The original agreement provided that, if possible, they should make their joint or several reports, such as they might be, within two years of the time they were appointed; but, although the commissioners applied themselves with energy and zeal, and gave up as much time as they were able to give from the discharge of their other duties, to the investigation of this subject, it was found that they were not able to make the report within the two years prescribed by the agreement. It was then agreed between Her Majesty's Government and the government of the United States that the time should be extended to enable them to make the report, to the 31st of December, 1896; and I am informed that Commander Wakeham and Professor Rathbun if they then do not find themselves in a position to make their final and complete report, will be in a position to make an interim report. What the nature of that report will be I have, of course, no means of judging. I will call my hon. friend's attention to the fact that in the report of the Fisheries Department for the year 1892 he will find, beginning at page 81, a great deal of valuable information with respect to the appointment of these joint commissioners and the nature and scope of their inquiry. I will ask the permission of the House to read a paragraph, which is in fact the agreement itself. It says:

The governments of the United States of America and of Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland agree that a commission of two experts shall be appointed, one on behalf of each government, to consider and report to their respective governments—either jointly or severally, or jointly to both governments, with regard to matters in which they may be in accord, and severally to their respective governments with regard to matters of non-concurrence—concerning the regulations, practice and restrictions proper to be adopted in concert, on the following subjects, viz. :—

(a.) The limitation or prevention of exhaustive or destructive method of taking fish and shell-fish in the territorial and contiguous waters of the United States and Her Majesty's possessions in North America respectively, and also in the waters of the open seas outside of the territorial limits of either country to which the inhabitants of the respective countries may habitually resort for the purpose of such fishing.

(b.) The prevention of the polluting or obstructing of such contiguous waters to the detriment of the fisheries or of navigation.

(c.) The close seasons expedient to be enforced and observed in such contiguous waters by the inhabitants of both countries as respects the taking of the several kinds of fish and shell-fish.

(d.) The adoption of practical methods of restocking and replenishing such contiguous and territorial waters with fish and shell-fish, and the means by which such fish-life may be therein preserved and increased.

So that the hon. gentleman will see that the subject-matters relegated to this commission to inquire into and report upon, were of the most supreme importance, and involved an investigation which might continue for some years, and which it may be necessary to prosecute in the near future before any international agreement can be arrived at. I want to say frankly to the hon. gentleman that, up to this time, the international commissioners, so far as this Government knows, have not presented any report or interim report of their labours, and consequently there will, of course, be nothing to be brought down in that respect. There are really no papers to bring down, except some trifling correspondence relating to the meetings of the commissioners from time to time, and the extension of the time within which they were to make their reports to the respective governments. I do not think that any good service would be accomplished by bringing down this formal correspondence, and I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that, having attained the object he had in view, and having presented his views to the House—and most interesting they were in some points—it will not be necessary to press this motion to a conclusion. After December next, reports will, in all human probability, be presented, and, as soon as they come into our possession, they will be placed before this House and the country. In view of the statement I have made, therefore, I suggest that the hon. gentleman should withdraw his motion.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I have some knowledge of this subject, and I agree with the hon. Minister of Marine in the suggestion he has made, and I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman who has charge of the motion, will be quite satisfied with this discussion. The annual reports for the last few years give a very good résumé respecting the treaty under which the investigation is proceeding, and reports of the progress made from time to time. But the subject covered by this motion is, I think, very properly brought to the attention of the House at this particular time; and, after having heard the hon. gentlemen who have spoken, from the province of Nova Scotia, and also the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, it seems to me that the Government should take warning from the important questions that are involved in this very inquiry before following up that—I venture to say—injudicious statement of the Prime Minister in that Chicago interview, because the hon. Prime Minister could not have had before him the very important information to which the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries has referred, in connection with the destructive engines which were used by the United States fishermen, when they had access to our waters, and which, perhaps, as much as anything, brought about an entire revulsion of feeling on the part of the fishermen in the inshore fisheries on our Atlantic coast against this joint user of our waters.

The subject, as the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries has said, covers not only the three-mile limit on the ocean, but has to do with the lakes as well; and no one knows better than the hon. Minister the difficulty that either the state governments or the federal governments have to encounter in connection with their efforts to protect their own fisheries against their own fishermen. First of all, there is the very awkward question of jurisdiction, as to what the federal government may do and what the state legislatures have the exclusive right to do, in connection with the control of those fisheries. It may be said without offence, and is often said in the United States by public men there, that the American fishermen have the whip-hand of their legislatures. I refer to that class of fishermen who are absolutely reckless and indifferent to the preservation of the fisheries, but only seek to obtain as many fish as they can at a time, without regard to the damage caused by their fishing engines upon the supply of fish for the future. In this country, we have experience of the same feeling, but it is to the credit of our fishermen, both on the lakes and down by the sea, that a good number of them are opposed to that greedier and thoughtless element, and our fishermen, as a rule, have submitted fairly to reasonable regulations and reasonable restrictions. Sometimes the department may err and unnecessarily agitate or excite the fishermen, but we have nothing like the difficulty on our side of the line which we find every year complained of by statesmen and executive bodies on the other side of the line. That brings at once into prominence that unfortunate statement of the First Minister to the effect that he is ready to agree that the inshore waters of both countries should be thrown open to the fishermen of both on equal terms. I venture to say that, no matter what his commission will report, it will be years before the United States government is able to secure the adoption of even the regulations that now obtain in this country and which our fishermen are willing to observe. When was it that the fearful injury done by the purse-seines first came under notice? It was when the United States fishermen had, under the Washington Treaty, the use of our waters; and that experience should be remembered before we make any offer to the United States on the lines of the old treaty. It was under that treaty that we obtained the experience which went to show that the United States fishermen cannot be held in control or restricted when given the right to fish within our limits. They used the purse-seines, and the damage was soon apparent in our waters. The hon. Minister of Marine referred to the valuable collection of evidence made by the Marine and Fisheries Department some years ago, upon which requests were preferred to the United States authorities to endeavour to avoid such destruction in the future. The hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Gillies) brought up the question long before we were able to obtain a treaty, and it is only fair to say that the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach) and the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall), were loud in their complaints of the injuries caused to our fisheries, even after the Washington Treaty had expired, when the United States fishermen were free to use those destructive engines known as the purse-seines up to the three-mile limit. While there was a law prohibiting the import into the United States during certain months of the mackerel taken in the purse-seines, there were other periods sufficiently long, during which the American fishermen could use the purse-seines to enable them to inflict great damage. This subject was brought so prominently before me in my time that the department took steps to obtain a remedy, and our efforts resulted, as the hon. Minister has said, in a treaty being arranged which, among other things, provided for a joint investigation; and I was sufficiently long in the department to know, as the hon. Minister now knows, what a suitable man the United States appointed as their representative, Dr. Rathbun, and our own commissioner is known as a man of great experience and most suitable to represent our interests. No doubt the labours of those gentlemen will take some time yet to complete. They have made their investigations on our coasts and lakes, and when speaking of the coast I have particularly in mind the Atlantic coast, and they have proceeded to the Pacific coast, where there are very interesting questions to study, owing to the contiguity of fishermen on both sides of the line in their fishing operations. It is a huge work, and their report will no doubt be most valuable and interesting. It has in view nothing in the nature of a joint user; it never contemplated anything in the way of an arrangement whereby these fishermen, who have exhausted nearly all of their own fisheries, both inland as well as coast fisheries, owing to the license given them to do as they please, should be permitted to come into our fisheries either on the coast or lake shore, which have been far better protected than those south of the line. Hon. gentlemen who disagree with me with regard to the restrictions I have endeavoured to impose on our lakes, have never disputed, and I feel confident will not dispute, that even in the same lake our fisheries are better than those of the Americans. It is so proved by the poaching, proved by the arrests we have made of vessels that come sixty and one hundred miles to steal our fish, their owners running the risk of losing their vessels in the attempt. Vessels have been confiscated; nevertheless, such is the relative condition of their fishery and ours, that in order to get fish, they think it worth while to run the risk of these illegal acts. On the coasts we know the risks they run. Notwithstanding the vigilance of our cruisers—and of course the difficulties of protecting our fisheries are great—they do poach there and have persistently poached there, as proven by the arrests from year to year. So, hon. gentlemen will see how natural it would be for our fishermen to resist, as I believe, as a body, they will resist—in fact I have no doubt about those engaged in the inshore fishery—this opening up of our waters to American fishermen. I do not believe there is an hon. gentleman in this House representing a large population of inshore fishermen who will contemplate favourably a treaty under which the fishermen of the United States are to come in under any regulation and fish in our waters on equal terms with our own fishermen. Without endeavouring to import into this discussion any acrimonious feeling or to make charges across the House for political purposes, I call the attention of the Prime Minister to what I believe, on investigation, he will see was an indiscreet statement made by him on this important subject, and made without the support of a single gentleman, so far as I know, representing these districts. We know that it was common report, and a report used to great advantage in the discussion in 1891 of unrestricted reciprocity, that the then Attorney General of Nova Scotia happened to make the remark that under reciprocal arrangements the fishermen of the United States would be as free as our own fishermen to use our waters. And the bulk of the Liberal party, if I recollect aright, were quick to repudiate the authority of the hon. gentleman for such an assertion; and as-surely there was no activity on the part of gentlemen opposite to prove that such a construction of the proposed arrangement was right and that under unrestricted reciprocity the fishermen of the United States were to be permitted to enjoy the privileges they enjoyed—and largely abused—under the old Washington treaty. It does not matter that the Conservative party made that old treaty. Under the treaty of 1854, we know the same privileges existed. So in 1872. But it was from experience gained under both these treaties and notwithstanding all the counter advantages, the fishermen are, as I believe, as a mass—I refer to the inshore fishermen and not the bank fishermen, the fishermen who depend for their living on fishing our own waters within our own jurisdictional authority—absolutely and entirely opposed to any arrangement or any construction that will bring into these waters, comparatively depleted as they are, injured as they have been, the active competition of the fishermen of the United States. Now, the hon. gentleman has referred briefly to part of the history of this case. I do not wish to occupy time unnecessarily, but I would like to make reference to that history to support the statement that I have made as to the treaty and as to the very great importance of the subject that is under consideration by these commissioners. I have here the Fisheries Report for 1892. This report devotes a great deal of space to the discussion of this purse-seining, and I have to call attention to the fact that Mr. Whit-cher, in his time a most active officer in the Marine and Fisheries Department, called attention, during the operation of the Washington treaty, to the injury that was being done by the purse-seine in the hands of fishermen from the United States. In this report the following occurs:—

In last year's report of this department, the subject of fishing with purse-seines was fully treated, and an exhaustive résumé of the opinions of competent authorities as to its results and effects was collated, forming a valuable appendix. The injurious effects of this mode of fishing being so strongly portrayed, and almost universally admitted, the department had no option but to conclude that the future preservation of the valuable mackerel and herring fisheries of the Atlantic coast demanded its general prohibition in our waters.

Without joint action, however, on the part of the governments of the United States and France, such prohibition cannot attain all that is desired, so long as its use is continued by the fishermen of other nations. The United States government have, however, endeavoured to minimize the danger by preventing the landing of mackerel taken with purse-seines on any part of the coast of the United States before the 1st June in each year, but by this time most of these migratory fishes—

And I call attention to this in connection with the other observations I have offered:

—have found their way to Canadian waters, outside the territorial limits in which the United States fishermen are permitted to use their purse-seines with impunity and freedom from restrictions, the prohibition in question is really not of such value as would at first appear. To be of general benefit to the fisheries, a universal prohibition is required, and international action has been sought with the view of prohibiting entirely the use of these obnoxious engines on the high seas.

So great was the injury that this Parliament proceeded to enact in 1891 a prohibition against the use of purse-seines in our own waters. And notwithstanding the extraordinary condition of affairs under which our own fishermen found the prohibition of this engine within the three-mile limit and its use outside of the three-mile limit, no person has attacked that measure. Well, in 1893 there is a further reference to this important subject and a great deal of valuable information that was not given in a previous report.

It was shown that this form of fishing engine destroyed vast and alarming numbers of young and unmerchantable fish which, at the period of their capture, represented no commercial value, but if allowed to mature, they would have assisted in maintaining the supply.

And again:

At the conference of the Dominion Fishery Inspectors convened at Ottawa in 1891, a motion for the prohibition of purse-seines in the territorial waters of Canada was unanimously adopted. It is to be remembered that from April, 1873, the date at which the Government of Canada anticipated the formal coming into force of the fishery articles of the treaty of Washington which was fixed by proclamation 1st July, 1873, until the year 1885, these highly destructive nets were operated by the United States fishing fleet in the inshore territorial waters of Canada. The destruction which followed this method of fishing is incalculable.

That is the way in which they abused the privilege given them under the treaty which enabled them to operate, with their vast numbers and enormous sail, within the limits of our fisheries. And again:

On the 22nd May, 1890, the Canadian Government asked that the United States government might be communicated with through Her Majesty's government, with a view to obtaining some international legislation looking either to the prohibition of or restriction of the use of the purse-seines in the mackerel fishery, in order that for the general good the impending danger to this valuable industry might be averted.

The Secretary of State for the United States expresses his willingness to give the subject his careful consideration—

And so on. Again it says:

It will be seen that the steps which have been taken were in the right direction. That the withdrawal of the American fleet from the immediate Canadian inshore fisheries owing to the termination of the fishery article of the treaty of Washington, has had a beneficial effect is clearly evidenced from the fact that the percentage of fish taken by the Canadian fishermen within the territorial jurisdiction largely exceeded in 1891 that of 1885.

That accounts in some measure for what I think the very reasonable position taken by our fishermen, based on the experience they had under the old treaty and the experience they have in enjoying the exclusive right to those fisheries as at present. I am very glad the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Gillies) has brought this subject immediately under the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and by doing so has directed his mind to the important questions that are being investigated by these commissioners, and also to what is in my view of vastly more importance, that whereas it may be impossible for anything to come out of this joint investigation other than a complete and logical vindication of the position of the Canadian Government, under either political regime, in regard to the protection of our fisheries, in addition to that, of course, the Government will obtain that full information which they should possess in negotiating a treaty with the United States. I am certain that the hon. gentleman will find, that because of the absence of any attempt at restricting or regulating the fisheries to the south of the line, they have practically nothing to give us in the shape of a quid pro quo; and that our own fisheries, from various reasons, whether from the action of the American fishermen under the treaty, or since the treaty, or from our own fishermen not acting strictly up to the regulations, our own fisheries are not in that healthy condition that they used to be—and I speak now, of course, in regard to the inshore fisheries. Under these circumstances I venture to say that the almost unanimous opinion of the inshore fishermen should be very carefully considered by any negotiators at Washington or elsewhere on the subject of the fisheries, and that view is that under no circumstances can they afford to throw these fisheries open to foreign competition.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) I have certainly no reason to complain of the spirit of the remarks which have been made by hon. gentlemen opposite on this question. It is very desirable indeed in a matter of so much importance that the subject should be approached in such a way as to obtain the very best results without importing into it any party bitterness. I am ready to admit that I am not as familiar with the subject as I could desire, or as the hon. gentlemen are, who come from the maritime provinces. There are certain facts, however, which are to the common knowledge of every man in this country, and upon those facts I have always based the opinions which I have expressed whenever it has been my privilege to speak upon this subject, whether in this House or elsewhere. Now, Sir, unless I am greatly mistaken, and unless the condition of things has very much changed in the maritime provinces, it is well known that the treaty of 1854 was always considered a very valuable arrangement for the people of the lower provinces, and the people there belonging to both parties always desired to see it renewed. At the very time to which my hon. friend referred a moment ago, when Attorney General Longley expressed some views from which he dissented—at that very time, in 1891, the then Government went to the country upon the statement that they had received an invitation from the American authorities to renew the treaty of 1854, and the Government wished to consult the people as to whether it was advisable to renew that treaty.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.
With modifications.

The PRIME MINISTER. There might have been modifications, but I will come to that. At all events, the broad issue put before the people of the country was that, in the opinion of the Government, it would be to the advantage of the Canadian people, and especially to those of the maritime provinces, that that treaty should be renewed. Now, what were the broad conditions of that treaty as regards the people and the fisheries of the maritime provinces? The broad features of that treaty were that the fishermen of both nations should have access to the waters of each country, and free access to the markets of each country. Notwithstanding that our fisheries are more valuable by far than the American fisheries are, the latter are a mere nominal quantity, and though all the fisheries of the Atlantic coast are Canadian fisheries, yet we gave to the American fishermen the privilege of using our waters in consideration of our having free access to their market for our fish. I have always understood that we were ready to give to the American fishermen the use of our fisheries, provided they gave us access to their markets.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not since 1878.

The PRIME MINISTER. From 1854 up to 1866 it was so, but the hon. gentleman says it is not so to-day. Perhaps it is not, but what are the reasons? What has taken place since to change the condition of things? Again, I do not pretend to speak with authority, or with technical knowledge, but I am informed that at the present time the great objection which our Canadian fishermen have to the admission of American fishermen to our waters is that the latter are allowed to use the purse-seine and other destructive engines, the use of which is denied to Canadian fishermen. Therefore it stands to reason that if the Americans were given the joint use to our waters, and were allowed to employ these destructive methods of fishing which are denied to our fishermen, and properly so—I say it stands to reason that the American fishermen would be placed at a great advantage, while ours would remain in a position of inferiority. Now, the advantage of the new treaty arrangement regarding fisheries, is this: My hon. friend is aware that under the treaty of 1888 American fishermen have to a large extent the use of our territorial waters.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not for fishing.

The PRIME MINISTER. They have the use of our territorial waters to this extent, that they can make them the basis of their operations to carry on fishing on the high seas. So that while they are able to make our territorial waters the basis of operations on the high seas, and while they are allowed to use these destructive engines to which my hon. friend has alluded, there is at the same time this condition of disparity, that our own fishermen are not only denied the use of those methods of fishing, but they have no market for their mackerel.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, the United States have to pay every dollar of the duty now. The supply there is not equal to the demand, and never is.

The PRIME MINISTER. If the hon. gentleman means to say that under such conditions the Canadian fishermen are standing on a footing of equality with the American fishermen, I cannot agree with him. I do not think the hon. gentleman's statement will hold good that the Canadian fisherman is on a footing of equality with the American fisherman in the Boston markets for his mackerel.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. They want his fish.

The PRIME MINISTER. They can have it from the American fisherman, but the Canadian fisherman has to pay a duty. Whatever my hon. friend may say with regard to the old threadbare question as to who pays the duty, I think if he comes to the question of fact, he will find that the Canadian fisherman is at a great disadvantage when he has to meet the American fisherman in the Boston market.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me one word. I am tempted to remind him that an authority who do not always agree with me on political economy, Mr. Jones, of Halifax, who both buys and sells fish, explained in this Chamber, as the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will remember, when we were discussing the rebate of certain duties, that on the mackerel to which we particularly referred, the duty was paid in the United States, on the very good ground common to all political economists, that the supply was not equal to the demand.

The PRIME MINISTER. I withdraw the question from the arena of political economy, which I cannot discuss at this moment. But I have to say this, that at the present time, unless I am greatly mistaken, Canadian fishermen would look upon it as a boon if they could send their fish to the Boston market on the same footing as American fishermen send their fish. No amount of quibbling will take away this bare and common sense fact. I am not prepared to say that I have absolute and accurate knowledge on that, but I give the view I have derived from the history of the subject. It may be that my views will have to be modified owing to changed circumstances which have arisen since the treaty of 1854. What I had in my mind was this—and I think hon. gentlemen opposite will support me in thinking it desirable—that it is most important to the Canadian people that we should enter upon new negotiations with the United States, so as to secure, if possible, an international agreement with respect to the use of purse-seines. I even believe it possible to open negotiations at Washington and lead the American authorities to understand that this is a question much broader than any matter of municipal law, that it has become a question of international law, that there should be international regulations to prohibit the use of those destructive engines on the high seas; I hold that this question possesses a broader aspect than that given to it by hon. gentlemen opposite, and I believe we would certainly meet not only the wishes, but the best interests of the Canadian people, and of the fishermen of the maritime provinces especially, by adopting such a course. If it were possible to obtain from the American authorities their consent to enter into an international arrangement to prevent the use of these destructive engines not only in the waters of the Atlantic but also in the waters of the great lakes, it would be desirable. My hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), when at the head of the department, made great efforts—I will not say that they were always wise efforts, and I will not say otherwise, but they were commendable efforts from his own point of view—to protect the waters of the great lakes from the depredations of American fishermen. While we were taking precautions to preserve the fisheries on our side of the lakes, the Americans on their side were taking no precautions whatever, but were wantonly destroying their fish. Would it not be desirable that international regulations should be adopted on the great lakes, to apply to both sides of the lakes, in order to prevent the destruction of the fisheries and at the same time adopt facilities for the propagation of fish. Under such circumstances it seems to me there is ample room for ascertaining whether we can arrive at any arrangement, and at all events negotiations are advisable upon the subject. As to what form these negotiations should take, how far they should be modified from the position occupied in 1854 in view of recent events in another matter on which I am open to conviction; but I give my view, and it is that at all events we should endeavour to have the American authorities and the Canadian authorities reconsider the whole subject of the fishery regulations.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not intend to enter into this discussion to any great extent, but I cannot permit the leader of the Government to assume for a single moment that the people of Canada, that the fishermen of Canada who are so directly interested in this matter would ever consent to adopt the proposal that was suggested, I think, in the unfortunate interview which the hon. gentleman gave to a Chicago newspaper reporter—free fishing for free fish. That was the broad statement made there, and I was very glad to gather from what the hon. gentleman just stated that he is quite open to investigate that subject—

The PRIME MINISTER. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER—with a view to modifying the statement made by him on that occasion, because in my judgment nothing could be more unjustifiable, so far as the interests of Canada are concerned, than the adoption of such a proposal. No such proposal ever was entertained by any Canadian Government, no such proposal was ever approved by any Canadian Parliament either before or since confederation. The treaty of 1854, as the First Minister has correctly stated, was highly popular throughout Canada. It was denounced by the United States, very strongly in opposition to the views of all the people of Canada. There can be no doubt that under that treaty great benefits accrued to the trade and business of every part of Canada, and especially the maritime provinces. There can be no question that under that treaty an immense trade was created and expanded which was for the general interest of Canada, but it is also well known that while the benefits resulting from the treaty of 1854 were highly appreciated in this country, those benefits were still greater relatively to the United States. Notwithstanding that fact, the government of the United States terminated that treaty as soon as its provisions allowed—which was in 1866—and I have no hesitation in saying that the Prime Minister was quite right when he said there was a strong desire manifested and continued efforts made by subsequent governments for the purpose of obtaining a renewal of that treaty. But there can be no doubt that public sentiment in regard to the value of that treaty has greatly changed in the intervening period. It must not be forgotten that confederation had not then been accomplished, and that the abrogation of that treaty was calculated to produce a general paralysis of business of every kind in the maritime provinces which had at that day practically no means of trading except with the United States. Confederation itself has rendered us, the maritime provinces especially, vastly more independent since the cancelling of that treaty than we were before, and therefore we are not in the same position we occupied then. But the treaty of 1854 contained no such provision as that of free fishing for free fish. The First Minister was quite right in saying that that was a prominent feature of the treaty, but the slightest examination of the treaty itself will remind that hon. gentleman that Canada obtained large and important concessions independent of a free market for their fish in the United States under that treaty of reciprocity, considerations to which the people of Canada attached the greatest possible value. In the treaty of 1871, when the late Sir John A. Macdonald acted as one of the joint High Commissioners, the hon. gentleman is aware there is no such provision embodied as free fishing for free fish. The hon. gentleman is aware that under that treaty the fishermen of the United States and the fishermen of Canada and Newfoundland were permitted to enjoy the use of the fisheries of the two countries on equal terms; but that treaty provided that an arbitration should be held for the purpose of ascertaining the increased value of the fisheries of one country over the fisheries of the other, and under that arbitration my hon. friend will remember Canada was awarded $5,500,000 for eleven years' use of our fisheries by the Americans, or something like half a million per year. It was, therefore, anything but a question of the Americans being allowed to enter the waters of Canada for the simple privilege of our being allowed to have the markets of the United States. I do not for a moment question the advantage of our having in the United States a free market for our fish. There is no doubt that so far as regards the mackerel fishery, the people of the United States are so dependent upon the waters of Canada that it makes practically very little difference; but my hon. friend (Mr. Davies) was quite right in saying that the fishermen of Canada would regard it as a great boon to have a free market for their fish in the United States. But, Sir, they would not regard it all as an equivalent for permitting the American fishermen to come into the jurisdictional waters of Canada for the purpose of fishing. One of the principal reasons for that objection undoubtedly is, that there is every reason to fear that if they were allowed free access to our waters they would adopt the same methods which have ended in the destruction, almost the annihilation, of the fisheries of the United States. Under these circumstances, there is, I am satisfied, the strongest desire on the part of Canadian fishermen that no arrangement should be made that will open the waters of Canada to the fishermen of the United States. At all events, no person who has taken the trouble to investigate the subject can arrive at the conclusion that any person in Canada would for a single moment entertain the question of "free fishing for free fish." I do not propose to prolong this discussion, Mr. Speaker, although it is a very important one. I agree with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that this view of the question does not exactly appertain to the motion before the House, but I think it very fortunate that there has been an opportunity given for an expression of opinion upon this subject; an expression which may lead the Government (in any question of negotiations for altered commercial relation between Canada and the United States) to be extremely guarded in what they do, so far as this great and important question of our fisheries is concerned.

Mr. GILLIES. I am quite content to accept the suggestion of my hon. friend (Mr. Davies) and withdraw the motion. At the same time, I must say that I have every reason to congratulate myself and my friends from the lower provinces upon the very interesting discussion that has taken place upon this important matter. I may state to my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies), and also to the Prime Minister, that the motion had a dual object. The first was to ascertain what was being done under the joint commission that was appointed in 1892; and as to what suggestions had been made by that commission with a view of preventing the use of those destructive engines, such as purse-seines, upon the extra-territorial waters. The second object of the motion was to permit the discussion which has taken place upon the general value of our inshore fisheries. I do trust that the Prime Minister (Mr. Laurier) will permit the views that he made known to the correspondent of the Chicago "Record" to undergo such a modification with regard to this matter as he has given us to believe that he will. Our fisheries are a great inheritance and they have been jealously guarded since the earliest days, not only by the colonial government, but the British government as well. The latter government in the '50's sent out armed vessels to guard our coast fisheries. From that day to this our fishing rights have been carefully guarded by every government that held sway in Canada. I do hope, if my hon. friends opposite have an opportunity of negotiating a treaty at Washington during the period they are in power, that they will remember that one of the most important things they have to bear in mind in negotiating a successful treaty will be the great value of the inshore fisheries.

THE CLAIM OF THE MESSRS. CONNOLLY.

Mr. CAMERON moved for :

1. A copy of the claim made by the Messrs. Connolly against the Government for $44,459 and of an amended claim of $70,418, and of an Order in Council respecting said claims dated 27th January, 1896, and of another Order in Council relating thereto dated the 7th May, 1896.

2. A copy of all Orders in Council and other proceedings relating thereto referring each of said claims to the Exchequer Court, and of all other papers connected therewith.

3. A copy of the judgment of the Exchequer Court and of all proceedings connected therewith, thereon.

4. A copy of the contract on which said claims were based.

He said : Mr. Speaker, I desire to make just a few observations on the motion that I propose to submit to the House. I would not have ventured to address hon. gentlemen at all were it not that I believe that the circumstances connected with the matter I am about to discuss render it necessary that I should do so. Those of us who sat in the Parliament of Canada in the session of 1891 will have some recollection of an investigation that took place before the Public Accounts Committee, in which the firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co. had some little interest. They will recollect that there was a long investigation before that committee touching frauds alleged to have been committed upon the public treasury by McGreevy and the Connollys, with the connivance of the Public Works Department. It will be recollected also that upon the presentation of the report of the committee there was a long discussion in this House upon the subject. Now, I had supposed at the close of the session of 1891, and after the complete and somewhat thorough investigation which took place before the committee, and after the exhaustive discussion upon the floor of this Parliament; I had supposed, and indeed I think every one expected that we would hear no more of the Connollys in connection with contracts from the Government or raids on the public treasury. Sir, I thought myself—and I daresay every member in the House at that period thought—that the startling disclosures that were made in connection with the Esquimalt graving dock and the still more startling disclosures that were made in connection with the Kingston graving dock, and the still more startling disclosures that were elicited before the committee and discussed in the House in connection with public works in the city of Quebec; I had thought that these would have ended for all time the connection of the Connollys with the Government of Canada, and that no further claims would ever be made upon the treasury by them for extras or anything else. Sir, we know something of the history of these contracts. We know that that firm had three contracts, the aggregate amount of which was $2,184,259. We know by the evidence submitted to the Public Accounts Committee, that the taxpayers of Canada had to pay for those contracts the sum of $3,138,234, or a clear loss to the people of Canada of $953,975; or, allowing, as was then stated, more than a fair profit to the contractors of $253,975, there was a raid on the public treasury by somebody, and with somebody's connivance, to the extent of over $700,000. We know, from that investigation, to some extent, at all events, what became of this large sum, which was paid to these contractors, over and above the contract price. We know that it was established by the oral testimony given and by the books produced, that a considerable portion of that sum went into the hands of leading men supporting the then Government, and into the hands of some members of that Government to be used for purposes that were in no sense justifiable—I use no stronger language. But what became of the whole sum then abstracted from the public treasury, we did not then know, and I dare say we shall never know, in this life at all events. The investigation of this huge and gigantic fraud resulted in what? In the expulsion from Parliament of a gentleman who sat in this House for many years, and in the expulsion from the Government of one who had been a leading member of the Government for many years. It resulted in more than that, Sir. It resulted in the trial of two of the men implicated in these frauds before a jury of their peers in the city of Ottawa. It resulted in their conviction and in their sentence by the presiding judge to a term of twelve months' imprisonment in the common jail of the county of Carleton. It is true; they did not spend twelve months in jail. Within two months their health failed, and they were released by order of the Government of the day. Now, Sir, one would have supposed, I must confess I supposed, and every thinking man in Canada supposed, that that was the end of this matter. One would have supposed that, when these men were released from prison, and when they had abstracted from the public treasury $900,000 more than their contracts called for, that was the end of the matter. You supposed it, Mr. Speaker, but, if you did, you were never more mistaken in your life. That was not the end of it. The Connollys, after having extorted these immense sums, bided their time for another raid on the public treasury. Like wise men, they bided their time until the eve of a general election. Things had changed, and men had changed. I have no doubt, from facts in my possession, that they had attempted the same thing during the reign of Sir John Abbott; I have no doubt that a similar attempt was made during the days of Sir John Thompson; and I have just as little doubt that during the supremacy of Sir Mackenzie Bowell these men made the same attempt. They failed. But other men were to the fore now; other men guided the ship of state; and the Connollys were on hand. We find that they presented an additional claim to the Government for $44,459 in January last. Was the claim rejected? Did the Government of the day tell those men: We have already overpaid you; we have a judgment of the court against you, and we will not consider your claim; in the first place, you have not complied with the contract; you have not got a certificate from the engineers in charge of the works; therefore, we cannot admit the justice of your claim? Not at all, Sir. That was not the stand taken by the late Administration. On the contrary, they referred this claim of $44,459, by Order in Council dated the 29th of January last, to a referee or a commissioner—not to the judge of the Exchequer Court, as they ought to have done, if they entertained the claim at all; but to the judge of the Exchequer Court, not as the judge of the Exchequer Court, but as a referee or commissioner. The singular thing about it is that this claim of $44,459 is in connection with the Kingston Graving Dock. Now, every man who sat in this Parliament in the session of 1891, knows that it was shown beyond peradventure that the contract for that work was obtained by the Connollys by the clearest possible fraud and forgery, which I charged then, and charge now, the Department of Public Works connived at. You see that what I complain of is not what is past and gone. My observations, so far, have been solely with the view of leading up to what I consider a rank scandal on the part of the late Administration. So far, you will see, this claim was recognized to some extent by the late Government, for they passed an Order in Council referring it to a commissioner. It seems to me that the late Administration were pliant, submissive, plastic as clay in the hands of the potter, for they yielded to the Connollys. Having got an admission of the claim of $44,459 and a reference of the claim to a referee or commissioner, the Connollys felt that they were masters of the situation. They had the Government by the throat. They could do with the Minister of Public Works and the other members of the Administration just what they liked, by some process that I know nothing of. But I know this, that, unless they had a pull on the Administration, they never would have had that reference to a referee. They were playing a game of poker with the late Administration, and everybody knows that the leader of the Opposition knows that game thoroughly, but he was no match for the Connollys. They were bound to go him one better, and they went one better; and, having got a reference of their claim for $44,459, they put in an amended claim for $70,418. They asked the Government to allow them to amend their statement of claim. They asked the Government to amend the Order in Council, and the Government, submissive, pliant in their hands, yielded to their demand.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Who was the referee?

Mr. CAMERON. Judge Burbidge; but it was not referred to him as a judge of the Exchequer Court. The Government took care to refer it to him not as a judge with the responsibility of a judge, but as an individual, a "commissioner," as he is called in one place, or "referee," as he is called in another. On the 7th May, 1896, this Government which pretended to guard the interests of the great tax-paying body of this country so amended their Order in Council as to refer the whole claim to the referee or commissioner. Why should this be done at this late stage? The claim was stale; it was as old as Methusaleh. If these men had a bona fide claim against the Government, why should it be left to stand until the gentleman who is now the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) became First Minister? I hope the papers I called for will throw some light on the subject. If the hon. gentleman had been in Parliament in 1885—and I believe he was not—he would have known that he had overpaid these men, as was practically admitted before the Public Accounts Committee. Will the hon. gentleman kindly condescend to tell us why we should waive the terms of the contract? He may say that it was because the engineer was dead. That is true; but all the engineers were not dead. There were others ready and willing to estimate the value of the extra works claimed for. I would like to know the real reason why he waived the terms of the contract, and I am sure a great many others would like to know also. It is because I want to thoroughly understand the grounds upon which the late Administration dealt in this manner with the contents of the public treasury that I move for these papers. The hon. gentleman knows well that by the action of his predecessors the country lost $900,000. Was he prepared as Prime Minister to advise that we should lose $70,000 more? I hope that when these papers come down, Mr. Speaker, they will throw light on this mysterious transaction.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have no objection to the motion now in your hands, Mr. Speaker. It is a very proper motion, and I only regret that it was supported by a very improper speech. I am sure that hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House would be better prepared to discuss this question if we had the papers before us. Had the hon. gentleman made this motion calling for the papers and, when they were in the hands of hon. members, discussed the question and placed it in as strong a light as he is able to do, I think we should be better prepared to deal with such a question. But the hon. gentleman, taking advantage of the fact that these papers were not before the House, taking advantage of the fact that hon. gentlemen, many of them new members or gentlemen who had not been members when the transaction to which he referred took place, has used very strong and, I think, very uncalled for and improper language in support of his motion. The hon. gentleman starts with a false premise. He gives as an evidence of corruption, of malversation in office, and, in fact, of everything that is bad, that the expenditure in connection with the Connolly contract was greater than what the contracts were made for. I undertake to say that this is an entirely false basis on which to place the argument. There is no gentleman in this House who has any acquaintance with public contracts who does not know that that is the normal state of affairs in connection with these works. Whether one party or the other is in power, the cost of public works is usually greater than the amount for which the contracts are let. Take the contracts on the canals, take the railway contracts either under the Administration of Mr. Mackenzie or under the Administrations which succeeded his, and it will be found that the actual cost of public works has been enormously in advance of the sums for which the contracts were originally let. That proves indisputably, in my judgment, that is no evidence of corruption, no evidence of wrong-doing, that a public work costs the country a much larger sum than the original estimate. I say therefore that the very basis upon which the hon. gentleman relied for the strong and unjustifiable language he used is an entire fallacy. The Manchester Canal has been referred to, and it is in the knowledge of gentlemen on both sides, that that great work, not built by a government, but by private capitalists, cost nearly three times the amount of money for which the contract was originally let. Yet, although the parties concerned were driven to their wit's end to raise the money in order to complete the work, I have no recollection—and I was in England at the time—of any portion of the press, or any one else, ever insinuating that there was the slightest wrong-doing or misappropriation of money on the part of the people engaged in the contract. If that be the case, why should it be treated as absolute proof of wrong-doing that a public work should have cost more than the original contract. The hon. gentleman, of course, knows that I was not in the country at the time that this ancient history, through which he has been wading, was being made. He has made, however, a great many statements in that connection through which I do not intend to follow him, because I was not only not in the Government but not even in the country. But he insinuated that the Government had been guilty of great partiality in releasing Messrs. Connolly and another contractor from prison before their sentence was completed. If the hon. gentleman had only turned around to the gentleman by his side, he would have learned that that eminent member of the medical profession was the very authority on which the Government felt justified in acting, and he would have learned also that the hon. gentleman who sits in beside him had joined his professional opinion to the statement that the health and life of these people required their release from prison. I was not consulted as to whether this opinion was unsound or not, but I think it seems to indicate that it was not exactly a party opinion upon which the Government acted, so far as the professional gentlemen, who gave that opinion, are concerned. But the hon. gentleman made another reference that I think we should have been spared. It was one that I think no hon. gentleman on either side of this House should ever make in this Parliament. He impugned the integrity of a judge on the bench. The hon. gentleman says that this reference had been made to a friendly referee.

Mr. CAMERON. No.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman shakes his head. I took the words down at the time, but if he says he did not intend to say that, I will assume that I misunderstood him. That is a position that I think no hon. gentleman in this House, who has regard to the high character and standing of our judges, ought to make. No imputation ever should be made by any member of this House, under any circumstances whatever, that would tend, in the least degree, to impugn the integrity and impartiality of any judge. If the time ever comes when it is necessary for any hon. gentleman in this House to take such a position, it should be followed up by the proceedings that are necessary in order to test the soundness of such an opinion. We are all interested, no matter to which party we belong, every Canadian is interested in maintaining the high character for the impartial administration of justice which should be possessed by every occupant of the bench; and I think I am warranted in saying that if there is anything in our country of which we have reason to be proud, it is the independent and impartial administration of our judiciary. Why was it necessary to make an insinuation of that kind? I care not whether the private party interested be a man who stands high or low, I care not whether he be a man of great wealth and standing and influence or in a very humble position, that comes before the Government for justice, I take the ground that whether a man has been found sinless or not in other and previous transactions, the Government have nothing to do with that, when a claim for justice comes before it, and the claimant asks for an impartial arbitrament of his case. It is one of the first principles of British law and justice, that a claimant shall have his claim fairly and impartially investigated. What has been done? Has any money been taken by the Government of Canada and given to Mr. Connolly? Not a dollar. Has anything been done of which the hon. gentleman according to his own statement, because we are without the material to discuss the question in the absence of papers, has proof to warrant the strong language he has used? No such thing is asserted. All that the hon. gentleman undertakes to assert is that the man had a public contract and claims that the Government owe him a certain amount of money and that the Government submitted the case to Judge Burbidge—a man of great experience, whose impartial administration of justice has never been challenged. The Government were willing that Judge Burbidge, who is familiar with such cases, whose whole life and business are spent in dealing with just such cases, should act in this matter. The Government were willing that Judge Burbidge should be placed in a position to fairly investigate this claim, and find out how much money, if any, is due the contractor, after going into everything connected with the claim. I fail to see what there is so very objectionable in that. I fail to see anything in it to warrant strong and unguarded language which the hon. gentleman used. It lowers the tone of this Parliament and the position of this country in the eye of surrounding countries, when gentlemen are to be found in Parliament who will make such free use of the very objectionable terms of "raiding the treasury," "fraud" and every thing of that kind, in the use of which the hon. gentleman seems to delight. Where does the hon. gentleman get his impression that there is no honesty in man? What induces him to believe that the gentlemen charged with the administration of public affairs in Canada are so corrupt, so unworthy, so dishonest, as to desire to take money from the public treasury and give it to any person? I say that the hon. gentleman does himself no credit. Because when you are called to estimate the acts of other men, you are accustomed to look within and to believe that other men will do what you would have done if you were in the same position. That is the only reason I can suggest for the hon. gentleman using the strong and unqualified epithets that he did. I was not in the country when this contract was let, nor am I familiar with the investigations that took place. All I know is that the then Minister of Public Works, a gentleman whom we all know as of high standing and high character, who did honour to the House of Commons by his presence here and by his conduct as a public man for many years, a gentleman who was afterwards called to the Senate—this gentleman brought down a proposal and an Order in Council which was endorsed by and had the concurrence of the late Minister of Justice, Mr. Dickey, whom all gentlemen on both sides of the House who know him, will acknowledge to be a gentleman whose character and integrity are of the highest. Under these circumstances, I was not prepared to say that I would object to having a reference to the judge of the Exchequer Court, which was constituted for the purpose of dealing with just such cases, to decide, after full investigation, in the light of all the evidence that could be put before the judge, just how much money was due by Canada to Mr. Connolly. All I can say is that I hope I may never be called upon to answer any charge of a worse character than that. In the absence of the papers on this question, I do not intend for a moment to discuss them. But I regret that the gentleman moving for the papers, instead of having them laid upon the Table of the House where members on both sides may be in a position to consult them, should take the opportunity, in the absence of the papers, to endeavour to prejudice and prejudice the case in the mind of members of the House and in the opinion of the country. I must point out how very objectionable is the mode that has been adopted now for the second time in relation to questions which are legitimate subjects for discussion, and which could be so much better dealt with in the light of the information that the papers would afford were they brought down. For my part, I have no objection to the motion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The facts of the case are not, perhaps, without some interest. To the old members of this House they are well known. In 1888 or 1889, I do not remember which, when apparently Connolly was not in the field, Bancroft got a contract for the construction of a graving dock at Kingston. That contract was investigated in 1891. I will not go into what the hon. gentleman has called ancient history. The facts of the case, as they came before me when I was sworn as Minister of Public Works, I will relate. I found that on the 7th of May, 1896, His Excellency had sanctioned an Order in Council, which reads as follows :—

On a report dated May 2, 1896, from the Minister of Public Works, submitting that on the 29th January, 1896, an Order in Council was passed on a memorandum dated 28th January, 1896, from the Minister of Public Works, stating that in connection with their contract for the construction of the Kingston Graving Dock, Messrs. Bancroft, Connolly & Co. have filed with the Department of Public Works a claim amounting to $44,459.10 for certain extra work executed, and also in connection with the detention of the plant, and on account of damages caused to one of the cribs of the outer piers, which claim they desired to be looked into and allowed by the Department of Public Works.

That since the Order in Council of 29th day of January, 1896—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman will allow me to draw his attention to the rules of Parliament providing that no Minister is allowed to quote from public documents in his possession unless he is prepared to lay them before the House at once. I suppose the hon. gentleman intends to do so.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am just reading the papers preparatory to laying them on the Table of the House.

That since the Order in Council of 29th of January, 1896, was passed dealing with the said claim, and referring the same for adjudication to the Exchequer Court, the said firm of Messrs. Bancroft, Connolly & Co., now N. K. & M. Connolly, have filed an amended claim with the Department of Public Works claiming the total sum to be due to be $70,418.61, the excess over the former claim being owing to clerical errors therein and to the addition of items omitted by inadvertence from former accounts, and of interest claimed for moneys alleged to have been due for some years.

Well, Sir, when I had read the first part of that Order in Council, I was very anxious to read the balance of it, because it seemed to me that able men, and there is no doubt that these were able men, like the Messrs. Connolly, who had filed the claim, would not have forgotten an item of nearly $40,000. I read on and what did I find? I found that the Government of which the hon. gentleman was the leader, had waived the rights of the Crown in every shape and form. We all agree that the humblest citizen has the same rights as the highest citizen to equal justice. The courts of justice are for all citizens. I found that the Government of the hon. gentleman waived all the rights of the Crown. On that point I certainly will not be contradicted. But I will make myself better understood by reading on :

That in the said Order in Council it was stated that before the claim of the said N. K. & M. Connolly could be examined, in fact before the full completion of the work, the resident engineer, Mr. W. O. Strong, who had superintended the work during its construction, died before any items of the claim could finally be discussed and adjusted with him, and further that the contract entered into with the Messrs. Bancroft, Connolly & Co. stipulated, as is usual in the contracts entered into with the Department of Public Works, that no claim for extras would be recognized unless supported by authority in writing of the engineer in charge, and the claimants have represented the difficult position in which they are placed by reason of the impossibility of producing the evidence of the said engineer to support their claim. The Minister recommends in view of the fact that it is necessary that a reference to the Exchequer Court should bear upon the full amount by Messrs. N. K. & M. Connolly, and further, so as to remove any doubt as to the conditions to the said reference, that the said Order in Council be amended.

And in that amendment is included the following stipulation :

That except as to prices as aforesaid, no provision or stipulation contained in the tender, specifications or contracts, shall be allowed to govern, which might prevent the said claimant recovering what they may be in fairness entitled to, and that this is to include a waiver of the certificate of the Chief Engineer of the Department of Public Works prior to payment.

Sir, I have said elsewhere that on many occasions officers in the Department of Public Works were prevailed upon to do things against which their conscience and judgment revolted; and I state from my seat here that on this occasion the officers in my department were overruled from beginning to end.

The reference was made, not to Mr. Justice Burbidge, but to Mr. Burbidge as a commissioner. The dates, I hope, have not been lost sight of. The first Order in Council was dated 29th January, 1896. The second Order in Council, by which the rights of the Crown were waived, was dated 2nd May, 1896, when the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) was at the head of the Government. The reference was acted upon on 15th June. The proceedings were very brief, lasting only three days, and judgment was rendered on 2nd July. The judgment against the Crown was for $45,296, precisely the same amount that Connolly & Co. owe the Crown by virtue of a certain arrangement that never should have taken place. The hon. gentleman is aware that there was a claim against Connolly & Co., by order of this House, for over half a million dollars. That claim was settled for $60,000 in round numbers; $10,000 to be paid by Larkin—he was obliged to pay up his share—and the balance by Connolly & Co., but they never paid their share. It is now paid, if we are bound by this award. The leader of the Opposition has stated truly, that we should never lower the dignity of the bench. Surely we are not guilty in this case; it was not our party that referred these claims to Mr. Burbidge. I will follow my usual practice of stating just what I think. At the very time that this claim of Connolly & Co. was referred to Mr. Burbidge, the Government thought proper to refer to him a claim by Mr. Goodwin, which had been discussed during the last session of Parliament. There was only one opinion entertained by Parliament, and it was that Goodwin's claim was a bogus claim; but in that case the Government also waived the rights of the Crown, and we have been condemned to pay $73,000. At the same time as the reference of Goodwin's claim was made and the claim of Connolly & Co. to Mr. Burbidge, a claim by Murray & Cleveland, of Toronto, was referred to the same commissioner. It is a great pity that so many claims which have been discussed before Parliament, and which had been declared unjust and unfair claims, have been referred to Mr. Burbidge. The Crown has waived its rights, and Mr. Burbidge has adjudicated upon the claims as they have been presented to him. There is nothing easier for a man to do than to lose his case, when he wants to lose it. I do not know whether we are bound by this Connolly award. Mr. Connolly came to my office, a few days after I had been sworn in, and asked me what I was going to do. I told him I did not consider that the Crown was bound by the award, but at the same time I would carefully investigate the case and see if there was any justice in the claim. I discussed the matter with my responsible officers, and their opinion is that, if there is anything due to Connolly & Co., it is a very small sum indeed. The award was given. The Crown did not have to pay the costs, but they were paid by Connolly & Co. themselves. Those costs amounted to $693, which Commissioner Burbidge charged for his work, and that, I suppose, is a very reasonable amount, but I do not say anything about the charge. I state this fact just to point out that the leader of the Opposition is altogether wrong, when he speaks of judges in this case. It was not a judge who acted in it; it was a commissioner, and so much is that the case that the commissioner has charged a fee of $693. If I have been well informed this award was deposited in the Bank of Montreal, and, on payment of $693 being made, it was delivered to Connolly & Co. So there is no question as to the dignity of the bench; it was a commissioner who acted on a case referred to him. Connolly & Co., I have been informed, paid the costs themselves; the Government have certainly not paid a cent. There was an amount of $693 paid to Commissioner Burbidge—I suppose there is no harm about it—and he has made an award. I have nothing more to say, except that I will refer the case to the Department of Justice, which will have to deal with it, after I have investigated the facts, and after the session I intend to go into it very carefully with my engineers. As the leader of the Opposition has said, whatever may have been the faults of Connolly & Co. in the past, if there is any money due to them, they are certainly entitled to it. About that matter there is no difficulty. If there is any money due to them, it will be paid to them.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I had not the pleasure of hearing the leader of the Opposition address his remarks to the House, but I am informed that, referring to the matter of Connolly being released, he said that he was released on a certificate given by me. I believe the hon. gentleman referred to the hon. member who sits beside the hon. member for West Huron. Did the hon. gentleman refer to myself?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes; I was informed, and, indeed, I thought it was a matter of public notoriety, that the hon. gentleman had agreed to the certificate as to the state of health of those parties.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I wish to inform the leader of the Opposition that he is entirely mistaken. I never gave any certificate of the kind.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am very glad the hon. gentleman has had an opportunity to make this statement, for I have heard it very frequently mentioned, or I would not have thought of referring to it.

Mr. McMULLEN. I desire to say a few words on this very important question. Every time this matter is stirred up, new facts of a very unpleasant and disagreeable kind are brought to the surface. We have learned to-night, from the papers submitted to the House, additional information on the whole question, and the surrounding circumstances point out very clearly and distinctly that, if there was not corruption intended, there was an intention to offer very reasonable terms on which an advantageous settlement for the contractors could be reached on the eve of the general elections. The leader of the Opposition has said that he was not here when the contract for the undertaking was let; that he was not aware of all the incidents connected with the inception of the contract and the construction of the work. Can he give a plausible reason why he took the whole matter out of the hands of the court that properly should dispose of it, and put it before a referee who was not discharging the duties of a judge. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) took a judge off the bench who ought to have adjudicated the claim in his judicial capacity, and he appointed him as a referee under certain instructions to decide the claims of Connolly & Company. It is quite clear that the leader of the Opposition made this move to meet some urgent appeal on behalf of somebody, possibly on behalf of Connolly & Company, and probably for the purpose of getting into the better graces of men who might be of advantage at the then approaching election. The hon. gentleman told us that in the past history of this country, as a rule all these contracts have far exceeded the estimates. We are sorry indeed to have to admit that that statement is true, so far as contracts let under the Conservative Government are concerned. I have been in the House for fifteen years and I have never known the Tory Government to let a single contract through the Public Works Department, which contract remained in its original condition for any length of period after it was let. An alteration took place in every single instance. The moment a tenderer got the contract then changes were made day after day, month after month, and year after year. In the case of the Kingston graving dock the contract was only left for a short time when changes were made. Take the Langevin Block. Why, Sir, the foundation was not dug until a change was made in the quality of stone to be used. Let us contrast that with the erection of public works in the province of Ontario. Have there been such practices in that province ?

An hon. MEMBER. Yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. No, Sir ; I deny it. The Parliament Buildings in Toronto were built within the estimates, and the same applies to nearly every public work undertaken in that province. The leader of the Opposition has cited the case of the Manchester Ship Canal as having cost three times more than the original estimate, and he would have us believe that there was nothing unforeseen in connection with the construction of that gigantic undertaking. Well, Sir, he brought that case up in the House before as an argument why we should not be surprised because public works in Canada cost extra. Does the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) not know the difficulties that surrounded the completion of the Manchester Ship Canal. He must know because he was living in England at the time. The fact is that immediately after the survey of the canal and letting of the contract a suit was brought by the city of Liverpool to prevent its construction, on the ground that it would carry the sewage of the whole city of Manchester into the Mersey. The work was commenced at the time that action was taken, and for two or three years it was kept hanging because of a law suit of enormous cost. To obviate the difficulty they had to build the canal alongside the River Mersey making it two or three miles longer than originally intended. And, Sir, in order to carry the trade clear past Liverpool in trans-Atlantic vessels fully laden, they deepened that canal to an unexpected depth. Does not the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) know that, and does he not know that all that extra work had to be done owing to the opposition of the city of Liverpool. Yet he gets up here and he cites the case of the Manchester Ship Canal as an excuse for all the increased cost of public buildings, and canals, and graving docks in Canada. Does not he know also that unexpected difficulties, quicksands and other things, which had to be overcome were encountered at the very start in the case of the Manchester Canal. The fact is that at one time they thought they would have had to abandon it, and although it did cost an enormously increased amount they carried it through, and it stands to-day one of the grandest engineering feats of the British Isles. This is the second time the hon. gentleman has cited this case in the House as an excuse for the enormous extra cost of Canadian public works. I hope he will not fancy this House so ignorant as to bring it up for a third time.

Sir, there is no question about it, but that scandals and disgraces of an unpleasant character have been for years mixed up with the letting of our public contracts in this country. We on this side of the House have deplored the great squandering of public money in this direction. Sir, this country will long remember the disgraceful doings in connection with the Langevin Block, the Curran Bridge, the Tay Canal, the dredging contracts, the graving docks, and all the rest of it. I sincerely hope that all these things are past, and that a better day has dawned for the people of this country. I believe firmly that the scandals and disgraces and extravagances that have characterized proceedings in connection with public works in this country for the last ten or twelve years, have disappeared never to be seen again. I tell my worthy and respected leader, and I tell him in the face of this House, that if he ever lends himself to things of that kind, I will never consent to swallow what hon. gentlemen opposite have done for the sake of party. When my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition came to this country he no doubt made a most gigantic effort to bring the old Tory ship safely into harbour once more. But, Sir, she had got down in the trough of the sea ; she was rotten from stem to stern ; her masts were sprung and her sails in rags, and she refused to answer the command of her captain. Her rudder was virtually useless, and she had a mutiny on board. He made a very vigorous and determined effort to bring her safely to port, but she was wrecked upon the rocks of public indignation for her own misdeeds. We hope we have seen the last of the scandals which occurred under the Conservative Government. We never want to see them repeated, and, Sir, I think that we never shall. The electors of this country have taken my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition down from the dignified position he occupied as First Minister, and they have relegated him to the stool of repentance for all time. We hope that it will do him and his associates good, that after a while they will be purged and purified; and if it ever should fall to their lot to be again placed in power by the people of this country, it is to be hoped they will make a more honest effort to administer the affairs of this country than they have done during the last eighteen years. But I think their return is a distant day. I believe the evidences of honesty, ability and statesmanship shown by the gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches to-day indicate an earnest desire on their part to banish for ever those experiences; and as long as they administer the affairs of this country honestly and honourably, I believe the people will keep them where they are.

Mr. LISTER. Mr. Speaker, we have got, as far as it is possible at the present moment, the facts relating to the contracts of Connolly & Co. I may say here that Mr. Bancroft was a fiction; no such man as Bancroft existed. The contract was awarded to Bancroft, but the tender was in fact that of Connolly & Co. They put in two tenders—one in their own name and the other in the name of Bancroft. As my friend the Minister of Public Works has stated, an action was brought by the Government against the Connollys, and the Connollys had an opportunity then, if they really had a claim against the Government, to set off the claim which was afterwards referred to arbitration; but it was kept back along with the other matters. The result of the settlement was that the Dominion Government appeared to be entitled to something like $60,000 against the Connollys. That was the settlement of the civil proceedings entered by the Government against them. It requires no lawyer to state to the House, because it will appeal to the judgment of every hon. member that in an action of this kind between the Government and other parties, just as between two individuals, there is an opportunity to have every matter of difference adjusted and settled. But there appears to have been no claim made on behalf of the Connollys for this $40,000 odd in the trial of the case of the Queen against the Connollys. So that we must come to the conclusion, so far as that claim is concerned, that it was an afterthought. There is no doubt that the fact of the Connollys allowing their claim to remain in abeyance for so long a time, and forcing it, so to speak, just before a general election, is a suspicious circumstance in itself. Whether the Government received any contribution from these men or not is of no consequence. It looked as if the Government were anxious that the claim should be settled in some way, not for the purpose of giving these men justice, but for the purpose of securing their support. We find that these men pressed their claim shortly before the general election, and we find that after the Government was defeated this claim was decided by a commissioner by reference—a gentleman not acting in his capacity as a judge at all; and the language of the hon. leader of the Opposition reproving my hon. friend from West Huron (Mr. Cameron) was entirely uncalled for. Judge Burbidge was not sitting on that case as a judge; he was sitting on it as an arbitrator, and as such charged fees to the litigants. If he had been sitting as a judge, he would have been entitled to charge nothing, as the country paid his salary; but, as a matter of fact, he sat not as a judge, but simply as a referee or an arbitrator. That is proved by the papers on the Table, and it is further established by the fact that before giving up his award he charged the fees of an arbitrator, amounting to $600 odd. So that we may dismiss at once any question as to the position in which Judge Burbidge acted upon these two cases. If that case stood alone, it might be different. But, strange to say, we find that at the same time Murray & Cleveland claimed to have a charge against the Government, on account of their contracts, of $80,000, which they had been pressing for a long time, and which the Government, for some reason, refused to adjust until just before the election. At the same time that they agreed to refer the Connolly claim, we find that they agreed to refer this claim of Murray & Cleveland. The matter was hurriedly pushed through; an arbitrator was agreed upon—an able man, I will admit. I do not for a moment pretend to say that so far as he was concerned, there was any impropriety at all. But I do say, as my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works said a moment ago, that if you confess that you are guilty, if you admit the claim of your opponent, it is not to be wondered at that the judgment will be against you; and we find the Government of the day in Council consenting that every defence they held against the claim of these men should be waived. What was Judge Burbidge to try? The Government had waived every defence to the action, and all he was to do was to go through the form of finding how much might be due to these people. But, Sir, that is not all. There is the claim of Charlebois in connection with the Langevin Block—a claim that had stood from 1886, I think; a claim outlawed, of ten years' standing; a claim which the Government had never recognized or acknowledged in any way. Suddenly the Government become satisfied that it was necessary that that claim too should be recognized and settled—under a contract that bears upon its face either the grossest negligence on the part of the engineers, or corruption—one or the other; because, as my hon. friend says, from the moment that contract was made changes took place from time to time It is true, as my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) says, that for years, I will venture to say since the late Government went into power in 1878 to the time they were ejected from office in 1896, there was never a contract completed which did not involve enormous extras. The extras on the Langevin Block were nearly as much as the original contract price. At the time of the investigation of 1891, Mr. Charlebois was in Europe; nobody could get him to give evidence. His claim was investigated, but Mr. Charlebois could not be found; and this claim has dragged along from then until June, 1896, when the Government make up their minds that it ought to be adjusted in some way or other; and what do we find? We find that the claim was not left to Mr. Burbidge, but to private arbitrators, gentlemen who occupy no official position at all. Two arbitrators were appointed to try it, and Mr. Shanly, of Montreal, a former member of this House, was appointed as the third arbitrator. But the claim was to be adjusted without Mr. Shanly ever having been informed or knowing that he had been appointed arbitrator at all. Sir, we have a letter of Mr. Shanly's. In so great a hurry, it appears, was the Government to settle this claim finally, that the third arbitrator was never notified, and never knew that he was connected with the case one way or the other. Here is Mr. Shanly's letter:

Sir,—The Hon. Mr. Tarte, in his speech at Knowlton, "Star," 31st July, stated that I had been named by the late Government as 'Referee' in a claim made by Mr. A. Charlebois, contractor, against the Department of Public Works and that an Order in Council to that purport had been drawn and "submitted." This, being "news" to me, I took to be one of those random assertions not unusual in stump speeches and, therefore, was surprised to read in the "Star" of August 1, confirmation by the Hon. Mr. Desjardins, late Minister of Public Works, of what had been proclaimed from the stump by Mr. Tarte. My object in asking insertion of these lines is just to say that the late Government, either through the Minister of Public Works or otherwise, never communicated with me on the subject of Mr. Charlebois's claim and that for the first intimation of my appointment as Referee and of the Order in Council, in the framing of which I was not given an "option" touching the use of my name, I am indebted to your report of the Knowlton speech. Absence from the city has prevented me from taking earlier notice of what, in so far as my name has been brought in, seems like a somewhat unbusinesslike fashion of doing business in a public department.

W. SHANLY.

Montreal, August 5, 1896.

Sir, it seems almost incredible that a Government should have decided that the claim of over $250,000, should be adjudicated upon by reference to arbitrators, and then have failed to notify the referee of his appointment or of any of the proceedings taken from first to last. Such, however, is the fact, and there is the letter from the referee, stating that the speech of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) was the first intimation he got of his appointment or of the Order in Council. One cannot suppress the feeling that these cases have been at least dealt with with undue haste. Let what charges be made against the Government that may be necessary to investigate these matters; but, I say, that having allowed this claim to stand for years, it was a most suspicious circumstance, that, on the eve of an election, it should be hurriedly put through, the Government waiving every defence it had, and allowing the claimant to get judgment against the country for a large sum of money.

Mr. McCLEARY. One of the principal weapons which have been used by the Liberal party in their attempt to overthrow the Conservative Government and party all these years has been that of suspicion. They have endeavoured by the system of maligning the public men connected with the Conservative party, to create the impression that the men who have been controlling the destinies of this country for all these years have been men of most dishonest and corrupt character. They have attempted, by a system of suspicion more than anything else, to gain the ear of the public in this regard. I would not have risen in my place to say anything on the question just now before the House, had it not been for the statement made by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). The hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) has told us that in nearly all the public contracts that have been let in this country, the final expenditure had exceeded very largely the original estimate. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) took exception to that. He said it was not the case, and he cited the Parliament buildings in the city of Toronto as an instance to the contrary. In that case, he said, the expenditure was kept within the estimates. Now, this is my first term in this Parliament of Canada. I have read and heard a good deal of the hon. member for North Wellington and of the position he has taken in this House. Well, Mr. Speaker, if his statements in the past are not more to be relied upon than what he has said this evening, I think that very little weight can be attached to them. Any hon. gentleman in this House, who is acquainted at all with the expenditure in connection with the Parliament Buildings in Toronto, knows well, that not only was the original estimate exceeded, but that it was exceeded by more than one-half. Let me give you, Sir, briefly the interesting history of this undertaking. In 1880 the Minister of Public Works of Ontario, then the late Hon. C. F. Fraser, asked the Ontario legislature for an appropriation of half a million dollars, and that appropriation was granted. He said that it would be ample for the erection of the building, completed, and handed over to the province. Competitive designs were advertised for and several plans were submitted to a committee of experts, which consisted of the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, Mr. Storm, Architect, and Mr. Waite, Architect, from the city of Buffalo. These gentlemen sat in consultation upon these plans, and two Canadian sets were adopted. The department then advertised for tenders, and it was ascertained, when the bids were all in, that the lowest tender exceeded the amount which Parliament had appropriated. The Minister of Public Works, did not come down to Parliament until 1885, when he told the legislature that it would be impossible to have buildings erected suitable for the province for the half million dollars voted, and asked for an additional $250,000, which the legislature granted him. And, moreover, Sir, the hon. Minister of Public Works stated from his place in Parliament at that time that this additional quarter of a million dollars, making a total amount of $750,000, would complete and equip this building, and that the building would be constructed after one of the Canadian plans that had been adopted by the committee of experts who had examined into the matter. But, when the bids had been asked for, it was found that, for some reason, the Canadian plans were defective, and Mr. Waite, of Buffalo, the American architect, was asked by the Department of Public Works to come and pass an opinion upon them and see if they could be adjusted so as to meet the requirements of the Minister of Public Works. Mr. Waite rejected both sets of plans, and said that neither of them would do, and he himself submitted plans to the department at Toronto, and his plans were accepted as the ones which should guide the contractors in their bidding for the erection of this building. Well, Sir, bids were asked upon the plans submitted by Mr. Waite, and the contract was let for $752,000. Mark what I told you a moment ago—that the Minister of Public Works had declared from his place in the House that the $250,000 he had asked for would complete these buildings. They went on and spent the $752,000, and what did they have for it? They had the bare walls of the building; they did not have a door, they did not have a window, they did not have a floor or even a roof over the building. And, before that building was completed, it cost the people of Ontario $1,400,000. Of course, Mr. Fraser, the Minister of Public Works, declared from his place in the House that he had never intended the equipment, the lighting or the furnishing of the building to be included in the original amount asked; and possibly he did not. Now, we in the province of Ontario did not complain about this; the Conservative party did not complain about it; Mr. Meredith, now Chief Justice Meredith, then the leader of the Conservative Opposition, did not complain that we did not get value for the money spent. But we did complain, and complained righteously, against the Canadian sets of plans being set aside and an American architect being invited to furnish the plans and getting the commission upon the work. No one suspected the Minister of Public Works of being dishonest, of being a corruptionist, or of stealing from the public treasury of Ontario, notwithstanding that we had to pay $1,400,000 for a building which the department declared would not cost more than $750,000. Now, what will the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) say to this, after having stated here before the representatives of the people that the expenditure on the parliament buildings of the province of Ontario was kept within the estimates? I say that gentlemen opposite are proceeding along lines of suspicion only. I have nothing to say with regard to the question actually under discussion. But, being to some extent a practical man, I think I may claim to know a good building when I see it; and, in my opinion, the Langevin block is an ornament to the city and a credit to the Dominion, and I believe that for the sum expended upon it the people have received good value.

Motion agreed to.

GRAIN STANDARDS.

Mr. DAVIN moved for :

Return of all correspondence between any person or persons and the Government on the subject of grain inspection in Manitoba and the North-west and complaining of the manner in which the grain standards have been selected, and all correspondence relating to the subject of mixing grain at the elevators, also to the manner of weighing and buying grain.

He said: This is a subject of the greatest importance to the North-west Territories and Manitoba, and one in which the people there take the greatest possible interest. It is one that is not new to this House, at least to those members who were in previous Parliaments, and the new members of this House are sufficiently interested in matters of this kind to have had their attention directed to the needs of the farmer in this respect. I am glad to see evidence that there is a great deal of interest taken in this matter this session. Last session I brought the matter before the House, and my hon. friend, the then Controller of Inland Revenue, held out hopes that the Government would deal with it. He assured me that the Government would inquire into any charges of frauds that had been made, and promised that if frauds were found to exist, redress would come. The hon. gentleman who at that time represented Winnipeg in this House, spoke at considerable length on the subject, and he declared positively that frauds existed, and that advantage was taken of the farmers in the North-west Territories. The hon. gentleman who is now the leader of the House spoke sympathetically in regard to that matter, and said :

I think the hon. Minister would do well to allow my hon. friend from West Assiniboia to have his committee and investigate the question.

Now, Sir, the reason I have not moved for a committee this session, was because the session was likely to be so short that the committee would be functus officio.

An hon. MEMBER. What does that mean?

Mr. DAVIN. It means that it would not have any power to go on. But, Sir, after that question had thus been brought before the House last session, we, that is, certain senators and members of this House who are interested in that subject, pressed on the Controller of Inland Revenue to deal with it. The House will remember that I brought a resolution before it, passed by one of the large agricultural societies in Manitoba, and that at the very time I was pressing the necessity for action on the attention of the Government, I received a letter from the secretary of the Patrons of Industry of Regina County, as follows :—

N. F. Davin, Esq., M.P.,

Dear Sir,—I was requested to send you a copy of the following resolution passed at the last meeting of above.

That is, the Patrons of Industry of Regina County.

That whereas, by a Dominion Act certain regulations are set forth whereby the grain standards of Manitoba and the North-west Territories are adjusted by a Grain Standard Board each year, said Act also provides that No. 1 Hard Manitoba and North-west wheat shall be sound and well cleaned, weighing not less than 60 pounds to the measure bushel, and shall be composed of not less than two-thirds hard Red Fife wheat, and whereas, said standard board frequently fixed grade No. 1 hard to weigh much more than 60 pounds, and to contain more than two-thirds hard Red Fife wheat. This causes great dissatisfaction, and we believe by thus altering the grades each successive year, it causes great depreciation in the value of our wheat in foreign markets through the confusion of grades.

Therefore, it is resolved that in the opinion of this Regina County Association of the Patrons of Industry, the standard grading should be abolished, and that a fixed Government standard be permanently established.

I am, sir, yours faithfully,

(Sd.) EDWIN MEADOWS, C.T.

Now, that is what we contended for as the solution of the difficulty, that we should have a permanent grain standard for No. 1, for No. 2, and for No. 3, so that the farmer would be able to carry round with him, just as the mechanic carries a rule, his glass bottle as a fixed standard by which he could measure his wheat. When a year came that you had exceptionally good wheat which might grade several degrees higher than the standard, the farmer could get the advantage of it. But at present, when a great country like the North-west Territories and Manitoba have had their yield, the buyers and the farmers, too, who are associated with them, take the wheat and mix it up; they mix scoured wheat with the very best wheat produced in the territories. Now, the farmers hold, and those of us who have looked into it are convinced, that in consequence of mixing scoured wheat with the best wheat, the farmer is deprived of the full advantage of his crop. Not only that, but in the North-west Territories, where we produce the very highest grade of wheat, we do not get credit for the grade we produce. While we were pressing this on the Minister, there comes to his office another communication signed by Charles Braithwaite, provincial president, and W. C. Graham, provincial secretary of the Patrons, which I will read :

“To His Excellency the Governor General in Council :

Hon. Sir,—At a recent convention composed of delegates from all over the province of Manitoba and from all parts of Assiniboia in the Territories, held under the jurisdiction of the Grand Association of the Patrons of Industry, the undersigned was authorized by them to submit the following as their decision in reference to the matter set forth below :—

Re the amending of the Grain Standards Act, it was unanimously decided that the standards be fixed permanently in the fall of 1896. That such board for fixing same should be composed of at least one-half producers; also that the Standard Act should be amended as follows : One hard, hard extra,” and so on. This, of course, to use a vulgar but expressive phrase, knocked endways all the pressure we were bringing to bear upon the Minister; and the Minister was able to flaunt before us this communication, said to be from all the Patrons of Industry in Manitoba and the North-west Territories. But palpably there was some misunderstanding, because a letter from the Patrons of Industry of Regina County, dated February 18, 1896, endorsed the action we were taking. Well, Sir, I wrote this letter to Mr. Meadows :

Ottawa, February 29th, 1896.

Edwin Meadows, Esq.,

Dear Sir,—I have to acknowledge yours of the 18th instant, conveying to me a resolution of the Patrons of Industry to the effect that as regards wheat, a fixed Government standard be permanently established.

This is what we have been working for and some progress was being made, but our efforts have been marred by the following petition to His Excellency.

I will not presume to say that Mr. Braithwaite and his friends do not know what is in the interest of the farmer as well as we do, but I certainly thought it would have been better not to postpone action until the fall of 1896.

Yours truly,

N. F. DAVIN.

We have had a communication which would seem to indicate that the view we took last year in favour of having a permanent grain standard, and to have it as soon as possible, was the right view, and not that which was put forward by those gentlemen, who effectually put a spoke in the wheel of those who were pressing their views on the Government at that time. I hold in my hand an extract from a report of the minutes of the Manitoba Central Farmers' Institute Convention, held in Brandon, July 14, 15, 16, 1896, and this is what it says :

Report of Committee on Grain Standards, Elevator Monopoly and Transportation Charges.

Mr. President, ladies and gentlemen,—

Your committee fully realize the importance of the work allotted to them under the above heading. And that not only the success of our farmers, but our country generally depends largely on the measure of relief granted. That the present and future outlook for low prices make it absolutely necessary that the cost of production and placing our crop on the world's markets must be reduced, or in other words, the farmer must receive a large percentage of product of his labour than under existing circumstances.

We believe that it would be advantageous to all concerned if grain standards or grades could be fixed on some more permanent basis than at present, the fixing of standards for our wheat we submit should be such as to enable the farmer to secure the full market value of his wheat, whatever its quality and to enable him to know exactly what is its relative value, and this can be better accomplished by a permanent grade than by one changing from year to year.

We hold that this is principally a farmer's question, more so than an exporter's, seeing that after all very much of our wheat is exported—not on the grade or standard fixed, but by certified samples made by the different exporters to suit their own convenience and profit. Hence the necessity of a classification of our wheat which would not admit of too much manipulation by making grades wide apart in price or value.

We think it would be a grievous mistake simply to reduce the number and so widen the grades as to absorb wheats which might vary considerably in value. As the whole of wheat purchased under such grades would be sold by farmers on the basis of grade, and all having wheat of higher quality would not receive value for their product and would naturally not aim at keeping up the quality of our wheat; and we deem it very important that our reputation should be maintained for a high grade, hence the recommendation with reference to this point which is attached to the following resolutions, all of which are submitted for your approval.

1. That in the opinion of this Institute the Grain Standard Board of 1896 should consist of at least one-half farmers, or representatives of farmers.

2. That the Dominion Government should so amend the Act as to make permanent the grades and standards as fixed by the said board with reference to grades 1 Hard, 2 Hard and 1 Northern.

3. That in deciding upon their permanency the board be requested to take into careful consideration the varying qualities of our wheat from year to year in the past.

4. That the word "Manitoba" be prefixed to all permanent grades of wheat, grown in this province.

In the North-west there is a strong feeling among the farmers that injustice is done to them in having Manitoba the classifying word for all wheat grown in the western country, it being known as Manitoba No. 1, and so on. We think that we ought to have a grade known as North-west, that in some way or other a phrase should be devised that would embody the idea of the North-west, so as to have its claim acknowledged. I am assured by farmers in parts of my own constituency, for instance around Moose Jaw and Regina, that they have from year to year produced a higher quality of wheat than that produced in Manitoba, high as is the grade produced in that province, and it is unjust to us that we should be asked, we being the larger country and bound within a very few years to have tens of thousands of acres of wheat more than Manitoba, to bring our wheat under the classification of Manitoba. So I must not be supposed to agree with this portion of the report, but it is most important to bring it before the House and before the hon. Controller of Inland Revenue at this time.

Mr. DAVIN.

5. That Manitoba No. 1 Hard shall consist of at least 75 per cent of hard wheat, to be sound, well cleaned and weighing not less than 61 pounds to the bushel.

6. That Manitoba No. 2 Hard shall consist of at least 66 $\frac{2}{3}$  per cent of hard wheat, to be reasonably clean but not clean enough for one hard, weighing not less than 60 pounds to the bushel.

7. Manitoba No. 1 Northern shall consist of not less than 50 per cent of Hard wheat, sound and clean, weighing not less than 60 pounds to the bushel.

8. That a copy of the foregoing resolution be forwarded to the Department of Inland Revenue, also to our federal members and to the secretary of the Winnipeg Board of Trade to be placed before the Standards Board when they meet.

9. That we ask the co-operation of both local and federal governments to aid in securing the placing of our grades on the principal grain exchanges in England and getting market quotations on same, thereby giving us a true conception of the export value of our wheat.

In regard to the elevator monopoly, I have to say this, that the resolution I have placed on the paper points to complaints of the farmers in my district to this effect. They say the way the wheat is weighed and the way it is graded is unjust to them. For instance, a farmer will come to you and say: "If you will come to my barns, you will see a large quantity of grain all of precisely the same character. I go in on a certain day with a load, and it is graded No. 1 hard or No. 1 extra. The next day I go in with a load from the same heap, but, instead of the grade being No. 1 hard, it is probably No. 2." The farmer will not accept the grading, and he goes to another place, and his wheat is graded as he thinks it ought to be graded. The complaint is that there is something wrong in the way the wheat is graded, and not only so, but something wrong in the way it is weighed. Farmers tell me, and I have seen it myself, that buyers will not allow any fractions to the farmers, all fractions going to the benefit of the buyers. That surely is terribly unjust. I sat down and tried to make a calculation as to the amount which is taken out of the pockets of the farmers and the North-west, and I estimated that in one year it would amount to tens of thousands of dollars. In regard to this subject, the resolution I have been desired to bring before the House is as follows :—

That we endorse the sentiments expressed by the Central Institute last year, on this subject and regret very much that the Canadian Pacific Railway have not seen fit to meet our wishes in the removal of an admitted grievance and an unjust restriction which causes serious loss in many districts.

Your committee fully acknowledge and appreciate the effort made during the past season by the executive of the Central Institute and would emphasize the necessity of still further following up the work by again urging the Canadian Pacific Railway to consider this matter, at the same time laying before them any further information obtainable, that will tend to strengthen our case.

As bearing on that point and cognate to it, there is the cry of the farmers in the North-west, that freight rates are oppressive ; and it was a great consolation to them, and they were filled with hope, when we were told that the present leader of the Government had come into power, that the freight rates would be dealt with. I have been told that there has been some disappointment felt in the west by the answer that was given to me by the leader of the House, when I asked him a question with regard to the promise he had made at Moose Jaw. This is what they say :

TRANSPORTATION.

We endorse the sentiments of the Central Institute, as expressed last year in this matter, and deeply regret that the Canadian Pacific Railway apparently cannot see that by their excessive freights they are seriously retarding not only the producing power of the farmers of this province but their consuming power as well, and as a consequence reducing to a great extent the carrying traffic of their own railway.

Your committee are of the opinion that the Central Institute has already fully discharged its obligations to the farmers of this province in so far as petitions to the railway companies and our legislative bodies are concerned in connection with this matter, and we feel that the time is fully ripe when we should discuss the advisability of taking more potent action in this issue. (Nothing definite was done with this clause, unless it was assumed to be carried with the motion which followed.)

That the Dominion Government be requested to amend the Railway Act so as to require railway companies to furnish all reasonable facilities for receiving, forwarding and delivering freight, and that the wording of such petition be left to the executive of the Central Institute.

Now, Sir, in connection with that I should like to call the attention of the Controller of Inland Revenue to a proposal in regard to this matter that has been placed in my charge by the farmers of my constituency. It is to the effect, that the Government should co-operate with the railway and with the steamship companies for the purpose of enabling the farmer to ship his wheat direct to the broker in Liverpool, or in case it should be found advisable, to London sometimes. At all events, the proposal is that the farmer should be enabled to ship to the broker in the old country, and he can then send his wheat direct in bags marked with his own initials. In this way there would be avoided the mixing process that takes place at Port Arthur, and which the farmers contend takes away from their legitimate profit and lowers the undoubted high standard of the grain they produce. Last year when this subject was before Parliament I had the strong support of the late member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) and this is what he said :

I understood him to say that he would be very glad, if these frauds were pointed out to him, to bring legislation into this House to cure the evil—

Mr. PRIOR. If there are frauds.

Mr. MARTIN. There are frauds ; I do not think there can be any possible doubt about that. There always will be frauds, I fancy—

Mr. PRIOR. No, no.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not ask the hon. gentleman to take my word for it, but I think he might pay some attention to the declaration of his hon. supporter from West Assiniboia. I think it must be within the knowledge of every member of this House that purchasers of wheat, like purchasers of every other article, will take advantage of every opportunity—and no doubt they have had considerable opportunity in this wheat trade—to buy at a lower grade and a lower price than is just, and that I think may fairly be denominated fraud. But the hon. gentleman who has just left the office of the Controller of Inland Revenue (Mr. Wood) has pointed out that this is an evil which it is almost impossible to cure by means of legislation. Parliament can provide what the grade shall be and take means to prevent frauds by the Government inspectors, but, as the hon. Controller of Customs (Mr. Wood) has pointed out, it would be a very uphill job indeed to make an Act of Parliament to prevent frauds of the kind referred to by the hon. member for West Assiniboia.

And again he said :

I understand the desire of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) who moved the motion is to elicit such information as to enable this House to legislate in the interests of the farmers. I am satisfied that so far as the interests of the farmers are concerned, the grades of wheat should be made permanent, not only as regards No. 1, but as regards No. 2 and No. 3 or any other grades that are considered desirable in the country.

I commend that to the hon. the Controller of Inland Revenue, as coming from a gentleman who was allowed to take a very prominent part in the Liberal opposition last session. And, Sir, if the Controller of Inland Revenue will look into the principal organ of the Liberal party to-day he will see that one of the railway men in the United States has made an appeal to the railway companies there to treat the farmer different from what they have been accustomed to treat him. This gentleman points out that they have been accustomed to make special rates to the buyer of wheat, rates more favourable than they will make to the farmer. These rates are not in existence for carrying wheat until the crop is bought up, and thus a more favourable rate is given to the buyer than to the farmer.

Well, Sir, the farmers of the North-west Territories feel that in regard to the buying of wheat from them, in regard to the grading of wheat, in regard to the system of fixing standards, in regard to the mixing of scoured wheat with their perfect wheat, and in regard to the transportation, they feel that they are at the present time in a state of great disadvantage and in a condition that calls for action on the part of the Government. I have shown the House that the leader of the Government (Mr. Laurier) did last session speak sympathetically in regard to the motion I brought before the House, as also did a gentleman who took a prominent part in the late Opposition, the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). I see that the "Globe" to-day writes in a very favourable way of the claims of the farmers, and my hon. friend and colleague from Eastern Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) is taking a very commendable part in these matters. That hon. gentleman is chairman of a committee and en passant I might express the hope that when that committee meets again I shall get some notice of it. Of its first meeting I got no notice whatever, nor could I find that any of my Conservative friends got notice; any way I got none, and when they meet again I hope I shall be informed. I say, we are taking a very great interest in these matters now.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friends opposite say "Hear, hear," but I remember when I first tried to interest the House in these very same questions the interest was not so great as it is now. But, as Mr. Disraeli educated his party, I suppose I may say that we have educated both parties just as my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Taylor) and other members and myself have educated the House on the subject of the Alien Labour Law. Having indicated to the hon. the Controller of Inland Revenue (Sir H. Joly de Lotbinière) and to the House what are the features of this question that ought at once to occupy the attention of the Government, what my object is in asking for papers, and why it is I have not moved for a committee (namely the brevity of the session), I have no more to do than to move, seconded by Mr. Sproule the motion which stands in my name.

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir H. Joly de Lotbinière). I had no idea until recently that there was so much to consider in connection with the question, and so many difficulties in the way of rendering justice to all parties concerned, not only in the growing of the wheat, but in the transporting of the wheat, the sorting of the wheat and the wheat trade generally; and I have been so short a time associated with these matters that I hope the House will be indulgent with me if I say that so far I have only begun to understand the question. The first thing that drew my attention to it was a meeting with the millers of Ontario, who called upon me about a fortnight ago to try to secure a settlement of this very question which has now been brought to the attention of the House with so much care and detail by my hon. friend. I discovered at once that there were three different interests concerned in the question, only one of which was there represented, namely, the millers; and they could not expect their proposal to be entertained without my giving attention to the other interests. First of all, we have the interest which I really look upon as the most important, and the one deserving of the greatest help and sympathy—the producers'; secondly, there is the interests of the dealers, who purchase the wheat from the farmers, and send it to the millers or export it; and, thirdly, there is the interest of the millers. Every year about this time a board meets at Winnipeg to decide what the standard shall be for the year's crop. So far there has been no rule for the composition of that board—as to the proportion in which these three different interests ought to be represented upon it. In fact, I do not think the question has been considered in that light before. For this year I do not know whether I have made a mistake in having a board of fifteen members, with five representing the farmers' interest, five representing the dealers' interest, and five representing the millers' interest. I know that this division does not meet the views of many of those interested in the question in the North-west. My hon. friend a short time ago read some petitions sent by the Patrons of Industry and other associations of farmers in the North-west, asking that one-half of the board should be farmers or producers of wheat. Well, as I said a moment ago, I think the producers of wheat ought to have a paramount, at all events a very great part, in settling the standard; but nevertheless, I would not put everything in their hands; because even in their own interest we must keep up the standard and the reputation of our wheat. What has been said by my hon. friend shows the difficulty that exists, even regarding the appellation of the wheat. My hon. friend protests, as representing the part of the country he comes from, against putting all the wheat under the name of Manitoba, and he wants a distinction made between North-west and Manitoba wheat. Then, there is the question whether there should be a permanent standard or a standard that will vary from year to year. At first sight it appears rather illogical to have a standard changing every year according to the crop and the season ; but on that point opinion is so much divided that the House will see how difficult it is to settle the question on the spur of the moment. For my part, it has seemed to me that there was a want of logic in the way our standards were fixed, for we have really two standards. We have the standard fixed by the board at Winnipeg, which last year placed No. 1 hard at 62 pounds, with two-thirds of hard, while the law fixes No. 1 at 60 pounds. The existence of these two standards accounts for the mixing done by the traders in order to bring the wheat which they export down to the No. 1 legal standard. Men who have given a great deal of attention to the question are of opinion that instead of having only that material standard of a certain number of grains of wheat, with a certain proportion of each kind, it would be much better to provide, since the law says so, that No. 1 hard must be 60 pounds, with two-thirds of one kind and one-third of the other kind. I think that would be much better than having the fixing of the material standard every year at so many grains of wheat in a little bottle which might be passed from one hand to the other. However, this is a matter which I think should not be altered hastily. Above all things, we have to consider the interests of those who grow the wheat, how any change would affect the position of the farmers in the North-west, and the hopes we entertain of peopling that country, and seeing at last a reward for all the sacrifices we have made in building the Canadian Pacific Railway. In view of the fact that in eight or ten days the standard for this season is to be fixed, I think it would be imprudent now to entertain the idea of making any change ; and I think we must not do anything which might discourage the farmers in the North-west or impair the attractiveness of that country to farmers who want to settle there and make a home for themselves and their children. I think we must deal with that question with the greatest tenderness, and not make any change at the eleventh hour. I hope my hon. friend will be satisfied to choose the different papers he desires out of the enormous amount of correspondence accumulated in the department ; and, in the meantime, I have not the slightest objection to the motion passing.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to me that there are two or three interests at stake in this matter, in regard to which it is desirable as far as possible to satisfy people who feel that there is a grievance. In the first place, there is the farmer of the North-west Territories. Now, he appears to have two grievances. One is with regard to the weighing, and that I think could only be remedied by appointing a public weigher, for even after the scales are examined, there is an impression in the minds of the farmers, that, in many instances, they do not get fair-play.

Whether that impression be well founded or not, it will always exist until a remedy is found. From information I have, I believe that, in some cases, there are just grounds for complaint, but I do not think it can be substantiated that such is the case at all points where grain is weighed. It appears to me that the difficulty can only be got over by appointing public weighers who would be sworn to do their duty faithfully between buyer and seller.

On the other hand there is an impression that a class of wheat, afterward called scoured wheat, is bought from the farmers at very low prices and then, after it undergoes the operation of scouring, is sold to the millers in Ontario and elsewhere, at a much higher price than it should be sold at, according to its quality. In this connection there is also a very serious grievance complained of by the millers down here. Let me give you an example. As the law stands, you are permitted to mix scoured wheat with No. 2 hard. The law provides that No. 1 hard shall weigh not less than 60 pounds to the bushel and contain not less than two-thirds red fife or hard winter wheat. What the farmers complain of is that they often supply wheat that will weigh 63 pounds or 64 pounds to the bushel, and yet get only the same price as for wheat weighing 60 pounds to the bushel. That would seem to indicate the necessity for another grade. From the information I have, I believe that it is desirable that a grade called "No. 1 Extra" should be provided, which would weigh more than 60 pounds to the bushel, and which, of course, will turn out a larger percentage of flour than wheat that only weighs 60 pounds to the bushel. Then, there is nothing in the law to prevent the mixing of scoured wheat with No. 2, although scoured wheat is not worth within 5 cents or 7 cents a bushel of what No. 2 hard is worth for making flour. There is sometimes only a difference of two or three cents between No. 1 hard and No. 2, but there is a difference of 5 to 7 cents between No. 2 hard and scoured wheat, and, therefore, it is unfair to mix scoured wheat with No. 2 hard and sell it as the latter. I know a gentleman who made a contract for five or six thousand bushels of No. 2 hard. The first consignment of 2,000 bushels might fairly be regarded as No. 2 hard, according to the standard it was selected from. Out of that, he made a class of flour that suited his requirements. Some months later he got a delivery of the balance, some 3,000 bushels, but in that consignment he found a very large percentage of scoured wheat, which was not as valuable for flour making as No. 2 hard, the difference being about 4 or 5 cents per bushel. He applied to the millers association for a re-examination in order to ascertain whether the last consignment was up to the grade which he had bought, by comparing it with the samples according to which he had bought. The law was turned up, and there was nothing found in it to prohibit the mixing of scoured wheat with No. 2 hard, and therefore, although the last consignment was not worth to him within 5 cents per bushel of what the first consignment was, and of what No. 2 hard ought to be, he had no redress. He does not like to go to law because he is a man who exceedingly dislikes going to court, but he feels that an injustice has been done him, and that, owing to the regulations of these standards, it is impossible for him to get his rights. My suggestion to remedy this would be the fixing of a standard for scoured wheat by itself, and not allow the mixing of it with any other grain, unless of a grade equally low in value. If that were done, you would prevent the danger of any fraud being perpetrated on the millers. It is also necessary to fix another grade for No. 1 hard, to be called No. 1 Extra, which would include all wheat that weighed over 60 pounds to the bushel. By making this expansion of these grades, substantial good would be done. For instance in Liverpool, where our wheat is largely sold, when they receive No. 1 hard and No. 2 hard this year, they will naturally conclude that each of these grades represents a certain settled quality of wheat; but if some years the No. 1 hard grades 60 pounds to the bushel and in other years over 62 pounds, confusion is created, and our wheat does not attain that stability in the foreign market which it should. It should be our object to have it known that each grade represents a certain fixed quality, and we would thereby have our wheat quotations as regular as those for western wheat from the United States. If my suggestion were adopted, the Government would be able to fix a permanent standard, which would be satisfactory, not only to the farmers but to the millers. My suggestion for remedying this I have given. It is for the Government to take the matter into consideration. If it is impossible for them to make any change in the standards this year, it is to be regretted, because I believe there is a substantial grievance on the part of the Ontario millers and also a substantial grievance on the part of the farmers of Manitoba and the North-west. Whether the farmer is getting justice or not, he believes he is not getting justice; and it is important you should satisfy him on this point. Many of them believe that there should be a permanent standard.

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. I would ask permission to say a few words in reference to the question of scoured wheat, which will be in explanation of the remarks my hon. friend led me to offer. I forgot to say that, when the deputation of Ontario millers came to me, they maintained the necessity and advantage of making a special class for scoured wheat, and that was decided upon; and I hope that when the board meets in Winnipeg, they will take that into consideration, and make a special class for scoured wheat. I have taken a note of what my hon. friend says about the other things, and I will see if it is possible to get some of these classifications agreed to at the meeting that is to take place.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. Controller of Inland Revenue (Sir H. Joly de Lotbinière) deprecates anything that would give a bad name to the North-west. I need hardly say that I am entirely with him in that. The way to secure the highest possible name for the North-west is to have the North-west wheat go to the ultimate market at its own standard, and not be depreciated by being mixed with scoured wheat at Fort William. The strongest opinion has been expressed to me by the farmers against mixing scoured wheat with their wheat. And I quoted, because I knew it would weigh with the hon. Controller of Inland Revenue and with the First Minister, the statement of the late member for Winnipeg (Mr. Joseph Martin), who spoke with the greatest emphasis endorsing this proposal. I suppose that just now it is impossible to carry out what I contend for in regard to giving us permanent standards. I am very much obliged to the Controller of Inland Revenue for the sympathetic way in which he has approached the proposals I have attempted to make. I have suggested to him whether he might not be able to arrange—of course, the Minister of the Crown can do more than a private member can—whereby the farmer would be able to send his wheat direct to the old country, the ultimate market. I have myself communicated with all the parties that I thought would be able to help in this matter, and I would appeal to the Minister to give his influence in the same direction. I have here a letter from one of the most intelligent farmers in the North-west Territories. No more intelligent man is engaged in agriculture in the North-west than the writer of this letter. The communication is short:

Headnesford, August 24th, 1896.

N. F. Davin, Esq., M.P.

Sir,—The petition signed by farmers in this district that I forwarded to you at Ottawa respectfully asking you to bring it under the notice of the Government and urging upon them the necessity for them to use their influence with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to grant to us the lowest possible through freight rate for wheat in bags, say for the present from Balgonie to Liverpool—the said petition was forwarded too late in the last session of Parliament for any practicable result any more than the acknowledgment of the practicability of the scheme. I again on behalf of the petitioners most respectfully ask you to bring it under the notice of the new Administration and urge upon them the necessity for them to use their good offices in urging upon the Canadian Pacific Railway Company the necessity for them to grant what we consider a reasonable request. Amongst the many reasons why we ask this favour are, 1st. We wish to avoid the men who are sent into the North-west to purchase wheat, because their business transactions have been with us most unsatisfactory. 2nd. We wish that the Northwest wheat may escape in future the mixing process that it has been subjected to in the past. 3rd. We are most desirous that the North-west wheat shall be placed on the English market in its pure state and there sold upon its merits. When these things are accomplished wheat growing in the North-west will become a fairly profitable industry, and it will be one of the very best means of bringing about immigration and inducing the right class of people to come to this country from Great Britain. Lastly, but not least, we are of opinion that it will be for considerable time to come the means of dispelling the clamour for the Hudson Bay Railway and it would aid very materially to increase the traffic upon the Canadian Pacific Railway. Hoping you will excuse me taking this liberty.

I remain yours,
J. HOLDEN.

I would urge the Minister to pay some attention to the suggestions of this farmer. I would also point out to him, what probably is hardly necessary to dwell upon, the wheat we send over now is highly appreciated by the English manufacturer of flour, because his wheat requires the mixture of No. 1 hard. But our wheat in its pure condition, unmixed with the scoured wheat, would be of far higher quality and would, of course, be still more highly prized and would fetch, as these gentlemen who have spoken to me on the subject say, a higher price. And the moment the manufacturers in England found they could get this high quality of wheat, they would take good care that every facility would be afforded for its transmission to them, just as in the case of the farmers of the North-west Territories, when they first attempted to send butter to British Columbia. It was not such an easy matter at first, but the very moment the merchants in Victoria found the quality of butter they could get from the North-west Territories, they secured every facility for its transmission, and the consequence was that the farmer who produced a high quality of butter, was able to send his product to the market. Now, here is another matter that will require readjustment from the hon. Minister, and that I would press upon him. It has been pressed upon my attention, not only by farmers who have spoken to me, but by my own observation. My hon. friend behind me (Mr. Sproule) has also suggested it to me. Why cannot the hon. Minister get his officers to overhaul the weights used in weighing the grain of the North-west farmers? They assert to me that these weights are not true, and even if their assertion is not well founded, it is necessary to disabuse their minds of such an impression. The evil of their supposing they are cheated is just as great—and I was going to say greater, though that might seem paradoxical—as though they actually were being cheated. I would urge upon my hon. friend, who has an officer in the North-west Territories, to let him go and see that the weights used at these elevators are correct.

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. My hon. friend knows that is the duty of the inspectors.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, but I also know that the inspectors do not attend to this matter.

The PRIME MINISTER. Then let them be removed.

Mr. DAVIN. It seems not to be considered to be their duty at present. I spoke to the Commissioner of Inland Revenue on the subject, and Mr. Miall said to me: "Well, that whole question of Weights and Measures in the North-west will have to be overhauled." I did not take a note of what Mr. Miall said, and I do not want the Minister to suppose that I am quoting him literally, but I understood him to say that the staff for the purpose is not sufficient, and that there would have to be some reorganization of the staff in order to accomplish what I suggested to the Minister. Well, I cannot complain of the manner in which the Controller of Inland Revenue has received the suggestions I ventured to make in moving for these papers. I will so far comply with his suggestion as to go to the office, and if the end that I have in view will be subserved by selecting from the papers, I would be most happy to do that. But meanwhile I propose that this motion shall pass.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am told that some members who have motions on the paper that we can reach in a very short time, are anxious to have an opportunity of making their motion. Suppose we go on until 11 o'clock.

The PRIME MINISTER. Certainly, I have no objection at all. I thought I was consulting the wishes of the House.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. CRAIG moved:

That Mr. Speaker be requested to issue an order prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors within the precincts of the House.

He said: I wish to make but very few remarks upon this motion. I have been asked why I did not move a resolution of this kind last Parliament. It has been said that then my friends were in power, and that was the time I should have made this motion. Well, I will give the same answer that I gave in speaking on the subject of prohibition last parliament; I said at that time that while perhaps it might not be practicable to have prohibition all over the country, that while we might not agree on that, there was at least one thing on which we could agree, we might have prohibition within the precincts of this House. I said that I had sometimes thought of making a motion to that effect, and my reason for not doing so was that I was comparatively a young member of the House, and I thought it better that some older member who had been longer here than myself, should do that. However, as there are a good many members in the House now who are newer than myself, I do not feel that the same reason prevents me now from making such a motion as this. It has been said to me since the notice has been on the Paper that there is no necessity now for making this motion, that the order issued by the Speaker a few days ago accomplished all that will be accomplished by the passage of this resolution. Well, Sir, I know that such an impression has gone abroad in the country. I was a little surprised to see an editorial in the Montreal "Witness," a paper which is usually well informed; but that editorial would lead all who read it to believe that the abolition of the bar will prohibit the sale of liquor in the restaurant connected with this House. Now, Sir, I suppose that most of the members of this House, at any rate, know that such is not the case; that while it is true that the bar is closed so far as members going to the bar and obtaining drinks is concerned, yet it is also true that liquor may be obtained by going down stairs and sitting at some table there, and getting liquor at meals, or with some refreshments. Now, I do not intend to say anything with a view to taking any party advantage in this matter. I do not look upon this at all as a party question. What I want to accomplish is something which I think will be for the credit of the whole House, without respect to party at all. But it seems to me that we cannot help a little party feeling passing through our minds sometimes; and when I read this editorial in the Montreal "Witness" praising up the Liberal party for doing what the Conservative party had never done, I just thought—and I wish to give the House the benefit of my thoughts on that occasion—I thought that if the Conservative party had done what is now done by the order of the Speaker, the Montreal "Witness" would not have been so ready to give us credit. Well, I suppose that shows that although it is as it says, an independent paper, yet it has leanings in a certain direction. I do not blame them for that, but at the same time I think they could do better than write that editorial, which I have not seen contradicted or criticised, and ascertain the facts of the case and give those facts to the public. I say this in answer to remarks made to me several times that there is now no necessity for the motion I intend to move to-night. I say, further, that I happened to be at the meeting of the Dominion

Mr. CRAIG.

Alliance when it was stated that owing to the efforts of some members of the House belonging to the Liberal party, the bar was abolished, at which the members of the Alliance rejoiced very much, and I and others received the impression that the sale of liquor was to be prohibited, just as I wish it to be prohibited by my motion. But I understand that the sale of liquor is not prohibited in the restaurant of this House.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Did you try?

Mr. CRAIG. That is rather a personal question. I wish the country to understand just how matters are, for I do not desire a false impression to go abroad on such an important question, and I think a good many people are under a false impression on this question. So I wish to repeat what I was saying when I was interrupted, that it is a fact that the sale was not prohibited within the precincts of the House by the order issued by the Speaker. I believe that the Speaker's intention was good, and I give him credit for doing what he did. I want, however, to go a little further than he went, and a good many members think with me in this matter. I wish to make a reality that which people now think is an accomplished fact, but is not. A great many of the people have gathered from what appeared in the Montreal "Witness" and the "Globe" that the sale of liquor was prohibited by the order of Mr. Speaker. That was not the case, but I wish it to be the case, for many hon. members have that impression, and I wish to make that impression a reality. That is one of the reasons I had for bringing this matter to the attention of the House. Another reason is that there is no need for liquor being sold within the precincts of this House. I have heard it stated that when the House sits to late hours some hon. members may need refreshment. Without making any invidious reflections, I think I may say that some of the hon. members who might need refreshment when the House sits late are not those who take refreshment, but that possibly some of those who take refreshment do not need it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name.

Mr. CRAIG. I only say it is possible, I do not say it is so; but I wish to remove any opportunity for this to occur. While some hon. members during late sittings might require refreshment of this kind, they would be willing to deny themselves for the sake of getting rid of what is looked on as an evil by a great many people in the country.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. You could carry a flask.

Mr. CRAIG. The hon. gentleman seems to know how to do it. I do not propose to interfere with carrying a flask, because that is not possible, but I do not want to take the responsibility of the flask. Another reason for my action is because of the feeling in the country. There is a public feeling that the sale of liquor within the precincts of the House is not a proper thing. We find that feeling entertained by people who drink liquor, who do not call themselves temperance men. I have spoken to men who are moderate drinkers, and they have agreed with my view that while perhaps they do not see anything wrong in drinking liquor and do not believe in a prohibitory law, they hold it would be better if liquor was not sold within the precincts of the House. I submit this motion also for this reason, that I desire to free myself from all responsibility in this matter, and at the same time give other hon. members an opportunity of doing so. If the motion does not carry, I shall have done my part. I shall have brought the matter to the attention of the House, and having done that, I shall feel myself released from all responsibility; but I have an impression that the motion will carry, for while I have heard some hon. members are not in favour of a prohibitory law, they favour a motion of this kind.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I do not know that I agree altogether with every word that has been said on this subject by my hon. friend, but neither personally nor as head of the Government have I any objection at all to the motion being adopted, and the Government has no objection to the motion being passed. The order given by Mr. Speaker was given in a way which he thought would meet the different views held on this matter by the members. There are some who are prohibitionists, and who hold that liquor should be prohibited altogether and everywhere; there are others who believe that temperance does not necessarily mean prohibition and total abstinence. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that the sale of liquor over the counter in the House of Commons was altogether improper. I am not ready to say that the sale of liquor as it was done under the order of the Speaker, and as is done in a club is of that character; it is not properly a sale of liquor, and the order of the Speaker was to the effect that liquor should be served as it is in clubs, to hon. members who wished to have it with their meals. If the sense of the House is to the contrary, if the sense of the House is, as it seems to be, that there should be no liquor at all sold within the precincts of the House of Commons, no matter in what form or way, and not only over the counter but even with meals, the Government has no objection that the motion should carry.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would not prolong this discussion, but I was very strongly impressed with the importance of some such movement as is proposed by my hon. friend who has submitted this motion to the House by what occurred during last session. The fact that liquor could be obtained within the precincts of this House enabled parties to publish very strong and unjustifiable censures with respect to the character and conduct of hon. members of this House, and I think in order to avoid the possibility of any grounds for such censures as were then published, and very extravagant censures they were, it is almost necessary to adopt the measure which has been proposed by my hon. friend. I shall certainly support the motion. I understand, Sir, that the same conditions existed under the late Speaker as would exist under your recent order. I understand that Mr. White when he occupied the position of Speaker gave instructions that no liquor should be sold at the bar, and in fact closed the bar. But the fact of liquor being allowed in connection with meals or refreshments, makes it an extremely difficult thing to promote that temperance which both you and the late Speaker have aimed at. At all events it has not protected the House from severe animadversions on the part of the press, and on public platforms throughout the country. In my own judgment I do not believe it would be possible to collect an equal number of gentlemen in any part of this country, or in any other country, amongst whom temperance is more uniformly the rule. I do not believe it would be possible to find a Parliament anywhere where greater self restraint is exhibited on the part of its members. I have had the opportunity of seeing Parliaments in other lands, and in my judgment the conduct of members of this House of Commons, in respect to temperance, compares most favourably with that of the members of any deliberate assembly in any part of the world.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. On the present occasion I am mainly influenced by the desire to protect the members of this House from such aspersions as have been cast upon them—I think most undeservedly—and which it is not unlikely may be repeated unless we adopt the stringent rule proposed by my hon. friend (Mr. Craig) of preventing any intoxicating drink being sold within the precincts of this House.

Mr. ELIIS. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that a resolution of this kind is of little importance, unless the rule is carried out in its entirety. I have been informed that there are other places, not under the control of this House, where liquor can be purchased and, if that be the case, it seems to me that we are not stopping the overflow, if there is such a thing, but that we are merely transferring from one part of the Parliament building to the other the traffic which is supposed to be carried on. If an effort is to be made in real earnest to stop what is undoubtedly an evil, then the matter should be carried further than it can be carried by the resolution offered by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Craig). It only applies to places under the control of this House. We may pass this resolution, but, if the sale of liquor is permitted in another part of the building, nothing more will be accomplished. Sir, than what was accomplished by your first order.

Motion agreed to.

RESIGNATION OF LATE GOVERNMENT —CORRESPONDENCE WITH HIS EXCELLENCY.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I take this opportunity of asking if I shall receive at the next sitting of the House the further papers that are absolutely necessary in connection with the correspondence with His Excellency the Governor General.

The PRIME MINISTER. I can assure my hon. friend that I am making every effort to have these papers brought down at the earliest possible moment. The work of classification of the many Orders has been so great that it has necessitated delay. I will make an effort to have them brought down to-morrow, and I am pretty sure I shall succeed.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Copies of all Orders in Council, reports and correspondence respecting the appointment and dismissal of the sub-agents of the Department of Marine and Fisheries at the port of Pictou.—(Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper).

Copies of all reports and correspondence and the reasons for the dismissal of Mr. Daniel McLean, captain of the Pictou Island life boat, and the appointment of Alexander Currie.—(Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper).

Copy of all correspondence and the Order in Council of the 11th July, 1890, by which a grant of land in the town of Revelstoke was made to the Kootenay Smelting and Trading Company.—(Mr. Bostock).

Copy of all correspondence in connection with all grants of land in the town of Revelstoke to J. A. Mara, ex-member for Yale and Cariboo, and the Order in Council under which the said grants were made.—(Mr. Bostock).

Copy of all correspondence in connection with grants of land within the railway belt in British Columbia made by the province subsequent to the date when the lands in the belt passed under control of the Government of Canada, and of the Orders in Council of the 29th March, 1895, and the 6th December, 1895, setting forth terms of the agreement between the Government of Canada and the province of British Columbia, acting on behalf of the grantees.—(Mr. Bostock).

Return of all papers, plans and documents relating to the acquisition by the Brockville and Ottawa Railway of what was formerly the Soldiers' Island, opposite the town of Brockville, and relating to the rights acquired by the said company (if any) to obstruct the navigation of the St. Lawrence River between the said island and the town of Brockville.—(Mr. Wood).

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11 o'clock.

Mr. ELLIS.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 15th September, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—SALE OF LIQUORS.

Mr. SPEAKER. I wish to mention to the House that in accordance to the resolution unanimously passed yesterday with respect to the abolition of the supply of liquor within the precincts of the House of Commons, I have given the most stringent and absolute directions that that order shall be carried out.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if he proposes to bring down during the present session any Supplementary Estimates, and when we may hope to receive them?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I am afraid we will not be able to dispose of the business of the session without bringing down Supplementary Estimates. I am really unable to state the precise day on which they will be submitted, but that day will be within the period when the hon. gentleman was in the habit of bringing down Supplementaries, and therefore I trust he will not deem it too late a period. We are very desirous to bring them down at a very early day, and we shall do our best to do so.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman will follow my example for the last few years he will not bring them down any Supplementaries.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am very much afraid that if I copied the hon. gentleman's example during the past few years, I would very soon find myself in his place.

Mr. FOSTER. I thank the hon. gentleman for the admission.

PORTFOLIO OF DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I should like to draw the attention of the First Minister to the question asked by me some time ago, and to which I had hoped to have received more explicit information from the hon. gentleman by this time, and that is in regard to the Department of the Interior. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman if he has made any progress, and when we may hope to have the portfolio of that important department filled?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). We are making progress every day, but we have not reached a conclusion yet. I hope, however, to do so within a very short time.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I wish to make an intimation as to a course of action to which I hope hon. gentlemen opposite will agree. It is well known that there are important departments of the public service for which no provision whatever has been made for the current year, and as a consequence all expenditures are necessarily suspended. There is a class of expenditure, namely, salaries and emoluments payable to various employees, for which provision was made during two months by Governor General's warrants; but now we have reached the third month, and it will be necessary in one form or another that we should be in possession of funds to meet very pressing claims, such as the House will recognize. I therefore propose to ask the unanimous concurrence of the House in the resolutions already agreed to in Committee of Supply, and as regards the balance of the items I propose to ask for a vote on account to the extent of one-tenth of the amount of each item with which the committee has not yet dealt. If that suggestion meets with favour of hon. gentlemen opposite, I hope to be able by such a course to provide for the expenditures urgently necessary, and which I presume hon. gentlemen opposite would not wish to delay.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose the hon. gentleman means to proceed on Thursday.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes.

RETURNS.

Mr. GILLIES. I desire to ask when will the Postmaster General lay on the Table papers connected with the Morrison contract for the carriage of mails between Port Hawkesbury and Sydney.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). On Friday last I instructed that the papers be prepared. They have not been handed to me by the deputy, but I will make inquiries in the department to-day.

THE OLIVER EQUIPMENT.

Mr. TISDALE. I desire to call attention to a matter which came to my notice yesterday. I find in the "World" of the 14th, the following:—

The Government has cancelled the Order in Council passed by the late Ministry authorizing the payment of $5,000 for the purchase of the patent rights to Oliver's infantry equipment. General Gascoigne has made a recommendation that as tests are now taking place in England, and as improvements are also being made in the equipment, it is inadvisable to make any purchase at present.

I wish to say that an Order in Council was passed, which I introduced in Council, authorizing the purchase of the Oliver equipment for $5,000. The vendee wanted $10,000. Before the order was passed I consulted the Major General commanding and he approved of it, and the purchase at $5,000 was under these circumstances authorized. I regret very much that the Government have seen fit to cancel this order, because it was conceded on all hands that it was a most excellent equipment.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman cannot go into any argument on a statement at this stage.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The matter might be postponed until the motion is made to go into Supply.

Mr. TISDALE. I understood the motion had been made.

BLOCKADE AT GALOPS CANAL.

Mr. QUINN. I beg to call the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals to a meeting held in Montreal yesterday of the Montreal Corn Exchange Association. This meeting was occasioned by the serious detention of crafts at Galops Canal owing to the low water, the result of which is that ocean vessels are detained at Montreal and are unable to proceed. The canal is blocked by obstructions, and the request of the Montreal Corn Exchange is that attention be given to it immediately in order to secure, if possible, nine feet of water in the channel there so as to allow vessels to pass through. There is also a request that instructions be given to the lockmaster at the lift lock, Cardinal Canal, to pass vessels down and up that lock on Sunday for the remainder of the season. I call attention to this matter as one of great importance to the trade of Canada, and I trust these obstructions will be removed as soon as possible so that vessels will be able to reach Montreal in order that ocean vessels may not be detained for want of cargoes.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I am sorry that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals is not in his seat at the moment, but I will call his attention to the matter referred to by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CHARLTON. I hope when the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals is called to this matter the Government will not see fit to grant the request that the Lord's Day be desecrated by having canals open on the Sabbath. The policy of the Government has always been to keep canals closed on the Sabbath, and there is no argument in favour of opening the canals on that day that cannot be justified in regard to permitting labour of any other kind on that day.

SUPPLY.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. TISDALE. As the Minister of Militia is not in his place, I will call attention to the Oliver equipment matter at another time.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Archives ..... $6,000

Mr. FOSTER. Does the hon. gentleman propose to carry on the collection of archives as formerly, and continue the copying of the manuscript documents in London and Paris?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). It is proposed to carry that on much in the same way as has been done. There have been some expenditures in Paris, which will probably be less in the future.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Privy Council, the State Department and the Department of Agriculture are engaged in the collection of these archives. Have any steps been taken to unite their work in this matter, as was proposed by the late Government?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Up to the present time I have not had an opportunity of looking into this matter, but I will do so on an early occasion.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman will find on record a memo. with regard to that.

Patent Record ... $9,000

Mr. FOSTER. Will the cuts in the "Record" be executed by the Printing Department, as is done at the present time?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The "Record" has been in the hands of the Printing Department, but the cuts have been printed in the office of the Montreal "Gazette," and I do not propose to continue that.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend is hardly right. I think, last year they were done by the Printing Department here.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. My information with regard to that does not accord with that of the late Finance Minister.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the hon. gentleman require some new plant for that?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That will be a matter for consideration by the Printing Department.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Had the Minister a report of his chief officers in connection with that before he announced his policy?

Mr. CHARLTON.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have not yet announced my policy, except that I do not intend to have them printed in future in the Montreal "Gazette" office.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the hon. gentleman have them done in the Printing Bureau?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I cannot say.

Statistical Year-Book ..... $4,000

Mr. SPROULE. I wish to ask the hon. the Minister why he makes a reduction of $2,200 a year in this vote. Is it his intention to get out a larger number of these books than have been circulated formerly? It is a very valuable work, and is used in our schools largely at the present time. We find it impossible to supply more than a small fraction of the number who apply for it. It would be advisable, in my opinion, to get out a larger number of copies of this book than we have been accustomed to.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The Statistical Year-Book has been an increasingly large publication. Next year I propose to decrease the size and bulk of this volume. I have not yet had an opportunity of going into the exact way in which that will be brought about. I would also inform the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) that for the past two years the vote in the Main Estimates has not been sufficient to cover the expenses of the book, and it has had to be provided for in the Supplementary Estimates. I trust that this year I shall be able so to reduce the bulk of the volume, without in any way impairing its efficiency, or decreasing the amount of valuable information in it, as will enable me to bring the expense within the vote.

Mr. SPROULE. Is it the intention to issue a larger number, or the same number? I think it would be desirable to issue a larger number.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That is a matter which I have not yet had under consideration, but I trust that we shall be able to get out a sufficient number to supply all proper applications.

Mr. CASEY. I am glad to hear the hon. Minister state that he hopes to decrease the volume of this book; but I join with my hon. friend opposite in the opinion that the book properly compiled is a most valuable document, and that the hon. Minister, consistent with the reduction in size, might probably be able to issue an increased number. We can easily dispense with the comments on the facts which we have been accustomed to see in that book, but we cannot dispense very well with the tabulated statements of facts which are found there and cannot be found anywhere else. I do not think there is a book in greater demand, or one that gives a better idea of the condition of the country, than the Statistical Year-Book, properly compiled.

Mr. FOSTER. The Finance Minister urged despatch with these estimates on the ground that they were estimates prepared by the late Government, and that therefore we ought not to criticise them. I notice that my hon. friend takes credit for the decrease of the vote. The vote is not decreased from the estimate which I brought down. I quite agree that the volume of the Statistical Year-Book had grown too bulky and, while the Minister of Agriculture was away last year and I occupied that position, I issued an order that it should not exceed a certain number of pages, and made my estimate accordingly. I think the book had grown so bulky as to defeat its own object, and an improvement in that respect is desirable.

Experimental Farms ..... $75,000

Mr. DOMVILLE. Before this is carried, I would like to say a word to my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture. I was amazed to see an experimental farm for the information of the farmers of this country, with a mansion for one of the employees to live in. I can see my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) looking at me. He seems to have an idea that whenever I rise I have something to bring out with regard to him; but I have no intention of saying anything that will shock him. We hear talk of economy, and yet we see a mansion on the experimental farm for one of the employees. As a representative of an agricultural constituency, I hope the Government will see some way to reduce the expenditure on this farm.

Mr. BERGERON. Not to burn it.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I thought my hon. friend said to burn it. I have known my hon. friend a long while, and I hope he will not find fault with me for expressing my opinion on this matter. I think it is a perfect disgrace to the country that the public money should be expended in building what may be termed mansions for employees. I do not know the name of the gentleman or anything about him; but I cannot see how any gentleman, on the salary granted to him by Parliament, could live in a mansion like that, and keep it going.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture will take quickly and seriously to heart the very strong advice given him by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. After that plea, I think he can hardly ask for the $75,000. Say $72,000.

Mr. DOMVILLE. My hon. friend is very good in his reply. I was only suggesting to the Minister that he should abandon the precedents of his predecessors. Perhaps it would be a good plan for him to lease the farm to some of his friends for a trifle; then he could have all those buildings on it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not think the vote for the farm is too large; neither do I think that the houses are more than what are required for the staff, nor that any one who has really the interests of agriculture at heart will object to this vote. I would like to ask the hon. Minister if he has decided on the appointment of an agriculturist?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have not decided on the appointment of any agriculturist. There is an application in the department for that position, but up to the present time I have had no opportunity to consider the question.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the hon. Minister answer me another question—whether he intends to enlarge the bee department and to appoint an apiarist?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I hope to be able, in some little changes which I purpose to make with regard to the work on the farm, to give a little more encouragement to bee culture in this country.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is not, I think, as satisfactory an answer as the House would like. I believe there is no department in which the farm could be made more useful than in the encouragement of bee-keeping, a subject not as well known to the farmers as some other auxiliary branches of agriculture. In the preparation of these estimates it was intended that there should be sufficient funds, by a re-arrangement of the expenses, to appoint an apiarist and to extend the work of the bee department, and I trust that the hon. gentleman will be able to do so.

Mr. SPROULE. A suggestion was thrown out last year which I think was in the right direction, that is, that a suitable building should be provided in which the crowds of people who visit the farm in the summer time could be sheltered from the weather in the event of a sudden rain storm. It was strongly urged that a building, supplied with seats and with water for the convenience and comfort of the visitors, should be erected; but I see that nothing has been done in that direction. I would like to say a word with regard to the remarks of the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville). To my mind there is no money voted by the Parliament of Canada spent to better purpose than that voted for the experimental farm. I think that the great difficulty heretofore has been that there has been too much economy in connection with that farm. More money could be spent to good advantage, and I believe the great interest of agriculture demands that there should be a much more lavish expenditure on that farm in the future. I do not agree with the hon. gentleman that the buildings there are mansions. It is an easy matter to create that impression on the minds of people who have never seen them; but I think the buildings are of moderate dimensions consistent with comfort and convenience, and the gentlemen who occupy them have done so not only with credit to themselves, but with advantage to the country.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I would like to ask my hon. friend what an ordinary farmer who made his living by farming, and not by talking, or as a politician, would say if he saw a man teaching farmers how to farm, and living in a house like that?

Mr. SPROULE. If the hon. gentleman travels throughout the country, he will find many farmers living in buildings quite as expensive as those on the Experimental Farm.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I do not find fault with the work of the gentleman who has charge of the farm. It apparently is well done. As I drove through the farm, it seems a good-looking farm, and there were a good many nice looking plants around, but I ask why this country should be asked to pay for a building such as the gentleman who managed that farm lives in, and how he could possibly live there on his salary. He must have means outside his salary to keep that building up. I say that the principle is bad. It does not look as if the authorities were trying to teach the farming community how to farm economically.

Mr. SPROULE. Does the hon. gentleman know what the building cost?

Mr. DOMVILLE. No.

Mr. SPROULE. I am told that there are barns within fifty miles of the farm which have cost as much as the most expensive building on it.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I do not know what it cost, but it must have cost many thousands of dollars. If we are to teach our farmers, by means of this experimental farm, how they can best employ their small means and muscles, we will have to set a better precedent and example. It is a very bad example to set them when we tax our people in order to provide our employees with such buildings as that.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL. (Translation.) I wish to take occasion of the debate on the vote for the Experimental Farm now before this committee to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Agriculture to that portion of the organization of the farm which more particularly concerns the province of Quebec. The service I wish to refer to is that of the correspondence. As we have no experimental farm in the province of Quebec, we have to apply directly to the Ottawa Central Farm. Now, I dare say that, such as organized at present, that farm serves no purpose, so far as the French Canadian farmers are concerned. I believe that the staff of French-speaking clerks is not large enough. I understand that there are only three or four

Mr. SPROULE.

French-speaking employees at the farm. Now, I do not wish my remarks to be construed as reflecting on the way in which those employees discharge their duties. I believe that they do their best, but they are not numerous enough to enable them rendering all the services which the French Canadian farmers have a right to expect from the farm. I know that there is a considerable French correspondence, but it cannot be helped, if the French-speaking people mean to share in the benefits it was intended should be conferred upon the farming community. Now, that correspondence is attended to by only three or four clerks in all, who, however, expedite the business to the best of their ability. And that is the reason why letters remain without a reply for whole weeks and months. That is the grievance generally complained of throughout the province. Our French Canadian farmers state on good ground that for them to apply for information to the Experimental Farm is simply wasting paper, as no reply is vouchsafed to their letters. The province of Quebec contributes her full share of the expenditure incurred for the maintenance of the farm, and I do not think it is asking too much that the service be so organized as to have the correspondence and the inquiries by letter coming from the French portion of the country promptly attended to. I think the Government ought to select a man well qualified to attend to that correspondence, and he ought to be put at the head of a special service. He should be authorized also to employ as many French Canadian clerks as would be required in order to despatch the business in connection with that correspondence. A separate branch should be established in which that correspondence would be attended to. By that means, the expenditure incurred for the maintenance of the Ottawa Experimental Farm would give more satisfactory results and those results, I maintain, can only be reached through the means I have just alluded to.

Mr. SPROULE. Has the hon. Minister any reply to my question as to whether or not he thought of erecting a building for the accommodation of excursionists to the farm?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That question has been brought before me by the officials, and I hope to make some provision. I might say that the number of buildings on the farm and their extent is already very large, and the expense of maintaining them very great, and I think it would be possible, without adding to them, to make such accommodation as the hon. gentleman suggests. I trust I will be able to do so without incurring the cost of a new building.

Mr. SCRIVER. I do not desire to prolong discussion, but I cannot forbear saying that that it is an opinion pretty well entertained.

among those most interested in this experiment, and for whose special benefit it was designed, that the experiment is a pretty expensive one. The farmers generally are inclined to believe that we are making an outlay upon those experimental farms which has hardly been warranted by the benefits conferred upon them; and for my part, I cannot forbear urging upon the Minister of Agriculture the desirability of economizing in every way possible, and not allowing the very large expenditure which has already been reached, to be increased in the future.

Mr. McMULLEN. I quite admit that the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) has not had time yet to thoroughly investigate the whole expenditure so as to enable him to make what we earnestly hope he will, considerable reductions in the annual expenditure of this farm. There are many things that could be well dispensed with. I understand that we are paying a very considerable sum for the supply of water from the city. I would like to know what that amounts to annually. There are other contracts which have been entered into and which add very considerably to the expense. I hope that when the hon. Minister comes to Parliament next year with his Estimates, he will be able to report a very considerable reduction. From the establishment of this farm down to the present time, very extravagant notions have been carried out, and I would suggest that every item of expenditure which can be dispensed with should be avoided. Of course, we have at present to give the hon. Minister a fair opportunity of thoroughly investigating the whole subject, and it would not be fair to expect any changes until he has been able to make a thorough study of the whole business.

Mr. CASEY. I agree with some of those who think that we have not hitherto had the value of our expenditure on the experimental farm, but I cannot quite agree with the assumption that the expenditure ought to be very largely reduced. I am the more inclined to the view that, while the farming community require that considerable expenditure should be made on these farms, we ought to get a great deal more value from them than we do. That is the view of the question which I would rather press on the hon. Minister. It is not so much undue economy in the management that we require as the obtaining of much better value for what we do spend. My hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) is quite correct in saying that extravagant ideas have prevailed, and that is naturally accounted for when we remember that the management of these experimental farms as part of the Department of Agriculture has been in the hands of people who were not farmers and did not understand farming. They are making unpractical experiments, and, without intending to be extravagant, were spending more money than was necessary without being able to show value for it. We have had a lawyer, a brewer and a doctor try their hands at its management, and the success has not naturally come up to our expectation. But now our farmers feel that we have at last a practical man in charge of the farm. I am not inclined to bother him much with advice at present. I rather think he knows as much about the matter as I do and a great deal more than most people. With my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), I am in hopes of seeing next year estimates that will look much more like real and practical progress than any we have seen for some years past.

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir H. Joly de Lotbinière). I do not like the experimental farm to be left without a fair hearing. I believe that, on careful inquiry, it will be found that the distinguished men who are at the head of that institution, each of whom was chosen for certain special qualifications, have really rendered great service. For my own part, there are certain questions in which I take a deep interest, particularly in matters relating to forestry and certainly most useful experiments have been made by these gentlemen in that line. So what I would like my hon. friends to do would be to wait until inquiry has established whether really we do not get good value from the expenditure that is made upon the experimental farm.

Mr. SPROULE. I was going to suggest, after the criticism of my hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Casey), that we should follow the course adopted in Ontario and put the farm into the hands of a commission. It would seem that they found it impossible to get a farmer to manage a farm discreetly and wisely, so they put it under the control of a commission and appointed a number of farmers.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I desire only to say a word, which I think is due from me in justice to the officers of the farm. I am satisfied that the gentlemen who have spoken, are of opinion that we do not get value for the money spent; I am equally satisfied that those who find fault with the work that has been done are, to a certain extent, unacquainted with that work. Take the work of some of the departments—take, for instance, the department of the entomologist, take the work done in forestry experiments, to which the hon. Controller of Inland Revenue has referred; take the work in connection with the dairy which has been done by Professor Robertson; take the work done by Professor Saunders in testing seeds—and I think you will find that the farmers of Canada thoroughly appreciate the results achieved. Of course, the farm has not been established a great many years, and there had to be much capital expenditure at first; but, so far as the work done is concerned, I am satisfied that those who investigate it, will find that it has been faithful, honest and effective work for the farmers of Canada. I am perfectly satisfied, also, that, when my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture comes to investigate the work and the means provided for accomplishing it, while he may make changes here and there, he will find, at least, that no extravagance has been permitted, and that the money voted year after year has not been too much to secure effective and useful work on the part of the farm in the interest of the farmers of Canada. As to the statement of my hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Casey) that novices have hitherto been in charge of the Department of Agriculture, and that now a change has taken place, I may say that I have the greatest possible faith in the new Minister of Agriculture, more especially since these Estimates bear evidence of the fact that all the changes that I made in the department have received his certificate of value, because he proposes to carry them out.

Mr. McMILLAN. I desire to say a word before the vote for the Experimental Farm is passed. When it was proposed to establish these experimental farms, it was stated that the Central Farm would be established and fully equipped for $160,000. When they made that statement, the Government certainly could not have known what they were going to do, for the buildings alone, to say nothing about other improvements, represent a total expenditure of between $150,000 and $160,000. I was much astonished at the remarks of the late Minister of Agriculture; they show us what a loss the country has suffered by having gentlemen at the head of the Agriculture Department who did not understand the business. He says that the Experimental Farm should increase the department of bee-keeping. The first thing they ought to do is to make thoroughly effective the departments that have been established. They have established a large stock of cattle on the farm, and what have we, the farmers of Canada, benefited by the experiments that have taken place with all these cattle? Large sums of money have been spent to encourage the dairy industry, but I would ask my farmer in this room, or any farmer in this country who has received the report of that farm, whether that report has been of any benefit to the farmers with respect to the dairy that has been established there; whether the department has gone in and shown us how a farmer should go to work to establish a good herd of dairy cows, which lies at the foundation of all solid dairying; whether it has shown to us what is required in order to keep a herd, the cost of a herd for a single year—which they certainly had a good opportunity of learning there—whether they have shown us how much could be made on each animal, what is the best way to keep the animals, and so on. I say that the report is without value upon this, one of the most important phases of farming in Canada at the present time. For two years or more this has been the case. In the last report we have not a single word about the number of cattle kept, the number of cows kept, or the amount that can be realized from each animal. If we had no example in the Dominion of this work being done, we might say that the Experimental Farm was doing good work. But let me point to the case of the farm established at Guelph. In the report of that institution you will get the number of cows kept, the weight of each animal, the number of days each animal is in milk, the quantity of milk given by each, the quantity of butter that can be manufactured, the cost of keeping the animals, and what is actually realized from the product. That is what we want to get from an experimental farm. And let me say that I have urged, year after year, that the farm proper ought to be separated from the experiment plots, from the department of experiment in forestry, from the horticultural department and all other experimental departments. We can never expect an experimental department to be self-sustaining. And yet we know that it is one of the most important departments. A good deal has been done on this farm in the way of experiments. But, when we come to the farm proper, we want that set apart by itself, and want to know the exact amount—which the report of the farm at Guelph shows—the exact amount grown upon the farm and the revenue derived from it. The report of the farm manager at Guelph shows conclusively that, now that he has got the farm in good working order, he is able to show a surplus over the working expenses of the farm proper. As a farmer, I pay more attention to the field crop and what can be realized from it, and what can be realized from the stock, than I do to what can be done on the experimental plot; because I know that, when experimental plots are dealt with, great care is exercised with them, and they show a very much larger yield than can be gained upon a whole farm. There is one thing I have certainly found fault with before, and I do it again to-day, I care not who thinks I am wrong—I refer to the amount spent for manure put upon the farm. The farmers of Canada are thrown upon their own resources; the manure put upon each farm must be made upon the farm. What are the facts with respect to this farm? In the report that I called for last year it was stated that no less than $12,700 had been spent in manure and fertilizers on that farm; while the revenue from the whole farm during the whole time it has been in existence, has only been $20,000, leaving something less than $8,000 revenue from the farm after the manure was paid for. Now, I say it is not a benefit to the farmers of this country to know what can be done on a certain quantity of land if two-thirds of the value of all that was raised upon that farm is spent upon manure to be put on the farm. I am pleased to think that we have a practical farmer in the Agriculture Department; and I hope he will divide all the different sections on that farm in the same way they are divided on the agricultural farm at Guelph, where the sections devoted to experiments are entirely separated from each other. On the Ontario farm there is a thoroughly practical man at the head of the experimental work, who keeps a separate account of every lot and of every experiment that is made. But he has full control of it; while here in Ottawa the director of the farm is a gentleman who never was a farmer himself. He is, I believe, an excellent individual, and one that will not make a statement that he does not believe to be entirely correct; so that in any criticisms I may make I do not wish to be understood as trying to belittle Professor Saunders. But I say it is impossible for any man, I care not what his theory may be in farming or stock keeping, efficiently to conduct a farm like that unless he is himself a thoroughly practicable farmer. Unless he be such he cannot conduct that farm in such a manner as that the farmers of this country may be largely benefited through it. Now, when these farms were established we were told that $35,000 was the very utmost it would require annually to keep them running. Go back to the "Hansard," and you will find that the then Minister of Agriculture stated that he would give his guarantee that it would not require more than $200,000 to establish this farm. Well, we find that it has cost pretty well up to $300,000 to establish this farm in the condition it is in at the present time. Let me say that the different departments on this farm should not be extended until such time as they are put upon an efficient basis, which I fear not to state is not the case to-day. I can say of the gentleman who is in care of the stock, that I have gone over the farm frequently and have never found that the stock was not thoroughly cared for.

But we want an individual at the head of that farm who is a practical farmer, who knows what farming really is, who knows what should be done, and what can be done. What benefit is it to us to know that in labour alone there are over $3,000 spent upon the farm proper, when the revenue from the whole farm is only somewhat over $3,700? When we take the item of the care of stock alone, there are over $5,000 spent for labour, and the revenue is only a little over three thousand dollars. This is not as it should be. Therefore I hope that the Minister of Agriculture will begin at the beginning and reorganize the whole institution. I see there is another building going up there. I was out and examined that building, and was told that it was for the purpose of establishing a herd of sheep. Now, to establish a herd of sheep upon that farm will require an expenditure considerably more than that building will cost, because the farm in its present condition is not fit for establishing a herd of sheep. I am convinced that in the province of Ontario to-day the best breeders have done more in that direction than can be done on the Central Experimental Farm for the next twenty years. In the present condition of that farm, it would only be throwing away money to establish a herd of sheep there. I would like to have the Minister get a proper herd of cows and see what can really be done in making butter from that dairy, and putting it upon the English market, so that the farmers may see what a thoroughly equipped institution of that kind can do in this respect. I do not think that the butter from this farm has ever yet been sent to the old country market. I think that when we are spending such large sums of money on a Government institution, furnished with all the appliances, and conducted with the best skill the Government can secure, that should be one of the first things to engage the attention of the department. They should have taken the herd that was there and have shown what could be done, and what the farm can realize from butter put upon the British market. That would be a point of great importance to the farmers, it would have been a good example to them, but we have had no such example up to the present time.

In going over that farm lately, I was well pleased with the condition the farm proper was in. It was really in a neat condition, and well kept, so that I will give the foreman credit for that. But there was one thing on that farm I did not like, and that was the orchard. I do not know who has charge of the orchard. We have heard a good deal about the orchard upon that farm. I must say it was in a disgraceful condition, and I must suggest to the Minister of Agriculture that he should place at the head of that department a thoroughly practical gardener. Do not put it into the hands of any professor. I have had a little experience in that line, and my experience has been that wherever you put practical work into the hands of professors, that work is neglected and does not do the farm credit. I must say that the orchard upon the Experimental Farm does not do credit to whoever has had charge of it. I drew the foreman's attention to it, and all I could get out of him was that it was not under his care, and I was happy that such was the case. In the present Minister of Agriculture I believe that we have got the right man in the right place, and I think that if he is properly supported by the people of this country, and by the farmers of this country, in a few years he will show us such results that hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, especially those who have pretended to fill the Department of Minister of Agriculture, will sink their heads in shame when they compare those results with what they have done.

Mr. SPROULE. I think it is clear that the leader of the Government made a mistake in selecting his Minister of Agriculture. Although the hon. gentleman who just spoke is too modest to say so, yet the indirect eulogies that he bestowed upon what has been done on the farm at Guelph, were indirectly pronounced upon himself.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. SPROULE. I am in order in showing what has been done on the farm at Guelph. And when this House knows that the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) was on the board of management of that farm for a long time, of course he was indirectly advertising his own ability.

Mr. McMILLAN. I had no reference to that whatever. Here is the report, where the hon. gentleman can see the facts for himself.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman feels sensitive upon this subject, no doubt, as he also does upon the selection of the Minister of Agriculture. Now, the hon. gentleman has said a few things that may be worth referring to. He said he was pleased that a practical farmer has been selected as Minister of Agriculture, because nothing but a practical farmer, in his estimation, could fill the bill. Well, he has told us what has been done on the farm at Guelph, and I would like to ask him if there is a practical farmer at the head of that institution; if Professor Mills is any more of a practical farmer than Professor Saunders?

Mr. McMILLAN. I will answer that question. It is Mr. Rennie who has full charge of that farm, and not Mr. Mills. Mr. Rennie is a practical farmer, and it was between him and his brother as to who would take the gold medal offered for the best farm.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman forgets that it is only a very short time ago that Mr. Rennie was appointed, and that all the practical farmers who have been employed to manage that farm up there have been obliged to change their manager every few years.

Mr. WALLACE. Permit me to remind the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) that Mr. Rennie is a seedsman in Toronto, and has been for the last thirty years.

Mr. SPROULE. I was going to say that if the selection there was so good, and the results so beneficial to the farmers, we cannot forget the fact that the manager of the farm has been changed three or four times since it was started; and that while it was at first under one manager, it was afterwards put under a board of management selected from the agriculturists of the province, one of whom was the hon. member who has just addressed the House; so that the panegyric which he passed upon the management of that farm, was indirectly passed upon himself. But notwithstanding those facts with regard to the Guelph farm, the management of the agricultural farm at Ottawa has been under one man since it commenced, and it will be admitted, especially by intelligent farmers, that he has done admirable work and the Government have not been obliged to change the manager every few years, as has been done at the Guelph farm. The hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) has stated that what is desirable is to show what can be done with a herd of cattle. The hon. gentleman cannot be so poorly informed that he does not know that a herd of cattle is kept at the Experimental Farm here and that data are collected, for example, as to how many cattle can be kept on forty or fifty acres, and I may say they have been keeping twenty-five head on forty acres and trying to keep thirty head. All the data are collected so as to enable any farmer to secure similar results. Experiments are made to ascertain what food is best for dairying, for fattening and for ordinary purposes, and these experiments are carried on in a most intelligent way. The value of the results is evident by the demand for these reports by the farmers. While we have been endeavouring to get the House to vote more money in order to secure a larger distribution of these reports, complaints have been constantly received from farmers that a larger number of these reports should be issued. Experiments have been carried on with respect to seeds; as to the proper time for seeding, what kinds of grain are preferable for certain soils and certain climates; changing seeds from one part of the country to another; and the farm has inaugurated a system known as hibernation by which the country is getting new seeds. The hon. gentleman is aware of these facts, because he has been a member of the Agriculture Committee from year to year, and he has not raised any complaints but has acknowledged the value of this information to the farmer and the excellent work carried on at the farm. With respect to dairying, no man will refuse to admit that we have perhaps the most competent dairy superintendent in any part of the Dominion, and, I might say, over the continent of America. The hon. gentleman knows as well as I do the value of the Dairy Commissioner, whose work is known not only through this country but the continent, and it is admitted that no better man could be selected for this most important work. It cannot be denied that this work is being conducted on most intelligent lines and that the information secured is valuable to agriculturists. With respect to bee-keeping, the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMillan) seems to consider that line to be of little value; but it produces $800,000 a year at very little outlay. In my opinion if the present Minister of Agriculture does what is the very best for the people, he will place in charge of that branch a man who will develop it as much as possible, as it is one in which much money can be made with very little outlay, and that is what the farmer wants. With regard to the development of sheep raising, the hon. gentleman has said that the farmers of Ontario and the Agricultural College at Guelph have done more in that line than the Experimental Farm.

Mr. McMILLAN.

Mr. McMILLAN. I did not mention the Agricultural College at Guelph, but I mentioned the farmers.

Mr. SPROULE. Those efforts have been confined to one province, and there are many other provinces which have not benefited by information on that subject as have the farmers of Ontario, and while this House is voting the money of the Dominion, it is proper that the information selected should be distributed in every province. In the province of Quebec the farmers were far behind those of Ontario in dairying, especially in cheese-making, but during the last few years they have improved so rapidly that to-day they are on a par with the most intelligent dairying of Ontario. This is due to the valuable information disseminated through the Experimental Farm here. No one can fail to have been proud of the position we occupied at the World's Fair at Chicago where we took 95 per cent of all the prizes for cheese. Much of this success must be attributed to the valuable information disseminated from the headquarters at Ottawa by which the dairymen of Quebec and Prince Edward Island, and also of Ontario have benefited, not to say anything in regard to Manitoba and the North-west. When we remember these facts it is unfair to say that the Experimental Farm is serving no good purpose, that there is not an intelligent or proper man at the head of it, and that a change should be made in the interest of the people. I do not think so. All my information leads me to the conviction that there is not a man at the head of any branch who is not admirably adapted for the work, and that in all human probability men less competent would be introduced if a change were made. The men there are the right men in the right place, and they should receive every encouragement for the valuable work done on the farm in the past.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I desire to say a word or two in reply to the hon. member's remarks. No one in this House appreciates more fully than I do the importance and value of the work that has been done by the experimental farms in this country. I may in that connection say that I was a member of a committee of this House on whose report the establishment of these farms was based and in consequence of whose report the experimental farms to-day are in existence in Canada. The work of this farm at Ottawa is of the greatest value to agriculturists of this country. A large amount of most valuable information has been collected by the officials and placed at the disposal of the practical farmers in the country, information which it is impossible for the farmers, with their ordinary facilities and ordinary training, to obtain for themselves. By reason of the employment at that farm of men trained to special work by scientific training and possessing the highest scientific qualifications, there is placed at the disposal of our people information of the most valuable character, information which is valued not only in Canada but in the United States, and even in England. I will say a word, and I do it very gladly, on behalf of the staff, the officials of this farm. For a number of years, ever since the establishment of the farm, I had been myself in close personal touch, as a farmer, with those officials, and I must say a word in praise of their universal courtesy, their devotion to their work and their competency for that work in the scientific branches to which I have alluded. The work of the farm is of a two-fold nature, and it would be well for hon. members and the country at large in speaking of this farm to remember this fact. In the first place, it is essentially an experimental farm, on which and through which experiments are made for the benefit of the farmers of the country. In the second place, it is a large farm, it covers a large area of cultivated land which has to be managed and dealt with by a practical farmer in a practical way. At the time of the inception of these farms, I myself protested against the extent of the land acquired, not only in Ottawa, but at the branch farms, because I believed a much smaller area was necessary for experimental work, and the other kind of work might very well be left to the practical farmers of the country to be dealt with. That opinion, however, was not adopted by the House or by the Administration, and the result is that to-day we have this large farm at Ottawa and other large farms at Napan, N. S., Brandon, Man., Indian Head, N.W.T., and Agassiz, B.C. The vote under consideration is for the carrying on of all these establishments, and consequently it requires to be a very large one. As I have stated, I do not think that such large farms were necessary for experimental work, but in consequence of their size the expenditure had to be much larger than it otherwise would be. The House can quite understand that in the short time I have had the position which I now occupy it has been impossible for me to undertake to make any radical, or even small, reforms in the management of such large establishments as these five farms are. However, I beg to at once thank the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) for the practical suggestions he has made in regard to the reforms which might be carried on in connection with these farms. The hon. gentleman has a long time been a member of this House, and he has so frequently discussed agricultural matters here with an ability gained by experience not only in his own province, but all over the Dominion, that it is unnecessary for me to say one word as to the ripeness of his judgment on agricultural matters. I know that the suggestions which come from him are very valuable. The hon. member (Mr. McMillan) is a practical farmer, and has demonstrated through his work on his own farm, his practical knowledge of agriculture. I trust and hope to be able in a short time to carry out some of the suggestions that have been made in the House. I can assure hon. members who have made those suggestions, that I am glad indeed to receive them from both sides of the House, because I am satisfied that gentlemen on both sides have but one object in view, and that is, the benefit to and the interest of the agriculturists of this country. With regard to the orchards on the Central Farm, to which reference has been made, it is simply a matter of justice to state that last winter was unusually severe upon orchard trees in this part of the country. The result has been a very great injury to the orchards on the farm, a result which is common to other orchards all over this section of the country. I regret extremely that the orchard is in the condition it is, but I trust that we will be able to establish a very good orchard there, by replacing the trees which have been hurt, and by choosing such trees as will stand the severity of the climate which is here notorious.

There is another thing which I trust will be able to be brought about on those farms, and which has not apparently received the attention of former Ministers of Agriculture. I refer to an effort to show in some sense and in some way how land can be treated in this country so as to bring a profit to the individual handling it. In saying this, I do not wish to cast any reflection upon the former management of the farm. I believe that in this country, where we have in the last few years spent enormous sums and devoted a great deal of attention to the completion of the manufacturing side of the products which we produce, not enough attention has been paid to the cultivation of the soil and the production of the fruits of the soil which we require for that after treatment. I trust that in the near future I will be able to arrange some work upon the central farm and upon the other experimental farms, which will show to the people of this country what I am very anxious to show, and what I believe to be the fact, viz.: that in Canada a farmer can take ordinary land and make money out of it as a living. I think that is one of the most important things which any Minister of Agriculture, or any experimental farm, could demonstrate to the people of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FISHER.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It is an unfortunate fact to-day in Canada, that a great many of our farmers are so discouraged that they are beginning to think that agriculture cannot be made to pay. That is an opinion which I do not share. That is the opinion which, if permitted to go abroad, would be of the utmost injury to the people of our country. I desire as soon as possible, to remove any such opinion that may exist, and to do away with it forever.

I want to draw attention to one fact in connection with some remarks about Prof. Robertson. Prof. Robertson is a gentleman whom I have known for long years. I knew him before he became connected with the farm. At the time of his appointment I was one of the great convention in the dairying interests which was held in this building, and the result of which was the appointment of a Dairy Commissioner for the Dominion. Prof. Robertson has done great work for the dairying interests of this country, and he is a gentleman who is splendidly qualified for the work. For the last year or so, the late Government has seen fit to divide Prof. Robertson's duties from the farm work, and to-day he is no longer connected with the Experimental Farm. He is Dominion Dairy and Agricultural Commissioner, and his work is specially designed with the view that his attention should be drawn towards the advancement of the agricultural products of this country, and especially for export. Therefore, his work and his salary and his expenses can no longer be charged in connection with the farm. There is one other thing which I may say in answer to the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil).

(Translation.) In reply to the remarks which have fallen from my hon. friend from Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil), I may tell him that I felt a genuine pleasure in hearing his suggestions in connection with the service of the French correspondence at the Ottawa Experimental Farm, as also with regard to the benefits which that farm is called upon to confer upon the French-speaking farmers of the province of Quebec. Long since, I have come to the conclusion that this question is deserving of the most serious consideration and that it should be settled in accordance with the views given expression to by my hon. friend. I am also aware that, among the French farming community in the province of Quebec, this is a question of paramount importance. I beg also to give my hon. friend for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil) the assurance that this question will receive all my attention and that at the earliest opportunity, I will take such action as may be necessary to improve the service of the Experimental Farm, in so far as the province of Quebec is concerned. It is my intention to do all I can in order that the French Canadian farmers in Quebec may reap all the benefits which they are entitled to expect from it and also, to so dispose matters as to enable those farmers to be put, in all respects, on a footing of equality with the rest of the farming community in Canada.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture if he subscribes to the statements made by my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. McMillan) that the buildings on the Experimental Farm at Ottawa have up to this time cost nearly $160,000 ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have not the figures at my command just now, and I cannot off-hand say whether that is correct or not. I suppose the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) has looked that up.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the hon. gentleman from Huron (Mr. McMillan) got his figures at hand ?

Mr. McMILLAN. Here is a report brought down last year which shows that up to the 1st of January last the buildings cost $151,448.

Mr. FOSTER. The buildings where ?

Mr. McMILLAN. On the Central Experimental Farm at Ottawa. I understand that five or six thousand dollars, if not more, have been expended since.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask my hon. friend if he is quite certain that that means buildings on the Central Experimental Farm, or upon all the experimental farms ?

Mr. McMILLAN. It is a statement of the total expenditure in connection with the Central Farm at Ottawa up to the 1st of January, 1896. The total amount expended for buildings was $151,448. As I stated before, a building has been put up for sheep at a cost of $5,000 or $6,000, and I say, as a practical farmer, that that building could be put up for one-third of that amount. For labour and making permanent improvements, $10,129 has been expended ; for farm labour, $47,147 ; for manure and fertilizers, $12,869 ; for live stock, $6,160.90 ; for swine, $558 ; for poultry, $270. The total amount paid for machinery and implements was $4,121 ; for harness, $922.70, and for horses, $1,270. The amount received from the sale of produce at the Central Experimental Farm and paid to the Receiver General was $20,581.

Mr. CASEY. It would seem that the farmer knows more about the expenditure of the late Government upon this farm than the late Minister of Finance does, and that the late Minister of Finance, when he rose in that superior style, and asked if the hon. gentleman was quite sure if this referred to the Central Experimental Farm, and not to all the farms, simply, in another moment of weakness, exposed his own ignorance of what his own Government had been doing ; because the report from which my hon. friend has just read is an official return sent in by the Department of Agriculture last year, in answer to an order moved for by my hon. friend himself. A few moments ago I said that I would not bother the Minister of Agriculture with much advice, and I have abstained from doing so in regard to the management of the farm. But I would suggest that he should take advantage of this large establishment which we have on hand, for the purpose of not only conducting experiments but conveying instruction. He is no doubt aware of the extent to which these two objects have been combined in the management of the Ontario Agricultural College at Guelph. At the same time that a large number of students have been instructed in the science and practice of agriculture, quite as much valuable experimental work has been done at that college as has been done at the Central Experimental Farm at Ottawa, and I think more.

We have an experimental establishment in connection with which enough might be economized for a contribution by the Government towards the education of a number of students. The hon. Minister is aware that the students at Guelph pay a considerable part of the cost of their education not only in work but in other ways. There is one thing, however, which the Minister may not know, that is, the extent to which that college, and the association of its graduates, have popularized experiments amongst the farmers of Ontario. No one could realize that, scarcely, unless he was present last winter, as I was, at a meeting of the Experimental Union, composed of graduates of that college, when a whole afternoon was devoted to the results of the experiments they had conducted last year. If the hon. Minister was not there, he could hardly realize the amount of enthusiasm that seemed to enter into their work of scientific experimenting with different grains, &c. I can assure him that through the operations of the Guelph College much more valuable experimentation is being done by the farmers of Ontario themselves on their own farms than is being done on all the experimental farms of this Government put together. With this object in view, as well as with the view of increasing agriculture education generally, I would strongly urge upon him the advisability of considering in the near future whether it might not be possible to combine the teaching element with the conduct of experiments on those farms. We have a vast plant that is not fully utilized at present, and I think it might be fully utilized in that way.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) a few moments ago referred to experiments at Guelph with regard to each cow, her production of butter, and so on. I have the last report at hand, and I am unable to find in it anything about such experiments. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would be good enough to send me over the report. There is another matter I would refer to. These experimental farms are for educational purposes, and they cannot reasonably be expected to yield profits every year, or perhaps any year. The hon. gentleman stated that certain services in connection with the Central Farm at Ottawa had gone considerably behind. I am not prepared to say whether that can be justified or not; but I am going to ask the hon. gentleman's attention to the results on the farm with which he has been very closely associated, and if that farm has gone behind, he should be able to offer some substantial reasons why it has done so. Let me take the last report of the Agricultural College at Guelph.

I shall not criticise in either case the management, but I find that at Guelph on the farm proper, during the last year, the sum of $37,568 was expended, and the revenues were only $11,708, making a loss of $25,850. We are not dealing with the farm at Guelph, but the hon. gentleman dragged it in, and unfortunately brought himself in with it. It is unfair to the Experimental Farm at Ottawa to say that it should pay large revenue. It must be remembered that these stations are educational in their character and that we cannot expect them to yield revenue, but there is no use in making things worse than they are by unfounded comparisons. In the figures which I have given of the Guelph farm, I have left out the expenses of the teaching staff and college.

Mr. McMILLAN. If the hon. gentleman will turn to page 69 of the last report from the experimental farm at Guelph, he will find that the salary of the superintendent is $1,200, the wages of the herdsmen, teamsters, &c., $2,771, and care of live stock $1,154, and that the total amount of the expenditure is $8,062, in connection with the farm proper, and not $37,000, as the hon. gentleman stated. He will find also that the revenue was $5,084 during the last year, so that he will have to examine the report a little more carefully before he rises to make a statement of the expenditure and revenue. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that the same mistake was committed in organizing the Guelph farm that was fallen into in organizing the Ottawa farm. A theoretical, instead of a practical man, was appointed in each case. At the Guelph farm, however, they now have a practical man in charge, who, although he was a seedsman in Toronto, many years, ran a large farm during those years, and at a competition he was a tie with his brother for the first prize for the best farm, and only failed obtaining it because it was considered that he might have put in his farm moneys earned elsewhere. He had as good a farm as there was in the province of Ontario, all the time he was seedsman, and he raised on the farm a quantity of the seed he sold. At Ottawa, in the last report, there is $1,500 expended for feed for animals. Well, there is a distribution of the grain, and, taking that distribution at the regular market price, it realized a little under $500. If a farm of that description will not feed the quantity of stock that is kept on it, it does not set a good example for farmers to follow. We want this Ottawa farm to be an example to our farmers, which, I believe, it can be made.

Mr. SPROULE. I spoke of Mr. Mills as not being a farmer, in the proper sense of the word. The hon. gentleman replied that the Guelph farm is not under the charge of Mr. Mills, but of Mr. Rennie, who himself was a practical farmer. If that be evidence that there have not been changes, I cannot understand it. If Mr. Mills cannot be accepted as a practical farmer, he has, nevertheless, been kept at the head of the Guelph farm, doing the same work as Professor Saunders does here.

Mr. McMILLAN. Is the hon. gentleman aware that Mr. Mills is a practical farmer, and lived on a farm until twenty-one years of age, when he met with a severe accident, which forced him to leave the farm? There are few men who have more practical knowledge. But the manager at Ottawa was a druggist in the city of London, and had never been on a farm, and, while he is a very capable man and would be a proper head of all those institutions, if we had practical, and not theoretical, men under him, as it is, his management has not had the success expected.

Mr. CLANCY. I wish to set the hon. gentleman right, because he evidently is not conversant with all the facts. The hon. gentleman relies entirely on the agricultural reports, independent of the public accounts, which show the whole expenditure of the farm. Take the public accounts for 1895, and you will find that $32,066 were paid for the teaching staff, &c., of the Agricultural College at Guelph, and he will find that the receipts from the students amounted to $7,000, making a loss of $25,000. Then, take the farm proper, and you will find that for experimental plots and seeding, dairy department, including experimental dairy, dairy school, poultry department, garden and orchard and mechanical department—all being of an experimental character—the whole sum expended, apart from what was expended on teaching staff, &c., amounted to $37,568.08. What were the receipts? They were:

Farm produce .....	$ 1,224 76
Garden produce .....	2 30
Sale of stock .....	2 30
Service of animals .....	134 00
Experimental dairy .....	2,707 18
Dairy school .....	3,727 75
Poultry department .....	187 64
Miscellaneous .....	67 28
Total .....	$11,709 17

showing a loss of $25,850.

Mr. McMILLAN. When I mentioned the experimental farm at Guelph, I only mentioned the farm proper, and here is the report of the farm proper. Let me state that the total amount spent is $56,000 on the college and farm at Guelph, but the amount spent on the college is $31,000, leaving $25,000 spent on the farm. But remember that included in that expenditure, is the dairy school, which has a very large number of pupils, and it must not be forgotten that in the Ottawa farm there is no teaching. I, therefore, made the only fair comparison that could be made, when I took the farm proper at Guelph, apart from the experimental farm.

Mr. CRAIG. I do not wish to follow the example of hon. gentlemen opposite and obstruct the passage of this item, but I wish to say that no money is better spent than what is spent for the benefit of the farmers. The only point sought to be made by those hon. gentlemen who have spoken on the other side, was that the late Government did not spend this money in the proper manner. In fact, they went over the same story that we have heard so often. If these statements are made only in a general way they lose their effect. I think it might have been better if those who criticise these expenditures had given us some items. What we are trying to do to-day is to pass these items, and it seems to me that the discussion about the conduct of the late Government is not very profitable, seeing that the late Government have not control of these Estimates. It is all very well for hon. gentlemen to talk about the extravagance of the late Government in expending money for these services, but I think it would be more proper if they would show how the present Government expends the money entrusted to it. If the present Government can improve upon their predecessors by expending this money to the greater benefit of the farmers of this country, no one will rejoice more than I shall. But, as we have had a change of Government, I think it would be in better taste to wait and see if that improvement takes place. Comparisons may be in order after a while. But when this Government comes down to the practical work of expending this money, it may be found that these general charges of extravagance against the late Government do not amount to much after all. I hope it may be found so; I do not want to think that the Government I have supported has wasted the people's money as hon. gentlemen opposite charge. As a matter of fact, I do not think they have; I think they were honest in their endeavour to improve the condition of the farmers of Canada and to give good government to this country. I believe they made mistakes, as all governments have and as this Government will. But because they have made mistakes I am not going to charge them with dishonesty and fraud. I am not going to say they were extravagant and that they wasted the people's money; I will say that they made a mistake and will point out that mistake. But now that we have heard so much about this Experimental Farm and have listened to so many lectures about farming, I would appeal to hon. members to let this item go through.

Experimental Fruit Stations..... $2,500

Mr. MONTAGUE. I would ask the hon. Minister of Agriculture if he has formulated any plan for the expenditure of this money and whether he can state now where these experimental stations are to be established?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I desire to inform the hon. gentleman and the House that when I found this vote in the Estimates, I inquired of the officers of the department whether any plans had been formed for spending the money. I found none, and I have had no opportunity of forming a plan myself. I left the item because I took it for granted that there was need for something of this kind, and I trust I may be able to expend the money so as to benefit so important an industry as the fruit-growing industry of this country.

Mr. PRIOR. I hope the hon. Minister of Agriculture will not forget British Columbia when he comes to establish these experimental fruit stations. Any one who has been in British Columbia must know that there is no part of the Dominion in which fine fruit can be raised to better advantage than British Columbia. There is every kind of climate in British Columbia—you can get it as cold as you like or as warm as you like. I would call attention especially to the need of a fruit farm on Vancouver Island. We have an experimental farm on the mainland of British Columbia, a very good experimental farm, carried on by experienced men and yielding good results. But on Vancouver Island we have nothing of that kind. The island is not so well adapted for farming, that is for grain growing, as some other parts of the province, but it is the best possible place for fruit. Salt Spring Island, in the vicinity of Victoria, is not to be excelled by any place in the Dominion. I trust that when the hon. Minister makes up his mind to expend this money on fruit farms he will see to it that one of them is established in the vicinity of Victoria.

Dominion Crop Reports, printing forms and other expenses and bulletins..... $1,500

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the hon. Minister tell if this work is being completed?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. In accordance with the instructions of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague), no doubt, circulars were sent out asking for information on this subject. When that information is received, I think it is wise and best that it should be distributed and available, and therefore I wish to continue this vote for the ensuing year.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I may explain very briefly in regard to these circulars. We found that in some of the provinces there was a system of crop reports but in the Dominion as a Dominion there was no such system. The only circulars I sent out after I had decided to arrange for this work were, first, one to the provincial governments asking for their system and asking also for their assistance, and one to the municipal officers and officers of agricultural societies in various parts of the Dominion asking them to suggest the names of those who would be likely to report in their several districts. I understand, though I cannot recollect at this moment where my information comes from, that a great list of these names had been secured some time ago, and I naturally supposed that circulars asking for information about the crops had been sent out.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I may say that I have not had any consultation with the officials of the department in regard to this matter yet.

Mr. CLANCY. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Agriculture if he has considered the effects of these reports. I have no doubt that both the provincial government and the Dominion Government, in seeking information of this kind, have been moved by a desire to spread among the people information that would be very useful. But I would like to point out to the hon. Minister that such information, in the broad sense, is not really useful to farmers, and the farmers are not anxious to get it. It would be well if it were not followed by other and evil effects. I hope I shall not be understood as speaking against anything that will furnish every citizen with the fullest information relating to every industry, and more especially to so important an industry in Canada as agriculture. But I desire to point out to the hon. gentleman that in Canada as well as in the United States and Great Britain, the reports given out to the whole world are not used by those most interested, but have been made the basis of gambling, as every farmer in this House will know. The chances of every farmer in the whole enlightened world, we may say, are discounted by persons who use this information as a basis for the buying and selling of futures. I desire to call his attention to a protest that was made in the province of Manitoba last year against giving detailed information as to the crops of that province, pointing out, as the farmers did there, that it was made use of for the purpose of affecting the prices of grain, even in Chicago, where it was acted upon. I have no doubt the end aimed at in getting such reports was good, but I have very material doubt as to whether the expenditure of any sum of money in this direction brings with it the results that were originally intended. I do not wish to say that information so useful should be entirely done away with; but I do think that this is a matter of such importance to the farming community that negotiations might take place with the United States government with a view to minimizing the effect of the gambling system which is carried on to such an extent as sometimes completely to overrule the law of supply and demand. No one who takes an interest in matters of agriculture but must have noticed that during the last year the prices of grain in England were so affected by the operators at that end working with those upon this side of the Atlantic, that the law of supply and demand, to a considerable extent, had no operation whatever. Now, the information for this purpose was gained entirely from the resources to which I have made reference. It would appear rather paradoxical to lay down a proposition that no information of that kind should be given, but I only desire to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to what seriously affects the farming community, both in this country and in the United States.

Fall Wheat Experimental Stations..... $1,500

Mr. SPROULE. How many of these fall wheat experimental stations does the hon. gentleman contemplate establishing, and in what localities?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. This item was put into the Estimates by my predecessor, and I find no plan in the department with regard to it, and I have not yet myself formulated any plan. I do not say positively even that I will do so until I have had an opportunity of thoroughly investigating the subject.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I may say that this item was put in the Estimates after consultation with the staff of the farm here. They represented, as the hon. gentleman knows, that no experiments in connection with fall wheat can be made at Ottawa on account of the climate. They also represented to me that it was desirable that such experiments should be made somewhere in the Dominion, since the fall wheat industry was one of the great branches of agriculture. The vote seems exceedingly small for the establishment of experimental stations proper; but it was represented that we might lease certain parts of farms in various portions of the country, and perhaps, by the employment of expert farmers to take charge of the experiments, a small vote could be made effective.

Mr. CASEY. The fall wheat area is entirely in Ontario, and it is already covered by the experiments carried on by the graduates of the Guelph Agricultural College, without any expenditure to this Government.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to draw the attention of the Minister to the fact that the country between Toronto and the Georgian Bay is one of the finest sections for fall wheat. There is no doubt that while it cannot be raised here, it can be raised there to perfection. I speak as one who for some time was engaged in purchasing wheat of that kind, which has always been supplied of the very first quality from that part of the country. If you take part of York and Simcoe, either south or north, and a portion of Grey, going across through that district, you will find the best district in the province of Ontario for fall wheat. If such stations are established, I would strongly advise the hon. gentleman to establish one somewhere in that district.

Mr. CASEY. And in my county, too.

Dairying service ..... $30,000

Mr. FOSTER. Does my hon. friend propose to utilize the whole of this vote?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That is a vote that Professor Robertson has in charge, and is expended in experimental work in dairying, in carrying on cheese factories and butter factories, and in assistance to such factories in different parts of the country. It covers the whole Dominion. Professor Robertson has thought that this year there might be a slight reduction, as he is curtailing operations somewhat in creameries and factories. But I think the sum indicated here will not more than suffice for the work that is really in hand.

Mr. SPROULE. Is this the vote that is used for sending around through the country the different instructors? We had them travelling through Ontario some years ago, and last year in Manitoba and North-west Territories.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. They were paid out of this vote.

Mr. SPROULE. How many of these instructors do you propose sending out this year; or how many were out last year, and where have they been carrying on work?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I cannot tell the hon. gentleman at the moment, but I can soon obtain the information from Professor Robertson. The instructors to whom the hon. gentleman has referred to, are chiefly in the North-west Territories and British Columbia; and there has been a little work of that kind done in Quebec during the present season.

Mr. PRIOR. I hope that it is not the intention of the Minister to decrease the amount expended for this purpose in British Columbia.

To enable the Dairy Commissioner to promote dairying interests by advances for making cheese and butter within the provinces, the proceeds of sale of products from such advances to be replaced to the credit of the Consolidated Revenue Fund ..... $25,000

Mr. MONTAGUE. Has the hon. gentleman taken over recently any new factories in connection with this?

Mr. SPROULE. There were a number of factories taken charge of last year, but I understood the commissioner to say that they were going to drop quite a number. Does this account for the reduction in this vote?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. Would the hon. gentleman kindly tell us how many factories the commissioner intends to have under his charge during the coming year?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I cannot give the exact figures.

Mr. SPROULE. Nor where the factories will be located?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No.

Mr. McMILLAN. I should like to receive a statement of the price realized for a certain quantity of Prince Edward Island cheese, sold under peculiar circumstances to Hodgson Brothers. It was sold at a certain price, but that price could not be stated until it had been marketed in England, and afterwards one-half of the profits were to go to the parties who produced the milk. I should like to know what price was obtained, and if any profits have been distributed among the milk producers. I believe this is a system that should not be followed, and that no Government official should be able to make sales in this way, under which the price cannot be made public until a purchaser has gone to the old country and effected sales. I do not say that any jobbery has taken place, but the practice certainly opens the road for it, and it should be stopped at once.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman refers to a sale that took place during the time I occupied the position of Minister of Agriculture. The hon. gentleman's statement that no jobbery took place is perfectly correct. The transaction was perfectly open and above-board, and the sale, I am led to believe by practical men who are entirely disconnected with the matter, was an admirable one, a very wise step to take at that time. It is true that for market reasons Professor Robertson, who acted on behalf of the Department of Agriculture, agreed that for the present the price should remain private, but the only reason was that which has been given. I do not know how the results may turn out, but the Minister will be able to give that information to the committee; but, so far as the department was concerned, it was a perfectly straight business transaction.

Mr. McMILLAN. If it was a perfectly proper transaction, why was not the price given to the public?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman does not insinuate that it was anything else but a proper transaction, and I gave him the reason.

Mr. SPROULE. The proceeds of the sales are to be refunded to the consolidated revenue fund. How much has been repaid?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The whole outlay.

Mr. SPROULE. Then, no loss has been sustained?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No loss. Professor Robertson has just handed me these figures, which will answer the question asked by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan):—June and July cheese sold at 8 cents; August, 8½ cents; September and October, 9 cents. There was no profit; some loss was sustained by Hodgson Bros. The sale was reported to the department; I have not yet obtained the details, but I can say, speaking from memory, that the reason the details were kept private at that time was that an arrangement was come to with Hodgson Bros. that, if certain profits were realized by them, they would be shared by the department, and, as the firm had not full details from which to ascertain whether there would be a profit or not, and, as the matter was one connected with their private business, it was hardly justifiable for the department to make public the details of that transaction.

Mr. McMILLAN. I understand that 250 boxes of cheese were sold and not paid for. Has suit been taken and the money collected?

Mr. TAYLOR. Did I understand the Minister to say, in regard to this cheese transaction by Professor Robertson with the people of Prince Edward Island, that no loss had been involved to the Government? Why I ask is that I heard the matter discussed at the Brockville Cheese Board, and a serious charge preferred against the Government, and a statement made by Mr. Mark Everitt, a large cheese dealer, that the Government had lost largely by this transaction. If I understood the Minister aright, he said that no loss to the Government had accrued by the action of Professor Robertson in this arrangement with the people of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. MONTAGUE. There was no loss. When the statement was made in the House that a loss had been involved, I stated then that all the advances given the farmers of Prince Edward Island were paid out of the profits of the sale, and, in addition, $25,000 was distributed to the farmers out of the sale.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have not got the full details of this matter, but I understand there was no loss at all to the department or to the country in regard to this sale. I shall be very glad to lay on the Table the papers or to allow any hon. member to see them.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then, I will thank the Minister to bring down the papers, because this has been a burning question at the Cheese Board of Brockville.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The truth should be known.

Mr. TAYLOR. I should like the Minister to bring down the papers, in order that we may examine them.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The charge was also made that the country was paying interest on the money advanced to those farmers. That was not true. The interest was paid out of the proceeds of the sale.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. In reply to the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan), I beg to say there is no suit in court. Instructions have been given to recover from Messrs. Warrington the price of 250 boxes of cheese, for which they have so far refused to pay.

To enable the Dairy Commissioner to promote the dairying interests of Canada by making provision for the placing of fresh made creamery butter and cheese on the British markets in regular shipments without deterioration in quality and for securing recognition of quality there ..... $20,000

Mr. SPROULE. Will the Minister of Agriculture be kind enough to give the committee some information as to what is being done in this line at the present time, and also as to the result of last year's operations?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. This is what is known as the cold storage vote. It was adopted for the purpose of trying some experiments, so that our butter might be placed on the English market in a better condition than hitherto. It is well known that our butter does not have the same recognized position there as our cheese and we who understand butter believe it is due to the fact that butter deteriorates on its passage from manufacturer to consumer. We believe Canadian butter is just as good an article as any made in the world, and, if it could be placed on the English market in the condition in which it leaves the dairy in Canada, our butter trade would be very much larger than it is now, and our butter would have a very much higher reputation. To endeavour to accomplish this result this effort was made to obtain cold storage, by which the butter might reach the English market in the same good condition in which it leaves the dairy. This has been done to a considerable extent, but not to that extent I should like to see, or hon. gentlemen opposite would like to see realized. An arrangement was made between Professor Robertson and a certain line of steamers in Montreal, under which insulated compartments for cold storage purposes were provided on certain vessels leaving Montreal for Avonmouth, the port of Bristol, in England. The service has been going on during the present season. Arrangements were also made for two vessels to be fitted with mechanical cold storage apartments. That plan, however fell through, because the agents and owners were not able to secure the fulfilment of the contracts with the firm in England to supply the mechanical equipments. The firm was not able to carry out its contract, and the result has been that we have not been able to reap the advantage of experiments with mechanical cold storage between this country and English ports.

Mr. FOSTER. In no degree ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Mechanical cold storage, in no degree. We have had what is known as the insulated compartment, which is a cold storage in which chilled products can be kept by use of ice in a good condition until they reach there. But the products put into these compartments ought to be chilled before they leave the port. I may say that in the beginning of the month of August when the rush of butter into the English market began this year, it was found that the arrangements made by Prof. Robertson were not adequate to meet the demand, and in an interview which I had, along with Prof. Robertson, with the agent in Montreal of this line of steamers, I authorized him, to a little more than double the capacity of these cold storage compartments, because I believed that it was a very valuable assistance to our dairying interests in this country. The fact that these demands have sprung up to such an extent is a full justification of the experiment in this line, and I trust that before long we will be able to accomplish a great deal more in this direction. I suppose that the members of the House are aware of the fact, that the leader of the Government and some other members of the Cabinet, met a large number of persons interested in this matter in the city of Montreal, and they declared then that it would be one of the first considerations of this Government to try and accomplish much more in regard to a chain system of cold storage which would stretch the whole way from the producer in Canada to the consumer in England. This matter is under the most careful consideration of the Government, and I trust before another season comes around we will be able to accomplish what I am sure is in the interests of the producers not only of dairy products in Canada, but of all other perishable food products, namely : that our products may be sent to the English market without any chance of deterioration on the voyage. I have just had a memorandum handed to me which shows that the shipments of butter to date in cold chambers of steamships are more than twice as great as they were last year. I may also state that this vote is not entirely devoted to the cold storage on ships from Canada to England ; but that a portion of it is available to be paid out, if necessary, to bring about a system of cold storage throughout the country on certain lines of railroad, so as to convey these perishable food products to the ports of shipment. The arrangements in regard to this are of a nature which may require a considerable payment from the Government. The nature of the arrangement is such, that if the advantages are availed of to a very large extent and the railroad companies in consequence get a full charge for the cars which they are obliged to run, there would be very little indeed for the Government to make up.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the maximum limit ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I can hardly tell the hon. gentleman that. I believe it is expected that some $1,500 or so would be spent this season by the Government. If the advantages were availed of to the fullest extent there ought to be no payment necessary on the part of the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. What amount of butter would a railway have to carry in order to free you entirely from the charge ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The full capacity of their cars being occupied.

Mr. FOSTER. And you limit the number of cars ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Oh, yes. The reason that the Government has to supplement it, is, that we require cars to be sent, and frequently these cars are not by any means full, but for the purpose of helping the people along that line of railway it is necessary that cars should be run although the products so far have not been sufficient to anywhere near fill the cars. When the trade is sufficient to fill the cars, I do not think there will be any expense on the Government.

Mr. SPROULE. It would be interesting to know how frequently these shipments have been made, and the quantity that has been shipped at each time. I would also like to know whether the consignments have been made to agents who generally handle these commodities, or to agents of the Government direct. The sum asked for appears to be very small, especially when we consider the amount of work which has to be done for it. In my part of the country last year, there were applications at different times for these refrigerator cars but they could not be supplied. I understood there was to be a car sent along each line of railway, but on the Grand Trunk Railway, north, from Toronto to Meaford there was no car, nor so far as I can learn was there a car on the Canadian Pacific Railway from Toronto to Owen Sound. On both these lines there are creameries, the owners of which wished to take advantage of the cold storage, but they could not get the cars sent to them and they complained very much on account of it. I think there might profitably be spent a much larger sum of money in this direction. In my opinion it would be very desirable to have these shipments made at regular and short intervals, because by that means we would be more likely to gain a good status in the English market. It would be wise also that we should have selected agents from among the firms who deal in those lines in Great Britain to whom the butter would be sent, and that we should not send it to the ordinary agent or commission merchant who handles produce, and who has no interest in it so long as he gets his commission. There would, I believe, be a better result if the butter was consigned to agents of our own whose duty it would be to introduce it in the English market, and get it a good reputation there as early as possible.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I will remember what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) has said and take note of it; and when I come down, as I may next session, with a much larger sum for this cold storage business, I shall hope to obtain his cordial support in asking the House for that vote.

Mr. SPROULE. I will do that with pleasure, if the money is wisely spent.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. This arrangement permits any private individual to ship his own produce by these cars, but the Government does not control the produce in any way whatever, and does not buy or sell it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am glad to hear from the Minister the figures showing an increase in the amount of butter which is being sent to England, and which I take as a very strong compliment to the course adopted by the previous Government; which course was adopted by them in spite, sometimes of protests and opposition from gentlemen who now I suppose will cordially support it. The Minister, I think, stated that he authorized a steamship company to double their capacity. What line was it, and on what terms has this arrangement been made?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The Elder, Dempster line. Many say that the whole arrangement will have to be recast. The arrangement with this company was one by which they were obliged to supply two vessels with mechanical cold storage, and in consequence of the heavy investment in that matter the Government was to share—

Mr. FOSTER. Up to a maximum?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Up to a maximum. The company was not making any charge for the insulated compartments, but as this mechanical cold storage arrangement fell through, and they consequently are not getting help from the Government. I have no doubt they will expect some assistance in regard to cold storage which they are now supplying. We have not yet come to any definite terms, however, with regard to that.

Mr. MONTAGUE. They are doing the work, and the arrangement so far as any bonus is concerned, is in an unsettled state. It seems to me to be an extraordinary way to be going on.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. This is a work which is somewhat of the same nature as that in connection with the railways. The charges made by the companies in this regard have to be credited to the Government, and the Government cannot possibly go beyond paying the deficit which might be shown in respect to it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am quite aware, but in the old arrangement, if I remember rightly, we had a maximum limit to the contribution of the Government.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The understanding was that it would be on the line of the old arrangement.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the cost of transportation on the cars and the steamships?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. On the railways these products are charged at less than the ordinary car-load rates, with nothing extra for cold storage. On the steamships the extra rate is five shillings a ton for butter and cheese, for cold storage.

Mr. BRODER. I would like to ask whether this butter and cheese that goes to Europe is thoroughly inspected before it is shipped; because you cannot take a poor tub of butter and freeze it good. If we undertake to get back a market which we have lost through not keeping our butter up to the best possible standard, we must send our product there under the best possible conditions. Before sending it, we must take care that it is the best we can produce. If the Government take no steps to inspect the article before it is sent, we cannot expect to attain the object in view. It will not do to allow the butter to be shipped indiscriminately, without inspection. I think the suggestion made by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) to have our agent there to see to the disposal of the article would not work very well, for this reason. Any one who has been engaged in the business of shipping to the English market knows that the moment he undertakes to act independently of the English dealers, that moment they will all be down on him and the article he sells. If you undertake to do anything in the English market, you must use the people there who are engaged in the business, and make them your agents, or else you will fail in the attempt. I had some conversation with an American who undertook to establish a market for poultry in England. He returned home a good many thousand dollars worse off and a good deal wiser than he had been a few months before. He tried to establish a market for turkeys, but he found the inspector in his shop about five times a day looking for stale turkeys. The English dealers had sent the inspector there, and the report got abroad that this man was selling stale turkeys, and he had to stop business. If we go into that market, we must do business through the English dealers, and we must send the very best article and ship it under favourable conditions, or we cannot hold the market. We had the market for butter in England 25 years ago ; but we sent our butter too heavily salted and not properly selected, and the result was that superior butter came in from Denmark and drove ours out of the market. There was no reason why we should have lost that market, if we had sent our butter under better conditions. Why has our butter trade with England increased this year ? Simply because the cheese market closed very badly last year, and a great many people went out of cheese and into butter because they thought they would do better with butter than with cheese. But butter has not done so well as cheese, and we shall probably have more cheese sent next year, and less butter. These are matters that will have to be kept in view in dealing with this question.

THE MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The quality of the butter is not taken into consideration, except that no butter which is not sufficiently cold to be properly put into these insulated compartments is accepted, and the Government employee notes the temperature of the butter when it is put in. Any butter so bad or rancid as to injure the butter alongside of it would not be put in ; but there is no undertaking on the part of the Government to guarantee the quality of the butter that is sent.

Mr. McNEILL. I do think that the remarks which have fallen from the hon. member for Dundas (Mr. Broder), who is evidently an expert in this matter, are well worthy of the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture. If there has been no inspection of the butter sent to the English market heretofore, I do think it would be well that the advice tendered by that hon. gentleman should be adopted ; because, now that we are making an attempt to secure the English market for our butter, as we have secured it for our cheese, there is no doubt that if we send there butter and cheese of an inferior quality, we shall not succeed in the attempt we are making. Unfortunately, our record for butter in the English market is very different from the record we have for cheese. The record of Canadian butter in the English market heretofore has not been good. The record of our cheese is very good. We want to have a good record. We want to do nothing that will lead the English consumer to suppose that we are not sending first-class butter there ; and the way to do that is to make sure that nothing but first-class butter is sent from this side. While on my feet, I would like to say that I have heard with the greatest possible pleasure the statements made by the hon. Minister of Agriculture in reference to this subject. I am delighted to find that he and his Government are determined to prosecute so thoroughly the attempt that has already been made by the late Government to open up this great market for our butter. It is a market that is almost unlimited. It is a much larger market than the market for our cheese. We have secured a good half of the English market for our cheese, and I do not see why we should not do as well with our butter. But if we intend to do so, we must take the precaution that only the very finest quality of butter is shipped from Canada to England.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think the point touched upon by the hon. member for Dundas (Mr. Broder), and backed up by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), is the most important point raised in this discussion. There can be no question that if we wish to secure a market for our products in Great Britain, we can only achieve success by seeing that none but the best articles leave our shores. I had myself an experience in Liverpool which illustrates very well the point these gentlemen are making. I was making some inquiries there from dealers in connection with Canadian poultry, and I discovered that our prospects had been largely ruined in that market by reason of the fact that a few years ago a shipment of poultry had been made which were, to a certain extent, defective, and not properly put on the market. And the result of that inferior shipment, perhaps containing only two or three birds not fit to be put upon the market, was that it destroyed our reputation in the market at Liverpool. The result would have been entirely different had there been rigid inspection of these birds before they left our shores. I think that the hon. Minister of Agriculture can do no better service than see that every product, especially perishable products, which goes from the Canadian farmers to the markets of Great Britain is inspected before it leaves our shores, for one bad consignment will certainly destroy the good reputation we may enjoy.

Mr. GANONG. It is not only the western part of Canada that is interested in the dairy business. The maritime provinces are to-day entering into honourable rivalry with the west. Owing to the liberal grant which the local government of New Brunswick, under the administration of the present Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair), has made to assist cold storage in that province, I have no doubt whatever that from the general storage at St. John and the branches in the different parts of the province, we also shall soon have beef, butter and cheese to export to the British market; and I would like to ask the hon. Minister if it is his intention that a part of this money shall be applied to steamships sailing from St. John?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. With regard to the inspection of these products before shipment, I might point out that for the Government to undertake to refuse to allow certain shipments to be put into cold storage and sent to England, and to allow other shipments to be sent, would be practically impossible. It is certainly important that our perishable products, as well as anything else we send to the English markets, where we have to meet the keenest competition, should be of the best quality possible; but I think we could attain that object by carefully instructing the people to make the best possible products. I think we can attain that object by giving them instructions and showing them how they can improve the quality in these cases where they do not send what is up to the average. I do not think the hon. member for Haldimand himself (Mr. Montague) would undertake to test and inspect and brand the shipments of butter and cheese and other food products before they are put in cold storage.

Mr. McNEILL. I cannot follow my hon. friend in that statement. I think it would be very advisable that these products should be branded. If any one chose to send an inferior quality of butter, of course the hon. Minister could not prevent the shipment, but he could prevent that consignment being branded as good butter, and that would be a notice to the English consumer of its quality. We would, in that way, distinguish the good from the bad, and the result would be that no bad butter would be shipped, because nobody would buy it.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman has not answered the question of the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Ganong).

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. As regards what has been said about shipments in these cold storage vessels, we require that all space shall be held for Canadian butter or cheese, and it is only when there is no more of that offering that any American or other cheese or butter is allowed to be shipped. Of course, the hon. member knows that no Canadian butter or cheese can go out of the country without being branded as Canadian, but as to branding the quality, I am not altogether in accord with him. In reply to the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Ganong), I may say that I have no desire to overlook the importance of the trade from the maritime provinces, and I am sure it deserves the fullest consideration just as well as the trade from the St. Lawrence ports.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not think the hon. gentleman ought to deal with shipments made in those cold storage departments on the same basis as ordinary shipments. I can quite understand that it would be rather severe for the Government to step in and say what should and should not be shipped to Great Britain in the way of ordinary trade: but I call his attention to the fact that we are liable to be called on to pay a sum of money for the purpose of promoting our English butter trade. The only way to establish a better trade is to increase the reputation of Canadian products, and as we are spending money for that purpose, I think the best possible service the department could do would be to see that the best article goes on the market, and that can only do would be to see that the best article shipped in cold storage, a part of the expense of which is to be paid by the people of Canada. It seems to me utterly absurd that a man should ship butter of a very inferior quality and that we should contribute some of the cost of the shipment of that inferior article which would help to destroy our trade rather than increase it. I am sure the hon. gentleman will see the force of what I say and give the matter his very closest attention. There is another question I would like to ask, and that is what amount of cheese has gone over this year in cold storage. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will let us know after recess.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). In reply to an inquiry that was made before dinner, I may say that of the products that were sent from the port of Montreal this season, no cheese practically was sent in the cold storage, but that from 6,000 to 9,000 packages of butter have been sent per week, but that the accounts, as returned by the steamship companies, are not in, and, consequently, I cannot give exact figures as to the number of packages or the number of pounds of these articles that have been shipped from that port this season.

Mr. FOSTER. There is nothing of this vote that goes to pay for advances on butter and cheese purchased to send to the British market? That was in the previous vote.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. So far as I am concerned, I have no more remarks to make, except that I may take a moment to recall to my hon. friend's mind what he may not be personally cognizant of, but what hon. members who were in the last Parliament will remember—that, when we initiated this policy of making advances and endeavouring to prepare a market for good butter in Great Britain, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), together with a large number of other members of the then Opposition, commented very severely on our policy in that respect, and, among other things, referred to us as "greengrocers."

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to give his quotation?

Mr. FOSTER. I can give the quotation. I congratulate hon. gentlemen on their repentance and on bringing forth fruits meet for repentance in the vote before us. I congratulate my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture upon his arraying himself in the ranks of the "greengrocers."

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I was not in the last Parliament, as the hon. gentleman knows. This vote has nothing whatever to do with the arrangement to which the hon. gentleman has alluded. That, I understand, was an arrangement which was entered into the year before for the purchase here of butter at a certain price and its sale in England by the Government at whatever price the market would allow. The last vote which was passed—which I may not be in order in referring to, but the House will bear with me, I trust—was a vote simply for "advances," and is practically used, in fact entirely used, for advances to the patrons who send their milk to the factories while the finished product from these factories is being marketed. It is simply to protect the farmers from the loss of time and loss of interest which would be involved in their waiting for the returns from the market. These advances are not to purchase butter and cheese in order to sell them again: they are simply the advances on the product of these factories. The vote is intended to be covered, and last year was covered, I believe, by the final settlement of the accounts.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not finding fault at all.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I do not think the hon. gentleman's speculations were very successful, as my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture can tell him.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I pointed out that the arrangements which the ex-Finance Minister alluded to, and which he has taken comfort to himself we are endorsing, are not at all the same as this vote, and have nothing whatever to do with it.

Mr. McMILLAN. The hon. ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) has been congratulating members on this side on their change of front on this question. The operation to which he has referred, was that of purchasing butter, and I hope that no Minister of the Crown in this Government will take the position taken by the hon. gentleman with regard to that. That butter was purchased at 20 cents a pound and sent to the old country and sold for 14·38 cents. And the hon. gentleman had the audacity to stand up on a platform in the northern part of Ontario and declare that his Government had been successful in returning to the treasury every cent that had been taken out to purchase this butter. But, when the question was asked across the House, he had to acknowledge the corn and admit that only 14·38 cents came in for every 20 cents that went out.

Mr. SPROULE. Whatever may have been the result of the first trial shipment, it is evident that the policy was successful, because the development of the trade has been going on very rapidly, and the hon. Minister of Agriculture tells us that it was much greater last year than it was at first. I have every hope that the development will go on.

Mr. McMULLEN. I wish to refer to a suggestion of the late Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague). He contended that it was desirable that only the best qualities of butter should be sent to the British market. I agree with him. But he suggested that the privilege of sending in cold storage should be confined to the best quality. While it is well to encourage the introduction of the best quality that is made in Canada, I think it would be hardly fair for the Minister to go so far as to say that he would refuse transshipment in cold storage to any but the first quality. I should have no objection, if we could so arrange it, to having butter inspected and branded as first, second or third quality. While I think it most desirable to encourage the production of the best quality of butter and of having as large a portion as possible of that sent to the English market of first quality, I think it would be hardly fair to exclude the other.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I quite agree with the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). I do not see how the Minister of Agriculture could refuse to ship any butter that might be offered, but I desire to convey to the committee my opinion that the Department of Agriculture should be exceedingly careful before putting its imprimatur upon butter shipped to the old country, to see that it was first-class. The plan suggested by the hon. gentleman would meet my idea, and I should think would be practicable—to inspect the butter and grade it. But butter permitted to go through under the patronage of the Dominion of Canada, and sent in cold storage paid for with the money of the people of Canada, should not be second-class butter that is sure to do us more injury than good. Just one point in regard to what has been said by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan). It is true that the late Government brought down upon itself a great deal of criticism because it undertook to purchase a certain quantity of creamery butter and place it in good shape upon the market of Great Britain. It is true a certain sum of money was lost in that connection. But I think I shall be approved by this House, I am positive I shall be approved by the country, when I say that the small sum of money lost in making these experiments, were trifling, when compared with the splendid result which has accrued to Canada from the efforts which we then made. The increase in the butter exports to the motherland is founded upon the experiment which was made, and which advertised our butter in the markets of Great Britain. And I would call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that the great butter industry of Australia, the splendid trade in this article that Australia has built up with the motherland, was worked up at enormous expense in the form of bounties taken from the Australian taxpayers and used as an inducement to producers to improve and increase their product.

Mr. BRITTON. I would remind the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) that the point made by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan), was not that there was a loss, but that the ex-Finance Minister stated that there was no loss, but in the House had to admit that there was a loss.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not remember such a statement, but I can tell the hon.

Mr. McMULLEN.

gentleman (Mr. Britton), who was not then in the House, that, if the hon. member for South Huron did not make that attack to-night, he and other members on his side in the late Parliament made that attack, both in this House and on the public platform, in connection with the very same subject upon which they feel called upon to congratulate us now.

Mr. McMILLAN. The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) was one of the gentlemen who stated in North Ontario that the butter that was sent to the British market was of such good quality that it raised the reputation of Canadian butter to a level with that of Danish butter. Last year I read a statement respecting 251 packages of this butter, a statement direct from the commission merchants who handled it, which showed that it was anything but of a quality to raise the reputation of our butter in the British market. It was in bad flavour, and part of it was turnipy. Not only that, but it was shown conclusively, upon subsequent investigation, that part of that butter was not fresh butter, it was butter that had been held over from the previous summer, that had been made with a view to consumption in Canada. I say that the late Government were not careful in the experiment they made, and I say that experiment injured the character of Canadian butter in the British market, rather than advanced it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I trust that after the conclusive argument which has been made by my hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. McMillan) the Minister of Agriculture will not refuse a moment longer to inspect, under the most rigid system, every pound of butter that goes from Canada. I can only say to my hon. friend that when the butter was shipped by the Government as a venture for the purpose of placing it in good condition on the British market, it was inspected, as I understood, most carefully; and if such packages were sent, it was certainly due to negligence on the part of the inspector.

Mr. McMILLAN. I can assure my hon. friend that the butter was not inspected; and I can assure him that part of the butter that was made at the Black Creek creamery the summer before, was found in Manchester in very bad condition, having gone off flavour, proving that the Government did not have a careful inspection so as to have only fresh butter sent over, as they said they would have at the time they went into that arrangement.

Mr. MOORE. I believe that the item for cold storage is one of the most important items in the Estimates now before this committee. While I do not wish to criticise unduly the hon. Minister of Agriculture or any of the hon. gentlemen opposite who have spoken, still it strikes me that the item under consideration does not quite meet the requirements of the country. In regard to the Minister of Agriculture, I may say that I believe he is competent and able to conduct properly the duties that are imposed upon him in his department. He is a practical farmer, and has devoted a great deal of time and energy in promoting the agricultural interests of the country; and I am grateful to the Prime Minister for having selected a gentleman from the eastern townships from which I come, to fill the important Department of Agriculture. But, Sir, I think the item under consideration is imperfect and too limited in its scope. It reads this way:

To enable the Dairy Commissioner to promote the dairying interests of Canada by making provision for the placing of fresh made creamery butter and cheese on the British markets in regular shipments without deterioration in quality and for securing recognition of quality there ..... $20,000

I cannot see why the hon. gentleman should limit the scope of this item to creamery butter and cheese, why the creamery butter and cheese makers of Canada alone should enjoy the benefit of the aid which it is proposed to give them by this item. We have heard the Minister of Agriculture say that our dairymen are as skilful and as able to make good butter as any other butter makers in the world, and I believe that is the case. They are consequently able to compete in the British market with the dairymen of other parts of the world, and I do not believe it is treating the dairy farmers fairly to exclude them from the benefit which will be derived by creamery butter makers under this item. While I desire to see the Government, whichever party are in power, exercise economy in the expenditure of the people's money, still I believe that this sum is too small an amount for the encouragement of the industry. I do not think it would be wise to limit cold storage to butter and cheese only, but I think the Government should extend assistance in this way to the exports of all perishable products which are raised by the farmers of this country and sent to the British market. We find that England imports dressed meats annually to the value of $115,678,905; eggs, $19,483,408; fruits, $23,680,348; condensed milk, $5,258,720; poultry and game, $29,415,141. These are all perishable products, and the farmers of this country are as well prepared to engage in this production as in the production of butter and cheese if they can only find a market for them. But we are debarred from the British market, which is supplied by the United States and other countries who have forestalled us in that market by means of the cold storage provided for them. I think it would meet with the views of hon. members of this House generally if that item was increased so as to include other perishable articles that I have mentioned. We find that fresh mutton is imported into England to the extent of 256,731,131 pounds; fresh beef, 227,834,955 pounds; other fresh meats, 97,287,482 pounds. Canada supplies 4-10 per cent of the fresh mutton; of other fresh beef, nearly nothing; and of all other meats, 1½ per cent; while the United States, with the aid of cold storage, are supplying the English people with the great bulk of these perishable products that might profitably be raised in Canada if encouragement were given to the farmers in aiding them to transport these articles to the British market in good condition.

I would also call the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to another matter. It has been frequently said that the Government cannot assist the farmers of this country by legislation; but I think it did encourage the manufacture of cheese in Canada, and with the result that the production of that article has enormously increased. In 1878 we exported $3,997,521 worth of cheese. By the encouragement given to the farmers by the provincial and federal governments, the production of cheese had increased in 1895 to $14,253,002. Now, the British market only requires about $22,000,000 worth of cheese per year, and we are supplying them at the present time with over one-half of what they require. The United States are also increasing their production of cheese, and the time may not be far distant when, through other countries engaging in this work the British market may become over-stocked, resulting in a fall in prices, which we know are, in all conscience, low enough already. Therefore, I think it is very important that we should encourage the farmers in other respects than in the manufacture of cheese. But in respect to butter we have a different story to tell. I remember a few years ago when I was engaged in buying butter, large quantities of it were shipped to the English market. We paid very little attention to the quality, it was kept for some time in the store-houses throughout the country, and afterwards shipped to Montreal. There it was held until it could be shipped on board vessels, and when it arrived in the British market, it was entirely unfit for the Englishman's table. If you wish to capture an Englishman's palate you cannot do it by selling him rancid butter or stale meat. England imported, in 1895, butter to the value of $69,327,786. We exported, in 1878, butter to the value of $2,382,237, but in consequence of losing our reputation by sending to the English market poor grades of butter or butter well made and spoiled afterwards by keeping, our exports fell to $697,476 in 1895. We have heard a great deal said about depression. The farmers of the country are well aware that we are in a state of depression; but while that is the case, while the agriculturists may feel they are in a depressed condition, they are not alone—for the farmers of other countries are suffering to a greater extent than those of Canada. To the encouragement and protection which has been given to the farmers, I attribute a great deal of their success and the elevated position they hold to-day as compared with the farmers of other countries, although they do not yet occupy the position which the importance of this calling entitle them to. If $20,000 proposed to be appropriated to promote the sale of creamery-made butter and cheese were increased to $50,000 and made to include all perishable articles raised on the farms, a great stimulus would be given to our farmers, who would be much more benefited than they will be by this comparatively small amount asked by the Minister of Agriculture to be devoted exclusively to cold storage for creamery butter and cheese. I need not occupy the time of the committee by adducing any extended arguments on this question. It will be evident that we should not restrict the encouragement to be given to our farmers merely for the sake of saving a few dollars; but the Minister of Agriculture should ask $40,000 or $50,000 to provide cold storage in order to transport in good condition all perishable articles raised in Canada in order to enable our farmers to compete with other nations. This Dominion has already spent large sums to enable our farmers to transport their products as cheaply as the farmers of other countries to the English markets where our agriculturists come into competition with those of every country on the globe, and with cheap and rapid transportation and facilities for preserving in good condition perishable articles in transit would open up a prosperous future to the farmers of Canada which cannot be secured by any other means.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Following up what the hon. gentleman has said, I should like to ask the Minister whether he proposes to bring down a vote to place Canadian meat on the English market?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That question is under consideration.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does the hon. gentleman hope during the present session to be able to inform the House on this question? I think the item had better stand.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No; that is impossible.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does the hon. gentleman propose to use any portion of it to make another trial shipment of fruit?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I made an arrangement this fall with the Dempster Line to take shipments of fruit. Some fruit has been shipped by that line, and more will be sent over, no doubt, before the end of the season.

Mr. CLANCY. I should like to ask the Minister if he proposes to make a trial shipment of high grade dairy butter. In order to reach the masses it will be necessary to send butter outside of creamery-made butter, which is of a high grade and most desirable to place on the English market; but there are other classes that are very useful, and I should like to know if he proposes to make a trial shipment of high grade dairy as well as creamery butter.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The arrangements made for cold storage are for creamery butter only. I have made no arrangements for dairy butter, although I fully appreciate the high quality of some samples made in this country. I am satisfied there is dairy butter quite equal to the very best creamery butter, but the difficulty of classification and of obtaining a uniform grade is so great that the arrangements made have only been for creamery butter.

Aid to agricultural societies ..... $7,000

Mr. McDUGALL. I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether any agricultural societies organized under local governments receive any portion of this grant?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It is given only to agricultural societies in the North-west Territories. This fact should be stated in the item.

Mr. McDUGALL. That is the reason I asked the question, for I do not understand that any distribution is made among agricultural societies in the provinces.

Quarantine salaries and contingencies of organized districts ..... $35,000

Mr. MONTAGUE. Has the hon. Minister filled the vacancy in connection with the office of port physician at Victoria? There was a recommendation for the appointment of Dr. Duncan, who has been doing the work.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That appointment was filled. An Order in Council was passed by the late Government before it went out of office. Under the rule laid down by His Excellency as to signing Orders in Council, that Order has been signed by him.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then my recommendation for the appointment of Dr. Duncan has been carried out, and I suppose he has charge of the office permanently?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. He was in charge of the office before the Order in Council was passed, and no change has been made.

Mr. PRIOR. I congratulate the Government on making the appointment.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It was made by the late Government.

Mr. PRIOR. Mr. Duncan is a gentleman thoroughly qualified to fill the position.

Winnipeg and St. Boniface Hospital..... $4,000

Mr. GILLIES. Under whose charge is this?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). The Winnipeg hospital is under the charge of the local authorities, and the St. Boniface hospital is in charge of the Roman Catholic authorities. They are both public hospitals, open to everybody and anybody.

Cattle quarantine ..... $22,000

Mr. MONTAGUE. I should like to ask the Minister a question with reference to which I gave some of the colleagues of the hon. gentleman notice. Some time ago, by the advice of the Veterinary Chief Inspector, and after consultation with the other officers of the department, it was decided to reorganize the veterinary staff of the Dominion and appoint for each county a veterinary inspector whose duty it would be to have a general oversight of the health of the various flocks and herds in that county. I am informed that a number of these gentlemen who were appointed have received notice that their services would not be required. I should like to know from the Minister on what ground he is proceeding?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. When I came to the department I found a large number of applications for these situations. I inquired exactly what was the nature of these appointments, and I found that they were in consequence of a recommendation of Dr. McEachren, Chief Veterinary Inspector, to the late Minister. That recommendation was made last winter, or early this spring, and Dr. McEachren was instructed to draw up a set of regulations and rules for the guidance of these officials. Immediately after that Dr. McEachren went away on a tour of inspection through the North-west and British Columbia, and he was away for two months. There were no instructions issued. The Minister, I understood, had sent Dr. McEachren recommendations, but had not ratified them, and they were not issued. There were, therefore, no instructions for these officials to act upon. At the very moment of the elections, appointments were made. A few were made from time to time as they went along, and I am informed by my officers that on the 16th June instructions were given to appoint a very large number of them. Apparently, evidently I may say, there was no inquiry into their veterinary qualifications. There was no consultation with the head of this branch of the department, and the instructions which the head of that branch had intended should be issued to these officers on their appointment had not been issued. The result was that a number of appointments were made in the heat of a political campaign, in a way that I could not help considering to be prejudicial to the service.

and I undertook immediately to prevent any bad effects from such action. I cancelled the whole lot of the appointments, reserving to myself to appoint officials who might be able to do that work in what I considered to be, and hope to be able to prove, a better method than that indicated by the first action of the Minister. Up to the present time I have not had an opportunity of consulting with the official head of that branch of my department sufficiently to indicate exactly what course I will take to guard the health of the animals in the way which was expected to be accomplished by the appointment of those officers. I have some proof that even in the short time these officers held their office, bad effects did occur, and I felt perfectly justified in the course I took.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) has rather imputed to me a political motive in connection with the matter. I had no such motive whatever. It is true that some delay did occur in connection with issuing the instructions, consequent upon my absence, and upon the absence also of the chief inspector, who was called away to the North-west Territories. However, what I was concerned chiefly about, was to find out the hon. gentleman's policy, as to whether the fact that these gentlemen had been notified that their services would not be required indicated that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) did not propose to carry out the policy we laid down in connection with local inspection. What I understand from the hon. gentleman to-night is, that while he reserves himself the right—which he has a perfect right to do under the rule which hon. gentlemen opposite have laid down—as to whether these officers shall be selected for the work or not, he leads the House to believe that he will carry out the system of local inspectors which the late Government pledged its faith to.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) is a little astray in saying that I am following the rule laid down. These appointments were purely departmental and were made by the Minister. I have grave doubts myself as to the power of the Minister to make such appointments, as I am inclined to think that they should be made by Order in Council. They were not made by Order in Council, but simply on the fiat of the Minister. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) has said that there was no political feeling in the matter. I believe him, of course, and accept his declaration, but I can say that the instructions left in the department by the late Minister were that the nominees of the Conservative candidates in the elections should be selected. Therefore, I do not consider that there was that proper surveillance and investigation into the professional qualities of these gentlemen which I think ought to be exercised in such appointments.

With regard to my policy, I may say that I expect to carefully guard the health of the animals of this country, and if in my organization of the quarantine department I find that local inspectors are necessary, I shall take steps to provide them.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman has not opened up such a serious matter in the statement he has made to the House. The hon. gentleman should have stated the whole facts when he stated any. If he had done so, he would have informed the House that no one could possibly be appointed unless he was properly qualified as a veterinary surgeon under the rules we laid down. If the hon. gentleman had stated that the matter would have borne an entirely different face to the House, and I am sure that the hon. gentleman does not desire, by telling half the truth, to place myself and the other members of the late Government in an improper position before the House. It is true that having laid down the rule that these officers should be properly qualified, I then took the nomination of gentlemen supporting the Government. If I were in power, I would do it to-morrow, and I have no doubt the hon. gentleman will do the same thing. Therefore, I do not think the hon. gentleman can claim a great deal of virtue for rather attempting to blacken the manner in which I had dealt with the matter by saying that I had taken the nomination of political supporters. I did it, I do not offer any excuse for it, and the hon. gentleman will do the same thing, and he might as well admit it to the House.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman will bear in mind that while these gentlemen had to be qualified veterinary surgeons, there is a great deal of difference in the quality of professional gentlemen.

Mr. MONTAGUE. There is a great deal of difference between a Tory and a Liberal veterinary surgeon, in the hon. gentleman's estimation.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. If I were to express such an opinion, I would only be following the footsteps of the hon. gentleman, who acknowledges that he appointed political supporters. But I consider it essential that something more than their political opinions should be considered in the appointment.

Mr. SCRIVER. I desire to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether in the arrangement for the appointment of these veterinary surgeons, it was decided how they should be paid—whether by salary or by fees?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. They were to be paid by fees, and their travelling expenses allowed. I may say that one of the dangers attendant on these appointments was that under the arrangements some individuals might very easily create work for themselves and plunge the country into serious difficulties and expenses. In justification of the action I took in regard to the cancelling of these appointments, I may say that in the three weeks during which these gentlemen were in office, some $500 or $600 of bills were sent into the department. These bills come from a very few out of the whole number. A number of them, having received no instructions, were wise enough to write to the department and find out what their duties were without taking any action; but others, appointed in the manner I have indicated, plunged into the work, and seeing an opportunity, perhaps not particularly to make money, but to make themselves important and to gain a little cheap notoriety for themselves, incurred very heavy expenses which will have to be paid by the department. In one instance, in the province of Quebec, one of these gentlemen showed such lack of judgment that the chief veterinary surgeon had to go to the locality to investigate the matter, and we have had very serious difficulty in satisfying the people of the neighbourhood in regard to his action, and they have expressed their satisfaction that his appointment has been cancelled.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he has considered the question that was brought to his attention a few days ago, whether he will or will not relax the quarantine regulations with regard to cattle coming into the country. I understand that a request was made to him to do away with the 90 days quarantine. In my judgment, that would be a great mistake. It is most important to keep our cattle healthy, and the best way to do that is to prevent the importation of disease, which I am quite sure would occur if the relaxation urged were granted. If the hon. gentleman has considered that question, I think it would be interesting to the House and the country to know whether he has come to any conclusion in regard to it.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I may say that representations have been made to me on this very important subject. There are certain interests in the country which would no doubt like to see the quarantine regulations relaxed. While I have considered the subject, I have come to no conclusion; but I can assure the hon. gentleman that no change will be made which will endanger the health of the animals in Canada.

Mr. McMILLAN. I hold in my hand a letter from the Chairman of the Cattle Breeders' Association of the province of Ontario in regard to the position of that association on this question of the quarantine between Canada and the United States. He says there was not a dissenting voice in the matter of the desirability of removing the quarantine regulations between Canada and the United States and of removing or modifying those between England and Canada. The check imposed on this side upon cattle coming from abroad was considered to have the effect of making importation practically impossible. The cattle breeders are in favour of removing the quarantine restrictions between Canada and the United States, for the reason that a very large number of farmers in this country raise cattle which they cannot fatten, and for which it is believed they would find a market in the United States if those restrictions were removed. It is also found that cattle could be shipped from any port of the United States if the quarantine restrictions were removed from there. The restrictions between Great Britain and Canada at the present time are almost prohibitory. Many farmers going to England would purchase two or three cattle there and bring them to Canada, as this is absolutely necessary to keep up the quality of our cattle, but for the quarantine restriction of 90 days. While relaxing those restrictions, we should retain the right to re-impose them at any time if we found that the herds of the United States or Great Britain were injuring the herds in this country through importation.

Mr. SPROULE. Evidently either the cattlemen or the hon. gentleman are not well informed with regard to what the regulations are at the present time. Because he says that a relaxation would enable the cattlemen to export through the ports of the United States. If he were a close reader of the press, he would have noticed that only yesterday the cattlemen were exporting from the port of Boston, and that for the last three years they have had the privilege of exporting through Portland; and these are the only two ports of the United States through which, so far as I am aware, the cattlemen of Canada wish to send their cattle when exporting to Britain. Therefore, a relaxation of the quarantine regulations is not required for that purpose. With regard to the relaxation for the sake of the importation of cattle, I most decidedly dissent from their view. I do not believe it would be in the interests of the country to in any way relax those restrictions, because if we once imported disease, we would then be able to estimate the disadvantages, after it was too late.

Mr. ELLIS. What is the object of the regulation requiring the inspection of horses from this country to the United States? There is a charge of a dollar by each inspector for that?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I was not aware, I confess, that there was a fee on horses going to the United States. Horses going to England are inspected because there have been representations from the Home Government with regard to some importations which were supposed to be affected with glanders, and we desired to maintain the high reputation which our horses have in the British markets. I have not looked into the matter to see whether or not there is the same inspection on horses going into the United States. My impression is, there is not.

Pension to Mrs. Colebrooke and child..... $ 219

Mr. OLIVER. What is the reason for the difference in the pension between this year and last?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). My recollection is that last year $400 was allowed Mrs. Colebrooke for arrears.

Public Works—Chargeable to Capital—
River St. Lawrence ship channel..... $75,000

Mr. FOSTER. Is that a continuation of the same work as was prosecuted before?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Precisely the same.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I see that in the earlier Estimates, brought down by the late Government, an appropriation of $95,000 was made for this work. How do you account for the decrease?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The sum in the Main Estimates was $75,000, and $20,000 was in the Supplementary Estimates.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Then, there is no actual reduction in this item as compared with the one brought down by the late Government.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The late Government had a main estimate of $75,000, and a supplementary estimate of $20,000. Besides this, there was a special warrant for $12,000. The total expenditure last year was $110,000. I hope this year to spend only $75,000.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Then, you ask for the same amount as the late Government.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). No, not the same amount as hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The same amount less the supplementary estimate.

River Kaministiquia ..... $10,000

Mr. CLANCY. Perhaps this would be the proper item upon which to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Public Works to another needed public work. I would ask the hon. Minister if it is the intention of the Government to place in the Supplementary Estimates a sum for the improvement of the navigation of the River Sydenham? This is a matter, as I understand, that has been before the Public Works Department for some time.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am not in a position to give my hon. friend

(Mr. Clancy) an answer to that question now.

Mr. CLANCY. I hope the hon. gentleman will be able to put the item in the Supplementary Estimates.

Public Works—Chargeable to Income—

Nova Scotia—
Halifax Drill Hall.....	$100,000
Lunenburg Post Office, Custom-house, &c., to complete.....	1,000

Mr. DOMVILLE. I would like to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Public Works to the city of St. John.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order. Wait for the next item.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I am calling the hon. Minister's attention to a matter of importance in a way that I think is quite parliamentary. I have seen discussions interjected upon items in this way, and I have been in the House as long as many of the hon. gentlemen opposite. I would like the hon. Minister to consider the need that exists for a drill shed in the city of St. John.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask if this $100,000 will finish the Halifax drill hall?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No; the amount of the contract is $195,000. I understand that $100,000 will be needed to complete the work.

Mr. GILLIES. What is to be the total cost of this work?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The total cost, including the site, the armoury, &c., will be $267,000.

Mr. BRITTON. It seems to me that the rule requiring the discussion to be confined to the item immediately under consideration, is more honoured in the breach than in the observance. I would like to call the attention of the hon. Minister at this stage to a work which I hope will be provided for in the Supplementary Estimates. Here is a very large vote for a drill hall in Halifax. Now, Kingston has not had a drill hall for four or five years. The one we had was sold to Queen's College. If Halifax is adjudged to be entitled to an expenditure of $100,000 for this purpose, I hope that at least one-quarter of that amount will be appropriated for a drill hall in Kingston, especially considering the fact that the late Government received the amount for the old drill hall on the supposition that a new one would be erected immediately. It is only fair to gentlemen opposite to say that the item for this work appeared in the Estimates, but the work was delayed.

Mr. GILLIES. Upon what system, or on what principle, is the choice of places for the construction of these drill halls made?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Of course, we must be guided by the needs of the province. Further than this I have not made up my mind on what system I will consent to recommend appropriations for drill halls.

New Brunswick—

Marysville public building.....	$8,000
Tracadie Lazaretto .....	1,000

Mr. DOMVILLE. I desire information as to this Marysville post office. Is this the Marysville opposite Fredericton, in the county my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) represents?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That vote was put in the Estimates to build a post office. It was understood at the time that Mr. Gibson was going to give a site. So far nothing has been done, but I thought fit to leave the estimate as it is, and negotiations can go on with Mr. Gibson, so that we may be able to see what we can do.

Mr. CAMERON. What is the population of this great city of Marysville, and what is the revenue of the post office there? Before we vote $8,000 for this purpose, we ought to know something of the circumstances. What is the population—500 or 10,000? Is the revenue $10 or $10,000? Before we pass this vote for building a post office in Marysville, we ought to understand these things.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I understand that Marysville is a very flourishing town with a population of about 1,400. The business men are enterprising and active, and need this post office building.

Dominion public buildings—

Maritime Provinces generally—Dominion public buildings.....	$10,000
---	----------

Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.) I would draw the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the fact that a local architect in Prince Edward Island was asked to report on certain repairs to the public building at Montague, and to take steps to improve the approaches to the building and to do other small repairs. Could the Minister tell me if he has received the report from the local architect?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have no report yet, but we expect one from day to day.

Mr. QUINN. There was a question about a drill hall in St. John, N.B. Is it the intention of the Government to build a drill hall there?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The question has not yet been considered.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I would like to know where it is intended to erect drill sheds during the present season. It is getting pretty close to the time that they should be estimated for. I know it has been the intention to put drill sheds in several places.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The Government have not yet had much time to consider where drill halls should be built. I have requests from certain towns, and in the Supplementary Estimates perhaps some votes will be proposed. But I cannot undertake to say that the Government is prepared to build many drill halls at present. Money is scarce.

Quebec—

St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary..... $7,000

Mr. FOSTER. What is proposed to be done with this $7,000 at the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We provide tools and all that kind of thing for the penitentiary. In the past we have provided the stoves also, but lately the Department of Justice has claimed that they should not provide the stoves.

Grosse Isle quarantine station..... $6,000

Mr. SPROULE. There is an increase of $5,000 for the Grosse Isle quarantine station. What improvements are to be made which necessitate this additional outlay ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I left the amount as I found it in the late estimates. It is for the following items : Bakery and baker's residence, $366.30 ; Catholic Chaplain's residence, $607 ; Catholic Chapel, $1,250 ; Superintendent's residence, $713 ; residence Assistant Medical Officer, $310 ; new residence, $1,121 ; repairs, $665 ; supplies not yet determined, and to cover travelling expenses and other contingencies, $1,600.

Quebec post office..... $2,500

Mr. CASGRAIN. I see $2,500 for repairs to Quebec post office. I think the repairs are sadly needed. What do you propose to do there ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Repairing wall between main building and new wing, $550 ; iron frames, $500 ; gas pipes, $400 ; repairing roof, $600. Then there are items for painting, wood work, and travelling expenses.

Mr. CASGRAIN. The inside of the post office badly needs painting just now ; in fact the inside has been in a dilapidated condition for a long time.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The heating apparatus has been renewed, and I will see that the painting is improved.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the hon. Minister of Public Works whether he has taken into consideration the petition of the ratepayers of Berthier, asking for the building of a post office in that town ? Berthier is an important town, being one of the earliest settlements on the north shore of the St. Lawrence. With the exception of Three Rivers, it is the most important town to be found between Montreal and Quebec. The revenue from the post office is surely more considerable than that yielded by the Marysville post office, for which a vote has just been taken ; and the population of Berthier is also more considerable than that of all those small localities where post offices have been erected. The present post office at Berthier is totally inadequate to the public needs. It stands on a site that is not within easy reach of a large portion of the people of that town who have most business to transact at the post office. It is unsuitable for and inadequate to the public interests of that important town. The ratepayers of Berthier have sent a petition to the hon. Minister of Public Works asking him to take into consideration the needs of the public service in that locality. I should like to know from the Minister of Public Works whether he has taken that petition into his consideration, and also whether he has decided to put in the Supplementary Estimates a sufficient sum to build the post office asked for.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Translation.) The hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil) sent me a few days ago, a petition signed by the ratepayers of Berthier. I have looked carefully into that petition. I am not ready now to tell the hon. member whether or not there will be a vote put in the Supplementary Estimates, so as to enable me to answer the appeal made by the petitioners. The hon. member will agree with me that so far I have had very little time at my disposal to enter into that kind of questions.

I may also draw his attention to the fact that, in some towns where post offices have been built, the sites on which they were built were given to the Government by the localities concerned. If the hon. gentleman is ready to tell me now that the town of Berthier is ready to furnish the site, I may, perhaps, see my way to recommending to this House to vote the money required for that building.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL. (Translation.) If the hon. Minister were willing to allow me two or three days before bringing in his Supplementary Estimates, I might then be in a position to give him an answer.

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) I should like to inquire from the hon. Minister of Public Works whether the sum of $12,000 included in this item, under the heading : " Dominion Public Buildings—Renewal and Repairs." is appropriated for the public buildings in the city of Montreal, or whether it is simply appropriated for the repairs of the post office in that town ? The reason why I put that question is this, that, as I am about to show, the Montreal post office is altogether inadequate to the needs of the public service in that city. I see that large sums are voted to build post offices in small towns. I think that the city of Montreal, which yields such a large revenue to the Dominion of Canada is entitled to receive at the hands of the Minister of Public Works the greatest consideration. Of late, unheard of attempts have been made in order to find in the Montreal post office sufficient room for the needs of the public service. Everybody knows that that space is altogether inadequate to the needs of the hour, the more so as several rooms have been reserved for the Ministers who, when in the city of Montreal, are waited upon by a great many visitors, and quite frequently by numerous and important deputations. There are also other departments which admittedly are obstructed. The Railways and Canals Department have also to rent in the city of Montreal apartments for which they have to pay a rent of from $1,200 to $1,500 a year. All which goes to prove that the Government have not got in the city of Montreal sufficient space for the needs of the public service. Now, what I wish to ask the Minister of Public Works is this: Would it not be desirable, under the circumstances, to take into consideration, in connection with this contemplated expenditure, the urgent necessity of buying a site and building thereupon an edifice in which all the public offices and the various departments of the Dominion Government should be located? By so doing, the various offices could be brought together in one single building, instead of being scattered here and there, as is now the case. Up to date, a considerable expenditure has been incurred, $24,000. I think, for repairs. It would be important, I believe, to take into consideration the actual urgency of having a central building, and one adequate to the needs of the city of Montreal, which is the most important and the largest city in the Dominion, and where all the public departments could be located.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. (Translation.) I am fully aware of the importance of the remarks just fallen from the hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk). The hon. gentleman will also agree with me, I hope, that the question he has just raised is too important for me to forthwith pass upon it. Such a large city as the city of Montreal would very likely require a central building like the one just described by the hon. gentleman. However, I am not prepared to give an answer just now. As to the vote of $12,000, it is for the purpose of making certain repairs to the Montreal post office. I have under my hand the details of the expenditure to be incurred. If the House wishes so, I am ready to give the details. The expenditure is the same as that provided for by the late Government. The reports which we have concerning the Montreal post office are to the effect that it would be large enough, but for some encroachments which take place somewhere about the building. I think I shall see my way to increasing the available space for the needs of the public service by keeping everybody within proper bounds.

Ontario—Dominion Reformatory ..... $30,000

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). I should like to obtain some explanation from the

Mr. MONK.

Minister in regard to the work on the construction of the reformatory at Alexandria.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. When I was sworn in as Minister I found there were differences prevailing between the chief architect of the department and Mr. Borque, the contractor for the building. I secured the services of Mr. Perreault, architect, of Montreal, and visited the spot. Mr. Perreault acted as arbitrator. The contractor was found not to be exactly in the right or in the wrong; it was understood that he would go on with the work. I may state, however, that the Government are considering whether it is a wise policy to have only one Dominion reformatory, and that difference of opinion existing to-day, and the contractor having practically ceased work, we will look carefully into the question. There has not been much work done so far, only $3,000 having been paid.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). What is the amount of the contract?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The contract for the main building is $95,000.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). How much has been paid for the site?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The Government have paid $5,369 for the site.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). How much has been paid altogether, and at what dates?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The Government has paid only $3,000 for work done.

Mr. BERGERON. Is there not a balance now claimed by the contractor as due him?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I think there is a balance due to him.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). Was not $3,000 only an approximate estimate, and has not more work been done since, and material placed on the grounds?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). What is the cost of all the work now done?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I think the contractor claims to have done work to the value of $6,000 or $7,000, or in that neighbourhood.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). Has the Minister any doubt as to the work at that place being proceeded with?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Nothing more has been done. As a matter of fact the contractor seems to have tendered at a very low price. He is a good man, he has provided the Government with a guarantee and we are safe with him; but he has not done a great deal of work, and he has now practically ceased work, as the hon. gentleman knows.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). If this contractor is not going on with the work on account of the prices at which he has tendered, is it the intention of the Government to relet the contract and complete the work according to plans and specifications?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The contract is for the erection of the building. The contractor is perfectly free now to work or not to work, so long as he completes the building by a certain date, which is specified.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). Is it the intention of the Government to go on with this work or not? It is desirable, if this money is to be voted, that the committee should know the intention of the Government with respect to it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The contractor is obliged to complete the building by 2nd May, 1898. I cannot oblige him to work now. If he completes the building within the time specified, I have nothing to say.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). There are no contracts entered into with the Government on those terms, and under the specifications and terms of the contract the work has to be proceeded with to the satisfaction of the department. It is no use for the Minister to say that he cannot press the contractor, for he can do so. Is it the intention of the Government to proceed with the work, and to bring it to a completion as rapidly as possible?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman is asking me a question that is not altogether a fair one. I found on entering the department a contract which was entered into on 17th March. The contractor has received a certain sum of money, and is now going on with the work. If he completes the work in the time specified, that is all that is required, and I cannot tell him to do this or that now.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). Certainly you can.

Mr. BERGERON. I understood the hon. gentleman to say a moment ago that the Government were considering whether they would not build reformatories in the different provinces, or at all events construct more than one. That would explain, it seems to me, why the work is not going on more rapidly. The contractor has been told probably something of that sort, and he is not proceeding with it. There are two reasons for it. First, because there is naturally no money in the department now, and secondly, that if he has to drop that contract he would rather lose less money by it and stop now.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. When I came to the department the contractor had stopped work because there was a difficulty between him and our architect. Since then he has not resumed work in a very active way. That being the state of affairs, and speaking for myself alone, being of the opinion that perhaps it is not wise to have only one single reformatory. I did not tell him to go on for I could not do so, nor did I tell him to work because I could not do so. He has plenty of time in which to complete his work. While he is not working I am thinking a little.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). Did not the Minister discharge the clerk of the works there? I would like him to explain why he did so. Did he not tell him, though the work was under progress, that his services were not required because they intended not to do any more work for some considerable time. Was not such a notice sent to the clerk of the works? I want to know if it is the intention of the Government to go on with this work at Alexandria, or whether they intend to have one or two reformatories? That surely is a very reasonable request to ask. This House wants to know how the money is going to be expended, when and where. I have asked the Minister repeatedly, if it is his intention to proceed with this work, and surely if the present contractor fails to carry it out the Minister certainly has the power of cancelling his contract and letting it to another. If the contractor does not make sufficient progress to complete the work within a certain time, it lies with the Minister to cancel his contract, and such power is taken in every case. There is no use in the Minister saying that he cannot press Mr. Bourque, the contractor, on with the work. I understand he has moved everything away from the work. Am I to understand that he has no intention of going on with it? Is the Minister aware of this?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I may state again that when I was sworn in as a Minister I found that the contractor had quitted work. He has not resumed work very actively since, and I did not press him because after having read the contract carefully I found that I had no right to press him. I dispensed with the services of the clerk of works for the excellent reason that the work being suspended there was no use paying him. I did in his case what I did in the case of many others.

Mr. SPROULE. The question which the hon. member from Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) asked, is a very reasonable one. It is, has the Minister changed his mind with regard to whether it was better to have one reformatory for the whole Dominion, or a different reformatory for each province. If the decision of the Government is to have a reformatory in each province I respectfully submit that Alexandria is not a suitable site for the province of Ontario, because it is at one end of the province. It is an important matter for us to know as early as possible if there has been a change of policy in that respect, so that no more money should be squandered there. I have never agreed in the opinion that the selection of this particular site was a good one, because it seemed to me that it ought to be located in one of our cities and on some great through line of railway. This reformatory appears to be located in an out-of-the-way place, and in a comparatively small town. If the Government decide now to change their policy, they should inform the House at once, so that there will be no more money squandered there.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). In answer to the last speaker (Mr. Sproule) I wish to say that when Sir John Thompson decided to build the reformatory in that place he did so for the reason that it was the most central locality in the whole Dominion. If you take the population of the Dominion from east to west you will find that Alexandria is as near the center of population as it is possible to get it. We are on a most important railway, the Canada Atlantic; the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway stations are only a comparatively short distance away. We are away from water which makes it more difficult for convicts to escape. We have got good quarries, and plenty of timber, and all kinds of material suitable for building purposes. In addition to that, Alexandria is almost on the border line between the two important provinces of Quebec and Ontario. We are near Montreal where any amount of supplies can be obtained if necessary, and we are within a short distance of Ottawa which can be communicated with by mail, telephone, or telegraph. Alexandria is a more convenient place for such an institution than any section of the country from which my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) comes.

The question that I want to ask the Minister is, and I want to have it answered; I want to know, Sir, if you intend to go on with that reformatory or not?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am very sorry that I have not been able to make myself understood by my hon. friend. I thought I was very clear indeed, but I will try to be clearer still. Here I find a contract over which I have no more control. If the contractor goes on with his work I will pay him. If he does not proceed I cannot force him to do so, and I do not intend to force him now, because he has two years yet in which to complete this work and that seems to me a very long time.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). I am not asking you about Mr. Bourque. Suppose that Mr. Bourque dies and disappears from this world altogether, I want to know from you, will you go on with the work there or will you drop it?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Well, if he dies, I will pray for his soul.

Mr. SPROULE.

first, and after that I will deal with the matter to the best of my ability. I will read the contract again, and see what I can do.

Mr. WALLACE. The question which the hon. member for Glengarry asked the Minister was, whether it was the policy or the intention of the Government to go on with the construction of that reformatory at that place. He has not received an answer to that question, and I think the House is entitled to an answer before the money is voted.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It seems to me that I have answered the hon. gentleman plainly. Mr. Bourque is an able man and a man of means, and I cannot suspect that he will fail in any way. He has several other contracts, and he is going on with his work, though not very rapidly. As I have said, I cannot compel him to go on any faster. I do not know what other information I can give. I do not know that I am obliged to say to-day what I would do if Mr. Bourque died.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). I am sorry to see that the Minister is trifling with this House. We want some civility. When we ask a fair question, we must expect a fair answer. I must say that the Conservative Government treated the Opposition in a more candid and respectful manner than this Government are treating this side of the House. I have no wish to delay the business of the session, but I have asked a straight and reasonable question: Is it the policy of the Government to go on with that reformatory at that place, or is it their policy to drop it? I want a straight answer to that question, without any equivocation. We all know Mr. Bourque; I have nothing against him; but the hon. Minister said, some time ago, that he had quit the work, and now he says he is not going on very fast. That answer will not do. I want a straight answer, and I insist upon having it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not think I have been in any way unfair to my hon. friend; I do not mean to be in any way unfair to him; but he cannot expect me to say any more than I have said. If Mr. Bourque goes on with his contract, and comes to me with a certificate of work done, I will pay him; but I cannot oblige him to go on. The time specified for the completion of the work is two years hence. As long as he goes on with the work, this Government is bound to pay him; there is no doubt about that. We have no intention to ask him to quit the work.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). Suppose he does not go on?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If he comes to us with a proposal to quit his work, the question will then arise whether we will go on with this work or build another house of the same kind elsewhere. But, so far, nothing has been done more than this. I found that Mr. Bourque, owing to a difference of opinion about the stone that was to be put in the foundation, had stopped work. He has not resumed the work in a very active manner, but he has resumed it to a certain extent. If he wishes to go on, we are obliged to pay him. If he offers us to quit the work, we will then consider the whole question.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood the hon. Minister to say that this contract was let at a very low price. Will he be kind enough to tell us what the amount is, and also the departmental estimate of what the work would cost.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I think he has undertaken the work for $95,000. I think the estimate of the department is a good deal higher than that. But Mr. Bourque has intimated to me that he is perfectly able to complete his work, and, as I have said, he is a contractor of large means.

Mr. SPROULE. Then, if he is able to do it, and has means, I assume that the Government have taken proper security to indemnify them against loss. I understand that the Government have a right at any time to send their engineer and ascertain if satisfactory progress is being made with the work, so as to insure its completion within the specified time; and, if satisfactory progress is not being made, they have the right to demand that he shall proceed with the work more rapidly, or they can cancel the contract. It is quite clear that satisfactory progress is not being made with this work; and yet, so far as we can learn, the Minister has not given instructions to his engineer to have the work prosecuted more rapidly; nor has he given any reason for this not being done. Therefore, I think the hon. Minister will see the necessity of either insisting on that work being done more rapidly or knowing the reason why: because it must be apparent to him that it will be utterly impossible for the contractor to finish the work within the specified time if he does not go on more rapidly than he is doing at present. I understood the Minister to say that he has resumed the work, but in a limited way, and that all the money that is due him up to the present time has been paid.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No; there is a certain amount due to him. He claims $6,000 or $7,000, if I remember rightly, and he has been paid $3,000; so that, if his claim is right, we owe him $3,000 or $4,000 for stone and other materials brought there. My information is to the effect that the contractor has plenty of time to complete the work within the time specified in the contract. Of course, if, during the spring season, Mr. Bourque does not proceed with the work, and we have not come to some agreement, I shall certainly urge him on.

Mr. SPROULE. That brings up another question of uncertainty. I understand that an agreement has been come to, what other agreement, then, did the hon. gentleman refer to?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The question has been raised whether a single Dominion reformatory was sufficient or not. When I was sworn in as Minister of Public Works, several representations were made to me, and in view of those representations I did not press the contractors to go on with the work. The contractor, having stopped the work, representations were made to me that perhaps it would be the wiser policy to have two or three schools of the same kind. The contractor is perfectly free to go on with the work if he wants to, for the agreement is there. But he has chosen to stop the work.

Mr. SPROULE. There are two entirely different elements in this matter. One is the policy of the Government with regard to the advisability of building one or several reformatories. That the Government have not yet decided. The other is the contract between the Government and the contractor. We would naturally expect a Minister of Public Works to show a desire to have the contract completed. If he does not want it completed, he should say so. The trouble appears to be rather with the department than the contractor.

Mr. CASGRAIN. No doubt the real reason why the hon. gentleman cannot tell us whether it is the intention of the Government to go on with this reformatory on that site is that the Department of Public Works is simply building this reformatory for the Department of Justice. The latter department has to do with the settling of the site and the deciding whether one reformatory or several should be built. This may be the reason why the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) is slightly embarrassed this evening in answering the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan). Perhaps the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) will give us an insight into the policy of the Government on this question.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). The Government take the common-sense standpoint. Here is a contract which allows the contractor a certain period of time to complete the building, and he has given security to perform his part of the agreement. Is it reasonable to suppose that the Government are going to cancel that contract at present?

Mr. CASGRAIN. My hon. friend the Solicitor General should answer the question put by the Opposition. Here is a contract which the Minister of Public Works finds at a standstill. He was sworn in two months ago as Minister, as he has frequently told us, and the work is stopped, and when he is asked why he does not urge the contractor to go on, he says : Well, I have allowed the contractor to stop work and discharged the clerk of the works. This looks as if the work was not going to be pushed at all, and as if the policy of the Government were to abandon the site. I put to the hon. gentleman this very fair question : Is there any intention on the part of the Government to abandon this site ? That question calls for a plain and precise answer.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The Government cannot have any other policy than to fulfil its obligations. The contract is there. If the contractor were proceeding with his work and were to come to me with an estimate, I would pay him, but he has plenty of time under the contract to complete the work, and we cannot oblige him to go on, and since he has stopped the work, I discharged the clerk. Now, if the contractor does not give up his work, if he does not come to us and ask us to abandon the contract, I shall certainly tell him to go on. We have security and are perfectly safe.

Mr. GILLIES. Why does he not go on ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I asked him why, and he replied : I have plenty of time. I told him that he must finish within the time fixed by the agreement, and nothing more took place.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). Is this not the best season of the year to do the work ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am not the best judge of that. The contractor is an able man and he told me he had plenty of time.

Mr. CASGRAIN. The question now is not what are the relations between the department and the contractor, or whether or not the Government can make this man go on with the work. But the question is whether the hon. gentleman has decided or not or whether the Department of Justice has decided or not, to keep to the site already chosen or choose another site, or is the whole matter under the consideration of the Government. The contractor, for one reason or another, fails to carry out the contract. Is it the intention of the Government to build that reformatory on that site or to build several reformatories, or is it the intention of the Government to build the reformatory on some other site ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The matter referred to by my hon. friend (Mr. Casgrain) has not been decided at all. Nothing has been decided.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman said in view of certain facts the Government had not pushed the contractor. What were they ? That the security was good, that the contractor had sufficient time to complete the work, and that the contract price was reasonable. But in giving reasons before, one additional fact was stated and that was that certain parties had stated that it was unwise to build only one reformatory, in other words, that it was wise to build more than one of them. Now, the honourable gentlemen are not availing themselves of the right the department possesses of seeing that the work is pushed on as rapidly as it ought to be. I asked another question to which I would like to get an answer, but which the hon. Minister omitted to refer to. I asked what was the estimated cost of this work ? The hon. Minister said the contract was $95,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not know that it would be in the public interest to give the department's estimate of the cost. Suppose we were obliged to ask for new tenders, it would not be in the public interest that that estimate should be made known. In any case that question does not arise now. The contract is let, the contractor has given good security, and, whatever may have been the estimated cost, it cannot change matters.

Mr. SPROULE. I think we are quite within our right in asking the estimated cost, because it is only by comparison with that that we can tell whether the contract is a reasonable one or not, and whether the money is spent wisely or unwisely. Since the contract has been let and the contractor is a competent person with financial standing to complete the work, and as we are asked to vote this amount, I think we have a right to know this estimate.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I think the hon. gentleman, on reflection, will see the force of the objection raised by the hon. Minister of Public Works. The contract price is a reasonable one—that has been stated. Suppose new tenders had to be called for, I do not think it would be expedient that every person tendering should have the Government estimate, because we may be quite sure that all the tenders would come pretty well up with the Government's estimate. If the hon. gentleman will think for a moment he will see that the reason is a sound one. There is no desire whatever to withhold information. On the main question the explanation is clear, I think. The Government do not intend to repudiate the contract; the work under it can go on at any time and the money will be paid. But should the contractor throw up his contract, the Government will then be open to reconsider the whole matter.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not think we have a right to suppose that the contractor is going to throw up his contract. It was entered upon in the regular way and the contractor is a man of good financial standing. We are bound to assume that he will fulfil his contract.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Let him go ahead, then.

Mr. SPROULE. Will hon. gentlemen please restrain their impatience. If they have nothing to do but interrupt it would be better that they should leave the Chamber. I contend that we have a right to this information. We are bound to assume that the contractor will finish the work. If they do not wish him to complete the work it would indicate that there are difficulties between him and the department or in the department itself.

Mr. WALLACE. I would like to refer to the extraordinary statement made by the hon. Finance Minister that if the contractor fails to fulfil his contract the whole question will be open to the Government as to what course they shall pursue with regard to the work. As I understand, the late Government came before the House with a policy for establishing a reformatory, naming the place where it was to be built and explaining the objects of the institution. Now, as a result of the contingency that the contractor has not fulfilled the terms of his contract, the Government, according to the hon. Minister of Finance, is to adopt a different policy with regard to the establishment of these reformatories. I think that is a most extraordinary proposition to make. If the Government are going to reconsider their policy they should reconsider it without regard as to whether the contractor is ready to finish his contract or not. Now is the time to submit a policy to the House and get the approval of the House for it. There is another point to which I wish to refer—the bringing in of an architect to settle a dispute between the contractor and the Government architect, Mr. Fuller. I think it is an unusual thing, to commence with, that the chief architect of the Government is to be subjected to the supervision of some outside and irresponsible architect. And yet I understand the Minister of Public Works to say that that was what was done. I think that is not a proper course to take in reference to an architect in whom the Government have confidence, and if they have not confidence in him they should dispense with his services.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The contractor complained bitterly of being treated in an unfair manner and asked for another architect who would go and examine the work. I submitted his complaint to Mr. Ewart, and Mr. Ewart agreed that it would be better to have another architect. Mr. Perreault examined the work, and he agreed with Mr. Ewart.

Mr. WALLACE. But suppose they had not agreed.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I cannot say what I should have done in that case.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Did Mr. Ewart agree to this?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The contractor and Mr. Ewart agreed that it would be well to have another architect to settle the matter.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It does not seem to me that the Minister of Public Works has made his case and his policy as plain to the committee as to the Finance Minister; and I do not think he has satisfied his colleague. In the first place, if I did not misunderstand the hon. gentleman, he stated that when he was sworn in he found that the contractor was not pushing the work vigorously, and that representations were made to him whether it was a wise policy to have the reformatory there or not, and, in consequence of these things he decided not to push the contractor? Am I not correct in that?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I said that we have no right to oblige Mr. Bourque to go on any quicker than he was going, because he had plenty of time to finish his work.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am afraid my hon. friend is evading the question. I asked whether he did not state to the committee that when he took charge of the Department of Public Works he found that Mr. Bourque was not pushing the work, and that as representations were being made as to the wisdom or unwisdom of using that site, and that consequently he did not push the contract. Now, I am within the judgment of the committee in saying that that statement was made by the Minister of Public Works. His next statement was: I will push him if he does not go on with his work. His next statement was that it was not decided by the Government whether they would go on with the reformatory there or not. The next statement was made by the Finance Minister that if he fails, then the whole question may be an open one for the Government to decide. Now, if these four answers satisfy the easily satisfied judgment of the Finance Minister as to the clearness with which the Minister of Public Works has defined his policy, I am bound to venture the suggestion that they do not satisfy the committee generally. Now, the Minister of Public Works says that on account of representation, he was loth to push the contractor; I think I am right in saying that the word "representations" was used. Now, I think the hon. gentleman should not hesitate to tell us who made those representations. Were they made by the Department of Justice and, if so, what were the representations and in what line did they operate upon the mind of the Minister when he said that the question might be an open one?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. What I said was this, that it was a very important question whether one reformatory was better than two or three; and I said that representations had been made, not since I have been a Minister only, but before, because my hon. friend knows that that question has been discussed over and over again. In view of all these facts, I said that finding the contractor was not very quick. I did not order him to go on, because he had plenty of time to complete his work.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not think the hon. gentleman is treating us candidly. I asked him the simple question, Were representations made to him as to the wisdom or unwisdom of this site; and if those representations were made to him, were they made by the Department of Justice, if not by whom?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There were representations made to me by members of the House, by colleagues of mine. We discussed the matter; and I had read the papers on that question.

Mr. MONTAGUE. As the Minister of Finance knows very well, the Department of Justice is the one whose Minister reports upon a question of this kind to Council, as to the policy. Now, has the hon. gentleman had instructions or representations from the Department of Justice as to the wisdom or unwisdom in connection with this matter?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, I have not.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then who were the representations from?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have just stated that the question had been discussed between my colleagues and myself, and between members and myself. It has been discussed in a general way, but not in such a way as to interfere with Mr. Bourque. Mr. Bourque is perfectly free to go on to-morrow if he likes, and I will pay him. The question has been discussed in an informal manner.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the hon. gentleman then say which policy is to be accepted by the department? We have had a policy specifically announced by the Minister of Finance, and we have had a policy specifically announced by the Minister of Public Works. The policy announced by the Minister of Finance is that if Mr. Bourque fails to go on with his work, then the whole question will be open for discussion; the policy announced by the Minister of Public Works is that if Mr. Bourque does not go on with his work, he will make him. Now, which policy are we to accept?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The policy of the Government will be to comply with the terms of the contract, we are bound by this contract, and Mr. Bourque is bound also. But for the time being we have no other policy to follow than to abide by our agreement.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries shakes his head. I think he is no more satisfied than the members of the committee. He knows there is an absolute contradiction between the policy laid down by the Minister of Finance, and that of the Minister of Public Works.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There is no reason which would induce me to believe that Mr. Bourque will not go on with his contract. He is competent to do so, and we have securities.

Mr. WALLACE. What is the date of the completion of the contract?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. 2nd May, 1898.

Mr. QUINN. I would ask the Minister if it is for this reformatory at Alexandria that the $30,000 are required? I would like to ask, also, how much work has been done within the last six months, and what amount of the appropriation of last year remains unexpended at this moment? We will by that means find out if it is necessary to vote this sum now.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have only paid $3,000 out of the appropriation of $20,000 of last year.

Mr. QUINN. There was a revote of $13,800, that would make $33,800 for last year, of which only $3,000 has been expended. Yet $30,000 are asked for now, which will make $60,000 to expend on that work this year.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. You cannot expend what has lapsed.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have spent $3,000 out of $33,000.

Mr. QUINN. Why should $30,000 be asked for now if no work has been done within the last six months?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The balance of last year lapsed, and we are asking now that the amount necessary to pay for the work which will be done.

Mr. QUINN. But how much has been done within the last six months?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The work was only begun in May last, and therefore there cannot be much work done yet.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly this is one of the oddest episodes I have ever seen in the House, and I have been in it for some time. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works is in a quandary, and I think I can find an easy solution for him out of it. I would suggest to him that he can get out of it in one of two ways—either say that it is the intention of the Government, if this man goes on with his contract, to abide by the policy which has been laid down to have one Dominion reformatory for the whole country—

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I said that.

Mr. FOSTER. The other way is to state—and the two must be stated together, in order to make it clear—that, if by any means the contractor does not go on with this work, then it is the intention of the Government to consider the whole matter, and to adopt the policy of building several reformatories, instead of one. If the hon. gentleman will state that, he will give the committee a definite opinion as to what the Government propose; otherwise, and as it is now, I do not see how the committee can possibly vote this money. There are several ways by which a contractor may be induced not to go on with his work. A contractor may not go on from certain circumstances arising out of his own position. He may refuse to go on, and, if he refuses, the contract lapses. But there are a dozen other ways by which a contractor may not go on. He may understand quite well what is the position the Government would like him to take with respect to the contract, and he may conform to the wishes of the Government. What the Government evidently has not done is this: it has not considered its policy, and it has not decided on its policy with respect to Dominion reformatories; and yet hon. gentlemen opposite want the committee to vote a sum of money under the guise of building a Dominion reformatory, when it is open to the Government, by indirect methods, not to allow this work to proceed. I think the Government should state their policy. For two or three years the matter had been discussed under the late Government. Representations were made from different quarters as to the necessity of having a Dominion reformatory. After it had received consideration from the Department of Justice—for it has primarily to decide the policy—the Government came down to the House and asked that the policy should be carried out. That was done by the Department of Justice, and, after it was decided that we should have one Dominion reformatory and that Alexandria would be a good site, the Government came down to the House and obtained a grant of money to carry out that policy, and consequently Parliament is committed to that policy. Under it a contract has been given out, and certain work has been done. The Government ought to say right here and now whether they are in favour of having one Dominion reformatory and having it built at Alexandria, or whether they are not in favour of that policy; and to supplement that statement by saying that, if, by any possibility, this contractor does not do the work, they will take advantage of the fact in order to carry out their own policy and go against the other policy. Then they would be standing on the ground of the contract, and, if the contractor carried out his part, the Government would have to carry out theirs. But the Government has steadily avoided, through the Minister of Public Works, making any statement of policy. The hon. gentleman said that some representations have been made to him. What right has the hon. gentleman to make the work proceed slowly or rapidly, when it is a work involving a policy which did not originate in his department, but in the Department of Justice; and, if representations are to be made, they are to be made by the Minister of Justice, and the mechanic of the Government for the time being, the Minister of Public Works, is to push on the acknowledged policy of the Government, and which has received the endorsement of Parliament, and push it on as rapidly as possible. But the hon. gentleman is evidently hedging behind this question of contract, in order to hide the utter lack of agreement as to policy on the part of the Government.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). It seems to me that the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) has taken a very unfair position before this committee. What are the facts with which we are called upon to deal? They are that a condition of things was created by the late Government which entailed responsibility upon the present one. They entered into a contract with an individual, and in consequence of the principle of continuity of government, we are bound to execute that contract, entered into with that individual. If we do not, the Government is liable for damages. Under these circumstances, the member for York says that the Government are bound to state their policy with respect to reformatories generally. We are not called upon to deal with that general question now. We have before us simply the matter of this contract and the execution of it. If, by means of any accident, the Government were relieved of the obligation that has been imposed on them by the late Government, they will then decide the question of policy; but why should the Government now be called upon to announce their decision on a question of policy, and make themselves liable to an action for damages for the non-fulfilment of the contract?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman is not obliged to make himself or the Government liable for a breach of contract with the present contractor. All we ask the hon. gentleman and his Government to do is to state plainly to this House that, if they are obliged by this contract to build a reformatory at Alexandria, they will go on and build it; if they are not obliged to do so, they will not go on and build it.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We have a contract between the Government of Canada and an individual. The fact of the contract having been entered into gives an assurance that it is to be executed honestly by the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman go one step further, and say that, if the contract can be carried out, a reformatory will be built there; but, if by any means the contract falls to the ground, then will the Government state what they are going to do with the money?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We will state that when the eventuality occurs.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The money will not be in the hands of the Government for any other purpose than that for which it is voted.

Mr. FOSTER. The vote says "Dominion Reformatory," and if, by any possibility, the contract goes to the wall, and the Government wished to erect a reformatory at another place, they would have a perfect right to construct a reformatory at Ottawa, Toronto, Owen Sound, or any other place in the Dominion. The Government would not ask the House to vote that money. If the Government are willing to add after "Dominion Reformatory," "at Alexandria," then, I think, their explanation might be allowed to go, because then they could not build it anywhere else.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The last criticism made by the hon. member is not an unreasonable one. He says that under the terms of the vote, the Government could abandon the construction of a reformatory at Alexandria and build one somewhere else. I can give the hon. gentleman an unqualified assurance that that will not be done. If the construction of a reformatory at Alexandria for any reason does not go on—and I do not anticipate any reason—and the Government resolves to build a reformatory elsewhere, they will come down to the House and ask for an appropriation.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, will the hon. gentleman insert the words "at Alexandria"? If the hon. gentleman is sincere—which I do not doubt in the least—he can have no objection to these words being inserted.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not see that the insertion of those words would make any difference; but, when the hon. gentleman wanted to build a reformatory at Alexandria, he did not insert those words in the vote. His Estimates did not state that the reformatory should be at Alexandria, and it was simply a matter or reasonable inference from the policy of the Government that it would be built there. If the House could accept it as a reasonable inference of the policy of the late Government, it will, I trust, be no less generous with us.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. FOSTER. There is this difference, that it was the settled policy of the late Government, about which there was no doubt, that it should be built at Alexandria. But both the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Finance have thrown doubts on the policy of the present Government.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. You have the positive assurance of the Finance Minister. What more do you want?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). He has got the assurance of the Finance Minister that if it is not built at Alexandria the money will not be spent. That is as straight and clear as anything could be, and it would be contrary to all the traditions of the House not to accept it.

Mr. McNEILL. The Minister of Public Works has told us that the contractor is quite able to finish this building, and that he is a thoroughly responsible man. If the contractor desires not to finish the work, is it the intention of the Minister to use all possible effort to make him finish it?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have no other policy, as far as I am concerned, than to pay the contractor when he comes to me with the estimates.

Mr. McNEILL. That is not at all an answer to the question I asked a minute ago. I wish to know if it is his policy to endeavour to have the work carried out.

Mr. MONTAGUE. He said so.

Mr. McNEILL. Oh, no. If he has said so, I have no doubt that he will repeat it to gratify me.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Certainly, I can have no other policy than to execute my part of the contract. The contractor is bound and I am bound, and I cannot do anything else but execute my part of the bargain.

Mr. McNEILL. I am quite sure the Minister will carry out his part of the bargain, but suppose the contractor does not want to carry out his part, will the Minister force him to do it?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I cannot assume that Mr. Bourque will not carry out his part of the bargain.

Mr. McNEILL. In every contract there is always a possibility that there may be a failure on one side. I wish to know plainly from my hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) whether it is his intention to compel the contractor, so far as he is able, to carry out his part of the contract?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. In this case the contractor has expressed a desire to go on, and I have expressed my willingness to pay him. He has come to my office on several occasions and he has said that he was prepared to finish the work by the time specified.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not wish to press the Minister further. I see plainly that he will not answer the question.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). The Minister says that it is his intention to pay the contractor if he goes on with the work. The site has cost $5,000, and he says the contractor's claim is $7,000, and then the amount in the Estimates here, including the revote, would come to about $40,000. If the contractor goes on with the work and he pays him, there will be something like $60,000 expended. When this question came before the House, Sir John Thompson explained that the building was to be at Alexandria, in the county of Glengarry. There was no doubt at that time as to the location of the building. If the Minister now is willing to pay the contractor if he goes on with the work, and is willing to expend about $60,000, I hope he will have no objection to put the words "at Alexandria" in the vote.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have no desire to amend the Estimates which were prepared by my hon. friends on the other side of the House.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would like to inquire from the Minister of Public Works if in this item for $15,000, any sum is intended for renewing or repairing the drill shed at Gananoque. This is a very urgent case. Some years ago the town of Gananoque presented the Government with a site for a drill shed. A few years ago the Catholic church at Gananoque purchased the lot adjacent to that, on which they erected a very fine building. They made representations to the council asking that they might petition the Government to have the drill shed removed, owing to the fact that a large quantity of powder was stowed within a few feet of their church. The council asked the Government to remove the drill shed and offered to pay $1,000 for the site on which the drill shed then stood. The Government accepted the proposition, gave the town a deed of the site, and promised to remove the drill shed within a reasonable time, the town paying the $1,000 to the Receiver General. The town then deeded the lot to the school board for the purpose of erecting a high school. The school was erected partly on the site on which the drill shed stood, and in order to make room for the building one or two bents of the drill shed had to be taken down. That was done by the school board, and the lumber and material was piled up. Now, Sir, that reasonable time has more than expired in which the Government was to remove the balance of the drill shed.

We have in that town an artillery corps as well as a rifle corps, and things are in a very confused condition, they not having room in the portion of the drill shed which remains standing. The portion of the building which now stands is up against the high school on the front and up against the Roman Catholic church at the side. It was the intention that the remaining portion of the drill shed should be removed during the summer, but now it is coming near the fall, and I hope the Government will take immediate steps to oblige the military authorities and the authorities of the Roman Catholic church, by removing the balance of the drill shed at an early date. If provision is not made under this item, I hope ample provision will be made in the Supplementary Estimates and that immediate action will be taken.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Louder.

Mr. TAYLOR. If my hon. friends opposite will hold their souls in peace a few minutes longer we will get through the Estimates quicker. It appears to me that since hon. gentlemen have passed over to that side of the House they have got swelled heads. I would suggest that they go down stairs and soak them a while. When I bring up this question, in which the militia authorities, the Roman Catholic church and the town council of Brockville are so deeply interested, I think the reasonable demand I make ought to be complied with.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. In answer to my hon. friend, I may say that the subject of the repairs to the drill shed belongs to the Minister of Militia and Defence. I have nothing to do with that.

Mr. TAYLOR. This has to be re-built. I see the Minister of Militia in his place, and if the Minister of Public Works cannot give me the information, I would like to inquire of the Minister of Militia.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I have had the matter to which the hon. gentleman refers brought to my notice, but I have not had an opportunity yet of investigating it fully. I believe the statement he has made is substantially correct, and I can only say the Department of Militia and the Government will feel themselves bound to carry out any arrangement made by their predecessors. I promise the hon. gentleman that I will take the matter up and go through it carefully, and do whatever is necessary and right in the premises.

Manitoba—

Portage la Prairie post office..... $20,000

Mr. BOYD. Before that item is carried, I want to know if this vote of $20,000 for the Portage la Prairie post office is going to finish the building, and how much has already been expended on that building?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I may say that some difficulty has arisen about the choice of the site. Representations have been made to me that the site chosen was not the proper one, and I received to-day a telegram from Portage la Prairie, which reads as follows:—

Portage La Prairie, September 15th.

The Hon. Minister Public Works, Ottawa.

The following is a copy of a resolution passed by the council of the town of Portage La Prairie at its last meeting: That the site selected by the Dominion Government for its post office here is not a central one, either as regards population or business, and its unfairness has given rise to a great deal of well-grounded discontent among our citizens; that its removal to the corner of Campbell Street and Saskatchewan Avenue, which is a fair and central location, will give general satisfaction to our town's people; and that a copy of this resolution be wired by our secretary-treasurer to the Hon. J. Israei Tarte, Minister of Public Works.

(Signed) F. A. WHITTAKER,
Secretary-Treasurer.

Representations had been made to me before, and I state frankly to the House what I answered verbally to those representations. I stated that if a site were offered and the city council adopted a resolution in favour of a change of site, I would then be prepared to ask Parliament to vote $5,000 to remove the building from the unsuitable place where it is to-day to the more suitable site that would be offered. The amount spent so far has been $15,223. The contractors, Viau & Lachance, have written to the department offering to take the building from the site where it is now and to put it up in the same condition that it is to-day on another site, for $5,000. The moment the citizens, represented by the town authorities, represent to the Government that the first site is not suitable, we have no other course to follow than to change it. As a matter of fact, the Government agent has never consented to the site which has been chosen, and the records in the department show that it was to a certain extent a political site. Under these circumstances I thought it was in the public interest that, if a free site were offered to us, and the town authorities adopted a resolution in favour of a change, we should consent to it.

Mr. BOYD. There has for years past been a feeling in Portage la Prairie with regard to the location of public buildings owing to the geographical position of the town. On the south side of the town there is a slough running in from the Assiniboine River, and on the north side the Canadian Pacific Railway runs parallel to the town, leaving the town proper about half a mile in width; and for the past fifteen years or more there has been a strong feeling with regard to the location of public structures in that town. Like most of the towns in that western country, Portage la Prairie has been built in a westerly direction. Now, Sir, the local government have erected all their public buildings—the Lands Titles office, the court-house and jail, the home for incurables—at the extreme easterly end of the town. If the precedent the Minister of Public Works proposes is a good one, that is that he should entertain the removal of the post office building on account of the action of the Portage la Prairie town council, I hold in my hand resolutions passed by the town council of Portage la Prairie, and by the county council of Lakeside adjoining the town, wherein they agree to buy the site and bear the expenses of erecting the Lands Titles office, as it is known, in a more central locality. I also have a letter signed by the then mayor of Portage la Prairie to the Hon. Thomas Greenway, to which Mr. Greenway replied that the matter was in the hands of the city's representative (Mr. Martin), and that he had nothing to do with it. And as I stated in the House last session, Mr. Martin's answer to those gentlemen was that they might go to the father of lies, that he would put the building where he pleased, and he did it. It seems to me preposterous to suppose that a building on which $15,000 has been expended, which is only 150 feet away from where the post office has been for the past fifteen years, should be taken down and removed only three blocks east of where it is, and a building that is only one block west of the centre line of the town and one block east of the central school-house, and east of the centre line between the two ward schools. I have explained the locality and the feeling of the town, and I think the Government is greatly to blame in not having proceeded with the work on the site that has been purchased. As regards the new site, the Minister and the department know that the foundation is not suitable. They know that water is reached at from two feet to three feet, and that the present building cannot be moved and placed on the new site for $5,000. It would cost nearly the whole of that to excavate and put in the foundation. I cannot conceive anything more preposterous than the proposition to remove a building, on which $15,000 has been expended, only three blocks, and only two blocks east of the present population which is continually growing west as is the case with all our western towns. The whole thing is a political job.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I know something about this matter, and I would like to point out that if the building is completed in its present location, it is entirely too far west and will be a source of great inconvenience for all time to come. The hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Boyd) has told this House that it will cost an additional sum of $15,000 to remove that post office, but the hon. Minister of Public Works has informed us that the contractor has agreed to remove the building, as at present constructed, for a total sum of $5,000. Now, an additional cost of $5,000 is not a very large item compared with the great convenience which the removal of the building will give the people of that town. As a resident of Winnipeg, I am sure that I but faintly express the sentiments of the business people of that city when I say that we have suffered for a great many years from the inconvenience of having our custom-house located at the south end of the town, far removed from the business portion, and although representations have been made, year after year, by the business people of Winnipeg, we have been unable to have our custom-house removed to the centre of the city. It is because I do not wish to see the people of Portage la Prairie suffer in the same way that I rise to say that it would be in the interest of that town that this change should be made. It is only going to cost $5,000 and if people are willing to contribute the new site, this House will be justified in voting that amount.

Mr. BOYD. That is merely the opinion of the hon. member for Lisgar which we have heard. He has not given any facts.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have given the facts stated by the hon. Minister of Public Works.

Mr. BOYD. The hon. gentleman merely stated that in the interests of the town this building should be removed. Well, I do not think, in the interests of the town, that it should, because it is only one block now west of the centre of population in a town that is growing west. And it is only 150 feet from the place that the post office has been for the past fifteen years. In this town, the very same thing was done by the Liberal party in putting up public buildings at the extreme east, where parties interested had property contiguous to it.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I happen to know something about this. There are two facts which confront us, and are much stronger than any expression of opinion. The first is that the Government officials refused to sanction the site.

Mr. BOYD. Why does the hon. gentleman make that assertion?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Because the hon. Minister has said so and the papers show it. The second reason is that the people of that city, through their representative, have asked that the change should be made. That one fact is worth the opinion of any number of men. The hon. gentleman's statement that all towns grow west is news to me. Towns may grow north, south and east as well as west. I see no reason why they should grow west. These facts would convince me even if I had not known something about it before, that this change should be made. We ought always to consult the authorities of the town in these matters. I know of cases where public offices were built in the wrong place, simply because some pet of the Government party had a piece of land to sell. The fact that the town council have asked for the removal and are willing to contribute their share, shows the building is now in the wrong place.

Mr. FOSTER. I think it is rather a grave proceeding that the hon. Minister is undertaking, considering it as a precedent. It will be a pretty difficult thing for an incoming Administration to review everything that has been done by its predecessors and set everything right according to its ideas, especially if it goes so far as removing buildings standing upon sites that some people may afterwards think to be wrong sites. The expense would be very large, and I would just put to my hon. friend whether he can undertake a business of that kind. Here was a Government in power and a member representing a constituency in which a building was to be constructed. The amount was voted by the House and the site was selected by the Government. The hon. gentleman says that the agent of the department did not approve of it. But the Public Works Department which is superior to any of its agents, actually settled upon the site and the contract has been given and $15,000 has been expended in the construction of the building on that site. Now my hon. friend proposes to review the work of an Administration a year or two years past and to ask the House to give him the sum of money to take down the old work and put up a new one. I think my hon. friend is entering upon an undertaking which he will find a pretty difficult one, and I think he will have to give pretty good reasons before the House will give him $5,000 to be spent in this manner under such circumstances. My hon. friend has stated that he will bring the papers down. I think it would be well to let this item stand until those papers are before the House.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That means bringing the whole question up again.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly. I, for one, am not in a position to vote, and I do not propose to vote until we see these papers. I want also to see a map of the town site. It is very well for an hon. gentleman from Winnipeg to say that this site ought to be changed, but we must remember that the representative of the county says it should not be changed. And we sit here and are asked to vote for an additional expense without understanding the case. Under the circumstances and with the statement from the Minister himself that there are papers that have not been brought down, I think it would be much better to let the item stand until we see the papers.

Mr. WALLACE. I happened to be in Portage la Prairie the day that the telegram came from Ottawa that the site to which reference has been made had been chosen by the department. I think I met only two people who were dissatisfied with the decision. The choice of site seemed to meet with the general approval of the citizens so far as I could gauge public opinion. I had the opportunity of looking at the site and it seemed to me that it was close to the centre of population. There were other reasons which the people pointed out to me which made me think that it was the most suitable location. For these reasons I think that after $15,000 has been expended—a large portion of it in making foundations, because the water comes within a few feet of the ground all over the place—to start elsewhere would be a childish piece of business and one that the Government ought not to undertake.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. When I stated that there had been $15,000 expended I should have said that of this $5,000 was paid for the site. Now I am offered a free site. On that question of site, what took place was this—and the papers which I will gladly bring down will prove it—my hon. friend from Macdonald (Mr. Boyd) is the party who really made the choice of site. The agent of the department positively declined to recommend the site which has been adopted.

Mr. BOYD. Has he recommended the site proposed?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. He has not, but he refused to recommend the other. One of the friends of the hon. gentleman—I cannot recollect his name—ordered that the present site be chosen. The matter was referred to the department at Ottawa. I say again positively that Mr. Smith declined to recommend the site. The hon. member for Macdonald at that time had powerful influence in the department and he chose the site himself. Until a certain private document was sent to me, which document was in the hands of Mr. Smith, I positively declined to have anything to do with the proposed change. That paper came into my hands and is now in my department. The town authorities represent to me that the site has been wrongly chosen. Surely they are better judges than we. We are offered a site free of charge, and the only cost to the Government will be $5,000. It is of no use to say that the building has cost $15,000 and because of that large expenditure we must not make any change. As I have stated Messrs. Viau & Lachance, the contractors for the building, have offered to make the removal and rebuild for $5,000. Something has been said about quicksand and water on the new site. The contractors have pledged themselves, and I will see to it that that pledge is in the contract, that they will make the necessary provision against quicksand and water. Otherwise I will not make the change. Five thousand dollars is not a very large sum as against the fact that the authorities of an important town like Portage la Prairie represent that the change is in the interest of the town. Under the circumstances I made up my mind that the site ought to be changed. But I say again that I did not make up my mind to that until I had in my hands a letter from Mr. Smith in which he states positively that he declined to choose the site and that the friend of my hon. friend from Macdonald tried to oblige him to recommend the site that has been chosen.

Mr. FOSTER. Does my hon. friend think that the member representing a constituency may not make a choice as good as that of an under official of his own? By his own argument he is putting this contemplated action very largely on the fact that the official did not choose to recommend a site. But does my hon. friend think that there may not be other dangers in a policy of this kind? A public building is supposed to give value to property in its vicinity. A change of this kind may be open to very serious objection on the ground that properties may increase in value in consequence, and that it may be to the interest of people to give a site worth $5,000 for the purpose of increasing the value of the property. I want to point out to my hon. friend that there are many difficulties likely to arise, if he undertakes to disturb what has been settled. Is this building of brick or stone?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Stone.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, you have a stone building worth $10,000 upon a foundation, and you propose to move that stone building, and the contractors are going to make another foundation, and put the building upon it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. I am afraid my hon. friend will have to meet a big claim in the way of extras.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Not one cent.

Mr. FOSTER. It seems utterly impossible for the firm to do that.

Mr. GIBSON. If the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) had been as careful, when Finance Minister, in looking after this site for a public building there as he is to-night, he would never have given his consent to putting the building where it was. I had the pleasure of visiting that town, and, although I saw a different class of men from those seen by my hon. friend from York, I can say, to the contrary of what he stated, that I heard a great many complaints. We have had complaints in this House, time and again, about the trouble caused to the whole town by the selection made by the hon. member who represents the constituency of Macdonald (Mr. Boyd). Now, the hon. member for York criticises the Minister of Public Works, as does also my hon. friend from Macdonald, about the impossibility of taking down this stone-work and moving it three or four blocks, and re-erecting it for the cost of $5,000. Now, any one familiar with works of that kind, knows that the money has already been spent in the preparation of these materials, and it is only a question of taking them down and removing them, and putting them on another site. I am bound to say that, if the gentlemen who have the contract, are willing to do that for $5,000, it seems to me, as a practical man, that they are pretty well paid for the work, and they are able to do it for that sum of money. Now, my hon. friend from Macdonald states that they are only moving this building some two or three blocks down town. I wish he had told this committee how large the blocks are in Portage la Prairie. Why, Mr. Chairman, this building is practically out of town, and it is putting the people of Portage la Prairie for all time to come to an inconvenience for the sake of some friends of the hon. member for Macdonald. The hon. member for York says that we should not do a thing of that kind. We are here, Mr. Chairman, to do what is right, no matter whether the late Government did right or wrong. If they committed a wrong, now is the time to make it right by this alteration. I put it to the judgment of every right-thinking man on this committee, on either side, if the Government are not doing the right and proper thing in a matter of this kind affecting the welfare of a town, where the corporation are willing to present the Government with a lot, where the public officials are desirous that the building should be put, and where it is convenient to the public, although it may not be convenient for the hon. member who happens to have been a friend of the late Government. I am within the mark in saying that he would not get half a dozen men outside of his own following to coincide with his selection. I do not know whether he was interested in the lot; but I do say that the interests of Portage la Prairie were not as well looked after by the ex-Minister of Finance when he swallowed the whole thing simply upon the advice of the member for Macdonald. It is important that this building should be at once removed for the convenience of the public, and that this difficulty should be settled now for all time to come. It has been up for the last two or three sessions, and I think the Government are justified in asking this House to right a wrong, even if it should cost $5,000. I, for one, will have much pleasure in supporting the Minister of Public Works, believing that the offer he has had from the contractors justifies him in making the change, especially since it can be made without any extras, which my hon. friend from York stands so much in dread of. I think, when the hon. gentleman from York looks in front of this Parliament building, at a block which was to cost the Government $200,000, and has run up in the matter of extras alone to something like nearly $800,000, he should say very little about extras.

Mr. MAXWELL. As this case is closely related to a similar case that occurred in Vancouver, I think I ought to give a little account of the extreme wisdom of the late Government. They have always been distinguished for the manner in which they selected sites, and also for their habit of putting public buildings in places where the citizens do not want them put. Now, we have had a post office built in that city on a site that was against the wishes of almost all the citizens of Vancouver; they put the post office in a place such that, when our people look at it, they are moved to indignation. Of course, we know that the late Government was always sensible to the sweet influences of particular friends, and they had a friend out there likewise whom they wished to accommodate. That friend was referred to by an hon. gentleman opposite as a large corporation. Not long ago, in order to please a particular corporation, and against the almost unanimous sentiment of the people of Vancouver, the late Government erected a post office in a place that does not benefit half a dozen people in the whole city. Now, I say, if we can get that post office at Portage la Prairie removed for $5,000, I will heartily support the proposition. I have great pleasure in supporting the request of the citizens of Portage la Prairie in this matter, because, as in the case of Vancouver, it is time the change was made, even though it cost $5,000.

Mr. BOYD. As yet I have heard no reason given why this post office should be removed. The Minister states that the selection was made upon my recommendation, and that the papers in the department prove it. I would like him to produce them. It has been stated that Mr. Smith refused to recommend the site. He (Mr. Smith) was not sent there to recommend a site. He inspected three sites. One was the present site built on, one called the central site, which is half a block east of where the present post office is situated. These foundations he found to be good. As regards a site one block east of that, he would not report in favour of the foundation; but he refused to assent to any particular site. As regards the final location of a site, a deputation came here and waited on the Government. That deputation of leading men of the town, included Mr. McLenaghan, one of the most wealthy men in town; Mr. Garland and Mr. Newman, ex-mayors, and another Mr. Garland, and it was on the recommendation of that deputation that the site was selected, and not on my recommendation particularly. As regards the statements made by some hon. members opposite that the site is out of town, I say that it is one block west of the present centre of population. Until hon. gentlemen opposite prove by statistics that such is not the fact, their statements are merely their own and the opinions of their political friends. This subject was thrashed out when Mr. Martin was in the House. He stated that it was a scandal, and that the hon. member for Marquette would be annihilated by his constituents. What is the result? I held two political meetings, and my opponents held two, but not one word was said about the post office question, no mention was made of it. A majority of 75 registered against me in that town at the previous election was reduced to 21. If such a wrong had been done as is represented, would those results have followed? I have given the plain facts in regard to the population of the town, that the post office had been there for fifteen years, and the opinions expressed by hon. gentlemen opposite are not sufficient to warrant the committee in making an unprecedented change; and an incoming Government would have as much right to move the post office back again as there is now for any change being made, because by that time the population would be far west of the present site.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is very well for the member for Macdonald to speak about the opinions of hon. gentlemen on this side counting for nothing; yet I fail to see that the hon. gentleman has offered anything but his own opinion. I assert that this was a political site in the first instance, and it being a political site, it is proper for this committee to consider whether a change should not be made at the present time. The sum of $15,000 has been mentioned in several instances. We have a distinct assurance that the total cost to the country will be only $5,000, and not one cent more. So keenly do the people of Portage la Prairie feel—and after all, it is the people of the town who are interested—that they are willing to contribute the site in order to have the post office located at a more convenient place.

Mr. FOSTER. Who contributes the site?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I presume the people of Portage la Prairie.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. A committee of citizens.

Mr. RICHARDSON. When the matter was first mentioned to me I hesitated for a considerable time before deciding to advocate a change of site, because I saw the force of the remarks of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), that it is very undesirable to establish a precedent of this nature; but when I considered what Winnipeg had suffered in the old days by having a post office located three-quarters of a mile from the centre of population, and how the city had suffered for ten or twelve years by having its custom-house so far away from the business centre, I promptly determined that if we could secure this change at a reasonable figure—and I consider this a very reasonable figure—I was prepared to vote for it. I think it is due to the people of that town that this committee should consider $5,000 as a small sum in order that they may have a post-office located where they desire. Three blocks in Portage la Prairie are not like three blocks in Ottawa; they constitute a very considerable distance, and I am well satisfied that it is the duty of the committee to make this change. I understand the municipality did not ask for the site originally selected, and the hon. member for Macdonald has given us the names of gentlemen who formed a deputation in order to select this site. Probably the most influential name mentioned as being on the deputation is that of Mr. McLenaghan, a gentleman who does not live there at all. He left the town a year or two ago and, of course, receives no letters at that post office. Of course he could afford to be one of a deputation if his property would be benefited by the post office being located where it is. I strongly urge that this change be made. I have looked into the matter very carefully and weighed the arguments the hon. gentleman for York presented, and after doing so I have come to the conclusion that this change should be made, if the cost would not exceed $5,000, and we have the assurance of the Minister of Public Works that that amount will not be exceeded.

Mr. FOSTER. The statement made by the hon. member for Macdonald should have great weight with the Minister of Public Works, and I can assure him I am not discussing this matter as a partisan. I consider it first as establishing a precedent which should not be laid down if it is possible to avoid it. My hon. friend states that a deputation—I remember the deputation myself—of prominent citizens at that time at Portage la Prairie asked for this site, and the site was selected. Other facts have been brought out by the hon. gentleman who represents the constituency. If there had been gross injustice done that might be a proper reason for establishing a precedent and doing an act of the kind proposed, but this has not been the case. In such case the hon. gentleman would have had to meet this issue during his public canvass. He has stated, however, that he did not meet it, but that a majority of 75 given against him at the last election was reduced to 21. These are facts worth a great deal more than the statements of hon. gentlemen who are not connected with the constituency, and who are not of course as deeply interested as are people connected with the town. I also point out that the Minister is acting on ex parte evidence. I trust the Government will not make any change under the circumstances detailed by my hon. friend.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am not asking for $5,000 necessary to make the change.

Mr. FOSTER. Do I understand that if the hon. gentleman does decide to make the change suggested, he will not make it until he has come down to the House and asked for $5,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I will not make any change until I come to the House and ask for $5,000.

Mr. MACDONELL (Selkirk). I wish to mention one fact in connection with this. The hon. gentleman for Macdonald (Mr. Boyd) has represented that the movement of population in Portage la Prairie is to the west. I desire to say that the movement of population in this town is to the east. I also wish to point out to the House that the Canadian Pacific Railway were so strongly impressed with that fact, that they have erected a new station about a quarter of a mile to the east of the old one. The Manitoba and North-western station, the Canadian Pacific Railway station and the public buildings erected by the provincial government, of which that hon. gentleman (Mr. Boyd) complains, are now all upon the same street in that town. The business portion of the town and the business interests of the town are in that locality.

Mr. BOYD. The only point the gentleman who has taken his seat (Mr. Macdonell) has made is with regard to the moving of the Canadian Pacific Railway station. Any person who knows anything about it knows, that the station was moved in order to make a junction with the Manitoba and North-western Railway, and not because of the necessities of the town in that direction. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonell) says that most of the business of the town is done on the street running from the station. Why, there is not a business house on it, except a livery stable. True, the Lands Titles office is on it, but as I have explained to the House it was put there after a resolution had been moved by the committee of the town council and the committee of the municipal council, asking them to put it west of where you propose to put this post office.

Mr. MACDONELL (Selkirk). I wish to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Boyd) whether it is not true that a magnificent hotel was erected at the western end of the town, and it is now falling into ruin and decay, and is unoccupied, while a new hotel erected in the vicinity of the station is doing all the business of the town.

Mr. BOYD. It is not the case. The leading hotel in the town of Portage la Prairie is on the corner opposite the site where the present post office is built. That is the Leland House, and it is the best hotel in the town.

Mr. MACDONALD (Winnipeg). I would like to say a few words on this matter as I was rather astonished to hear my hon. friend from Selkirk (Mr. Macdonell) say that Portage la Prairie is growing to the east. Anybody who has ever been in that town knows, that like every other western town, it is growing to the west, and each year the site where the present post office is built is getting more into the centre of the town. I have great confidence in the knowledge of my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) as a contractor, and I have no doubt that what he says as to the cost and practicality of moving this building is correct, but his remarks about the town shows he knows little of Portage la Prairie. The blocks there are very little larger, if at all larger, than they are in Ottawa.

Mr. GIBSON. Give us the size ?

Mr. MACDONALD (Winnipeg). I cannot give you the size of the blocks in Ottawa, but I know they are about the same size as the blocks in Portage la Prairie.

Mr. GIBSON. Twice the size.

Mr. MACDONALD (Winnipeg). About the same size. I would guarantee to say that the removal of the post office from the present site to that which is contemplated will not save any person living in Portage la Prairie three minutes time in walking from one site to the other. I will further say, that 80 per cent of the people of Ottawa, live further from the post office here than do the people of Portage la Prairie from the present post office in that town. I have every confidence in the intention of the Minister of Public Works to do right in this matter, and I believe that if he leaves this an open question until he views the present site himself as well as the one contemplated, he will not consider it in the public interest to spend this $5,000 in removing the post office. As I know Portage la Prairie well, I thought it only fair to make these remarks.

Mr. GIBSON. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman from Winnipeg (Mr. Macdonald) if he ever heard any complaints about the site of the post office in that town ?

Mr. MACDONALD (Winnipeg). I have never heard any complaints. I attended two meetings held during the last election, when I spoke in the interest of my friend (Mr. Boyd) and at neither of these meetings was the question at all mooted. I do not believe that the question of the site of the post office had the slightest influence in that election, whereas, had there been any strong feeling in the matter every hon. member in the House knows, that it would have cost many votes, and would have been thrown in the teeth of the candidate when he came before his constituents.

Mr. BOYD. Before any site is selected, and before any change is made, will the Minister come down to this House and ask for the money?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. BOYD. Have you any objection to my putting a motion that if the money is expended it be expended on the present site?

Mr. GIBSON. You may put the motion, but it won't carry.

Mr. FOSTER. If the Minister of Public Works has given his statement to the effect that no change will be made until he brings down a vote which we will pass in this House, that will be equivalent to your motion.

Mr. BOYD. Very well.

Harbours and Rivers, Nova Scotia..... $13,200

Mr. MILLS. I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works if it is his intention to proceed with the repairs of Margaretsville pier and Hampton pier in Annapolis County, N.S.?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We are just now looking carefully into that question.

Mr. MILLS. There is a large amount of correspondence and petitions with reference to Margaretsville pier to which I would like to call the attention of the hon. Minister. This pier was taken over by the Dominion Government from a private company, with the distinct understanding that it should be kept in repair. It is now in a state of dilapidation. The late Government, had they been allowed to submit their Supplementary Estimates last session, had in view the putting of that pier into a state of thorough repair, and I trust that the present Government will follow in their footsteps in that regard. There is also the Hampton pier, and the cutting out of the channel at Clementsport, to which I have had the honour of calling the attention of the late Government quite frequently. I trust that the Minister of Public Works, in bringing down the Supplementary Estimates, will not overlook these matters. I would also call his attention to a snag which has been left from the old bridge at the mouth of Bear River, and which is a very dangerous impediment to navigation. My attention was called to it by Captain Chute, of Bear River. I may add, as an inducement to the hon. gentleman to remove this snag, that Bear River is a very prosperous town, and gives a large majority against me. I understand that Captain Chute's vessel came near being damaged, if it was not actually damaged, by this snag. I trust that the Government will also look after that.

Harbours and Rivers, Prince Edward Island ..... $46,000

Mr. HACKETT. I would like to ask the hon. Minister if he has provided in the Supplementary Estimates for the repair of Tignish and Miminegash breakwaters?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Repairs are now going on.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I would ask the hon. Minister of Public Works whether he will put in the Supplementary Estimates an item for the pier at Ste. Famille on the Island of Orleans? He knows that the pier last year was almost carried away by the ice, and if nothing is done this season it will be carried away completely.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I hope to be in a position to comply with the request of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BENNETT. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Public Works if it is intended to expend any further amounts on the harbour of Collingwood and Owen Sound other than those in the Estimates, also the nature of the work at Owen Sound?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There will be certainly more money spent in some of the harbours. The works at Collingwood are estimated to cost about $200,000, but this year we will not spend any more than we are applying for.

Dredging ..... $188,000

Mr. KAULBACH. Is it the intention of the hon. Minister to do any dredging on the La Have River or in the harbour of Lunenburg and also of Mahon Bay? The work is much needed, and requests have been made, from year to year, to have it done. The promise was made me last year that it would be attended to this year. Will the hon. Minister make a note of this and see that those three works are attended to?

Mr. McNEILL. I wish to call attention to a matter to which I referred in the House the other day. I would not do so, were it not that I am quite satisfied that it involves the risk of human life. I refer to the dredging of the bar at the mouth of the Saugeen River. If the hon. gentleman could assure me that something would be done this fall, so as to enable the fishermen, before the severe weather comes on, to get out and in with safety, I should feel very much relieved. I fear some disaster will occur, unless something can be done. I leave the matter entirely in the hands of the hon. Minister.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am very much afraid that I will not be able to do much during the fall. We shall require first a survey of Southampton harbour, and then we have not a rock dredge. It might be a good policy to have a rock dredge built, because that would save us a large amount of money. My department is not fully equipped to do such work as my hon. friend requires. I will look carefully into the matter, and see what I can do.

Mr. SPROULE. I notice that a portion of this item is for Ontario and Quebec. Has the Minister an understanding as to where this dredging is to be done, or is it only to be done in case of emergency? I would ask him whether he has provided for dredging at Thornbury harbour, where it is very much needed?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We will do some work there.

Mr. KAULBACH. I would like to add to the request I made a moment ago, a similar request with regard to the dredging of Crooked Channel, in Lunenburg.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I will look into the matter.

Mr. FORTIN. I would ask the Minister of Public Works whether any portion of this amount is to cover the expense of dredging the sandbank in the St. Lawrence opposite Pointe aux Trembles? I have been informed that that sandbank prevents the steamboats having access to the wharf during the low water of the months of August and September.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The trouble is that we have no dredges for this work. The dredges in the port of Montreal, just opposite Pointe aux Trembles, cannot work in low water. But I shall have in my possession in a few days a dredge that my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals has transferred to my department. This dredge was in the hands of the Montreal Cotton Mills Co., and they have had it for the past year without paying a cent. I represented to my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals that he would render a great public service, if he would transfer this dredge to my department, and this he has done. The dredge is on its way to Montreal, and will be used for dredging in shallow water.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I am glad that this question has come up. How could it happen that my hon. friend from Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach) could have no dredging done, while at the same time a dredge could be given over to a corporation, passes my comprehension. How he could have known of this, and not protested, or how it could have been kept from him, I cannot understand.

Mr. FOSTER. I quite agree that if any dredge were to be given to a corporation, it should have been given to my hon. friend.

Mr. GILLIES. I would like to ask the Minister with regard to a large dredge that was furnished to his department recently. I believe its destination was the Atlantic coast of the lower provinces, and I would like to ask if she has yet commenced operations? If so, where is she working and where will she continue operations during the remainder of the season?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The dredge was sent to Shediac, which was the point at which the contractors were bound to deliver it. We tried it there and found it to work very well indeed. Then the request came from the city of St. John for the loan of the dredge. The dredge is on its way to St. John and I hope it will arrive there safely in a few days. We have decided to allow the dredge to work during the winter season in the harbour of St. John. Our friends down by the sea have shown a great spirit of enterprise and the Government thought they were perfectly justified in lending the dredge to assist in carrying on the important work they have undertaken.

Mr. GIBSON. I would like to ask how the Montreal Cotton Mills Co. has this dredge for nothing?

Mr. FOSTER. If we are going into that we shall probably take a long time and I think we had better adjourn. I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. GIBSON. I have as good a right to ask questions as the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) has. He has asked a good many pertinent questions—

An hon. MEMBER. Impertinent.

Mr. GIBSON. No; I will not call them impertinent. But I hope the hon. gentleman will not deny me the privilege which he has exercised so freely.

Mr. FOSTER. While I deny the hon. gentleman no right, I am exercising a right of my own. We have gone through a great mass of Estimates, and I do not think hon. gentlemen can ask us to sit here longer. If this question is gone into it must occupy a good deal of time.

Mr. GIBSON. I think I have the right to an answer.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I will give it. Of course I cannot give the exact time for which the Cotton Mills Co. had this dredge as it did not belong to my department. If I am well informed they had it for a year.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Who gave the authority?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We have done a fair lot of work, and we do not wish to push the House too hard—

• The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Better carry this item.

Mr. FOSTER. No; better let it stand. There will be a number of questions with reference to this dredge.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Carried.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No; not carried. I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to, and resolutions reported.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.30 a.m. (Wednesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 16th September, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

JACQUES CARTIER AND LAVAL CONTESTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that I have received from one of the judges selected for the trial of election petitions, pursuant to the Dominion Controverted Elections Act; judgments relating to the electoral districts of Jacques Cartier and Laval, respectively, by which the preliminary objections were maintained and the election petitions dismissed.

THE ORDER PAPER—CHANGE OF FORM

Mr. SPEAKER. I desire to draw the attention of the House to a small change which has been made in the printing of routine proceedings by my direction. The questions to be put by members are each numbered. This is in accordance with an English precedent, which has been established since 1880, and I think it will in several ways work beneficially. In the first place, hon. members may either refer to a question by its number when asking for an answer, or, if they choose, they may read the question, as usual. In the next place, it has been quite apparent that, when an hon. member has a number of questions placed in his name on the Order paper, it is very difficult for members of the Government to know which one they are replying to. With each question distinctly numbered, I think the business of the House will be facilitated very much.

TRADE RELATIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

(a.) Did the leader of the Government at Abbotsford, P.Q., on October 8th, 1890, make use of the following words :—" When the Liberal party comes into power it will send commissioners to Washington to propose a mutual agreement by which there will be free trade along the whole line, doing away with custom-houses that go so far to cause friction between the two countries," or words which would convey that meaning ?

(b.) Did the leader of the Government, in Boston in 1891, as reported in the press of that city, say : " The first article at the present moment in the programme of the Liberal party is to establish absolute reciprocal freedom of trade between Canada and the United States, for all products of the two countries, whether natural or manufactured. Their object is, when there is a Liberal Administration at Ottawa, to offer to the United States the free entrance to our territory of all American products, whether natural or manufactured, provided the United States extend the same privileges to the products of Canada," or words which conveyed that meaning ?

(c.) Did the leader of the Government, at Brampton in 1894, use, as reported, the following words :—" If we come into power, on that day I promise you a commission will go to Washington, and if we can get a treaty in natural products and a list of manufactured articles, that treaty will be made " ?

(d.) Did the leader of the Government use the following words in Boston in 1891, as reported in the press :—" The proposition which we make involves the position that we should offer to the American people that which is denied to the rest of the world. In so saying, I do not forget that I am a subject of the British Crown " ?

(e.) Is the leader of the Government aware that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has declared : " If it (unrestricted reciprocity) does discriminate against Great Britain we have a right to. We owe Great Britain nothing but charity for her atrocious blundering against our interests. There never was a time that Canada could not have bettered her position by joining the United States " ?

(f.) In view of the foregoing declarations and pledges, has the Government sent any commission to Washington for the purpose of negotiating a treaty of reciprocity between the United States and Canada ?

(g.) If not, is it the present intention of the Government to do so, and if so, when ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I will endeavour as fully as I can to satisfy the rather fastidious curiosity of my hon. friend. (a) My hon. friend has heard me several times on the floor of this House, say that I would not be bound by the accuracy of this report. I did not use any such words or convey any such meaning. (b) I have again to say that the hon. gentleman has heard me several times say that I refused to be bound by the accuracy of the reports of the American papers. In fact, everybody who has been in the United States, knows that the American dailies do not contain the reports of speeches, unless a manuscript of the speech has been handed to them in advance of its delivery. (c) I cannot answer for the accuracy of these words, but I think I am ready to accept them. (d) I have already answered that. (e) I have been informed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that he is much pleased to find that the hon. member for York has taken to studying the speeches of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and that he believes their attentive perusal will greatly benefit the hon. member, and may tend to prevent him repeating certain grave errors into which he has formerly fallen; that, as regards the alleged quotation referred to, the Minister of Trade and Commerce is inclined to believe that the hon. member has mixed up several disconnected sentences from different speeches, without regard to the context, and that the Minister will be obliged if the hon. member will specify the time and place at which and where the said speeches were delivered. (f) No, the Government has not. (g) It is the present intention of the Government to enter into negotiations with the American authorities; but the Government believe that, pending a presidential election, the time would not now be opportune. The Government would not like to have the commissioners come back after an interview with the American authorities of three minutes' duration.

TWO-CENT LETTER POSTAGE.

Mr. RICHARDSON asked :

Has the Government, in accordance with a memorial from the Winnipeg Board of Trade, considered the question of establishing a two-cent letter rate of postage for the Dominion, and if so, what is its decision in regard thereto ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). This is one of several important questions which the Government has not yet been able to deal with.

LIGHTHOUSE AT OKA.

Mr. ETHIER asked :

Whether it is the intention of the Government to construct a lighthouse at Oka, on the Lake of Two Mountains ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). It is the intention of the department to send an engineer to make an investigation on the spot. With regard to the necessity for this lighthouse, I am not able to answer now, or until I receive the engineer's report.

LOCK No. 1, LACHINE CANAL.

Mr. QUINN asked :

1. Is it the intention of the Government to proceed with the construction of lock No. 1, Lachine Canal, this winter ? 2. If so, will such work be done by contract or by day labour ? 3. If by day labour, will the system of eight hours per day be followed ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS (Mr. Blair). The whole subject is engaging the serious consideration of the Government.

FREE TRANSMISSION OF MAIL MATTER.

Mr. McMULLEN asked :

1. Was any mail matter other than that within the meaning of section 26 of the Post Office Act, during the recent elections, posted at Toronto and allowed free transmission through the mails ? 2. If so, by whose authority was such free transmission allowed ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). I beg to state that the postmaster informs me that he is not aware that any such mailed letters were posted at Toronto and allowed free transmission through the mail.

BINDER TWINE AT KINGSTON PENITENTIARY.

Mr. ROGERS asked :

How much binder twine was manufactured at the Kingston Penitentiary in the season of 1896 ? How much was sold, and at what price ? Why is it that there is so much on hand ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). In answer to the first question, 500 tons. In answer to the second, ten tons were sold.

Mr. ROGERS. Only ten ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes, and that is not paid for. The reason why there is so much on hand is that an agreement was made in April, 1896, under which this was to be disposed of by Mr. Patrick Kelly, who was to furnish security, as he was not a man of very substantial means, and the security was not furnished.

Mr. BERGERON. What price ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I cannot give the hon. gentleman the price at which the ten tons were disposed of, because it has not been paid for.

MR. ANGUS P. CAMPBELL.

Mr. CALVERT asked :

1. Is the Government aware that Mr. Angus P. Campbell, an employee in connection with the Savings Bank Branch, Post Office Department, Ottawa, was absent from his duties for a considerable time previous to the late elections ?
2. If so, was the said Angus P. Campbell absent with the consent of the Government ?
3. Did he receive his usual salary while absent ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say : Mr. Angus P. Campbell formally applied for and was granted the usual three weeks "annual leave" from the 8th to the 28th June, inclusive. He received his salary while on leave.

P. E. BOURASSA, INSPECTOR OF WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Mr. GUAY (translation) asked :

1. Whether it is true that Mr. P. E. Bourassa, inspector of weights and measures at Quebec, committed irregularities in paying over the amounts collected by him in the course of the year 1894 or 1895 ?
2. If so, what was the nature of the said irregularities ?
3. Was that gentleman retained in his position after such irregularities had been committed ?
4. Is he still in the employment of the Government, and if so,
5. Is it the intention of the Government, in view of the facts, to dismiss him ?

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir H. Joly de Lotbinière). (Translation.) To the first question, Yes. 2. Mr. Bourassa had not deposited the money received by him within the time required for the fulfilment of his duty. 3. Yes. 4. Yes. 5. Yes.

COPYRIGHT.

Mr. McDOUGALL (for Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) asked :

Have the negotiations between Her Majesty's government and the Canadian Government respecting the subject of copyright come to a conclusion ?

Is the Government able to make any statement respecting the position of the question ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). The correspondence in question is of a confidential nature, and has not yet been brought to a conclusion. The Government are not in a position to make any definite statement on the subject.

MR. JOHN A. BARRON, Q.C.

Mr. HUGHES asked :

Is Mr. John A. Barron, Q.C., of Lindsay, in the employ of the Government or of the Liberal party ?

Has application been made to appoint Mr. Barron to a position ?

Mr. FITZPATRICK.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). He is not in the employ of the Government. Whether he is in the employ of the Liberal party, the Government has no knowledge, and that concerns Mr. Barron himself. Mr. Barron has made no application for an appointment.

CHIGNECTO SHIP RAILWAY.

Mr. McDOUGALL (for Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) asked :

Is the following a substantially accurate report of part of a speech of the Honourable the Minister of Marine and Fisheries at Amherst, Nova Scotia, 28th November, 1895, referring to the Chignecto Ship Railway :—

"Mr. Davies thereupon said, that Hon. Mr. Dickey, their present representative, had, he understood, pledged himself to secure the extension of time desired or resign his seat in Parliament. As he had not resigned, he presumed the extension had been granted. (Thundering applause.) If Hon. Mr. Dickey had failed and the Government had not discharged its obligation, when the new Government came into power, it could promise that the matter should have full and generous consideration."—(Halifax "Morning Chronicle," 28th November, 1895) ?

2. Is the following a substantially accurate report of a speech of the Honourable the Minister of Marine and Fisheries at Kentville, King's County, Nova Scotia, 23rd June, 1896 :—

"Mr. Davies next took Sir Charles' manifesto and dealt with its main clauses. The Hudson's Bay Railway and the Chignecto Ship Railway were dealt with at length. Mr. Davies said he was not opposed to any reasonable project which would tend to develop the resources of Canada, but the two mentioned were preposterous." (Applause.)—"Morning Chronicle," 5th June, 1896) ?

3. Will the Minister of Marine and Fisheries state to the House his present opinion of the Chignecto Ship Railway, and whether he is prepared to give this project full and generous consideration ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). I may say that the occasion referred to was a most interesting one, and the speech that I delivered upon that occasion was received with great cordiality. I am inclined to think that if that speech were printed on the Orders of the Day it would have considerable effect on the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite, and I am told—I felt very proud of the fact—that it had some effect when delivered in the town of Amherst. The quotation read by the hon. gentleman was not in the speech itself. It was in answer to a question put me at the time. A contemporary report appeared in the "Chronicle," which, I think, was substantially correct, but this quotation, read by itself, without the question, would not be understood. There were two questions discussed. One was the Chignecto transport scheme on its merits; and the other was a question distinctly apart from the merits of the scheme, and that was, to what extent there were moral considerations which bound the Government to extend the time. I was not asked, with reference to the main question, whether I believed in the scheme or not, but I was asked with reference to the moral considerations, whether the Government were bound to extend the time. I did say at the time that the matter would have my full and generous consideration, and I may say that since the opening of the session, I have implemented that promise by forming one of a committee, which gave a lengthy and generous hearing to Mr. Provan, who represented the company. With regard to the second part of the question, referring to the speech which I delivered at Kentville, N.S., the occasion on which I delivered that speech was also most interesting. That speech was a reply to one delivered by my hon. friend the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster), who had spoken there a few days before. Some two thousand or three thousand people attended, and my hon. friend, if he turns up the report, will find it most instructive. I took considerable pains to put the facts before the country.

Mr. FOSTER. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is making a speech and not answering the question.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the rule will be found to be this, that any hon. member may put a question on public affairs either to Ministers or other members of the House, and that any answer should be confined to the question put, although, in the case of Ministers of the Crown, May lays down that very considerable latitude is allowed them.

Mr. SPROULE. We do not want to know whether it was an interesting occasion.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Were it not a very interesting occasion, I would not have been questioned at all about it. I admit that basic fact. It was a most important occasion. 2,000 or 3,000 electors were present, and I venture to say that my friends and myself who addressed that meeting made most interesting speeches, and I commend them to hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. DAVIN. I wish you would make some of those speeches in the House.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the hon. gentleman will do me the honour to read my speech, he will find that it was a résumé of a speech which I did make in the House the previous session on the Hudson Bay matter, and which the hon. gentleman, I think, did me the honour of listening to at the time. I have not read the report of the speech to which the hon. gentleman calls my attention, but have no reason to doubt that I did denounce as preposterous a proposition then in the air, and attributed to Sir Charles Tupper, relating to the Hudson Bay Railway. As regards the last question, my opinion of the Chignecto Railway has not changed.

BRIDGE AT THE MOUTH OF THE BEAR RIVER.

Mr. MILLS asked :

Is the Government aware that the remains of the piers of the old bridge at the mouth of Bear River, a tributary of the Annapolis River, are dangerously in the way of navigation? Has any step been taken towards removing the same? If not, does the Government intend to remove these impediments to navigation?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). To the first part of the question I desire to answer that it has been reported for the past ten years to this department that the piers in question interfered more or less with navigation. As yet no direct steps have been taken towards removing them. The impediments are the property of the province of Nova Scotia, whose attention will be called to the fact of their interfering with navigation, with the view of having them removed.

RESTRICTION UPON OYSTER FISHING.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

Whether a petition has been received by the Government from certain persons in the city of Charlottetown praying that the restriction to fish for oysters above the North River Bridge, North River, Charlottetown Harbour, be removed, and if so, what action the Government has taken or intends to take thereon?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). Requests have been made of the nature referred to by the hon. gentleman, but no action will be taken upon them, pending an examination of the oyster beds which is being made by Mr. Kemp, the Oyster Inspector.

DUTY ON LEAF TOBACCO.

Mr. DUGAS asked :

1. Is it the intention of the Government to levy a customs duty on foreign leaf tobacco?
2. If so, what amount?
3. If not, what do they purpose doing with a view to provide a more remunerative market for the farming class who cultivate that article?

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir H. Joly de Lotbinière). The subject by its very nature ought to be dealt with when the revision of the tariff is undertaken.

SALARIES OF CIVIL SERVANTS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. McINNIS asked :

Was any person delegated by the late Government to inquire into and report on the additional cost of living in British Columbia, having special reference to the salaries of civil servants? If so, what was the nature of such report?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). No record can be found of any such inquiry having been made.

INQUIRY INTO ALEGED MALADMINISTRATION.

Mr. CAMERON asked :

1. Is it the intention of the Government to issue a commission such as was issued by the late Sir John A. Macdonald, shortly after his accession to power in 1878, to inquire into the acts of his predecessors in office ?

2. Is it the intention of the Government to issue a commission to inquire into the various acts of departmental and official misconduct, negligence and maladministration charged against the late Government for the last eighteen years, and for the various sums of money that have been illegally taken from the public treasury during that period ?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to call your attention to question No. 2, and to object to it on the ground that there is a statement of fact there, and not only a statement of fact but one involving a charge which the hon. gentleman, I think, had better make in another way.

Mr. CAMERON. In which part of the question ?

Mr. FOSTER. In the second part.

Mr. SPEAKER. Will the hon. gentleman state specifically which part of the question he objects to and on what ground.

Mr. FOSTER. The objection I take is to the second part of the question in which the hon. gentleman who asks the question, states as a matter of fact that sums of money have been illegally taken from the public treasury.

Mr. CAMERON. I did not state that. I speak of sums of money charged to have been taken. Everybody knows that charge is made.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend (Mr. Cameron) will take the English as it is. The hon. gentleman cannot even annotate a question of his own which is staring him in the face. The question says :

2. Is it the intention of the Government to issue a commission to inquire into the various acts of departmental and official misconduct, negligence and maladministration charged against the late Government for the last eighteen years—

There is no objection to that. But the question goes on :

--and for the various sums of money that have been illegally taken from the public treasury during that period ?

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the imputation contained in the question is against the rule as laid down in the English practice. May says :

A question may not contain statements of facts, unless they be necessary to make the question intelligible, and can be authenticated ; nor should a question contain arguments, inferences, imputations, epithets, nor ironical expressions.

Mr. LAURIER.

I think this comes within the objection in that it covers an imputation, and I think the hon. gentleman had better confine the question to specific cases.

Mr. CAMERON. In deference to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, I will strike out the latter part of the second division of the question, the words :

And for the various sums of money that have been illegally taken from the public treasury during that period.

The PRIME MINISTER. That subject is engaging the attention of the Government at the present time.

TAY CANAL LAND DAMAGES.

Mr. CAMERON asked :

1. Have any claims for damages to land been made to the Government occasioned by the building of the Tay Canal ?

2. If so, who are the claimants and how much is the sum demanded by each claimant ?

3. Have any sums been paid on account of such claims ? If so, to whom, and when were such sums paid ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). As to the first portion of that question, I may say that there have been claims to a very large amount and presented by very many parties against the Government for damages to land occasioned by the building of the Tay Canal. As to the second and third portions of the question, I would suggest that my hon. friend (Mr. Cameron), if he desires to have the material laid before the House, might move for a return.

Mr. CAMERON. It will be too late this session.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Then I can furnish my hon. friend with a statement for his own private use. It would be inconvenient to answer him verbally, there are so many persons having these claims.

Mr. CAMERON. But I do not want it privately ; I want the information for the public.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I will lay it on the Table if it can be done in a regular manner.

Mr. CAMERON. I have put the question and I desire an answer.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman has ample time to move for the return, because the return could be laid on the Table at once.

Mr. CAMERON. But it could not be reached.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to point to my hon. friend (Mr. Blair) that if he allows this question as a precedent, he will be in honour bound to answer other questions, which will be very inconvenient for him.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I would like to go out of my way to accommodate the hon. gentleman who desires this information, yet I do not feel like standing up here and reading a formidable array of names and figures.

An hon. MEMBER. Lay the statement on the Table.

Mr. FOSTER. You cannot lay an answer to a question on the Table.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I will furnish the information to the hon. gentleman privately—

Mr. CAMERON. I do not want it privately; I want it for the public.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Move, move.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would suggest that if the hon. Minister is not prepared to answer the question at present—

Mr. CAMERON. He is prepared. He has the information there.

Mr. CASEY. I would like to ask if it would not be allowable under the circumstances—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. CASEY. I rise to a question of order, I would—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I can really allow no discussion whatever at this stage. The matter is entirely between the hon. member who has asked the question and the hon. Minister who has undertaken to answer it. The answer may be given or may not be given by the hon. Minister, just as he chooses, but we cannot have a debate of any kind upon this question.

TAY CANAL—CLAIMS FOR DAMAGES.

Mr. CAMERON asked :

1. Have any claims for damages to land been made to the Government occasioned by the building of the Tay Canal ?
2. If so, who are the claimants and how much is the sum demanded by each claimant ?
3. Have any sums been paid on account of such claims ? If so, to whom, and when were such sums paid ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. Yes; claims have been made for damages to land occasioned by the building of the Tay Canal. 2. The claimants' names and amount paid in settlement of each claim are :

COMPLAINT AGAINST THE SERGEANT-AT-ARMS.

Mr. CASEY. When I was endeavouring to get your ear a few moments ago for the purpose of making a statement—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman must be in order.

Mr. CASEY. I rise to a question of privilege, and I will explain the question of privilege if hon. gentlemen will keep order. I say when I rose a few moments ago endeavouring to get your ear for the purpose of making a suggestion by which questions might be answered without involving so much trouble on the part of a Minister, an action took place on the part of an official of this House which I do not propose to submit to without a protest. The Sergeant-at-Arms came over here between the seats for the purpose of informing me that I was not in order, and could not speak then, which is a perfectly gratuitous statement on his part, and a thing which it was none of his business to attend to. He had no right here at all, he had no right to speak to me while I was speaking, he had no right to offer me his opinion as to whether I was in order or not; and I wish to call your attention to the matter, and to ask your opinion of his conduct in that connection.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member I hope is mistaken. I am sure—

Mr. CASEY. No, I am not mistaken, distinctly.

Mr. SPEAKER. I hope he is.

Mr. CASEY. I make the statement on my honour.

Mr. BLAIR.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am sure it would not be proper for the Sergeant-at-Arms to interfere with the action of any hon. member in this House, and I hope that the hon. gentleman will feel that he has been mistaken, and has misunderstood the action of the Sergeant. He cannot speak for himself at present, and I hope the hon. gentleman will allow the matter to rest there. I entirely agree with the hon. member that it would not be a correct thing for the Sergeant-at-Arms to interfere with hon. members.

Mr. CASEY. Of course, I know I am not mistaken as to the facts, and I thought it proper that the attention of the House should be called to it. I think it is proper that this official of the House should be given to understand that such a thing should not take place in the future.

NAVIGABILITY OF HUDSON'S BAY.

Mr. RICHARDSON asked :

Has the Government reached any conclusion with regard to sending an expedition to Hudson's Bay and Straits to investigate the navigability thereof, with a view to settling beyond peradventure the question of the practicability of the Hudson's Bay Railway as a commercial enterprise ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I beg to assure my hon. friend that the Government will consider it their duty, at an early date, to have the question of the navigability of Hudson's Bay and Straits exhaustively investigated.

BINDER TWINE AT KINGSTON PENITENTIARY.

Mr. RICHARDSON asked :

1. How much binder twine has been manufactured at the Kingston Penitentiary since the Government instituted the industry, and what the cost has been ?

2. What is the gross amount that has been received for the twine ?

3. Was any of the twine sold on credit, and if so, to whom ?

4. Is any money owing to the Government on account of twine, and if so, by whom?

5. What time has elapsed since the debts, if any, were due?

6. Have any steps been, or will any be taken to enforce collection?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). I may say to the hon. gentleman that this question opens up too large a field of inquiry to be answered at this time. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that he move for the papers.

FISHING LICENSES ON LAKE WINNIPEG.

Mr. BOYD asked :

1. Have commercial fishing licenses on Lake Winnipeg been extended by changing the date of closing from the 1st of September to the 5th of October? If so, why has such extension of time been granted?

2. When was the date of closing of the said licenses changed from the 5th of October to the 1st of September?

3. Why was the commercial fishing season shortened at that time?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). 1. Yes; to encourage the "chilled" fish trade recently introduced and to place commercial fishing on an equality with domestic fishing. 2. 8th May, 1894. 3. Because commercial fishing at that time was almost solely to supply the Selkirk freezers. The freezers were as a rule filled by the end of August and the shippers could not conveniently handle the catch after that date.

THE QUESTION OF PROHIBITION.

Mr. DAVIN (for Mr. Roche) asked :

Was the leader of the Government correctly reported in the Winnipeg "Tribune," October 16th, 1894, as having said the following:—"The question of prohibition was discussed at the convention in Ottawa last summer. The Liberal Government would take a plebiscite of the people on this question. The people would be asked to give a plain 'yes' or 'no' as to whether they desired the passage of a prohibitory law. If they said 'yes,' an Act would be at once submitted to parliament. He, the speaker, hoped the people would say 'yes'?"

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I have been asked that question so often I am afraid I cannot remember the particular occasion to which the report has reference. My memory is not equal to the task of remembering all those answers.

MAIL CLERK AUSTIN.

Mr. CAMERON moved for :

1. Copies of all correspondence between the Postmaster General and the Inspector of the Stratford District, respecting leave of absence obtained by one John Austin, a mail clerk, during the months of January and June, 1896.

2. A copy of all correspondence between said John Austin and the said department or any of its officers respecting said leave of absence.

3. A statement showing the number of days the said John Austin was absent from his duty in the months of January and June, 1896, and causes of such absence.

He said: As the Postmaster General is in his seat I desire to offer a few remarks in regard to the motion before the House. This young man, John Austin, who is mentioned in the motion I have submitted, is a resident of the township of Ashland in my riding. Prior to the by-election of 1892 he was promised a position in the service of the Dominion Government. Not only was he promised a position, but two young men who live within a distance of two miles of each other were promised similar positions. These young men were all Irish Catholics. The by-election in 1892 took place, when I was defeated. Shortly after the election they were all appointed mail clerks in the service of the Dominion. Three other young men, who were Protestants, were also promised positions in the service. They never obtained positions, but the Catholic boys did; that, however, does not concern me, for the representative of Huron could appoint a dozen if he pleased. But I do object that two of those young men in the service of the Government made themselves offensive during the by-election of January last and the general elections of June last. I know that young men in midwinter do not generally take part in by-elections and canvass among Irish Catholics in a constituency on a holiday. I asked the post office inspector by what authority those young men obtained permission to leave their official duties to take part at the by-election and also at the general election. I received a letter from Mr. Hopkirk, stating that Austin was absent by leave of the authorities at Ottawa. What I desire to know from the Minister is whether or not leave was obtained by those young men to absent themselves from the discharge of their duties for two or three weeks in January, and at least ten days. I am informed, in June last. I tell the hon. Postmaster General here and now that beyond all doubt, and it is admitted by one of them, they took part in the political campaign in January, 1896, and personally engaged in the campaign of June, 1896. I also desire to know from the Postmaster General how far he proposes to allow officials in the department to dabble in politics. Those two young men stood at the church door on the Sunday before polling day and distributed lying and scandalous printed dodgers against me with a view to influence my Catholic friends in the township of Ashland against me. It was a gross and outrageous act on their part. I should like to know, first, whether Austin had a right to be absent from the performance of his duties in January and also in June? In the second place, I should like to know if the country pays employees to engage in active political canvass, and especially if it pays them to distribute lying printed dodgers at the church door against one of the candidates in the election. I draw the hon. Postmaster General's attention to these facts. It rests with him to deal with these men. I am in a position to prove these facts, and I state these facts on my responsibility as a member of the House. I ask the hon. Minister to deal with these men and to mete out to them justice, but that is the very thing they do not want; at all events I want him to deal out justice, and not keep them in the public service if the statements I now make are correct.

Mr. LISTER. My hon. friend has called the attention of the House to the case of post office railway mail clerks in his riding. I desire to avail myself of this opportunity to call the attention of the House to similar conduct on the part of other officers of the late Government. It appears to me that these leaves of absence granted to officials of the various departments just prior to the last elections were very general indeed. In my town there is an officer in the customs who was appointed railway mail clerk. It was found for some reason or other that he was not able to perform the duties of that service, either because he was unable to pass the examination, or because he was too old for that service. Not being able to remain in the service for which he was appointed, the post office, he was changed, on the recommendation of the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), in whose constituency he was a resident, to the Customs Department in my own town. Now, Sir, strange to say, after the late Parliament had expired, this gentleman, who had been an active politician in the county of Haldimand, not only at one election, but at several elections, and who had been appointed to the position by my hon. friend the late Controller of Customs (Mr. Wood), I believe, upon the recommendation, no doubt, of the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague)—strange to say, after the House had come to an end on the 28th of April, 1896, the then Controller of Customs, the Hon. Mr. Wood, by telegram gave this man three weeks' leave of absence, and on the 20th of May, 1896, he gave him a further leave of absence of one week. Now, instead of going away to enjoy himself upon a trip, which one would infer the leave of absence was intended for, this man went to the county of Haldimand and spent the whole of that time, and more too, in most offensive work there for the Conservative candidate in that county. The information that I have is that, during these two periods of his leave of absence, he went through the county, making speeches and canvassing for the Conservative candidate. My information, furthermore, is that, in prosecuting that canvass, he was offensive to a degree. I desire to call the attention of the department and of the House to this fact, because it seems to me that it was an organized piece of business that the heads of the departments should grant leave of absence to their officers, wherever it was found that these officers could render service to the political party then in power. I appeal in this case, as well as in the case my hon. friend (Mr. Cameron) has mentioned, that not only the Government is to blame, but that the officers who sought for and obtained leave of absence for the purpose I have mentioned, should not be continued in the public service of this country.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). There is no objection to the motion being adopted. I am sure my hon. friend from West Huron (Mr. Cameron) would not desire me to say now how, on an investigation, the judgment of the Government ought to be. A charge has been made against Mr. Austin, who is mentioned in this notice of motion. That charge will be duly investigated, and, so far as I have to do with it, I shall endeavour to do justice in the premises. I may say, generally, Mr. Speaker, that very many complaints have been lodged with me of a similar character, but, in consequence of their delicate nature, rather than arrive at a hasty decision during the pressure of sessional work, I have thought it wiser and fairer to take ample time so that I might do no injustice to the accused. I tell my hon. friends that, when the time admits, every charge will be thoroughly investigated.

Mr. FOSTER. This reminds me to ask my hon. friend (Mr. Mulock) when he will lay on the Table of the House the papers on which he based the discussion of Friday with reference to the Cape Breton mail service?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman, perhaps, heard me state yesterday that immediately, in fact on Friday evening, I gave instructions to the Deputy to prepare them. On leaving the House yesterday, I renewed these instructions to the Deputy. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) is more familiar with the method of keeping the records in the archives, and he will understand it when I say that the Deputy told me that these papers were in the vault, and he could not get them on Friday night. He told me yesterday that on Saturday he had given them out to a copyist, that the file was now in the hands of a copyist outside the building, and he hoped on to-morrow or next day to bring the copies to be compared. My hon. friend need not feel at all alarmed about there being any delay in the matter.

Mr. FOSTER. Did the hon. gentleman say he had employed copyists outside the department?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am not employing any one outside the department. The Deputy Minister told me they were being copied by a person outside the department. I did not understand that he meant a person not in the service of the department, and I did not ask him particularly. I do not know whether the person whose name he mentioned is an official or not, but I will give the hon. gentleman that information, too, if he desires it.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I would like to know from the Government what they are going to do with the postmasters who prostituted their positions at the last elections to serve the Tory party. Some of these men spent their whole time receiving Tory literature and newspapers, and distributed them from door to door by giving these papers to young men who went into the post office, and who carried these dirty sheets into the houses of the people.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member will see that, if the discussion pursues this line, we will never come to a decision on the particular question before the House. The point raised by the hon. gentleman must be brought forward in some more general way. The debate, certainly, has taken a wider range than it should. This is a specific motion with reference to one particular clerk, and I do not think a general discussion on the whole post office service would be at all in order.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. You are right, Mr. Speaker, and I bow to your ruling, but—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair.

Mr. SPEAKER. I admit that some remarks have been made outside of this motion, and that was the reason, no doubt, why the hon. member made the point.

The PRIME MINISTER. I have no hesitation in answering the question of my hon. friend (Mr. Choquette) and in saying that any one who has distributed dirty sheets, is an offensive partisan.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I wish to put just one question to the Prime Minister.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I presume the hon. gentleman (Mr. Choquette) is going to ask a question of the Prime Minister with reference to the statement that has been made. The hon. gentleman has a perfect right to ask a question.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I should like to know from the Premier if we will be obliged to have an investigation in these cases, or will the written declaration of the member elected, or of the candidate, be sufficient to cut the heads off these Tory postmasters?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I should like an answer to my question, and, if I do not get it, I will bring the matter up again.

MAIL CLERK DALTON.

Mr. CAMERON moved for :

1. A copy of all correspondence between the Postmaster General and the Inspector of the London Division, respecting leave of absence obtained by one Dalton, a mail clerk, during the months of January and June, 1896, and of all applications made for such leave of absence and replies thereto.

2. A statement showing the number of days the said Dalton was absent from his duties in the months of January and June, 1896, and reasons for such absence.

He said : I do not propose to make any observations on this motion, further than to say that the young man Dalton, whose name is mentioned in the resolution, was appointed at the same time and under similar circumstances as the man Austin, and he engaged in precisely the same work that is in my judgment, scandalous political canvassing during the by-election in January, and the general election in June. I may say to the Postmaster General that I did not ask him to dismiss these men without an investigation, nor do I ask him now. All I ask him to do is to write to these men and tell them that charges of such and such a nature are preferred against them, and ask them if the charges are true. If they answer that the charges are true, the duty of the hon. Postmaster General will be a very simple one. If they deny the charges, then the responsibility must rest on the Postmaster General as to what steps he shall take. All I ask is that he shall take steps to deal with these men in the most effectual way he can.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. There is no objection to the order being made. Nothing that I said was intended to imply that my hon. friend from West Huron (Mr. Cameron) desired anything so unfair as a judgment without a trial. His whole request was that the accused should be called upon, and that the charges should be fairly investigated.

Motion agreed to.

THE CHANGE OF GOVERNMENT.

Mr. CHOQUETTE moved for :

Copies of all reports passed by the Treasury Board and of all Orders in Council submitted to His Excellency between the 23rd of June and the 8th of July last.

Mr. HAGGART. I made a motion similar to this, and I would ask the hon. leader of the Government when copies of these Orders in Council will be down?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The order has already been largely complied with. I placed the papers unofficially in the hands of Sir Charles Tupper yesterday, and I hope to-day to lay them before the House.

Motion agreed to.

BATTLEFORD INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL.

Mr. RICHARDSON moved for :

Copies of all correspondence bearing on the subject of the confinement in a close cell of an Indian boy at the Battleford Industrial School which was alleged to have caused the boy's death.

He said : I may say that some uneasy rumours have been in existence in the Battleford district with regard to the death of this boy. The country has expended a very large amount of money on these industrial schools, and I think it would be in the public interest that the House should learn all the facts connected with this circumstance ; and if it should be found that no blame can be attached to the officials of the school, there will be general cause for satisfaction. It is with this object that I make this motion.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Can my hon. friend give me an idea of the time the death of the boy is alleged to have occurred ?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I could not state the time very accurately. I was assured that the death of the boy had occurred in consequence of negligence. I neglected to ask about the time, but I could get the information for the hon. Premier to-morrow.

Motion agreed to.

THE MINING INTERESTS OF CANADA.

Mr. BOSTOCK moved :

That, in the opinion of this House, it will be in the interest of immigration, and the development of the Dominion, that the Government should collect through the Department of Agriculture all the information possible with respect to the mining interests of British Columbia, and the other provinces of the Dominion, and distribute it.

He said : Mr. Speaker, I would like to say, before I discuss this question, that I was not aware, at the time I drew up this motion, that there were certain statistics published by the Geological Department at the present time ; and, in making the motion, I do not wish to be understood as pressing for the compilation of these statistics by any particular department. But the hon. members of this House must recognize that at the present time a large mineral development is going on in British Columbia, especially in that part of the province which I have the honour to represent. It is of great importance, not only to the settlers and the miners in the province, but to the rest of the people of this Dominion who are taking an interest in the development of that country, that there should be reliable statistical information brought up to date as to what is being done. Not only in the Kootenay country, including East and West Kootenay, but also in the Boundary Creek country, in Okanagan, in Lillooet and in

Mr. LAURIER.

Cariboo, a large amount of mining development is in progress. We have had returns from the Kootenay country which will before very long call the attention of investors and other people to what is going on there. I would like to read a few statistics showing the output of the West Kootenay country within the last few months.

Unfortunately, owing to the lack of statistics I am only able to give a few figures with regard to the output of that country, and I cannot say what has been done in the other parts of the constituency, but I have here some figures which show that for the year ending 30th June, 1896, the output from West Kootenay, which went out by the way of Nelson, was as follows :—

30,673 ounces of gold.....	= $ 552,135
1,459,629 ounces of silver....	= 969,215
11,647 tons of copper.....	= 129,250
6,020 tons of lead.....	= 220,849

$1,871,449

Making a total value of ore sent out through the customs at Nelson of $1,871,449, to which must be added what is estimated to have gone out by way of Revelstoke, 6,410 tons, value at $100 per ton, or a grand total of $2,512,449. That is up to the 30th June of this year, and it shows a very considerable increase over the year 1894, which is the latest year of which I have been able to obtain any statistics. The figures given in the report of mineral statistics and mines only bring the matter up to 1894, and they show that the output of the camps of British Columbia for 1894 was $456,000 of gold, and the value of silver amounted to $470,219, or 746,379 oz. You will see, Mr. Speaker, by those figures, that we have had a great increase in the output of the mineral produce of British Columbia, and everything shows that we are going to have a much larger increase. I would like to read an extract from a report made by one of Bradstreet's men, who was through that country a short time ago. He reports as follows :—

The engineer of one of the largest smelting companies in the United States has reported that the Rossland Camp alone will produce after the 1st October this year 1,000 tons a day, or 365,000 tons per annum, amounting in value to about $7,000,000 or $8,000,000 a year. And the Slocan and Ainsworth Camps should produce 50,000 tons, or $5,000,000.

According to this report, which we must take as a reliable statement coming from the source it does, we are justified in looking forward to a great development in that country, which is going to attract an enormous increase of population, who will make their living in the country, and also attract the attention of capitalists throughout the world to a field of investment to which they have not had the opportunity of turning their attention before. We have also in the Kootenay country enormous fields of coal which require development, and which only wait the attention of capitalists to yield the most profitable results. We find that the mining business in West Kootenay has been most profitable to the men who have been engaged in it up to the present. The returns, so far as I have been able to collect them, from the principal mines in that country, show that the War Eagle, one of the best known mines in the Rossland Camp, has paid up to June, 1895, $82,500 on a capital of $500,000, and the Le Roi, another large mine in that district, has paid a total of $200,000 of dividends up to date. The Slocan Star, in the Slocan country, which is a silver mine, has paid a total of $300,000. These figures show the amount of business being done in that country, and the large field which exists there for investment. It is only natural that we should have at present a number of companies floated in the eastern provinces for the purpose of interesting investors in the mining development that is now going on, and we find that some of these companies are being put upon the market in eastern Canada in a very loose and unsatisfactory manner. It will be a great drawback and disadvantage to our province if some steps are not taken to check the indiscriminate floating of such companies, in which the prospectuses issued are most unsatisfactory and contain exceedingly misleading statements. From the way such prospectuses are drawn up, they would appear to be drawn up solely for the purpose of misleading the investing public. I have here a prospectus, which has been published in one of the papers in the east, the prospectus of mines called the "Nest Egg" and "Palo Alto." In that prospectus, the names of leading men in the province of British Columbia are printed as being connected with these mines, but after it was brought out in Toronto, one of the gentlemen whose names appear on the prospectus, wrote that he had nothing to do with it. It will be interesting to the House if I read one or two of the replies given by gentlemen whose names are mentioned in this prospectus, as being connected with these mines. Mr. Turner, the Premier of British Columbia, telegraphed as follows:—

I know nothing about the prospectus of the Nest Egg and Palo Alto. I do not guarantee any statements made by Geo. A. Case. He has no authority to act for me.

Mr. Turner is one of the gentlemen whose names appear as being interested in the Nest Egg, and, of course, being Premier of British Columbia, his name would naturally tend to make investors in the east think that the property was a good one. Mr. E. V. Bodwell, a leading lawyer in Victoria, telegraphed:—

I am not in any way responsible for the prospectus of the Palo Alto or Nest Egg mines. I do not know what statements they contain. I do not know Mr. Case and he does not represent me. I own some shares in the Palo Alto, but have no interest whatever in the Nest Egg. No one has any authority to deal with my name in connection with either the Nest Egg or Palo Alto.

Lieutenant-Governor Dewdney's name—the present Lieutenant-Governor of British Columbia—was also mentioned in this prospectus. He was in England when the prospectus was brought out, but Mrs. Dewdney telegraphed that the Lieutenant-Governor was not in any way responsible for the statements made in that prospectus. This is a very good specimen of the way in which these prospectuses are being got up and the use that is being made at the present time of the names of leading men in the province for the purpose of getting investors in the east, who cannot learn a great deal of the development of that country, to put their money into these concerns. I hope the Government will see their way to taking hold of this matter and that they will be able to introduce some legislation that will prevent prospectuses of this kind being placed upon the market and that they will hold those interested in getting up these companies responsible to the public generally for the statements that they make in these prospectuses, that these statements are true. A leading newspaper in Rossland, speaking about these foreign companies, says:

Especially some provision should be inserted in the Act which will prevent foreign companies from disposing of their holdings without consulting their shareholders and even in opposition to their wishes.

I may say that that paragraph has reference more especially to one company that was organized and floated under the laws of the state of Washington whose directors were enabled to entirely override the wishes of the shareholders, and disposed of the mine in a way that was a great detriment to the shareholders and a great damage to the camp generally. Now in the province of British Columbia we are very anxious to see foreign capital brought into the country, and we recognize the undesirable character of some of these companies that are now being floated on the market of the east. If this sort of thing is allowed to continue and the investors lose their money, it will be a great setback to the development of mining in British Columbia, and we shall have to suffer the consequences. I hope that the information that can be collected through the Geological Survey will be brought up to a later date than it is at the present time, and that, if possible, the staff now engaged in the department in compiling the statistics may be increased, so that more reliable information may be brought forward and placed before the public. I move this motion feeling confident that some steps will be taken by the Government to assist us in this matter.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Mr. Speaker, the House, I am sure has listened with very great interest to the remarks of my hon. friend from Yale and Cariboo (Mr. Bostock). The present condition of mining development in British Columbia, I may say without exaggeration, is the hope of this country. We all look to British Columbia as being the province of all the provinces which is to attract immigration from abroad, as we know that gold discoveries have always proven the greatest attraction to immigrants in all parts of the world. The motion of my hon. friend, as I understand him, contains two points. First he declares the desirability of making the mining wealth of British Columbia well known not only throughout this continent, but throughout the world. My hon. friend is aware, and, in fact, he has adverted to it, that at the present time the Geological Survey is doing valuable service in that direction. One of the functions at present devolving upon the Geological Department of Government is to collect and to publish as soon as may be after the close of the calendar year, full statistics of the mineral production and of the mining and metallurgical industry of Canada; to study the facts relating to water supply, both for irrigation and for domestic purposes, and to collect and preserve all available records of artesian or other wells, and of mines and mining works in Canada. This duty is now well attended to; and I was glad, I am sure, as was every member of the House, to hear my hon. friend state that the gentleman now in charge of the Geological Department, Dr. Dawson, is a most valuable officer. I am sure we may all rely that in his guidance of his department Dr. Dawson will take all necessary steps to meet the views of my hon. friend. I am informed that at the present time the department is making special effort to distribute information on the subject of these mines all over the different provinces of the Dominion. I cannot speak particularly of what he has done in other provinces, but I can speak from information received as to what he has done in the city of Montreal. He has distributed collections to the following institutions:—Polytechnic School; Righteous Order of Sacred Heart; McGill College; High School; Montreal College; St. Mary's College; Sisters of Congregation of Notre Dame; Mount St. Mary's Institute for Deaf Mutes, Mile End; Sisters of Congregation of Notre Dame, St. Jean Baptiste; St. Laurent College; Deaf and Dumb Institute, St. Denis Street; Montreal College of Pharmacy; Department of Agriculture and Public Works; Industrial School; Mount St. Louis Academy; Montreal Jail; Panet Street School; Convent Museum, St. Laurent; Monument Nationale; Ville Marie Convent, Notre Dame de Grace; Mother House; Congregation of Notre Dame; Our Lady of Good Counsel. If more is to be done than is done at the present time, I am sure we may rely upon the effort of Dr. Dawson to meet the important requirements of the mining development of British Columbia. But the most important part of the remarks made by my hon. friend were those referring to the efforts of speculators to place upon the market bogus schemes and spurious organizations. This is an unimportant feature. It is not new; the same thing has been experienced, I suppose, in every mining country in the world. Similar attempts were made in Australia and California. I do not know at present whether the law is adequate or is not adequate to meet this growing evil. This is a matter which must lie more directly within the scope of the Department of Justice. All I can say at the present time is that the Government will ask the Minister of Justice and his department to ascertain whether or not the law is adequate to meet such spurious schemes as these which have been brought to the attention of the House by my hon. friend. If the issuing of such bogus prospectuses cannot be prevented, if the law of the land is not adequate to meet offenders of this kind, the law of the land is deficient and must be amended. I would say that if the officers of the Department of Justice report to the Government that the present law is not adequate to reach such offenders, then, next session, the Government will consider it its duty to have the criminal law amended so as to bring such offenders within the law and thus prevent, as far as possible, repetition of the offences. My hon. friend is aware that nothing tends so much to injure the growing interests of British Columbia as the investment of sound money in such bogus enterprises. All I have to say to my hon. friend at present is that the Government will deem it their duty to have this subject properly investigated in order to see whether legislation is demanded in this direction. In the meantime I hope my hon. friend will not press his motion.

Mr. LAURIER.

Mr. SPROULE. I am glad to see that the hon. gentleman's attention has been drawn to this subject by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Bostock), because I think it has occurred to a great many people, both in the House and out of it, that while there are many valuable mines being developed there to-day, there is reason to believe that a number of bogus schemes are being placed on the market, for which money is being got out of people who cannot afford to part with it without getting something in return. It seems to me, from reading the Toronto and Montreal papers, and papers in other parts of the country, that a special effort is being made to boom these mining schemes by every species of advertising, that will finally result in doing injury to that line of business, as the boom did that which formerly occurred in Winnipeg and Manitoba in real estate. Mining claims which is taking place there, will follow the same course, and be somewhat of the same character. Now, while it is very desirable to develop these mines as rapidly as possible, it is also desirable to prevent people from placing before the world schemes that can only result in taking money from the people fraudulently, for which they are not likely to get anything in return.

Mr. TISDALE. I think probably that if hon. gentlemen who are troubling themselves so much about this matter, were a little more conversant with the broad nature of our criminal law, they would find in it plenty of provisions that would answer their purpose. I do not know whether it is one of the duties of the legislature to take charge of special interests, or to prevent the advertisement of particular interests. The proposition covered by the notice is one that involves very broad questions, and I think it arises from want of knowledge of the present criminal law which, in Ontario, at all events, is very wide with regard to frauds or attempted frauds, in any way, shape or manner, by false representations or anything of that sort. I think if the hon. gentlemen who are anxious about this matter, would look into our criminal law they would find that an extension of that legislation along certain lines would cover any cases that it does not now cover. I may say that when our criminal law was lately codified, and had the advantage of the legal talent of both sides of the House, all these matters were very carefully considered. I do not believe in bogus advertising, or bogus companies, or bogus notices; but I think that if hon. gentlemen will examine our law as it exists at present, they will find that it would be pretty difficult, without making the remedy worse than the disease, to make the law any more efficient or any broader than it is at present; and they will find that there is no particular necessity of attempting to enlarge our criminal law upon these lines.

Mr. PRIOR. I was unfortunately called out of the House just before the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Bostock) brought this motion up; but judging from the remarks which fell from the leader of the Government, I presume that the hon. member for Yale said something about bogus companies in British Columbia. Now, the hon. gentleman is member for a district which includes, there is no doubt about it, the richest mining country in the world to-day, that is Kootenay; and I would say of the hon. gentleman that I believe he knows the district as well as any man in British Columbia, for he has spent a great deal of his time there, and I know he has seen almost every mining property there to-day. Now, I know perfectly well that there are some men at the present time who are placing schemes on the market that, to say the least of it, do not give much encouragement for a man who knows much about mining. But at the same time, I will say that I think the very large majority of the mining schemes that are placed on the market to-day in British Columbia are bona fide speculations. Everybody who knows anything about mining, knows that from first to last it is a speculation; and no man, unless he has sufficient capital to warrant him in going into the business, has a right, from a business point of view, to put his money into a mine. I speak from knowledge, because I was brought up as a mining engineer, and I know more about it than the majority of people. But I will say this, that I believe there is no mining country in the world that shows the same satisfactory evidence of rich deposits as British Columbia to-day, especially the Kootenay district. But if men deliberately go and speculate in companies when they know nothing about mining, and know nothing about the companies, know nothing about the men who are at the head of those companies, it serves them right if they lose. I should advise any man in this country, or any other country, before he puts his money into a mining speculation, to find out for himself who the men are who have put it on the market, and who are interested in the management of the mines. If he does this and finds that the men who have the management of these schemes are men of standing, men of integrity, men of experience, and if he wants to have, as they say, a flutter with a little money, he may do so. But he is very foolish indeed if he puts his money into them without ascertaining who has the management. I am very glad indeed that the hon. member for Yale has brought this matter up, because since I have been here in Ottawa, since June last, I have seen that a great deal of interest is taken in Montreal and Toronto and elsewhere in British Columbia mines. I should be very sorry, indeed, not so much for the speculators themselves as for the name and credit of British Columbia, if men in the eastern portions of this Dominion were to put large sums of money into these mines, and find out afterwards that they had been fooled. But if they make a proper selection, they can invest their money with a fine chance of making large returns.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). The hon. member for Yale has brought an important matter to the attention of the House. As he says, we have great natural and undeveloped resources in British Columbia, and it is in the interest of Canada at large that those resources should be made known. It is, therefore, doubtless the duty of the Government to endeavour, as far as possible, to make those resources known in order to bring about their development. Now, that being the case, he goes on to say that the system now pursued will operate to the prejudice of the development of those mines because companies are being incorporated, not for the purpose of developing the mines, but rather for the purpose of enabling speculators to deal in stocks to the prejudice of the development of the mines, and consequently to the prejudice of the development of the country. The hon. gentleman suggests a remedy for that difficulty. Take the case of mining companies; there are two points to be considered. First, these mining companies are incorporated, not under the laws of Canada, but according to the laws of the adjoining states of the United States. Being incorporated there they offer no such guarantee as is offered by companies incorporated under the laws of this country, and therefore it is said if those companies are incorporated in the United States, the reason for their incorporation there is that our laws are not intended to meet such cases and would not permit certain transactions to be carried out as may be carried out under the laws of the adjoining states. Under the incorporation laws of the United States, you may issue a certain amount of stock, and that stock may be sold at 10 cents on the dollar. That cannot be done here, where, when such stock is issued, a shareholder is liable for the full amount of the stock. We should amend our laws to meet exigencies of that sort. We should inquire into the condition of the United States laws which have been framed and subsequently developed by experience acquired among the people there. We ought to take the laws of the United States in their present condition and examine them, and see how far we could incorporate their provisions into our own statutes. But we are met with this difficulty, as to how far this Parliament can deal with questions that affect property and civil rights, which are under provincial jurisdiction. That is a difficulty which I refer to, but which I do not now discuss. Again, there is another difficulty. These companies are issuing prospectuses which contain false statements of facts, such as that certain gentlemen occupying prominent positions and whose names are a guarantee of responsibility are connected with the companies, when in reality they have no connection with them. There is a difficulty here. Those prospectuses are issued broadcast throughout Canada; they are issued here and go to Quebec and beyond the Atlantic to London. The investor reads them. He looks at the prospectus, and sees the names of our public men connected with these enterprises. This is an inducement for investors to invest their money in these enterprises. It is true, as the ex-Minister of Militia (Mr. Tisdale), has stated, that our criminal code would meet such a case. I am strongly of the opinion, without stating anything definite, that there is doubt about that point. The border line between false representation, involving false inducement to enter into a bargain of this sort, and a warranty is very shadowy and very hard to define; and therefore I say it is very doubtful if the criminal code would reach such a case. Suppose it did reach it after considerable difficulty, does this House not think that it would be rather a precarious remedy in the hands of an investor to which he might have recourse, for example, an investor in England, to endeavour to remedy an evil of that sort. It seems to me we should provide a remedy. To put the matter in a nutshell: In the first place, it is important to know how far this House might introduce legislation affecting the incorporation of these companies and so meet the conditions existing in the mining country of British Columbia, which do not exist in the case of ordinary commercial enterprises; in the second place, supposing that to be beyond our power to deal with, if it is a matter for the province of British Columbia to deal with, and if the province does not act, should there not be general legislation introduced here into our criminal code such as would enable us to deal with this class of cases. These are points to be dealt with as regards legislation, and as they have been brought up they may be considered; and no doubt between this and the next session the people of British Columbia, who are primarily interested and who could easily remedy the evil, because there can be no doubt as to their right to legislate in regard to it, might amend their local laws; and if they did not act in that direction, then it might be possible for this Dominion Parliament to take action.

Mr. DYMMENT. I merely rise to say that I thoroughly concur in all that has been said by the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo (Mr. Bostock), and if I might presume to give the Minister of Agriculture some information, I would inform him that if he decides to gather these facts that will be of value to the people of this country, he can obtain as valuable information in the district of Algoma as in any part of the Dominion. I desire to enter my protest very strongly against the tendency that has been shown by hon. members who have debated this question to look to British Columbia and pass over Ontario, and that portion of the district which I have the honour to represent, the Seine River and Rainy River districts which do not take a back seat even to British Columbia in regard to mineral wealth. We have a grand country there, and I think the time is opportune to make an investigation and gather all the information possible, and distribute it throughout the country.

Mr. CASEY. I think the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo (Mr. Bostock), and also the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dymment), have done good service in bringing this matter before the attention of the House. The hon. Solicitor General has made some very thoughtful remarks in regard to amendments of the law; but possibly, pending the amendments of the law, the best way to protect a man against being cheated is the publication of all possible information. In Ontario we have a Bureau of Mines, especially charged with the duty as regards mining, and which gives very valuable information respecting the mines in Algoma and elsewhere. I would urge that even if it were necessary to create a new department of that kind here for the purpose of giving information regarding mines, in cases where the province does not attend to it, it might be well, both as regards the interests of Canada and those of foreign investors, that such a department should be established. Foreign investors would be more likely to write to headquarters at Ottawa for information regarding Canadian mines than elsewhere, and I believe this information could be well obtained through the existing department of the Geological Survey. I throw out the suggestion as to whether the collection of these details might not be carried out by the Geological Survey, rather than by the Department of Agriculture. That survey has, of course, devoted its attention to ascertaining what deposits of minerals are in the country. I do not know whether it could properly take any notice of commercial transactions concerning them. It might be necessary to create another department like the Bureau of Mines in Ontario, which would not only take account of the deposits of ore, but of the efforts made to develop them. The kind of information we require is: (1) Facts in regard to the deposits; (2) information from the mine-owners, not given on the authority of the Government necessarily, but given under oath or in some authentic way, of the steps they have taken to develop their properties. I would ask the Government to consider under what department this information might be properly collected and supplied. I may say that the Geological Survey has of late years been largely engaged in Nova Scotia in exploring and mapping out private properties such as coal mines, and I do not know why that benefit should not be extended to mines of other minerals in different parts of Canada.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Mr. Speaker. I am in full sympathy with the remarks that have been made on this matter, for I believe that in no country in the world of the same size is there so great mineral wealth as in Canada. In Nova Scotia we do a little to spread information about our minerals, but at the present time it is somewhat difficult to obtain reliable information generally in the Dominion of Canada. There should be some central place where a man from abroad could obtain proper information, not only as to the quantity, but as to the character of the minerals in a certain district. We do not want in this country a repetition of the same senseless excitement as they had in the United States in regard to their minerals. I am glad to see that the people of British Columbia are taking a more sensible view of the matter than did the people of Nevada and California, where fortunes were made at the expense of others. I am glad that the people of California are standing on the merits of their country, and that alone. The suggestion that there should be some bureau established in which reliable information could be obtained by investors, is well worthy the attention of the Government. As our mineral wealth is, next to our agricultural wealth, the greatest in the Dominion, I think that the Government might very well undertake an expenditure with this object in view. I do not know what is the case in other provinces, but in the province of Nova Scotia the royalty obtained from minerals is a great factor in carrying on our local business, and it would seem to me that the provinces might co-operate with the Dominion in carrying out this project. There may be men in Ontario, Quebec or Nova Scotia who wish to obtain reliable information about the minerals in British Columbia, and it seems to me there should be a central place where they could obtain that information. The development of our mineral resources is a real and tangible thing, and it would be much more sensible to spend money in developing them, than to expend it in trying to promote some hot-bed industries in this country. I believe that we have more mineral wealth than the American republic has, and that means, of course, more than any part of the world. We are only now beginning to realize our vast resources in this respect, and I am sure that the Government, in proposing any scheme to develop these resources, will meet with assistance from hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House. I believe that the day will come when our whole country north, as far as we can go—and Canadians can go further north and live and thrive better there than any other people—will be found to be an inexhaustible bed of mineral wealth. I agree with the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) that the thanks of the House are due to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bostock) who has brought this matter up. A wise expenditure by the Government in the direction indicated by the motion, would, I believe, be of great and lasting service to Canada, and would be productive of the best results.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). Before the motion is carried, I would like to say a few words in reply to that portion of it which seems to belong to my department. In the statistical branch of the Department of Agriculture there is a great mass of information in connection with the mining industries as well as with other industries of Canada. It is not an infrequent thing for people from abroad to write to the Dominion statistician to obtain information, and I can assure the hon. member from British Columbia (Mr. Bostock) and other gentlemen who have spoken in this respect, that the statistician is very able and very willing to give all the information at his command in regard to this, as to other matters of interest to investors. The mining question, however, is largely one of a purely scientific nature, and that part of it, as is well known, is dealt with by the Geological Survey. The Geological Survey is possessed of immense information in regard to the mining and mineral wealth of this country, and although the details may be more scientific than are wanted by investors or practical miners, I am satisfied, if they would go to the bureau of the survey, they would find a good deal of information of a practical, as well as of a scientific nature to assist them. I am quite sure that any information that is within the reach of the statistical branch of the Department of Agriculture, will be gladly placed at the disposal of anybody inquiring for it; and, what is more, I think I may say that the attention of the statistician could be particularly directed to the mining development of the country for some little time to come, so that greater details of such information might be given to those who need it.

Mr. MORRISON. The hon. member for Yale (Mr. Bostock), who has introduced this matter to the attention of the House, has dealt with the subject very exhaustively indeed, and has given a lot of very valuable information; information which, I think, not only this House, but the greater number of the people of this country have been sadly in need of. The hon. the Minister of Agriculture has stated that abundant information may be had from the reports of the Geological Survey, and that they contain a great deal of information with regard to our mines. With all due deference to the hon. Minister, I submit that the departments ought to be more aggressive in the future than they have been heretofore, and ought not to rest satisfied with gathering information and retaining it within the four walls of the archives. They ought to take steps to disseminate that information, in the same manner as is done by the province of British Columbia. I have in my hand a report of the provincial mineralogist of British Columbia, Mr. Carlyle, in which he gives a very exhaustive account of the mineral resources of the Trail Creek mining district. In that report, which the government of British Columbia has circulated very liberally, there is reliable information, and information which, I find, is being sought through every medium, apparently, but the right one. Probably those seeking that information may not be aware that the province of British Columbia has been as enterprising as it has in respect to its mineral resources. If the Dominion Government were to take the same means and adopt the same methods as have been adopted by the province of British Columbia. I think that a great deal of the difficulty which is apprehended in respect to the investment of capital in British Columbia would be obviated. Now, I submit that the danger, which is very imminent, in connection with the investment of money in these mines in British Columbia, does not lie in the province of

Mr. FISHER.

British Columbia, but rather without it. The danger, especially to small investors, lies very largely in this great province of Ontario, as is shown by the extracts which have been read by the hon. member for Cariboo from the Toronto "Globe" and the Toronto "Mail and Empire." Within the last few months these papers have contained most glaring advertisements of various schemes, some of them legitimate, others illegitimate; and I am led to infer, from what the hon. member for Cariboo says, that people foisting those schemes on the public have committed acts bordering on crime. If this Government took steps, and immediate steps, to spread broadcast the information which they may have in their bureau, they would do a great measure of justice to their own country and also protect outside investors. Because, after all, we are not yet independent of investors without our own Dominion. We must cater to them, and offer to them every facility and at the same time every safeguard. I wish to emphasize what I stated before, that the danger to investors does not lie in the province of British Columbia. So far as the province of British Columbia is concerned, I think it furnishes every safeguard that it could be expected to furnish under the circumstances. The Government of that province affords sufficient protection to life and property within the province. Its school system is one of the best in the Dominion of Canada, if not on the continent of America; and this is an important consideration, because, after all, one of the objects of a government in assisting to develop the mining resources or any other resources of a country is to attract a desirable class of settlers; and one of the first things that influences an intelligent settler is the school system. I say, then, so far as that is concerned, that our school system is a very excellent one. The officers appointed to enforce law and order are tried and competent men. So I might go through all the elements which one wishing to invest in the country, and to settle there, would ultimately look for, to show that every safeguard is afforded to people coming to the province of British Columbia to invest their money and to reside there. So that it is quite obvious that the onus lies on this Government to take steps, and immediate steps, to further this great industry—an industry that is bound to be, if it is not now, the greatest in the Dominion of Canada; an industry to which the Dominion of Canada must look for a great deal of its prosperity and advancement, and we ought to leave no stone unturned to furnish the fullest information respecting that industry. I did not intend addressing the House on this matter, to supplement the valuable information which has been given by the hon. member for Cariboo. I rose simply because I felt an apprehension that there might be some misconstruction put upon the remarks made by the hon. member for Cariboo and some of the other hon. members when they emphasized the danger existing from these wild-cat schemes. I feared that some of the hon. members of this House, and some people outside of the House, might be led to infer that the danger lay within the province, whereas it really lies outside. I would humbly suggest that if there is any information in any of the departments with regard to these mines or any other mines, immediate steps be taken to distribute that information, and that the method followed by the province of British Columbia be adopted, of getting out a report and having it sent to various centres and to all who may be interested in the mining development of that province. I would again refer to the report of Mr. Carlyle, the provincial mineralogist of British Columbia; and I think it would repay every member of this House, and any person who has any idea of investing in British Columbia or removing there, to read that report. The information contained in it is most reliable, compiled as it is by one who has absolutely no selfish ulterior interests to serve in its compilation.

Mr. BOSTOCK. After the assurance of the hon. leader of the Government, I would, with the permission of the House, withdraw the motion.

Motion withdrawn.

VOLUNTEERS OF 1837-38.

Mr. BRODER moved :

That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that some suitable recognition should be made by the Government to the volunteers of 1837-1838 for the valuable services they rendered in defence of their country at that time.

He said: I am quite aware that this matter has been brought to the attention of the House on different occasions, but as nothing has yet been done, I must ask the indulgence of the House while I attempt to say something which may lead the House to make some suitable recognition of the services rendered by the volunteers of 1837-38. I wish to say, at the outset, that there is no desire on my part to say anything which may bring up unpleasant recollections of the past. Whatever may be said, on either side, as to the merits or demerits of the contending parties in 1837-38, we can say this, that the men who went out to defend their country in those days should have some recognition at the hands of the people. If these men had halted at the threshold of our country's needs to discuss whether or not they were wrong or whether or not those opposed to them were in the wrong, this country would not be a British colony to-day. We have to recognize this fact, that those who were actively engaged in the aggressive movement against the constituted authorities of this country, at that time, did afterwards, in their older and more mature years, give strong expression to the sentiment that their success would have been a calamity to Canada. I am glad to be able to acknowledge that many of the men who were then in the aggressive movement afterwards filled high positions in our official life and did good service for their country, as has been recognized not only by those who sympathized with them in their early days, but also by those who opposed their views. And the value of their services in these later days was not only recognized by the Canadian people but by the home authorities as well. But while I am willing to give them all the credit they deserve, as regards their integrity and devotion to the interests of this country subsequently, I think that we ought not to lose sight of those men who left their homes and families and took their lives into their hands to defend our country. These men, too, are certainly entitled to some recognition at our hands. It is the duty of every man, not only to stand at the door of his home and defend his family, but when duty calls, to stand at the gate of his country and defend it against the invader. I feel that this country has been derelict in the discharge of its duty towards the men who filled the breach in these days of danger to our existence as a portion of the British Empire. Many of these men are still living and feel, as they go down the vale of life, more and more keenly the neglect of their country. I wish to say that many of the descendants of these men are to-day fighting the battle of life, sustaining their parents in their old age, who fought their country's battles. I am glad to say that there are not many of them in indigent circumstances, because they were made of the kind of stuff that will succeed anywhere. I do not put their claim on this ground. I put it on the higher ground that every man who stands up in the defence of his country has a right to some recognition. That is the principle which was acted on by this country in the near past, and on which England and the United States and all civilized countries are accustomed to act. I am quite aware that there are men in this House who express themselves as favourable to those in rebellion on the ground that by their agitation they precipitated the bringing about of responsible government; but that was not the object these men had in view. Their object was to sever this country from England and make it a republic. And in that object they do not deserve the credit which some people give them. In the life of the late Lyon Mackenzie, written by his own son-in-law, Mr. Lindsay, I find a letter written by Mr. Mackenzie to his son on the 5th March, after he had been in exile.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier).
What year?

Mr. BRODER. The year is not given, but it was about nine years after he had been in exile and incarcerated in the United States for breach of the neutrality laws. I think it was in 1846. On the 5th March, he wrote to his son in Albany :

You never can, never will, know what I have borne and suffered in many ways. Yet I am here, healthful and (somewhat) hopeful, though poor and within a week of fifty-two.

And he adds :

After what I have seen here, I frankly confess to you that had I passed nine years in the United States before, instead of after the outbreak, I am very sure I would have been the last man in America to be engaged in it.

In this letter he admits fairly that he had made the great mistake of his life, and in a subsequent letter he admits that the success of the movement which he was leading would have meant the ruin of this country. I shall read an extract to prove the position I take. Mr. Mackenzie says, in this other private letter, written about the year 1849 :

A course of general observation during the last eleven years has fully satisfied me, that had the violent movements in which I and many others were engaged on both sides of the Niagara, proved successful, it would have tended to injure the people of Canada, whom I then believed I was serving at great risks ; that it would have deprived millions, perhaps, of our own countrymen in Europe, of a home upon this continent, except upon conditions which, though many hundreds of thousands of immigrants have been constrained to accept them, are of an exceedingly onerous and degrading character.

As many hon. gentlemen are aware, there were formed during these times in some of the border cities of Michigan, Ohio and New York, organizations called Hunters' Lodges. The whole object of these bodies was to extend republican government on this continent. The men forming these organizations sympathized with the movement on this side of the line, and even gave it aid. I wish to read the obligation taken by members of these Hunters' Lodges, in order to show the tendency of the movement on the other side of the line, and on this side also, so far as it was sympathized in by these Hunters' Lodges. The city of Cleveland was the centre for these organizations, but there were lodges also, as I have said, in Michigan and New York. The following is a quotation from the obligation to which I referred :—

I swear to do my utmost to promote Republican institutions and ideas throughout the world -- to cherish them, to defend them ; and especially to devote myself to the propagation, protection, and defence of these institutions in North America.

It is an historical fact that these Hunters' Lodges sympathized with the movement here, and that Mackenzie was to some extent aware of their movements and had some hope of support from them, is asserted by his biographer, who is his own son-in-law. Now, whatever the results may have been, the objects sought by those who were engaged in the movement must be considered. There were constitutional means by which the reforms sought could have been brought about. None of us can endorse or sanction the appeal to force in order to bring about constitutional changes in the country. I wish to say that, while we recognize what has been done, whilst we are willing to forget all distinctions of the past, and what was done in the hopefulness and enthusiasm of youth, while we may sympathize with the feelings of these men, we cannot but admire the men who fought to defend the institutions of this country. While we respect the feelings of the others, we cannot but feel the highest regard for those who sought to maintain the institutions under which we live. These men were pioneers who were engaged in hewing homes for themselves and their families out of the wilderness, and they left their all to take part in defending the institutions of their country. I contend that this Parliament should recognize in some tangible way the services rendered at that time by these men, and that a proposal to this effect should find a response in the heart of every hon. member of this House. I do not mean to discuss this question in the sense of reflecting upon any class of people in the country who were engaged in the movement which was opposed by the men of whom I speak. But the sense of justice and fair-play which pervades the people of Canada, irrespective of class or party, will own the merits of these men, and will desire to have it recognized in a suitable manner.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Before this motion is put, I desire to say a few words with regard to it. This is not the first time that this proposal has been brought under the attention of members of this House. I remember that eight or ten years ago a similar motion was presented. I entirely differ from those who favour this proposition and from the speech which was delivered by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Broder) who has just taken his seat. I am of opinion that, if any recognition is to be given to those who took part in the rebellion of 1837-38, that recognition should be given to the rebels. I contend, Mr. Speaker, that the rebels on that occasion rendered a great and lasting service to the people of this country. I contend that at that time the upper and lower provinces were ruled over by a tyrannical government, by whom injustice was done to the people of the country, and whose acts were worthy of condemnation by every man with the spirit of liberty in his bosom. I contend that there was no other course open to the rebels than the one which was pursued by them, and, therefore, that the rebellion was justifiable. That it was so was shown afterwards by the report that was made by Lord Durham, when he was sent out to this country to investigate the troubles. For these reasons, I am of opinion that this resolution should not carry. You have only to go to the grounds at the western end of this very building to find a monument erected to the memory of one of the chief rebels of that day—Sir George E. Cartier. What was the history of Cartier after this rebellion? He was taken into the councils of his country, and became a leader in the Conservative party. And, when he died, the Conservatives of this country erected a monument to his memory. If we are to enter upon this matter, we ought to take steps to remember and honour the men who secured for us responsible government, from which flowed the other liberties which we now possess. If I had my way, I would have a monument erected on the other side of this building to William Lyon Mackenzie, the leader of the rebels in Upper Canada. Even now, if we have a form of government in this country that was working, not in the interests of the people, but in the interests of a family compact, as the government of 1837 was, and if there was no other way open to the people to secure redress, than by a show of force, we should be justified in rebelling. If the British Government had treated the people of the United States properly, that country might have been a British colony to-day. I contend that this resolution should not meet with support from the members of this House.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Copies of all correspondence between the Department of Customs and private individuals, and all representations made by Boards of Trade throughout Canada, concerning the appointment of a Board of Commissioners or a judge for the settlement of disputes between the departments and individuals.—(Mr. Quinn.)

Return showing the subjects of all Minutes of Council passed by the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie and approved after his resignation in 1878, and before Sir John Macdonald took office, giving dates and all circumstances connected with such resignation; also showing the subject of all Minutes of Council passed by the Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell after he had resigned, and approved by His Excellency before Sir Charles Tupper took office, giving dates and all circumstances connected with such resignation.—(Mr. Belcourt.)

Copies of all petitions and other documents addressed to the Government asking that the eight-hour system be adopted in the public service.—(Mr. Quinn.)

After Recess.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 10) to confirm an agreement made between the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Gibson.)

Bill (No. 11) to revive and amend the Acts respecting the St. Clair and Erie Ship Canal Company.—(Mr. Tisdale.)

Bill (No. 12) to incorporate the Hudson's Bay and Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Oliver.)

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 19) respecting the Georgian Bay Canal and Power Aqueduct Company.—(Mr. Maclean.)

IN COMMITTEE.

Bill (No. 2) to amend the Dairy Products Act, 1893.—(Mr. McLennan, Glengarry.)

FAST ATLANTIC STEAMSHIP SERVICE.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I desire to call the attention of the Government to an important statement purporting to have been made by a member of the Government on a topic of interest to the whole country, and particularly to the section from which I come, and that is the proposed fast line of steamers from Quebec to England. In a report handed to me and to which my attention has been called, Mr. Dobell is reported as having made the following statement at a meeting held in Quebec the other day, as reported in "La Semaine Commerciale":

This meeting was of more than ordinary importance. The presence of a member of the Government gave rise to observations made on the question of the fast line of steamers, the bridge and other topics. Mr. Dobell stated that Quebec would not receive any advantage from the establishment of a fast line of steamers, as a line running 17 or 18 knots was sufficient for the needs of the country, and the fast line could only be useful to Quebec when other great enterprises shall have been accomplished, such as the Great Northern Railway, the bridge and the deepening of the canals.

I should like to ask the Government whether the hon. gentleman was authorized as a member of the Government to make that statement; and if so, whether he was then expressing the opinion of the Government on this important question.

Mr. DOBELL. I have no hesitation in replying to the hon. gentleman who has called my attention to the report of a meeting of the Quebec Board of Trade. I appeared there in my capacity as president of the board, and I spoke on the same lines as those I have followed for a great many years past. I have always called attention to the inadequacy of the passenger service that is now conducted between Quebec and Great Britain. The subsidy is too mean, it is not sufficient to maintain such a line of steamers as we should possess. At the same time I have always claimed that a 20-knot steamer is too costly, and that the wants of this country are more in the direction of having extra good accommodation, larger steamers, but at the same time the passage money, not more costly, that Canadians desire to cross the Atlantic with all the comfort that it is possible to give them, but they do not want to pay more than $75 or $80 for the passage. We have not people in this country who are prepared to pay £100, which was often paid from New York, and if we had 20-knot steamers from Quebec, I believe the enterprise would end in disappointment. I do not think there is any more danger in running a 20-knot line of steamers from Quebec than an 18-knot line, but I believe it would be too costly as compared with any advantage which this country would derive from it. It would involve an outlay of $750,000 a year. An 18-knot service—I have never said 17 or 18 knots, and I have always claimed that we should have 18 knots—could be performed from Quebec to Liverpool in the same time as a 20-knot service would perform the voyage from New York to Liverpool. The working of this line would cause a saving of about half the cost, we would have accommodation in the way of cold storage, and more capacity for general cargo. Besides, I believe that before long power will be applied to steamers in a more economical way than is the case to-day. I am told that 20-knot steamers from New York cost a very large sum in repairs, and that an 18-knot service suffers from far less friction and is performed with more comfort and ease than a 20-knot service. But I claim this, that we ought not to ignore or to treat lightly the offer that has been made by the British Government to assist us if we adopt the 20-knot service, but I have not seen any evidence yet that the British government would not be prepared to help us if we adopt an 18-knot service. My idea is that if the British government were approached they would be perfectly satisfied with an 18-knot service, if we could show them that it would be better for Canada and would be attended by about half the cost and give greater accommodation both to passengers and cargo than a 20-knot service. I may also state this to the House, that I have it on the authority of one of the heads of the Cunard service that nothing would tempt them to build another 20-knot steamer. I state that on the authority of a gentleman who is practically at the head of the Cunard service in Liverpool, the reason being that they find it too costly. I repeat, that I spoke at the Quebec Board of Trade in my capacity as president of that board. I believe this Government is acting wisely in not allowing itself to be forced to give a decision on the tenders submitted. Those tenders will be before the public ere long, and the people will see what reasons we had for not deciding hastily, for I believe that in a very short time we will be able to make a contract on much better terms. I think every indication points to that, and we shall, I believe, prove to the country that we have saved them a very large sum of money and that we are indebted to Mr. Chamberlain, too, for not having closed the late contract without the acquiescence of this present Parliament. I think, Sir, that on every hand we have to congratulate the country that we were not forced into accepting that tender, which was called a tender, but which I did not consider as a tender, because we were bound and the other side were not bound, and I do not think that is a position for a great country like Canada to be in. I therefore, Mr. Speaker, have no hesitation on my own behalf in taking the responsibility of saying, that I advocated delay, and that I also advocated that before we went into this we should see what other large ship-owning companies will do for us to provide a service at less cost.

Mr. FOSTER. The statement which has just been made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Dobell) is too important to be allowed to pass without some little remark. It is a most important statement which he made—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do not think the hon. gentleman can discuss the question now.

Mr. FOSTER. I can put myself in order by moving a motion.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Not now.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Maxwell for :

Copies of all petitions or memorials presented to the Government on the subject of Chinese immigration.

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir H. Joly de Lotbinière). This question of Chinese immigration is one very little understood by us in the east, however well it may be understood by our friends on the Pacific coast. I now rise, as I did the other day, not so much to discuss the merits of the question, as to do what I think every member of this House would do in my place. I think that no member of this House who would have had the honour of being chosen to accompany a distinguished man who was looked upon as the guest of our country, and who was to be treated with honour when he was our guest; there is, I think, no member of this House, who having heard the remarks made by my hon. friend from Burrard (Mr. Maxwell) who would not have felt it his duty to get up and, if not in any way to support such a policy as appears to be obnoxious to British Columbia, at all events to help to redeem the word he had given: to stand by these men and not to abandon them. That is the position I mean to take now. I do not want to support any policy this evening either of one kind or another in relation to the Chinese. I understand too well the difficulty that exists, and I know that hon. gentlemen will believe me when I tell them that what I will say this evening I say in my own personal capacity. Never have I had any communication with my colleagues on the subject, and I am perfectly persuaded, so far as I know, that they have never even considered the question of the treatment of the Chinese in British Columbia. It is only my own opinion that I will take the liberty of giving to the House, in answer to the character given to these poor Chinese by the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Maxwell). I thought it was my duty to study the question. I have studied it as carefully as I could from this report which has been characterized by the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Maxwell) as outrageous, but which I characterize as one of the best reports that have ever been laid before this House. Before I went to meet Li Hung Chang, I was convinced that he would bring up the subject. I expected to hear reproaches from him in connection with the way his countrymen were treated in this country, but instead of hearing reproaches from him, I heard him say, and he repeated it several times, that it was a comfort for him to be under the shade of the British flag where there was justice and equity for every one. Never a word of reproach was uttered by him, only he asked me not to abandon his fellow-countrymen. As I have said before, this report on Chinese immigration which has been characterized by the member for Burrard (Mr. Maxwell) as an outrageous report is perhaps the best report which has ever been laid before this House. I got a copy of it bound and prepared with every possible care in order to do credit to our country, and I presented it to Li Hung Chang in order that he should study it, and learn from it what can be said against his countrymen as well as in favour of them. If any one takes the trouble to read a part of this report, he will find that everything that could ever be said against the Chinese has been said against them. Every accusation of immorality, and every accusation of crime was laid against them, and you will understand readily why it is so when you know, that the evidence was not only taken in British Columbia, but also in California where there is a bitter feeling against the Chinese. I tried to draw the attention of Li Hung Chang to that report, in order that he could learn for himself what were the serious objections against his countrymen. On the continent of America where there is already one colour and race problem to settle, I understand how imprudent it would be to take upon ourselves the solution of another problem, and to have a yellow problem added to the black problem. The conclusions of this report, especially those prepared by the Hon. Mr. Chapleau, prove how well he understood the question, and how prudently he drew the attention of the country to the difficulties which were in the way. The concluding words of that report said :

That therefore if restrictive legislation were considered opportune, it should aim at gradually-achieved results, and the history of the question, as well as the evidence, shows that by legislation regulating, not excluding Chinese labourers, every purpose can be effected which those who apprehend evils from Chinese immigration could and actually do desire.

He speaks of "regulating," and in this respect you can see at every stage how carefully and prudently the question is stated. You will find in the report such words as these :

The best friends of the Chinese must admit that it is indispensable to regulate that immigration.

I want it to be perfectly understood, Mr. Speaker, that I speak only in my own personal name and not in any way as representing the ideas of my colleagues in the Government who, to my own personal knowledge, have not considered the subject. I speak merely in order to redeem as well as lies in my power the character of these men who have been treated in what I consider such a cruel manner by my hon. friend from Burrard (Mr. Maxwell). There are three points of view under which this question can be considered. It can be considered first, from the point of view which was adopted by my hon. friend (Mr. Maxwell), and which represents the idea of those whose mandate he was executing here, and whose mandate he declared it was his bounden duty to carry out. There is another way to consider that question, and it is to consider it from the Chinese point of view. There is a third way of considering that question, and it is certainly the way the great majority of the members of this House consider it. On the one side, the hon. member for Burrard cannot find opprobrious terms enough in which to qualify the morals of the Chinese who are settled in British Columbia, and to show how fatal their presence is in that province, forgetting completely the services they have rendered. If their usefulness is gone now, we ought, at all events, still to remember what they have done. The third opinion, which stands between that of the advocates of the Chinese on the one side and that of the opponents of the Chinese on the other, is the opinion of those disinterested men who, without adopting exclusively the views of either one party or the other, can express themselves with the generous, manly feeling with which the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) expressed himself the other day when he asked, what was the meaning of this in a country like ours? Was it possible that we were going to exclude any one class of people because we were not able to compete with them? Was it possible that we were going to acknowledge our inferiority? Every hon. member of this House must remember the generous sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Guysborough in answer to the accusation brought against the Chinese by the hon. member for Burrard; and that is the way in which a disinterested man would naturally feel inclined to look upon the question.

I would like for a moment to be allowed to deal with the question from the Chinese point of view. There are two points to which I propose to draw the attention of the House. First, what is the material result accruing to British Columbia from the presence of these Chinese immigrants; and, secondly, what is the moral and intellectual effect produced by them? Without following the example of the hon. member for Burrard, without trying in the way in which he did to stamp the character of those who supported the Chinese, I would say that, after all, they are only poor heathens, and if their ideas of the treatment of their neighbours are not so elevated as ours are, let me tell you that they had among them more than 3,000 years ago, a man, Confucius, who, although he did not rise to the height of the Golden Rule of Christianity, yet expressed the negative of the same truth when he said: "Do not do to others what you would not have others do to you." So I think I can fairly say something on behalf of those poor heathens whom the hon. member for Burrard has given up the idea of converting to Christianity. And, by the way, I must say I was painfully affected by that declaration. I had thought there was hope even for the poor Chinese, that they might be converted to Christianity. At all events, we send missionaries among them to try to convert them; and I am astonished to hear the hon. gentleman declare that it is perfectly useless to think of converting them in British Columbia. Is it possible that in a Christian country it is useless to try and convert the Chinese to Christianity? Is it possible that where they are surrounded by churches and Christians, and such excellent examples as are presented by those who live around them, there is no chance of converting them? Then, what is the use of sending missionaries all over the world to seek the heathen and to attempt to convert them in the wilder regions where they live?

As to the material advantages of the presence of the Chinese in California and in British Columbia, there is no doubt that they have done a great deal to open up to civilisation those two countries. California and British Columbia would not have been redeemed perhaps for a generation or two but for the building of the several railroads that cross the continent, and carry to those countries the population of the east. At the time those railroads were begun it was next to impossible to transport any great number of labourers from the east across the prairies to work upon them, but it was the easiest thing in the world to bring the Chinese across the Pacific in ships. They were brought, and it was by their labour that those great railroads were completed. And not only so, but they were utilized in redeeming those valuable swamp lands of California, tule lands, which, once drained, give the most wonderful returns, and which cannot be drained by European labour, but must be drained by Chinese or Negro labour. I will spare the House a number of quotations which I might make from this report to show the services rendered by the Chinese in helping to construct those great lines of communication, which have opened up the far west to the people of the east.

Mr. WILSON. Give us the quotations.

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. I might give many of them; but here is one statement by Mr. Briggs, who, though most bitterly opposed to Chinese immigration, was nevertheless fair enough to admit:

I think the Chinese have been a very important factor in the development of our public works, and in the development of the resources of the state up to a certain period. We have outlived that day.

That is to say, their usefulness is gone, and now we do not want them any more. We are ready to cast them away like useless tools, after we have grown rich by their aid, after they have done work for us which we could not do ourselves. There is a very striking passage in that report showing the way in which the Chinese were treated in California. On the 4th of July, 1852, they were actually invited to join the great procession which celebrated that day. They were still wanted, because their services were still appreciated. In 1862 they were not invited any more, because the people had begun to feel that they could do without them; if they had joined the procession in 1872 they would have been stoned; and they are treated in the same way now, because their usefulness is gone. It is said that they make their money, and then go home to spend it. Well, I would like to know what we do when we go to China? I would like to know if the hundreds and thousands of Englishmen and other Europeans who go to China, go there to settle, or whether they do not go there to make money and then return and spend it at home. This is the position that Europeans occupy in China, and I do not see why they should reproach the Chinese with the modest ambition of coming here and trying to earn a little money and then return home and spend their savings in comfort in their own country. And we must not forget that we forced our way into China at the point of the bayonet, and that, by the opium war, we forced on the Chinese the use of that drug, with the indulgence in which we now reproach them. I think it is a shame for Englishmen to reproach Chinese with being opium smokers, when they remember the iniquity of Great Britain in forcing, at the point of the bayonet, the use of opium on the Chinese. That was one of the most shameful acts that ever disgraced the fair fame of a civilized nation. As to the moral and intellectual aspect of the case, every one knows that the Chinese civilization is much older than ours. Every one knows that 2,000 years ago, when we were utter barbarians, the Chinese had reached a very high state of civilization. We know that they then had the use of the compass, gunpowder and the printing press, and a number of other valuable things, which with us are only the production of our modern civilization. We ought to look upon such a nation with respect, in memory of its past, even if it be now in a state of civilization inferior to our own. This decadence we can easily account for, when we consider the isolation in which that country has itself kept for so long a period, and the same isolation we are cultivating ourselves, when we seek to drive these people from our shores. We know very well that in China instruction is the one means by which every man gains promotion and may rise to the highest grade in the service of the state; and a nation which has such a grand past and in which instruction takes the precedence of everything else, is certainly one deserving of some consideration at our hands. As to their habits, I know that the habits of the Chinese are such that I would not advise my friends in British Columbia or anywhere else to adopt. But as I have said, the opium habit is one with which Englishmen ought to be the last in the world to reproach them. As to their bad morals, I might quote again this report, only I think my hon. friend from Burrard (Mr. Maxwell) does not like me to quote much from it.

Mr. MAXWELL. What book is that?

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. The report of Mr. Chapleau and Judge Grey.

Mr. MAXWELL. I have that, and the hon. gentleman may quote all he likes from it.

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. If I were to quote all I like, I would quote the whole of that book. Instead of being the outrageous report which my hon. friend described it to be, it is, in my opinion, one of the fairest reports we could find anywhere. It is a report in which everything is contained, both on one side and the other. I might quote something more in connection with the example which the Chinese give Europeans in commercial matters. I have a book here written by a man who is well known by all who take an interest in Chinese matters, Mr. Robert K. Douglass. Speaking on the morality of the Chinese, he says:

The Chinese are in no way behind us in that respect; in fact I know of no people in the world I would sooner trust than the Chinese merchant and banker. I may mention that for the last twenty-five years that bank has been doing a very large business with Chinese at Shanghai, amounting I should think to hundreds of millions of taels, and we have never yet met with a defaulting Chinaman.

This is a quotation which the author gives from some remarks by a Shanghai bank manager. I wish to state exactly the position which I take in this matter. I do not take the position that this question does not deserve serious consideration, or that this immigration must not be regulated carefully, nor do I pretend that we must open the door wide to all who choose to come and join in this immigration. I do not even outline any plan in which I would propose to treat the Chinese, but my only purpose, in rising to address this House, was to say that they do not deserve the character given them by my hon. friend the member for Burrard (Mr. Maxwell). They have come here to earn their living honestly, and deserve to be treated like honest men, who do an honest day's work for an honest day's wage.

Mr. CHARLTON. I was very glad to hear my hon. friend the Controller of Inland Revenue announce that he was placing before the House his own sentiments only in relation to this matter, and that the Government is in no way bound by his statement this evening. I should be very sorry to see the Government occupy the position on this question that is occupied by the Controller of Inland Revenue. The hon. gentleman has evidently been brought somewhat under the influence of the great Chinaman, Li Hung Chang, who visited Canada a few days ago, and who was escorted by the hon. gentleman from Niagara Falls to North Bay. No doubt the hon. gentleman saw in the person of that distinguished Chinese gentleman and the members of his suite, Chinamen of the very highest type and education, who impressed him with a very favourable idea of the character of the race to which they belong; but I do not suppose my hon. friend has come into contact with that class of Chinamen who are objected to by the Anglo-Saxons of the Pacific coast. If he were as familiar with that type of Chinese character as he evidently is with the educated and high-toned character of which Li Hung Chang is a specimen, his experience would be a better guide than it is at present, in my opinion. But this very individual, who evidently produced so favourable impression on the Controller of Inland Revenue, is a man whose character, I am afraid, my hon. friend does not thoroughly comprehend. I am afraid that if he knew all about Li Hung Chang, his admiration of that gentleman would be somewhat diminished. I remember one or two historical facts in connection with his career that possibly have not come under the observation of my hon. friend. At the time of the Taiping rebellion, some years ago, when General Gordon marshalled the Chinese forces, and subdued the rebels after thirty or forty engagements, the leaders of the rebellion surrendered the city of Soo Chow to General Gordon on the pledge that their lives would be spared. The city was surrendered upon this express condition. General Gordon gave his pledge that this should be the case. While General Gordon was arranging terms of capitulation and other matters in connection with the surrender of the city, the gentleman, who has so favourably impressed the Controller of Inland Revenue came upon the scene, and he promptly ordered that the heads of the Wangs should be cut off, and they were decapitated accordingly. General Gordon heard of this, and, in a towering rage, he seized his revolver and went upon the track of Li Hung. That eminent statesman hid in closets and climbed over the roofs of houses and finally took refuge in a boat where Gordon could not reach him. But had Gordon found him, the Controller of Inland Revenue would have been prevented from holding sweet intercourse with him. This gentleman produced such an unpleasant impression upon the mind of General Gordon that that distinguished soldier tore up his commission and shook off the dust of China from his feet. He said that no English gentleman could serve under such a government or associate with such people. The Chinaman may have reformed since that day, but I am afraid that, though child-like and bland, he is the same man that he was when he beheaded his enemies in this dastardly and inhuman manner.

The question of Chinese immigration is, I confess, a very difficult one. I can respect the feelings of my hon. friend (Mr. Maxwell) and to some extent enter into those feelings as well as into the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) and others when they plead for the right of asylum for these people upon this continent, when they plead that these people should be allowed to come here to settle, to come into contact with civilization of the west, that they should be brought under Christian influences and that the Christian people of this country should welcome them to our shores for the purpose of christianizing them. A great deal of the theory and this expression of sentiment does credit to my hon. friend's generosity and sympathy. But I have noticed in California, in Oregon, in Washington, in British Columbia—in all these states and provinces of the Pacific coast an intense feeling of hostility to the Chinese. That hostility exists there where they come in contact with these people. These expressions of sentimentality if I may be permitted so to express it, are heard here where we know nothing about these people. I am bound to say that it is a very significant fact that all the population upon the Pacific coast are averse to the importation of the Chinese. My hon. friend alludes to the fact that in San Francisco in 1852 these people, the Chinese, were invited to join in the 4th July celebration, while in 1862 they were not invited. When they were new comers in 1852, when their character was not understood they were invited, and in 1862 when their character was understood the people did not care to associate with them. It is impossible to secure assimilation between the Chinese and the Anglo-Saxon; you cannot get any such thing as homogeneity between the two races. The Chinaman remains a Chinaman; he remains a heathen. He comes here not to become a citizen, not to become a permanent resident; he remains an alien, he remains a stranger in a strange land. He comes here with all his peculiarities and all his vices—and these make a most loathsome list. If you want to find what they are, read the 1st chapter Romans, where St. Paul describes the vices of his time. The Chinaman is addicted to every one of them, and after the Anglo-Saxon has been in contact with these people for a short time, he makes up his mind that the presence of the Chinaman is an evil, that it works nothing but evil, and that for his own safety, for the preservation of society and of the institutions of the country, it is absolutely necessary that restrictions should be placed upon this emigration. Now there is the Pacific slope, an inviting country, and there across the ocean, is a nation of 400,000,000 of people. Do you want to see the Pacific states and provinces Mongolian? That is the question. Remove the barriers, remove the restrictions upon immigration, and you will have upon that coast not Anglo-Saxon states and provinces, but states and provinces that are Mongolian, with the great mass of the people of Chinese. And the Chinese will flow over the mountains to the plains of the West. And thence they will find their way to the provinces and cities of the East. There would be practically no limit to Chinese immigration if restrictions were removed. It is not that those who are opposed to Chinese immigration are inhospitable in their feelings, it is not that they wish to deny to any class of the human family equal rights and privileges, it is not that they do not desire to see the Chinese christianized,—it is the instinct of self-preservation that compel the Anglo-Saxon to demand that barriers shall be set up against this flood that would pour in upon them and subvert their institutions.

Now, it is useless to tell us that we can permit the importation of any kind of people into this country and that we are guilty of infraction of human rights if we impose any restrictions upon these immigrants. In the country to the south of us we see evidence that due care has not been exercised with regard to the immigration into that country of undesirable classes—not Chinese alone, but Italians, Bohemians and other peoples that have come to the United States in such numbers as to change to a considerable extent the complexion of society and to endanger in some instances the institutions of the country. It is now felt by intelligent Americans that this flow of immigration should have been regulated, should have been checked, that certain classes of this immigration should have been excluded. The country is realizing the full effects produced by this evil and is now, at the eleventh hour, proposing to take the measure that should have been taken at the outset to exclude that class of immigration that has proven dangerous and threatening to the institutions of the country. Such being the experience of the United States, let us be warned by that experience, and let us realize that this is not a question of sentimentality, it is not a question whether Chinamen shall be allowed to come here and be brought under conditions that shall improve him mentally and morally, but the question is:—Shall multitudes of depraved heathen with all the vices of heathendom be allowed to come into this country, to swarm, to overrun, to override the population that we must look to to make this Dominion a great country? It is not a mere question of population, it is a question of what kind of population you shall have. A population of five millions such as we have in Canada to-day is better than a population of ten millions of some other kinds and better than a population of 20,000,000 of Chinamen. I simply rose to say, Mr. Speaker, that in considering this question we must avoid being influenced by mere sentiment, that we must realize thoroughly that a great many things are to be considered, and that we must recognize that the instincts of the people who come into contact with this element are to be respected. I for one would be very averse indeed to the adoption of a policy which was protested against by British Columbia, if British Columbia was to receive the full influences and consequences of the adoption of that policy. If Chinese immigration is distasteful to British Columbia, and if British Columbia is the province which is to receive Chinese immigration, then, I say, we should respect the prejudices, if you please to call them so, but they are convictions rather—I say we should respect the convictions, respect the desires of British Columbia in this matter. I pay great attention to the views placed before this House by British Columbia members, and I find there is no divergence of views among them, and I know there is no divergence of views among the people of British Columbia with regard to this question. It is simply a question with them, shall this province be an Anglo-Saxon province, or shall it be a Mongolian province? They take the view that they would rather have it an Anglo-Saxon province. They are going to fight for the realization of that dream, and I shall do nothing, as a member of this House, to interpose any obstacle to the realization of their desires in that matter.

Mr. PRIOR. However much the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Maxwell) and myself may differ on subjects with regard to the trade policy, I am glad to see that there is one subject on which we are both fully agreed, and that is with regard to the legal exclusion of Chinese from the Dominion of Canada. The hon. gentleman has, in a lengthy and very eloquent speech, given this House very full information in regard to that question, and, therefore, I need not speak upon it at any length to-night, nor repeat what he has said, because, although I was not present when he spoke, I read his speech with great pleasure—leaving out the question of the report which the Controller of Inland Revenue has spoken about, because it is so many years since I read it that I could not give an opinion. I will say that the hon. member for Burrard has spoken nothing but the exact truth in regard to Chinese in British Columbia. Now, I know there are a large number of gentlemen in this House, as there were in the last House, who think that this is a matter that does not need much attention from the Parliament of Canada, that it is a question that solely applies to the province of British Columbia. Let me tell the hon. gentlemen present, on both sides of this House, that it is a matter of the greatest importance, not only to them but also to large masses of the wage-earning population of this Dominion. This is not a new matter. It has been brought up time and again for years past, by hon. gentlemen who have represented the different sections of British Columbia. There may be some present here to-night who remember when Mr. Bunster spoke on the subject, when Mr. Baker and Mr. Shakespeare expatiated upon it in this House, and also when I myself brought it before the attention of the Government of the day. I remember perfectly well begging for the sympathy of the Government in regard to the employment of Chinese on the fortifications which were to be built, and which are now building, at Esquimalt, near Victoria. The officer in charge there was, I understood, about to employ Chinese, and I applied to the Government to get them to use their best endeavours with the Imperial authorities not to allow any Asiatic labour to be employed. I am very glad to say that very little, if any, Chinese labour has been employed; but still they stated that they had a right to employ it, and would do so if they saw fit. Now, this Chinese question was a serious one many years ago, but not nearly so serious as it is at the present moment ; and I will tell this House, if you will allow me, the reason why. In British Columbia, in the earlier days, there was a much smaller population than there is at present, although it is not very large yet. But wages were very much higher than they are now, times were good, and there were very few labouring men indeed who, if they wanted work, could not obtain it at remunerative wages. At the present time, I am sorry to say, and for the last two or three years, it has been the case that there have been large numbers of men, good, honest, faithful labouring men, who have not been able to get regular and steady work at anything like decent wages ; and they contend, and I think with a great deal of truth, that the principal cause is that Chinese labour is employed by private individuals and others in the province of British Columbia.

Now, the hon. member for Burrard said that he and all the other members from British Columbia were pledged up to the hilt—I believe those were the words he used—to do their best to get this Chinese Exclusion Act passed. Now, I beg to differ from the hon. gentleman on that point, because I myself personally gave no pledge whatever. The matter was never brought up on the platform at the last two elections I ran, and I do not remember the subject ever having been mentioned. But the reason why it was not brought up, I presume, was that every one of my constituents knew exactly where I stood on the matter. They all knew perfectly well that I, together with the other British Columbia members, believed most sincerely that the influx of Chinese should be stopped. Now, Sir, the hon. member for Burrard said that he believed the leader of the Government and also the leader of the Opposition were in full sympathy with him on this question. I have a copy of a telegram that was sent by the leader of the present Government in May last, addressed to Mr. J. C. McLagan, Vancouver, B.C. :

Chinese immigration restriction not a question in the east. Views of the Liberals in the west will prevail with me.

(Sd.) WILFRED LAURIER.

Now, I do not quite agree with that telegram, because I say that this Chinese question is equally a question in the east as it is in the west, for although the west is the gateway through which these heathen, as my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) calls them, enter the Dominion, still they are just like cholera, if they are not stopped they will spread from the west to the east. Now, I may say that I know the late Government was fully in sympathy with British Columbia members in regard to this question, and that on every occasion when the matter was brought before them, they showed that they were in sympathy. So far as I recollect, on all occasions it was simply the international question that debarred them from passing some act. I may at once say that I know full well that the principle of the exclusion of any man is wrong ; but I think that circumstances alter cases. If we were trying to exclude a lot of men who had the same mode of living as we have, or as Canadian or British workmen have, I say it would be wrong to try and exclude them. But where we have men who live in a totally different manner, I think that should be taken into consideration.

Mr. PRIOR.

The white men have to make a decent living, they have to make decent wages to be able to keep what they consider a proper and decent house over their heads. They marry and raise children, which the Chinese never do in our country. The Chinese live 15 or 20 in a small room, they live on food that no white man could exist on ; and, therefore, I do not consider that we are violating any correct principle when we try to exclude such men from our country. The hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Maxwell) went very fully into the moral aspect of this immigration. The hon. gentleman, from his early training and from the calling he has followed for so many years, is far better qualified to deal with that subject than I am, and I will, therefore, say very little in regard to the morals of the Chinese. I may say this, however, that there are just as good Chinamen as any other men in the world—some of them. There are first-class Chinese merchants, well-educated men, resident in Victoria to-day, and there are plenty of the labouring class of Chinese who are good honest men, and can be trusted almost as well as some white men. Their vices are different from the vices of white people ; but we all know that white people have vices which none of us would seek to condone. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) drew the attention of the House to what has been going on in the country to the south of us. He showed, and very properly showed, that for many years the Americans have been allowing a stream of immigrants to come in that have in the end proved to be a burden on the communities in which they have settled, and a menace to the good government of the country. Those people, although they were what we call white people, were an undesirable class : still, as regards the majority of them, whatever wages they earned, they spent on their families and themselves in the country in which they settled, but such is not the case with the Chinese, nor with the Japanese either. They come into the country and work for wages which it would be cruel and most unfair to ask any decent white man to accept ; they save all the money they can, the majority of the labourers living more like pigs than men, and send out of the country every dollar they can possibly save. I say men like that cannot possibly do any good to the country and assist in building up this country to the position to which we desire it to attain. Unfortunately, there are plenty of white men who are obliged to work for very small wages ; that is the case in every country in the world. There are various kinds of work, however, such as clearing land, where the owner cannot afford to pay large wages ; but I contend it would be far better for Canada as a whole, if the Chinese were excluded, and we were to get some of the cheap labour of which you have so much in the east, and send it to British Columbia. I am informed there are men working in Montreal to-day for 70 cents and 80 cents a day. There is no Chinaman in British Columbia who could be found to work for such wages. So, instead of the Chinese, who are employed by nearly every contractor or manufacturer, give us some of this cheap labour to be found in the east, and let it do the work, instead of the Chinese. I think every hon. member is aware that for years I have been a consistent protectionist. I believe in protecting the industries of the country, but I also believe in protecting the labour of the country. I believe that, whether a man is a Liberal or a Conservative, a free trader or a protectionist in regard to the commodities produced in the country, you cannot point your finger to a single workingman who is not a strong protectionist so far as his own labour is concerned. Now, what do we see? Workingmen joining unions—the majority of them belong to unions. What is the purpose of those unions? They are for nothing but the protection of the labour of the unionists against outside and unfair competition. That being the case, they will not allow white men, even their own brothers, to work on the same job with them, unless they belong to the union with which they are connected. If that be the case, do they not believe in protection to labour just as much as we believe in protection for the manufacturers of the country. We are told there is an international difficulty here. I always firmly believed there was, because it seemed to me, at first sight, that the Chinese might, if they “cut up rough,” and we kept them out, keep our people out of their country. But what do we see? We find New South Wales, a dependency of the British Crown, as much as Canada is, has passed a law imposing a tax of $500 on every Chinaman going into that colony, a tax which the people of British Columbia ask to be imposed on Chinese coming here. If it is lawful and proper to enact such a law in New South Wales, why is it not possible to do so in Canada? I firmly believe that the Chinese and Japanese in British Columbia and Canada now should be treated honestly and fairly by us ; but I say this, and in regard to it I agree with the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Maxwell), that we have plenty, if not too many, Chinese already for the class of work for which they are fitted, and for which we could not get cheap white labour. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) came out to British Columbia a few months ago, in company with the hon. the Premier, and he spoke at a meeting held in Victoria, when, I may say, he “took the house ;” but I could wager a good deal of money that, if the hon. gentleman had delivered there the speech he gave to this House the other day on the Chinese question, he would have been hissed off the platform. There is no doubt that the general feeling of the public in British Columbia is deadly opposed to Chinese immigration. The hon. gentleman said, the other day, “We should open our gates to all from other lands.” Well, Sir, I, for one, must protest emphatically against that doctrine. I do not think any member of this House wants to see our labouring men brought down to the level of the Asiatics, and it is impossible for the white man to live, if he has to compete with such labour. The hon. gentleman further said, “We must bring our best moral and spiritual efforts to bear on them.” I do not think that will make very much difference to the wages they will work for and the way in which they live. I have heard it said in the States that the only good Indian was a dead one ; and the majority of the people of British Columbia believe that is the case with the Chinese. The hon. gentleman again said, “If we exclude them, we give up our claim that we are able to compete successfully with them.” We do not intend to try to compete with Chinese or Japanese labour ; it is impossible with the different mode of life of the white man that he can compete with such labour. I also wish to warn this House against the competition we are bound to receive in the Japanese in their own country, where they are carrying on manufactures. Perhaps hon. members have not taken notice of these facts, but a short time ago the Americans sent a commission to Japan to find out what competition they would have to meet in that country, and they found the Japanese were building mills of all descriptions, were turning out goods, such as cotton, iron-work, engines and other kinds of manufactured goods at such prices as rendered it impossible for our manufacturers or any other manufacturers in any civilized country to compete with them. With the cheap transportation such as we have now across the Pacific, a very short time will elapse before Canada and the United States, and even Great Britain, will feel the effects of that severe and serious competition. There are a certain number of people in British Columbia who contend that they cannot do without Chinese. The owners of canneries declare they must have Chinese to work in those establishments. They have my most heartfelt sympathy in their efforts, because they have to compete with the American canners who utilize Chinese labour, and I must say that unless they can obtain cheaper labour than the white labour in British Columbia at the present time, they would not be able to compete successfully with the cannery men to the south of us, and on the Alaska coast. I must say also that the Chinese do make first rate household servants ; and that up to the present time it has been very hard indeed in British Columbia to get girls to fill these positions. However, I cannot help thinking, that if the number of Chinese were reduced, from some portion of the Globe or other we should be able to get as many white domestic servants as are needed. Sir, as long as the Chinese are allowed to come in people will employ them, because it is only human that when you want work done you try to get it done as cheaply as you can. I wish to say in conclusion that I am heartily in accord with the resolution moved by the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Maxwell), and I sincerely trust that hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House will look upon the matter seriously and not as a joke, because it is no joke. I trust that the Government will by some means or another find a way in which they can put a stop to these Chinese hordes now coming to our country, either by imposing a higher tax on them or by passing some law which according to their mind is more effective than a tax.

Mr. McINNES. Mr. Speaker, when I heard the able and comprehensive explanation of this Chinese question which was given to the House last week by the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Maxwell), I thought it was unnecessary for anything more to be said in justification of the position which is taken on this question by the people of our western province. It seems, however, that notwithstanding the convincing and complete argument of my hon. friend (Mr. Maxwell), there is still some diversity of opinion among hon. members upon the question of increasing the restrictions upon Chinese immigration. As this matter is undoubtedly one of the most vital consequences to British Columbia in general, and to the district which I have the honour to represent in this House in particular, I wish to endorse the remarks which have been made by different speakers who have spoken in favour of increased restriction, and I wish more particularly to refer to a few of the arguments which have been advanced by hon. gentlemen who hold a different view. The first member who expressed an opinion different from that of the introducer of this motion was the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), and Sir, I must confess that I was surprised to find that hon. gentleman take the position which he did, because we have always regarded him, and in fact we know that he is still, a stalwart friend of those who are labouring under unjust and unfair conditions of society, and on this occasion it seemed peculiar to find him in opposition to those whose interests he has always championed. But, he explained away the surprise of most of us when he stated to the House, that there were practically no Chinamen in the province of Nova Scotia. Sir, if there were Chinamen in Nova Scotia and if that hon. gentleman were brought in contact with the evils of the presence of large numbers of Chinese, he could not hold the views which he at present does. If he lived in British Columbia or in any place where there are a large number of Chinese, he would see the interests of the white men undermined by Chinamen in the most unfair manner. He would see the white labourer driven from his work; he would see white farmers forced off their farms; he would see white families reduced to the verge of starvation; he would see these things as we see them in the west, not in individual instances but in numberless cases, and seeing them I know that he would sympathize with those of his race who are looking to this Parliament for relief. The hon. gentleman, in justification of the position which he has taken on this question for the time being—I say for the time being because I believe that both he and the Controller of Inland Revenue after further ventilation of the question, will be inclined to accept the views held by those members of the House who are most directly concerned—I say the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fraser) has advanced certain arguments in favour of his present position, to which I wish to refer briefly, because I have no doubt there are other members of this House holding similar views.

The first idea suggested by the hon. member (Mr. Fraser) was, that the movement in favour of restricting Chinese immigration was something of a class agitation which is supported by the working classes only. That is altogether a mistaken view of the situation. There can be no doubt but that the first effect of the presence of this large number of Chinese is manifested upon the working classes, but, Sir, it is equally true that the injurious effect falls upon all other classes of the community. The farmers are as much interested in this question as are the workmen, and it is not too much to say that the tradespeople are also similarly interested. It must be remembered that while there are about 20,000 Chinamen in British Columbia, these Chinamen observe a rule not to patronize any white establishments if it is possible to do otherwise. The great bulk of their supplies and provisions are imported direct from China. Now, if these 20,000 Chinamen were not in British Columbia, there would be somewhere about 10,000 white men to take their places, and the majority of these being in all probability heads of families, the condition would bring an enormous trade to the merchants of that province. The fact is, that all the people of British Columbia, no matter what their calling in life, are desirous of restriction being placed upon further Chinese immigration. I shall not dwell upon this phase of the question at the present time, because in a very few months there will be a monster petition presented to the Government asking for further restrictions to be placed upon the immigration of Chinese, and when that petition is presented to this House it will be found that the signers of it include not only workmen, and tradespeople, and farmers, but also those who are engaged in industries, which it is contended by pro-Chinese advocates cannot be carried on in British Columbia without Chinese labour. But, if it were argued that this question were a mere question of competition, and that the object was for the workmen to get rid of this competition; even if that were the basis of our objection, I confess that after the discussion that I heard in this House last Wednesday evening I would expect to find a great deal of sympathy with our movement. For, Sir, when the Alien Labour Bill was before the House, hon. gentlemen on both sides endorsed the principle of keeping out American labour. In British Columbia we do not complain of fair competition. The point which we take is not so much that Chinese labour comes into competition with our white labour, but that it creates a condition of affairs which makes competition impossible. You will see that this is so, when you consider the habits of the Chinese in that province. In the first place, while we have about 20,000 of them, we have as a matter of fact, only about 50 Chinese women. That means that nearly the whole of the 20,000 Chinamen of British Columbia are unmarried. Now, as most of the white men are married you will readily observe that even were these Chinamen equal in other respects to unmarried white men that in competition against married white men, they would have a decided advantage in the labour market. There is another point which makes the advantage of the Chinamen more apparent, and it is that they come to British Columbia without any idea whatever of accommodating themselves to the customs of our people. They live and work there as mere dumb animals. They engage in no phases of society which involve social obligations. The result is that, not having any appearances of self-respect to keep up for themselves and their families, they have thus an additional advantage in competing against our people.

Another point which has been referred to is this. They and their ancestors before them, owing to the over-populated condition of China, have adapted their stomachs, so to speak, to do with the least possible nutriment. They have inherited the capacity to live on the minimum of food which is necessary to sustain life, and this necessarily implies, in so far as the rate of wages is determined by the necessities of life, that these people can undermine the white labour.

Therefore, on account of their lack of social obligations in the community, on account of their single blessedness, so to speak, on account of the fact that they can live on next to nothing, you will see that they are in a position to undercut our labour at every turn. It is absolutely impossible for white men to compete against Chinamen in the field of labour. The result is that a white labourer must either cast his self-respect to the winds, and must degrade himself to the level of that vile product of congested Asiatic life, or he must seek other fields of labour. This question, then, comes to this. White labourers in British Columbia cannot compete against Chinese labour; they will not, on account of their self-respect as white men and British subjects, consent to degrade themselves to the condition of the Chinese, and the question arises will they be forced to leave British Columbia? Will British Columbia, with all its wealth of natural resources, and with its assured future, become the heritage of the degraded Chinese, or will it become the glory of Canada?

The hon. member for Guysborough threw out the suggestion, and it has been endorsed by the hon. Controller of Inland Revenue, that we have broad acres of unoccupied land in this country, and that it is certainly the right of the Chinese to come in and occupy them if they see fit. There is no doubt that it is desirable that our broad prairies should be peopled; but I think it is equally undesirable to have them populated with the refuse of humanity. We want men to come to this country who will make good citizens, men who will thicken the backbone of this country; but to say that all the magnificent opportunities of this country should be thrown open to the riff-raff of humanity is a proposition which I do not think this House will entertain. There has been a complaint heard throughout the country, and I think also in this House, against the degraded elements of European life being dumped into this country. I think that complaint is well-founded. But the fact is that the worst elements of European life are Pilgrim Fathers in comparison with the scum which rises from the social conditions of the over-populated and semi-civilized Empire of China.

The hon. Controller of Inland Revenue has eulogized the character and the morality and the intellect of the Chinese people. I would say that, so far as the better classes of Chinamen purpose to come to this country, there is at the present time, so far as I understand the law, no obstacle in their way. The present law merely excludes the Chinese labourer. In that law we have not gone so far as the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) has gone in his Alien Labour Bill, which has been endorsed by this House. That Bill, as I understand it, is directed against all outside countries, and is intended to prevent foreign labour coming into competition with our labour. We do not go so far as that. The Chinese restrictionist wishes to prohibit only the Chinese labourer from coming into this country. There is at present no restriction whatever on Chinese merchants, Chinese students, Chinese tourists, or Chinese ambassadors. They are allowed to come into this country, and there is no serious objection to them. It is only upon that degraded class which comes to this country in slavery, and remains in slavery while here, that we desire to place restrictions.

The hon. Controller of Inland Revenue, as I have said, extolled the Chinese character. He has been lately brought into contact with Earl Li Hung Chang, and there is no doubt that that eminent Chinaman has made a very favourable impression upon our Controller. But I would point out to that hon. gentleman, that in China, where there are four hundred million Chinamen, there is but one Li Hung Chang; and it would be just as reasonable to attribute the virtues of the Hon. William E. Gladstone to the Whitechapel wretches as to attribute any virtues which the hon. Controller has seen in Li Hung Chang to the degraded Chinese who are imported into British Columbia.

The hon. Controller has extolled the morality of Chinamen in opposition to the experience of the people of the west and the experience of almost every person who has come in contact with the Chinese people there; and, as he has referred to books, I shall speak by the book also. I have here the report of the Minister of Justice of this country for the last year, in which I find a statement of the nationalities of the convicts in the penitentiary of British Columbia; and I find that out of 108 convicts in that penitentiary 36 are Chinamen. There are more Chinamen there than native-born Canadians. Now, at the outset, there are not more than 20,000 Chinamen in British Columbia, this means that while not more than 20 per cent of the people of British Columbia are Chinamen, upwards of 30 per cent of the convicts in the penitentiary are of that nationality. I do not know that that stands very well beside the contention of the hon. Controller in regard to the morality of these people. But, Sir, it is certain that the fact, as disclosed by the report of the Minister of Justice, is well known to all persons who live in British Columbia; and if I had here the report of the common jails of the province, it would be found that that report would make it more apparent still that the morality of the Chinese, as we know them in British Columbia, is of the very lowest kind.

The hon. Controller also extolled the intelligence of the Chinaman. In that connection I have looked up the statistics of the asylum of British Columbia and I find that out of some 109 inmates 20 are Chinamen. So you will see, if you speak by the book, that it can easily be proved that the class of Chinamen which we have in British Columbia are neither of the very highest moral or intellectual standing. But we, from British Columbia, upon this occasion, need not confine ourselves to books as must the hon. Controller of Inland Revenue, who lives 3,000 miles away from the condition of affairs which we have described to-night. He has gleaned all his information from works written by parties whose interests I do not know; but the representatives from British Columbia have personal knowledge of this question and are agreed in declaring that a different condition of affairs exists in that province from that which the hon. the Controller would lead this House to believe exists, and I think that hon. members will be more inclined to take the view of my hon. friend from Burrard (Mr. Maxwell), backed up as it is by the unanimous expression of the experience in British Columbia, and by legislation in the great nation to the south of us and down in the Australian colonies, than the views which are to be found in the works of unknown authors.

But the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) furthermore sought to raise a prejudice against our agitation in this matter, by saying that we are copying the legislation of the United States just as we had taken our protectionist theories from that nation. Well, I do not know that the judgment of a nation of seventy million people is to be disregarded altogether. I think quite the contrary, but if there are any objections from free traders to our adopting the judgment of that great protectionist nation to the south on the Chinese question, I would refer them to the colony of New South Wales. That colony, which has strong free trade proclivities, has passed the identical legislation which the people of British Columbia are now asking this Parliament to pass. But the point we make is this, that wherever Chinamen have been brought in contact with Anglo-Saxons, whether in the United States or Australia or British Columbia, there has been the same unanimous desire on the part of Anglo-Saxons to be rid of their presence. Everywhere we find the same unanimous verdict that the two people cannot live together in the same country, to their mutual advantage.

There is another argument which has been advanced in this discussion, though I do not know that it has been strongly advanced, but it is one which, if it were well based, would be one of the strongest arguments that could be advanced by pro-China advocates. That argument is that undoubtedly, while it would be to the advantage of British Columbia to have Chinamen excluded, yet that advantage would be entirely provincial, and that the national trade of Canada with China which would be interfered with is of more importance than the mere provincial benefits which would accrue to British Columbia from the exclusion of the Chinese. Now, I have looked this matter up, and so far as I can gather from the statistics in the Statesman's Year-Book, I find that for the three years prior to 1892, when the Americans passed the Exclusion Act, the United States exported to China goods to the value of 4,000,000 taels, and that during the three years after the passage of that Act, the annual value exported, averaged 6,000,000 taels, or an increase of 50 per cent after the Exclusion

Act was brought into effect. It is therefore idle to contend that if we raised our restrictions on Chinese immigration, there would be any falling off in the trade between Canada and China. The case of the United States is on all fours with ours. They have shown greater hostility than the people of British Columbia have shown and are now asking this Parliament to give expression to, but notwithstanding that, the people of China bought 50 per cent more goods from the United States, after the Exclusion Act, than they did prior to that Act. There is a reason for this. The Chinese are not only unsentimental in trade as in other things but are otherwise very peculiar. They are conservative, they do not wish for any change in their system of civilization. They wish to go on, as they have been going on for centuries, undisturbed by outside nations, and the result is they look upon all outside countries with disdain. They do not exercise any discrimination whatever, but class all outside people as foreign devils, no matter to what nationality they may belong. The result is that when they make purchases from these outside peoples it really makes very little difference to them whether they purchase from a Canadian, a German or a Frenchman. There is another reason which explains why trade increased with China, even in the face of apparent hostility. It is this. The whole trade with China is done through commission agents at the sea ports of that country, so that the Chinese themselves are not brought into immediate contact with the people they purchase from. Therefore, I do not think that we need attach any weight to this trade argument when considering the legislation asked for.

The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), and one or two others spoke of humanity in connection with this question, and they suggested that it is every man's right to go where he wishes on this globe without restriction. The hon. member for Guysborough spoke of a common fatherhood, and I shall not enter into that view of the case, but let me point out one fact in this connection. While it may be true that the Chinese do not place any restriction in a technical sense upon the immigration of Canadians into their country, as a matter of fact that statement is very far from being correct in the practical sense, for while the Chinese may have no law against Canadians or British subjects entering China, yet, as a matter of fact, there are conditions existing there which attain the same object. It is well known that if a white person attempted to enter the interior of China, he would simply take his life in his hands, and that is the most effective exclusion that can possibly be inflicted on an outside people. It seems to me that when Li Hung Chang melodramatically implored the hon. Controller of Inland Revenue not to abandon him, he had, no doubt, in his mind the fact that he was about to enter the far interior of this country, and, remembering the massacres of foreigners which have taken place in the interior of his own country, he feared lest a similar fate might await him here. Just exactly as a white person on the coast of China would no doubt have to appeal to the Imperial authorities of that country for protection, if he attempted to enter the interior, so Li Hung Chang appealed to our hon. friend: "Do not abandon us." If the question of humanity be considered, I would suggest that the highest and most practical kind of humanity requires that we protect the interests of those who are nearest and dearest to us.

Now, there has been a question raised as to the jurisdiction of this Parliament to interfere. It has been contended that there are international difficulties in the way. It appears to me that it is rather late in the day for these difficulties to arise. The proper time for these difficulties to have been ventilated was in 1885 or 1886, when the first restriction was placed upon the Chinese immigration. We have acted upon that restriction law for ten years. Having endorsed the principle for that length of time, it seems to me that it is rather late in the day to attempt to criticise it or to attempt to upset it now. But, in connection with this question, it is well to note the fact that, when Earl Li Hung Chang interviewed the Right Hon. Mr. Chamberlain in Great Britain, and made some kind of protest against the restriction which was placed upon this immigration into Canada, Mr. Chamberlain informed him that in these matters the colonies were entirely self-governing. There we have the opinion of one of the highest authorities we can possibly have, that it is competent for this Parliament to deal with this matter as it sees fit. We have the further fact that in New South Wales, which is a British colony and in the same position as we are—in fact, in a less advantageous position than we are—they have placed a restriction of $500 upon Chinamen coming into that colony. If they have the jurisdiction to pass such a law, surely we have similar jurisdiction in this country. The position, then, is just this: It has been found in British Columbia, in fact it has been found wherever the Anglo-Saxon race has been brought into contact with the Chinaman, that the presence of the Chinaman is incompatible with the enjoyment by the Anglo-Saxon of the opportunities of his country. And, as there seems to be no doubt that we have the right in this Parliament to put further restrictions upon immigration of Chinamen to this country, I hope that hon. members will consider the facts which have been laid before them in this discussion, that they will consider this question from the point of view of those who are most in contact with the conditions complained against, and those who are most interested in it, and when, in the near future, a definite proposal is laid before the House, asking for relief by restriction upon the entry of Chinamen in to this country, hon. members will be prepared to grant that relief, which is so urgently needed and so unanimously desired by the people of British Columbia.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. I must appeal to hon. gentlemen to let us go home now.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We had a pretty late sitting last evening, and I have some private and unofficial information, which I hope is not correct, that we may be late to-morrow night. Unless hon. gentlemen interested in orders yet to come, object, I will consent to the adjournment. I move the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.10 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 17th September, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. CHOQUETTE presented the second report of the committee appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates of the House, as follows:—

That a complaint was lodged with your committee by Mr. D. Monet, M.P., against Messrs. Lucien Lasalle, Joseph Bouchard, Peter McLeod and J. B. Vanasse, four translators of the debates of the House of Commons, that they, while in office, took a prominent part in active political strife since 1891;

That notice of said complaint was sent to the above-named translators, with the request that they furnish the committee with an explanation;

That the four translators appeared before your committee, and were examined in connection with the said charge;

That Joseph Bouchard admitted he attended three public political meetings during the last election, having a seat on the platform, and that he addressed one of these meetings at Larose's Hall, in the city of Ottawa;

That the report of the said meeting, as published in the Ottawa "Daily Citizen" of the 12th June last, and filed with your committee, stated that Joseph Bouchard addressed the meeting in French, and indicated that he strongly supported the fiscal policy of the late Government, as well as its policy with regard to the Manitoba school question;

That the said Joseph Bouchard, although he contended that the report of the "Citizen" eulogized too highly his speech, admitted that he advocated the return of the Government's candidate and endorsed the trade policy of the Government as well as its course with regard to the Manitoba school question;

That Peter McLeod admitted that all the parliamentary correspondence which appeared in "Le Trifluvien" over the nom de plume of "E. Liane" was written by him;

That a portion of this correspondence was translated and filed with your committee; that in this correspondence one honourable member of the House of Commons was referred to as a young blockhead, and the leader of the Opposition as the leader of the traitors who had pocketed his honour and dignity, etc.;

That J. B. Vanasse admitted the accuracy of the charge made against him of having on the public platform referred to the then leader of the Opposition and to one of the candidates in the county of Richelieu as renegades and traitors of their race and religion.

In view of the above related facts, which in the opinion of your committee convict the said Joseph Bouchard, Peter McLeod and J. B. Vanasse of having improperly interfered in politics, your committee recommend their dismissal from the staff as translators of the debates.

With regard to the case of L. Lasalle a majority of your committee are not in favour of recommending his dismissal.

Your committee beg to submit, herewith, the minutes of proceedings and all documents produced before them in connection with this case.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. As this report is one of a good deal of importance, I would like to ask the hon. leader of the Government if he would be good enough to have the evidence printed, and to fix a day for the consideration of the report.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The whole report will appear in the Votes and Proceedings to-morrow.

Mr. DAVIN. I understand that there is no intention of proposing the adoption of this report until next week.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I intend to move that it be concurred in on Tuesday next.

Mr. TAYLOR. I think that—

Mr. SPEAKER. There is no question before the Chair.

Mr. TAYLOR. I was going to say that before the motion for the adoption of the report, we should have the evidence printed.

Mr. SPEAKER. There is no question of the adoption of anything.

THE PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT.

Mr. GIBSON. I beg to move the adoption of the first report of the Joint Committee on the Printing of Parliament.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that this report, as read to the House, contains an important recommendation relating to the internal economy of the House; and I think that report, as well as the report of the Committee on the Debates, should have the ordinary notice of two days before they are considered by the House. I do not suggest that they should be put on the regular notice book, which would probably put them far back in the session; but if the hon. gentleman gives notice that after two days, Monday or Tuesday, or any other day, he will move that the report be considered, that motion may be considered when motions are called, which will satisfy the rules of the House.

Mr. GIBSON. If I have the consent of the Government, I will give notice to bring this motion up on Monday.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH THE HIGH COMMISSIONER.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to call the attention of the First Minister to several notices on the Order paper for the production of correspondence between the High Commissioner and the Government, and I would like to say to my hon. friend that these papers were prepared at the end of last session, in response to a motion made by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), but they were not completed in time to be laid on the Table. They are all now ready, and I would ask the hon. leader of the House to be good enough to lay them on the Table, in anticipation of a motion, because it will be very important to have them when discussing the motion proposed by the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver).

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The papers are all ready and will be brought down in a day or so. I have thought of that.

PRECEDENCE OF GOVERNMENT ORDERS.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved:

That, for the remainder of the session, Government Orders have precedence on Mondays after Private Bills, and on Wednesdays, with an hour for Private Bills after half-past seven o'clock.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We are very anxious to reach the end of the session, and I do not object to the motion, but I think that as much latitude as possible should be allowed with regard to matters that really require to be brought before the notice of the House.

Mr. DAVIN. I have some important notices on the paper. Some of these are undoubtedly such as I think will commend themselves to the Government, and they can wait, but there is one subject of eminent importance, and that is the doing away with a state of things most undesirable and indeed discreditable. Last session I attempted to do so, and so did another member who is no longer in the House. I refer to the Bill entitled an Act to amend the North-west Territories Representation Act. When I tell the hon. First Minister that the state of the law at present places in the hands of irresponsible people—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that he cannot anticipate the discussion of any question on a motion of this kind.

Mr. DAVIN. With your leave, Sir, the First Minister has made a motion, and before I vote for it, I want to give a reason why I shall either vote against it and call for a division, or else make a suggestion to the First Minister.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman may give a reason, but I wish to draw his attention to the rule that he cannot discuss the subject of any motion on the Order paper on a motion of this kind.

Mr. DAVIN. I could not be guilty of such a breach of order under any circumstances, especially with yourself in the Chair. However, I need not enter into the nature of my motion, because I think the hon. First Minister and his colleagues thoroughly understand the position. What I would suggest is that if the Prime Minister takes these days, he should put that Bill on the Government Orders.

Mr. CASEY. I would like to call attention to this matter, and the hon. First Minister can reply to both at once. As there are some notices of motion here for correspondence and so on, the hon. gentleman might allow us, on Monday next, to go through those that do not require discussion so that the material might be ready for use at a subsequent session if not now.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). We have passed through the paper once or twice already, but if there are any such motions, I suppose the House will have no objection to taking them up on Monday. With regard to the suggestion of the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), I understand that his Bill is the same as that which was introduced last session by Mr. Martin, which certainly dealt with a very important subject, and after giving the matter consideration, the Government may find its way to putting it on its own orders.

Mr. MACLEAN. In previous sessions when the Government took Mondays, their orders took precedence after questions, and not after private Bills. I think that private members should retain the right to put questions on that day.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). That is quite right and we will amend the motion to that effect.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

ABBE PROULX.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to ask the attention of the Government to a paragraph which appears in its journal "La Presse," of the 16th inst., published in Montreal. Here is the paragraph :

L'Abbé Proulx on an Official Mission.—His Parishioners Notified of his Absence on very Important Business.

On Tuesday of last week, the 8th September, l'Abbé Proulx, of Saint-Lin, received the following despatch, dated Ottawa, September 8th, 1896 :—

Rev. Abbé Proulx, Curé of Laurentides.

Everything is ready, be here to-morrow.

W. LAURIER.

On Wednesday morning l'Abbé Proulx took the train at Montreal. It was not known what his destination was. On Thursday morning he was met at Montreal and on Friday he took the train for New York and took passage on one of the trans-Atlantic steamers for Europe. Last Sunday his Vicar, l'Abbé Martel, from the pulpit read to the parishioners of St. Lin a letter from their parish priest in which he stated that he had to leave them, that he could not give the reason which caused his absence, but that he was leaving Canada on most important matters and that he certainly would do his duty.

Now, Sir, it was currently reported in Montreal that the important mission of l'Abbé Proulx was in connection with the school question of Manitoba. I should like to ask the First Minister if the telegram I have just read to the House, and signed by him, or supposed to be signed by him, is correct, and if so, whether l'Abbé Proulx has left on an important mission connected with the settlement of the school question of Manitoba, whether he goes on that mission sent by the Government, and, if the hon. gentleman can say so, what is the nature of the mission which he is called upon to fulfil ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). M. l'Abbé Proulx is not on an official mission for the Government. I sent that telegram referred to, to l'Abbé Proulx. It refers to personal matters concerning which I have no information to give.

RETURNS.

Mr. CASEY. I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) that a return was moved for last session showing the expenditure and details of the expenditure on Port Stanley harbour under the last great grant that was made by this House for that purpose. I suppose that return has been prepared, and I would like to know if we are to have it this session.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The papers referred to will be brought down to-morrow.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to know when the return asked for last session by

Mr. LAURIER.

Mr. Tarte, covering the instructions to G. H. Young, inspector of customs, in regard to the conduct of Thomas Scott, will be brought down.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. May I ask the First Minister—I understood him to say that l'Abbé Proulx had not left on an official mission—but I did not understand—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has the floor.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question put by the hon. member for North Wellington has not been answered.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). I may say to my hon. friend from North Wellington that the matter he refers to had not previously been brought to my notice, but I will make inquiries in the department as to the papers he speaks of.

L'ABBE PROULX.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Now, if I may be permitted, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the First Minister. I understood the First Minister to say that the Abbé Proulx had not left on an official mission, but I did not understand the hon. gentleman to say that the Abbé Proulx was not invested with a mission, that his trip was not undertaken on a mission confided to him.

The PRIME MINISTER. I tried to satisfy my hon. friend (Sir Adolphe Caron), but I do not know that I shall be able to do so. I think he has the school question on the brain. Let him set his mind at rest. I never spoke a single word to the Abbé Proulx about that question.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. That is not an answer to my question.

THE ESTIMATES.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Before proposing a motion for Committee of Supply, I may be permitted to speak a word of explanation. On Tuesday I gave notice that I would ask the House to take special action to-day with reference to a provision for the immediate needs of the public service. But in view of the progress that has been made with the Estimates—the excellent progress, I may say, and I hope I may add that the progress may be continued—I shall not deem it necessary for the House to carry out that suggestion, and for the present it may be postponed.

17TH SEPTEMBER, 1878.

Mr. WALLACE. I would like to ask the Prime Minister if it is his intention to move to-day that the House adjourn at six o'clock so as to enable us to celebrate the eighteenth anniversary of a very important event in the history of Canada ?

The PRIME MINISTER. What event ? I have entirely forgotten about it.

THE ROYAL ASSENT.

Mr. SPEAKER. I wish to mention, for the information of the House, that I have received intimation that His Honour the Deputy Governor, about four o'clock, will request the attendance of members of this House in the Senate, when assent will be given, I suppose, to the Supply Bill.

PRINTING BUREAU—PAYMENT OF EMPLOYEES.

Mr. McNEILL. I would like to ask the Finance Minister—in reference to the remark he made a short time ago—whether he has funds in hand to pay the employees of the Printing Bureau for their services up to date, and if so, whether these services will be paid for ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I do not know that I can give the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) a very specific answer. It had not been my intention to pay the employees of the Printing Bureau out of the appropriation by Governor General's warrant, because it was pointed out in the House that it was, perhaps, a little in anticipation of the need. If the Estimates make the rapid progress we anticipate, I think we would prefer to have these payments come out of the general Appropriation Bill, rather than out of the Governor General's warrants. But we will reserve that, in case of delay in the Estimates.

Mr. McNEILL. I made the remark because I had understood that payments were due to these employees, and that the men were much in need of the money.

THE MORRISON MAIL CONTRACT.

Mr. GILLIES. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the Postmaster General if the papers relating to the Morrison contract, called for on Friday last, are ready to be placed on the Table : if not, when will they be ready ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). I stated yesterday—

An hon. MEMBER. No.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Yes ; the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) put the same question to me, and I gave an explanation. I stated that on Friday evening, after the discussion, I had instructed the Deputy Postmaster General to produce the papers and have them copied at once. On Tuesday I asked him for them. He told me that he had not been able to get them on Friday evening, because they were in the vault, and it was after hours, and he had not charge of the vault. He said he had given them out to be copied by a young lady—do you want the name ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes ; be particular.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Miss Seymour.

An hon. MEMBER. How old is she ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. All young ladies are very young. He said they had been delivered to her to be copied. Yesterday, on returning to my department, in consequence of the inquiry of the ex-Minister of Finance, I asked him again, and he told me that I would get them to-day or to-morrow. I asked him before coming up to-day if he received them yet from her, and he told me he had not, but that they would be here to-day, and I suppose they will.

SUPPLY—FAST ATLANTIC SERVICE.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I rise for the purpose of drawing the attention of the Government to a very important statement which I see in the "Hansard" of yesterday, made by the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) in regard to one of the most important questions that, I think, is under the consideration of the Government. Now, it will be remembered that the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce stated that the question of the Fast Atlantic service was receiving the careful consideration of the Government ; and it was also stated, I think by that hon. gentleman that none of the tenders were exactly completed, but that the whole subject was receiving the careful consideration of the Government. Now, I think this House had a right to the earliest information and the earliest announcement from the Treasury benches, of the decision of the Government on that important question.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman, I have no doubt, will put himself in order by a motion, if he is proceeding to make a speech.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will defer my remarks until the motion is made to go into Supply.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I regret very much that, owing to having taken a cold last night, I am in a somewhat unfit condition to make any extended observations to-day ; but I regard this question of such supreme importance to Canada that I read with great astonishment the announcement that my hon. friend from Quebec West, one of the members of this Government, had assumed an attitude of open and avowed hostility to the proposal of a twenty-knot service between Great Britain and Canada. However, I pass by that point to deal for a few moments with what I regard the great importance of the Government giving this subject the attention that it deserves before they arrive at any premature decision to prevent such service being carried into effect. I may say, Sir, that this House has for a long time past been making every possible effort to get a fast Atlantic service. When the House voted 100,000 pounds a year, for ten years, for that service, and when efforts were made to secure its being taken up by capitalists in England, I received a communication from the present Duke of Devonshire, then the Marquis of Hartington, saying that he was satisfied that unless the Government of Canada were prepared to add to that appropriation and make it 150,000 pounds, it would not be possible to obtain the service. I placed myself at once in communication with the then Premier, the late Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, who authorized me to say that the Government would apply to Parliament for the sum of 150,000 pounds per annum for the purpose of securing so important a service. Subsequently, and shortly before that great conference was held here at Ottawa, in which the Imperial Government was represented and the Australasian and South African Colonies were represented, by direction of the Government, I, in conjunction with the representatives in London of the Australasia Colonies, waited upon the Marquis of Ripon, and pressed upon him the importance of the Imperial Government being prepared to give substantial assistance in aid of this project, and we gave the assurance that it would receive the hearty support of Canada and of Australasia. I may say, Sir, that no person knows better than my hon. friend from Quebec West, that a gentleman who has taken a very prominent part in relation to Imperial defence, at once attacked this proposal unless it was accompanied by a substantial pledge on the part of Canada and Australasia that we would contribute largely to the support of the Imperial navy. Finding that public opinion was likely to be prejudiced on this important question, as my hon. friend from Quebec West knows, I delivered an address at the Royal Colonial Institute, at which the Marquis of Lorne presided, for the purpose of placing before the British public and the press and Parliament of England, the great importance of this fast Atlantic service, and the importance which Canada and Australasia attached to it. On that occasion I set forth the great importance to Canada of taking advantage of the geographical position of this country, and having such a service between Great Britain and Canada as would draw this great Dominion and the mother country more closely together. I pointed out that with a twenty-knot service it was quite feasible, in fact it was obviously practicable, for Canada to be able to deliver mails and passengers in the city of New York in a shorter time than it could be done by the fastest ships that now sail on the Atlantic directly from Great Britain to the United States; and that so far as Canada was concerned, Quebec, Montreal, Toronto and all these important centres in Canada, and so far as the western states were concerned, the gain would be such as to enable Canada, at all events, to perform the mail service for a very large portion of this continent. Now, in that connection I had the great satisfaction of seeing my hon. friend from Quebec West give me the most ardent and able support. When my proposal was attacked, as it was attacked, by Sir John Colombe, he was answered in a very strong and able speech by my hon. friend from Quebec West, who pointed out the great importance of this measure to Canada and the mother country; and I take this opportunity of thanking that hon. gentleman very much for a speech that, delivered before a crowded assembly, did a great deal to strengthen public opinion, and to inform the press and public men of England of the great importance of this measure. Now, I may say that at this conference that took place in Ottawa, as the First Minister knows, a resolution was arrived at approving in the most hearty manner of the proposal to shorten the distance between Great Britain and Australasia by having a fast line of Atlantic steamships running between a port in Great Britain and Canada, and between Vancouver and Australasia. Hon. gentlemen need not be told that the action of that conference received the most hearty, enthusiastic and eloquent endorsement from the hon. gentleman who now occupies the position of First Minister.

ROYAL ASSENT.

A message from the Honourable Sir Henry Strong, Deputy Governor, by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod:

Mr. Speaker, Sir Henry Strong, Deputy Governor, desires the immediate attendance of your Honourable House in the Chamber of the Honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker and the House went up to the Senate Chamber.

IN THE SENATE CHAMBER.

His Honour the Deputy Governor was pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following Bill:—

An Act for granting to Her Majesty the sum of $446,500 required for defraying certain expenses in connection with the annual drill of the militia during the financial year ending the 30th June, 1857.

SUPPLY—FAST ATLANTIC SERVICE.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, the proceedings of the conference, were followed, I am informed—I had not the pleasure of being here—by a motion in this House to appropriate £150,000 sterling for the purpose of securing a fast Atlantic service, and that motion received the unanimous assent of the House, or at all events it was passed without a division. That action, of course, strengthened the hands of those on the other side of the water who were seeking to secure the co-operation of Her Majesty's Government. I do not think this House can attach too much importance to the great advantage to Canada of having the Imperial Government and Parliament join in promoting enterprises in which both Canada and the mother country are interested. I believe it would be difficult to overrate the importance after having constructed, as we have done, a great trans-continental line of railway from Halifax to Vancouver, of any steps calculated to make that great line of internal communication the great highway of the nations, a highway not only between Great Britain but between Europe and the far east, China and Japan, and also with the provinces of Australasia. All these objects are prominently kept in view in connection with this proposed fast line service. The Imperial Government were approached on behalf of Canada and of the Australasian provinces, and they were pressed strongly upon this question, and as I have already stated, the Marquis of Ripon, who was then the Colonial Minister, was most sympathetic, and the Earl of Rosebery, who was then the Prime Minister, took a most lively interest in the question. They secured the appointment of a large departmental committee, respecting the various departments of the Government, the Admiralty, Post Office, Colonial Office, Treasury, and one or two others, and this question was receiving the attention of this committee when the change of Government took place. When Mr. Chamberlain became Colonial Minister, the matter was pressed upon his attention. He promised to give the most prompt consideration through this departmental committee, which had been previously formed, to the importance of pressing this matter to a conclusion, and at a very early day he was in a position to assure me that Her Majesty's Government, having fully and carefully considered this important question, were prepared to join with Canada, and apply to the Imperial Parliament for such assistance as would be required to carry it out. I will not go perhaps quite so far as that; but I will say that what the Colonial Minister communicated to me was that he was not prepared to say that the Government would give £75,000 a year, because it was necessary to ask for new tenders, and the service might not require that amount in addition to what had been voted by the Canadian Parliament, but what was intimated to me was, that Her Majesty's Government would be prepared to guarantee one-third of the cost when that was definitely ascertained after new tenders had been received. That was done, as the hon. gentleman knows, and it was done with the unanimous consent of this House. The leader of the Government will remember that when the late Government were unable to carry anything through this House owing to the obstruction with which they were met, a very striking exception was made in regard to that measure, and a Bill was allowed to be passed amending the previous Act in such a way as would enable the Government promptly to call for tenders. Those tenders were made, and very properly so, subject to the approval of Parliament. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Dobell) in his remarks last night was not warranted in arriving at the conclusion that we were indebted to Mr. Chamberlain for a contract not having been closed without the acquiescence of this Parliament. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken, because we had no power to close the contract. The hon. gentleman will see that under the Act we were compelled to submit whatever contract we made to the approval of Parliament; we could not act without the approval of Parliament for it was a condition on which the Act was passed, as hon. gentlemen opposite will remember. Tenders were called for as early as we could establish the form and character of the service required, and prompt action was taken by the Government because we knew that unless a contract was entered into, subject, of course, to the approval of Parliament, it would be impossible to secure what we were aiming at, and that was to have this service go into operation two years from the present season. I understood the Minister of Trade and Commerce to say that none of the tenders were strictly formal, and as regards that point the hon. gentleman is undoubtedly correct; but the only point that was informal in the tenders was the time allowed after accepting the tender for parties to make their financial arrangements. I believe I am safe in making that statement.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). The fact was that the tenderers reserved the option to go on or not, as they pleased. It was not merely a question of time; they took to themselves, in so many words, the option to go on or not.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have mentioned the reason. But it was not for the purpose, as has been explained, of making the necessary financial arrangements, because any one knowing the position of the Allan Company which tendered, and the great wealth of the firm in Glasgow, must be well aware that whatever as regards any undertaking into which they entered the firm was in a position to command financial strength necessary to carry it through. But the object they had in view, as stated by a very able gentleman connected with that firm, Mr. Dunlop, who is well known as the representative of the firm in Glasgow, was to secure time to make such arrangements with the great carrying companies, the Canadian Pacific Railway and Grand Trunk Railway, as would not leave their enterprise at the mercy of the action of those companies. No doubt the Minister of Trade and Commerce is aware that that qualification was distinctly withdrawn. The present High Commissioner in London told me he had an interview with Mr. Dunlop, and pointed out to him that on account of the doubts prevailing as to the tender of the firm being an absolute tender, that difficulty was at once removed by withdrawing that restriction and thus making the tender absolute, in which position the tenderer must go forward. That being the position of this question, I did hope that after all the efforts Canada had made, and in view of the great importance of this subject, there was no doubt but that the present Government would proceed with all their energy and power to secure its accomplishment. I have shown the very strong reason that Her Majesty's Government had for believing that this question was regarded not only by the late Government, but by all parties in this House, as one of supreme importance. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Dobell) stated last night :

I have not seen any evidence yet that the British government would not be prepared to help us if we adopted an 18-knot service.

It is right for me to say to the hon. gentleman that I had it in the most clear and distinct manner from the Colonial Minister that he would not feel himself justified in asking Parliament for a single pound of aid to this service if it were not a 20-knot service. He attached such great importance to shortening the distance between Great Britain and Canada to the narrowest possible limit, that it was absolutely a "sine qua non" that it should be a 20-knot service. That requirement was put in the tenders under the conviction that not a particle of assistance could be obtained from Her Majesty's Government for any less speed than twenty knots.

Now, Sir, I cannot understand the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell). When I came to Canada I had the honour of receiving an invitation from the Quebec Board of Trade, of which the hon. gentleman was president. He then very kindly offered that the Quebec Board of Trade should do me the great honour of entertaining me, and that, as I believe, was for the chief purpose of enabling me to put distinctly before them the great advantages that would arise from this proposed fast Atlantic service. The hon. gentleman knows that the communication in summer was to be between Quebec and a port in Great Britain, and in winter between Halifax and Great Britain. The hon. gentleman will hardly underrate the importance which I have always understood the Board of Trade of the city of Quebec, and the people of Quebec, have felt in this enterprise. I have taken the best possible means of informing myself in regard to that, and I have been completely misled if this is not a project which commends itself to the most hearty approval of the enterprising citizens of Quebec.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Hear, hear, everybody there wants it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Dobell) can hardly underrate the attractions which the St. Lawrence route would present to the great tide of pleasure-seekers, and the great tide of passenger traffic which is passing to and fro between this continent and Europe throughout the season. The hon. gentleman cannot underestimate the advantages of a service which would enable passengers before going on the open sea to overcome seasickness, that bane of travel on the ocean. The hon. gentleman cannot possibly underrate the great attractions to that tide of travel passing from the American republic to Great Britain, which an ocean voyage of three days instead of six days would present.

I can well understand, Sir, the opposition that our proposed fast line would receive from such as the Cunard Line, of which I believe the hon. gentleman himself (Mr. Dobell) is the agent in the city of Quebec. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Dobell) shakes his head. Well, then, I have been misinformed as to that. I know the Cunard people well, and I have always known the hostility of these great steamship lines sailing from New York to any such formidable rival as a Canadian fast Atlantic service would present. They would be more than men if they did not use every means in their power to endeavour to counteract the competition, which I am satisfied they would have every reason to dread. Not only would this fast Atlantic service be the means of drawing the great commercial cities of Canada closer to the mother country, but it would also be the means of making Canada the great highway between the east and Europe. A letter or a passenger could go from London to Yokohama via the Canadian route, and across that line of steamers on the Pacific subsidized by us and the Imperial Government, in one-half the time required by the Suez Canal, the next shortest route. Letters have been delivered in twenty days from Yokohama from London, whereas more than double that period is required by the Suez Canal. I have seen a number of passengers who have travelled from the east by the Canadian route, and such was the pleasure and comfort of the voyage that they have told me that nothing would ever induce them to go by any other route. I draw attention to that as a very important matter. My hon. friend (Mr. Dobell) will also see how anxious the people of Australasia would be that we should have a fast Atlantic service which would shorten the voyage between Australia and the mother country. And, Sir, not only would the fast Atlantic service which we propose be of great importance for mails and passengers, but every one knows that one of the most important conditions in the invitation for tenders which we sent out, and one of the most important conditions in this contract which we proposed to make—and which I was in hopes would be made at an early date between the Allan Company and this Government—one of the most important considerations was that they were to provide all the cold storage required. The contract embraced ample provisions for cold storage, making it, in my judgment, of the greatest advantage to all the farming interests, as well as to the population generally of Canada. All the perishable food products, such as fruit, meat, vegetables, eggs, butter, cheese, in fact, everything that our farmers want a market for, could, if this fast Atlantic service was established, be placed on the British market practically in as short a period almost as they could be obtained from Scotland. The hon. gentlemen opposite must see that it would be impossible to underrate the direct pecuniary advantage this would be to the great farming population of Canada—and there is no portion of our farming population so deeply and vitally interested in this as are the farmers of the province of Quebec. They would have cold storage provided at the city of Quebec, to which they could at once send their produce in the freshest possible condition, to be transferred the next day to the steamer; and in that way they could reach England within five days, bridging the Atlantic as it were. Under these circumstances, I regret most deeply the statement of the hon. gentleman. I regret it, not from a party point of view at all. I believe that the greatest injury the hon. gentleman could do to himself, the greatest barrier he could erect against his return here at a future day as a representative of the city of Quebec, is to obstruct this fast Atlantic service. I am open to correction; but I do not believe that we would see the hon. gentleman sitting in this House to-day if prior to his election he had put himself in antagonism to that project. It has never been a party question, I am happy to say. I have drawn the attention of the House to the unanimous support which this project received in its inception from this House; and last session I was personally indebted to the hon. gentleman who now leads the Government for having presented no hostility to the passage of the Bill which enabled us to call promptly for tenders, and to lay those tenders on the Table of this House. Under these circumstances, I would like to call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to an authority which I think all hon. gentlemen opposite will regard as a very high authority. I refer to the "Globe" newspaper. That paper is not published in the city of Quebec; it has not the direct and almost personal interest in this great question which every resident of the city of Quebec has. It is published in the city of Toronto, away in the heart of Ontario; and yet, Sir, you will search in vain for any argument more clear, more forcible, and more unanswerable, in my judgment, than that contained in an article of the Toronto "Globe" of August 6th on this very subject. It points out the difficulties that have been suggested. Then, referring to the distance from Quebec to Liverpool, it says:

For a 20-knot steamer this distance represents only 133 hours steaming, giving a saving of 59 hours, or over 30 per cent. In winter the voyage from Liverpool to Halifax would be completed in 120 hours at this speed.

Again:

The superiority of the Canadian route will thus amount to at least a whole day in summer and more than a day and a half in winter, from port to port. If in respect of accommodation for all classes of passengers the new steamers are fully equal to those of the New York lines, a very large passenger traffic will be attracted to the Canadian route.

I may say that the contractors are required to provide the very finest service to be found in any part of the world, with passenger accommodation equal to that provided on any of the New York lines.

Not only Canadian passengers, but those going to and from Chicago and the western states, as well as all travellers to and from China, Japan and Australia, will find this route the fastest and most attractive.

Every word of this is not only perfectly sound and accurate, but it commends itself, I am sure, to the judgment of every intelligent Canadian; and when we have an opportunity of getting Her Majesty's Government to unite with us, and to contribute one-third of the amount necessary to obtain this vast boon for Canada, why should any hon. gentleman in this House place himself in a position of avowed antagonism to this great measure? I do not hesitate to say that our position with the Imperial Government will be weakened if it is found, after they have taken a great deal of trouble in connection with this project, and have committed themselves—and the hon. gentleman knows how difficult it is to get the members of the Government to commit themselves—to the great responsibility of providing £75,000 sterling per year for ten years for a service not in their own country, that Canada recedes from her position and says, "We have changed our minds, and we do not intend to go on with this service to which we have professed to attach so much importance as to induce you to commit yourselves in this unreserved way. The "Globe" says further :

Attention will be drawn to Canada. The attractions which she offers to all classes of tourists and sportsmen will be more fully appreciated than hitherto, and European travellers in search of rest and sport will find in Canada fresh and inexhaustible opportunities far superior to those of Switzerland or Norway.

The hon. gentleman cannot underrate the importance of attracting wealthy and influential tourists from Great Britain or any part of the continent of Europe to Canada, as we all believe that all that is necessary to advance immeasurably the interests of this country is to bring its inexhaustible resources prominently before the capitalists of Europe. The "Globe" says further :

We think there is a great deal in the contention of the Patrons that improved freight facilities are of more importance than of improved service for passengers and mails. On this point the assurance is given that the fast steamers would be fitted with large refrigerators, which will enable shippers of Canadian butter and eggs, fruit, cheese and dressed meat, and possibly of other perishable articles, such as fresh salmon and other fish, to send their goods to the British market in the best possible condition. The Allans also proposed to establish in conjunction with the fast service a line of cargo steamers of great size and high power for the further development of their cargo and cattle carrying trade. The cargo steamers will be 8,000 to 9,000 tons, and will be fitted with the most modern appliances for carrying live stock, as well as with large chilled spaces for meat shipments and dairy products. We are told that such vessels, with their large cargo capacity, will supply the best accommodation for all kinds of freight, and will also be available for bringing to Canada large numbers of immigrants during the busy season, when the space on the fast steamers may be overcrowded.

I will not detain the House with more than one more quotation :

As to the amount of the subsidy, the cost of the mail steamers is estimated at $7,000,000 and the cost of maintenance at $3,000,000. It has been suggested to the Government that a service of 18-knot steamers might be substituted for the 20-knot service for which tenders have already been received. Against this it is argued that in comparison with the New York lines an 18-knot service would rank as second-class ; that it would attach to such service ; that it would attract no attention to the Canadian route, and would almost certainly fail to divert traffic, either passenger or freight, from the New York route ; that it would be no advertisement for Canada.

I will not add anything beyond saying that it is not too late yet for the colleagues of the hon. member for Quebec West to overrule his determination to obstruct this important service, and that they will be able to convince even that hon. gentleman that he will be doing a great injustice to Canada if by his present attitude he should be able to obstruct and prejudice a project to which the minds of the whole people of Canada have long been turned, and in which they take the deepest interest.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I am grateful to the hon. gentleman for having brought this important subject to the attention of the House, and, on the whole, I may say that I have not to complain of the remarks he has made, except in this respect, that he has been most unjust and unfair to my hon. friend from Quebec West (Mr. Dobell). My hon. friend never stated, and could not have stated—the hon. gentleman certainly must have misapprehended him altogether—that the Government had come to a determination to substitute an 18-knot service for a 20-knot service. He could not have made such a statement, because it is in the knowledge of the House—there can be no dispute as to that—that the Government has come to no determination whatever upon the tenders which have been received. The whole question of the service is under consideration, and has to be considered very carefully, for the reasons I am about to state. The hon. gentleman, I was glad to see, remembered and recalled to the House that last session, in the position I then occupied, I thought it my duty to offer to the Government every facility for passing a Bill which enabled the Government to call for tenders for this trans-Atlantic service. And I did so during the last session, not only as a Canadian, but as specially interested in the matter, representing, as I do, the city of Quebec, which is most interested. The present arrangements which exist with regard to the St. Lawrence are satisfactory to nobody, and most unsatisfactory to the city of Quebec. That city, by the facilities it offers, having the finest harbour on the continent, certainly the finest harbour in the Dominion—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Except Halifax.

The PRIME MINISTER. I allow this local prejudice to my hon. friend, but still it will not modify my opinion. At all events, as far as the navigation of the St. Lawrence is concerned, the consensus of opinion was that Quebec ought to be the terminus of this line, and, of course, as a Quebecker, representing the city of Quebec, we were in hopes that such a line, when established, would develop, not only the passenger trade of Canada at the harbour of Quebec, but also the traffic trade. But, when we came to open the tenders which were received by the late Government, upon the notices published in the newspapers, we found that they provided for a passenger service, but not for a freight service. It is in the knowledge, I think, of everybody, that naval construction, as many other things in this day, is undergoing constant changes. We found that, while the boats provided would have furnished splendid passenger service, they would afford no facilities at all for freight. The space allotted for freight could not accommodate more than from eleven to fifteen hundred tons. Now, I would ask the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) who put the question yesterday to my hon. friend from Quebec West (Mr. Dobell), if he would be satisfied with boats which, though they gave facilities for the passenger traffic, gave no facilities at all for freight traffic, and would carry only from eleven to fifteen hundred tons of freight. I do not know but that we may be obliged, in the end, to take those boats; but, before we give our assent to a proposition of this character, it is our duty to exhaust every possible means of information as to whether or not, for the money we would have to pay, we could obtain a better service, not only as far as the passenger traffic is concerned, but so far as the freight service is concerned also. I take issue with the hon. gentleman, furthermore, in this. He said, a moment ago, that in the specifications which were published, it was specially provided that the boats subsidized would afford ample facilities for cold storage. It is true that the tenders which were published contained the special provision that the boats to be subsidized should have ample and the latest and best provision for cold storage. But, in all the tenders received, not a word is to be found about cold storage. Under the circumstances, I should like to know if the hon. gentleman is prepared to say that it was our duty to accept at once those tenders and get Parliament to vote the money, while no provision was made for cold storage.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The draft contract provides for it; and, as the invitation for tenders contained that as an essential condition, of course, we would have made no contract unless it covered all the requirements set out in the invitation for tenders.

The PRIME MINISTER. The draft contract which was submitted, certainly provided for cold storage, but the tenders do not contain any provision, and I do not know how you could compel a tenderer to sign that contract. I will give my hon. friend a better answer. The Messrs. Allan have stated in the press, I believe, that they were prepared with their other boats to provide for cold storage. That may be, but the fact still remains that, when you have to deal with matters of this kind, when Canada is asked to pay no less a sum than $750,000 a year, we not only have the right, but it is our duty, to see that we make the best possible bargain we can. That is the reason why we have not moved hastily. Speaking, not only as a Canadian and a member of the Government, but as representative of the city of Quebec, I have no hesitation in saying that, if the boats had no provision for cold storage, they would not be at all what the people of the city of Quebec expect. They expect that this service will be one that will not only develop the passenger trade at the port of Quebec, but the freight trade as well. This is the reason why the Government have thought it advisable to make haste slowly. There is another reason why we have not proceeded more rapidly. The tenders were not specific and absolute. The Messrs. Allan themselves and Mr. Huddart did not tender absolutely, and we were not in a position to compel them, in the face of the tenders they put in, to enter into a contract at once, because they reserved to themselves a period of four months in which to ascertain whether they could make certain financial arrangements, and, if they failed, they were to be at liberty to withdraw. What is the answer of the hon. gentleman to this? It is that the character of the Messrs. Allan is well known, that they are a wealthy firm, and that they would have no difficulty in making the necessary financial arrangements. I do not dispute that. But my hon. friend has a greater faith in the ability in this respect of the Messrs. Allan than they have themselves, because they did not undertake to accept the contract absolutely, but made a condition, and at the end of four months it was in their power to admit, or not to admit, or refuse. Now, the hon. gentleman knows very well that it was impossible for the Government, under such circumstances, not to refer these tenders to the Colonial Office. When the correspondence is brought down—and I hope that it will be brought down before the session is over—the House will see more clearly the necessity for this step. The hon. gentleman perhaps may remember that on the face of the correspondence, as it exists to-day, it was impossible for the Government to deal with the matter unless with previous conference with the Colonial Office, because the Colonial Office intimated, if I remember aright—and I think I may say this without breaking any confidence—that the tenders being as they were, perhaps the Government would have to consider whether new tenders should or should not be called for.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

The PRIME MINISTER. My recollection is that there is an intimation to that effect. I am quite sure that it will be found in the correspondence when it is brought down. But, even if the intimation is not there, taking the question as a mere matter of business argument, when the tenders were not absolute, was it possible, would it have been right, for this Government to give the contract and ask Parliament to vote the money unless ratification had been obtained from the Colonial Office? These are the reasons why we found it wise to proceed slowly. But proceed we must. The Government has no intention of shirking the duty that rests upon it of providing the best possible service on the Atlantic, a service which must give us not only passenger traffic but must develop our freight service. The service will be acceptable to the Canadian farmer only if our farmers are able to get by means of it that rapid and safe carrying of their produce to which the hon. gentleman alluded a moment ago. That is the main reason, I may say, why we thought we had to get more knowledge of this question before we gave the contract—because no provision was made in the tenders received, to give to the farmers of Canada those facilities for carrying their produce which they had reason to expect. And I hope that by next session we shall be in a position to ask Parliament to vote for a service which will not only be the best so far as the passenger service is concerned, but the best also so far as the freight trade of this country is concerned.

Mr. DOBELL. Mr. Speaker, I hope to confine myself to a very few words, so few that I find it necessary in advance to express the hope that the hon. leader of the Opposition will not think that it is from any lack of respect for him that I occupy so short a time in answering some of the remarks he has made with reference to myself. I think I can say that when, last evening, I reiterated the substance of the address that I had made to the Quebec Board of Trade a few weeks ago, an extract from which was read by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain), I did not say anything either in contradiction of or at all inconsistent with the course which the Government had laid down for itself on this question. On the contrary, I claim that I was in perfect accord with that course. The hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) tried to make me out inconsistent and tried to exaggerate very much certain things that I had said last night, by stating that they involved open antagonism to the Government's course. Now, big words always appear to me to indicate a very weak cause; I never knew any one who thought it necessary to use strong language except to hide some weakness in his position. Mr. Speaker, I went upon the hustings advocating a fast, first-class steamship service, and I favour that to-day; we can be content with nothing less. But I do say that the Government have acted wisely in carefully guarding the contracts to be entered into for that fast service. And, Mr. Speaker, is it not worth while, before entering upon a contract involving this tremendous obligation, to see the result of the working of the 20-knot steamers that are now plying between Liverpool and New York? Why should we not profit by the experience of a large line like the Cunard line, and not put upon this country an obligation that we may be sorry for? I wish to speak moderately regarding hon. gentlemen opposite, because only yesterday, as it were, I was with them, and therefore it would ill-become me to say anything severe. But I would ask them if some of their contracts would not have been better if they had paused a little before entering upon them. The hon. leader of the Opposition did infer some things which jarred upon my better nature, I am not thin-skinned, but when the hon. gentleman referred to an invitation extended to him, like some others, he did not tell the whole truth. He did not tell us that at that time he occupied the very high and enviable position of High Commissioner of Canada. I had no idea that he had abandoned that position. We extended that invitation to him, not as leader of the Opposition, but as High Commissioner. We felt it due to him. No matter how poor we may be, at least we never forget the duties of hospitality. We extended an invitation to the High Commissioner, as we thought, but when he cast off the cloak of High Commissioner and showed himself as a politician, why, Sir, we could not invite him as a body, and we did not. I should not speak harshly, because the hon. gentleman has been generous in dealing with a certain subject that I would have felt delicacy in mentioning. I am no orator as Brutus is, but a plain, blunt man. Being probed on a certain question, I did rise and make a speech in the Colonial Department, in defence of a cause that I will always defend to the utmost of my power, no matter in what part of the world I may be. The attack was not upon me, but upon Canada and upon the alleged meanness of Canada, and the expression used, was that Canada had never contributed one brass farthing to the defence of the Empire. Mr. Speaker, would you need to be probed a second time before springing to your feet and telling the gentleman who made such a remark that he did not know what he was talking about? The gentleman in question was Sir John Colomb. I was satisfied that he knew nothing about Canada, but that he was one of those who sow discord and create ill-feeling between the mother country and her colonies; and I took occasion to tell him, that it was a body of exactly such men who lost us the United States over a hundred years ago. Now, another slightly incorrect statement made by the hon. leader of the Opposition was that I worked with him on Imperial defence.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon; I did not refer to that subject.

Mr. DOBELL. I understood the hon. leader of the Opposition to state that I had worked with him heartily on Imperial defence.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No; I did not refer to it at all.

Mr. DOBELL. I only wished to say that I never belonged to that organization.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Nor did I. I was always opposed to it. The hon. gentleman and I worked together.

Mr. DOBELL. I had great pleasure in working with the hon. leader of the Opposition on many occasions in London, and I shall be very glad, if he ever again takes the place of High Commissioner, to work with him again, and always for the benefit of Canada. Well, Sir, I do not think that I need to take up the time of the House much longer. There are other things that I would like to speak about, but there will be an opportunity.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. DOBELL. No, Mr. Speaker, I think I have answered sufficiently the charge brought against me; I think I have shown that there has been nothing inconsistent in my action with regard to the fast line service. I have always held the ground since I have been in this House that a twenty-knot steamer is too extravagant for this country; such a service can never be carried on to advantage. I think we can give finer accommodation, and more comfortable—I dwell largely on comfort, because we Canadians, I find, like a great deal of comfort for a very little money.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DOBELL. Yes, Mr. Speaker, Canadians, and Western Americans, too, want to cross the Atlantic for $75 to $80, and if you ask them for more, they will see if there is not a cheaper line going, and they will take that. But there is one little matter I would like to clear up, and this is a good occasion for doing so. The hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) made a statement a night or two ago, personal to myself, that I had come out as an Independent Conservative. Now, I want to put that matter straight. I came out strictly as an Independent, and told a member of the late Government that I would not accept the slightest favour from the Conservatives. I came out strictly as an Independent, and I set myself to run against their nominee.

An hon. MEMBER. What are you now?

Mr. DOBELL. I am a loyal Liberal, and very proud of it.

Mr. FOSTER. We are certainly very much indebted to the hon. gentleman for the outspoken confidence with which he has favoured us. It is a case of about as quick a conversion as has ever been put upon record in this House.

Mr. LISTER. Not as quick as yours was.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend who made that remark will please have the kindness to state to what he refers. As I hear no explanation, I understand it was one of those interruptions which proceed from nothing, and had no object. But the hon. gentleman stated that he came out on the hustings and in the contest as a strict and straight Independent. Well, we have no fault to find with that; but within a month of the time that he took his stand on the platform as a strict Independent and was elected upon that platform, we find him joining a Liberal Government, and forgetting entirely the platform upon which he had been elected, and the electors who had sent him from the city of Quebec as an Independent. He canvassed on that basis, he got his vote on that basis, and no sooner had he got his vote on that basis as one of the prime elements of the contract that he made with his electors, than he ceased to be an Independent, and joined the ranks of one of the parties and became a member of a party Government. My hon. friend has a perfect right to do that, I do not blame him for doing it, if he considers that was the best course.

Mr. DOBELL. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. But he will acknowledge with me that it was a pretty sharp turn, and amounts almost to a breach of his canvass contract. If my hon. friend has joined a Liberal Government from the basis of an Independent canvass, on the condition that he should go back to his constituents and say to them: Now, I have obtained new light, and I propose no longer to be an Independent, as I told you last week and the week before that I should be. I have joined a Liberal Government, and I want you to give me your opinion of my action. That would have been all right; but the hon. gentleman went straight from his canvass as an Independent, and the votes that he got upon that basis, to a portfolio which did not submit him to the criticisms of the electorate whom he had canvassed as an Independent.

Now, Sir, this question divides itself into two parts. There is, first, the attitude of the Government with reference to the fast line service, and there is, secondly, the attitude of a portion of the Government with reference to such service; and it is well for us to see whether this Government, and the portion of the Government, stand upon the same platform. All that brought this matter before Parliament occurred in the city of Quebec, in a meeting of the Board of Trade of which my hon. friend is, I believe, at the present time the president. A report of that meeting was published in a Quebec paper, "La Semaine Commerciale," and a portion of it was read here last night having reference to the remarks of my hon. friend. Now, that paper is published in the city of Quebec, a city where this matter is a prominent subject of conversation, and which is very much interested in this question, and the report which this commercial paper, not a partisan paper, made of that meeting, may be taken as representing pretty clearly the statements of my hon. friend, and the trend of those statements. Well, I call the attention of my hon. friend to this fact, that we cannot read the editorial in "La Semaine Commerciale" without seeing that every line bears upon it the impression that the hon. gentleman is not in favour of a fast line properly so called; and that he put before the accomplishment of a fast line, if it ever is accomplished, certain other public works and improvements which he thinks ought to antedate the establishment of that line, certain works in the city of Quebec, such, for instance, as the paper puts it, as the completion of the Quebec bridge, which must be done before the fast line is put on. But the point I want to make now, and I call attention to it, is that the impression made by my hon. friend's speech was that he repudiated a fast line service, as it has been understood at any time during the last three years in this Parliament and in this country. The hon. gentleman shakes his head as intimating that he did not repudiate it; and yet the last sentence that he uttered with reference to this matter this afternoon, was that he was not in favour of a twenty-knot service. Now, Sir, such was the impression made upon that paper by the hon. gentleman's speech in the city of Quebec, at the Board of Trade. My hon. friend said last night that he spoke there as an individual, but he cannot disassociate himself from the Government which he joined from an independent basis, and with which he has linked his fortunes. I submit that the hon. gentleman, as a member of the Government, has no right to go to an important meeting in an important city, and, in his individual capacity, to declare his absolute opposition to a settled line of policy of a previous Government, a line of policy that has been discussed in the country for three years and practically taken as settled, a line of policy to which the present Government has on many occasions, through its individual members, given its adherence so far as the principle is concerned, and which the leader of the Government to-night says it is the determination of the Government to push forward to completion as rapidly as they think they can. Now, Sir, a portion of the Government goes down to the city of Quebec, and before any statement of policy has been given by the leader of the Government in the House, takes the public and the Board of Trade in that city into its confidence, and actually repudiates the chief principle of the fast line service, namely, the question of speed. My hon. friend not only did that in the city of Quebec, and this assumption was fairly taken by the paper which commented upon it, but later he came to this House last night and stated the same thing. The leader of the Government would lead the House to infer that we had pushed the statements of the hon. member for Quebec West further than they were intended to go. But I ask the attention of the House to what he did say last night, and to what he stated here this afternoon. Let us see what he said last night, and I will ask my hon. friend to read it and come to the conclusion, if he can, that the member of the Government who sits for Quebec City is in favour of a fast line service with the element of speed in it which is necessary for the accomplishment of a fast line service. The hon. gentleman said :

At the same time I have always claimed that a 20-knot steamer is too costly, and that the wants of this country are more in the direction of having extra good accommodation, larger steamers, but at the same time the passage money, not more costly, that Canadians desire to cross the Atlantic with all the comfort that it is possible to give them, but they do not want to pay more than $75 or $80 for the passage.

Take that sentence. In the first place, 20-knot steamers would be too costly. Then, the hon. gentleman, as a member of the Government, subscribed to the statement that he is not in favour of a 20-knot fast line, for it would be too costly. But he has another objection: Canadians want a good thing, but they want it cheap, and they will not be prepared to pay more than $75 or $80 for a passage. I tell the hon. gentleman and the leader of the Government that if they wait to obtain a fast line service consonant with the wishes of the country and at the same time to secure passage thereby at rates from $75 to $80, they will wait till doomsday. The hon. gentleman says that Canadians want a good thing, and want it cheap. He is opposed to a fast line because it is costly and it cannot be given to the country cheap, yet the hon. gentleman himself and thousands of Canadians, almost every year, go down to New York and take the best berths in the fastest steamers from that port to Liverpool, and they do not get them cheap. They know a good thing, they want it, and are prepared to pay for it. Would they not be willing to pay an equal price, if they sailed by a fast steamer from Quebec as from New York? But the hon. gentleman is opposed to a 20-knot service, chiefly because the people would not be able to get a $75 passage. He proceeded :

We have not people in this country who are prepared to pay £100, which was often paid from New York, and if we had 20-knot steamers from Quebec, I believe the enterprise would end in disappointment.

The hon. gentleman does not want to build too costly steamers; he does not want any steamers on which the passage will be more than $75 or $80, and he says that a fast line would end in disappointment. He has taken a position as unalterably opposed to any fast line that does not fulfil those conditions. No fast line service, however, could be established which would fulfil those conditions. The hon. gentleman further said :

It would involve an outlay of $750,000 a year. An 18-knot service—I have never said 17 or 18 knots, and I have always claimed that we should have 18 knots—could be performed from Quebec to Liverpool in the same time as a 20-knot service would perform the voyage from New York to Liverpool. The working of this line would cause a saving of about half the cost, we would have accommodation in the way of cold storage, and more capacity for general cargo. Besides, I believe that before long power will be applied to steamers in a more economical way than is the case to-day. I am told that 20-knot steamers from New York cost a very large sum in repairs, and that an 18-knot service suffers from far less friction and is performed with more comfort and ease than a 20-knot service.

There is no use giving any more quotations from the hon. gentleman's speech. He has placed himself squarely on record as not being in favour of any service which is more rapid than 18 knots, and he has given the reasons why he is in favour of that kind of service. Does the hon. leader of the Government subscribe to that doctrine? The hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) is one of his prominent supporters, and is a member of the Government, and he has taken a position as being unalterably opposed to a 20-knot service. The hon. gentleman might in two weeks' time, come from an independent platform and join a Liberal Government, and justify that to himself; but I doubt if, after his speeches delivered last night and to-day, in the event of his leader, next week or next session, bringing down a proposition to Parliament for a 20-knot service, involving the expenditure necessary for that service, the hon. gentleman could swallow his words and remain in that Government and vote for a policy of that kind. It is not necessary to go further in order to show the position which the hon. member for Quebec West takes with respect to the fast line service. He is against it; he is against a 20-knot service; he considers 18 knots sufficient, and he holds that fast steamers would be too expensive and would not give the requisite freight accommodation, and that the result of such a service would end in disappointment, and, therefore, he is unalterably opposed to it. That is the position of the hon. member for Quebec West. I now come to the position of the leader of the Government, who is supposed to represent all the Government—or what portion of the Government does he represent?

Mr. DOMVILLE. Those who have not bolted.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman has bolted for a good position, and, no doubt, he would be prepared to bolt again.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I bolted you.

Mr. FOSTER. No doubt, the hon. gentleman would be prepared to bolt again for a good position.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I bolted into a good one, and you bolted out.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman has said he is in favour of securing for this country a fast service as rapidly as it can be obtained. The hon. gentleman does not bind himself that the service will not be beyond 18 knots. By that very statement he intimates that it will in reality be a fast service, and consequently there is a position of antagonism between the hon. leader of the Government and those members of the Government he represents, and the member of the Government representing Quebec West (Mr. Dobell). The hon. leader of the Government, however, seeks to justify delay, and to justify delay on several grounds. One of his many grounds is this, that the vessels for which tenders were asked and for which tenders were received, were so deficient in freight accommodation that he thought it would be well for the Government to go slowly, in order that they might secure large freight accommodation, together with a fast service.

The PRIME MINISTER. To ascertain if it were possible.

Mr. FOSTER. I quite understand that. I think it is the saving clause in the hon. gentleman's declaration, and he knew exactly what he said, when he made that statement.

The PRIME MINISTER. I hope so.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman, as a result of his investigations, will not be able to avoid the extreme difficulty of providing ample freight capacity and a rapid service in the same vessel. The more closely the hon. gentleman inquires into the matter, the more he will be satisfied that the Government have only a limited range of choice as to the quantity of freight that can be carried, if the main idea of having a fast service is maintained. If it is laid down that the speed shall be such as to entitle the service to be called a fast service—and 18 knots would not, in the opinion of this House, so entitle it—the hon. gentleman will find, and, no doubt, he knows to-day, that the capacity for freight must necessarily be limited. The hon. gentleman said that the capacity would only be 1,000 or 1,500 tons; I think that is about right, so far as my memory goes. It will be impossible, unless you very greatly increase the tonnage and size of the vessel, which will, of course, increase the cost very largely, to secure very much larger freight capacity than from 1,500 to 2,000 tons.

The question has got to be fought on these lines; as to whether you shall repudiate this fast line principle of passengers and mails and subordinate it to the freight, or whether you will subordinate the freight capacity to the principle of speed in the conveyance of passengers and mails. That, I think, my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) will find out. Although it is perfectly right for him to make his investigation and see whether or not the freight can be extended, I think he will find out that unless he is prepared to very nearly double the tonnage of the vessels as compared with the tonnage of the tenders for which we called, he will not be able to accomplish any very much larger scope of freight combined with the speed that is necessary for making it in reality a fast service. So much with reference to that. But 1,500 tons or 2,000 tons per vessel is still a very respectable quantity of freight of the kind that this will be.

The PRIME MINISTER. 2,000 tons is out of the question altogether. The extreme limit is 1,500 tons.

Mr. FOSTER. I am giving my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) the scope to make the tonnage larger and keep the speed and get up to as high as 2,000 tons. That he may do, but he has got to make his vessels of much larger tonnage than those for which we asked for in the tender.

The PRIME MINISTER. Exactly.

Mr. FOSTER. And if he does that, he has got to add materially to the cost of the whole service, and the amount of capital required to build them and to put in the machinery which will run them will have to be very much larger.

The PRIME MINISTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. I call my hon. friend's attention to this. There is only one kind of freight which seeks these large vessels, and that is the finer quality of perishable freight, and it will be no small amount if the vessels which are at present called for would carry 1,500 tons per trip, which would be an aggregate of 78,000 or 80,000 tons in a year of that particular class of products which will alone pay for its carriage in fast vessels. And, if my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier), by adding greatly to the tonnage and consequently to the cost of the vessels, is able to bring it up to 2,000 tons, he will not very much largely increase the amount of freight compared with that which offers, but he will very largely increase the cost of the service. But, I think what takes place is this, and what takes place under these peculiar conditions where these tenders are now, is that fast freight vessels follow in the wake of a fast line such as we are contemplating to put on. What I fear we may miss—and I hope my hon. friend will take it into account—is this: that if there ever has been a peculiarly favourable condition for joining these two as a sequence, that condition occurs now in the tenders which are put in for this very service. The Allans have tendered for the service. They are the principal tenderers, and are the ones whose tender will be chiefly looked at. The Allans are a Canadian company as well as a European company. They have a large freight interest over the world, and especially between Canada and Great Britain, and it would be peculiarly fortunate if they should get the fast line service carrying a minimum of freight where they are in a position to follow it up with a fleet of fast freight vessels in the line of operations which they have been carrying on for a series of years, and which they will continue to carry on and extend. No tenderer not having the plant and the experience and the vessels that the Allans have in this particular service would be able to supplement a fast line for mails and passengers with a fast freight line to at all the extent and with the ease that the Allan company can with reference to Canada. That is a strong point in this matter. My hon. friend will see that any delay, even for the saving of a small amount of money, would militate against placing the contract, if it can be done, under such favourable conditions for the extension of a fast freight service. So much with reference to that.

Now, my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) has tried to ground the reason for his delay on this: that what he wants is cold storage, and that although that entered into the correspondence, yet the tenders did not provide for cold storage.

The PRIME MINISTER. The tenders called for it.

Mr. FOSTER. The point my hon. friend made then was that the answers to the tenders did not reply to that point in the call for the tenders.

The PRIME MINISTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, now, my hon. friend knows perfectly well, and he will be the first one to acknowledge that that criticism fails very largely when he comes to look on what is the ordinary course of business. In a tender you call for certain things. The main point that the tenderer applies to in such case is the question of speed and the question of subsidy. All the rest is general. Once you have the points of speed and subsidy fixed, the other points are settled when you come to draw up and sign the contract between the Government and the steamship company. I recollect going through that same operation in the contract that was made with the Anderson company for this fast line some five or six years ago. Exactly the same course was pursued, but when we came to form the contract and to get it signed, every one of these points were carefully guarded and made provision for. In the contract, which my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) will find among the papers, he will see that that point was very carefully guarded. More than that, he will find that the Allan company were prepared to sign that draft contract. They approved of the draft contract after some correspondence had taken place and signified their approval and were ready to sign it, and in that contract the question of cold storage was amply provided for. There is therefore no ground for delay upon that point.

My hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) made the point that the tenders were not absolute, and that that was a reason why the Government should—I cannot understand what—but at least should invite delay. How does my hon. friend propose to cure that by delay? Is he going to call for new tenders and so throw open again to a long period of uncertainty and doubt the whole question which is now so closely approaching conclusion, both with reference to Canada and the Allan company, and with reference to Great Britain and its aid in the matter?

The PRIME MINISTER. I can answer that. If the Canadian Government alone were interested in this contract that point might easily be waived and got over; but my hon. friend is aware that we must consult the Colonial authorities in order to have a subsidy.

Mr. FOSTER My hon. friend is perfectly right in saying, not only that it is right for us to consult the Home Government, but the Home Government, seeing that a change of Government had just taken place, have very properly said: We do not wish finally to go into this matter until we have the opinion of the incoming Government, and more especially as the contracts had to be laid upon the Table of the House before they could be ratified. But my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) must also be frank enough to state this: that there was arrived at an absolute agreement between the Colonial Office and this Government with reference to the matter of the subsidies, and that one of the essential elements of that was that the speed should be up to the proper extent, and that they would not get help out of the British treasury for a line which did not in reality make itself approved as a fast line. The only delay that was necessary in that, if my hon. friend will allow me, was for the present Government to signify its assent to the arrangement, and ask that the contract be signed, with the understanding that the British Government was favourable to it. All the preliminaries, even to the details of the contract, were finally agreed upon and settled as between the two Governments; and that was the position in which my hon. friend found the matter when he took up the reins of Government. The point that was kept in view was that it was courteous and right that the incoming Government, in order to implement this contract, should have the opportunity of signifying its assent to it, and of carrying the matter to a conclusion. I think there is no delay necessary on that account. It was simply to enable the Government to give its views on those matters to the Colonial Office. So much with reference to that. The position, I take it, is better than I feared it was last night. The hon. First Minister, leading the Government, and I hope leading the hon. member for Quebec West—and that is not a difficult matter, judging from past experience—has made a statement from which we can congratulate this House and the country that the situation is not so bad as it appeared to be last night. As it appeared last night, it looked as if the Government had repudiated the fast line entirely. So far as the hon. member for Quebec West is concerned, he does repudiate it. He ties himself down to a service not exceeding 18 knots; and he gives reasons which, if he holds them, are reasons which exist to-day, which will exist to-morrow, which will exist for all time. So that we have the position of the leader of the Government in the main satisfactory, and if he will only assure the House—and I am not sure that he did not do it—that no unnecessary delay will take place in the Government availing themselves of the present favourable condition of things to make this contract fast, and to get this service started, even though the drag-wheels be put on by his hon. colleague from Quebec West, I think the House will rest satisfied with the policy and the announcement of the hon. gentleman with respect to that. At all events, a great weight has been taken off our shoulders and off the shoulders of the people by the hon. gentleman's statement. He almost made the statement that another member of the Government and his opinions are repudiated, and that the Government as a body goes in for the fast line service, and hopes to have it accomplished as soon as possible.

I would venture to suggest to the hon. gentleman that it is very unsettling and inconvenient to have members of the Government in one place repudiating a policy, and the Government in another place stating that they hold by the policy. I am afraid my hon. friend will have several difficulties of that kind. I notice that my hon. friend, in a telegram sent to British Columbia during the time of the elections, made a promise to the gentlemen who at that time were striving very hard to become members of this Parliament, that whatever view they took on Chinese immigration would be the view that he would subscribe to, and that would prevail. My hon. friend knew then the view of the British Columbia candidates; he knows now the view of the British Columbia members; and yet another important and honoured member of his Cabinet has pledged himself to that great and venerable statesman, Li Hung Chang, that he will not abandon him, and he last night put himself, in the most philosophic and generous way, in the forefront of the battle, and, in opposition to the leader of the Government, declared that his lance was in rest, and would never be lowered so long as Li Hung Chang needed a champion. I honour my hon. friend the Controller of Inland Revenue for his chivalry, and for holding firmly to the compact which he has made with Li Hung Chang. But I warn him that there will be a splintering of lances one way or the other when he meets his leader with the British Columbia delegation behind him—the British Columbia delegation declaring that the Chinese must not be allowed to come into this country, the leader of the Government declaring that what they want shall be carried out in law, and my hon. friend, in his philosophic and chivalric devotion to Li Hung Chang, declaring that he shall not be abandoned, and that the Chinese shall be welcome to come to Canada.

I hope my hon. friend can make a statement with reference to another matter which would be equally reassuring. There is today in this city a large delegation from the city of St. John. They are here because the impression has gone abroad that the policy of the late Government in reference to the subsidizing of steamers running from Portland to the old country is to be repudiated, and that these steamers are to be again subsidized. That question has been discussed in this Parliament, and I think it has been very largely the opinion of Parliament that the time had come when we should cease giving subsidies to any freight service, and in fact to any service, from United States ports, the vessels simply calling at Canadian ports and going to Great Britain. The former Government, after full consideration of the matter, came to the conclusion to adopt that policy, and they have put their views on record, and my hon. friend will find them in the records of the Privy Council Office. Now, I find that the fear is entertained all too largely, that that policy is to be abandoned, and that subsidies are to be granted to vessels plying as of old from Portland to the ports of Great Britain, and calling at St. John and Halifax. I hope my hon. friend will be able to make just as satisfactory a statement with reference to that as he did with reference to the fast line service. I do believe my hon. friend will not abandon the policy which this Parliament, I think, has affirmed with reference to that matter, which the late Government at least carried out; and he will do a great deal towards clearing up what is unsettling public opinion in the maritime provinces, if he will be kind enough to make a statement with reference to that matter this afternoon.

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir H. Joly de Lotbinière). Mr. Speaker, when I disagree with my hon. leader, I will certainly not follow the example set last session by the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Foster). I will not betray my leader as the hon. member betrayed his. When I differ from my leader I will tell him frankly. In the meantime, I may remind the members of this House that the position I took last night was perfectly clear. I stated that I had never consulted any of my colleagues on the Chinese question, that they had never consulted with me, that I had never heard them speak of the question; and if in the last election I did not know what took place in British Columbia it was because I was busy in my own corner of the Dominion with the work which the hon. members on the other side of the House had cut out for me when they tried to excite all the religious prejudices they could against me. When I heard the hon. member on the other side say that we had appealed to religious prejudices, I did not rise and speak; but since I am obliged to do it now, I tell hon. gentlemen opposite that they excited religious prejudices against us in the most shameful manner in the last election. I tell them that we are not answerable for the raising of religious prejudices, but they are, because the leader of the Opposition said that he had been deceived in the bargain he had made in order to try to carry the province of Quebec.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman has put words in my mouth which I did not utter. I deny, in the most emphatic terms, that I ever had any bargain with anybody.

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. The hon. gentleman declared his disappointment, at all events.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I was somewhat surprised to see my hon. friend from York making an attack on myself when his object at bottom was the sowing of dissensions in New Brunswick, as was shown by the termination of his speech. I remember, and probably the hon. member for Cape Breton (Sir Charles Tupper) remembers it too, that after a celebrated orator in this House had talked very volubly and at great length, my old friend, for whose memory I have the greatest respect, the late Sir John A. Macdonald, compared him to a windmill run by a water power. I would hardly apply that description to my hon. friend, because, I know, Mr. Speaker, if I did, you would call me to order. I might give another illustration which is perhaps more apt. A young man once made a speech in the presence of an uncle of whom he had great expectations. He asked his uncle what kind of a speech he had made? The uncle replied: "You have made an excellent speech." "How long did I talk," asked the youth? "Well," replied the uncle, "I do not know." "Did I take three-quarters of an hour, and what did you think of it?" "Well, it was not bad. If you had been very clever, you would have made that speech in about ten minutes, and if you had been extra smart, you would not have made it at all." My hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) charged the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Dobell) with having changed his opinions after the election. Well, supposing he had. He ran as an independent, and the hon. member for York himself once ran as an Independent Liberal. I would ask my hon. friend if he remembers how, when travelling through King's county, he used to say: "I am a Liberal," and would call up recollections of the Ryans and other leading Liberals, and exclaim: "What great and good men they were?" Then he would go on to explain how he had always looked up to them as a boy and say: "If I could accomplish anything like the great good they have done, my work would be finished." "I would like," he used to say, "to have the little boys in the county of King's point to me, as I used to point to Ryan, and say there goes Foster who is pre-eminently above all his peers in his country." That, he exclaimed, would be a lasting memorial in King's county to his virtues. But where to-day is my hon. friend? He has left us and deprived all the little boys in that county of the opportunity of pointing to him as the great Liberal. The hon. member knows that I am speaking what is the truth, and it will be wiser for him to get up and say, as he did the other night, that when the papers are brought down it will be different. Let him deny what I say at his peril; "verba volant, scripta manent." Some of his speeches of those days are yet extant and can be produced if necessary. When he went to Waterford, he proclaimed himself a Liberal and claimed that he was a son of King's county, in which I think he made a mistake. I did not know it at the time, but I learned it afterwards. He called up the Liberals and Conservatives together and explained things in this way. He said: When we entered confederation the Liberals and Conservatives joined together and became Liberal-Conservatives and Conservative-Liberals, and all good men joined together for the good of this country. Why does he not apply the same example to my hon. friend from Quebec (Mr. Dobell), when my hon. friend was willing to come in with this party, which not only he believes, but the country believes, is the party which ought to govern Canada. The country has repudiated my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster), and his own county repudiated him. The hon. gentleman is fond of playing upon words in this House and outside. When he gets into a Catholic district, he tells the voters that he is Catholic enough to do anything to serve their interests. He knows that the farmers who live in the back districts do not understand the literal meaning of the word "Catholic," unlike the hon. gentleman, who has had the benefit of a larger education. At least, we are told he has, and I presume he has. At any rate he is quite a good speaker, as we must all admit. But he is not so good that he is willing to show fair-play to an opponent, for when he went down to Queen's, after being driven out of his own county, to address an audience there, he refused me the privilege of a British subject and would not allow me to reply. Does the hon. member think that the country does not take his proper measure? Is it not on record that he ran as a Liberal and that he joined the Conservative Government shortly afterwards, just as soon as he got the chance. He said at that time: When I go to Ottawa, people will say that I am going to support the Tilley Government, that Tilley will literally take me into his arms, but I am not that kind of a man, I am independent. Well, Mr. Speaker, I was then a supporter of the Government, and am not afraid to say where I was and where I am to-day. I am not afraid to take a manly course, and my justification is that my county has every confidence in me and the integrity of my position. Now, let me call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that in 1891 three or four days after the nomination, tenders were advertised for to furnish a fast line service. On that occasion, I asked him how it came about that on the eve of an election the Government asked for tenders for a fast line, and that the contract was not to be determined until the election was over. He replied that I was taking a very unfair position. Why, he said, we have literally granted it, and you may look upon the fast line as an accomplished fact. Well, five years later, again on the eve of a general election, the late Government were promising many branches of railway in Prince Edward Island, they were promising a railway line through every parish, and they promised to have a fast line from Halifax. They promised other concessions in New Brunswick, and literally it was a case of throwing the blanket over running horses and holding them back from the race. The people, however, awoke at last and determined to get rid of these men and have a new party in power. My hon. friend attacks this Government for not carrying out at once the policy which he had laid out in 1891, which he was five years trying to mature, and which he had not carried out before the last election. And now this position taken by the hon. gentleman, I think, is an untenable position. If he talks about the hon. Premier holding back upon that question, then, Sir, I am in favour of his doing so. I speak now as a New Brunswicker, as coming from a province that expects a great deal from the leader of the Government. That province has the highest appreciation of him and the strongest confidence that in him the people have a man who will do something for the maritime provinces. We have been going on with promises ever since confederation, and promises are not enough. Our hopes were roused, when we got confederation. But confederation brought us little or nothing. Then came the National Policy, which I voted for, and I am not here to repudiate it. I accepted it at the hands of my political friends, because I was in hopes that it might be to our interest and be a good thing for Canada. I did not agree with it, but I was willing to see it tried. And we found that my views were not at all wrong. The people accepted the National Policy, but found that it bore hardly on

New Brunswick. And I do not hesitate to say that our people now want as near free trade as the hon. Premier can give us, as near free trade as the circumstances of the country will allow. Of course, we cannot expect to get free trade with the mass of debt we have, with the immense taxation that is necessary. But we may so deal with the finances of the country, we may so arrange our affairs, cutting down unnecessary expenses and extravagances, that we may look for a change of policy, and the adoption of a policy, not to build up one or two men, but to build up the country at large. Now, when we find a party in power that is willing to do something for us, my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) finds fault. He speaks of the Allan line. Why did not they build up St. John? Why did they not come and take away the freight of that port? We find to-day that a steamer comes, as it did last winter, and is able to take so much from our port, that other steamers are attracted; and, if the Government will kindly give us a little support in order to keep those steamers coming there until they have got their trade into shape, until they are able to develop the resources of the port, success will be assured, and New Brunswick will not come before this House asking for favours; she will not be asking for $750,000 for fast line steamers. When the delegation from New Brunswick hears what the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) has to propose, I am sure that they will go home perfectly satisfied, and that New Brunswick will be satisfied, as well. Mr. Speaker, I have one more word to say.

Some hon. MEMBERS Hear, hear.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I am glad to hear my hon. friends say "Hear, hear," because, no doubt, they think that, if I went on, I might say something unpleasant. But I do not propose to put it out all at once. I have no doubt in my own mind that, as the elections in New Brunswick take place one after another, we shall carry all the seats, every one of them. We will reduce immense majorities into large minorities, just as we did in Queen's county, which we carried, just as we did in King's county, just as we did in the city of St. John and the city and county of St. John, notwithstanding all the efforts and all the eloquent speeches of the hon. gentleman. Notwithstanding all his efforts, the practical people will declare that they do not want men who will beat around the bush; what they want is a Government of practical politicians. The country does not thank us for wasting time. I had hoped that we should have been here only a fortnight, that we might have gone home before the nineteenth of the month. I had hoped that the Opposition, led by my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster), would not have prolonged debate after debate. For my part, I have not taken up the time of the House.

Mr. DOMVILLE.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DOMVILLE. My hon. friend from West Assinibola (Mr. Davin) says "Hear, hear." Sir, he has wasted more time of this House than almost any other man in it; and I can assure him that, much as we admire what he says, we shall still more admire it, when it is more briefly expressed. Now, New Brunswick looks to the development of the port. I speak now to the party I am supporting. They are pleased to think that this will be done, and I have no doubt that it will be done. I have no doubt that the Government will give a practical demonstration to the people of St. John that they are going to build up that port, and not the port of St. John alone, but the whole port of New Brunswick—if I may so speak, seeing that it is at the mouth of a vast river, and is a province of vast resources. The real interest of the people will not be abandoned for some scheme at Hudson Bay, or some fast line, or some other distant field that looks green. When the people feel that there is a party in power that really means business and is really going to do something for them, their hearts will revive, business will improve, and New Brunswick will prove not ungrateful for the change, and will show the hon. Minister leading this Government that, when she gets a good man, she can appreciate him and stand by him.

Mr. McNEILL. I just wish to say in one word that I was very much gratified to find that my hon. friend the Prime Minister had not said anything to endorse what I regarded as a very unfortunate statement made by the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell). I am glad that this subject has been discussed by the leaders on both sides altogether apart from party. This is a subject that I hope will always be kept above party. It is above party, and I sincerely hope that both sides of the House will unite in endeavouring to have this fast service carried out as it ought to be. Anything to check the progress that has been made in regard to this matter, would check the great progress that is being made toward the unity of the Empire; and I do sincerely hope that the hon. leader of the Government will do all that in him lies to further this great project.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. CHARLTON. I desire to make a few remarks in the line of the discussion that has taken place this afternoon with regard to the matter of the fast steamship service. That discussion has been confined largely to members of the eastern provinces and of Quebec; and I shall detain the House for a few moments only to say a few words upon that subject from an Ontario standpoint; and I presume it would be the desire of the Government to have the views of the representatives from all parts of the Dominion upon this most important question, freely expressed before they have definitely settled upon their policy with regard to the matter. Now, Sir, I repudiate the position taken by some members of the House that the country is committed to this project. I assert that the Government which has now assumed the reins of office is in no wise committed to the policy of their predecessors with regard to fast steamship lines, or with regard to any of the other leading features of the policy of the late Government which is now in Opposition. I wish to point out that the late Government dallied with this question, considered it for years, and failed at any time to take a straightforward, consistent and settled course with regard to the matter. At first they made slight advances, then receded, then advanced a little, and then receded; and at all times were evidently disposed to shrink from incurring the responsibility and the expenditure that the scheme would entail. Now, when these gentlemen are in Opposition they would fain force the Government of the day into a position which they themselves shrank from, they would fain force the Government of the day to incur an expenditure which is practically an addition of $20,000,000 to the public debt of this country. I do not think, Sir, that the policy of making this addition to our charges, the policy of incurring an annual expenditure of $750,000 for a fast steamship service, is one that will commend itself at least to the representatives of the province from which I come.

I must say in this connection that I was highly pleased with the remarks of my hon. friend from Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) last night. His remarks were those of a solid, level-headed business man, who has not been carried away with all this clap-trap about a fast service, and the securing of western passenger traffic, &c., &c., who looks at the question from a business standpoint, and realizes that with steamers of large capacity and a speed of 18 knots an hour, we would secure a service at vastly less cost, and that would be actually more beneficial to the interests of Canada, than the service proposed. I place very great reliance upon the opinion of the hon. member for Quebec West, associated as he has been throughout all his business life, with forwarding enterprises, and with business in general. If the Government is to adopt a new policy with regard to steamship subventions and the establishment of steamship lines, the policy foreshadowed by the hon. member for Quebec West is, in my opinion, the policy that the Government should adopt. I felt, Sir, moreover, a great degree of sympathy for that hon. gentleman, and I felt like stigmatizing as most unfair the attack made upon him by certain speakers on the Opposition side of the House. Sir, this country was in a position at the time of the last general election, when good men of all parties were called upon, if they would discharge their duty to their country, to come to the rescue. Hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House who had been managing the affairs of this country, had brought it to the verge of ruin. The condition of affairs in this country was most critical, and the continuance of the management on the lines they had pursued, for five or ten years longer, would have been in the highest degree disastrous to the interests of Canada. I often said in my own canvass in discussing public questions, that we called upon all good men, we did not care what their political antecedents had been, we called upon all men who desired to advance the interests of Canada, to come over and help us put these men out of office. The hon. member for Quebec West is one of that class whose patriotic impulses and regard for his duty as a citizen of Canada, overruled the party affiliations and party trammels that had previously, perhaps, bound him; and so I give him more credit for the position that he took, for the aid he has given in procuring for this country a good Government, than if he had been for years associated with the men his better judgment has told him it is proper for him to associate with politically at present.

Now, returning to this steamship service question, I am free to say that I would not dare to advocate the granting of $750,000 to a fast steamship line, that I would not dare to advocate a liberal grant for the Pacific Ocean cable, and ever face my constituents again. I would not think of it, and if I did do it, it would be an act of folly for which I would be punished by their rejection. There is scarcely a member from the province of Ontario who can either favour the granting of $750,000 to a fast steamship line, or favour the granting of one-half the cost of a Pacific Ocean cable, who will ever receive the approval of his constituents for that act. And so I stand here to-night, as a member from an Ontario constituency, and representing, as I believe I do in this matter, the opinions of the majority of the people of Ontario, and I warn this Government against being guilty of that act of folly which they would be guilty of if they granted a subvention of $750,000 per annum to a fast steamship line, or if they undertook to pay any considerable portion of the cost of a Pacific cable. The Pacific cable, of course, Mr. Speaker, is part of the scheme. We have the fast line, we have the Pacific cable, we have an Australian steamship line, and these are all parts of one scheme, an Imperial scheme, as it is called—a very good scheme if the cost of it is saddled upon the right shoulders, but a scheme of which it is not prudent or proper for us to assume the expense. It strikes me that one of the most objectionable features of granting a subvention of $750,000 per annum to a fast steamship line, is that the Government of Canada will be spending $750,000 a year for the purpose of rendering bankrupt other Canadian steamship lines. We have the Allan line, we have the Dominion line, we have the Beaver line and we have the Donaldson line, and here is a proposal to expend $750,000 a year for the purpose of rendering the investments in all these lines unproductive, even worthless. Well, I do not think we are called upon to do it, in view of the facilities we have already given to steamship lines for transacting the business of this Dominion; and additions to these facilities will be provided by the enterprise of those who are engaged in the transportation business, and will be forthcoming as fast as the wants of the country demand.

Now, Sir, there is a great deal said about Imperial unity. It is a very nice thing, and a very good thing, too, and I believe in it to a certain extent. I believe in having all the portions of the British Empire acting together in concert, and I believe in having every portion discharge its due liability to the rest of the Empire, doing its full share—I believe in all that. I believe that Canada will never shrink from discharging the full share of the responsibility that rests upon it, resulting from the fact that it is a portion of the British Empire. But what have we done already? Have we done nothing? Have we done nothing to forward the interests of this Empire? Have we made any investments, have we made any expenditures that redound to the advantage of the Empire at large? I claim that we have. I claim that we have expended vast sums of money for the purpose of developing our own resources, and at the same time for the purpose of advancing the interests of the Empire. We have furnished to the British Empire a line of communication across this continent, the Canadian Pacific Railway. We have put into that railway over seventy million dollars of public money, we have granted to that railway a vast amount of public lands, we have exempted that railway from taxation, we have exempted its lands from taxation, we have given to it franchises and privileges of the most valuable character; and in doing all this, we have piled enormous burdens upon the shoulders of the taxpayers of this country. We have done our duty to the Empire in other respects, we have done more than our duty to the Empire; we have incurred a vast debt, we are staggering under that debt, and that debt is largely due to our desire to discharge our obligations to the Empire, as well as for the purpose of developing our own resources. And if we are called upon to expend money, simply upon the suggestion that we owe the Empire something, if we scrutinize the facts and arrive at a just conclusion we will see that we owe the Empire nothing, that we have done everything that can be reasonably required of us in the line of strengthening the Empire at large. England, of course, has vast resources; she has vast possessions. Her statesmen indulge in great schemes, schemes that are world-wide in their operations, and at the same time England is very thrifty in the management of her affairs. She takes care of herself very well; she sets to ourselves an excellent example in that respect. She is pushing an expedition up the Nile to the Soudan, and the cost is being paid by Egypt. She is sending regiments from India, landing them on the coast of the Red Sea, for the purpose of advancing her Imperial schemes in the Soudan, and the cost of those regiments is charged to the Indian exchequer. England so far as she can get assistance in this way, does it; and her statesmen of course would have no objection, they would be anxious in fact that we should pay the cost of a fast ocean service, also half the cost of laying a cable from Vancouver to Australia, which would be of no special service to us but would be of enormous advantage to England in the management of her own Imperial concerns. We wish well to England. Let her extend her Empire, and the faster the better; the more nations and the more millions that are brought under her sway, the better is it for the interests of humanity. Let her dominions expand, and so far as I am concerned I bid her God-speed in every step she takes. But we do not wish to be called upon under present circumstances to do more than our fair share in bearing the burdens. And so we respectfully say that if England wants a fast line across the Atlantic, let her establish it; if she wants an ocean cable from British Columbia to Australia, let her lay it down; if she wants the use of our Canadian Pacific Railway, which we have constructed, it is open to her use. We will give her all the assistance that it is proper for us to do, and we will aid her in every way that it is reasonable for us to do, but I, for one, as representing a western constituency, protest against putting the money of Canada into parts of a great Imperial scheme and to be used for the advancement of Imperial interests. Let the Imperial finances pay the cost of these undertakings. I have said that Canada is overloaded. Canada is overloaded—Canada is poor. Our statesmen go to England, as the late High Commissioner did, and hobnob with dukes, lords and earls, and they are very desirous of standing well there. They are taken in tow by those noblemen and impressed with the idea that Canada had better expend $750,000 a year in establishing a fast steamship line, and that it would be very agreeable to England if Canada paid half the cost of laying down an ocean cable, a position very well illustrated by a case related by Artemus Ward, who in a burst of patriotic fervour, declared that the rebellion had to be put down if it took half his first wife's relations. So those men, who wish to stand well with their British friends, are prepared to oblige them even if half of the wealth of the country has to be expended for the privilege. We do not feel just that way. We are not overshadowed by the blandishments that overcome some men. I feel bound to say that we must look after the interests of Canada, that we must discharge fairly and fully our duty to the Empire, but we should not go beyond the full and fair discharge of those obligations. The party now in office has come into power largely because of its pledges to introduce a better condition of things in this country. We have denounced as a party of extravagance hon. gentlemen now in Opposition. The verdict of the people has been that those men should go into Opposition; they failed to discharge the duties to the satisfaction of the country that devolved on them, and so the country withdrew its confidence from them. That confidence has been withdrawn from those gentlemen largely from the fact that the expenditure has been unduly increased, that the debt has been unnecessarily augmented, and there was a general belief that the management of the finances had been reckless, imprudent and extravagant. Now the Liberal party has come into power through the promise that those evils will be removed.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. That is the pledge which has been given, and yet at the very threshold we are confronted with this proposition of hon. gentlemen that we should practically increase the debt by $20,000,000 through giving a subsidy of $750,000 a year for a line of steamers we do not absolutely need. That is not the way to redeem our pledges to the country. The Opposition will be very glad to see it done. But the Finance Minister himself shirked the responsibility, he avoided the issue, he backed and filled and did everything except come to the consideration of that question.

Mr. FOSTER. We did it and you stopped it.

Mr. CHARLTON. I think the Government had better refrain from carrying out this project. Too much anxiety is displayed by hon. gentlemen opposite to see it done; and it is a very good line of policy to pursue to refrain from doing what your enemies are very anxious you should do. I think we had better refrain from taking up the scheme that even a spendthrift and reckless government shrank from carrying into effect. We had better let the scheme alone. We have our duty to do to the Empire. We can do it, and it will not require this country to spend $750,000 to do it. We have to do our duty to the Empire, but its full discharge does not require an expenditure of four or five millions on a Pacific cable. We want a statesman-like, a moderate, a common-sense, business-like policy adopted, such as was foreshadowed by the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell).

We must exercise care and economy in the expenditures of this country. If we are to meet with the approval of the people the annual charges must be reduced, the increase of the debt must stop; we must reach a point where the debt will gradually diminish, and to accomplish these results we must refrain from the kind of schemes of which this fast steamship line project is a specimen. I close by repeating that I have discussed the question at various points in Ontario, and I think I know the feeling of the people, and I would not dream of facing a constituency in any part of that province where the issue turned upon whether I had done my duty to the country in supporting a subsidy of $750,000 annually for a fast steamship line, or a grant of $4,000,000 more or less for a Pacific cable; and believing that the country will not look with favour upon this policy, I have taken the liberty of saying to-night what I have said with respect to it, thinking that possibly the Government might not consider it amiss that a member from the west should have given expression to the views which he believes prevails in the great province of Ontario.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman answer a question, if he deems it to be a proper one? Is the hon. gentleman in favour of a steamship line of eighteen-knot speed?

Mr. CHARLTON. If asked my opinion, I say I am in favour of allowing the steamship lines we have at present—four lines—that are serving the country well, to continue to do so. I am not particularly in favour of adding to our steamship subventions, but if matters can be readjusted so that we can secure a good eighteen-knot service without increasing the cost to the country, I should like it done.

Mr. DAVIN. I rise to say a few words on this question, and to express my sense of bewilderment, because I found a distinguished member of the Government rising in his place and repudiating what seemed the accepted policy of the Government, and then again the leader of the Government repudiating the position taken by this colleague of his. But no sooner has the leader of the Government taken his seat after laying down in the most emphatic language what is the policy of the Government, than up rises the member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) and repudiates the Prime Minister. We have a junior member of the Government repudiating the Prime Minister; we have Quebec West repudiating Quebec East. But what have we now? We have a distinguished member of the party in power which has charge of this scheme, taking out of his pigeon-hole a speech that he delivered a few years ago attacking the Conservative Government, and he pours the stale shot into the Treasury benches which he is supposed to support. It illustrates what my hon. friend the Finance Minister said at the conference held here in 1893. When the Reform party laid down that interesting programme full of contradictions, he set forth this proposition, which was consonant with the programme. He said: In the Liberal party, where there are independent minds, there is sure to be a certain amount of divergence. To-day we have a united Cabinet here with an unlimited license for discordant utterance, and we have a Liberal party apparently quite consistent with a Government of that kind. I am not going to take a different position from that which was taken by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Charlton). We have two great parties in this House, and the vast number of both these parties favour a fast line.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. DAVIN. Ah, there are other gentlemen opposite who do not, and so I find there are yet more divisions amongst them. I thought that the Government was like that blackbird pie into which an incongruous bird from a neighbouring rookery had strayed, but it seems to me now that there is more than one incongruous bird in the pie. I am not concerned with that, but I say that we are to-day face to face with what the hon. gentleman who leads the Government with such distinction, knows is a very serious matter. We have here in the green tree of the Reform party in power, a Government that is palpably not united among themselves.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. DAVIN. Hon. gentlemen opposite may laugh, but that is the position. And it is a very remarkable and a very serious thing that we have these discords at a time when we have no programme from the Government. Why, Sir, if we have these discords when we have no programme, what shall we have when they bring forward a series of measures? Now, the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) interested me very much to-night, and he never speaks without interesting me. It afforded him the most intense, I will not say grotesque amusement, to witness the difference that he exhibited as existing between himself and his leader. The astonishment of the House was reflected in his face by gleams of self-satisfied humorous delight, and I confess that when I heard the hon. gentleman's speech it was to me very interesting. The argument in regard to the swift line that was used by the leader of the Government did not strike me as one that was cogent or in any way conclusive. He argued that these swift steamers had only 1,500 tons capacity for freight, and he said: We shall have these swift steamers, that is our policy. But he indicated that we would have swift steamers with a greater freight capacity. Well, Sir, from the little attention that I have been able to give to it, and as a non-scientific man reading what I can on these subjects, my impression is that the scientific men who speak with authority on this matter, lay down the rule that you cannot have speed and at the same time have great capacity for freight. The ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) made a very proper argument when he stated that those who contemplated the fast line were not thinking merely of passengers—in justice to them that should be said—they were thinking of facilities for the transport of perishable commodities in which our farmers in the west and the farmers in the constituency of my hon. friend from Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) are interested.

Mr. CHARLTON. Do not bother about them.

Mr. DAVIN. The 1,500 ton capacity would accommodate a large amount of freight of these perishable articles. I understand that the "Lucania," which is one of the ocean greyhounds, a 22-knot boat, is paying, and I understand that the Cunard company, in addition to their fast steamers, have lately built 14½-knot steamers for the purposes of general freight-carrying, showing that these experienced shipbuilders think that it is not possible to do what the leader of the Government thinks could be done, namely: combine greyhound speed with large capacity for freight-carrying. Therefore, that did not strike me as a very powerful argument of the First Minister.

One word with reference to what fell from the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville) whom I always like to see and hear, and I like to see him better than I like to hear him even. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Domville) has a tremendous capacity for pedal eloquence, and it always is a pleasure for me to observe him. But, Sir, there is one abounding pleasure he gives me, and I enjoy this pleasure the more because I believe I share it with other members of this House; there is not a time that the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville) speaks that I do not thank an infinitely kind Providence that he preserved me from the chance of having been a schoolmate of his.

Mr. CHARLTON. That is far-fetched.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) says it is very far-fetched. It is distinctly "ad rem" for the hon. member (Mr. Domville) speaks generally of infantile reminiscence, and the bulk of his speeches are taken up with accounts of what happened in his school-days.

Now, Sir, the part of the speech of the hon. member for North Norfolk that has called me to my feet is that in which, as it seemed to me, he uttered an attack upon all Imperial aspiration amongst Canadians. I could not help feeling that there was an element of cowardice—I dare not utter it—that there was a want of courage in that speech. I could not help feeling that it was an attack upon a position taken up by the leader of this House on an occasion when I heard one of the most admirable speeches from that hon. gentleman that I ever heard from him since I have had the honour of hearing speeches from him—and I have heard a good many exceedingly good speeches from his lips. At a banquet which was given by the Government to Lord Russell—and I had the honour of being present at it—the Prime Minister presided, and he presided, as those of us who were present saw, with dignity, and spoke with eloquence and power; and the note in the speech he there delivered which most pleased us all, and which found an echo I believe throughout the whole of Canada, and which had, to some extent, a new ring in it, was the Imperial note. Taking in connection with that speech, that portion of the speech of the hon. member for North Norfolk which dealt with Canada's Imperial aspirations and her quenchless determination to be true to the Empire, and which attacked the proposal endorsed only a few hours ago in this very House by the leader of the Government, I say that the whole speech of the hon. member for North Norfolk was a covert attack upon his leader, the head of the Government to-day.

Mr. CHARLTON. I call the hon. gentleman to order. His language is unparliamentary.

Mr. SPEAKER. What language?

Mr. CHARLTON. Cowardly.

Mr. DAVIN. I did not say cowardly. I said covert. I was on the verge of being unparliamentary, but I trembled on the verge. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman was not merely unjust to the Imperial patriotism of Canada; he was unjust to the commercial capacities and interests of Canada. I was amazed that a man of his business experience could speak as he spoke to-night about a Pacific cable in relation to Canada's interests. He seemed to think that a Pacific cable could only be useful to Imperial interests, and could only be useful to England from a military point of view. Why, Sir, that cable would never be laid by England, or by England in conjunction with her colonies, if it was merely for military ends. What England contemplates, you may be certain, is not simply military ends, but commercial ends also. Does any one imagine that England, with her commerce looking to the four winds of heaven, and touching the commercial interests of the world at every point, could have a Pacific cable without that cable being useful to us as a young commercial nation? Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman failed to see—his standpoint was too contracted, his view too narrow, his horizon too bounded for him to see the Imperial and commercial relations of the questions we were discussing. And, Sir, whom is he striking at now, when he talks about persons who will go over to London and hob-nob with dukes? This is an echo—I remember it very well—which belongs to other days. I have heard those strident tones make parabolas across that Table when they were intended to work execution upon men who were sitting on that side, but who are now here. His attacks to-day fall amongst his friends on the Treasury benches. Whom was he striking at when he talked about hob-nobbing with dukes? I hope there is to be a discussion at no very distant day upon a very important subject to be proposed by an hon. friend of mine from the North-west. Is the hon. gentleman striking at the present High Commissioner, an appointee, and a distinguished appointee, of the present Government? Or whom is he striking at? There are no persons on this side now hob-nobbing with dukes. Is it my hon. friend from North Brant (Mr. Somerville), who the other day deprecated such men as we have had as High Commissioners, and intimated that we should have something much rougher and more democratic? Should such a gentleman go to England as High Commissioner, and should a duke happen to be Colonial Minister, he would have to rub elbows and rub hips with him. I do not suppose it would demoralize him terribly. I do not suppose it would destroy his character to meet a business man who happens to have a title. However, all that thunder, so far as the Conservative party is concerned, is now as ineffective as burnt powder or the snow of last year. The hon. gentleman is not what Disraeli once said of one of his enemies: he is not an extinct volcano. I do not know that he was ever a volcano; but as an engine of war he still detonates, though whatever he throws out now strikes his own friends. I am afraid that my hon. friend was set a bad example by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). The hon. member for North Wellington took my breath away the other night; he made me tremble. Looking down at his leader and looking daggers but using none, instead of the tones of praise that we have been accustomed to hear from him, he talked in other tones. He said with Anthony that he had come to bury Caesar, not to praise him; and he warned the hon. leader of the House that if ever he did anything like this, that and the other, as had been done by others, then he would have but a short shrift, and would cease to be captain of the good ship "Reform." And now we have my hon. friend from North Norfolk, a Nestor of the Reform party, warning the hon. leader of the Government that he has got into power to redress terrible evils, dire iniquities which this party committed when in power, and to reduce expenditure. I want to say that I will support him in reducing the expenditure.

Mr. LANDERKIN. One more to join us.

Mr. DAVIN. Oh, yes, I will support him in that; and if there are any Augean stables to be cleansed, I will help him to cleanse them. I will help him to perform all these feats which he has to perform. But, Sir, I do not use the language of warning to him; I do not say he is not going to do it; I do not distrust him. The notes of distrust come from his own benches; and now we have the hon. member for North Norfolk saying that if such and such things happen, the Government need not expect the support of Ontario. Why, Sir, it is disconcerting and disheartening to me—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, a new Government has been brought into power, and I have said that I admire the hon. gentleman who is leading the House for the courage with which he formed that Government, and I also must praise the abnegation of the party he leads, because they are correlative virtues. The virtue of courage in the leader would have been dangerous, if there were not the correlative virtue of self-abnegation in the party. I honour the party and the leader and the Government; what more can a party expect from an opponent than that? They are all honourable men.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You will get a subsidy soon.

Mr. DAVIN. Is that what they are going to do, Mr. Speaker? I never got a subsidy from the other Government.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Well, you tried very hard.

Mr. DAVIN. No, I did not. I hope my hon. friend will not interrupt me. I once told him that his face was red by nature, not unassisted by art, and I do not want him to add to its rubicund quality by excited interruptions. I want to show how unjust hon. gentlemen opposite are to themselves and the position of the Government and the difficulties of their leader in taking the tone that was taken by my hon. friend the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) to-night, and my hon. friend the member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) the other night. They say that this Government, which was turned out, was so bad and inefficient. They know well themselves—

An hon. MEMBER. Do not worry yourself about the Government.

Mr. DAVIN. There is another gentleman who is red by nature, not unassisted by art.

Mr. SPEAKER. There are certain expressions which may seem witty, but they are rather personal, and, I think, should be avoided.

Mr. DAVIN. I quite agree with you, Mr. Speaker. I never could have allowed myself to be guilty of the little breach of decorum that I have been guilty of, but for the exuberant enthusiasm that hon. gentlemen opposite have put into the speeches we have listened to to-night. What I want to say is this. Those gentlemen on the other side, who spoke of the defeat of the Conservative party, know well that they are not speaking their innermost convictions. They know well that what occurred on the 23rd June was this: that by reason of a peculiar question, a victorious party—or, to take the figure of speech used the other night by the hon. member for Wellington—a ship without a weak plank in her, a strong ship, well beamed, and masted, and taut, and with a victorious policy at the masthead, was, by reason of a peculiar question, sent upon the rocks. That is just what happened, and to say that the party was beaten on its trade policy or because of its extravagance, or because the country had got tired of it, is not to give the real secret of the failure of the Conservative party on the 23rd of June. It was beaten solely and simply—

Mr. DAVIN.

Mr. DEVLIN. Because there were not sufficient returning officers.

Mr. DAVIN. I really do not know what the hon. gentleman means.

Mr. DEVLIN. You knew it on the 23rd.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not know what the hon. gentleman's wit consists in; in fact, I never know what it consists in, although I make desperate efforts sometimes to find out. When the hon. gentleman was on this side, I used often try to understand the wit of what he said, when it sounded like wit.

Mr. DEVLIN. There was too much art in you then.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, there never was too much art in my hon. friend.

Mr. SPEAKER. Hon. members must be good enough not to fling observations to one another across the floor of the House.

Mr. DAVIN. I am very glad, Mr. Speaker, that you called the hon. gentleman to order.

Mr. SPEAKER. There were two gentlemen engaged in doing that. No hon. gentleman should do that.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Sit down.

Mr. DAVIN. No doubt, it would give some of my friends opposite much pleasure, if I would sit down, but I have risen to discuss an important matter, and, if I give these gentlemen any uneasiness, let them bear it as best they can. What I wish to say is that they know well, when they say that the Conservatives were beaten because of their trade policy, or extravagance, or because they had become a sink of corruption, that they are not speaking by the book. The only thing that defeated the Conservative party on the 23rd of June was the course taken with regard to the Remedial Bill in this House, and that question is not yet settled. I hope it will be settled in accord with the views I have again and again, inside and outside this House, expressed. But, after that question is settled, from what we have seen here, we have reason to believe that the Government has all its difficulties before it. Its difficulties have commenced in the cradle. They have begun, as we have seen to-night, in the bosom of the Cabinet itself. We have seen in the green tree to-night those elements of disruption and the flaring up of that independence of which my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) spoke. They have dangers to meet, not merely from the strength of the Opposition—and I believe it is a strong Opposition—but from the very bosom of its own party, from the very heart of the Cabinet, and it is these dangerous forces, I believe, that will disrupt and destroy the Administration.

Mr. ELLIS. Perhaps the rather humorous observations which the hon. gentleman has addressed to the House are as much as can be said in favour of the proposition with regard to a fast line. I rise merely for the purpose of expressing my own opinion, which, I believe, is that of the constituency I represent, with regard to this matter, and of giving such support as I can to the views expressed by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). This question has been considerably discussed in the city of St. John, and the general opinion there is against it. The feeling there prevails that Canada, burdened as she is to-day, ought not to take up such a heavy responsibility as will be involved by the immense subsidy for this line. The Board of Trade of St. John, composed both of Conservatives and Liberals, and not dealing with this question from a political standpoint at all, has expressed its opinion against it. I will read one paragraph from a memorial which they sent to the Government:

That the expenditure of so large a sum as $750,000 yearly to be guaranteed for such a service for an extended term of years must involve a most serious demand upon the resources of the country and hinder aid to the development of other enterprises tending more materially to advance the interests of the whole Dominion. While, as this board is led to believe, the proposed line is being advocated largely in Imperial interests, the giving of so large a subsidy would seem to cast upon Canada an undue proportion of the costs, and a responsibility far beyond any probable returns.

When I was in this House from 1887 to 1891 my colleague was Mr. Weldon, who is now dead. In the discussions which took place upon this question we were opposed to the granting of the first subsidy of, I think, $500,000. In 1894, the Government proposed an addition of $250,000 to this subsidy; and if gentlemen who are interested will refer to the speeches made by our representatives in the House, Mr. Chesley and Mr. Hazen, they will observe that these gentlemen were seduced into giving a certain kind of support to the scheme by the proposition made to them and expressed on the floor of this House that the contractor for these steamers would be allowed to select St. John as one of the ports on the Atlantic seaboard to which these steamers could go. Mr. Chesley's speech clearly points out the feeling of the city of St. John against the proposition, but he was induced to vote for it by reason of that offer. Well, Mr. Speaker, the hope held out on that occasion was a false hope. Even with the proposed addition, the scheme was not satisfactory to our people; but when the contract was called for it was found that there was no such proposition in it relating to the city of St. John. I have only risen to say that the opinion of our city is the same as it was then, the same as it has always been. We believe that the interests of Canada can be best advanced by other means. We do not believe that the spending of so large a sum of money for such an enterprise will yield the country a compensating benefit. The country, burdened as it is with a large debt, should not be called upon to bear this additional expenditure, considering what the interests are that demand it. I quite feel that as far as necessary, the Imperial idea expressed by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) should be maintained, but I do not think the burden of this Imperial idea should be thrown upon Canada, or that we should do more than our fair share—and certainly the payment of $750,000 a year is more than our fair share. I do not know the opinion of other gentlemen, but coming from the maritime provinces, where we have waited long for the development that has not come, I cannot support this scheme.

Mr. MACLEAN. As a member from Ontario, I rise to repudiate the statement made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). The people of Ontario are in favour of the fast Atlantic service.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear. No, no.

Mr. MACLEAN. The people of Ontario do believe that Britannia rules the seas, and they are willing to do their part to maintain the Empire's proud position. The hon. member, (Mr. Charlton) to-night, as on many former occasions, states the case of the Bay of New York against the Gulf of St. Lawrence. The people of Ontario will every time favour the St. Lawrence route, and support any reasonable scheme that has for its object the building up of Canadian trade by that route. Gentlemen on the other side, and especially the hon. member for North Norfolk, have taken upon them to express the United States view, and promote the welfare of the United States ports. If the hon. member for North Norfolk would like to appeal on this question to the people of Ontario, I am willing to go with him and discuss it in any county in the province. The hon. gentleman would find, especially in the city of Toronto, that the feeling is all in favour of the fast Atlantic service. The way to get the fast Atlantic service is to try to get it. We can talk about it and raise petty objections to it without accomplishing anything practical. There is only one way to get this service, and that is to start it. If this is done Canada will control the great inter-continental traffic that ought to and that would flow through our territory. Another point is that this fast Atlantic service is a part of our Canadian Pacific Railway scheme. They were men of the party of hon. gentlemen opposite who said that the Canadian Pacific Railway was a failure, that it went through a sea of mountains. We know to-day what that sea of mountains has turned out to be—that in it we have the richest mining country in the world. Similar results will follow when we build up this fast Atlantic service: it will bring travel and traffic across Canada, and will build up our country, as well as doing a great deal, as has been said, to realize the Imperial idea. The Conservative party believes in the Imperial idea, and will support this Government, and especially the leader of this Government, if he tries to realize the views which he expressed in this House to-day.

Mr. LANGELIER. This debate relates to a question that deeply interests my own constituency, and not only my own constituency, but the whole city of Quebec. This is not the first time that this question has come before the House. I believe that I was one of the first members to bring up the subject. Some eight or nine years ago, one of the then members for Halifax—I think it was Mr. Kenny—asked the Government what had been the duration of the trip of the various mail steamers of the Canadian line within two months: and from the information that was laid before the House in answer to that question we learned that the duration of the passage was all the way from eleven to fourteen days. That is the way the mails were being carried. I stated then and I state now that in my opinion it is pure waste of money to pay steamers to carry mails in such a manner as that. The question of the faster service was left aside for some time. Some years afterwards the question was taken up by the Government of the late Sir John Macdonald, and it was proposed at first to give a subsidy of $500,000 for an improved mail service between Canada and Europe. But that sum was found insufficient. I must say that the whole House favoured that. Later on, when it was proposed to grant $750,000, that also was unanimously voted. We may have been wrong or we may have been right in voting that sum, but it seems to me useless to renew the discussion that then took place. Some exception was taken to the proposal, but both parties joined in voting for it. The country is no poorer now than it was then, and I think it will be richer under the new Government. It is true that $750,000 is a large sum; but it is better to pay that amount to have the mails carried in an effective manner than to pay a smaller sum for such a service as we have had. As I stated when the question was before the House years ago, when the country was much poorer and much smaller in population than it is to-day, we paid £104,000 a year to the Allan line to carry the mails from this country to England. At that time £104,000 was equal to three times $750,000 at the present day. But nobody complained. In my opinion we had better not pay one cent of money for a mail service unless we have a complete service. I must say that in my city there are no two opinions about this question. If I were to allow this question to pass without raising my voice, I would be charged with lack of good faith to my electors and to the citizens of Quebec. During the last election this question was not discussed because the whole city of Quebec and surrounding constituencies were at one upon it, and there is not a dissenting voice. If any man were to go on the hustings and say that he was opposed to a fast line service between Canada and England he would be hooted off the hustings. I think some misunderstanding has taken place with regard to the remarks made by the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) yesterday. I am quite sure that he was misunderstood. Some hon. gentlemen understood him to say that the policy of the Government was opposed to a fast steamship service; and I was glad to hear the Prime Minister to-day say that the Government's policy is not yet quite made up. We do not know whether the sum of money previously voted will be enough. I do not say that we should spend any amount of money for this fast service; if we find it is going to cost more money than the country can afford, then let us dispense with it, as we have to dispense with many other things we would like to get. But if it is possible to have a service for the sum of money voted some years ago, then I say, by all means let us have that improved service between Canada and England.

Mr. ROGERS. As this is a very important question from a farmer's standpoint, I feel that I cannot allow the opportunity to pass without saying a few words upon it. I represent a constituency of farmers, and I also represent a body which is pretty well known in Ontario, the Patrons of Industry. Hon. gentlemen who were in the late Government will remember very well the deputation that met them on this subject from the Grand Board of Patrons of Industry that met in Toronto, composed of eighty to one hundred of the representative men of Ontario, Quebec and Manitoba. For two years in succession they emphatically and unanimously condemned this scheme of granting $750,000 a year for a fast steamship line ; and I think we were as representative a body of men as you can find anywhere—barring, of course, this one. I must say that that feeling has taken a strong hold upon the farmers, and it was manifested all through the late contest wherever this subject was mentioned, and the action of the Grand Board was endorsed on all occasions without a dissenting voice. A cheer always went up whenever a candidate spoke in condemnation of that proposition. I am sure the late Government are aware that they lost many seats through their proposal to give that vast amount of money to a fast steamship service, as well as $120,000 yearly towards communication with Australia. The farmers of this country feel that the burden of debt is getting too heavy for them to bear, and they want to shake it off. I am glad to see that the present Government intend to take some action along the line of establishing, if it can be done, a fast steamship service in connection with cold storage ; and I sincerely hope that the cold storage scheme will take precedence of the other, because the needs of the country at present demand that something should be done on that line. I feel sure that whatever action the Government may take in that direction will receive the hearty endorsement of the farmers of Canada. I must say that I was considerably surprised at the remarks of the hon. member for York (Mr. Maclean) who pretended to speak for the whole body of the farmers ; and I could not help feeling that he was not quite in hearty sympathy with us. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said that he would not dare to go back to his constituents if he stood up and endorsed that scheme, and I can say the same thing with regard to my constituency. Now, the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) also spoke upon this question, but he did not dare to support it. He played around it with a great flow of oratory, but he never said that he would endorse that scheme. He knew well enough that he would not dare to go back to his constituents in a by-election, as he very likely may have to do, if he had supported a proposition to spend $750,000 a year for a fast steamship service. I am sorry to see so much of the time of this House taken up with mere oratory. In conclusion, let me say that the farmers of this country object to be burdened to any greater extent than they are now, unless they can get some direct benefit from the expenditure. They are not in a condition to stand it. Perhaps when our circumstances are improved, we can launch out in some such scheme ; but in the meantime the Government will do well to act very cautiously and with hesitation before they grant any more large bonuses.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), in addressing the House on this question, presumed to speak for the entire province of Ontario. He stated that the entire province of Ontario was in favour of this fast Atlantic service at the cost proposed. Now, I beg to say on behalf of my constituents, that while we are ready to do anything reasonable to obtain a creditable steamship service between the mother country and Canada, we are not prepared, and I do not believe the people of the country—particularly of the province of Ontario, are prepared to support a scheme such as outlined by hon. gentlemen opposite, to establish a twenty-knot service at a cost of $750,000 a year. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) attempted to prove that there was a difference of opinion between some members of the Government coming from Quebec. Now, I listened with attention to the address of my esteemed friend at my left (Mr. Dobell), and I listened also to the address of my esteemed leader, and I must say that I can see no difference between them. My honoured leader stated that the Government of which he is the head was determined to secure the best service they possibly could for Canada, at the very lowest price. That is what the people of this country want, and it is right and prudent on the part of representatives of rural constituencies to rise and state that a twenty-knot service at a cost of $750,000 a year, is one that the people of western Canada at least, are not prepared to support. I am confident, however, that the Government will consider this question with prudence, sagacity and care, and if a scheme should be finally set on foot, it will be creditable to Canada, and not beyond our resources. I am satisfied that it will be carried on in a manner that will redound to the credit of the present Government, and will prove that our friends opposite were in the air altogether, that they were far above the heads of the people, and were going in for schemes that this country would not endorse in its present financial condition. We claim that the Government should pursue a policy of care and economy, and I believe they are going to do so. Why, Sir, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) stated, what is quite true, that this scheme would add to our debt $20,000,000. When we realize that fact, we must approve of the policy of the Government as outlined by the leader, when he says that they intend to proceed with the utmost care and economy. The hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) should be the last member to rise and seek to find differences of opinion among members of the Cabinet. The hon. gentleman has performed a feat in the House which has not been performed by any member during fifteen years, and that is the feat of repudiating himself, which he has done on several occasions. I have heard the hon. gentleman make a speech one way and almost immediately afterwards vote the other. Hon. members have seen him do that, and the hon. gentleman's course has afforded amusement. His eloquence also amuses the House, but hon. members take as little stock in the opinions he expresses as his constituents take in the hon. gentleman, for he had the most narrow escape of any hon. member who holds a seat in the House. He is shortly going back to his constituents, and so to-night he would not advocate a fast Atlantic service with an annual grant of $750,000. The hon. gentleman occupied the time in beating about the bush and never came to the point, and yet when the hon. gentleman goes west no doubt he will say that he spoke in favour of the scheme or against it just as it suits him. I hope whatever may come out of this project, the Government will see that the annual expenditure is not increased to the enormous extent intended by hon. gentlemen opposite, but that prudence will be exercised, and exhaustive investigation made as regards the steamship lines running between this continent and the mother country, and thus ascertain how far it would be prudent for the country to attempt competition against the 65,000,000 of people to the south of us, especially in view of our financial difficulties, which have been brought about by the extravagant administration of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. McMILLAN. As a farmer of Ontario, and one who has had opportunities of ascertaining the sentiments of my brother farmers, because during eight years I have travelled over the province and held meetings regarding agricultural questions, I desire to state that the statement made by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) that the people of Ontario are almost a unit in favour of a fast steamship line, is not correct. Whatever may be the opinions of a large number of the people of Toronto, the farmers do not consider that a fast line is specially in their interest. The feeling of the farmers is this: While they want as efficient a mail and passenger service and as cheap a service as possible, they are more interested in having a thorough system of cold storage, by which proper care can be taken of perishable goods during shipment. I paid particular attention to the remarks made by the leader of the Opposition, who stated that if the speed was reduced from 20 knots to 18 knots it would cause all the traffic going over the Canadian Pacific Railway from the west to take the route through the Suez Canal, even though it took eighty days instead of forty days. That was a piece of the most arrant nonsense I ever heard. In regard to the action of the late Government, the ex-Finance Minister, in defending himself and his colleagues stated that if the present Government waited to secure the opinion of Canada in favour of the service, they would wait till doomsday.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman will perhaps permit me to interrupt him and say that he entirely misunderstood what I said.

Mr. McMULLEN.

I said nothing of that kind at all. What I did say was this, that if the Government waited until they got a 20-knot service which would give a passage across the Atlantic at $75 per head, they would wait till doomsday.

Mr. McMILLAN. I took down the language used by the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman may have made a slip of the tongue, or made the statement in a moment of weakness. At all events, I took down his language, and I was much astonished to hear it. What our farmers want is a service that will give them as cheap rates as possible, for one or two days makes no difference in the condition of perishable goods when there are proper cold storage facilities provided. I was very much impressed by some remarks made by the Australasian intercolonial commissioners when in Ottawa. When members of this Government were advocating a rapid mail service between Canada and Great Britain, the commissioners from the Australian colonies stated that what the farmers of Australasia wanted was not so much a fast service as one that would carry freight in good condition, as with cold storage the question is one of two days was of very little importance. According to my experience, and the experience of others, a 20-knot service is impracticable from Quebec down the St. Lawrence until a point 200 miles outside of the Straits of Belle Isle is reached. During the last five years I have crossed the ocean twice. The last time the steamship—during 36 hours was running at about 8 knots, and there was danger of running into icebergs during that time. During the present summer a vessel left Montreal with 90 head of cattle belonging to me on board. In the Straits she was running at only about 8 knots, but in a dark night, although there was no fog, she struck an iceberg and had to return to Newfoundland. The opinion I have expressed in regard to a 20-knot service is expressed by men who have given attention to the navigation of the Gulf. Let me read the opinion of Mr. Clement, of Glasgow, who is a commission merchant who handles large quantities of Canadian produce. He was asked his opinion of the Huddart scheme with a 21-knot passenger service, with a Canadian subsidy of $750,000 a year. Mr. Clement replied:

The fast line service excites the enthusiasm of Imperialists on both sides of the water, but I cannot see where the money is in it for Canada. A few tourists might be attracted this way by it for a while, but that would be of little benefit to this country, and it is doubtful that it could be maintained, owing to the difficulties of navigation in the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

This gentleman has establishments at Glasgow, Manchester and London and probably handles the largest amount of Canadian perishable goods sent to the old country. I believe that even 18 knots is impossible until the vessels get outside the Straits of Belle Isle, in view of the weather which generally prevails in the Gulf. Let me say as a farmer that it is much more important to us that we should get reduced rates and ample accommodation with cold storage than secure a fast line on the payment of an enormous subsidy. In all subsidies granted in the past agricultural interests have been entirely ignored, and I hope the present Government in any subsidies granted will pay strict attention to the interest of the farming community, and see that any line of vessels subsidized shall possess ample cold storage arrangements and give cheap freights, because those are what the farmer want to-day. This provision will be one of great benefit to the farmers, and it is one which the Government can confer on them if the steamship scheme is properly carried out.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I expressed my opinion on this subject last session, and since then I have discussed it before the electors. I discussed this question upon public platforms, where there were representatives of the opposite party, and I did not find, during my whole campaign, which lasted five weeks, a single supporter of the Conservative Government who would advocate a fast line of Atlantic steamers. That only goes to show that the farmers and a large number of the business men in western Ontario are opposed to the expenditure of $750,000 a year to obtain what they have at the present time, good lines of steamers to carry the products of their toil across the Atlantic. I have listened to the speeches made in favour of the fast line, from the leader of the Opposition down to the last one who spoke on that side of the House, and I did not hear a single substantial argument in favour of it. It is true that we are told that a great number of travellers would come from the Western States, and from Vancouver, and probably from the far East to travel through our country. But, allowing that they did, what advantage would that be to us, when their time was so much occupied that a day was of such value to them that they came through Canada, instead of going by the Suez route? Again, you can understand that during the winter season a fast line of steamers on Canadian waters will not be patronized, as would the fast line from New York. I do not see any hon. gentlemen opposite who would take a long drive in the winter season, all the way to Halifax, the winter port, for the purpose of countenancing a Canadian steamer, when after twelve hours' travel he could take a fast steamer from New York. We must also bear in mind that we are so geographically situated that it is impossible for us to have our steamers travel at full speed, as they do from New York. There are difficulties in our navigation of the Atlantic, such as fogs and icebergs in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, which would necessitate our fast steamers going slower. Such obstacles do not present themselves to the south, and, therefore, they will always have the advantage in crossing the ocean faster than we can.

We were told this afternoon by the leader of the Opposition that great advantage would accrue to the farmers of Canada, through having their perishable products carried on this fast line, and he mentioned eggs, and butter, and vegetables, and such like. Now, I appeal to the common sense of every individual in this House and in the country, what difference would it make to the farmers to have their eggs arrive in London, Liverpool or Manchester twenty-four hours sooner than they arrive at the present time. We have cold storage compartments on other steamers, and butter can be preserved in all its flavour for six weeks as well as for five days, and we are just as liable to strike a high market, if our products arrive in England a day or two days late, as we would by the fast steamer. I cannot see for one moment what advantage it would be for the farming community, and, therefore, I think, in the present financial condition of the country, when we are striving to economize on every side, it would be an error of policy on the part of this Government, or on the part of Parliament, to agree to spend $750,000 a year for a service which would not be largely to the advantage of Canada. The hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) stated that there appeared to be an agreement between the Government and the Allan Company that they would make other arrangements to carry our products across the ocean. And, if there are other arrangements made by slower vessels, do you not see that our products would be carried in about the same time as they are at present, and that there would not be much hurry about it, after all? What advantage is it to the farmers of Canada, who would have to contribute about one-half of the $750,000 a year, to sustain that line? I understand that $750,000 are to be given each year for ten years, which means $7,500,000, and then for the following ten years there would be given $500,000 a year, which would mean $5,000,000, or, in all, the people of this country would be called upon to contribute $12,500,000 out of their hard-earned money, to keep up a service which almost everybody acknowledges would be of little advantage to the community. We are also told that these steamers would carry all the Canadian mails. That is not so. These steamers are supposed to cross only once a week, and the mails that would arrive half an hour after the weekly steamer left, would have to be sent via the United States. Then again, it is said that this fast line would benefit the large commercial men of this country who do business with England. It is well known by everybody who is engaged in business in these latter days, that instructions are not carried on by mail, but rather by cable, and, if goods are necessary to be here by a certain day, they can be shipped from England so as to arrive on the very day the Canadian merchant requires them. Looking the whole matter over from a common sense standpoint—and that is the standpoint from which we should view it—it would be impolitic and unwise, on the part of this country, to vote $750,000 a year for ten years and $500,000 for another ten years to establish a fast line of steamers.

RECENT ELECTION IN NORTH GREY.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair, I wish to direct attention for a moment to an article which appears in one of the Quebec papers, called "L'Electeur," a Liberal paper published in Quebec, and which article is headed: "A Word to the Brethren." This is said to be a manifesto issued by the members of Parliament who are reputed, according to this paper, to be Orangemen, to the electors of North Grey in the late election. The article is introduced in the following language:—

An unpublished document submitted for the consideration of our compatriots. It is our duty in pursuit of a patriotic taste to keep our compatriots constantly on guard and to acquaint them with the perils of the political situation, in order that they may the better protect themselves.

We have just had placed in our hands an unpublished document of great significance. It is an Orange manifesto distributed by thousands of copies during the recent election in North Grey. It bears the signature of all the Orange members of the Commons and reads as follows:—

A WORD TO THE BRETHERN.

The time having arrived when all Orange brethren must unite to stem the aggressions of Romanism, the following Orange brethren are devoting their full energies to defeat the Hon. Wm. Paterson, who voted against Orange incorporation:—

Right Worshipful Bro. N. Clarke Wallace, M.P., Grand Master of the Orange order of British North America, and President of the Triennial Council of the World.

Bro. Geo. Taylor, M.P., Past County Master for Leeds.

Past Master Bro. Dr. Sproule, M.P.

Bro. W. F. Maclean, M.P.

Past Worshipful Master Bro. Col. Tyrwhitt, M.P.

Bro. McNeill, M.P.

Bro. Sam. Hughes, M.P., ex-Worshipful Master, Victoria County.

Bro. Andrew Broder, M.P.

Worshipful Bro. W. Beattie Nesbitt.

These brethren having taken charge of the campaign in North Grey on behalf of Mr. McLauchlan, will, with other brethren address meetings throughout the riding in Mr. McLauchlan's interests. Meantime you are called upon by the Grand Master, N. Clarke Wallace, to render all brotherly assistance in advancing the cause, and you will please without delay distribute the inclosed Owen Sound "Star" supplements amongst the electors where it is judicious to do so.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say, in regard to this, that only some of the gentlemen named in this were in the county of Grey at that election. Some of these gentlemen, who are reputed to be prominent members of the Orange Order, never were members in their lives, and are not members to-day. In the next place, I wish to say that no manifesto of that nature was issued by that gentleman, or by any one in his behalf, and distributed among the people of North Grey. I emphatically deny and repudiate this article. The only information I had about the manifesto was this. About twelve o'clock on the night before the election, a friend of ours came to me, and stated that he had been shown it by a Roman Catholic friend, who had said that it had been given him by an active canvasser of Mr. Paterson, but under the promise that he would not give it up; but he allowed a copy of it to be taken. He said it had been distributed the previous night, which was Sunday night, to every Roman Catholic of the district. I am not aware of its having been seen by any Protestant of the district. It was distributed by a prominent supporter of Mr. Paterson, a gentleman whom I know very well. But I am authorized to say, on behalf of these gentlemen, that they never got out that manifesto, or any other manifesto. What we had to say we said fairly and openly on the platform: and at every meeting, so far as my knowledge goes, we had both Protestants and Catholics present.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What did you say about French domination?

Mr. SPROULE. I do not know what the hon. gentleman is saying; but I am speaking with reference to what is calculated to mislead, and what I honestly fear is intended to mislead. It is published down in the province of Quebec, among people who cannot know the facts, and who, if they believe it, will undoubtedly be misled by it; and, in justice to the hon. gentleman and to those associated with him in that campaign, I wish to deny that they distributed this manifesto, or saw or knew anything about it, except as to the copy which I speak of having heard about on the night before the election. Instead of that, it is reported to have been distributed in thousands.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Dredging ..... $188,000

Mr. BRITTON. I want to ask if, included in this item, there is any appropriation for dredging on the Rideau Canal between Westport and Kingston?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). That does not belong to my department. It belongs to the Department of Railways and Canals. It will come up later.

Roads and Bridges..... $81,800

Mr. FOSTER. Why is the item for a swing bridge over the Burlington Channel increased from $15,000 to $19,800 ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The money we had last year has lapsed, and this is to pay for the balance of the work done, the bridge now being completed.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend has no re-vote marked.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It should have been marked "revote."

Mr. FOSTER. Does this pay the whole of it ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Telegraph line .....$ 1,000

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, before this item is carried, I wish to ask the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) whether he has looked into the correspondence carried on between his predecessors in office and myself in connection with the building of a telegraph line between Grosse Isle and Crane Island ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. (Translation.) A report was made on the matter, but I have not yet had time to look into it, which I intend to do later on.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) This being a matter of importance, I hope the hon. Minister will, at the earliest opportunity, carefully consider that report, as it involves the building of a telegraph line, the necessity for which is being keenly felt, especially in the winter season, by the people of Crane Island.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. (Translation.) I shall give the matter my best consideration.

To provide for salaries of engineers, draughtsmen and clerks, Chief Engineer's Office ..... $46,000

To provide for salaries of architects, draughtsmen and clerks, Chief Architect's Office ..... 22,500

Mr. SPROULE. I understand that the hon. Minister of Public Works has discharged a number of these officers, yet he is asking for an amount of $46,600. How many has he in the department and how many has he discharged ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. In the Estimates there was an amount of $54,000 asked, and I am only asking $46,000, which makes a saving of $8,000. I did not discharge all the draughtsmen, and certainly could not do so.

Mr. SPROULE. How many did you discharge ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. In the chief engineer's branch I discharged the following draughtsmen :—

Chabot .....	$2 00 per day.
Moffette .....	2 75 "
E. Smith .....	3 00 "
J. H. Roy .....	2 75 "
H. Friel .....	3 00 "
J. Aube .....	3 00 "
F. E. Percey, late engineer.	$200 per month.
Tremblay .....	$4 00 per day.
Leduc .....	$1,200 per year.
John Connell .....	900 "
L. T. Dorais .....	1,200 "

In the secretary's branch, the following gentlemen were discharged :—

J. Marsan .....	$1 00 per day.
E. Aube .....	2 00 "
A. Girard .....	1 50 "

In the accountant's office, the following were discharged :—

H. Lyons .....	1 50
G. Wolsely .....	2 50

In the architect's branch :

D. A. Mara .....	$2 50 per day.
T. B. Morin .....	1 75 "
G. Bray .....	$40 per month.
E. Pelletier .....	$1 50 per day.

There are a lot of other men, labouring men, whose names I have not here.

Mr. SPROULE. If I kept a correct account, I think the hon. gentleman named some 13 temporary clerks who were discharged, and the aggregate of whose salaries would be from $15,000 to $16,000, besides others he has not mentioned. Take $15,000 from $54,000, and you will have $39,000, yet the hon. gentleman asks for $46,000. Does he intend replacing any of these men he has discharged ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I must say that I will have to dispense with the services of some more employees, as I have not yet been able to complete the work of reorganization. There will certainly be some other dismissals. In the opinion of my officers, we can do the work with less men than we now have.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Why then do you ask for so much money ? The reduction in the Estimates should be proportionate to the reductions in the number of men employed.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have already saved in wages on that account alone $21,000, but I have not had time to go into the full details of the reform I am trying to make. That reform is surely not a party question. My hon. friends tell me that I am asking for more money than perhaps may be wanted to pay the actual number in my employ. They may be sure that I will not spend a dollar more than will be necessary. If my hon. friends will look at the figures, they will find that in the main estimates I am saving this year $78,000.

Mr. FOSTER. Is the hon. gentleman not going to bring down any Supplementary Estimates? What is the use of his trying to take credit for a reduction of $78,000 in the main estimates when all his estimates are not down yet. It will be time enough for him to plume himself on his saving, and no one will be quicker to give him credit than I, when his whole estimates are down, and we can see what saving he has made. I think I understood him to say that he has saved on these dismissals $21,000. That is what those clerks would require for one year's wages.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. He is then in this position. He turned round to his hon. friends behind him and said: I have made a saving of $21,000. The better way for my hon. friend to do is to prove that by striking $21,000 from this estimate. But I call his attention to the fact that he is cutting off only $8,000. Now if the hon. gentleman is going to make the saving indicated by the number of clerks he has dismissed, he must not ask the House to give him $13,000 more than he intends to spend merely because he promises that he will not spend any money that is not necessary. He must take one of two courses. He must either say: I wanted to get rid of a large number of men, and I am going to employ a certain number, but not quite so many; or, if he does not want the men he must make the estimate in accord with the saving he is going to make. Does he intend to put on more men than there are there now? Does he intend to replace any of these twenty-one men whom he has dismissed?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I must remind the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) of the facts of the case. If he looks at page 50 of his own estimates, he will find that my predecessor asked in these main estimates for a total appropriation of $1,566,000. I am now asking only $1,487,000, a saving of $78,000. The hon. gentleman tells me: You may ask a little more on certain items than you will be obliged to spend. That may be the case. I have frankly stated to the House that I have not had the time thus far to go into every detail of the work that is before me. I will not spend one dollar more than is necessary. And I say this, that I hope, I earnestly hope, to be able to save in wages this year between $60,000 and $75,000. I may be mistaken, but that is what I hope for. Every day, Sir, it is easy for me to save a certain amount of money. I do not wish to indulge in recriminations about that; this department has been placed, I quite admit it, in special circumstances. Every day I am doing some reform work, and doing it, it is only fair for me to say, with the full concurrence and help of my employees to whom just as much credit is due as to myself.

Mr. TARTE.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman must not attempt to-night what he tried so effectively to do the other evening in the discussion of the Dominion Reformatory. We have passed all the items for his department with the exception of these items for salaries, which are entirely different from the others. You may refuse to build public works and save in that way; but this is a matter that is of vital importance at this time—what saving can be made by dispensing with what my hon. friend is pleased to call useless and unnecessary clerks. The hon. gentleman has stated here—and he stated it in the newspapers before he stated it here—that he found a great many people in the department who were not needed. Presumably those whom he dismissed were of that class.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman came to the virtuous conclusion that he would not pay with public money anybody whose services were not necessary. That is perfectly right, and if he will continue to act upon that principle, he will have the support of gentlemen on this side. On coming into office and on consultation with his chief officers, the hon. gentleman came to the conclusion, that, amongst the 120 men or so, he could dispense with the services of a number thus affecting a saving of $21,000. Why, then, does he ask $13,000 more than is necessary?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not say that I am asking $13,000 more than is necessary.

Mr. FOSTER. You do not need to say it; the figures show it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We are saving—

Mr. FOSTER. I do not want to hear what the hon. gentleman is saving on the whole public works. Let us take one item at a time. My hon. friend jumps about like a spry little animal that we all know of. Will he answer the one question that I put?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have read the list of dismissals in the whole department, not only in the branch for which I am now asking the credit.

Mr. FOSTER. From the whole department?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The whole department including these four votes. I think that I have dismissed, if I am not mistaken over 200 men.

Mr. FOSTER. Men whose salaries were paid out of this item?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No; but in my department.

Mr. FOSTER. Let us stick to this item.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am prepared to stick to the whole thing; it is better, I think.

Mr. WALLACE. I am sure we are glad to know that the Minister of Public Works is practising economy; and, for my own part, I am satisfied there is great room for economy in the Public Works Department. But I would like the hon. gentleman to explain to this committee how it is that after he has stated to the House that he has dispensed with the services of a number of men whose salaries he estimates amounts to $22,500 or a little more, how is it that he still asks—taking these two items together, as these figures apply to the chief engineer's office and the chief architect's office—that he still asks for an increase on the permanent staff of $3,265. At any rate, there was $79,000 last year, and $68,500 this year, or $10,500 less than last year. But there should be $22,500 taken off instead of $10,500, and we can ask them to take off $12,000 more, especially in view of the fact that he has only commenced the economies he is going to practice, and he can dispense with the services of a number of other employees, such as architects, draughtsmen, clerks and so on, in the engineer's and chief architect's office. In view of the further fact that he has increased the expenditure on the permanent staff—

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have not increased it.

Mr. WALLACE. The expenditure on the permanent staff in 1895-96 was $48,985; his estimate for 1896-97 is $52,090, or an increase of $3,265.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. These estimates are those of your own friends, they are not mine.

Mr. WALLACE. Now, Mr. Chairman, we have been frequently reminded that these Estimates are not those of the present Government. I can say that 90 per cent of the members of Parliament on this side of the House are not in the slightest degree responsible for these Estimates. They never passed the criticism of Parliament. There are only eight or ten members of the Government who submitted these Estimates in the House, who are now sitting here. I say that 90 per cent of the members of Parliament on this side of the House are in no sense responsible for these Estimates, and I think it is time the Minister of Public Works should cease making that excuse. We hold the hon. gentlemen opposite responsible for these Estimates, and we are going to call them to account for the expenditure they make under them. Now, we find an increase on the permanent staff of $3,265, and the Minister has told us that he has only commenced his retrenchment with these twenty-five men whose salaries aggregate $22,500: so we can safely ask that that $22,500 be deducted from last year's Estimates. If the Minister means, as no doubt he does, that he has reduced the expenditure to that amount, and that he is going to reduce it still further, he has no right to-day to ask for a single dollar more than the difference between $69,000 and $47,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am very sorry that my efforts to practise economy are not better appreciated by hon. gentlemen opposite. I come before this committee with a clear saving on one item only of $21,000, and hon. gentlemen are not satisfied. The hon. member for York (Mr. Wallace) says he is not responsible for these Estimates. I quite understand that he is not responsible for the whole thing, because he had then bolted from the ranks of the late Government. But the late Government brought these Estimates before the House, and although I have made this large reduction, my hon. friends are not pleased. They are not pleased because I have found ways and means to make a saving. Well, they want me to make more saving. Let hon. gentlemen give me a little more time, and I will try and satisfy them. Now, they take me to task because, with their pencils in hand, they take down the names of all the men I have dismissed. My hon. friend should understand me better. I read the names of the men that I dismissed in every branch, and they represent a certain amount of money that is not to be entirely applied to the item before us.

Mr. WALLACE. I mentioned that fact that the names the hon. member read out were not to be applied to the chief engineer's office, but were to be applied to other offices as well; and I have deducted the amount that he saved from the sum total.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My hon. friend is wrong, that is all. He said I had increased the permanent staff; I deny it. It is not fair to say that I have increased the number of permanent employees.

Mr. WALLACE. I did not say that he had increased the number of permanent employees. I said he had increased the expenditure from $48,985 to $52,090, as will be found on page 18.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I say that my hon. friend is wrong. I found in my predecessor's Estimate, page 18, three second-class clerks, one $1,400, one at $1,350, one at $1,325. There were then three new second-class clerks that had been created by my predecessor. I have already explained why I left them there, because I have in my department a great many temporary employees, who I think should be made permanent. I think that my predecessor was wise in creating these three second-class clerks. We have a number of good employees who are not permanent, and from whom we should select a certain number and make them permanent.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman wants money to provide for the salaries of engineers, draughtsmen, clerks, and the chief engineer's office. If he would be good enough to tell us how many men he employs in that office, and the salaries he intends to give them, then we could find out whether he is asking more money than he should.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am not asking for more money than I want. Perhaps I will be able to make still more saving. I have not had time to go through all the branches of my department. I have an army of outside employees, amongst whom I hope to make a good deal of saving.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to me the question is a reasonable one. If the hon. gentleman cannot give the names, then it would be fair to leave this item until he can give them.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I will bring down the names to-morrow.

Mr. SPROULE. We are not speaking of the outside men, but of those who are in that office.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I will give the names to-morrow.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). There is this difference between the position of the Minister of Public Works and that assumed by any other Minister who has explained his estimates, that other Ministers when spoken to about dismissals have stated—and they showed a degree of wisdom in their action—that they did not know what changes would be necessary. But the Minister of Public Works so soon as he was sworn in commenced cutting off heads, making dismissals on a large scale, and at the same time taking the credit of having effected large savings. We find, however, that under the head of Civil Government, that hon. gentleman has asked for an increased amount. Again, if the Minister has made those dismissals, which undoubtedly is a fact, why should he come to this committee and ask absolutely for as much money as was required before those dismissals took place? It is nonsense to state that there has been a decrease of $78,000 in the entire estimate before the members of the committee have seen the Supplementaries. An apparent reduction could be effected by the Government resolving not to go on with certain public works, and yet in reality there might not be one cent saved in wages.

Mr. QUINN. I do not think I can be held responsible for the Estimates before the committee on the ground that they are the Estimates of the late Government, but as a member of the committee I should like to have some explanation as to why the amount has not been reduced to a greater degree. I probably misunderstood the explanation given by the Minister, but I took a note of what he said when asked by an hon. gentleman as to the amount by which employees wages would be reduced, and what officers had been dismissed. Under the first item, to provide salaries for engineers, draughtsmen and clerks in the chief engineer's office, $51,000 were appropriated for 1895-96, and $46,000 are asked at the moment. An hon. gentleman asked what men were discharged, a number having been discharged in that particular branch, and what their salaries were. The Minister answered, giving the names of certain individuals, beginning with one who had a salary of $4,000 and ending with one at $400. The amount in the aggregate is about $16,000. I desire to inquire if there is a reduction of $16,000 in this item under consideration made by dismissals from office by the hon. Minister?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. They aggregate $18,000.

Mr. QUINN. The next item was the chief architect's office. In reply to a question, the Minister read a number of names, beginning with one who received $1 a day and ending with one who received $1,200 a year, the total number being ten or twelve with salaries aggregating $9,000. Yet we find as regards the first item a reduction of only $5,000, namely, the difference between $46,000 and $51,000, and on the second item a reduction of only $5,700. If there has been a reduction from dismissals in these two offices, aggregating $25,000, how is it that the reductions made by the Minister in the Estimates for these departments only represent $10,700?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The hon. gentleman is making a fatal mistake, for he is comparing the Estimates which the Minister of Public Works has submitted with the Estimates of the previous year in the column adjacent. If the hon. gentleman will take the first series of Estimates before the House he will discover that the appropriations made by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), as Finance Minister, were considerably in excess of those figures, and therefore a proper comparison is not between our Estimates and the Estimates of last year, but our Estimates and the Estimates which hon. gentlemen opposite prepared for the service for the current year. The point has been taken by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) that whereas the Minister claimed a reduction of about $21,000 under the head of salaries of officials, there was in reality no such difference, the difference being as between $46,000 and $54,000, or a difference of $8,000. But if the hon. gentleman will examine the other items he will find that in most of them there is a difference. Under the item to provide for the salaries of engineers, draughtsmen and clerks there is an appropriation asked of $46,000, whereas the appropriation asked by the hon. gentleman opposite was $54,000. There is a saving of $8,000 on that one item. If the hon. gentleman will take the architect's office, he will find we propose an appropriation of $22,500 against an appropriation of $28,500, or a saving of $6,000. If he takes the item for telegraphic service, he will find an appropriation of $2,900 asked as against $3,500 in the previous Estimates, or a saving of $600. If he will take the last item, to provide for temporary clerks and other assistance, he will find an appropriation of $23,000 as compared with $30,000 in the Estimates of my predecessor. If the hon. gentleman will add these several sums together, he will find they amount to $21,600, the sum which the Minister stated he would be prepared to save in those branches.

Mr. WALLACE. In regard to the statement of the Finance Minister, that we have to compare the Estimates submitted last session with the Estimates now submitted, I deny that. Hon. members of this House, with few exceptions, are not responsible in any degree for those Estimates, and we refuse to be bound by them. Last year $126,640 was asked; this year the amount is $110,000, or a decrease of $16,240. To that decrease add an increase made in the permanent staff, of $3,280, and it leaves a balance of $13,000. But, Mr. Chairman, the Minister has told the Committee to-night that he has dispensed with the services of the clerical staff, architects, draughtsmen, and others, amounting to $22,500. We ask him, instead of taking $13,000 from the expenditure, that he should fairly deduct $22,500. That we can fairly demand from him.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. After the very interesting lecture which my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) from West Assinibola gave us to-night on the necessity of unity and harmony on this side of the House, and after his reference to a speech of mine made in Ottawa some years ago—which I am glad he has remembered—as to the liberty which should exist in any political party in matters of detail, I am astonished, and indeed pained, to discover that there is such an absence of unity on the other side of the House. It grieves me to find now that this blue-book containing the Estimates, which is a part of the record of the Conservative party, is to be repudiated by all of them, except six or seven gentlemen who sit on the front Opposition benches. I had the impression that this great united Conservative party were prepared to stand by their leaders, at all events on the eve of the last election, and, when these Estimates were brought down to the House, I thought they committed, not only the Government who presented them, but also the party supporting them. If my hon. friend (Mr. Wallace) for special reasons was in a position to repudiate these Estimates,

I venture to say that such is not the case with regard to the great body of hon. gentlemen who sit near him. We have a right, in all seriousness, to hold, not only a few gentlemen, who have the privilege of sitting in the front Opposition ranks, but the whole Conservative party, responsible for the presentation of these Estimates. We have assumed the responsibility for them, in accepting them so far as we do, and more especially shall we be responsible for them, when the expenditure comes to be considered at the close of the year. We have a right to say that as these Estimates were submitted to the House by our predecessors in office, they should assume a share of the responsibility for them. I, therefore, trust we shall have no more of that lack of harmony which has been exhibited on the other side of the House this evening. The Minister of Public Works did not undertake to make savings, as compared with the appropriations which hon. gentlemen made a year ago. He undertook to make savings as compared with the staff which he found in his office when he came in. And, if the hon. gentlemen opposite spent less money, or appropriated less money, in their Estimates in a former year, and if they found it necessary to appropriate a larger sum in their Estimates for the current year, is it fair and reasonable that they should take the Estimates of 1895-96 as the true basis of the expenditure, when, in reality, they had more people in their employ than they had provided for in those Estimates? My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works has a perfect right to say that, inasmuch as—not last year, but in your Estimates for the present year—the late Government asked for a certain amount, and inasmuch as he proposes to spend a much less sum for the current year—he has a perfect right to make that a comparison and to claim credit for his department for the difference, which is the saving he makes.

Mr. FOSTER. After this somewhat excited speech, I just want to ask my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) one question. He has tried to make this House believe that he gets the Minister of Public Works out of his great difficulty by going to the Estimates that the preceding Government had placed before the House; for what year? For the year 1896-97. These Estimates were not passed.

Mr. McMULLEN. Oh.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the matter now? I am very sorry if any words of mine should cause bodily trouble to my hon. friend (Mr. McMullen). These Estimates did not pass. There was not a single man in the employment of the Minister of Public Works, when he took office, who was employed under Estimates that were not passed. Am I right or wrong?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Wrong.

Mr. FOSTER. That shows about the calibre of hon. gentlemen opposite. I asked the Minister of Public Works, because I do not think that his friend helped him a bit. When he read out that list of men he dismissed, amounting in their salaries to $21,000, it was a list of men who were employed and paid under the vote that passed Parliament for 1895-96. According to his own figures, my hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) saved $21,000 out of that vote. Now, the question that he has got to answer is this: As he only shows $14,000 of a saving as regards the expenditure of the preceding year, what is he going to do with that difference between the $14,000 and the $21,000? Why, what folly it is to say that, suppose we had brought down $500,000 for this current year, did not pass the Estimates, did not employ a single man under them, that, therefore, if my hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) came in and reduced down to $100,000, he should make his claim for a saving with reference to what was proposed but never had been carried out. The point I want to make to my hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) is this: it was the men employed under the vote of 1895-96 that you dismissed; you dismissed $21,000 worth of them; you, therefore, have more money by about $7,000 than you want, and you are not showing what you are going to do with that.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My friend is a very difficult man to please, but I will try to show him that he is wrong again. There is no possible doubt but that I have made a saving, because the men are not there. That is a plain fact. There is one thing that my hon. friend knows, or should know, and that is that there were men under the old regime employed and charged to dredging, and surveys, and all that kind of thing. Amongst the men that I have dismissed there were for instance, Tremblay, Dorois, Connell and others, who were charged to surveys or dredging. These men are no more with me, and they will not be paid again. No nice talking will change that fact. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) is an artist in mixing up matters.

Mr. FOSTER. I am trying to unmix them for you.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. In this case he has mixed himself altogether. Is there any clearer case under the sun? The men have been dismissed, and they will be paid no more, and, if he is not pleased, I am sorry.

Mr. GIBSON. I know very well that there is no more competent gentleman in this House in dealing with figures than the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), and I would like to add a word or two in relation to what he said. He said that these men were paid under an appropriation made by his Government. Granting that to be true, his appropriation on the four items now in dispute amounted to $113,400. The hon. Minister says he has dispensed with a number of employees. If you take the difference between what he asks and the difference that was to be paid, $113,400, you will find that the Minister of Public Works asks for $94,400, or a difference of about $19,000.

Mr. WALLACE. What four items?

Mr. GIBSON. $51,000, $28,200, $3,500, $30,700—

Mr. WALLACE. I wish to ask the hon. gentleman why he omitted the first item, "Services and inspections," for which the amount asked by the Minister is $3,000 of an increase?

Mr. GIBSON. I am not here to defend the Minister of Public Works in regard to his items, or any other Minister; but I wish to put myself right before this committee, by entering my protest against the unfair remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. I say the Minister has asked for a certain sum of money, and the hon. gentlemen opposite is criticising the whole of his reductions on four items. The Minister says he has caused a saving of $21,000 on these four items; and if they are added together, they will make $19,000, which is pretty close to the mark. The ex-Minister of Finance as I understand him, said that these men were paid under his own appropriations. Well, those appropriations amounted to $113,400; and according to the statement of the Minister of Public Works, for these various items he now asks for the sum of $94,400, or a saving of exactly $19,000; and that is all he said regarding these items. The saving of $78,000, I understood him to say, referred to the whole service in his department, not to these four items.

Mr. WALLACE. I asked the hon. member for Lincoln and Niagara (Mr. Gibson) to explain that item; but in a cloud of words he tried to obscure it and did not answer the question. I suppose the reason he did not was that this item shows an increase of $3,000, which, if included, would not give as favourable a showing as he wanted to make. The Minister of Public Works says he has decreased the expenditure by $22,500. Then we say drop $22,500 out of the Estimates.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have saved more than that. I have saved $78,000.

Mr. WALLACE. So far, he says, he has only begun to economize, and he is going to reduce expenditures still more, and discharge further employees. He says now that he has reduced the expenditure by $78,000. Well, I hope he is not deceiving the committee or the country. I would not charge him with that. But what does the saving of $78,000 mean? It means not a smaller staff here, but less public works in the country; that is all. I find that the appropriation for 1895-96 was $1,492,000, while the appropriation for 1896-97 is $1,487,000, which is a decrease of only $5,000, not $78,000.

Mr. TAYLOR. And the Supplementary Estimates to come yet.

Mr. WALLACE. And the Supplementaries not down yet.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This is not the first time that the hon. gentleman has been found to be unfair in this House. He is once more unfair to-night. He may or may not be responsible for the past estimates; the country will not care a great deal about that. But what are the facts? Estimates were brought down last session, which are in our hands, and they show that $1,566,000 was asked for by my predecessor, while I am asking to-night for $1,487,000, or $78,000 less. These are the plain facts and figures. But my hon. friend says, "But you are going to reduce public works." When I dismiss about 200 men, does that mean a reduction of public works? I have read to the House the names of some of the men whom I have dismissed. On the 1st of August I dispensed with the services of 75 men, if I remember the number exactly, at Ottawa. Since that time I have dispensed with the services of a number of other men at different places. For instance, I have dismissed a watchman named Hurley at the graving dock at Kingston, a man named LaMontagne at Lévis, a man named Lajoie at St. Maurice, a man at the custom-house at Three Rivers, and so on. I am not in a position to-night to give to the House the names of all the men whom I have been obliged to dismiss from the service because they were not wanted. It is unfair to say that I am reducing public works in the country. My hon. friends also speak of Supplementary Estimates. I hold in my hand Supplementary Estimates that were prepared by my predecessor, and, Sir, if you believe me, they reached the respectable figure of $2,941,000. I will not bring down estimates like those. I shall be obliged perhaps to bring down pretty large Supplementary Estimates, and I will tell my hon. friends why, and the ex-Minister of Finance knows why. Our public works to-day are in a dilapidated condition. A great many hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have come to me this session and have told me that public works have been neglected to the utmost extent; and it is a fact. In nearly every part of Canada our great works have been neglected—works which, if they had been repaired in time, would have cost $3,000 or $4,000, but which will now cost very much larger amounts. What am I going to do? I am in the hands of both sides of the House. I say it again, and the ex-Finance Minister knows it. He has often gone to my predecessor and told him: you will not spend any more because we have no more cash in hand, and my predecessor was obliged, on many occasions, to let important public works run into the sea because he had no money to take care of them. There are great wharfs, which have cost millions of dollars in a dilapidated condition, and if not repaired, they will be altogether destroyed. It is not a pleasure to ask Parliament for large sums, but I shall certainly not bring down to the House Estimates of the magnitude of those which were prepared by my predecessor, and which reached the respectable amount of $2,941,000.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend takes a document, which he has under his hand, containing a large number of items that foot up to $2,900,000, and he shakes that document at me and says it is the Supplementary Estimates that I prepared last year. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken. He is still young and fresh in his department, and my hon. friend sitting beside him (Mr. Fielding) is also young and fresh, so far as the financial work of the Dominion is concerned. They will both find that there will be no year in which it will not be impossible for them to meet all the demands made on them for public works. Let the Finance Minister eke out, as best he can, what money Parliament will give him, there will still be a large number of men from all parts of the country who will insist that there are works which require to be undertaken or repaired and which are going to pieces. In no one year will the department have an amount sufficient to do everything, which it would be well to do, if we could afford it. My hon. friend will not be long Minister of Public Works before he will find out that the demands put before him, and which he will have to check off and reduce before submitting them to Council, even after he has sifted them, will be twice as large as they will be when passed upon by the Council, and the document my hon. friend has shaken at me is simply a portion of the items which were pressed on the attention of my predecessor, the Minister of Public Works, and which would have been taken up in Council and sifted thoroughly. That is all there is in that. It is a mare's nest and the eggs were not hatched.

Time is the great vindicator, and time will put this matter right when the Minister of Finance brings down his next Public Accounts. When the Minister of Finance brings down the public reports for 1896-97 and lays them on the Table of this House, there will be no column of comparison that my hon. friend can find between what we might have expended, if we had remained in office, and what he has expended. The table of comparison will be between the expenditure for 1895-96 and the expenditure of 1896-97, so that although my hon. friend may show his economy to-night, as between what he proposes to expend and what we might have expended, if we had continued in office, he cannot do that in the public records. The record will simply show the comparison between the expenditure of the two years, and what will that amount to? Here are the figures, before the hon. gentleman's own eyes, of the saving he has made in the whole Estimates which he has brought down, and that saving amounts to $4,000. Here are the items we are discussing, the items of salaries. Subtract the two amounts, $126,000 and $110,000, and there is only $16,000 left out, but he has given us a number of dismissals whose salaries aggregate $22,000, and he ought at least to have reduced his Estimates by the amount of the salaries of those he dismissed. If the hon. gentleman does not want to do that, he can probably say to the House that some of those he dismissed were useless and must be replaced by others, and if he does that, the House cannot refuse him the money. But in any case, he should have dropped about $5,000 more than he did. In the list of those mentioned as dismissed are there men who are not paid out of these votes at all?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. That would reduce the apparent surplus by a certain amount. Is it not possible, after all, that if those were deducted, the hon. gentleman would not have a very large amount of surplus over his reductions in the staff of men who were dismissed, and who were paid out of these votes. I do not propose to quarrel with him any longer, but my hon. friend brought it on himself. He went to the newspapers and made a tremendous flurry about his economy, and how things were very bad, and he was going to make them very good, and naturally we are curious to know how he is to succeed, and certainly we do not wish to place the temptation of a surplus before him.

Mr. RATZ. I am at a loss to know how these Estimates are made up. I am a new member and desire some information. On taking up the Auditor General's Report, I see that heretofore in the Public Works Department, there have been accounts paid that, in my opinion, should not have been paid. In order to explain more thoroughly what I mean, it will perhaps be necessary for me to read some of the items. I find in the Auditor General's Reports, under the Public Works Department, Ottawa officials, certain items. For instance, here is an item of hire of cabs to the amount of $304. Looking over the details, I find that they include: from office to house, $13.50; to Ottawa station, $34.25; station to hotel, $72; hotel to station, $66.75; sundry cab hire, $87.75; from Ottawa station, $30.25. This expenditure for cab hire was incurred in the city of Ottawa alone. Now, if this was the private business of any member of this House, there is not one on either side that would entertain for a single moment such bills as this. The constituency that I represent sent me here to look after their interests as I would after my own business, and I believe that every other member was sent here for the same purpose. But I find that this gentleman, whose accounts I have read, paid out for barbers, waiters, shining boots, items not given, $80.55. I do not know whether it is supposed that the country is to pay for shining boots and for the attendance of waiters and barbers for civil servants. I believe that members of this House pay for shining boots if they get it done; I know I am willing to pay for mine. This gentleman went out and was caught in a cold-snap, for he paid for the hire of an overcoat for twenty-six days at 50 cents per day. The same gentleman was caught out in a rainstorm and borrowed an umbrella, for the loan of which he paid $2.50. He could have bought two umbrellas for the price he paid for the loan of one. What troubles me is this—if the weather was so cold that he required an overcoat, how in the name of common-sense did he require so much shining of boots? We find in another man's account an item of barber twenty-seven times, $4.15, and nine baths, $3.15. Now, I do not know whether he got those baths, but at any rate the country had to pay for them. We find that another gentleman went away, and apparently he got to the city of Chicago. He has charged the country railway fare to the fair grounds, $1.50; entrance to the World's Fair, $3. We find the same gentleman charges for waiters, barbers, bell-boys, car-boys, $9.50. Another gentleman here charges for the wear and tear of a coat and suit for two months $6 odd. We find another charges railways to the World's Fair, entrance tickets to the fair grounds, elevated railroad, intramural railway, and so on. I would like to know, for my information, whether it is the intention of the Minister of Public Works to entertain such bills as these. I do not wish to detain the House any longer as it is getting late.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. RATZ. These gentlemen want me to go on. I will. I will read something else that may interest them. I hope I am not to be ruled out of order, though I may not have the right to mention these items, as they do not relate to this department. I find under the head of medicine and medical comforts for the North-west Mounted Police, lime juice, 65 gallons; whisky and brandy, &c., paid to the Western Milling Co., of Regina, alcohol, two gallons; Dublin Stout, 13 dozen pints. In another item we find lime juice by the barrel, whisky, brandy, and so on. I would be glad if some one of the medical men of the House would state for what disease this lime juice is actually used. But I am really in earnest about my first question. I would like to know whether it is the intention of the Minister of Public Works to entertain such accounts as I have mentioned to-night.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My colleagues and myself have fully made up our minds to be economical. If we drink lime juice we will pay for it out of our own pockets. If we forget ourselves to the extent of having a glass of wine or brandy, we will try to pay for it, and if we break umbrellas, we will buy new ones with our own money. To be serious, Sir, there is no doubt that there has been a large expenditure which should not have occurred, but with my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding), the Minister of Finance, at the helm, such cases will not be repeated.

Mr. WALLACE. I am sure there have been very many members of this House on both sides who have regretted the departure into Opposition of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). But we find now that we have a gentleman in the House who can discount the finest efforts of that hon. gentleman. The remark is made beside me here that the hon. member for North Wellington, as he looks across at this side is green with envy. He may regain his composure, but he can never regain the laurels that he has lost to-night. As to the statement made by the Minister of Public Works, there is a familiar tone about it. He says that the public works all over the Dominion are in a dilapidated condition; that the breakwaters have been neglected in every direction, and that works that might have been improved and repaired for $1,000 will cost from $3,000 to $6,000, or more, because of this neglect. And he says in pathetic tones: Gentlemen, what am I to do? To me it seems that there is an air as of the spirit of the late lamented Mr. Mercier hovering over these things.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Let the hon. gentleman go on and speak of the dead.

Mr. WALLACE. We will speak of the living. The hon. Minister says that he has dismissed 200 men, that he has dismissed seventy-four men in the city of Ottawa alone, and that the expenditures have been reduced in every direction. Well, Sir, the expenditure that was authorized by Parliament up to 1st July, 1896—and I think these gentlemen came into power about ten days later, so that the expenditure could not have been very seriously added to after that date—was $1,492,000. The estimated expenditure, up to the first of July, was $1,492,000, and that amount Parliament voted. This year, they say they have made these enormous reductions, owing to dismissals, the salaries of twenty-five men alone amounting to $22,500, but, notwithstanding this and the saving on the salaries of the 175 other men dismissed, there is an estimated saving of only $4,500. But even that saving is a illusory one, because, if you take the permanent staff on page 18, whose names are not included in this million and a half dollars, there is an increase of $3,200 and a decrease of $4,500, which makes a net decrease of $1,300. Now, after all the boasting of this hon. gentleman for the last two months, and in view of the necessity—which I admit—of retrenchment, and for which there is large room, still all the decrease he has been able to make is $1,300, and the supplementaries not down yet. Now, Sir, we are voting a very large amount of money that, according to their own statement, is entirely unnecessary, and I think we can fairly ask the Minister of Public Works to revise the account he has submitted here, and ask for a much less sum.

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, before that item is carried, I wish to say a word or two in connection with a matter about which I now ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) to give me the necessary information. I would like to know from the hon. Minister whether he contemplates taking action on the petition of the ratepayers of the parish of Ste. Geneviève who have brought to his notice, through their petition, certain grievances which I think are well founded. Within the last few days the House has voted considerable sums of money for public works and repairs to public works already built, but I believe it to be our duty not to overlook the grievances of those people who are being injured through public works built by the Government. There are land owners who find themselves placed in a very hurtful position and are suffering considerable damages from the building of public works. Now, what I have just stated applies with particular force to the case of the land owners of Ste. Geneviève, to which I now call the attention of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), as that parish is situated in the county that I have the honour to represent in this House. What I would like to ask the Minister, is that he should appropriate, out of the considerable sums of money voted for repairs, a sufficient amount—although necessarily a small one—to obviate the serious damages which those land-owners are suffering from the public works built, a few years ago, by the Dominion Government.

There have been two wharfs built by the Dominion Government opposite Ste. Geneviève and Isle Bizard. Certain repairs and improvements have also been made to the Ste. Anne locks, and it is claimed that the damages and inconveniences complained of result from those public works, and further from certain works built by the Government at Carillon. For a certain number of years, works under special statutes have been carried on at Ste. Anne and Vaudreuil, and

I understand that there has resulted from those works a gradual rise in the level of the waters on the lake of Two Mountains and on the Ottawa River, at the outlet of the latter from that lake. Now, owing to that, the landowners of Ste. Geneviève, to whom I refer, run the risk of seeing their lands flooded. And I may say that, for a certain number of years past, flooding has been a regular occurrence, which did not take place prior to those works having been built. Now, in the view of experts, fully competent in such matters, although not engineers, the flooding of these lands results from those works having been built, as I have just stated; and they, therefore, hold to the view that it is incumbent upon the Government to see to it that the cause of those damages be removed. Now, with a view to that latter result being reached, what is to be done? What they suggest is this, that a dam should be built at the mouth of the creek opposite the flooded lands, and further that another dam be built lower down, so as to obstruct the passage of the water remaining on those lands. Through that expenditure the landowners would be protected from the flooding of their lands and, on the other hand, the Government would enjoy a better position than the one they now occupy, as they would no longer have to settle any lawful claims for damages arising from the construction of those works. I believe that, under the circumstances, the petition sent, a little while ago by those landowners, should be looked into by the Minister of Public Works. If, as I readily believe, the hon. Minister is bent upon practising economy, no better opportunity of carrying out his policy could offer itself than by preventing the recurrence of damages caused by public works built by the Government. I hope that the hon. Minister will send out an engineer who will make it his duty to inquire into and report upon the causes of the regular recurrence of those inundations which result in such heavy damages to the land owners in question.

Now, I might further call the attention of the hon. Minister of Public Works to this fact, that mostly all the landowners who suffer from the flooding of their lands are men who have always supported the party which the hon. gentleman now belongs to. They have always forestalled the advent into power of the hon. gentlemen opposite as the new era when their petitions would be speedily acted upon and all such claims settled. As it is my privilege to represent those landowners in this House, I take it to be my duty to press their claims upon the hon. Minister. I do not wish, however, my remarks to be construed into a statement that all the landowners who suffer from those inundations share in the political views of the hon. gentlemen opposite. There are some among them who do not share the same views as the hon. gentlemen opposite, but I venture to give expression to the hope

Mr. MONK.
