House of Commons Debates

FIRST SESSION—EIGHTH PARLIAMENT

The Seventh Parliament of the Dominion, which had been prorogued from the twenty-third day of April, 1896, and thence from time to time, was dissolved by proclamation on the 24th day of April, 1896, and writs having been issued and returned, a new Parliament was summoned to meet for the despatch of business on Wednesday, the 19th day of August, 1896, and did accordingly meet on that day.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 19th August, 1896.

On which day, being the first day of the meeting of the First Session of the Eighth Parliament, for the despatch of business, John George Bourinot, Esquire, Clerk of the House of Commons, Henry Robert Smith and François Fortunat Rouleau, Esquires, Commissioners appointed by Dedimus Potestatem for administering the Oath to Members of the House of Commons, all attending according to their duty, Samuel E. St. O. Chapleau, Esquire, Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, delivered to the said John George Bourinot, a Roll containing a List of the names of such Members as had been returned to serve in this Parliament, together with Certificates of Returns of Members for the Electoral Districts of Quebec East, Oxford, South Riding, York (O.), North Riding, Kings (N.S.), Brome, Quebec (County), Queen's West (P.E.I.), Portneuf, Shelburne and Queen's (N.S.), and St. John and Iberville.

The aforesaid Commissioners did administer the Oath to the Members who were present,—which being done, and the Members having subscribed the Roll containing the Oath, they repaired to their seats.

A Message was delivered by René Edouard Kimber, Esquire, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod :—

Gentlemen :

The Honourable Sir Henry Strong, Deputy Governor, desires the immediate attendance of this Honourable House in the Senate Chamber.

Accordingly, the House went up to the Senate, when the Speaker of the Senate said :—

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate, and Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

I have it in command to let you know that His Excellency the Governor General does not see fit to declare the causes of his summoning the present Parliament of Canada, until the Speaker of the House of Commons shall have been chosen according to law, but to-morrow, at Three o'clock in the afternoon, His Excellency will declare the causes of calling this Parliament.

And the Members being returned,

ELECTION OF SPEAKER.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Dr. Bourinot, in accordance with the intimation conveyed by the representative of the Crown, and in accordance with the long-established usage of Parliament, the duty now devolves upon this House—fresh as it is from the people—to elect a Speaker. It would be mere presumption on my part to remind hon. gentlemen that the Speakership of the House of Commons is one of the most important offices under our parliamentary system of government. The Speaker is the channel of communication between the Commons and the Crown. He is the spokesman of the Commons. It is his duty on every occasion when the Commons think proper, to address the Crown, to convey the messages which the House wishes to convey, whether they be in approval or dissent, or whether they be expressions of joy or of grief. He is in that respect pre-eminently the Speaker of the House of Commons. In the olden days, when the nature of the relations between the Crown and the Commons were somewhat hazy and undefined, these functions of the Speaker, as we know, were of paramount importance; but in the later centuries, as the relations between the Crown and the Commons have been more clearly defined and better understood, those special duties, though of course still continuing, have lost some of their degree of importance. But the Speaker is also the presiding officer of this House, and, as time has developed our parliamentary system of government, we have found that the duties of the Speaker, as presiding officer of the House, are now the chief duties of the office. The experience of all parliaments, and especially the experience of the Mother of all Parliaments, as well as our own experience, has taught us that the discharge of these duties requires, on the part of the presiding officer of this House, a sound and firm judgment, a judicial mind, and a thorough knowledge of the customs and usages of Parliament; and above all, the proper discharge of the duties of the office requires from the Speaker absolute impartiality and fairness in his decisions.

I submit to the members of this House that in all these respects the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) is eminently endowed, and that he is a proper person to be the Speaker of this House. All the members of this House who sat in the last Parliament—and there are still a few—all those who sat in the previous Parliament will agree with me that in the hands of the member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) the honour and dignity of this House, the sound traditions of parliamentary government, and the rights and privileges of individual members will be in safe keeping. All will agree with me, that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Edgar) will discharge the duties appertaining to his office with favour to none and without fear of any, and they will agree, too, that he will be in every respect, as the office implies, the First Commoner of the land. Therefore, Dr. Bourinot, it is with great pleasure that I move, seconded by Sir Richard Cartwright:

That the Hon. James David Edgar, Esq., member representing the Electoral District of the West Riding of the County of Ontario, do take the Chair of this House as Speaker.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not rise for the purpose of raising any question with regard to the nomination which has just so ably been placed before the House by the hon. the leader of the Government. I have no doubt that the duties of the high office of Speaker of the House of Commons will be discharged with great ability and with great impartiality by the hon. gentleman who has just been named. But I desire to express my regret, and the regret of gentlemen on this side of the House, that it has been found necessary to depart from the time-honoured precedent of having the Speaker alternately French and English. I think I am quite safe in saying that it has been, if not the uniform, the all but uniform practice of this House, that the Speaker during one Parliament should be of one nationality, and the Speaker of the succeeding Parliament of another nationality. As I said before, while taking no exception to the high qualifications of the gentleman who has been named for the position of Speaker, I wish to express my regret that it has been found at all necessary to depart from the precedent which has so long been the practice of this House.

The motion being put to the House,

The Clerk of the House (Dr. Bourinot) declared the motion carried in the affirmative, nemine contradicente; and James David Edgar, Esquire, Member for the Electoral District of West Ontario, duly elected to the Chair of the House.

Mr. LAURIER.

Mr. Edgar was conducted from his seat in the House to the Speaker's Chair by the First Minister (Mr. Laurier) and Sir Richard Cartwright.

Mr. SPEAKER ELECT. I beg to tender to this House my sincere and hearty thanks for the high honour they have conferred upon me by electing me as their Speaker. It will be my pleasure, as well as my duty, to endeavour to deserve that high honour by dealing with all questions which come before me in my official character, with firmness and with impartiality. I am fully sensible of my unfitness for the position, but I rely confidently upon the co-operation of hon. members on both sides of the House to assist me in maintaining our rules and regulations, in vindicating our rights and privileges, and in preserving the freedom and dignity of debate, according to ancient usages.

The Serjeant-at-Arms (Col. Smith) then placed the Mace on the Table of the House.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 3.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 20th August, 1896.

The SPEAKER Elect having taken the Chair,

PRAYERS.

A Message was delivered by René Edouard Kimber, Esquire, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod:

MR. SPEAKER,—

His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this Honourable House in the Senate Chamber.

Accordingly the House went up to the Senate Chamber.

Then the Honourable James David Edgar, Speaker Elect, said:

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY:—

The House of Commons have elected me as their Speaker, though I am but little able to fulfil the important duties thus assigned to me.

If, in the performance of those duties, I should at any time fall into error, I pray that the fault may be imputed to me, and not to the Commons, whose servant I am, and who, through me, the better to enable them to discharge their duty to their Queen and country, humbly claim all their undoubted rights and privileges, especially that they may have freedom of speech in their debates, access to Your Excellency's person at all reasonable times, and that their proceedings may receive from Your Excellency the most favourable consideration.

The Honourable the Speaker of the Senate then said :

MR. SPEAKER,—

I am commanded by His Excellency the Governor General to declare to you that he freely confides in the duty and attachment of the House of Commons to Her Majesty's person and Government, and not doubting that their proceedings will be conducted with wisdom, temper and prudence, he grants, and upon all occasions will recognize and allow their constitutional privileges.

I am commanded also to assure you, that the Commons shall have access to His Excellency upon all reasonable occasions, and that their proceedings, as well as your words and actions, will constantly receive from him the most favourable construction.

Then His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to open Parliament by a Speech from the Throne.

And the House being returned,

MR. SPEAKER said : I have the honour to state that the House having attended on His Excellency the Governor General in the Senate Chamber, I informed His Excellency that the choice of Speaker had fallen upon me, and, in your names and on your behalf, I made the usual claim for your privileges, which His Excellency was pleased to confirm.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 1) respecting the Administration of Oaths of Office.—(Mr. Laurier.)

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

MR. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that the House did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate Chamber, and His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both Houses of Parliament. To prevent mistakes I have obtained a copy, which is as follows :—

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

The necessity of making provision for the public service has compelled me to summon you together at this somewhat inconvenient season.

It is impossible to lay before you, at this session, the public accounts for the past year ; or, indeed, any of the reports usually submitted to Parliament.

Under these circumstances, and in view of the fact that you will be required to re-assemble early in the ensuing year, it does not appear expedient to invite your attention to any measures beyond the passage of the supplies.

The operation of the tariff will be made the subject of careful inquiry during the recess, with a view to the preparation of such a measure as may, without doing injustice to any interest, materially lighten the burdens of the people.

Immediate steps will be taken to effect a settlement of the Manitoba school question, and I have every confidence that, when Parliament next assembles, this important controversy will have been adjusted satisfactorily.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

The Estimates for the current year will be laid before you forthwith.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

I hope that when you will have given the necessary attention to the consideration of the year's supplies, I may be able to relieve you from the duty of further attendance at this session of Parliament.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr Laurier). I beg to move, seconded by Sir Richard Cartwright :

That the speech of His Excellency the Governor General, to both Houses of the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada, be taken into consideration to-morrow, or on any other day that may suit the hon. gentleman opposite.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would just say, in reference to that, that I do not think any time will be lost by the adoption of Monday instead of to-morrow, as the hon. gentleman who is leading the Government is aware that a number of gentlemen who are likely to take part in the discussion of the Address will not, probably, be here till Monday. If that would be equally convenient, I would be glad that Monday should be adopted. While on my feet, I desire to ask the hon. leader of the Government to be good enough to obtain His Excellency's permission to lay upon the Table of the House the correspondence which took place in connection with the resignation of the late Government. It would be very desirable, I think, to have before the House that correspondence when the Address is considered, as it would enable us to deal with the question of the change of administration at the same time.

The PRIME MINISTER. With regard to the first demand of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition, that is to say, that the Address should be taken into consideration on Monday, I certainly have no objection. I would not like to break the present harmony which has existed so far, and which I hope will continue to the end of the present session ; and it is therefore with great pleasure that I accede to the demand of my right hon. friend. With regard to the correspondence which has taken place attending the resignation of office by the late Administration, the hon. gentleman is aware that I cannot give him the answer at this moment, but I will do so to-morrow.

Motion, that the Speech from the Throne be taken into consideration on Monday, agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved :

That Select Standing Committees of this House for the present session be appointed for the following purposes :—1. On Privileges and Elections ; 2. On Expiring Laws ; 3. On Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines ; 4. On Miscellaneous Private Bills ; 5. On Standing Orders ; 6. On Printing ; 7. On Public Accounts ; 8. On Banking and Commerce ; 9. On Immigration and Colonization ;—which said committees shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the House ; and to report, from time to time, their observations and opinions thereon, with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Motion agreed to.

The PRIME MINISTER moved :

That a Special Committee of five members be appointed to prepare and report, with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose the Select Standing Committees ordered by the House this day, and that Mr. Laurier, Sir Charles Tupper, Sir Richard Cartwright, Sir Adolphe Caron and Mr. Davies do compose the said committee.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT.

Mr. SPEAKER laid before the House the Report of the Joint Librarians of Parliament up to date.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The Debates Committee was composed last Parliament of 15 members, 9 representing the Government and 6 the Opposition. The members whom I suggest now are Messrs. Beausoleil, Charlton, Somerville, Scriver, who were members of the committee last year, and Messrs. Haley, Monet, Richardson, Ellis and Choquette. On the Government side last Parliament were Messrs. La-Rivière, Taylor, Earle, Davin and Craig. This leaves a sixth one to be appointed to represent the Opposition, and I leave the choice to the suggestion of the hon. gentleman.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would ask the hon. gentleman whether he has taken into consideration the fact that the numbers 9 and 6, composing the committee last year, were no doubt arranged in view of the relative proportions of the two sides of the House, and I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he has considered the fact that the Opposition is now represented by a larger element than it was when those numbers on the committee were arranged.

The PRIME MINISTER. I have thought of all that, and the difference seems to me so minute that it is not proper to make a change. If the hon. member has a sixth member to suggest, I shall be happy to add his name.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would suggest the name of Mr. Bergeron.

The PRIME MINISTER moved :

That a Select Committee be appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates of this House during the present session, with power to report from time to time ; to be composed of Messrs. Beausoleil, Bergeron, Charlton, Choquette, Craig, Davin, Earle, Ellis, Haley, La-Rivière, Monet, Richardson, Scriver, Somerville and Taylor.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT—THE MANITOBA SCHOOLS QUESTION.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the motion to adjourn is adopted, I take the opportunity of asking the hon. the leader of the Government whether the statement contained in a leading journal, that negotiations were now pending and likely to result favourably with regard to the question of the Manitoba schools, is well founded. The hon. gentleman is quite aware of the great anxiety which is felt on both sides of the House—I think I may say by every member of the House—to have this unhappy question brought to a satisfactory conclusion at as early a period as possible. It will be a great source of relief to the House to learn that this statement contained in a leading journal is well founded, and that negotiations are now pending and likely soon to result in a satisfactory arrangement.

The PRIME MINISTER. I have great pleasure in informing the hon. gentleman that, at my invitation, Mr. Sifton, the Attorney General of Manitoba, came down to Ottawa with the view of entering into negotiations for a settlement of that important question. Further than this I am not at liberty to say at this moment.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 3.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 21st August, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. SPEAKER. With reference to questions to be put by members and notices of motion, it would be perhaps as well, at the beginning of the Parliament, to have a clear understanding of the rule, I think it is 25, which provides that when questions or motions are not brought forward in their order, they shall be dropped, unless, under the usage which has grown up, they are allowed to stand at the request of the Government. It is not a part of the rule, but it is a usage or understanding, which of course will be observed unless the House decides to the contrary. But I wish to indicate to the hon. members, a large number of whom are new, that when questions are called and not put, and when notices of motion are called and not moved, for any reason, they disappear from the Order paper unless they are allowed to stand at the request of the Government.

GRAIN STANDARDS FOR MANITOBA AND THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville) asked,

Whether it is the intention of the Government to make any changes in the rules regulating the selection of grain standards for Manitoba and the North-west during the present year?

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). It is not the intention to make any changes as to the selection of grain standards, which will require any amendment to the Inspection Act. The department is considering several minor features which the Act permits to be dealt with departmentally; but I am unable at present to state positively that any changes will be made this year.

THE METRIC SYSTEM OF WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville) asked,

Whether it is the intention of the Government to adopt the metric system of weights and measures in lieu of the system now in force in Canada?

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). It is not the intention of the Government to adopt the metric system of weights and measures. It is practically optional now under the 35th section of the 104th Chapter of the Revised Statutes.

THE RULES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. SPEAKER. Before calling the next order, I would like to state, what will no doubt be interesting to all the members of the House, particularly the new members, that I have made inquiry as to the time when the printed rules of the House will be ready for distribution among the members, and I find that they will be ready on Monday.

ADJOURNMENT—THE CHANGE OF GOVERNMENT.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I now move that the House do adjourn, and I beg to state to the hon. gentleman opposite, with regard to the correspondence he asked for yesterday, which took place between the late Prime Minister and His Excellency on the occasion of the resignation of the Ministry, that we have the assent of His Excellency to bring down this correspondence, and it will be laid on the Table of the House as soon as the Address is passed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to say, Mr. Speaker, in reference to the statement which the hon. leader of the Government has just made, that I think it would be very desirable to have that correspondence, which His Excellency the Governor General has consented to being laid before the House, on the Table of the House previous to the Address being passed. There is no reason that I can possibly imagine why it should not precede the passage of the Address, and the hon. gentleman will see at once that as it may raise a grave constitutional question, it is very desirable that the House should have an opportunity of discussing that matter in connection with the Address. I think I am correct in the impression which I have at this moment that it is usual for ministerial explanations, or explanations on the part of those in the Government in regard to the formation of a new Government, or explanations of gentlemen who have held positions in an administration, to be at the very earliest possible moment submitted to Parliament. The House is entitled to know, and the country is entitled to know, at as early a moment as possible, the circumstances that have attended the resignation of one Government and the formation of another. I do hope, therefore, that the hon. gentleman will kindly reconsider that matter, and, having obtained the consent of His Excellency the Governor General to lay the correspondence upon the Table of the House, will be good enough to lay it on the Table before the consideration of the Address in answer to the Speech.

The PRIME MINISTER. I must say to the hon. gentleman that for my part I have serious doubts as to the constitutionality of the procedure which he suggests—that this correspondence should be brought down so as to form part of the debate on the Address. It is quite possible that the correspondence which took place between the hon. gentleman and His Excellency at the time he mentions may be made the subject of a debate; but if it is to be debated at all, my impression is, in the constitutional view as well as in point of propriety, that it would be better that this correspondence should be the subject of a debate by itself, and should not be mixed up with the matter of the Address. For my part, I think the only constitutional method is to debate on the Address the issues raised in the Speech from the Throne. As to the explanations resulting from any change of government, I am not aware that any explanations are due from the fact that a new government has been formed, consequent upon an appeal to the people and the result of a general election. If, however, the hon. gentleman is of opinion that he has any point of debate to raise on that subject, I think it can be raised and debated later on. If my memory serves me, and I appeal also to the hon. gentleman's memory, no such change of government or administration has ever been made the subject of discussion in the debate on the Address, but has always been the subject of debate by itself; and on the whole, I think we had better adhere to the plan I have suggested. The papers will be laid on the Table as soon as the Address is adopted; and if there be any controversial matter in them, I shall be happy to give the hon. gentleman every opportunity for debate.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I can only say, in reply to the hon. gentleman, that if there were any grave constitutional reasons why the course I have suggested should not be pursued, I would be quite prepared to bow to them; but at the same time I may say that the Speech from the Throne raises questions which materially affect the very point at issue. The resignation of the late Government and the correspondence attending that resignation, with His Excellency the Governor General, have a direct and most important bearing on the Speech which His Excellency has delivered. Under those circumstances, I hope that my hon. friend, if he will allow me to call him so—

The PRIME MINISTER. Certainly.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I hope that my hon. friend will carefully reconsider that question, with the view, if possible, of meeting what I think will greatly facilitate the progress of the work of the session, and dispose, in the debate on the Address, of questions that are very important and are incidental to the Speech from the Throne. I will not, at this moment, press the hon. leader of the Government further than to ask him to give that his most careful consideration, because I feel that the House will be placed at a very great disadvantage if we have not that correspondence laid on the Table and in the hands of hon. members on both sides when considering the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. Is this, Mr. Speaker, on a motion to adjourn?

Mr. LAURIER.

Mr. SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn is before the Chair.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. On the motion to adjourn—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has spoken.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Of course I am in the hands of the House, and no doubt the courtesy I am asking will be readily extended. I would like to ask the hon. leader of the House if his attention has been called to the fact that under the Audit Act it is necessary, I believe, to lay upon the Table of the House copies of all special warrants which have been granted by the Governor General, and that this is the last day upon which the Government or the Auditor General is required to have them laid on the Table. If the hon. gentleman's attention has not been called to that point, I hope that on Monday he will be good enough to lay on the Table copies of all the special warrants and the expenditure thereunder as required by the Act.

The PRIME MINISTER. My impression is, at this moment, that the delay is four days. At all events, it does not matter, and they will be laid on the Table on Monday.

Mr. SPEAKER. The motion before the Chair is that the House do now adjourn.

RELATIONS BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES.

Mr. HAGGART. Before the House adjourns, I wish to draw the attention of the hon. the leader of the Government to an alleged interview with him which is reported in the "Globe." I shall read the report, and if necessary follow it with a written motion. It is from the correspondent of a Chicago paper called the "Record." The "Record" correspondent says:

When I told Mr. Laurier that the victory of the Liberal party in Canada and his appointment as Premier were considered good cause for congratulation in the United States, as they offered hope for more friendly relations between the two countries, he smiled and said: "I appreciate the kindly feeling of your people most sincerely, and I am sure their confidence has not been misplaced. The Liberal Government, which has just taken office, desires and intends to signalize its administration by a renewal of neighbourly relations with our friends across the border. As you have suggested, the relations between Canada and the United States have not been as cordial for some time past as I hope they will in the future. Providence has placed us in the position of neighbours, and we should strive to live side by side on terms of mutual friendship and respect.

"Some years ago, when considerable friction had been created by the North Atlantic fishery troubles, I took an opportunity to say that the question should be adjusted in a friendly manner, becoming an enlightened and friendly people, by the simple process of give and take, and I do not see now why an arrangement should not be made resembling that effected under the treaty of Washington in 1871, and the treaty of 1854, whereby not only the ports but the inshore waters of both countries were thrown open to the fishermen of both on equal terms, and the markets for the fish of the two countries made equally free. That, it seems to me, would be the sensible way of settling the fishery question. The North Atlantic fisheries would be more valuable to the United States and Canada alike if some such arrangement were adopted."

The Canal Question.

"Then," continued Mr. Laurier, in reply to a question, "as to the canal question, the American mercantile fleet upon the upper lakes now numbers many large steamers. There are twenty vessels of four thousand tons, and I hear that your shipyards are turning out vessels of even six thousand tons. The day of small steamers like that of the wooden sailing ship has passed. Between Buffalo and Duluth there is a channel deep enough to accommodate vessels of twenty feet draught. We in Canada are aiming to make a channel of the same depth from Lake Erie through the Welland Canal and the canals below Kingston to Montreal, but the task is a formidable one, owing to the immense expense involved.

"Up to date, we have spent $60,000,000 on our canals, the major portion on the Welland and St. Lawrence canals, which is a large sum for 5,000,000 of people, and especially when it is considered that we have also contributed very liberally for railroads. It goes without saying that very great benefits would be conferred upon the farmers of the western and north-west states, no less, of course, than upon the farmers of the Canadian North-west, if these great steamers could load at Port Arthur and Duluth, and carry produce without breaking bulk, as they have to do now at the Welland and again at Prescott, right through to Ogdensburg, Kingston, Oswego, Montreal or Quebec, and carry back merchandise and manufactures for the western settlers, at cheap rates.

"Farm produce is low the world over owing to the immense production which modern science—the self binder, the railroad and the compound marine engine—has rendered possible and, so far as I can see, it is not likely to reach its former price for some time, if ever.

"You cannot, if I may be allowed to say so, help the farmer on this continent by any quack device. You can do it only by cheapening the cost of producing the stuff and by reducing the expense of getting it to the European market. A twenty-one foot channel from Lake Superior and Lake Michigan to the Atlantic Ocean would reduce the cost of what the farmer has to buy from the eastern states, and give him lower transportation rates for what he has to sell. I suppose, too, that a reduced rate on the lakes and the St. Lawrence water route would oblige the railroads north, that is in Canada, and south, that is in the States, to meet it with an equally lower rate, and from the seaboard during the season of navigation, so that the farmer far inland from the route would experience equally the good effects.

"Commissioners have been appointed by the governments of the two countries to consider the question of a deep waterway system, and I am in hopes that a perfectly feasible scheme will shortly be reported—a scheme that will enable the United States to participate in the work and exercise control without in any way compromising the sovereignty of Canada over her own territory. It should be a purely business arrangement with nothing political about it.

Closer Trade Relations.

"As to closer trade relations, the Liberals have always been in favour of freer trade with the United States, and I am prepared to make an arrangement with your country for the free exchange of such natural products and such manufactured articles as may be mutually agreed upon. This question, together with those of deep waterways and fisheries and the coasting trade of the lakes should, it appears to me, be all taken up together and dealt with in a broad, serious and comprehensive spirit on one anvil.

"I observe that the bonding privilege has recently been discussed in the United States Congress. Let that question be taken up along with the rest. The alien labour law of the United States, which has created a good deal of unpleasantness, should be included. In short, let us have a thorough understanding and better relations all round. Canadians of every political stripe watch with profound satisfaction the growth of feelings of good-will and affection between England and the United States, and the Liberal party of Canada will do what it can—all it possibly can within its sphere—to aid in getting rid of old prejudices and bringing together the two sections of the Anglo-Saxon family for their own good and for the good of mankind."

I would ask the hon. gentleman if that interview is at all correct, and, if so, to what extent?

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman is rather inquisitive. He asks me to speak off-hand as to the correctness of an interview of two or three columns which I have not read for some time. However, I can assure him that it is substantially correct.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 3.40 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 24th August, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

NOTICES OF MOTION POSTPONED.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved that notices of motion be deferred until after the consideration of His Excellency's Speech at the opening of this session.

Motion agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY-INTERNAL ECONOMY.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows :—

ABERDEEN.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, an approved Minute of Council, appointing the Honourable Sir Richard Cartwright, Minister of Trade and Commerce; the Honourable Louis Henry Davies, Minister of Marine and Fisheries; the Honourable William Stevens Fielding, Minister of Finance, and the Honourable Joseph Israel Tarte, Minister of Public Works, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons, as Commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of the 13th Chapter of the Revised Statutes of Canada, intituled: "An Act respecting the House of Commons."

Government House,

Ottawa, 24th August, 1896.

CAPTAIN MCGREGOR, OF THE "BAY-FIELD."

Mr. CAMERON asked,

1. Is the Government aware that Capt. A. M. McGregor, of the survey boat "Bayfield" has been an active political canvasser and partisan on behalf of Conservative candidates in the West Riding of the County of Huron for the last fifteen years? 2. Is the Government aware that at last general election the said Capt. McGregor abandoned said survey boat on Lake Erie and went to Goderich, in West Huron, to vote for the Conservative candidate? 3. Was the absence of said McGregor from his said duty with the knowledge, consent or authority of the Government on the occasion aforesaid? 4. Was any application made by him to the department or any of its officials for leave of absence on the occasion aforesaid? 5. If such application was made and leave granted, by whom was the leave granted, and for what cause?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). 1. The Department of Marine and Fisheries has had no official knowledge that Captain McGregor has been an active political canvasser, &c., for the past fifteen years, but complaints have lately been made to the department charging Captain McGregor with being an active and offensive political partisan and these complaints will be investigated. 2. The department is aware that Captain McGregor was absent from his vessel and it is presumed for the purpose of voting. 3. Yes; I am so informed by the officials of the department. 4 and 5. There is no record of any application having been received for leave, but the officer in charge of the survey was instructed to grant leave to any officer or member of the crew of the "Bayfield" if he wished to avail himself of the privilege of voting.

Mr. LAURIER.

CAPTAIN DUNN, OF THE "PETREL."

Mr. CAMERON asked,

1. Is it within the knowledge of the Government or any of the departments thereof, that Captain Dunn, of the Government cruiser "Petrel," on service on Lake Erie a few days before the 23rd June, 1896, took said cruiser from said service to Owen Sound and conveyed voters from the various ports on the east coast of Lake Huron to Owen Sound to vote for the Conservative candidate at last general election? 2. Was the use of such cruiser for such a purpose with the knowledge, consent or authority of the department, or had said Captain Dunn authority to so use said cruiser? 3. Had the said Captain Dunn leave of absence from the department to go from Lake Erie to Owen Sound to vote at said election, or for any other purpose at that time? 4. Is the same Captain Dunn appointed by the present Government, with one McNeill, to investigate the complaints of the Wikwemikong Indians?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). 1. The department is aware that Captain Dunn took the cruiser "Petrel" into Lake Huron on the 20th June, 1896, and was in Owen Sound on the 23rd of that month, but is not aware that any person was taken on board for the purpose of being conveyed to Owen Sound to vote or otherwise. 2. There is no record in the department of any such knowledge, consent or authority. 3. Captain Dunn had instructions to go into Lake Huron for the purpose of patrolling these waters. He was not limited to any particular point, as the whole of such waters are within his jurisdiction as a fishery officer. There is no record of any directions having been given about voting or interfering in any way with elections. 4. The Department of Indian Affairs requested this department to allow Captain Dunn to proceed to Manitoulin Island, and jointly with Mr. McNeill of that department, investigate complaints of the Wikwemikong Indians, of alleged unjust fishery prosecutions. Captain Dunn being a fishery officer, no special appointment is necessary.

FRANCHISE ACT.

Mr. CAMERON asked,

Is it the intention of the Government, during the present session of Parliament, to introduce a Bill to repeal the present Franchise Act or to otherwise deal with that Act?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). It is not the intention of the Government to introduce any legislation during the present session, their intention being that, in so far as practicable, the session should be short and expeditious. Should, however, the session be protracted beyond the expected length, the Government may then think it advisable to introduce a Bill to repeal the present Franchise Act.

FAST ATLANTIC STEAMSHIP SERVICE.

Mr. LANGELIER asked,

1. What is the amount of the lowest tender for a fast steamship service between Canada and England?

2. From whom was the tender received?

3. Do the Government intend to award the contract to the parties who have made the said tender, and when?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Two tenders have been received, one from the Messrs. Allan, and the other from Mr. Jas. Huddart. Neither of these tenders is in accordance with the specifications, and the Government proposes to make further investigations before taking final action in the matter.

PROPOSED BRIDGE AT QUEBEC.

Mr. LANGELIER asked,

Whether it is the intention of the Government to build a bridge in front of Quebec, or in the vicinity, to connect the Intercolonial Railway with the Canadian Pacific Railway, or to aid in the construction thereof by a subsidy or otherwise?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). It is not the intention of the Government to build a bridge in front of Quebec, or in the vicinity, to connect the Intercolonial Railway with the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Government have no application before them for aid in the construction thereof.

NORTH-WEST EXHIBITION—OUTSTANDING INDEBTEDNESS.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

Whether the Government intends to place a sum in the Estimates to pay the outstanding indebtedness in connection with the North-west Exhibition held at Regina in 1895?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The matter is under consideration.

BOUNTY TO FISHERMEN.

Mr. KAULBACH asked,

Is it the intention of the Government during the present session in view of the increased numbers of fishermen, and for further encouragement of the industry, to increase the amount of bounty for distribution?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). The vote granted annually by Parliament to encourage the development of the sea fisheries and the building of fishing vessels, being a statutory one, it is not the intention of the Government during the present session to introduce any legislation on the subject.

CORN AND CORNMEAL.

Mr. KAULBACH asked,

As Indian corn is not grown in Canada in quantities sufficient to satisfy Canada's demand for consumption, is it the intention of the Government during the present session to place the article on the free list, free of customs duty, so as to enable cornmeal to be manufactured in Canada? Or is it the intention of the Government to admit cornmeal free?

The FINANCE MINISTER (Mr. Fielding). It is not the intention of the Government to propose any legislation during the present session amending the tariff.

CONTROLLERS OF INLAND REVENUE AND CUSTOMS.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked,

1. Are the Controllers of Inland Revenue and Customs, or either of them, members of the Cabinet?

2. Was any assurance given either of these hon. gentlemen on behalf of the Government, on taking of office, respecting his position in the Government, and if yes, what was it?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). 1. The Controllers of Inland Revenue and Customs under the existing law are not and cannot be members of the Cabinet. 2. It is the intention of the Government to ask Parliament to amend and remodel the existing law concerning the Department of Trade and Commerce, so as to restore the heads of the Inland Revenue and Customs Departments to the rank of Cabinet Ministers, and the fact has been so publicly stated by the Prime Minister.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Perhaps the hon. gentleman overlooked the second branch of the question. Was any assurance given to either of those hon. gentlemen on behalf of the Government, on taking office, respecting their positions in the Government?

The PRIME MINISTER. I think I have stated that in my answer.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman contends his answer covers both paragraphs?

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes.

THE PRIME MINISTER'S SPEECH IN WINDSOR HALL.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked,

Is the following a substantially accurate report of a part of the hon. the First Minister's speech delivered in Windsor Hall, 22nd January, 1895:—

"I have read in the 'Gazette' the statement that if you remove protection, raw material would no longer be free. I say that if we were to have a revenue tariff raw material would be free. Raw materials are not free to-day under the protective system. There are certain raw materials which are free. Wool is free; thank Heaven they have not thought of taxing it. Cotton is free also, but is iron free? Cotton is a raw material, and wool is a raw material for certain manufactures, but there are two articles which are raw material of every manufacturer, and these articles are coal and iron, and are they free? If you have a revenue tariff the object will be to develop the country, and all raw material should be free under such a tariff."

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I must tell my hon. friend that notwithstanding every desire I have to oblige him, I am afraid I shall not be able to gratify his rather fastidious curiosity. I am forced to make the painful admission that my memory, which I had the weakness of supposing pretty good, is not equal to the task of remembering, word for word, a speech delivered more than eighteen months ago.

Mr. FOSTER. That must have been a moment of weakness.

THE TRENT CANAL.

Mr. HUGHES asked,

Has the contract for that section of the Trent Canal from Lake Simcoe to the point where the first section of the Balsam Lake to Lake Simcoe division meets the Talbot River, been let, in accordance with the advertisements calling for tenders for the same?

2. If not, why not?

3. Is it the intention of the Government meantime to abandon the enterprise?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). 1. No; the contract has not been let. 2. Because the receiving of tenders has been postponed. 3. No such decision has been reached, but the matter of entering into new contracts is under consideration.

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT.

Mr. INGRAM asked,

Whether it is the intention of the Government to repeal the Electoral Franchise Act, and if so, when?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I have already answered that question.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S WARRANTS.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I desire to ask the Minister of Finance if he will be good enough to lay on the Table of the House, without a formal motion, the Orders in Council under the authority of which these Governor General's Warrants were issued a return of which has just been brought down; and also the report of the Minister of Justice upon the application for the Governor General's Warrants. I do not think it is necessary to make a formal motion; that is a courtesy which will be readily accorded.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I shall be very glad to place on the Table any documents of the nature referred to by the hon. gentleman, at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. FOSTER. Would he be good enough to have the ten days' statement laid on the Table of the House, commencing the first of the month.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes.

THE CHANGE OF GOVERNMENT.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the leader of the Government whether he has considered the urgent appeal which I made to have the correspondence between the Governor General and myself, as the leader of the late Government at the time of its resignation, laid upon the Table of the House, in order that it may be under our observation in connection with the debate on the Address.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I have, Mr. Speaker, and I have seen no reason to depart from the decision which I intimated to the hon. gentleman the other day. My intention is to have this correspondence laid upon the Table of the House immediately after the passage of the Address, and to have it printed, so that it can be in the hands of all the members of the House before it comes up for discussion.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House proceeded to the consideration of His Excellency's Speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. McINNES. Before proceeding to discuss the matters which are referred to in the Speech from the Throne, I wish to acknowledge the compliment which is paid by the Government to British Columbia upon this occasion, in selecting a representative from that province to take part in the preliminary proceedings of this Parliament. This is the first occasion upon which this honour has been done to my province; and although it is a mere honour, and as such is of little practical importance, yet, Sir, I hope I am justified in regarding the circumstance as evidence that at last we have a Government in power in this country that recognizes the importance of, and is prepared to pursue a policy of generous treatment towards that great far west. Unfortunately, the Government which has controlled the affairs of this country in the past, has not given that considerate treatment to the west which its importance and its probable future entitled it to. With respect to their general trade policy, it militated against the development of the west; it handicapped those who were engaged in those enterprises which were calculated to develop the resources of the west, as it compelled those persons either to pay enormous import taxes to the Dominion Government, or to pay large tribute to the Canadian Pacific Railway. The result was that it produced a condition of stagnation in the development of those resources in that province, which has continued throughout a number of years. And although during the last year or two, this inactivity has been burst through in one or two directions, yet that is entirely due to the irrepressible energy and perseverance of the pioneer prospectors of that country, and not to any kindly conditions which were imposed on it by the late Government. Of course, I recognize, and I freely admit, that there was a time in the history of the Conservative party when they did pursue a progressive policy towards the west; but, unfortunately, the working out of that policy even at that time was marked by a number of serious mistakes and instances of crude legislation which tended to keep back the progress of the country. But years have elapsed since the Conservative party pursued that policy. Latterly, as I have said, they have forgotten altogether the former tendency of their policy towards that part of the country. They have failed to appreciate altogether the magnificent resources and possibilities of that section of the Dominion; they have treated our demands and even our interests with indifference, and, in so far as they have shown us any special treatment, it has been characterized by such ignorance of local conditions there as to have very materially lessened the intended benefits. I have just said, with respect to the working of the trade policy, that it worked out disadvantageously to that part of the Dominion; but also with respect to less important matters which required special treatment, the late Government have also shown a tendency to treat us unjustly.

Let me state an instance. We have, for the last five years, contributed to the Dominion treasury on an average about $2,000,000 per annum. The largest amount we have received back in any one year, to cover all public expenditures in the direction of all special appropriations for public works, has amounted to only $1,200,000. The result has been a direct annual drain on that province for the last five years, of something like three-quarters of a million dollars. That circumstance, taken in connection with another circumstance which is equally known, that the people of British Columbia contribute three times as much per capita in federal taxation as the people of any other province, makes the injustice shown towards our province complete, and no wonder, in view of facts like these, and the additional fact that we require special treatment on account of the almost insuperable difficulties with which we have to contend, we no longer see the solid six supporting a Conservative Government. Sir, there has been a change of sentiment out there. That change has been based on good, solid and substantial reasons, and we are here to-day as members from that province no longer supporting that party, because the electors in British Columbia have no longer faith in that party. We are here demanding fair-play; we ask for greater justice and more considerate treatment, and if we receive these, no doubt in return we will show the people of the east an expansion of trade, a development of resources, and an outburst of prosperity which will simply astound members of this House. But, in order that the House may understand, in its fullness, the wrongs that have been done to the western section of the country by the late Government, it is necessary to compare the natural conditions out there with the social conditions. Hon. members have heard, undoubtedly, of the great natural resources of British Columbia, but although they may have heard them praised to the sky, they have not heard those resources praised too highly. We have resources which make British Columbia the most favoured spot on this continent, if not in the world, as regards natural wealth. We have our timber limits, mighty forests practically without limit, of fir, cedar and pine; we have our fishing industries, which can be developed to almost any extent; we have enormous deposits of coal, enough in my own district to warm and run this continent for centuries; we have deposits of copper and iron, inexhaustible; and, above all, we have, as the House is aware, the precious metals, our hills and mountains honeycombed with these minerals, and I might almost say, the beds of all our rivers are laid with gold and silver. I say all, in order to express the extent of our wealth, because there is a peculiar fact in connection with the mineral wealth of British Columbia, and it is that the precious metals are not limited to any particular section, the whole country being one great mineral region through which gold and silver are thickly distributed. Unlike other countries, Africa and Australia, we have this distribution of precious metals through the whole length and breadth of the province. To-day you are hearing something of Kootenay and Cariboo, but I can assure this House that within a year or so at the outside, hon. members will be equally familiar with the names of Alberni and Texada. The people have not heard of these regions simply because time is required to develop the mines and to place them on a dividend-paying basis, at which time they are first heard of. To show what the possibilities of the great mining industry of British Columbia are, let me say that at Rossland, the centre of the Kootenay district, whereas two years ago it boasted of but fifty inhabitants, to-day the population is nearly 5,000; that whereas two years ago the prospectors brought out a few little bits of gold, samples to lay before investors, at the present time there are mines in operation which this year will contribute to the wealth of this country, I believe, upwards of $10,000,000. When it is considered that this is only one small section which contributes that wealth to the Dominion, with no more mines in operation than can be counted on the fingers, and when we can state it as an assured fact that there are a dozen centres of equal importance to Kootenay, which will undoubtedly spring up within the next few years, the House will begin to understand the tremendous importance this industry will assume in the near future in British Columbia. But if we are to derive full value from the gold industry in that province, I suggest as worthy of the consideration of the Government, the establishment of a mint in that province. It is a peculiar fact that all other colonies of the Empire have mints, where they produce their own currency; and although from a commercial standpoint it would undoubtedly be advantageous to British Columbia to have a mint there, yet I think there are considerations of a more national character which will commend this suggestion to the Government, and I hope they will see that it will be in the interest of that industry to establish a mint, and that there is no place more suitable for the establishment of that institution than British Columbia. There is another report going the rounds of the press just now, I observe, and that is a suggestion to establish a Department of Mines. This suggestion if carried into effect would have a tendency to stimulate gold mining and other classes of mining in British Columbia. In this connection, of course, there can be no doubt that if that department were established, British Columbia would receive Cabinet representation, as undoubtedly the portfolio of that department would almost as a right belong to that province; but whether we receive Cabinet representation in that way or not, I hope the importance of giving British Columbia representation at the Council board of this Dominion will not be overlooked. In British Columbia we regard this representation now as a matter of right. Whether you compare our population and our representation in this House with those of other provinces, or whether you regard our province and our right in this regard from the revenue producing standpoint, we are more than entitled to Cabinet representation compared to some of the other provinces. But, Sir, if you consider the influx of population which undoubtedly will pour into that province in the near future; if you consider the difference in the conditions of life in that province, as compared with the conditions of life in the east; if you consider, above all, the great future which is before that province, I think all hon. gentlemen will agree, that British Columbia should receive proper recognition from the rest of Canada. I am pleased to know that the interests of my province are being considered by the present Government, and although the late Government did make a step towards recognizing the rights of British Columbia, I am glad that the Liberal Government is preparing to give them a fairer and a fuller recognition. Sir, I spoke of the influx of population which will undoubtedly flow into the province of British Columbia. There can be no doubt about that, because there is nothing which draws population and immigration to a country like the glitter of gold. We rest assured in British Columbia that come what may we will have a large population, and because of this certainty, we are not perhaps so much interested in the question of immigration as are other parts of the Dominion; for instance Manitoba and the North-west. Different policies of immigration have been spoken of, but it seems to me, Sir, that the best immigration policy is a policy which will promote natural trade conditions. It seems to me preposterous to speak of introducing population into this country when the conditions of life are such that our population will not remain with us. When the conditions are such in this country, that we cannot even retain our native-born population, what is the necessity for spending large sums of money in endeavouring to induce people from the old country to come here. We want to make the conditions of life in Canada easy for our people, and so attractive that when immigrants come here they will remain with us. Our country is a grand country, capable of maintaining in prosperity millions of people. Good wine needs no push, and, Sir, if the present Government—as I have no doubt they will—if they establish trade conditions over this country which will promote prosperity, there will be no trouble about the immigration question. Might I be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to refer to a phase of the immigration question which particularly concerns my own province. This particular class of immigration to which I refer affects British Columbia more than it does any province in the Dominion. I speak of the immigration of Chinese. I shall not weary the House with any extensive references to this question to-day, because it will undoubtedly be brought before your attention in a more particular manner before the session closes. However, at the present time, I wish to take this early opportunity of expressing my confidence that this Parliament will recognize that the importation of hordes of Chinese coolies such as are coming to British Columbia at the present time, is detrimental to the best interests of that province, and, Sir, I hope on an early occasion to show that if you regard this matter from a national standpoint as well as provincial, it will be found that it is highly desirable that restriction should be placed on Chinese immigration.

Now, Sir, I started out to show what were the natural conditions in the west and in British Columbia particularly. I wish to show, that the conditions which exist in that province to-day are a crowning proof of the inadequacy of the policy of the late Government. We have enormous natural wealth in that province, but while that is true, it is unfortunately equally true that we have no great measure of prosperity. There are evidences of want and of poverty in the midst of all this abundance and plenty, and it seems to me, that there must be some clear reason why these two conditions should exist side by side. I do not know why there should be poverty in British Columbia unless it be that the Government which has controlled the affairs of this country in the past, has removed the natural advantages of the country from the grasp and control of the great majority of the people. What is true with respect to British Columbia is true also of the North-west Territories and Manitoba. There are in those parts of our Dominion immense opportunities for people to take up homes, and live a happy and prosperous life. They have rich and fertile prairies enormous in their extent and wonderful for their fertility of soil. But Sir, as you know, Manitoba and the North-west Territories are not populated. You can travel for hours through that country without seeing the hut of a settler, and the whole of that vast domain is almost as virgin as it was when the buffalo roamed on the plains. It was in connection with this portion of Canada that a certain gentleman who stands very high in political circles in Canada, made wonderful prophecies which earned for him the name of the great stretcher. But, Sir, so far as any prophecy he has indulged in with respect to the North-west and Manitoba is concerned, that prophecy does not entitle him to any such distinction. If the existing condition of things in that country is ridiculously different from what he prophesied, it does not prove that he was a great stretcher. It, however, proves what is more important, and that is, that the policy which he and his colleagues sought to inflict upon this country was utterly inadequate for the development of Canada, and what applies in that regard to our western country is in a sense true of the whole Dominion. Ours is undoubtedly a rich country, rich in natural resources, rich in the fertility of its soil and rich in its mines. Our people are energetic, economical and persevering, and let me ask why it is, that in view of all this, poverty and depression exists? Why have some of our people to make such a desperate struggle to gain a miserable existence? Sir, I think there can be but one reason and only one reason, and that is, that while the opportunities of this country are great, and while our natural advantages are enormous, it has been rendered possible for these advantages to be cornered by a favoured few. While it is said by some that a Government cannot cause depression or prosperity, I consider, Sir, that in so far as the late Government has fostered a system of monopolies in this country, which turned from the grasp of the people the blessings which nature conferred upon them, they are responsible very largely for the depression which has existed in Canada for the last few years. Sir, some of us—and some of the hon. gentlemen possibly on the other side of the House, may have doubted a short time ago that there was any depression in this country; but since we have won our seats we can no longer think that, for I do not suppose that there is a member here who has not been deluged by applications—in many cases from men of culture, refinement and ability—for some miserable petty position. Is that not an evidence that the existing conditions of things is such that the people wish to flee from this struggle for existence?

But I was speaking of monopoly, Sir. I said that the Government had created and fostered monopolies in this country; and the placing of all the opportunities for wealth in this country in the hands of these few monopolists is the reason why prosperity has not been very general among our people. Just look at that for a moment. You will see that every condition to the gaining of an existence in this country is characterized by monopoly. Our whole land system—without entering into a discussion of Henry Georgeism—is based on the principle of monopoly. We will not discuss that matter; but the late Government aggravated the prevailing condition of affairs by giving enormous grants of land to people to hold at their own sweet pleasure. For instance, in giving to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company that magnificent heritage in the North-west Territories, they have done an enormous injury not only to the present but to future generations. I say, then, that the land, as a condition of existence, is monopolized. Look at the different branches of trade, and you will find the same condition of affairs. The National Policy undoubtedly fostered monopolies which could not have existed but for the enormous protection granted them. Look at the means of conveyance in this country, and you will find them also in the hands of monopolists. So I say that every condition to an existence—land, trade, means of conveyance—is monopolized, and it is for that reason, I say again, that the opportunities afforded by this country have not been enjoyed by the people as they should have been.

These monopolists have run this country so long that, like all people who rule a country for a considerable length of time, they have become impressed with the idea that it was their natural right to rule. They became so strong and powerful in the country that they not only controlled its commerce, but actually controlled the Government which in the first instance created them, and the Government, entrenched behind such a powerful influence, also became possessed with the idea, like the old kings, that they had a divine right to rule. But, fortunately for this country, they discovered on the 23rd of last June that whatever may have been their right to rule, they had no right to ruin; and even after the people had pronounced against the Government, after they had expressed their want of confidence in them, those gentlemen clung to office and gave an exhibition of lust for power which, whether constitutional or not, was certainly most indecent.

But in all these matters, as you know, the people finally rule; the rights of the people are finally triumphant, and it was not surprising that the hon. leader of the Opposition, like a certain other Charles, who history tells us, was very fond of official abuse and dictatorial methods, had to bow his head to an indignant and outraged public. On the 23rd of June last the people of this country most unmistakably declared their discontent and dissatisfaction at the condition of the country, and expressed a desire for a change. Sir, that change has come about; and it seems to me that the people on that occasion commissioned the new Government to inaugurate a new administration of affairs in this country—to tear down those monopolies which were in possession of rights belonging to the people, and to broaden out the opportunities for wealth, so that there would be brought about an era of more general prosperity throughout the country. That, Sir, I take it, is the work of the Liberal Government to-day. For what is liberalism if it is not relentless opposition to all class privileges—if it is not the spirit that declares every man to have an equal right to common opportunities at the hand of the state? That is the liberalism wanted in Canada to-day. That is the liberalism which makes a democracy possible, and which alone can make a democracy great. We want more of that kind of liberalism, that justice to humanity, which was celebrated by the young Scottish ploughman when he sang:

It is pleasing, therefore, to find in the Speech from the Throne an assurance that this new Administration realizes the importance of recognizing the interests and rights of the great mass of the people. With respect to the tariff, they give us an assurance that so far as it operates at present as a burden on the people, they are prepared materially to lighten that burden. It is pleasing and reassuring to see that they realize the existing condition of affairs; because, while we on this side of the House are not socialists, while we do not wear red shirts nor carry daggers, yet we do see that the conditions of society at the present day are becoming strained, and relief must be given to those who are suffering from an enforced condition of poverty in our country, and if this relief is not forthcoming from these legislative halls, it will be enacted in the streets.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. McINNES. Hon. gentlemen laugh; but, Sir, it appears to me that those who laugh most at that statement fail most to recognize the existing condition of affairs; for justice is crying out for a redress of the grievances which are felt in every city and home in this country, and that cry can no longer be withstood or ignored.

There is another assurance in the Speech from the Throne with respect to the trade question, and that is, that a searching inquiry will be made into the question. That shows that the Government, while intending to do justice to one section of the community, have not the slightest intention of doing injustice to any other section of the community. This announcement in the Speech from the Throne must be reassuring to the business people of Canada; but, Sir, while it is true that the business people of the country have every right to receive consideration, and while their rights and interests are in a sense vested and must be respected, I hope the fact will not be lost sight of that there are other rights and interests in this country which are just as vested, but which have not been respected in the past. There are other rights just as strongly based upon the principle of justice as any rights that can be bought for a few dollars. These rights, commonly called vested, are merely speculative rights, and I hold that they have not the same importance and are not entitled to the same regard as those rights of a higher nature to which I have just alluded. So much for the tariff. I think that the assurance in the Speech from the Throne that justice will be done to all parties can be taken in the spirit in which it is meant. Justice will be done to all parties; but I hope that the Government, when dealing with a revision of the tariff, will see that so far as the tariff affords any protection at all, that protection will be afforded to those who most need protection.

The Speech from the Throne then deals with the Manitoba school question and gives the assurance that before next session this question will in all probability be settled. That must come as a great relief to all classes in the community. Sir, it is gratifying to notice that the present Administration are pursuing the same policy which they so earnestly advocated while in opposition; and when giving the assurance that they are likely to succeed in settling this matter, it was scarcely necessary for them to breathe into that Speech from the Throne the spirit of conciliation, because conciliation is the only method by which questions of this kind can be settled. The Speech from the Throne does not declare along what lines this settlement will proceed. We do not know what terms of settlement will be arrived at, but I think we may take for granted that the settlement, when finally reached, will be in accord with the liberal principle of provincial rights. I think we may take for granted that it will be in harmony with progressive modern thought, and will in no way violate the principle of self-government. It must have been a matter of regret to all parties that this question was ever introduced into Dominion politics, and it is a matter of greater regret that it should have been introduced for the express purpose of furthering party ends, for I take it there can now be very little doubt that the late Government did introduce this question into Dominion politics as the very last hope of their retaining power. They knew, as well as the people throughout the country knew, that they had forfeited the support and respect and confidence of the country; they knew that the corruption and iniquities which marked their administration had alienated from them the confidence of the people; they knew there was a general dissatisfaction throughout the country consequent upon the failure of the National Policy. They knew those things, and as a last hope they sought to stir up religious and racial strife, thinking that by this means their iniquities and shortcomings would be lost sight of and that they would secure the support of one of the contending elements. Sir, they did not hesitate to set creed against creed, race against race, province against province. They did not hesitate to create a fermentation which practically led the people of this country to the verge of civil war.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. McINNES. Hon. gentlemen smile, but I think I am within the mark in making that statement. They brought the different elements into a position of the greatest antagonism—it would be impossible to imagine greater antagonism without open violence—and they did this, altogether for party ends; and these are the men who for years have been deluging this country with political clap-trap about patriotism and loyalty and the unity of Canada. Sir, they would not hesitate to disrupt this whole confederation if they could thereby gratify their inordinate greed for power. If you have any doubts about that, consider the situation to-day. The fight has been fought, the principle of coercion has been contended for. It was contended for by one hon. gentleman who was prepared, you will remember, to lay down his life for it. But now that the fight has been fought, what do we find? Where is the principle of coercion to-day which these hon. gentlemen were contending for? They have discarded it, they have thrust it to the winds, and I am constrained to ask whether the hon. leader of the Opposition has thought better of his life, since the new Government came into power, or whether he has thought less of that principle. But worse than that, to show what opportunists, what mere opportunists, we have to contend against, you need but go to North Grey to-day. What is the cry there? Sir, after the late Government had used every effort to gain the support of the province of Quebec, after it had done everything and was prepared to do everything to flatter their religious or racial instincts, after having failed in their efforts to compel the people of that province, by the most ungodly use of godly influences, to support them, what do we find? We find that rather with the hearts of a foiled seducer than with the spirit of a great party, they now turn upon that province and malign the character and nobleness of that province which they could neither win nor conquer. We find that up in North Grey to-day they are howling about French domination, forgetting altogether that they were the party who tried hardest to secure that French support in this House. Having failed to do this, they now raise the cry that this country is being subjected to French domination.

Sir, they have failed to hit the mark altogether. They have lost their power, and a sort of insanity appears to have seized them similar to that which possesses a she-bear who has lost her cubs. But even that does not explain their condition, for although we cannot expect them to see things in a normal way, yet in casting around for the reason for their loss of power, they ought to be able to see that the reason they are not on this side of the House is not because the French Canadian people of Quebec have turned against them, but because they have forfeited the confidence and respect of the young element of the electors of this country. It was not the French in Quebec nor the Orange nor the Protestant or English vote in Ontario or anywhere else that returned this Government to power. It was the young element in Quebec and Ontario and throughout the whole country. Have you ever, Sir, considered the fact that of those who cast the first vote on the 23rd of June last, thousands of them had attained the age of 29 before they could exercise their franchise? As you know, five years elapsed between the last general election and the election before that. The election before that was made on lists which were three years old, which meant that the man who had attained his majority in 1888, the day after the lists were made up, had no right to exercise his franchise until the 23rd of June last. Thus tens of thousands of young electors, between the ages of 22 and 29, cast their first vote on the 23rd of June last. That is the element which placed in power this new Government. I do not think I am exaggerating when I say that 80 per cent of the young electorate of this country are believers in the principles of Liberalism, and have been attracted to the Liberal party, by the justice of its cause, the clean records of its leaders, and their lofty and national sentiments. And I can assure this Government that as long as they possess these principles, as long as they endeavour to work them out in a definite programme of progress and prosperity, they will have the support of the young men of this country and will retain the respect and confidence of that ever recruiting class.

Before I conclude, Mr. Speaker, I wish to express the confidence in the Government which is prevalent throughout this country. On this side of the House we are proud to regard the present Government as the best that has ever held power in Canada. Whether this be true or not, whether this be a right estimate or not, I do not know; but, Sir, one thing is certain—that this Government is composed of the ablest and purest and most honourable men that can be brought together in Canada to-day. It is because I believe our honoured leader and the distinguished gentlemen whom he has associated with him in the Government will do what is right and fair by all classes and sections of this community; because I believe, Sir, they also appreciate the importance, the national importance of developing that greater Canada beyond the lakes, and that greater west beyond the Rockies; because I have every confidence that they will strive to make broad the foundations of our national life and to build up in this Canada of ours a democracy greater and truer than any the world knows, that I am pleased to move this Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. LEMIEUX. (Translation). Mr. Speaker, in accepting the task of seconding the motion for the adoption of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I did not disguise from myself how ungrateful is the task and onerous the burden involved.

More accustomed to another atmosphere, I do not, I hasten to avow, feel quite at ease in this Chamber, where the rules of debate circumscribe one, denying to eloquence itself the right to move the heart, appealing only to logic and reason. However, Mr. Speaker, if, as has been said, "noblesse oblige," youth also compels; and as in seconding the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver, I have the great honour to be more especially the spokesman of the deputation from the province of Quebec, I submit, therefore, with good grace to the arduous task which has been imposed upon me; at the same time claiming your indulgence.

Your election, Sir, as First Commoner of this House has been greeted with pleasure by the old French province of Quebec, where you were born, where you obtained your education, where you have learned our language and studied our literature, and of which you have made yourself the generous defender during the course of your political career. It is a most agreeable duty for me to offer you, on behalf of my colleagues, this testimony of our sympathy.

The important events which have taken place in the country during over a year of political agitation, the henceforth historic date of the 23rd of June, and the notable changes which have been brought about in the constitution of this House, are cause that at this moment, from one end of Canada to the other, from the seacoast of Gaspé to the far-famed Eldorados of British Columbia, general attention is rivetted upon us.

However, if we except the Supplies which this House will be called upon to vote for Her Majesty's Government, the work of this session should be of short duration and will necessarily be of little importance.

The advanced period of the year, the short interval of time which separates the two Parliaments, the haste with which it was necessary to prepare and revise the Estimates, are so many obstacles which have prevented the new Administration from bringing forward, during this session, those measures of public policy upon which we had counted. The Speech from the Throne, however, gives us an insight into important reforms, the accomplishment of which will be hailed with pleasure by the whole country.

No change will be made in the tariff, for the present at least. This announcement, while reassuring to those who have their capital invested in the various industries with which our young country is dotted, need not alarm the agricultural community, whose shoulders have until now been so heavily burdened by such heavy taxes and who, during the last general elections, have so emphatically declared in favour of a change of regime, that is to say, for tariff reform. The Ministers will put themselves in touch with all classes of the population, and their work will consist mainly in removing the shocking inequalities foisted upon our fiscal system by twenty years of extreme protection. The Government, Mr. Speaker, does not aim at revolution, but at peaceful reform and at the reconciliation of conflicting interests, without any disturbance or violent crisis: such is their ideal. This scheme of tariff reform, I am aware, will meet with systematic opposition from those interested. The selfish interests fostered by the present system, the men who had cherished the hope of living a quiet life here below, have an instinctive abhorrence of any change; but they should remember the old Latin adage "Vita in motu" (there is life in motion). Like all who have abused their power, they should be prepared to submit philosophically to the alterations brought about by the exercise of the electoral suffrage.

In this work of tariff revision, the Government will, I have no doubt, have a due regard for public opinion. They will proceed gradually, without too much precipitation, so as to relieve, with care and discernment the farmer, the artisan and the fisherman from the grasp of certain industries.

The Speech from the Throne also deals with the Manitoba schools question. The settlement of this vexed question, which has given rise to such stormy debates, was no further advanced at the dissolution of Parliament, three months ago, than it was six years since. For motives which I do not see fit to scrutinize or qualify, the Conservative party has done nothing but procrastinate, postpone and dilly-dally with this question every time it was brought before the House during the last Parliament. It was only at the last hour, after a ministerial crisis, unprecedented in parliamentary annals, when all delays had expired, that a Bill full of imperfections and more remarkable for what it left out than for what it contained, was proposed. The School Bill had been dignified with an imposing title, but in reality it contained two radical vices which rendered it unacceptable to one side as to the other. This Bill guaranteed nothing substantial to the Catholic minority of Manitoba, and at the same time antagonized by its violent provisions those whose help and good-will were so necessary for the allaying of a dangerous agitation. The position then taken by the distinguished chief of the Liberal party was the most rational and the most equitable. Let us not forget that we live in a country composed of diverse elements, enjoying equal rights. The races which inhabit it have the same interests and are entitled to the same share of liberty, to the same right to bask in the sunshine of liberty. But if conflicts arise between them, conciliation and tolerance should be resorted to, above everything else, to dissipate prejudice, hatred and passion. It was this wise and prudent policy which was endorsed at the polls by the electorate. Despite the manifestly unfair fight carried on and the unjust attacks made upon it, the Liberal party, we feel confident, will settle this Manitoba school question, a few months hence, without disturbance or shock, so as to satisfy all parties interested. The alliance, formed at the opening of the electoral campaign, and which offers a striking analogy to that between Lafontaine and Baldwin, is already an assured pledge of success. The noble veteran of the Liberal party in the province of Ontario, Sir Oliver Mowat, has been for the last quarter of a century, the champion of liberty in educational matters, and his name alone is a talisman. As to the eminent gentleman whom we are so happy to see in the position of Prime Minister, his past career is a sufficient guarantee of the tact which he will display in the settlement of so irritating a question on the lines of justice and equity. In this work of pacification, the Government ask the active co-operation of all those who believe in the future of Canada. My task, Mr. Speaker, is now accomplished, but before resuming my seat, I believe I will but be echoing the opinion of the large majority of the electors of this country in expressing my sincere satisfaction at the signal triumph achieved by the Liberal party at the last elections. After twenty years of ostracism, of bitter combats, of repeated defeats, the Liberal party resumes the helm of affairs with a revival of youth, of vigour and of energy. With leaders of integrity, a scrupulous economy in the administration of public affairs, a firm and vigorous adherence to the path of reform and progress, with respect for the constitution, with fidelity to its promises and attachment to its traditions, the people expect much from the Liberal party. Like the signal placed on the mast which protects the ships from the rocks and shoals, the Liberal party is also bound to guide and protect with jealous care the country whose destinies have been entrusted to it. At the beginning of this century, in the first Canadian Parliament, when an intriguing and ambitious party diverted the public funds from their proper destination and smothered the popular liberties, the Liberal party was ever to the fore and energetically insisted upon respect for rights and franchises trampled under foot. Out of this memorable fight were born our public liberties and responsible government. By a curious return of human events, at the dawn of the new era, which will be called the 20th century, the Canadian people, instructed by past events and moved by a sentiment of gratitude, confide anew their destinies to their defenders of old. But, Sir, despite the verdict so freely and so spontaneously given by the electorate on June 23rd last, a discordant note continues to be raised. A group of public men and journalists whom I would not confound with what was once the great Conservative party, exert themselves to raise the cry of French domination, because, for the first time since confederation, the Prime Minister is of French origin. It is true, and I am glad to avow it, the old French province of Quebec, the mother of the confederated provinces, hailed with pride and joy when the hon. Premier was called by His Excellency the Governor General to take the reins of Government. But to whom do we owe this honour, if not to the English Liberal party, who, in 1889, without considering the race and the religion of Mr. Blake's young lieutenant, have given him the command, relying upon his proverbial integrity, on his political genius and on his grand eloquence? The province of Quebec is, no doubt, legitimately delighted at the result of the elections, but, Sir, more than any other, you can testify that she has no desire to dominate. Her dream, as I said, is not to dominate but to meet in friendly rivalry with the English provinces upon a ground where the scot is sure, where the hand is free and where the heart will feel neither weakness nor shame; and that ground is Canada, our common country. And let me repeat here the language used by the Prime Minister before his electors at St. Rochs: "We are French Canadians, but our country is not confined to the territory shadowed by the citadel of Quebec. Our country! it is all that which is covered by the British flag on the American continent, the fertile lands which border the Bay of Fundy, the valley of the St. Lawrence, the region of the great lakes, the prairies of the west, the Rocky Mountains and the lands bathed by that celebrated ocean where the breezes are as gentle as those of the Mediterranean."

The future of this country depends to a large extent on the sentiments which its several nationalities entertain towards each other, on the spirit of tolerance or intolerance of which they will give proof. As already said, Sir, and it cannot too often be repeated, English and French are called upon to play in America the glorious role France and England have played on the other side of the ocean. To us belongs the noble mission of continuing on the virgin soil of the New World the immortal work achieved by those two proud nations on the historic soil of Europe. Our fellow-citizens of English origin have brought with them from the banks of the Thames that practical spirit, that sense of business and that commercial genius which have placed them undisputably at the head of commerce, of finance and of industry. They have above all brought with them that art of governing men, which they possess to such a high degree, and which their ancestors have undoubtedly borrowed from the Romans.

We, of French origin, have preserved that precious deposit which was bequeathed to us by France, when

Notre vieux drapeau, trempé de pleurs amers, Ferma son aile blanche et repassa les mers.

We shall never lose that taste for the fine arts and belles-lettres, that harmonious style, that pure and sonorous language, that fine flower of exquisite urbanity, in a word, that thirst for the ideal which is the necessary complement of the Celtic character. If we are generous enough to establish a fair compensation between our faults and our reciprocal qualities, we will give to the world the spectacle of a people endowed with a special type and physiognomy, a jealous guardian of rich national traditions, and remarkable for its intellectual culture. Union and concord ought to preside over all the phases of our political existence, if the idea of our country is to be our object, the desideratum of each of us. In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I cannot do better than quote with passing emphasis the words which Daniel Webster addressed to his fellow-citizens and which at the present moment are replete with interest:

In a day of peace let us advance the arts of peace and the works of peace. Let us develop the resources of our land, call forth its powers, build up its institutions, promote all its great interests, and see whether we also, in our day and generation, may not perform something worthy to be remembered. Let us cultivate a true spirit of union and harmony. Let our conceptions be enlarged to the circle of our duties. Let us extend our ideas over the whole of the vast field in which we are called to act. Let our object be our country, our whole country and nothing but our country. And by the blessing of God may that country itself become a vast monument not of domination and terror, but of wisdom, of peace, and of liberty, upon which the world may gaze with admiration for ever.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would like to know the pleasure of the House as to taking the Address en bloc, or paragraph by paragraph?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Paragraph by paragraph.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question is on the first paragraph.

On paragraph 1,

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, it now becomes my duty to tender my congratulations to the hon. mover and seconder of the Address which has just been listened to with so much attention by the House. I cannot help feeling, however, that so far as the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. McInnes) is concerned, that duty, very vigorously discharged, was discharged rather in an aggressive form, and I cannot therefore, quite tender the same hearty congratulations to the hon. gentleman that I would otherwise have it in my power very gladly to do. I noticed, however, a little inconsistency in two portions of the hon. gentleman's speech. In the first place he expressed great gratification at the fact that, for the first time, the Government of Canada had honoured the province of British Columbia with due consideration—referring to the invitation which the hon. gentleman had received to move the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. Before the hon. gentleman finished, however, he made a very earnest and very impassioned—and, of course, a very unselfish—appeal to the Government to do for their supporters from the province of British Columbia what the previous Government had done. I was inclined to believe that the hon. gentleman considered the compliment paid him in asking him to move this Address was much greater than that of having conferred a seat in the Cabinet and a portfolio upon a member from his province. I do not intend, however, to traverse the speech made by the hon. gentleman further than to say this: he referred to the change of sentiment that had caused the province of British Columbia to send a majority of supporters of the present Government. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman represents in his own person that change. But for the presence of the hon. gentleman in this House the Government would have no majority in British Columbia, so that it is the hon. gentleman's presence that constitutes that change. I was under the impression that the hon. gentleman did not owe his seat in this House to any change in popular sentiment in British Columbia as between the political parties, but to the unfortunate circumstance that the Government of which I had the honour to be the head was represented in the election contest by two supporters, two gentlemen who offered themselves as Conservatives with the hon. gentleman against them; with the result that the hon. member for Vancouver sits here having polled a minority of 450 votes. So far as British Columbia is concerned, it appears that the Government do not owe their majority in this House to any change of sentiment in the province of British Columbia, but to the unfortunate circumstance that we had too many candidates in the field, that two strong supporters of the Government of which I had the honour to be the head competed on that occasion for a seat in this House, and thus enabled the hon. gentleman to sit here, representing, as he does, a minority of 450 of the votes polled.

Now, Sir, I may say with reference to the remarks made by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux), that I listened to them with great attention, and with deep regret that I was not able to follow more carefully the expression of his sentiments in the beautiful language in which they were conveyed. But I may say that I was a little surprised to learn from that hon. gentleman that the farmers and the fishermen had high hopes of deriving great benefit from the recent change of Government. I was under the impression that the late Government, and the Liberal-Conservative party for the last eighteen years, had done a great deal to promote the interests of the fishermen and of the farmers of Canada; and I was under the impression that there was no portion of this Dominion in which the advantage resulting from the efforts of a Conservative Government had been more marked than in the province of Quebec. I may be wrong, but I believe that in connection with the efforts made by the late Government, and by the very able man who was placed at the head of the dairy department, great services were rendered to the farmers of Canada, and in a very marked degree to the farmers of the province of Quebec. I may also remind the hon. gentleman that the Conservative Government even exposed themselves to the charge by hon. gentlemen then sitting on this side of the House, of becoming dairymen, and in fact of lowering the dignity of a government, by the efforts they made to develop the various industries in which the farming population were so deeply interested. Now, Sir, it may also be within the memory of the House that on a certain occasion a treaty was submitted to this House by the late Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, the Washington Treaty of 1871; and the House will recollect that under that treaty an award was made in favour of the Government of Canada, by which Canada obtained some five millions and a half, a million of which went to Newfoundland. It will be remembered that that treaty made by the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald as one of Her Majesty's High Commissioners at Washington, was most strenuously opposed in this House by the Liberal party. Hon. gentlemen opposite then sitting on this side of the House gave the most vehement opposition to that treaty, which, however, was carried to a successful completion, and under which the sum of $4,500,000 was received from the award of the Commission at Halifax, as representing the increased value of our fisheries over those of the United States of America. It will be remembered that the policy of the Liberal-Conservative Government was to treat that money as the property of the fishermen, and the interest which it represented, which has increased recently from $150,000 to $160,000 a year, has been annually distributed among the fishermen as an earnest and an indication of the deep interest that the Liberal-Conservative Government and party took in that very important and interesting class of people.

Now, Sir, I do not intend to say more upon that subject at this moment; but while tendering my personal congratulations to my hon. friend who has attained the high position of First Minister of the Crown in Canada, I desire to express my deep regret at the mode in which that object was attained. I say my deep regret, because, Sir, no person would be more proud, no person would be more pleased than myself, to see a gentleman of the nationality of my hon. friend occupying that distinguished position. But so far as my knowledge goes, I believe it is the first time in the history of parliamentary government in which any gentleman has attained the triumph which that hon. gentleman has attained, without having succeeded in obtaining a majority upon any of the great issues upon which the two parties went to the country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I find that statement creates a little amusement on that side of the House, but perhaps, I may be permitted to point out the reasons and the grounds upon which I make the statement that that hon. gentleman did not succeed in obtaining a majority on any of the great issues that were submitted by the two parties when we went to the country. The hon. gentleman is aware that in 1878 a very sharp issue was created between the two great parties in this country. The Government of which the hon. the First Minister was then a member, and of which the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was the Finance Minister, were pressed very urgently by the Opposition of that day, during the latter portion of the period that they governed this country, to make a substantial change in the tariff of the country; and the issue was placed broadly and squarely before the people of Canada as to whether the free trade policy to which those hon. gentlemen had pledged themselves, and to which they determined to stand, or the protection of Canadian industries to which the Opposition were committed, should be the policy of Canada. The hon. gentleman knows that the result on that issue was not doubtful, and he knows that on the accession to power of the Government of the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, measures were promptly taken to carry into effect the policy which had been ratified by the people of Canada. The hon. gentleman knows very well that when the tariff was brought down by the late lamented Sir Leonard Tilley, who crystallized the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party into an act of Parliament, the hon. gentlemen opposite said that at all events we had carried out our pledges to the country; they admitted that there had been no faltering in carrying out the policy on which we went to the country, in the Act which we submitted. Now, the hon. gentleman is also aware that in 1882 that same issue was submitted to the people of Canada. For years the hon. gentlemen forming Her Majesty's Opposition in this House stood by their guns, and the battle was fought over that question in the election of 1882, and with a like result. A large majority was found to confirm the verdict of 1878, which had been given in such decisive tones, and it remained the policy of Canada. There was another issue, that of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but as that has ceased now to be an issue, I do not propose to refer to it. Then in 1887 the same issue was taken between the two parties in this country, those still standing by the principles of free trade, and those still maintaining the policy which the country had adopted in the protection of Canadian industries, and with a like result. Again the people of Canada declared themselves in a very clear and unequivocal manner in favour of the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party and Government in protecting Canadian industries. In 1891, after these three defeats, hon. gentlemen opposite finding that it did not seem to be exactly a successful policy on which to go to the country, constructed a new policy, and that was a policy of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. It was a rather long jump certainly from the policy of free trade to the adoption of the highest tariff that perhaps existed in any part of the world; but at all events, without going into that question, for I do not wish unduly to occupy the time of the House, the issue joined in 1891 was on the question as to whether we should continue the policy of the Liberal-Conservative Government and party of fostering and protecting Canadian industries, or whether we should adopt a policy of continental free trade, of having one tariff between the United States of America and Canada. The hon. gentleman is aware that the policy of the Opposition, the new policy of unrestricted reciprocity, met with a like defeat, and the policy of affording efficient protection to Canadian industries was still maintained by the electors of Canada.

In order to reach the point at which I am aiming, that of showing the issue which was submitted to the country at the recent election, I shall be obliged to read to the House a few brief extracts that will place in a clear and unmistakable manner before the House the policy upon which hon. gentlemen opposite stood when they went to the country on the last occasion. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who, as I have stated before, was the financial head of the Mackenzie Administration and who has always been recognized in this House as the great financial authority and exponent of the fiscal policy of the Liberal party, stated the policy of the Liberal party as appears at page 714 of the "Hansard" of 1893. I do not intend to go through the voluminous extracts I could give from various speeches made by hon. gentlemen opposite and the strong terms in which that policy was placed before the country, but I simply desire to place on record a very few extracts in order that there should be a very clear understanding as to what the issue was on the recent occasion. The hon. gentleman said:

The hon. gentleman desires to know our policy. I will tell hon. gentlemen what has been our policy from first to last. Our policy from first to last has been to destroy this villainous protective system, which has been grinding out the vitals of the people of this country. I do not care in what particular way the reptile is destroyed. I do not care whether it is cut off by the head or the tail, or in the middle. I do not care whether it is by free trade, positive or absolute, or by revenue tariff, or by continental free trade.

Then at a later date, in 1894, as will be seen by reference to page 336 of "Hansard" of that year, the hon. member for South Oxford used the following language:—

These hon. gentlemen challenge us—these consistent mortals who are shocked at our inconsistency demand our policy, and in especial they demand mine. Sir, they shall have it. I announced it years ago; my policy from first to last, ever since this infamous system was put on the statute-book, has been to do away with protection—how, I did not care.

Well, Sir, I think that will place satisfactorily on record the views and sentiments of the financial authority of the Liberal party in this House.

I come now to the views expressed by another high authority on that side of the House, the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies). I may say that the policy of unrestricted reciprocity was not exactly a success and that the party finding that it did not appear to be the road to power, felt it necessary that that policy should receive its quietus, and the funeral obsequies were performed by the hon. member for Queen's, who went down to Middletown, in the county of Annapolis, N.S., in 1893, for that purpose. In a speech delivered there the hon. gentleman said :

Well, gentlemen, I need say no more. Whatever doubts or difficulties there may have been about understanding our trade policy in times past, there is none now. Our platform is clear and definite. * * * To-day the people of Canada stand face to face with such an issue, and the next contest is to be one between free trade and protection. * * * The policy of the Liberal party, on the contrary, is the reform of the tariff by the elimination from it of every vestige of protection.

There can be nothing more clear and definite than the frank statement which the hon. gentleman made as to the policy of the great party to which he belonged. Then at Sussex, N.B., on January 4, 1896, a very recent date, that hon. gentleman, who is the leader of the party in the maritime provinces and a very able leader, gave expression to the following sentiments :—

No intelligent elector could obtain from that statement any opinion except that it was the determination of the Liberal party, if they came into power, to give a tariff of 17 per cent or at the outside 20 per cent, and if manufacturers could not live under it they must die. In 1891 the leader of the Government in May of that year, as will be seen by reference to page 27 of "Hansard," still clung with a good deal of longing, notwithstanding the defeat of the party at the polls, to unrestricted reciprocity, and he used the following language :—

While they commit the mistake of basing their trade policy, uniformity of allegiance and a mere sentiment, we of the Liberal party maintain that the policy of this country must be based not upon sentiment but upon business principles; and, fresh as we come from the people, I say that the only policy which will benefit this country is unrestricted reciprocity and continental freedom of trade. Sir Charles Tupper says in an article published a few days ago in the "North American Review," that the delusion, as he calls it, of unrestricted reciprocity was dead and buried. Dead and buried! I am as good an authority on the subject as is Sir Charles Tupper, and I say that it is more alive than ever.

Well, the hon. gentleman changed his opinion upon that subject at a later period, and he found that the statement which I have ventured to make, that unrestricted reciprocity was dead and buried, proved to be true. And if any doubt remained, the funeral obsequies of that ill-fated bantling, performed by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) for ever set at rest the question as to what the fate of unrestricted reciprocity had ever been. The hon. the First Minister, however, revised his view in reference to that, and he returned to his first love free trade. He said not very long ago :

The Liberal party believe in free trade on broad lines, such as exists in Great Britain; and upon that platform, exemplified as I have told you, the Liberal party will fight its next battle.

That was a tolerably conclusive statement as to what the views of the First Minister were as to the issue between the two great parties at the recent election. Then, as late as the 22nd of January, 1896, the hon. the First Minister said :

I have read in the "Gazette" the statement that if you remove protection, raw material would no longer be free. I say that if we were to have a revenue tariff, raw material would be free. Raw materials are not free to-day under the protective system. There are certain raw materials which are free. Wool is free; thank heaven they have not thought of taxing it. Cotton is free, also, but is iron free? Cotton is a raw material, and wool is a raw material for certain manufactures, but there are two articles which are raw material of every manufacturer, and these articles are coal and iron, and are they free? If you have a revenue tariff, the object will be to develop the country, and all raw material should be free under such a tariff.

No statement could be clearer, no statement could be stronger than that as to the determination of the hon. gentlemen—and this, mark you, is down to a comparatively short period before the battle was fought—that the duty on coal and iron should be removed. Again, at Sohmer Park, on the 18th February, 1896, the hon. gentleman said :

They have a tax on iron, which is a raw material of every industry. The tax on iron is $4 a ton, and at the present price of iron, that means a tax of 63 per cent ad valorem. The tax on coal, which is also a raw material of every industry is 60 cents a ton. Although I have not the latest quotations of coal, I am sure that this tax is equivalent to 40 per cent. There is a tax on coal oil of six cents a gallon, which, considering the price of coal oil in the United States, is equivalent to a tax of 100 per cent, to which must be added the tax of 40 cents on the barrels containing the oil. Can the industries which are thus taxed for the raw materials they use produce advantageously? You have piano factories in Montreal; the duties on imported pianos is 25 per cent. Can the piano manufacturer support foreign competition when he is taxed to the extent of 40, 60 and 100 per cent on the raw materials that he uses, and only gets a protection of 25 per cent on his manufactured products? The same is true of your wagon factories; it is true of the mass of industries. Protection is a fine thing only for a few monopolies. It mars the growth of all our great national industries. Now, I have been asked, what are you going to do? I have just told you what we are going to do. We are going to have a tariff for revenue, and we are going to abolish completely all the duties on raw materials.

Now, Sir, as stated by the highest authorities in the great party opposite, that is the issue upon which the two parties went to the country. We have never changed. From 1878 we have consistently maintained the vital importance to Canada of protecting Canadian industries, and we believe that the policy ratified on four different occasions by the electors of the country in an emphatic manner, was ratified because under that policy the country had prospered, as it had failed to prosper under the contrary policy of free trade pursued by hon. gentlemen opposite. I say, Sir, that on that issue we went to the country. Free trade versus protection, as stated by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), a revenue tariff and the freeing of raw material, such as coal and iron from the duties on them, as stated by the First Minister. Well, some rather curious things have occurred, and I do not believe that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) will himself say to-day that he has obtained his majority from the electors of this country on that great issue clearly and succinctly stated and put before the people of Canada. Some facts to which I will draw attention, I think, warrant me in the conclusion that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) found, as did the great leader of his party on a previous occasion. In the contest of 1887, the Hon. Edward Blake, face to face with the electors of the country, made a somewhat remarkable speech, in which he practically stated, that if the Liberal party attained power, their policy would not be to disturb the great manufacturing industries of this country, and he frankly admitted that he had arrived at the conclusion that it was necessary, practically to adopt the tariff as it existed. Now, Sir, as is well known, that hon. gentleman was not supported by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in that view of the case, and when we met in Parliament, Mr. Blake shortly afterwards resigned his position as leader of his party, and subsequently ceased to be a member of Parliament. Very much the same state of things has occurred during the present contest. I believe I am warranted in saying that the hon. gentleman opposite has received no mandate from the people of this country to break down the protection that is now given to our industries, and to adopt a policy of free trade or a revenue tariff policy. At a public meeting held at Westmount on the 19th of May, 1896, as reported in the Montreal "Witness":

Mr. Madore impressed upon his hearers that he was utterly in accordance with Mr. Laurier's policy. He was with him in tariff reform and also in his policy with regard to the reform in the general administration of public affairs, also on the question of Manitoba schools. * * * Speaking of the reform of the tariff, of which he was decidedly in favour, he said it did not mean a radical change, but it was purely and simply a legislation on a better scale with regard to the duties on different goods. The tariff reform had been a necessity for more than one year. It would be beneficial to every one, including manufacturers, and would not injure them as the Conservative party makes it appear. It would lessen the taxes and it could be called a kind of protection.

Well, Sir, that, I think was climbing very vigorously on to our platform, and adopting the issue upon which we were standing, and forsaking the issue upon which hon. gentlemen opposite said they would go to the country. The "Star" of the same date gives this report of the same speech:

The speaker was in accord with his leader on the tariff question. The Liberal party was not seeking to make any radical change in the tariff, but simply wished for a readjustment of the duties on a more equitable basis—a tariff which would assist the manufacturers, and, at the same time would not press too heavily on the consumer.

That does not exactly square with the views expressed by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). That desire to assist the manufacturers does not exactly square with the policy of removing every vestige of protection, to which the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), had committed himself. But I may remark that the hon. First Minister, who was present when Mr. Madore made this speech at Westmount, stated in the course of his address:

The issues now before the electors had been well defined by Mr. Madore.

So that this view of making no radical change in the tariff, but rather improving the condition of affairs in the country, was heartily endorsed by the hon. First Minister, who was there to ask the electors to accept the policy stated by Mr. Madore as the policy of the Liberal party.

Then, Sir, in Maisonneuve, the hon. First Minister supported Alderman Préfontaine. At that time Alderman Préfontaine delivered his views in the presence of the First Minister, who endorsed his candidature and asked the people to elect him. This is what Alderman Préfontaine said:

He (the speaker) was not a free trader, neither was the party; but he wished it understood that he was in favour of protection for the national industries. By protection he meant protection for all classes, not only for the manufacturing interests.

Now, Sir, I think I have said enough—it is not necessary that I should detain the House longer—in regard to the point I have made, and that is, that on the great issue submitted to the electors of Canada on the 23rd of June, the hon. gentleman has received no mandate from the people, considering the extent to which he had qualified the views in regard to free trade and protection uttered on previous occasions by the two hon. gentlemen who sit now on his right and on his left.

Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman made a speech at St. John's, Quebec, which does not materially differ from that delivered by His Excellency; and in that speech he said:

We do not intend to introduce any important legislation. The consideration of tariff changes will be adjourned until the session of January or February, and from now until that time my colleague, Mr. Fielding, will interview the different business men in the country, and will prepare a tariff which will be of a nature to satisfy all established industries, and to lighten the burden of taxation.

Protection is not at present to be torn up root and branch; the industries which have grown up under the policy of the last 18 years are not to be ruthlessly destroyed; but the hon. Minister of Finance is to interview the business men of the country and ascertain what tariff can be adopted that will, as Mr. Madore has said, improve the condition of the manufacturers rather than destroy their industries. I do not intend to pursue that matter further than to say that, regarding as I do the absolute necessity of maintaining protection to the industries of Canada in order to insure the progress and prosperity of the country, far from expressing any regret at the changed views and sentiments of the hon. First Minister, which undoubtedly represent the policy of the party, I congratulate the hon. gentleman most heartily and most warmly upon the enlightened views which he has at last been able to adopt, and upon the safety and security which the industries of this country will enjoy in consequence of that change. But I maintain, as I said before, that on that issue the hon. gentleman has not gone to the country; and I do not hesitate to say that if he had gone to the country upon that issue as it had been presented down to a recent period, and as it was indicated by the speeches of the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., and the hon. member for South Oxford—had he gone to the country upon that issue, unconnected with that unfortunate question which was interposed, and which produced such a striking and marked effect upon the result of the recent election, the hon. gentleman, instead of sitting where he now sits, would be sitting here. In my judgment, it is impossible to see this change of base in the presence of the electors of Canada without arriving at the conclusion that hon. gentlemen opposite, whatever they may think of the wisdom or the unwisdom of the policy of protection, know that it is deeply seated in the minds and feelings of the great body of the electors of this country; and their opposition to that policy would have secured their defeat just as it had done on the four previous occasions when it was submitted to the country.

But, Sir, there was another question, and one of very great importance, which was submitted as an issue in the election, and I will briefly draw the attention of hon. gentleman to that question. That was the question of remedial legislation. The House is perfectly well aware that the Government of my predecessor, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, had adopted the policy of remedial legislation. They had adopted the policy of accepting the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Queen's Privy Council as throwing upon them the duty of introducing into this Parliament the means of restoring the privileges that had been taken away by the Act of 1890 from the French Catholic minority in Manitoba. Hon. gentlemen are perfectly well aware that when I was invited to become the leader of the party in the House of Commons, I placed before the House that question as one of the very gravest possible importance; and believing, as I did, that it involved very grave and important consequences, and that the duty was undoubtedly thrown upon the Government of the day of sustaining the position taken by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England, I did not hesitate to stake the life of the Government upon that policy. I need not detain the House further than to say that when the Bill was introduced for the purpose of giving effect to that policy, the hon. First Minister moved the six months' hoist, and took his stand—as firmly, as distinctly and as unequivocally as any hon. gentleman ever took a position, in my judgment—upon the unwisdom of interfering with the autonomy of the province of Manitoba. He took the position of maintaining that, as the majority of the people of Manitoba and of the representatives of Manitoba had taken away those privileges, they must not be restored by an Act of this Parliament, but that conciliation must be used, and in fact the majority must be induced to modify their views in such a way as to restore the privileges of which the minority had been deprived. That was the position taken by the hon. gentleman here and was also that taken by him in the province of Ontario, as I shall show the House. On the 12th June, 1896, the "Globe" newspaper reports the hon. First Minister as having said:

He (Mr. Laurier) desired to secure the sentiment, not of his own people of Quebec but of the English-speaking people of Ontario. (Cheers). He was there to say not that he would give either a small or large amount of relief to the minority, but that, assisted by his friend, Sir Oliver Mowat, he would settle the question, not by appeal to any class, but by appeal to the sense of justice which was implanted in every one by the Creator. He was a Roman Catholic, and a French Canadian, and therefore might have strong sympathy for the minority. But as he himself would not be coerced by anybody, so he would not consent to force coercion upon anybody.

Can any language be clearer or stronger than this emphatic declaration by the First Minister that he would not resort to an Act of Parliament of the Dominion to override the majority of the legislature of Manitoba.

The cry raised throughout the country was "hands off Manitoba" and "no coercion." It was denied that this Parliament had the right to pass an Act which would override the deliberate policy of the Manitoba legislature. I do not intend to go into any argument in relation to that question. I am not dealing with the subject with that object, but in order to show on what issue we went before the country. That was the issue clearly and emphatically put. The Government of which I had the honour to be the head, declared in a public manifesto, issued by myself, that a cardinal plank in their platform was the restoration of the privileges which had been taken away from the Catholic minority of Manitoba and they appealed to the country for support on that issue. As the hon. gentleman knows, there was no more clearly defined issue ever put before any country than that which was put openly by the Government of which I had the honour to be the head. The late Government believed that it was the bounden duty under the circumstances, of the Government of Canada to respect the judicial decision of the Queen's Privy Council. They believed it had become their duty, under that decision, to pass an Act which, so far as we were able to do it, would restore the privileges of which the minority had been deprived. The hon. gentleman joined issue with the Government on that question. He declared that there should be no coercion and that whatever was accomplished must be done by persuading the majority to undo what they had done. At Chatham, the hon. gentleman said emphatically :

Mr. Laurier dealt fully with the school question. It was, he declared, a provincial question.

There is a sharp issue joined. We held that it was a provincial question down to the time when the legislature of Manitoba invaded the rights of the minority, but that it then ceased to be purely a provincial question, and the duty devolved upon this Parliament to redress the wrongs which had been inflicted. The hon. gentleman, however, said it was essentially a provincial question.

But because, at Ottawa, there was a Government which had not the courage to do right, it was dragged into the federal arena.

That could only mean one thing, namely, that the Government of Canada had failed in its duty to this country in not vetoing the Act of 1890. The hon. gentleman will see at once that if that be the case, it only renders the duty still more imperative of remedying the wrong. Until at Ottawa there were men prepared to show the courage to do right, the school question would never be settled. That is a good deal like the Delphic oracle. It will admit of half a dozen constructions.

It was the privilege—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

This is the point to which I wish to ask the hon. gentleman's attention.

It was the privilege of the minority to agitate and agitate until the majority were convinced.

There is no suggestion that in case the majority failed to do justice to the minority, Parliament would intervene. There is no suggestion that it was the duty of Parliament and in the power of Parliament to restore the privileges which had been taken away from the minority.

I will refer to another leading member of Mr. Mackenzie's Administration, a gentleman whom I am glad to see occupying the position of Secretary of State at this moment, the Hon. Mr. Scott. Mr. Scott in a public speech, delivered here in the city of Ottawa, and reported in the Montreal "Star" of 29th May, 1896, said :

If that question could be laid aside for two or three years it would settle itself, and people would see and do what was fair, but they could not allow questions of race and creed to arise. Mr. Laurier's was the only possible solution of the question. Manitoba was returning members pledged against remedial legislation, so that claims that a Bill should be passed next session was a fraud. It required delicate handling, gentleness, conciliation and fair reasoning, not coercion and talks of standing on rights. The minority would realize that anything could only be granted by the good-will of the majority.

This is the point to which I wish to draw the attention of the House.

The minority would realize that anything only could be granted by the good-will of the majority.

There is the position to which Mr. Scott committed himself before the electorate of Ontario in the most emphatic manner in his declaration that nothing should be done, that there was no means by which this question could be settled, and he spoke as with authority from the hon. First Minister, whose opinions he endorsed. The hon. First Minister, who is quoted by Mr. Scott, was committed, so far as his colleague could commit him. The fact of Mr. Scott having been taken into the Government is, to a certain extent, an endorsement of the declarations which that hon. gentleman made, that there should be no coercion, that there should be no action by this Parliament to override the legislature of Manitoba.

I think I have made clear the issue between the hon. gentleman and the Government of the day on this question, taking the hon. gentleman's position as he put it throughout the province of Ontario during the recent election. But I now come to a rather curious part of this question, and that is that while the hon. gentleman obtained his support—not a majority I am happy to say—while he obtained the support which he did receive in the province of Ontario on the distinct pledge and declaration that he would never interfere, by any Act of this Parliament, but that only means of conciliation should be used, yet when he found himself face to face with his own constituents in the province of Quebec, he propounded a new and entirely different doctrine from that on which the issue had been fairly and squarely joined on the floor of this Parliament and before this country. And I will call the attention of this House for a few moments to the speech that the hon. gentleman made to his own constituents at St. Rochs. I am reading from a translation of an article that appeared in "Le Soir" which, I understand is an organ of very high authority with the hon. gentleman. The translation, which is a strictly literal one, of what was published in "Le Soir" of May 12, 1896, gives the statement the hon. gentleman made at St. Rochs :

If the people of Canada put me in power, as I am convinced they will, I will settle that question to the satisfaction of all interested parties. I will have with me Sir Oliver Mowat, who, with his popularity at stake, has always been, in Ontario, the champion of the Catholic minority and of separate schools. I will place him at the head of a commission which will look into all interests in jeopardy, and I assure you that I will succeed in according justice to those who are now suffering. Is not the very respected name of Mowat a guarantee of the success of this scheme? And lastly,—

And I invite the hon. gentleman's attention to this emphatic statement.

—should those means of conciliation fail, I shall have recourse to constitutional means, and these I will use fully and in their entirety.

What more could be said. Says "Le Soir":

Could any one bind oneself in a more solemn and straightforward manner?

He could not. And thus we see that the hon. gentleman who made a most emphatic appeal to this House against coercion, against overriding by this Parliament the act of a majority in the province of Manitoba, who went from platform to platform in the province of Ontario maintaining the same policy of non-interference, of avoiding anything like coercion and depending upon conciliation alone in order to obtain redress of those grievances, when standing in the presence of the electors of the province of Quebec placed himself not only on the same platform as the Government he opposed, but, in gambling parlance, he went one better than the late Government, and stated not only that he would adopt the same means as they adopted, that he would fall back upon the law and constitution of the country and by Act of this Parliament give the redress that Manitoba, if it proved obdurate, would not give—but that he would do it in its entirety. It is known very well that one of the charges the hon. gentleman made, and one of the charges most emphatically stated by a gentleman now a member of his Cabinet was that the measure proposed by the late Government fell altogether short of what was necessary in the interests of the minority. The leader of the present Government gave his pledge that he would use the constitutional remedy in its entirety and would go far beyond what the Liberal-Conservative party had proposed in this House to do. Now, I do not hesitate to say that a majority thus obtained, by the avoidance of a sharp issue clearly defined between two great parties when before the electorate of the country, is not a majority obtained by fair or legitimate and justifiable means. And, as I have shown, the hon. gentleman having obtained almost all his support he has outside the province of Quebec upon the policy of non-interference with the legislature of Manitoba, cannot turn round and obtain the support of the province of Quebec by a declaration that he will not only do that to which he has objected on the floor of this House and on the various platforms of Ontario, but that he will go much further than has been proposed by any other party in giving that redress and by the same constitutional means. I submit, therefore, that on that question the hon. gentleman is not at the head of a majority, but of a minority. Speaking on the authority of the First Minister, Mr. Monet, his candidate in Laprairie and Napierville, according to "La Patrie," of April 20th last, pledged himself to vote for no Remedial Bill unless it gives more advantages to the minority than were accorded in the famous Remedial Bill of last session. So the hon. gentleman sought the support of Quebec on a solemn and unequivocal pledge to carry out the policy of the Government to which he was opposed, and to go further in that direction than they proposed to go. And without that change of front in the face of the enemy, or of the electorate of this country, the hon. gentleman would still be sitting on this side of the House and not where he is. Now, Sir, I will make a short quotation from a speech which the hon. gentleman ventured to make at St. John's, in the province of Quebec, since the elections—a ministerial utterance. In that I find that he reverts again to his former position :

I have declared on the floor of the House of Commons, I have declared in Ontario, I have declared in Quebec—

I venture to question the accuracy of that portion——that the only means by which to settle this question was not by coercion, but by conciliation.

Since the elections are over, the hon. gentleman says he has declared on the floor of the House and in Ontario—about that there is no question, and in regard to it I agree with him—that he had emphatically declared that the only means—not a means, but the only means—by which this question could be settled was by conciliation and not by the action of this Parliament. Now, Sir, I think I have given the House sufficiently good grounds for the opinion which I have expressed—that on the two great issues between the parties in this country, the hon. gentleman is sitting here not by virtue of having had his policy maintained either on one question or the other, but that so far as the country is concerned, the hon. gentleman is in a minority. But, Sir, I must now draw the hon. gentleman's attention to a charge made by him against myself, and one which had a great deal to do with the results in the recent election—that I had endeavoured to raise a race and religious cry in this country. Sir, I stand in the presence of this House and before the people of this country; I stand here with a record of over forty-one years of public life, and I say in a most clear and unhesitating manner that from the hour I entered public life to the present, no man has been able fairly to charge me with endeavouring to set race against race or religion against religion. On the contrary, my whole life bears testimony, every act of it, that such is not the case. I could cite proofs innumerable, if I did not fear to weary the House, to show that my great aim as a public man has been to promote the utmost harmony, the utmost confidence and the most kindly co-operation between those of different races and of different religions. I recognize fully and in the most unequivocal manner that in this country, divided as we are into two great races and differing largely on the questions of religion, it would be impossible to look forward with any hope or any confidence to the future of Canada if questions of race and questions of religion were permitted to enter into the decision of the electorate of the country. I have always set my face against it, and I shall always continue to do so. Now, Sir, on the occasion of the welcome which the hon. gentleman received in the city of Ottawa, he is reported in the Montreal "Gazette" as saying:

You well know that when Sir Charles Tupper was appealing to the prejudices of my fellow-countrymen and co-religionists, while he was trying his best to arouse passions which we know when aroused, are uncontrollable; when he was doing that the Liberal party in the province of Quebec never appealed to passion, and that the Liberal party obtained victory upon the same grounds in Quebec as in the province of Ontario and every part of the Dominion, Liberals we were in Ontario, in Nova Scotia and in Quebec as well.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. An hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." I think he has forgotten the fact that I have given the House the most clear and unmistakable evidence, from the lips of the First Minister himself, that his policy as propounded in the province of Quebec on this great question, was as unlike his policy propounded in the province of Ontario and on the floor of this House, as day is unlike night. Well, Sir, I will now come to the grounds upon which the hon. gentleman charged me with having appealed to the electorate of this country to oppose him by reason of his being a Frenchman and a Catholic. I say, Sir, that I should feel myself utterly degraded if I were capable of doing either the one or the other. I will briefly give the House the grounds upon which the hon. gentleman made that charge, one of the gravest, one of the most important charges that it is possible for one public man to make against another; and I put it to his own sense of candour and justice as to whether he has not misrepresented me in the most palpable manner. The hon. gentleman, speaking at Terrebonne, on the 13th of May last, is reported as follows:—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Mr. Laurier next quoted from Sir Charles Tupper's speech in Winnipeg, the following: "To my Conservative friends who have turned their backs upon me, I want to make another appeal, and it is this: I want to know where is the man with any brains in his head, where is the man who has any capacity for exercising intelligent reasoning who would justify himself, or could justify himself to his countrymen, if he oppressed a feeble minority, and that for the purpose of bringing into power a Roman Catholic French Premier, who declares he will do more? Do you think he would stultify himself? Perhaps I hear a person say, that Mr. Laurier has done much to deter the passage of the Remedial Bill. Quite so, but I want to ask that person the reason Mr. Laurier gave for it. It was that the Bill was useless, that it was a half-hearted measure, that it was good for nothing, that it could do nothing for the Roman Catholics, and that he would have a much stronger Bill."

The First Minister then went on to say:

I protest against the language of Sir Charles Tupper, who says to the Protestants of Manitoba, "Are you going to put at the head of the Government a French Canadian, a Catholic, for, gentlemen, if the Liberal party triumphs the Prime Minister will be a French Canadian and a Catholic." I protest against the language of Sir Charles Tupper, who speaks thus in Manitoba. He will speak on Friday in Sohmer Park, in Montreal, and he will not dare to speak like that.

Now, Sir, I ask the hon. gentleman whether that is not a complete misrepresentation of the quotation as I read it to the House. What did I say, Sir? I made no appeal to the electorate of Canada to reject the hon. gentleman because he was a Frenchman or a Catholic. So far from that being the case, there has not been a word in any speech I ever uttered, here or elsewhere, that will bear that construction for a single moment. The appeal I made was not to Protestants, it was to my own friends. To my own friends I said: Will you turn your back upon me, will you desert the party to which you belong for the purpose of bringing into power a Frenchman and a Roman Catholic as Prime Minister?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am afraid the hon. gentlemen opposite are not very acute logicians, they fail to see my argument. I was not appealing to the electors, I was not appealing to Protestants, but I was appealing to my own friends who were proposing to desert me on the question of this Remedial Bill, and to vote against me because I was prepared to support remedial legislation in the House of Commons on this issue; and I said: Will you not stultify yourselves if, in so doing, you strike me down, if you strike down the Government and party to which you belong, for the purpose and with the result of bringing into power a French Roman Catholic Premier who declares that he will do more? I say I am in the judgment of the House, I am in the judgment of every man in this country who knows anything of reason or logic, when I say that no such construction can be given to my words as that they were an attack either upon the nationality or the religion of the hon. gentleman in connection with the high office which he now holds. I say that is perfectly clear and perfectly palpable, and therefore the hon. gentleman has no warrant whatever for the statement. I repel with the utmost indignation the insinuation that I could be capable of referring to the nationality or the creed of any hon. gentleman in regard to any position he might hold in this House or in this country. In my judgment I say such conduct would be utterly intolerable. I should regard confederation as a complete failure if the high position of Premier of this country were not equally as open and as accessible to a French Canadian as to any man of any other nationality. Those are my views, views that I have always expressed here and elsewhere. I could give evidence to the hon. gentleman of the most unmistakable character that on an occasion not very remote when the prospective position of Premier was pressed upon me I refused it and declined to take the course suggested, because I thought it would not be undesirable that a French Canadian should occupy the position of First Minister in this country.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I have but little to add to the point I was making in regard to the criticism upon the speech which I delivered at Winnipeg. But I may say this, Sir, that on the morning of the day on which I made that speech the "Free Press" newspaper, which certainly up to that time had been a supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite of a rather pronounced character, published a telegram containing the speech of the hon. First Minister made at St. Roch, to which I have referred. It was as follows:—

Quebec, May 7th.—In the course of a speech last night Mr. Laurier said in reference to the Manitoba schools, the Government had finally introduced a Bill which was such a miserable thing, that though called a Remedial Bill, the principle of remedial legislation was not within its four corners. * * *

My friend Mr. Ross, Minister of Education in the Government of Sir Oliver Mowat, (great cheering), is with me here on the platform and agrees with me. (Mr. Ross, hear, hear), that there should be religious teaching in the schools. * * *

Mr. Mowat would have approached the Protestant people of Manitoba, not with threat, as was done by Bowell, but would have addressed himself to Christian conscience and told them to give to the minority the privileges of conscience they claimed for themselves, and if the people of Manitoba remained obdurate there were always reserved the powers of the constitution to fall back upon.

On the following day, 9th May, the morning of the day on which I addressed the people at Winnipeg, the "Free Press" said under the head of "Mr. Laurier's Announcement:—

Whatever the reason, the impression created in the minds of those opposed to separate schools here was that Mr. Laurier and the Liberal party represented the forces opposed to coercion in toto, and that from them under no circumstances might a remedial Bill be expected. This impression must now go, and instead of it will come a better understanding of the attitude of the parties toward the question.

I give that as the report in the "Free Press" newspaper of the speech delivered on the evening of the 7th by the First Minister, and the conclusion at which the very able editor of that journal arrived, and they show that the policy of the First Minister and that of the Liberal-Conservative Government were one and the same so far as that matter was concerned. I have endeavoured to show that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) did not on the recent occasion triumph in regard to either of the great issues that were submitted to the people; and in confirmation of my statement of that fact and of my opinion that the hon. gentleman owes his position in this House to-day as First Minister of Canada, not to the fact that the policy which the hon. gentleman propounded on either of the great issues submitted to the people was adopted or ratified by the electors of Canada, but that the hon. gentleman's triumph was a triumph of race, I read the following extract from "Le Pionnier de Sherbrooke," of 29th June, 1896:—

Mr. Laurier's candidates in this province have gained votes by saying that the Remedial Bill presented on the 2nd of March last, did not grant enough to the oppressed minority, and that if the Liberal leader were returned to power he would grant a measure that would be much more efficacious.

It is on the faith of this promise that thousands of electors have been induced to mark their ballots in favour of the Liberal cause.

We shall await Mr. Laurier's action on this head of his programme, and if he makes sincere efforts to put a stop to the persecution from which our friends have been suffering for the last six years, we shall give him in that not only our sympathies, but also our most cordial support.

So much for the fact that the hon. gentleman, having changed his attitude altogether on this great question in the presence of the electors of the province of Quebec, announced that he was ready to go further than the Government had done.

"L'Union des Cantons de L'Est," Mr. Laurier's own organ, published at Arthabaska-ville, concludes its editorial comment as follows :—

Patriots of the province of Quebec, thanks ! You have done your duty and have shown the country that you have heart and intelligence. Mercier must have shuddered in the eternal peace of the grave at seeing his executioners of 1892 crushed by public wrath in his own dear province. Papineau, Dorion and the old leaders must be proud to-day at the uprising of their race in Parliament and in the councils of the nation.

"La Gazette de Berthier" says "that it was Mr. Laurier's name which acted like a torrent that carried the day." This tribute to the hon. gentleman's personal popularity is one in which I entirely concur. I have no doubt at all that it was to a very large extent the question of race which decided the issue in the late election, and not, as I have said, the adoption by the electors of this country of the policy which the hon. gentleman had propounded in regard to either of the two great issues that were submitted to the people. But notwithstanding the result, the fact remains that upwards of 19,000 of the electors of Canada polled their votes for the Liberal-Conservative party over and above all that voted in support of the Liberal party. So the hon. gentleman will find that while he has a majority in Parliament, obtained by the very extraordinary means to which I have referred, the fact remains that the great party which I had the honour to lead during the late contest polled over 19,000 votes more than was polled by the party whose members now have the pleasure of sitting on the Treasury benches. I will not detain the House, unless the point is questioned, by giving the details, which I am prepared to submit to the House. Outside of the province of Quebec, an alteration of five votes would give the Liberal-Conservative party a majority in every province of the Dominion ; and as it stands, outside of the province of Quebec, a decided majority of the members was returned to support the party which I had the honour to lead. I may be asked what about Quebec ? All I can say is that Quebec was a great disappointment to me. I frankly admit that I was entirely unprepared for the course pursued by the electors of that province. It was stated in the discussions on the hustings during the late campaign by hon. members of this House that I had made a compact, a bargain with the bishops of the province of Quebec to give me their support in return for the course which I had pursued in this House in respect to the question of remedial legislation. I am here to say in the presence of this House that a more unfounded statement never emanated from the mouth of any hon. gentleman. I am here to say that from the moment I came from England last winter down to this hour, I have never had the pleasure of meeting a single bishop of the province of Quebec or of having any communication with them, either directly or indirectly. Therefore, Sir, I am not in a position to reproach the hierarchy, or any person else in the province of Quebec, for the course they pursued. But, Sir, I may say this : I think it unfortunate—and I am now speaking apart altogether from the question of the effect upon the position of political parties—I think it a very unfortunate thing that a Government, that a party who from a sense of duty, a sense of what they owed to the constitution of the country, a sense of what they owed to the peace and happiness and prosperity, as they believed, of the country ; I think it unfortunate that they should take their lives in their hands to carry out a policy which was stated to be one to which the province of Quebec attached the most vital importance, and that under these circumstances a course should have been pursued that is calculated to lead to the impression, that whatever sacrifices a great party may make in carrying out a policy which is specially dear to any section of the Dominion, these sacrifices should be disregarded and entirely overlooked. As I said before, I have no ground of complaint, because I had no pledge, no assurance, nor anything of the kind. The course that I pursued on this question, the course that the Government of which I was a member pursued, the course that the late Government of which I had the honour to be the head pursued, was a course dictated by the sincerest convictions of duty and of what they owed to the country. And, Sir, I am free to confess that I entirely over-rated the importance of this question. I say, Sir, that in the light of what has occurred, I am in a position to frankly admit that I greatly over-rated the importance of this question of remedial legislation. I entered upon it, as I say, under the conviction that the Government of Canada were bound by every principle of right and justice, and of statesmanship, to carry out a policy which they believed to be for the maintenance of the law and the constitution of the country as expounded by the highest judicial tribunal of the Empire. It was in that spirit that the late Government entered upon the discharge of their duty. It was in that spirit that they did their utmost, and that they did all that men could do to carry it out. I may say more, Sir. In addition to the conviction I had that it was right and proper, and that it was the absolute duty of the Government to maintain the law and the constitution as thus expounded, I did believe that it was a question of much more far-reaching importance than I now find it is. I had the conviction, I entertained the opinion, and I entertained it sincerely, that the Roman Catholics of Canada attached the most vital importance to the question of religious education for their children. I entertained the belief, and I entertained it sincerely, that it would be a cause of deep resentment on the part of the great body of the Roman Catholics of this country, if the Parliament of Canada refused to carry out the law and the constitution of the country as expounded by the highest tribunal of the Empire. Having these views, I attached, as I say, the utmost possible importance to this question, and I regarded it as a still more imperative duty on the part of the Government of the day to avoid anything that would leave the impression upon the minds of a great body of the population of Canada, that equal justice was not meted out to every man in Canada, by the Parliament of Canada, irrespective of race or creed. Under these circumstances, as I say, I find that I attached much greater importance to this question than the result of experience has shown to belong to it. I find that there has not been that deep importance attached to this question, by a very large portion of that denomination, that I had previously supposed. I make that admission frankly to the House, and I cannot but feel that it is not unlikely that it will be much more difficult in the future than it was in the past—and it was difficult enough as gentlemen in this House all know in the past—it will be much more difficult in future to induce gentlemen to sacrifice their own judgment to some extent, and the feelings of their constituents to some extent, to maintain a policy, which when subjected to the test of actual experience, is not found to have the importance attached to it that was previously supposed.

Now, Sir, I do not intend to say more upon that subject on the present occasion, but I will say this: that in the future as in the past the cardinal principle with the great party to which I have the honour to belong will be: equal justice to all without respect to race or creed. I am glad to know that the responsibility of this question—an important question, although not so gravely important as I had supposed—I am glad to know that the responsibility rests no longer upon my shoulders, but upon those of the hon. gentleman who is now the First Minister of the Crown. I can only say, that I trust and sincerely hope, that he will be most successful in obtaining such a settlement of this question as will do justice, and give satisfaction to all parties. I can assure the hon. gentleman not only that he has my most cordial wishes for a happy, and early, and fair settlement of this important question, but that anything that I can contribute to that end will be at all times most cheerfully done. I say that, Sir, as to my views on the course that should be pursued, and, as to the course that was pursued my view remains unchanged. My desire to see equal justice dealt out regardless of race or creed remains as strong now as ever. While I have the honour of a seat in this House, or even after I should cease to be a member of this House, I have no hesitation in saying, that the same principle will always obtain with me, and I shall always be found true to that principle which lies at the very foundation of Canada's prosperity, progress and advancement. That principle is, that there should be the conviction established in the minds of all persons irrespective of race or creed, that there is but one law, and one measure of right and justice to be meted out to those whose interests are at any time imperilled.

I may say in regard to the very erratic speech of the mover of the Address (Mr. McInnes) that there was some little apology for the gentleman, and that is, that the First Minister had called upon him to make bricks without straw. As a matter of fact, to move an answer to an Address which contains nothing is rather calculated to tax the powers of even an experienced member of this House, not to speak of one who has had no previous experience. The Speech from the Throne is more remarkable for what it does not contain than for what it does contain. I cannot help wondering why this Parliament was called together at all. Why are we here? For what object are we here? It is not certainly for the statement that is put in the mouth of His Excellency the Governor General, who says:

The necessity of making provision for the public service has compelled me to summon you together at this somewhat inconvenient season. Why, Sir, in view of the fact that the first act of this Government has been what I regard as a gross violation of the law, that the first act of this Government, as exhibited by the papers laid on the Table of the House to-day is not only a gross violation of the law, but shows that Parliament is not required at all in this country. Their very first act, on coming to power, shows that hon. gentlemen opposite entertain very different views from those which they entertained and pressed upon this House when on this side of the House. They have now discovered a new law and a new gospel. Let me invite the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite for a moment to the question of providing for the public service, which it appears obliges His Excellency the Governor General, at very great inconvenience, to call this Parliament together. Why, Sir, the enormous sum of money provided for the public service by the Governor General's warrant, shows that it is a mere matter of form to call Parliament together to vote public money—that it is entirely apart and outside of any necessity. The papers laid on the Table to-day disclose the fact that these hon. gentlemen, who held yesterday that it was a gross violation of the law for Governor General's warrants to provide money for such purposes as are provided for by this Government under this warrant, are no sooner placed in a position to advise His Excellency the Governor General than they advise him to commit this violation of the law which they had condemned, and which the Act on the Statute-book shows to be altogether unjustifiable. I will remind the hon. gentleman opposite that a gentleman who has always been regarded as a very high authority in this House on questions of this kind—I mean the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), the former Finance Minister—will be found in "Hansard," of 1891, vol. 3, page 4540, to have used the following language:—

The language of the Act is quite plain and I will read it for the information of the House:

If when Parliament is not in session any accident happens to any public work or building which requires an immediate outlay for the repair thereof; or any other occasion arises when an expenditure not foreseen or provided for by Parliament is urgently and immediately required for the public good, then on report of the Minister of Finance and the Receiver General, that there is no parliamentary provision, and of the Minister having charge of the service in question that the necessity is urgent, the Governor in Council may order a special warrant to be prepared for the purpose of supplying this.

It is scarcely necessary for me to point out that the obvious meaning of this clause is, that when any occasion arises when any expenditure which cannot fairly be foreseen by the department or provided for by Parliament, is urgently and immediately required; then and then only, is it intended that such a warrant should issue. Now, Sir, I say it is an evasion of the principle intended and of the meaning of this Act, for the Government, or a department of the Government, first of all to neglect their duty, first of all to neglect to take proper precautions to inform themselves of what money would be required and to apply to Parliament; and then afterwards, to plead their own deliberate neglect of duty as an excuse for having recourse to this extraordinary provision, and obtaining use of the Governor General's warrant.

And the hon. gentleman, on the strength of that declaration, moved a resolution which concluded by saying:

That under such circumstances the issue of a Governor General's warrant for the said sums was a gross abuse of the power vested in the Governor in Council under the said Act.

Now, Sir, I want to ask the hon. gentleman what was the position in this case? Was the occasion unforeseen? Does the hon. gentleman forget that my hon. friend on my left, the late Minister of Finance (Mr.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Foster) begged and implored this House to provide for the public service—to provide even a small amount that would carry the public service on until Parliament could be summoned? But, Sir, with their eyes open, and with perfect deliberation, these hon. gentlemen, controlling at the time a small minority of this House, and abusing the position of power in which they were placed by the near expiration of the life of Parliament, refused to permit this House, although a large majority were begging and imploring them to do so, to make provision for the public service. Was it an unexpected contingency, when the hon. gentlemen, with their eyes open, and knowing what would occur when the public service could not be provided for, deliberately refused to make that provision, and then came down to the Governor General and asked him to adopt a course which they themselves have declared, and properly declared, to be a gross abuse and violation of the law, for the purpose of covering, not an unforeseen contingency, but a condition of things which they, by wilful obstruction, forced upon this House? It bodes unfavourably, Sir, for the future of Canada. It is a bad start for a new Government to commence with a gross violation of the law, with an abuse of the power they possess, with trampling under their feet the very principles which they themselves have laid down in this Parliament as fundamental principles. The hon. First Minister had occasion to speak on this subject in the city of Toronto on a recent occasion, when he denounced it as un-English, un-parliamentary and improper on the part of a Government to spend a single dollar of public money that was not voted by Parliament; and yet, Sir, the hon. gentleman, instead of adopting a course in accordance with his own declaration, first brought about the contingency by the most palpable and determined obstruction which any party were ever guilty of on the floor of this Parliament—a course which, I trust, will never be paralleled again; and then, Sir, the moment it was found to be convenient for his own purposes and the purposes of his Administration, he advised the Governor General to perform an act in violation of the statute, and one which has been correctly denounced by the hon. member for South Oxford as a gross abuse of the statute and a gross impropriety. Under these circumstances, I need not quote authorities. I have here the authority, which we all regard as a very distinguished one, of Dr. Bourinot, who says on this subject:

Special warrants may issue, when Parliament is not in session, and any expenditure not foreseen or provided for by Parliament is urgently and immediately required for the public good; and a statement of all such warrants is laid before the House, not later than the third day of the next session.

I will not detain the House further on the present occasion on this question, as we shall have an opportunity of discussing it more at length on a future occasion; but I ask again if we can expend a million under Governor General's warrants for the public service, what need of calling this House together at all? Is it anything but a farce to summon this Parliament from the Atlantic to the Pacific, to come together here in midsummer, to be told that they are brought here for the purpose of voting supplies, when all that is necessary is for the Government to obtain the signature of the Governor General to a warrant to furnish them with any amount of money for the public supplies that they may require? I have said already that I do not intend to press that matter further at the present moment, but I may say that this speech is rather remarkable for what is not in it than for what is in it. The hon. gentleman is unwilling to take the House into his confidence. He is very reticent indeed. He intends to take seven or eight months to ascertain what his policy is, to find out what he proposes to do and submit to Parliament.

I wish the hon. gentleman had been equally reticent and cautious in submitting his policy to a foreign country. I have spent many years on the floor of this House, but I confess I have never, on any occasion felt the unbounded amazement that I did when the hon. the First Minister declared in this House that the report read by my hon. friend from North Lanark (Mr. Haggart), from the Toronto "Globe," was an authentic statement. In my judgment, it would have been better for the hon. gentleman to have taken his colleagues into his confidence. But no doubt he must have done so. I suppose he must have had their authority before he propounded the foreign policy of Canada in relation to a foreign country, and confided it to a newspaper of a foreign country. I believe, Sir, you would search the records of statesmanship in any country in vain to find any parallel for an act so utterly unjustifiable. Why, just imagine, the hon. gentleman is here, he has brought the Parliament of Canada together from one end of the Dominion to the other, and he tells us that he has nothing to say to us. All I want, he says, is money. He has no confidence to give us, he has no policy to propound or submit. Although he has had eighteen years on this side of the House to formulate a policy and arrive at an opinion of what is in the interests of this country, he has not a word to say to the assembled Parliament of his country as to what policy he proposes to pursue on any single question touching the interests of this great country. But what do we find in this interview? Why, I can only describe it—and I do not wish to use too strong a term—as an act of unmitigated folly. I cannot imagine in the interests of Canada any course which the First Minister of Canada could pursue which is more calculated to defeat the very objects he himself has in view than to take into his confidence the reporter of an American newspaper, and make known to the world the policy of Canada through such a channel. Does not every one know that in diplomacy it is of the utmost importance to proceed cautiously? Does not every one know that in diplomacy you must follow in the most tactful and diplomatic manner, the views and sentiments of the parties with whom you are about to negotiate, and that to wear your heart on your sleeve and state to the seventy million people across the border what you propose to ask them to do, and under what great necessity you are to obtain what you ask, is simply to give your whole case away. If the hon. gentleman had sought how best to defeat any object he had in view with regard to questions of that kind, he could not have taken a more effective means of accomplishing his purpose. But I have a graver objection than that to make. I hold that it is in the last degree unpatriotic on the part of any Canadian to commit himself to the statement to which the hon. gentleman did commit himself regarding a great party in this country. The hon. gentleman has charged the Liberal-Conservative party with being hostile to the United States of America. He declares that the Liberal-Conservative party, which has been in power for the last eighteen years, has not treated the people of the United States in a proper and neighbourly manner. Why, Sir, the statement would be bad enough if it were true, but it is not true. I state most unhesitatingly that every historical fact which bears upon the question proves that there is not a tittle of foundation for this statement. Sir, the Liberal-Conservative party of Canada have, for the last eighteen years, on every occasion, done all that men could do, and all that a Government could do, to show the people of the United States that they were anxious to live upon the most neighbourly and friendly terms possible with the people of that country. I am aware that the hon. gentleman had the good fortune to obtain the support of the whole press of the United States in the late contest. I will not say that he obtained any other support, but, so far as the press of the United States is concerned, the hon. gentleman was able, by one means or another, to indoctrinate the people of that country with the impression that the Liberal party of Canada was more friendly to them than the Liberal-Conservative party, and that the American people were more likely to obtain the accomplishment of their own hopes and wishes from the Liberal party than from the Liberal-Conservative party. Not only is that not the case, not only have the Liberal-Conservative party, on every occasion, shown the utmost desire to maintain the most friendly possible relations with the United States, but the hon. gentlemen opposite are men who, whenever the question arose between Canada and the United States of freer intercourse, always endeavoured to obstruct the carrying out of those arrangements that were found to be calculated to promote cordiality and good feeling between the two countries. Let me remind the hon. gentlemen again of the treaty of 1871. I need hardly tell you, Sir, that when the treaty of 1854 was abrogated by the United States in 1866, instead of the Government of Canada meeting that unfriendly act on the part of the United States—an act which certainly was within the control and jurisdiction of the United States—in a hostile spirit, took exactly the opposite course. At the very moment when that treaty terminated by the United States, we could have prevented them from taking fish within the three-mile limit, but we, instead, allowed their fishermen to go on throughout the whole season unmolested just as if the United States had not refused to carry out their part of it. That certainly was not an unfriendly act. What more? The hon. gentleman knows that from 1854 down to the present, all Canadian Governments—not only the Liberal-Conservative Government, but the Government of which the hon. gentleman himself was a member—have done everything in their power to bring about friendly relations, and obtain such a treaty as would promote the best of fellowship between the two countries, and serve the interests of both. But the hon. gentleman knows that all these advances have been met by the United States—I will not say in an unfriendly manner—but by a refusal which they were perfectly justified in making within their own rights. They have always said: We do not intend to make any treaty with you. The hon. gentleman knows that the Government of the late Mr. Mackenzie sent one of the most distinguished members of the party supporting it, the Hon. George Brown, to Washington, to negotiate a treaty. And he knows that that hon. gentleman was obliged to return unsuccessful because he could not obtain any treaty with the United States which he could ask the Parliament of Canada to ratify or which he himself would be willing should go into operation. The hon. gentleman knows that in 1871, at a time when there was a very great deal of feeling between the United States and Great Britain with regard to the Alabama question it was regarded by the Imperial Government as important—and it was a matter in which we ourselves had a very deep interest—to settle these vexed questions between the two countries. The hon. gentleman knows that the late Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald was appointed a joint High Commissioner with the present Marquis of Ripon and the late Lord Iddesley and a number of other gentlemen to negotiate a treaty with the United States. They went to Washington and after several months of negotiation succeeded in making a treaty. That treaty was made subject to the ratification of the Parliament of Canada. In England of course, as the hon. gentleman knows, Parliament is not required to ratify a treaty at all; the Government has supreme power to arrange a treaty and give it complete effect without reference to Parliament at all. But in view of the importance of the treaty and in deference to the wishes and the independent position that Canada occupies, the treaty was made subject to the ratification of this Parliament. Well, Sir, what happened? Why, these very gentlemen opposite, the First Minister who now endeavours to show that the Liberal-Conservative party of this country have been unfriendly to the United States, instead of saying: This is a great Imperial question, this is a matter in which the mother-country is deeply interested—so deeply interested that she was prepared to pay an enormous sum of money to the United States to obtain a settlement of the question—and therefore we will support it; instead of this they attacked and denounced Sir John A. Macdonald for having as they said, sacrificed the dearest interest and rights of Canada. They spent day after day in this House denouncing that treaty and doing all that men could do to show that it was a base surrender on the part of the Liberal-Conservative Government and party to the United States. And had it depended on their views or their influence that treaty would have had no existence and these difficulties would have continued. But the Liberal-Conservative party in this House was strong enough to carry the treaty in defiance of the efforts of hon. gentlemen opposite on that occasion. And now, in the light of experience, what does the hon. gentleman say? Why, Sir, it is ludicrous in the view of the course the Liberal party took on that occasion to find that now the hon. gentleman's ambition is to renew the treaty of 1871, the very treaty that he denounced as a base surrender to the United States of Canadian rights and Canadian interests. This treaty, it now appears, is an object and the highest ambition of the hon. gentleman to get renewed. And well it might be. I can well understand it in the light of experience. I do not believe there is an intelligent Canadian within the bounds of this Dominion, that does not feel the same way, that does not know the course the Liberal-Conservative party took on that occasion was right, and the course hon. gentlemen took was wrong. If any ever entertained a doubt of it, they have that doubt removed by the declaration conveyed to this American reporter and to the press of a foreign country that the hon. gentleman wishes to renew the treaty of 1871. But, Sir, there is another statement here to which I take the strongest possible exception, and I am astounded that any gentleman knowing the facts should have lent himself to such a statement :

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Some years ago, when considerable friction had been created by the North Atlantic fishery troubles, I took an opportunity to say that the question should be adjusted in a friendly manner, becoming an enlightened and friendly people, by the simple process to give and take, and I do not see now why an arrangement should not be made.

Why, Sir, does the hon. gentleman not know that long after 1871 the present distinguished ambassador in London, Mr. Bayard, addressed a letter to myself couched in the most friendly terms and intimating that he thought the time had arrived when we might deal satisfactorily with the Atlantic Fishery trouble. And what happened? This happened—that the present Secretary of State for the Colonies, the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, Sir Lionel Sackville-West, now Lord Sackville, and myself were appointed plenipotentiaries by Her Majesty to negotiate the Treaty of Washington of 1888. The hon. gentleman knows that when the United States terminated the treaty of 1871—again by their own motion and in opposition to the desire of everybody in Canada that it should be continued—we had no alternative but to fall back upon the treaty of 1818. He knows also that, having been accustomed under the treaty of 1854 and under the treaty of 1871 to frequent our waters, great irritation was caused among the fishermen of the United States, and that the press of the United States, both Republican and Democratic teemed with abuse of Canada for the unfriendly course pursued by our Government for the protection of our undoubted rights under the treaty of 1818. The plenipotentiaries sat down around a table and discussed this question for three months, with the result that we reached a treaty which practically conceded every point of practice that Canada had pursued in regard to the United States. It was signed by the plenipotentiaries of both countries, and it was sent to the Senate by President Cleveland with the declaration that it was a fair and honourable settlement of the question and should be accepted by the Senate. And the hon. gentleman knows that the reason the treaty was not accepted was because the Republican party were in a position to prevent any settlement being reached, because it required a two-thirds vote in the Senate to ratify the treaty. Now, Sir, that it is not all. When this treaty was passed the British plenipotentiaries submitted for the consideration of the representatives of the United States a modus vivendi to go into operation pending ratification of the treaty. Under that modus vivendi means were provided by which the American fishermen could at once enjoy to a large extent the advantages which the treaty afforded upon the payment of a tonnage fee. That modus vivendi is in operation to-day, and not only that, Sir, but President Cleveland publicly tendered his hearty thanks to the British Commissioners for submitting it, and his Republican successor, President Harrison, included in his inaugural address to Congress a statement of the fact that under that modus vivendi all friction had been removed between the two countries. Is that an indication of unfriendly action? Here is an action of the Government of Canada outside the treaty which has virtually settled all that irritation on account of the Atlantic fisheries, and has received the hearty commendation of the Presidents of both the great parties in the United States, both of Mr. Cleveland and his successor; but to read this, one would suppose that the only man in Canada who had ever taken any interest in removing this irritation, was the hon. the First Minister. The hon. gentleman, I suppose, knows that from 1888, from the time that treaty was signed by the plenipotentiaries of the two countries, and under that modus vivendi, down to this hour, there has never been a complaint on the part of the Government of the United States against Canada for anything in relation to that question. I think before the hon. gentleman opens his heart to a reporter of the press of a foreign country in a way that he will not do to Parliament, he should take the trouble to learn a little more of this question. Now, Sir, there is another question of considerable magnitude and one which, after the commission had reported, I suppose might be brought under the notice of the Parliament and people of Canada. Not so, Sir; before any decision is reached on the part of any Canadian commission, or any joint commission, the hon. gentleman confides his policy to the press of a foreign country, and expresses his readiness to engage in the deepening of our canals to the extent of 21 feet. Why, Sir, it is enough to take away one's breath to find this economic Government prepared to undertake an expense, no person knows whether it will be fifty millions or one hundred millions, probably much nearer the latter sum, as our portion of it. But that is not all. He proposes not only to rush into this wild expenditure without any authority of Parliament, or any consultation in his own country, but he makes a proposal that the canals of Canada, that the great waterway of the St. Lawrence, to which the people of Canada attach the most vital importance, and upon which the life or death of Canada may some day depend—he proposes to confide that enormous waterway that nature has placed in the hands of Canada, to the joint control of this country and seventy millions of people in the United States of America. It is enough to take one's breath away to find the First Minister rushing into a declaration of policy of this kind, which is calculated, in my judgment, to create a great deal of difficulty by arousing hopes that may never be realized. But supposing that was his policy, there is no way by which he could defeat it so effectually as to say, in thus unburthening his heart to the press of a foreign country, that Canada is practically dependent upon the great republic to the south of us, and is prepared to do anything, to go upon our knees at any moment, to grant any concession that may be necessary.

Now, Sir, I have another objection to this matter. The hon. gentleman says that among all these questions he proposes that the bonding system shall be taken up. What does the hon. gentleman mean? Does he not know that the bonding system enjoyed by Canada to-day is under a solemn treaty made between Great Britain and the United States of America. Occasionally, some people in the United States, who are very anxious to create trouble with Canada, who do not hesitate to do everything in their power to hand us over to the United States, have been kind enough to suggest to the United States Government to stop the bonding privilege as a means of bringing Canada to her knees, just as they have been kind enough to suggest that the United States have it in their power to adopt a course that they saw would render the great railway lines of this country, the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway, bankrupt in a very short time. That is a policy that I can understand emanating from the Farrars, from the Wymans, and from the Glens; but I cannot understand the First Minister of Canada committing himself to a declaration that is tantamount to saying that the bonding privilege is one that we have yet to settle. Sir, it is a privilege that has been conceded after the most solemn declarations by the plenipotentiaries of both countries and has been ratified by a treaty under which we now enjoy it. I do not intend to take up the time of the House longer in reference to this matter, but I felt that it was absolutely necessary that the earliest opportunity should be taken of showing the consequences of this extremely reckless and imprudent course which the hon. gentleman seems disposed to pursue.

Now, I have only one word more to say and that is in regard to the postponement of the consideration of the fiscal policy of this country for the next eight or nine months. I may say, Sir, that a more fatal policy for Canada I do not believe could be conceived. Free trade would be bad enough, a revenue tariff would be bad enough, a declaration that the industries of Canada were to be struck down at a blow would be bad enough; but, Sir, uncertainty is worse. I say that while it was not necessary, under the view which those hon. gentlemen take, to call Parliament for the sake of getting supplies, it is necessary, and it is in the most vital interest of the people of Canada, that they should know what is to be the policy of the Government of this country. Does the hon. gentleman not know what was the cause of that frightful disaster that has wrought ruin to millions of people in the great republic to the south of us? Does he not know that the election of President Cleveland, with the declaration that protection was to be struck down and that free trade was to be the policy of the United States of America, paralyzed every industry in that country? Does he not know the frightful financial and commercial disasters that ensued from that hour, until that country was brought into a condition that every person must deplore, a condition that we of all others have reason to deplore, because, situated as we are, separated by an invisible boundary line for so long a distance, it is impossible for that country to undergo a great financial and commercial crisis without its being severely felt throughout Canada, and such was the case. But, Sir, under the ægis of the National Policy, Canada withstood—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will give the hon. gentleman an authority, not Canadian but American. Let me tell him what an eminent statistician of the United States of America said in regard to the position that Canada held, at the same time that this wave of depression, which did affect us, was crushing the great republic to the south of us, and causing hundreds of thousands of people to suffer for the want of bread, and carrying misery and desolation into the homes of millions of people of that country, for the reason that commerce was paralyzed, the industries of the country were paralyzed, because they did not know what was to be the fiscal policy of the country. Sir, under these circumstances, I will give hon. gentlemen, who seem so much amused at the position which Canada occupied, affected as it was to a considerable extent, but which, under the ægis of the National Policy it was enabled to withstand even to the overflowing of injurious results that naturally fell upon the country from its proximity to the United States, a statement which appeared in the "Forum," early in 1894, from Mr. D. A. Wells, the well-known American economist. He said:

In the Dominion of Canada, separated territorially from us on the north by an imaginary line, there has been no panic, no unusual demand for money, no stoppage of industries, no restriction of trade, no increased rate of interest; in short, nothing beyond the ordinary course of events, except so far as these events may have been influenced by contiguity to what may be termed a financial cyclone, whose pathway of destruction was contiguous to, but not within, Canadian territory.

This opinion as to the condition of the two countries is not from a Canadian, but from a high American source. Does the hon. gentleman want to bring about in Canada the same disastrous conditions in every section of this Dominion from which the United States is now suffering? If he does, he is pursuing the best way to accomplish his purpose. All trade reports indicated an improved commercial condition in Canada; in fact, every evidence pointed to the fact, in the most clear and unmistakable manner, that Canada was merging from the wave of depression that has overspread the country for some little time. But what will be the effect of this announcement? The capitalists who have been waiting to know what was to be the fiscal policy of Canada, as to which party was to triumph, in order to decide whether they would invest capital and employ labour, north or south of the boundary line, according as to whether Canadian industries were to continue to enjoy protection, or whether there was to be free trade, will be paralyzed in their action, and, indeed, there is not a business man in this Dominion who is not vitally interested in knowing as early as possible what is to be the fate of this country. Under these circumstances, I fear that while there was no ground, under the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, for calling Parliament together, because they have proved quite equal to getting supplies without any of our weak assistance, there was and there is reason why the Government should state its trade policy at the earliest day, say, before this House rises. It is due, not to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, but it is due to the people of Canada, it is due to every enterprise in our country that they should know at the earliest hour possible what is to be the fate of this country, and govern themselves accordingly. Any decision is better, in my judgment, than no decision, because it was a state of undecision that produced such widespread disaster so graphically depicted by the pen of Mr. Wells, in the United States, and which no Canadian who has the interest of the country at heart, desires to see in this Dominion. Under these circumstances, I would even at this late hour implore the hon. gentleman and his colleagues, in the interest of the country, to let our industries know something as to what is to be their fate. Take the great coal mining industry of Nova Scotia, which has grown up under the fostering protection of the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party. It is a question of life and death with those engaged in it whether hon. gentlemen opposite intend to do in this instance what they have pledged themselves solemnly to do. They have pledged themselves solemnly to make coal free, and to make iron free. I wonder how they are going to obtain the consent of the Minister of Justice to that policy. Hon. gentlemen opposite are aware that my iron policy, as it is called, was branded in very opprobrious terms by hon. gentlemen opposite, as a system of monstrous protection, as one of monstrous bounties. But the Prime Minister of Ontario did not think I had gone far enough, and he took money out of the treasury of the province to increase the bounty. We want to know under which king we shall serve. We want to know whether the policy of the Minister of Justice at the other end of the building or the policy of the Prime Minister is to prevail. We want to know whether those great industries which have grown up, and which occupy an important position in the maritime provinces are to be sacrificed or not, and the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite are unable to make their arrangements until nine months ahead is one of a most serious character. A great many manufacturers of this country, men who have large amounts of capital invested, naturally want to know whether their industries are to live or die, and I therefore say that, in my judgment, the Prime Minister would have been quite warranted in calling Parliament for so important a purpose as disclosing frankly and fully to the people what they had to hope for or what they had to fear, instead of bringing us together for what—with these Governor General's warrants on the table—appears to have been very inadequate cause. All I can say is this. I trust the hon. gentleman will go forward on the line on which he has taken such advanced steps during the campaign. I hope the hon. gentleman will throw behind him all that wild free trade rhodomontane in which he was in the habit of indulging and amusing the country, and that he will advance in the direction of giving the industries of Canada that protection which is necessary to allow them to live and flourish. If the hon. gentleman will do that, I can assure him that instead of receiving the opposition of hon. members on this side of the House, he will find us prepared to go heart and hand with him in any measure that is calculated to maintain the progress and prosperity of the country in connection with which we believe necessary protection to our great industries is absolutely indispensable.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I have assuredly no fault to find with the speech to which we have just had the pleasure of listening, nor is it my intention to offer any criticism upon it. On the whole, it was a moderate speech, and if we remember the source from which it came, I think it was a very moderate speech, indeed. True, Sir, there was throughout it, from the first to the last syllable, a tone of disappointment and bitterness; but with this I find no fault, and indulge in no criticism. I waive it in deference to the feelings of a man who, having abandoned a high and honourable position in the service of the country for the more noble and higher ambition of restoring the wrecked fortunes of his party, and having failed in the task, has not yet recovered from the surprise and the shock, that, like Cæsar, he came and saw, but, unlike Cæsar, he did not conquer. It is manifest from the tone of the speech of the hon. gentleman that he has not yet rightly apprehended the full significance of the verdict which was pronounced by the people of the country on 23rd June last. It is quite evident from the speech delivered that the hon. gentleman up to this day does not know what are the causes which have produced that upheaval, that earthquake which shook the whole of Canada, from the island of Vancouver to Prince Edward Island on 23rd June last—an earthquake which was very similar to some earthquakes which we read about in the olden times, and in which the sinners were buried alive, and the just were spared and saved.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) told us in the opening part of his address, that the Liberal party had not obtained a majority on any of the issues submitted to the people of this country. I fail to understand what was the object of the argument of the hon. gentleman. He says we have not obtained a majority on any of the issues which were submitted to the people of this country. Well, Sir, I care not to go very minutely into that argument, but I look at the result only, and whatever may be the cause the result is: there is the hon. gentleman in opposition, and here are we at the head of the Government of Canada. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) stated more. He said that although his party were in the minority in this House, yet that they had obtained at the polls, no less than 19,000 votes more than the party which is victorious. Again I refuse to go very minutely into those calculations of the hon. gentleman, but all I have to say is, that if the victorious party polled a minority of the votes in the country, what has become of the Gerrymander Acts of hon. gentlemen opposite? They certainly were never intended for that purpose, and if that be their result I am sure we shall have the support of my hon. friend when we repeal these Acts, as repeal them we shall. Nor do I consider that my hon. friend was any more happy in his reference to the hon. gentleman who moved the Address, when he said that although the hon. gentleman (Mr. McInnes) had a seat in this House he had a minority of the votes in his constituency. True there were three candidates in the field, one Liberal and two Conservatives. There were two different kinds of Conservatives, however, in the constituency of Vancouver, as in many other constituencies in this country. There were Conservatives who were Ministerialists and who were prepared to swallow everything in connection with the Ministerial policy, but there were also Conservatives, who though remaining Conservatives, and yielding nothing of the conviction of their lives, were, however, no longer ready to follow the Government of the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper). That is the reason why my hon. friend (Mr. McInnes) is here. But, Sir, if the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) does not know yet what are the causes which have brought on this change of government, I may tell him. There are three causes. The hon. gentleman and his party were defeated because their fiscal policy, which by a strange misnomer has been termed the National Policy, had not fulfilled the expectations of the people, and although that policy had not fulfilled the expectations of the people, still the hon. gentleman adhered to it. The hon. gentleman and his party have been defeated because the administration of public affairs under his Government had been extravagant and corrupt. The hon. gentleman and his party have been defeated because upon a grave and important question,—a question which for its solution required great tenderness and care of treatment—instead of appealing to the honest intelligence of the people, instead of appealing to the convictions and to the consciences of the people, the hon. gentleman and his party appealed to sectional prejudices and to religious feelings. He was defeated, because by his policy on this question he created amongst the better classes of his party a distrust, which rent his party into factions which are now irreconcilable. Sir, these are the reasons why the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) did not succeed. And in view of the tactics which were adopted by the hon. gentleman and his party to succeed, in view of the methods which were resorted to by them, I say: blessed and thrice blessed is the day when these tactics were defeated, when these methods were rebuked, and when these appeals to sectional feelings were trampled under foot by the people to whom they were addressed. I am doing no injustice to my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) when I say, that his speech to-day was rather a doleful and mournful one. But there was a single ray of sunshine in it. There was a ray of sunshine in it when he came to speak of my hon. friends, the mover and seconder of the Address. He paid them just and well deserved compliments, which I am happy to re-echo, but he discriminated somewhat between the mover and the seconder. He said that the mover had been altogether too aggressive for his taste. Well, I thought that this would have been a reason why my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) would have paid a greater compliment to the mover of the Address (Mr. McInnes). However, he chose not to do it. As to the speech of the hon. gentleman from Vancouver, I have to say that he pleaded the cause of his native province in a manner in which I have never heard it pleaded in this House before. He did it in a way which will commend itself to the Government, and I am sure it will not be forgotten by them at the proper moment. Now as to my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux), the seconder of the Address. His reputation for eloquence had preceded him to this House, and much as we expected from him still more has he given us, and with regard to both himself and the mover I am sure that members on both sides will be happy to find that such valuable additions have been made to the debating talent of this Parliament.

Now, my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) has gone somewhat minutely, and more minutely than I care to follow him, into an interview which I gave some time ago to an American journalist. The only criticism—not the only but the principal criticism—which the hon. gentleman had to offer to that interview was, that I had been too candid and too sincere, and he said that it would never do for any kind of a diplomatist to carry his heart on his sleeve as I have done. If that meant anything, it simply meant that my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) agrees with Talleyrand who said: that speech has been given to man to conceal his thoughts. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) is of that opinion evidently, and we know from his past record that he is as good as his word, and that he preaches both by precept and example. We remember very well that in the campaign of 1891, the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) stated to the people of Canada that the Government of Canada received an invitation from Mr. Blaine the American Secretary of State, to a conference at Washington with a view of renewing the reciprocity treaty of 1854. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) made that statement on all the hustings of Canada and he invited the support of the Canadian people because of it. He told them, that if Parliament had been dissolved it was simply to answer the invitation which had been given by Mr. Blaine, then Secretary of State for the United States, asking co-operation and a conference to renew negotiations, in order to have a reconsideration of the treaty of 1854. Well, Sir, the truth was, as the hon. gentleman knows, that no such invitation had ever been given by Mr. Blaine. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) did not carry his heart on his sleeve. He was not candid with the people. He was not sincere with the people, but the hon. gentleman knows right well that a few months afterwards he had to eat humble pie in the office of Mr. Blaine in order to get an audience from him. These are not my lines, however. It may be a weakness of mine to carry my heart on my sleeve. It may be a weakness of mine to be candid, but I believe it to be the best diplomacy of all to be honest in speech and honest in action as well.

Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) also rebuked me for what I said as to the control of the canals after they had been deepened. Was the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) sincere and candid, and did he carry his heart on his sleeve when he made that criticism? If he had been candid and sincere, and if he had carried his heart on his sleeve as he should have done, he might have said to the House, that when I made that statement to this American journalist, I was simply carrying out the policy of the late Government, because, Sir, there is to-day a joint international commission, a commission appointed by the Canadian Government to act in conjunction with the American government, to examine that very question of the deepening of the canals and the control of the same. Here is an Order in Council which was passed by the late Government of Sir Mackenzie Bowell on the 30th of November, 1895:—

On a report dated 22nd November, 1895, from the Minister of Railways and Canals, submitting that by petition to Your Excellency in Council, the President and members of the International Deep Waterways Association have set forth that the Congress of the United States has enacted as follows:

The President of the United States is authorized to appoint, immediately after the passage of this Act, three persons who shall have power to meet and confer with any similar committee which may be appointed by the Government of Great Britain or of the Dominion of Canada, and who shall make inquiry and report whether it is feasible to build such canals as shall enable vessels engaged in ocean commerce to pass to and fro between the Great Lakes and the Atlantic Ocean, with an adequate and controllable supply of water for continual use; where such canals can be most conveniently located, the probable cost of the same, with estimate in detail; and if any part of the same should be built in the territory of Canada, what regulations or treaty arrangements will be necessary between the United States and Great Britain to preserve the free use of such canal to the people of this country at all times.

And, Sir, upon that the Canadian Government appointed three commissioners—Mr. Howland, Mr. Keefer, and Mr. Monro, to confer with the American Commissioners in order to see what reports, regulations or treaty arrangements would be necessary between the United States and Great Britain to preserve the free use of such canals to the people of the United States at all times. I must say, however, of that interview, that I have nothing to take back from the statement I made that the relations of the two countries had not been satisfactory; for I am bound to say that under the treatment accorded to American fishermen in 1886, 1887 and 1888 by the late Canadian Government the relations of the two countries were brought to such a pitch that one time the two countries were actually upon the verge of commercial war. Commercial war, Sir. I have a high authority for that statement; and who is my authority? The hon. leader of the Opposition, who made that statement upon the floor of this very House in the session of 1888.

The hon. gentleman said that the Speech from the Throne afforded but a very meagre bill of fare; but it is in season, and I do not suppose that my hon. friend would have any stomach for a very heavy meal at this moment. Moreover, the circumstances are such that we cannot have at this time anything like the usual session of Parliament. We are not in a condition to do so. Even the examination of the Public Accounts, the hon. gentleman knows, cannot go on at the present time. He knows very well that it would not be for us anything that would break our hearts, if we were in a position to bring to the scrutiny of this House the Public Accounts of last year when the public expenditures were controlled by hon. gentlemen opposite. But, Sir, we cannot do it; we have to defer that pleasure to another session. We have called the session for one reason and for one reason alone, that is, to obtain from this Parliament the supplies for carrying on the business of the country—the supplies which the late Parliament, under the leadership of hon. gentlemen opposite, who had then the responsibility of public affairs, did not vote. This is the only reason why we have called this session of Parliament.

In this connection the hon. gentleman made some pleasant allusion, or bitter allusion if he prefers, to the issue of the special warrant. Well, all I have to say at this moment is that I will follow the example he gave at a later period in his speech, and will not discuss this question now, because we shall have an opportunity of discussing it by itself on a future occasion.

Another criticism which the hon. gentleman indulged in was, that though we were elected on the policy of tariff reform, we were not prepared to-day to lay on the Table of the House any measure of tariff reform; and he says that the uncertainty of delay is worse than what he calls free trade. Sir, the issue between the two parties in the last election was whether the National Policy should be preserved intact, as it was, or whether there should be tariff reform, and the policy of tariff reform succeeded. Now, the hon. gentleman says, go on and carry out your promise, and bring down at once your measure of tariff reform. All I have to say is that it is my extreme sorrow, and the extreme sorrow of my colleagues as well, that it is not possible for us at this moment to bring forward such a measure of tariff reform as we would like to have. But there is the obvious and manifest reason for it. Of all the evils that a protective tariff brings on the people, perhaps the greatest is that though the people have universally and unanimously determined to have a reform of that tariff, yet such conditions have been brought about under it that no such reform can be effected without exposing the country to some commercial disturbance. We must try to avoid this. One of the effects of a protective tariff, as the hon. gentleman well knows, is to create a high pressure atmosphere, in which all kinds of industry, trade and commerce have to live and operate; and a sudden disturbance of that condition of things, while dangerous to natural life, might also be dangerous to commercial life, and, therefore, though we are determined to reform the tariff, we have to do it cautiously and after deep and anxious consideration. We have to proceed slowly. There are, I admit, certain items which we might reform immediately. The hon. gentleman has instanced coal. But any reform in the tariff, to be effective, must be general. To reform the tariff upon any one article or two articles alone, might afford some relief to some classes; but it might perhaps jeopardize the interests of other classes; because in any civilized country, under a tariff such as we have, all interests are dependent upon each other, and to disturb the condition of one you disturb the condition of all. Therefore, we have been forced to the conclusion that if we are to reform the tariff, as we must, we must do it in a single measure, to be submitted to Parliament at one and the same time. But, Sir, let me go back a few years. I am not bound to take shelter under the examples of hon. gentlemen opposite; but let me call the attention of the hon. leader of the Opposition to this fact. He has stated that in the election of 1878 the issues between the two parties were clear cut. So they were. There was a revenue tariff policy on one side, and protection on the other side. On that occasion the policy of protection prevailed. What took place? Did the hon. gentleman who succeeded at that time and his colleagues proceed at once to plunge the country into the throes of a reform of the tariff? The hon. gentleman knows that it took considerable time to consider the reform which they were to bring forward, even though the issues were clearly cut. The election took place on the 17th of September, the Government of Mr. Mackenzie resigned on the 9th of October, Parliament was not called until the 13th of February, and it was not until the 14th of March that the tariff measure was brought before the House. Here is an example from a source which I am not fond of following, but which still gives in this matter an example of caution which we are bound to follow and will follow.

But the hon. gentleman devoted by far the greater and most important part of his speech to the Manitoba school question, and the whole tendency of his argument to-day was to try and put us in contradiction with ourselves. He said that we had one policy here and another there. I take issue with him upon that. The hon. gentleman wants to know what is the policy of the Government upon this question. If I were to extend to him the same treatment which was meted out to us when on the other side, I would ask what is the policy of the Opposition. Now, we heard during the last session from the lips of the hon. gentleman, not once or twice but a dozen times, a declaration which is very different from what we have heard from him to-day. We heard from him then the declaration that in this matter the sovereignty of Parliament was abridged, that Parliament was not a free agent, but was forced to lay violent hands upon the school legislation of Manitoba and restore the Roman Catholic separate schools. Nay more, we heard also the hon. gentleman state, in deep and solemn tones, that he was ready to die, if his death were necessary, to procure for the minority the justice to which they were entitled. Such was the language we heard from him last session, but it would appear that all that is now a thing of the past. It would appear that this policy of stern adherence to the constitution, this magnanimous policy of devotion to the minority is no more. There is an election going on to-day in the good riding of North Grey, and there we have the authority of the whip of the party (Mr. Taylor) that he was sent by the hon. gentleman himself, as a missionary, to tell the staunch Tories of that riding that remedial legislation is no longer part and parcel of the programme of the Conservative party. Now, it appears, Parliament is again a free agent, now the sovereignty of this Parliament is not abridged, and this Parliament is no longer obliged by the letter of the law and the judgment of the Privy Council to lay violent hands upon the legislation of Manitoba, and is no longer obliged to restore to the minority their separate schools. The hon. gentleman is no longer ready to lay down his life, even though to die were necessary in order to obtain justice for the minority. Here are the words which the chief whip of the party pronounced yesterday at Owen Sound in the north riding of Grey :

Mr. Taylor said that the circumstances of this campaign were different from the last, as the Remedial Bill was no longer a part of the Conservative policy. Sir Charles Tupper had sent word by him to this effect to the electors of North Grey ; that good feeling had now been restored between Sir Charles and N. Clarke Wallace and the other anti-remedial Conservatives. He said it was an insult to the intelligence of North Grey for Mr. Laurier to attempt to palm off in this riding a Minister who was defeated at home, and who did not own a cent here. A vote for Mr. Paterson would mean a vote for the domination of Quebec.

What is the meaning of this ? What did the hon. gentleman mean when on the floor of this House, not yet five or six months ago, he told the people of this country that Parliament was bound—bound by the terms of the law—to interfere in this matter, bound to lay violent hands upon the legislation of Manitoba, bound to restore separate schools, and bound to die, if necessary, for the maintenance of the constitution. What was his meaning ? What was his object ? Was he simply playing a game in order to obtain the twenty votes of a majority in the province of Quebec which he expected ? And now, what is his meaning to-day when he sent the whip of his party to the good riding of North Grey to tell them that this is no longer the policy of the Conservative party, and that the Conservative party no longer intend to lay violent hands upon the legislation of Manitoba. When the hon. gentleman appeals, by the mouth of the whip of his party, against French domination and Quebec rule what does he mean ? His meaning is the same as it ever was—a double game and a double policy. When you, Mr. Speaker, took your seat, the only criticism which the hon. gentleman had to offer to your nomination was that you had not the honour and the privilege of belonging to the French race. Sir, your nomination is an instance of the French domination which we intend to have, and which will be nothing more and nothing less than to select good men for every position, whether they be English, French, German, Irish or Scotch. But this is not the language which we hear to-day in the riding of North Grey. The language which is heard in that riding is an appeal to what sectional feeling there may be in the hearts of its electors by raising the cry of French domination and Quebec rule. Now, I do not care to carry this further. The hon. gentleman wants to know what is the policy of the Government and he has a right to know it, and I will tell him. We have always taken the ground that this question of the Manitoba schools has been bungled, from first to last, by hon. gentlemen opposite. They first exhausted every subterfuge, which they had under the law in order not to act, and when they determined to act, they acted on perfectly untenable grounds. We have a most peculiar constitution, and in that peculiar constitution there is a feature which seems to be altogether at variance with its very spirit. Of all the clauses which cemented these provinces together, the one perhaps which was the most potent and effective was that which expressed the desire of all classes of the community that every section of the community represented by a province should be independent and supreme within the sphere of the powers allotted to it. But, strange to say, although the subject of education is one of the powers referred to the provinces, yet there is a right of appeal given by the constitution to any minority whenever in any province there was existing a system of separate schools. If the minority in such province is dissatisfied it is given an appeal to this Parliament. This is altogether in contradiction to the spirit of the constitution, but let that pass. When the appeal is given let us consider for the moment to whom it was given. First of all, it is manifest that if an appeal was given, the right of the province to legislate upon the subject is thereby acknowledged, and this is a subject which is no longer in dispute. The appeal is given, not to a court. If it were, the court would only have to inquire whether or not the legislature had acted within its rights. The appeal, however, is given, not to the courts, but to the Federal Government and Parliament. It is not, therefore, a judicial but a political appeal, and as such is to be exercised not only for the benefit of the minority but for the good and welfare of the Canadian people as a whole. This is the true interpretation of the constitution, and the hon. gentleman is surprised at the attitude which I have taken upon this question. Let me tell him, as he well knows that there is no party to this controversy, not even the government of Manitoba, which ever denied that the power of appeal existed in this Parliament, which ever denied that we had the power to interfere and lay violent hands upon the legislation of Manitoba. But, Sir, though we have that power, all reasonable men, all those who love their country, insist that it shall not be exercised violently, but that it shall be used only as a last resort when every other means had failed to obtain that degree of justice due to the complaining minority. The hon. gentleman knows right well that this is the view maintained by the Manitoba government themselves. Let me quote to him the very language of the Attorney General of Manitoba in answer to the communication of the Dominion Government:

The remedy sought to be applied is fraught with great danger to the principle of provincial autonomy. An independent consideration of the subject, as well as the recognized constitutional practice in analagous cases, clearly indicates that it should only be made use of as a last resort; and after the clearest possible case has been made out, it is obvious that so drastic proceeding as the coercion of a province in order to impose upon it a policy repugnant to the declared wishes of the people can only be justified by clear and unmistakable proof of flagrant wrong-doing on the part of the provincial authority.

You have there the admission by the government of Manitoba themselves that they never denied the jurisdiction of this Parliament, but what they denied was the right of this Government to interfere in the way proposed without investigating the subject in a proper and friendly spirit as they had more than once asked should be done. The first duty of the Dominion Government when this appeal of the minority was brought before them six long years ago was at once to apply to the government of Manitoba, to treat with them and to endeavour to settle the question amicably. Sir, they failed to do that. But when we came into power the very first thing we did was that which should have been done by gentlemen opposite—we applied at once to the government of Manitoba. The government of Manitoba responded. They sent here their Attorney General. We conferred. All I can say at the present time is that I have every reason to hope, every reason to believe, that when again this Parliament assembles, this question will have been settled satisfactorily to all parties concerned. Sir, when I say that this question will have been settled satisfactorily to all let me make one exception. I know full well that any settlement we can make, however just, however fair, however meritorious it may be, it is condemned in advance by those extreme men who are ready to exact their pound of flesh even though they are cutting it out of the very heart of their country, those men who, whether they belong to one section of the Conservatives or the other are to-day sharpening their knives, in order to obtain from the bleeding corpse of their country, not justice but the satisfaction of revenge. These men I do not expect ever to satisfy. But I expect we shall be able to satisfy all reasonable men, all right-minded men, all those who, whatever may be their views upon this question, are prepared for the sake of peace, harmony and good-fellowship, to make some sacrifice upon the altar of their common country even of opinion and preference. And I hope that when we appeal to the sense of fair-play of justice and generosity in behalf of a united Canada, it will meet with a clear and unmistakable response from all classes. But I should despair of the future of my country, not merely as to the settlement of this question but as to the settlement of every other question which may come up if the tactics followed by the hon. gentleman opposite and his friends were to prevail in this country, if those who blow hot and cold who to-day are vociferously clamouring against the policy which they supported no later than the month of June were to prevail.

Sir, the hon. gentleman dealt a few moments ago with a subject which I was not surprised that he should tackle, because it is one which I am sure must have caused him some uneasiness and even pain as a Canadian for some time, because he cannot but regret, I hope, at all events, that he does regret the language which he made use of on former occasions. The hon. gentleman has at last taken issue with me because I reproached him that upon that question he had made an appeal to feelings of race and religious prejudice. Well, Sir, I accept the challenge, and I repeat to-day in his presence the charge which I preferred against him throughout the provinces I visited during the late election. Here in the great assizes of the nation, before the assembled representatives of the people, I arraign the hon. gentleman and his friends for that in the late election they did their utmost to arouse the religious prejudices not only of the people of Quebec but those of the Protestant and English speaking provinces as well. Let us join issue at once. The hon. gentleman quoted the speech he delivered at Winnipeg. Let me quote it again.—I think the very words that he read:

To my Conservative friends who have turned their backs upon me I want to make another appeal, and it is this: I want to know where is the man with any brains in his head, where is the man who has any capacity for exercising intelligent reasoning capacity, who would justify himself, or would justify himself to his country, if he oppressed a feeble minority, and that for the purpose of bringing into power a Roman Catholic French Premier, who declares he will do more.

"A Roman Catholic French Premier." The hon. gentleman was speaking in the city of Winnipeg, to an English-speaking audience. He was addressing his friends, as he said—his English-speaking friends in Winnipeg in the province of Manitoba where the great bulk of the people are opposed to intervention in this matter. If he wanted to make a point against me by saying I had promised to do more than his Bill provided, why, in the name of common sense, was he so particular to tell them that if they turned him out of power they would bring into office a "French Canadian Roman Catholic Premier." There was inuendo in that. He disclaims having had any intention of appealing to sectional or race or religious prejudice. A few days afterwards the hon. gentleman was at Port Arthur and this is the language he made use of there:

I am speaking now not to Liberals—it is no use speaking to them, but to Conservatives, and ask can you vote to turn out the present Government and put in a French Roman Catholic Premier.

If that was not an appeal to race and religion, what is the use of language? But the hon. gentleman went to the province of Quebec. Does the hon. gentleman pretend that he used in the province of Quebec the same language that he used in Winnipeg or Port Arthur? Here I have the speech he made in Montreal, at Sohmer Park, before a French-speaking audience. I quote from the report of the Montreal "Gazette":

I am prepared to say that what I said at Winnipeg was this:

Now, mark the words. The hon. gentleman was explaining to a French Canadian and Roman Catholic audience what he stated at Winnipeg, which language I have just quoted.

I made an appeal to the Liberal Conservative electors who were under the impression that the Dominion Government was forcing separate schools upon the province of Manitoba. I said, "Is there a man of intelligence here who does not see that the Government are only carrying out the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Queen's Privy Council, a judgment which declares that the privileges which belonged to the Roman Catholic minority have been taken away, and that it is the duty of the Parliament of Canada to restore those privileges." I took the ground that every Liberal Conservative was in honour bound to stand by his party in endeavouring to restore the privileges of which a feeble Roman Catholic minority had been robbed, instead of striking down that party for the purpose of bringing into power a French Roman Catholic Premier who himself had declared that he had opposed the Bill because—

He promised more? No, but because——it was too weak to accomplish its object.

Here is the language of the hon. gentleman in Winnipeg. Speaking to English Protestants his language is: Are you going to turn us out and bring into power a French Roman Catholic Premier who promises that he will do more? But in Quebec he says: Are you going to turn us out of power and put into office a French Canadian Roman Catholic Premier who declares the Bill is too weak, and that he will bring in a stronger Bill? There is the language of the hon. gentleman—an appeal to prejudice on both occasions, an appeal to the French Canadians because I had opposed this Bill on the ground that it was too weak; and an appeal to the Protestant and English-speaking electors of Manitoba because I had opposed the Bill on the ground that I desired to bring in a stronger one. Sir, on each occasion the hon. gentleman was doing his very best in order to arouse local prejudices in each province. Now, to-day, to crown all, the hon. gentleman is sending the whip of the party into an important constituency to tell the people that they are not to vote for Mr. Paterson because a vote for Mr. Paterson would be a vote in favour of Quebec rule and French domination. French domination! Sir, this is the time and the day to clear up that issue. This is the time and the day, I insist upon it. Let us deal with this question now.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I wish the hon. gentleman to understand that I disclaim having sent any person to make any such statement.

The PRIME MINISTER. Sir, to-morrow is polling day; it is only too bad that this declaration of the hon. gentleman was not made eight days ago. French domination! No person has a right to speak of French domination. It is true that we carried the province of Quebec; but there is no question of French domination, or English domination, or Irish domination, or Scotch domination, or German domination. We stand on British Canadian citizenship. What matters it, Sir, whether the majority supporting the Government come from one province or another if the policy of the Government rests upon the broad principles of truth, justice and honour? What matters it whether the majority comes from one province or another if the arguments we used in one province were those we used in all the provinces? Sir, the men who to-day occupy these benches are fully conscious that upon this and upon other matters they have before them difficult and anxious questions to deal with and to settle, not by appealing to one class, not by appealing to one section; but upon all questions and on all occasions, by appealing to all classes, and to all sections, with the view and with the end, with the supreme view and with the supreme end of making Canada a country, not a country only, but one country as well.

Mr. FOSTER. Unaccustomed as we are to our respective places, and being new in the session, and wishing to commence, as I am sure we all wish to do on both sides of the House, with due moderation. I think the time of the evening is so far advanced that I may be allowed to move that the debate be adjourned.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I presume that my hon. friend is exhausted by his efforts down in the county of Queen's and Sunbury, and that he is not, perhaps, ready to go on with the speech that he intended to make this evening. Although the hour is still early and rather premature for adjournment, I suppose we shall have to agree to his request; but I would like to tell my hon. friend that we intend to have, if possible, a short session, but, at the rate we are proceeding, it is going to be a very lengthy session.

Mr. FOSTER. I will not be long.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT—DEATH OF SENATOR MACPHERSON AND MR. CLARKE, M.P.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before that motion is carried, the painful duty devolves upon me of calling the attention of the House to the loss by death of a very prominent Canadian. I refer to the late Sir David Macpherson. Sir David Macpherson, as the House well knows, occupied a very conspicuous position for many years in Canada. As a contractor, as a gentleman connected with large financial institutions, as representative of a large constituency in the old legislative council of Canada, and subsequently as a senator of the Dominion, as president of that body, and as a member of the Government of Canada, having held for some time the position of Minister of the Interior, the late Sir David Macpherson became well and widely known in every portion of Canada. It was my good fortune, from the time I first became acquainted with this portion of Canada, to enjoy the personal acquaintance and confidence of that hon. gentleman; and I believe my opinion will be confirmed by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House who had the pleasure of his acquaintance, when I say that he was in every way, not only a most estimable man, but one who, possessing great ability, took a very deep and keen interest in everything calculated to advance the interests of Canada. I feel that his death marks the passing away of one of the comparatively few remaining senators who sat in the old legislative council of Canada. I am quite sure that I am expressing the sentiments of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House when I say that I feel the death of that hon. gentleman is greatly to be deplored by the people of Canada.

Mr. FOSTER.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman, I am sure, has rightly expressed the feelings entertained on both sides of the House, which are called forth by the lamentable event which has just taken place. Sir David Macpherson, as we know, was one of the most important personalities in our country for more than forty years. His great business ability, his experience as a legislator, as a man of the world, as a contractor, and as a merchant gave him a place accorded to but few men during their lifetime. His removal of course comes at the end of the natural term of life, and in that circumstance takes away a good deal of the bitterness which death always carries.

Death has dealt severely with us during the present Parliament. This is the second death we have had to deplore since the last election. Apart from Senator Macpherson, we have to regret the death of a colleague, Mr. Clarke, whom I had not the pleasure of knowing personally, but whose acquaintance I made during the last few months. We did not know him, but those who are associated with him feel sure that if we had had the privilege of his company as a colleague he would have proved one of the most excellent members of this House. But such are the incidents of life. His death is still more deplorable because he was in the prime of life. Death respects neither sex nor person, and though we know this, and though it is a truth that has been recognized since the commencement of the world, still whenever it is recalled to us it renews the same pang and we deplore the event.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

Governor General, &c., &c., &c.

RESIGNATION OF MR. MCCARTHY, M.P. FOR BRANDON.

Mr. MCCARTHY. Mr. Speaker, I had the honour of being returned for two constituencies, namely, the constituency of the North Riding of Simcoe, and that of the electoral district of Brandon. Under the circumstances, I am called upon to elect for which constituency I shall sit, and as no petition has been presented against me, either respecting my return for North Simcoe or respecting my return for Brandon, I am now at liberty to elect, and I do so, Sir, by resigning my seat for the electoral district of Brandon.

Mr. SPEAKER. As the hon. member states that no petition has been presented against his return for either of the two constituencies for which he was elected, the fact of his resignation will be entered in the Journals.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the first paragraph of the proposed motion of Mr. McInnes for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in answer to his Speech at the opening of the Session.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to address myself for a few moments to-day to some of the remarks which were made by hon. gentlemen from the Government side of the House on the Address in reply to His Excellency's Speech from the Throne. In doing so I shall take up very briefly one or two only of the points which remain untouched in the address of the mover, the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. McInnes). After returning his thanks to the leader of the Government for at last recognizing the claims of his native province by calling upon him to move the reply to the Address, and after having put in an additional plea to that rather full recognition, that it might be well also to recognize the claim of that distant province to a portfolio in the present Cabinet, the hon. gentleman went on to give one very peculiar evidence of the effect of the National Policy and of the administration of the Liberal-Conservative Government during the last eighteen years. He said there were in that province, and in fact in all the provinces, evidences of a very great depression in the fact that numbers of people, many of them people of culture and refinement, were piling in applications for positions under the new Government, and to such a degree that the lives of the members, and particularly of the Cabinet Ministers, were becoming a burden unto themselves. Well, Sir, I give my hon. friend credit for originality in finding out one more evidence of the effect of the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party and Government. If he will allow me, I think I can find another cause to which to assign the circumstance, and belonging to another category. Sir, I should say that it was evidence of a wide and consuming hunger amongst the old adherents and life-long followers of the present Government, who, for eighteen years, have been in the cold shades of Opposition, yet looking longingly and regretfully at the public treasury, and the officers and employees who have been fulfilling the duties thereof, and drawing their salaries. It may also be looked upon as evidence of a full crib at which a Liberal hand was to stand ready and deal out to those old, tried and true, and cultured followers the little gifts and the large gifts that might come to hand, and which are for the time being at their disposal. But that it is evidence of a depression, I have not the least doubt, a depression which has long existed amongst the Liberal office-seekers, a depression which now settles upon the members of the Cabinet and members of the Liberal party who have recommendations to make, and a depression which will, by and by, settle upon nineteen-twentieths of the eager applicants for office, who will find that, even under Liberal rule, the crib is not sufficient to provide for them all. Yes, even the cultivated and the cultured are making their applications, for I notice that this depression manifests itself even amongst the old members and lately elected members to this House. We mourn the absence to-day of our genial, and talented, and cultured friend, the former member from Queen's (Mr. Forbes), who has had his longings satisfied and his desires met by being appointed to the office of a preventive employee at the munificent salary of $100 a year. We mourn also the absence of an old, true and tried friend of the Liberal party, and a colleague of my own from the province of New Brunswick, who, after having for eighteen years followed the fortunes of the Liberal party, has at last had his longings satisfied and his desires met by being appointed to the munificently salaried position of postmaster of Marsh Hill, in the province of Ontario, at the salary of $10 a year. These are, so to speak, the first fruits out of that long list of depressed office-seekers who have been wending their slow and tedious way towards the portals of the Government buildings at Ottawa during the last eighteen years, and many of whom are destined never to enjoy the benefits for which they have been longing. When the hon. gentleman who moved this Address was launching out in his aggressive and fiery way, a way which pleased my moderate friend who is now leader of the Government, I wondered whether this fiery zeal, and this hot manner of expression were products of the wild and free West, or whether they were cultivated under glass, so to speak. I diligently followed the tone of his remarks and the set of his phrases, until I got into a quandary between the two. I believed, from his language, that he had been sitting at the feet of some political Gamaliel, and I thought at first it must have been at the feet of my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) when he coined the strong and well marked phrase of "hypocritical rot." But, by and by, when he commenced to talk of "the ungodly use of ungodly influences," I concluded that he had been sitting at the feet of my hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), who used a somewhat similar expression in reference to the National Policy, and declared on one occasion in this House that it was "a system accursed of God and man." Well, Sir, I recommend my young friend, who did so well in his maiden effort, to avoid, as the "Globe" would say, the apostles and prophets of disaster, and confine himself to more moderate expressions, which, I think, would convey to the majority of his auditors a sense of greater power in the arguments which he may address to the House from time to time. I now come to the speech made by my hon. friend the leader of the Government, and I must say that the hon. leader's speech, his first ambitious speech after taking the reins of Government and meeting the high court of Parliament, did not impress me as being of a remarkably statesmanlike type. It seems to me that the hon. gentleman studiously avoided meeting every one of the positions, of the strong, moderate and well-fortified positions that were taken by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition—positions that were made in no cavilling spirit, that were directed to no trifling objects, but which touched three or four points of the greatest importance, and which challenged the most serious and the strongest reply that the hon. gentleman could make. We shall see as we go through, item by item of the hon. gentleman's speech whether he has met them as we would have wished the leader of a great and strong Government, by its own professions and claims, including all the talents and all the virtues, should have met them. He complained of the bitter spirit in which my hon. friend couched his language. Now, Sir, there have been times when I think even I could trace just a little amount of acid, of acrimony, of bitterness in the attacks which my hon. friend has, from time to time, delivered upon the Liberal position, but I must say that during the two hours he spoke yesterday I looked in vain for a trace of bitterness. It did not exist in my hon. friend's speech. The reason for it the hon. gentleman gave. Here, he said, is a gentleman who left a high and lucrative position, who might have been to-day enjoying the sweets of office. He came over with an ambition to lead his party to victory in a great electoral contest, and to lead his party after victory, if victory should perch upon his banner. But he failed, and defeat came instead of victory, and therefore the hon. gentleman tries to find the bitterness of defeat in the words my hon. friend used. My hon. friend cannot grasp the situation; he knows that men on his side would have felt that bitterness under like circumstances. But men on the hon. gentleman's side were too canny, and they calculated the possibilities too closely to have left high and lucrative offices and risked all upon the cast of the electoral die. The whilom Premier of the province of Ontario, when approached by all those arts of flattery which the hon. leader of the Government possesses in so high a degree, to take the perilous jump into the vortex of a contested election with his party banner and his party chances within his grasp, was too canny to so act. He preferred to keep the office he held as Premier of the great province of Ontario, with his comfortable salary, with his still more comfortable patronage—of which the hon. gentleman is said to have made such good use in years that have passed—and determined that he would not place his political life in the balance and throw all into an electoral contest. Then there is an hon. gentleman sitting to the left of the First Minister, who was Premier of the province of Nova Scotia, and who, in 1893, by the unanimous consent of all those who toiled in that hot month of June or July in the convention at Ottawa, was marked out and designated as a minister of the Cabinet that was to come. He did not undertake to put his life into the balance, but he held comfortably on to his comfortable office and stayed there until the results of the elections were told and then when he saw on which side of the fence the straw was piled, he made his little jump and landed as Finance Minister in the Cabinet of to-day. And there is still another, not yet either to the right or left of the hon. leader of the Government.

An hon. MEMBER. He will be here tomorrow.

Mr. FOSTER. He to-day is fighting for his very life in a constituency in the province of New Brunswick. He was one of the two noble friends, the fratres marked out by the divine fire as coming members in the Ministry that was some time to be, which should include all the virtues and all the talents. That hon. gentleman did not propose to throw his life into the balance, either, but he kept comfortably on, at his comfortable salary, and with his comfortable patronage until he saw which of the dishes had the thickest cream, and then he landed down by the side of the richest, and he is to-day fighting, as I have said, for his life in a contest which he bewails, and which hon. gentlemen opposite would rather had not come on. No, the hon. gentleman and the hon. gentleman's colleagues, whatever you may say against them or for them, will never be open to the imputation that they are not canny, that they take their lives in their hands and that they risk all for their party fortunes and in their party's behalf. The hon. leader of the Government was good enough to inform this House, and I am sure the information came quite unexpectedly on the House, and fell, I am afraid, on incredulous ears on this side of the Speaker, that an earthquake had occurred in Canada, and as the result of the earthquake the hon. gentleman and his party were landed to the right of Mr. Speaker, and further that it shook all Canada, and that the saints were shaken up and the sinners were shaken down. Well, my hon. friend if he is going to use scripture for his similies, must read scripture thoroughly, and he will find out of it that it is not proof of the innocence of a man or a party that for the time being he or it happens to come out on the upper side. There is a verse, I think, something like this: "Or those eighteen upon whom the tower of Siloam fell and slew them, think ye that they were sinners above all men that dwelt in Jerusalem?" And the answer to that question was: "No; but unless ye also repent ye shall all likewise perish." Now, Sir, did this earthquake take place? That earthquake, in the sense of the hon. gentleman's rendition of it, it did not take place in the tight little province of Prince Edward Island. If it did, it shook them out on the other side, for in the island the party opposite have lost rather than gained. Was the earthquake very severe in the province of Nova Scotia?

An hon. MEMBER. Rather. •

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman could not come out of the contest with a majority, notwithstanding the close combination of provincial and Dominion authority and patronage, giving the lie to one of the best old tenets of the Liberal party, but from which they have entirely departed. Even from that province they could not bring a majority with all their powers, their added, double-jointed powers. Did the earthquake prove very severe in the province of New Brunswick? I trow not. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) got four supporters out of the fourteen members from that province. Did the earthquake prove very severe in the province of Ontario? Where is my hon. friend's majority in that, the premier province of this Dominion? Where is their majority from that province where all their efforts and all their patronage were massed with the one object of destroying the Liberal-Conservative party?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The efforts of both governments.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, the efforts of both governments. Did the earthquake act very severely in the province of Manitoba? Let Winnipeg answer. Take the Dominion generally, and the earthquake which my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) speaks of turns out to be not an earthquake but something very different. There is a suggestion of great force and power in an earthquake. There are hidden and pent up forces which after gathering for centuries burst all bounds and rend the earth asunder, and do their mighty work. But there is another way by which such events are hastened sometimes, and that is by the insinuating, quiet, unseen, disintegrating effect of the subtle fluid of water, which undermines and eats away quietly by night and by day, until by and by the landslide takes place, and the accumulations of debris of rocks and of stones, sometimes destroy, and always astonish the innocent people who unsuspecting had been living upon the surface of the earth. If anything occurred, my hon. friend, I think will agree with me, that it was such an insidious landslide which took place in the province of Quebec. My hon. friend (Mr. Laurier), however, may have this to comfort him with reference to that, and it will not be the best of comfort. The hon. member (Mr. McInnes) who moved the reply to the Address yesterday, sits here, not because of an earthquake; not even because of a landslide, but because of a division—as my hon. friend himself said—in the Conservative forces which were opposed to the Liberal forces in that constituency. The Liberal-Conservative party has convictions, and its men have convictions, and sometimes these convictions are strong enough to go even against party discipline and that influence which contributes to the solidarity of a party. My hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) and his party cannot lay claim to such a quality as that. However they may differ upon certain subjects, when the time comes that everything is at stake and the prize has to be won or not, convictions fall and the hon. gentlemen opposite mass themselves together, with their eyes only and solely upon the prize which is to be won. But, if my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) thinks that he will get any comfort out of the fact that there have been divisions in the Liberal-Conservative party, I am afraid, Sir, that he will be disappointed. There are two men who have seats in this House to-day from the city of St. John, N.B., and who would not have been here but for this divided conviction and opinion amongst Conservatives, in that city. And, Sir, when that constituency is opened, as opened it will be by the courts, those two gentlemen will find that the Liberal-Conservative party which was divided in its convictions sufficiently to defeat its candidates at that election; they will find the Conservative party united and these two seats will revert to their proper and normal condition under the sentiment of Liberal-Conservatism in the city of St. John. From the city of Ottawa there sit two gentlemen who would not be sitting here if it had not been for the unfortunate division of the forces of the Liberal-Conservative party. The same thing can be said of the city of Hamilton; the same thing can be said with reference to the seat in Vancouver; and the same thing can be said with reference to Nanaimo. My hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) must remember that the woe will be upon him and his party, when in the coming time the Liberal-Conservative party, strong in its united power, strong in its forces welded together, will successfully face the Liberal party after this temporary victory has passed, and when the Liberal party come down to deal with deeds and not with words.

Mr. FOSTER.

My hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) when he was challenged by a moderate and strong statement—moderate in the way in which it was put and strong in the proof which was placed behind it—when he was met with the statement, that he had not a majority in this Parliament, from the country, on the great dividing lines between the two parties; my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) devoted under two minutes of time to combatting that strong position. And he answered it in what way? He said: Well, you may go on with your elaborate discussion, you may place the points just as strongly as you please, you may produce all the arguments which you can, my answer to you is this: we are here and you are there, and that satisfies us. Well, Sir, I want to tell my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) that that answer may satisfy him, but it does not satisfy a reasonable man, and it will not satisfy this House, and it will not satisfy the sober second thought of the country. The gambler who cheats at cards and gathers in the stakes, when you confront him with his sharp practices, may answer you: well, I am here and you are there, and I have the stakes and that satisfies me. But it does not satisfy the code of honour which exists amongst players, and my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) may use that argument with reference to the political situation, but as I have said, it will not satisfy the sober second thought of the people of this country who will see the indictment, who will note the answer, and who will not note it to the advantage or strength of my hon. friends opposite. My hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) has stated that the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) is a disciple of Talleyrand who gave it as his dictum that speech was made for the purpose of concealing one's thoughts. Well, Sir, if there is a gentleman in this House, who I think cannot be charged with concealing his thoughts, to whom the credit must be given—whether he be deemed to be on the right side of a question or on the wrong side—to whom the credit must be given of stating boldly and strongly his position, and taking the consequences of his statement; that gentleman is the hon. gentleman who leads the present Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper). And, if there is one man who typifies that doctrine of Talleyrand, and acts on it in his political life, and has always done so ever, it is my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

An hon. MEMBER. Try it again.

Mr. FOSTER. I mean the leader of the Government, the former leader of the Opposition. My hon. friends opposite have occasion once in a while to laugh at a mistake that one may make in language. They are quite welcome to that slight enjoyment. It may for the moment—

Mr. GIBSON. Of weakness.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, of whatever you please. It may for the moment induce a little jollity and disperse the coming clouds of depression, of which my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. McInnes) spoke yesterday, but it does not affect the argument, and it does not obscure the point which I am trying to make. Now, a man who conceals his thoughts by his words comes under one of three categories. He either has no convictions to state, or he has convictions but expresses them poorly, or he possesses convictions and does not want to state them clearly. I leave my hon. friend the leader of the Government, and I leave the House to judge to which of these categories he belongs. But I make this statement, that no public man in Canada has for the same period been able to float so long upon words, and simply words, out of which no definite and true meaning could be taken, and upon which almost any construction could be placed, as my hon. friend who formerly led the Opposition and to-day leads the Government in this House. But I want to say to my hon. friend that another period has begun in his life, and hereafter he must translate his words into legislation, into deeds; and the test of the hon. gentleman will come when he has to leave the region in which he has so long airily floated, and has to come down to the hard matter-of-fact work of translating his opinions, his convictions and his thoughts, into the legislation and the administration of the country. The hon. gentleman has given an admirable instance of the way in which he appears to say something and yet says nothing, in a paragraph of the Address which is before me. It says:

The operation of the tariff will be made the subject of careful inquiry during the recess—

Now it comes——with a view to the preparation of such a measure as may.—

And we are on the tiptoe of expectation to know what kind of a measure it is, when he slants off into this expression:

—without doing injustice to any interest, materially lighten the burdens of the people.

There you are. Talleyrand himself would be nowhere with that sentence. It would so far outshine his great powers that he would conduct the rivalry no further. Why, Sir, that is a mere matter of opinion. The free trader could say: From my point of view, a tariff put in force on my principles would do injustice to no interest, and materially lighten the burdens of the country. The unrestricted reciprocity advocate, in which category nearly every hon. gentleman on that side of the House has come at some time or other in his life, might say: From my point of view unrestricted reciprocity, embodied in the legislation of the country, will not materially affect any great interests to its injury, and will materially lighten the burdens of all. And so every shade of tariff and fiscal belief could come under the hon. gentleman's phrasing, and be justified, no matter which might afterwards be framed into the matter and make-up of the tariff.

My hon. friend said, in justification of the very light repast which he had placed on the public table, that we had no stomach for a heavy meal. Well, Sir, after hard work I find one's appetite is sometimes apt to be pretty keen, and it is a great disappointment to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House to have the appearance of a table put before them, a beautiful mirage, as it were, and, when you come up to it, to find neither potatoes, nor salad, nor meat, nor any other thing that would satisfy one's hunger.

An hon. MEMBER. There is "Tarte."

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, but the "tarte" is not upon the table. Now, Sir, what is the reason the hon. gentleman gives for having no viands upon the table?

Mr. GIBSON. He is a prohibitionist.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, Sir, that remark is not very apropos, so far as the subject is concerned, but it is as near as my hon. friend gets to it generally. The only reason that the leader of the Government has given why there are no viands upon the table is that all he wants is supply. He puts this declaration in the mouth of the Governor General :

The necessity of making provision for the public service has compelled me to summon you together at this somewhat inconvenient season. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman was perfectly at liberty not to ask for anything but supply, and to say so in the Speech he put into the mouth of the Governor General ; but I submit that when my hon. friend proposed to state that, he should at least have given the real reason, and not put a wrong reason in the mouth of the Governor General. Why, Sir, if it had been a truthful expression it would have read. I think, something like this : " The stupid and unreasonable obstruction pursued by the Liberal party at the late session of Parliament having resulted in a refusal of all supplies for the fiscal year 1896-97 at a time when they might have been voted with comfort to the House and economy to the country, has compelled me to call you together at this inconvenient season and at great public expense." That would have been a truthful reason to have given, and to have put in the mouth of His Excellency the Governor General. The supply that is being asked for is the supply for the fiscal year 1896-97. The time to make that supply was in the session of 1895-96. That time came about last year. There was ample time in which to make the supply ; there was information ready for every item that was asked. There was a pressing necessity for every session must make and ought to make, unless very grave reasons intervene—a sufficient and ample supply for the services of the succeeding year. There was the recommendation of His Excellency the Governor General. Why, then, was the supply not granted ? No extraordinary supply was asked for. It was only the simple, ordinary supply for the regular and ordinary services of the country. A supply was asked for one year. When the gentlemen in opposition opposed the granting of a full supply, the proposition was made that supply for six months should be given. That would have avoided altogether the necessity of an extra session, and would have allowed the House to convene at about its usual time without the great inconvenience and the great expense attendant upon this session. When that was refused, the proposition was made to the hon. gentleman to give a three months supply, which would tide over the season of the hot weather, and allow Parliament to meet late in the autumn, when one session would have done for the services of the two years, instead of two sessions, which are now necessary. Why was this not done ? Simply because the hon. gentlemen then in opposition to the Government thought fit to obstruct and prevent a supply. They gave as a reason that the Remedial Bill intervened ; but, Sir, if you search the records you will find that ample time was spent in the obstruction to going into supply to grant the ordinary supply for three months, for six months, for a year, and therefore no necessity whatever existed for the calling of this session. Why it is called to-day and why supplies must be voted is due entirely to the unreasonable obstruction of hon. gentlemen opposite who were then in opposition. But even supposing they were unreasonable and obstructed supply then, was there any reason really for calling us together now to get supplies ? None ; not the least. The hon. gentlemen entered upon a course of policy boldly and recklessly. Why did they not pursue it ? If they had been as brave as they were reckless to pursue it, they need not have called Parliament together until January, they need not have called Parliament together until next July, they need not have called it together at all. These hon. gentlemen, after having been asked to vote a foreseen and regular expenditure, and after they had deliberately refused, when they fell into the pit that they had dug for others, had recourse to the authorization of Governor General's warrants, and have been appropriating moneys for the public service of this country without the sanction of law and without the sanction of Parliament. What do I find ? I find that in the month of July a Governor General's warrant was asked for, and given without hesitation, for one million dollars. For what ? To meet an unforeseen expenditure ? Was it because some cataclysm had destroyed the public works of the country and made it necessary to implement them at once before Parliament could be called ? No, Sir, but to pay the salaries and wages and working expenses of the departments of the Government—to meet foreseen expenses, stated expenses, which they themselves refused to vote. These careful, prudent, law-abiding men, did more than that. They took the Governor General's warrant freely given for one million dollars. They could spend but $600,000 of it. These are the close financiers, these are the admirable estimators of what they require. Somebody acting as Minister of Finance, on his word as Minister of Finance, and buoyed up by his coadjutors, made a solemn declaration to the Governor General that the Government were in absolute necessity for a million dollars in order to meet the departmental expenses for the month of July. They got the million dollars and spent $600,000 of it, and had to put back $400,000 perforce at the end of July into the public treasury because they did not need it. These gentlemen, not satisfied with that experience, got another Governor General's warrant in the month of August, one day before Parliament met, as freely granted, for another million dollars to meet departmental expenses. Well, I put this logically to sensible men. If you can by Governor General's warrant appropriate two million dollars for departmental salaries, why can you not appropriate twelve million dollars for the same purpose? What is the use of calling Parliament together in August to go through the form of appropriation? If you can appropriate two million dollars for departmental expenses, salaries of employees, expenditure as stated regular and foreseen as anything can be, why can you not appropriate a million dollars for public works? Why can you not appropriate half a million dollars for marine? Why can you not go through the whole list and make the whole $36,000,000 appropriation, and not go through the farce of calling Parliament together at all? But how the welkin would have resounded with the denunciations of this bold outrage, this unprincipled invasion of the constitution, this destruction of the very foundation of parliamentary government, if we had been elected to power and had done this. Maybe we would not have got a Governor General's warrant. But if we had, all the Grit newspapers of the country would to this day have been ringing the changes on this unparalleled conduct of an unprincipled Tory Government. Talk about wobblers. I see before me the boss wobbler of them all. In 1891, my genial and moderate friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) who sits in front of me, had the honour of fulminating on this side of the House against the iniquity of Governor General's warrants. He brought up his motion, he attested to it by his speech, he was joined by his brother Liberals, and smoke and fire were visible in this Parliament for the two or three hours that the fulmination was going on. But the Governor General's warrant which was given then was but an infant in swaddling clothes compared with these giants of July and August. The Governor General's warrant then was a mild-mannered one for an expenditure which had not been foreseen, and which had not been foreseen through the fault probably of a superior officer, but not of the Minister or the Government. But the fact remained that it had not been foreseen. It was for Intercolonial Railway purposes, and the chief officer justified neglect by declaring that owing to the time the accounts came in, he did not know it would be wanted, and consequently the supply was not asked.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). Oh, oh.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend from Queen's is given to being very sceptical. He puts on, not the regulation look of affliction, which one of the voters of Queen's-Sunbury said the Liberals will have to put on after five o'clock to-night, but he puts on an air of infinite contempt and scepticism with regard to any statement that may be made by an opponent. I know what I state, and I am willing, when the proper time comes, to argue that question from the facts of the case. I say that never was a Governor General's warrant asked for by a Liberal-Conservative Government of the nature of these last two warrants. My hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) laid down the law, after he had read the Act. He said you can give a Governor General's warrant when some public work is damaged or destroyed by some event which could not have been foreseen and for which there is therefore no appropriation, and when it is requisite in the public interest that it should be rebuilt or repaired without delay. You can, he said, on occasions of great emergency, not foreseen or provided for, have recourse to Governor General's warrants; but for what was foreseen and recommended and asked for and then refused by Parliament, the fiat of Parliament is against you, and a Governor General's warrant ought not to be used and cannot be used, under the law and the constitution, which govern responsible and parliamentary government. But our hon. friends easily forget in power the statements and the positions they took when out of power. I believe the Toronto "Globe" unfortunately had a homily, not long after the elections, on the difficulty which a party experiences when it comes into power, in keeping up to their promises and professions out of office. My hon. friend from South Oxford has unfortunately read that insinuating editorial and fallen from grace. I desire to say this, that if these hon. gentlemen who represent Liberalism, who are introducing a new era, who have commenced to supplant the functions and duties of Parliament, by Governor General's warrant, were as brave as they are bold and reckless, they would have kept on appropriating for six months and not have called us together at all. I like a brave man. Boldness, if it is to be successful with the people, must be accompanied with bravery. Once having commenced to assume the rights of Parliament and appropriate by Governor General's warrants, why did these gentlemen not stick to it, and why did they call us together to go through a mere form?

But, leaving that point for the moment—these gentlemen are going to ask us to vote supply. I notice that my hon. friend the leader of the Government has published far and wide his intention of introducing a new policy for the North-west. His principal newspapers have followed up his indication, and to-day the press and public mind is full of the new policy, the new departure, which, by the way, all say may cost a large amount of money, but if it opens up the North-west it is well worth the money they say, and it must be pursued. They will place their Estimates on the Table and ask us to vote them. Will they ask for supply for the North-west? Will they ask us for supply for the Department of the Interior and the immigration branch, which must devise and carry out the policy, this new policy for the North-west? If they do, they must show us a Minister and his policy before they can expect to get an appropriation. Is Parliament going to be asked to vote an immense sum of money for the North-west for immigration and vote it to a man who is not known and for a policy which has not been developed? Why have not they a Minister of the Interior? They are a strong party, they have talents in abundance outside of their regular party following in the Dominion Parliament and inside of it also, according to their own assertion. Why all this delay as to the Minister of the Interior, who embodies or is to embody this new departure, and this lavish expenditure? Hon. gentlemen opposite must not feel that they have been taken at an advantage if, when they ask us for supply, this side of the House asks them for their Minister and their policy before it grants them that supply. Why have not they a Minister of Interior? Is it that there is no man in the old parliamentary following sufficient for the place? Well, then, they can go outside. They have gone outside before, Oh, so often! My hon. friend spoke of the feeling of bitterness that exists by reason of disappointment on this side of the House. But there is bitterness elsewhere. Away down in the groves of Bothwell wanders disconsolate and forlorn an aged philosopher, who, through good and evil report followed—aye, who dominated—his party's policy, who was the bosom friend of the hon. leader of the Government, and who to-day takes refuge in his poetry and his philosophy from the canker and the bitterness of disappointed hope. A young and callow fledgling takes his place and fills the office that he should have had and leaves him to wander alone in bitterness and disappointment. And down by the resounding waves of the Guysboro' shore there may this very day be a walking the ponderous form of one who thinks and thinks and thinks of the ingratitude of a leader and a party, a leader who made him his colleague and yoke-fellow in travelling from one end of this country to the other when fighting his battles, but who, when it came to dispensing the sweets of office, let him go idly by and passed on to a man untried and unknown in the field of Dominion party politics. And, Sir, there may be another, in fact there may be two others. There may be a gallant Colonel down in the county which I myself once represented and which he represents now—and of which representation he is very proud indeed. There may be another disappointed man there in the bard-like and prophetic-looking adherent of the party who for twenty-five years has fought their battles in and out of Parliament, who has done

yoeman service, and who has been passed over in favour of another unknown man in the field of Dominion politics, leaving him to wander disconsolately upon the shores of Lake Utopia looking for the fabled serpent which is said to inhabit its deep waters. But why have they not a man from the North-west? They had a standard-bearer, a right-hand supporter who stood by the side and upheld the arms of the hon. member who formerly represented L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), a bold and fitting work-fellow who fell as my hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) fell in the battle of the 23rd of June, but who has not enjoyed the good fortune that my hon. friend has enjoyed of being so absolutely necessary to his leader and so intimately connected with the affairs of that leader that a new constituency must be got for him willy-nilly—and though the people say: We do not want him, the people's judgment is nothing in Liberal estimation. You must have him, says the Premier, for I want to make him a member of my Ministry. The hon. member for Winnipeg is tortured to-day with disappointment, it may be with uncertainty—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The late member for Winnipeg (Mr. Joseph Martin).

Mr. FOSTER. The late member for Winnipeg—true. And he wonders whether the same reward for past services will be meted out to him as was meted out to the former member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte). Why is there not a Minister of the Interior? Is there another deal on? Is something waiting to be "fixed" before they can choose the man, and is there a consideration floating around to tempt ambition or cupidity? There must be some reason. The most important Minister in the new departure that the leader of the Government is to make is the Minister of the Interior, and yet no one is selected for that office. Why? My hon. friend is surely not at the end of his resources. Is not there another postmastership equal to that of Marsh Hill that might be given to some aspiring man to make a vacancy for the late member for Winnipeg? Could not you work up a preventive office somewhere to make a vacancy? Maybe you could do what the Minister from the province of New Brunswick (Mr. Blair) thought of doing and actually proposed to my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier)—a most original idea. After the election was over the choice for Minister from New Brunswick fell upon Mr. Blair. But Mr. Blair had no constituency. But to get one, Mr. Blair had his own peculiar notions. He illustrated a part of all the virtues of this Liberal Government, for he tried to get a seat by the persuasion of a member of a party opposite to himself, and at his nomination in Queen's, he told the assembled electorate that he might have got it, but the price was too high. So, finding these peculiar tactics unavailable, and the price too high, the hon. gentleman had a proposition ready, a most original one—he declared it in a speech delivered three days before the revised report appeared in the St. John "Telegraph." And what was this original idea? He said that, not being successful at once in getting a seat, he might go into the Senate for two or three months, and he had arranged with a friend in the Senate to loan him his seat for three months. And so this bright and shining light in this bright and shining Government, proposed to go into the renting of a senator's seat for three months in order to get a place in Parliament, when he found it difficult to get in by way of the Commons. Now, Sir, will some one loan a seat to some one in the North-west so that we could have a Minister of the Interior here?

Well, my hon. friend goes on next, and says that he has no measures; and here again he gives reasons where he better had given none, for the reasons do not seem to be sufficient. What are the reasons why no measures are to be brought down, as put in the mouth of the Governor General? The first reason is this:

It is impossible to lay before you at this session the public accounts for the past year, or indeed any of the reports usually submitted to Parliament. Under these circumstances, and in view of the fact that you will require to reassemble early in the ensuing year, it does not appear expedient to invite your attention to any measures beyond the passage of the supplies.

There are two reasons, one is that you cannot put on the Table of the House the Report of the Public Accounts for the year 1895-96, and that therefore you cannot put any measures before the House. Sir, the absence of the Public Accounts might be a reason for not passing the Estimates under certain circumstances; but it is no reason for not passing these Estimates if these Estimates are simply those that should have been passed in March and April last. Estimates which followed the accounts of the preceding year, and which were put upon the Table. But, Sir, I put it to this House and to the country whether it is any reason for not bringing down legislation, that the Public Accounts for 1895-96 are not on the Table. The fact that the reports of the departments are not on the Table of the House, is no reason, and never was. The only objection that was ever made from the Opposition side of the House on account of the reports not being down, was that we should not pass the Estimates of a department until we knew what the department had done for the preceding year, but it was not urged as a reason for deferring one single measure if there were any measures of importance. Why did not the hon. gentleman treat this House and the country fairly, and say: We do not think it is expedient, under the circumstances, to have any legislation this year, and we are not going to have any;—but not giving a reason which is no reason, a reason which never has been given before, and would not be valid if it were given. But why have they no legislation? They want the reports and the Public Accounts. What for? Do they need the Reports and the Public Accounts in order, for instance, to put legislation upon the statute-book which will give them power, in a legal and parliamentary way, to open negotiations with the Cabinet at Washington for a reciprocity treaty? What reports are necessary for that? Why is not that introduced? If authority is necessary, why is not a legal measure taken in order to bring that question to the front, and to push it forward? For the hon. leader of the Government said, in 1890, in 1894, in 1895, aye, and in 1896, that when they came into power, on that day a commission should go to Washington in order to negotiate a treaty of reciprocity with the United States of America. Why has not that been put in motion? Was it a condition absolutely necessary to carrying that out, that the reports should be brought down? But, Sir, there was something else that could have been done; they might have brought in a measure for reducing the salary of the Governor General. My hon. friend, the Postmaster General of the new Cabinet (Mr. Mulock)—who is not now in his place, who is camping elsewhere—on two different occasions introduced a Bill into this House, argued for it, pushed it forward, and it was supported by numerous Liberals in the House—a Bill for reducing the salary of the Governor General from $50,000 to $35,000. Has my hon. friend forgotten his zeal of two years ago? Where is the measure which one of the most important members in the Cabinet, should now, if he keeps his promises and professions of two and three years ago, have in a forward state for the consideration of this House? Or where is that other measure that the Postmaster General, that my hon. friend from Queen's, that other hon. gentlemen sitting in the Ministerial benches, and behind the Ministerial benches, declared was a measure of imminent necessity, a measure to reduce the expenses of the departments of Government, and to curtail the departments of Government? Have they forgotten that? Aye, to such an extent, Sir, that instead of proceeding on the plane of curtailing the number of Cabinet offices and curtailing the salaries, they have added to the number of the full Cabinet Ministers, and they have raised the salaries of those who formerly were Controllers, and did not have the full salary of Cabinet Ministers. Do I say they have raised it? No, they have done worse. It has been a commonly accepted theory that until you get the consent of Parliament you cannot appropriate money, and should not appropriate it even by promise; but before my hon. friend got the consent of Parliament, or put a measure before Parliament, he invited gentlemen to go into his Cabinet, saying, I only give you $5,000 now and a Controllership, but you shall have $7,000 and a full Ministership if you will come into my Cabinet. They have come in, or are trying to come in, and this promise must be implemented. Parliament has not been consulted at all. Why is there not a measure for carrying out this promise? Does my hon. friend propose to do this by Governor General's warrant as well? He might just as well as pay the salaries of employees and officers of the Government by Governor General's warrants. Where, Sir, is that measure which hon. gentlemen have been for ten years declaring was needed by this country, a franchise measure? No report was necessary to be laid on the Table in order to have that measure before the House. Why is it not here? Where is that ninth and last plank in the platform of the Liberal convention of 1893, which declared that it was incumbent upon, and would be the duty of, the Liberal party when they came into power, to test the feelings of Canada on prohibition by a plebiscite of all the provinces? On the strength of that promise, resolutions were passed, conferences sent notes of congratulation; the Montreal "Witness" was elevated almost to the seventh heaven, and an era of coming elucidation of one of the most vexed questions in public life to-day, was heralded with the advent of that party to power. They are in power. It does not require blue-books to be down to make provision for a plebiscite. Why is there not a measure before the House to carry out that great and last promise in the platform of the Liberal party? Then, Sir, why is there not, above all, a tariff measure?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FOSTER. That laugh is very indicative. I tell you what it sounds to me like: "Ha, ha, ha, you were fools enough to think that we were going to revise the tariff." If there is any translation for that laugh, that is the translation in plain English. Well, I acknowledge that you very likely have fooled us, as you have fooled a great many people in the Dominion. You went about for eighteen years fulminating against the iniquity of a protective system, and declaring in favour of free trade, declaring in favour of a revenue tariff which should have no vestige of protection in it. You nurtured the young men in your party upon that sort of pabulum. Your papers were flooded with it from Vancouver to Cape Breton. On the hustings, in your caucusses, and in your club meetings—everywhere you indoctrinated your people with that theory. You are face to face with your promises now. You said that when you came into power you would do so and so. You are in power. Will you execute the mandate; will you put into execution what you promised, or is it that those promises and faint hearts have met together and so the promises lag in fulfilment to-day? I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that there could be nothing stronger in the history of Parliament, there has been nothing stronger than the doctrine laid down with explicitness by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House with respect to the enormity of protection, its deleterious effects to the country and the imminent and urgent necessity of getting it out of the country as soon as possible. Shall I refresh the hon. gentleman's memory? Yesterday, in answer to a question asked by my hon. friend beside me, the leader of the Government said he could not remember exactly what he said; he did not deny that the statement quoted expressed his opinion, as did the article in the Chicago "Record." Let me refresh the hon. gentleman's memory. At Brantford in 1890, August 20, the hon. gentleman said:

Mr. FOSTER.

I propose that we should follow England's example and open our ports to the products of the world.

At Winnipeg, in 1894, he said:

The task of the Liberals of the province of Manitoba, the task of the Liberals of this province in particular, has been to prove to the world and to our countrymen the benefits which are to be derived from the principles of free trade. I came before you to-night to preach to you this new gospel of freedom of trade. I denounce to you the policy of protection as bondage, yes, bondage, and I refer to bondage in the same manner in which the American slavery was bondage.

At Montreal he said:

Upon that question I need not tell you that we stand at the very antipodes of the Conservative party. The Conservative party believe in protection. All their hope is in protection. The Liberal party believe in free trade on broad lines such as exist in Great Britain, and their immediate object is a revenue tariff—a tariff to be derived from customs, but which will levy no duties, except for the purposes of revenue.

I have told you that our object is to have a customs tariff for revenue only.

Upon the question of protection there can be no compromise.

We stand here against protection, and in favour of a customs tariff based upon the principles of revenue and nothing else.

The system of protection has been the bane and curse of Canada.

The Liberal party believe in free trade on the broad lines such as exist in Great Britain.

At Brantford, in 1894, the hon. gentleman said:

Is there any man to say that he would not be content to open the Canadian market to the American manufacturers if in return he obtained access to the American market for his products.

The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) is represented as stating:

Our policy from first to last has been to destroy this villainous protective system by free trade, revenue tariff, or continental free trade.

And again :

Sir, they demand our policy. Well, Sir, they shall have our policy, and here I believe I speak for my hon. friends beside me. Our policy is death to protection and war to the knife to corruption.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, because in the hon. gentleman's opinion protection and corruption are indissolubly bound together.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear," he adheres to that declaration. If the hon. gentleman does not put a knife into protection he is harbouring protection and corruption. The hon. gentleman further says :

We strike and will strike for liberty and freedom from this system of protective taxation.

Why does he not strike ? Why are these slaves left for nine long months to be downtrodden by the monopolists of protection, and the hon. gentleman refuse to strike ? The hon. gentleman says :

And I tell the hon. gentlemen that we will not rest until the slavery that they have imposed upon us has become a thing of the past, and until Canadians are as free as Canadians ought to be, free to make the most they can of the opportunities God has given them.

And there the hon. gentleman rests ; there he is going to rest for nine months. The only difference is that he does not rest in the same seat he declared he was about to occupy. The hon. member for South Oxford said :

There is no Canadian manufacturer who need be afraid to face the competition of the world. Our policy is death to protection.

At Pembroke, in 1890, the hon. gentleman said :

A small ring and clique of combiners and protected manufacturers, who as I have told you, have been permitted for years past to make a prey and plunder of the people of Canada.

At Meaford the hon. gentleman said :

I stand by the declaration I have made that protection is nothing more nor less than deliberate legalized and organized robbery, and, more than that, if you do not stamp it out it is the very high road to political slavery and industrial slavery afterward.

Need I read more ? Are not these statements as strong as the English language can make them ? Is not this the pabulum on which they have been feeding the party until it has grown strong enough to put them in power. Now, why do they not carry out their promises ? Why wait for nine months ? This is August ; they will wait, they say, until early in the year. They cannot get a tariff measure through this House before

April, May, June or July of next year. Why should the country wait for these men's convenience ? Why is it being "bled white," as the favourite phrase goes—why are the people being ground in slavery, as the leader of the Government declares ? Surely hon. gentlemen opposite are bound, yes, bound by their past teaching and by every tenet of honourable party politics to lose not a single moment in putting their principles into operation and dealing the death blow to protection. But the leader of the Government has a reason now why we should go slowly. He says a change would cause a bad disturbance in the country. Did he not know that two, three or four years ago ? The hon. gentleman who was leader of the Opposition, and is now leader of the Government, declares that to deal a death blow to protection would cause a severe disturbance, and it will not be done now, but nine months hence. Not only so, but this blow must not be dealt all at once, the work must be done gradually ; meanwhile, the country is to remain nine months in this horrible slavery, which is described as worse than that formerly prevailing in the southern states. The hon. gentleman says that vested interests have grown up. He had to wait until last night's discussion to find that out. He does not appear to have known all these years that there were vested interests ; and yet has not this crusade been begun and carried out with a full knowledge that there were vested interests at stake, and with a full determination to destroy these vested interests and cause a commercial disturbance which would ultimately prove as they declared for the good of the country, as it would cause the downfall of a bad system. My hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) says : But you cannot, for instance, take the duty off coal. He said, it must come off ; it is a raw material, and seated right alongside of his friend (Mr. Fielding), he did not deny that last night. He said : The duty on coal must come off. Well, what was the hon. gentleman's excuse for not taking it off. It was : that because if you touch one there it deleteriously affects a great many other interests. Will my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) tell me what will be deleteriously affected, outside of the coal industry, if coal is made free of duty ? I do not think he will find any such industry. The makers of iron would like to have coal free. They would not be deleteriously affected by it. The men who run mills would like to have coal free, if they can get it ; for it would not deleteriously affect their industry. I say to the hon. gentlemen opposite : Cannot you do now what you have been declaring year after year ought to be done, and what you have been specifying year after year should be done. There has not been a year from 1879 down until now, that hon. gentlemen leading the Opposition then, and now on the Treasury benches, have not gone into details, and by resolution, every one of them voting for it in most cases, defined article after article, that ought to be reduced in duty, or that ought to have the duty entirely taken off. If you were ready for that in 1879, ready for it in 1882, ready for it in 1885, ready for it in 1890, ready for it in 1894, why are you not ready for it now? You were ready for it when you were in opposition, but you are not ready for it now when the responsibilities of office are on you. You were dealing in words then, you have to act now, and there is every difference between words and acts. Do my hon. friends opposite wish me to specify. Why, Sir, in 1879, Mr. Fiset—he is here in the House now supporting the gentlemen who are in the Government—and has that hon. gentleman any reason why what he thought ought to be done in 1879 should not be done now right off-hand? He moved:

That the 15 cents per bushel duty on wheat be struck off, and that wheat be transferred to the free list.

The leader of the government in the province of Quebec, if I mistake not, was the mover or the seconder of a resolution which declared for free wheat and free agricultural products. If the mind of the hon. gentleman was made up to this, and if he believed it right years ago, and is disposed to be the same enemy to protection to-day as he was then, what is to prevent him taking the duty off wheat? What interest outside of the wheat growing industry would be deleteriously affected? None. On the contrary, according to his own theory, we would get cheaper flour. The hon. gentleman's reason is no reason, but is a mere subterfuge.

Well, Sir, I find that Mr. Charlton, about the same time moved—and that hon. gentleman is now a member of this House:

That wheat, coal and pig iron be placed upon the free list.

And all the Liberals voted yea and said "Amen." Sir, that was in 1879, and if in 1879, wheat, and coal, and pig iron, should have been placed upon the free list, what is to prevent their being placed on the free list now, and placed on it at once? What, but the fact, that these gentlemen were in opposition then and they are in power to-day. Mr. Vallée moved a little later:

That wheat-flour imported into this country be placed on the free list.

And all the Liberals voted for it. If they were right then why do they not carry that out now? On the 30th March, 1882, Mr. Laurier moved:

That the duties on coal, coke, and breadstuffs be repealed and that these articles be made free.

Forty-seven Liberals voted for that, and 120 Conservatives voted against it, and yet my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) after fourteen years, and professing that he holds the same opinion, and denouncing the bondage of protection, is not ready to implement, now that he is in power, what he vociferously demanded in 1882 when he was out of power. In 1886, Mr. Mitchell moved the same motion, and Mr. Laurier and all the Liberals voted "yea." In 1893 a motion was moved:

That no sufficient reason has been adduced or exists requiring investigation, respecting the foregoing facts which are notorious, nor justifying delay in the passage of remedial legislation which is imperative.

The remedial legislation, to wit, being:

A reduction of duties upon the necessities of life.

That was a motion moved by Mr. McCarthy and voted for by Mr. Laurier and the Liberal party. But, now they say we want investigation. In 1893 there was no investigation needed according to them, and no delay was justifiable for the thing ought to be done and done at once. Well, Sir, the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., (Mr. Davies) now in the Government, a few years ago moved:

That inasmuch as Great Britain admits the products of Canada into her ports free of duty, this House is of the opinion that the present scale of duties on goods mainly imported from Great Britain should be reduced.

For that the Liberals all voted. They believed that it was right then, that the time was ripe, that no delay was necessary and that it should be done off-hand. Why do they not carry it out to-day when they are in power? Any way, what becomes of my hon. friend's excuse that you must have investigation, and that if you do this it would cause disturbance, and that you must be very careful as to when you proceed with it. The trouble is, Sir, as I have said before, that their large promises have been too much for them. Their heart is faint within them when they come to the time of action, and they are simply marking time to gain their breath, to get over the bye-elections, offending nobody as far as possible, and after that they will see what they will do.

Now, if there is a change of heart, if the hon. gentlemen have experienced a change of heart, will not they be manly and honourable enough to confess it? It must be a change of heart, or else they stand open to the imputation of going back on their policy. If it is a change of heart they have experienced, let them tell us anyway. I hold that it is incontrovertible, that in the case of the great business interests of this country which have been modelled for 18 years upon a certain tariff and revenue system, in which there is unbounded capital for Canada, and in which the labour of this country is vitally interested; I say this position is incontrovertible: that if you refuse to act at once, after having used these weapons and infused uncertainty and fear into the business interests of this country, if you refuse to act, and yet make a delay of nine months; the least thing that you could do, the thing that the country demands of you and which your duty should prompt you to do, is, to indicate the principle upon which you propose to revise the tariff. A gentleman said to the leader of a government: I am engaged in a manufacturing industry; I manufacture this year for my sales of twelve or fifteen months hence: If you are going to revise the tariff and scale down the duties on my products, I will not manufacture; I want you at least to tell me what principle you are going to adopt, so that I may accommodate my business and my capital to it. What answer has been given? What answer would be given, if that question were put to my hon. friend? If millions of capital put that question to him, what would he answer? His duty is to tell those men and to advise that capital whether he is going to revise the tariff keeping a sufficient protection, or whether he is going to revise it on the basis of free trade and a tariff for revenue only. It is simple robbery not to do that. It is unfair and unjust to the interests of labour and capital alike. Surely the hon. gentleman does not go about whispering into private ears: "Don't you be afraid, I will not hurt your industry." Surely he will come to this House, the high court of Parliament, the people's representation, and take them into his confidence, and tell them what they are to tell their constituents, what they are to report back to the country. The hon. gentleman cannot do less than that. It is the duty of this Opposition to try and get that enunciation from this Government. I think we would fail in our duties if we left the precincts of this House and went back to our constituents without being able to tell them at least the principle on which hon. gentlemen propose to proceed. Now, Sir, the Manitoba school question has been brought up. I have little to say about that at the present time. I have simply to say this, that my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition gave what I consider to be a very strong and a very fair statement of the canvasses upon that question, and of the Janus-like policy of my hon. friends opposite upon it. The only reply to it which my hon. friend gave was in standing up, as the leader of a Government and a statesman, and raising the accusation and the cry of race and creed prejudice against my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. Everybody in this country who has followed the course of the last contest knows exactly the truth of the statements that were made; aye, and gentlemen sitting very close to the Premier know who raised the cry of race and creed then. The Toronto "Globe" itself knows who raised it, when it declares, as it did not long ago, that the question was not now as to whether a remedial Bill should be passed or not, but whether the hierarchy should rule this country or not. These two statements went into different portions of the country—one facing in the line of no coercion, that is, no remedial legislation here, come what might; the other facing in the line of the rights of the minority in Manitoba being granted, by the province if it would grant them, through this Parliament if the province would not grant them. It was on these two diverse cries that my hon. friend conducted his campaign and gained something of his success. Now, Sir, so far as I am concerned, I am going to await the pleasure of my hon. friend. He has made the statement for the information of the House, after having made it in the newspapers, that a conference has been held, and that the matter is practically settled or under way of settlement; and the Toronto "Globe," the organ of my hon. friend, speaking by authority yesterday, affirms that it is practically settled on all points. I thought we were to have an investigation. I thought there was to be a great commission, with Sir Oliver Mowat at its head and ever so many more with him, to get information that neither the Government nor the members of Parliament nor anybody else possessed, but for which they were thirsting, and without which it was altogether and absolutely impossible to come to any agreement. Yet, with no commission, no investigation, no evidence further than what we have had, the hon. gentleman comes before the House and the country now and says the matter is practically settled. Well, I have this statement to make, that if the Manitoba school question is practically settled by an agreement between the Manitoba government and my hon. friend's Government opposite, and settled to the satisfaction of the minority, giving the minority their rights under the constitution—if the question is settled in that way, it will be settled to the eternal and everlasting disgrace of party politics in this Dominion of Canada. What do I mean by that? Not that I would be sorry to find it settled; but if the Manitoba government settle the question in affiliation with my hon. friend opposite, they will settle it on the basis which they refused to the former Government, thus publishing to the world that the two had been acting in secret concert, and had kept up the contest for party purposes. Time will tell, Sir, whether the question will be settled in that way or not; and when the hon. gentleman brings down the settlement it will be time enough to take that matter up and discuss it further. Until that time comes, I do not propose to have anything more to say upon it. Now, Sir, I come to the final point which I wish to take up, that is, this new evangel of the new Liberal Government comprising all the talents and all the virtues. They have begun; let us see whether they have begun well or not. They vaunt the principles of Liberalism. My hon. friend is fond of repeating the phrase until I suppose he believes it, that he is a Liberal of the old Liberal school, of the old English school. He holds to Liberal principles, he vaunts them, he makes them his creed, he elevates them for his worship. When this new Liberal Ministry, based on these old, sound doctrines of Liberalism, come in and commence their administration, we on this side of the House must be excused if we ask them to live up to the high plane of their professions and their ideals; and so, with a great deal of curiosity, we watch their progress. What is it so far? The first thing they do is to go back on the old Liberal principle of economy—economy in governmental machinery—and raise the salaries of two members of the Government, and make them full-fledged Ministers of the Crown without reducing the number in any other direction. That is their first act. Their second is to interfere with the processes of the courts of law in what I believe to be a most unjustifiable manner. The principle is one which every one must admit, that the Government, whatever power it may possess, must keep its hands off the courts of law whilst the processes of law are going on. Once a suit is instituted in a court, the Government of this country must stand back until the court has had its say; and when the court has given its decision, there is the prerogative of the Government that may be invoked for pardon or the lessening of the penalty. But, I repeat, that while the suit is before the courts; no Government has the right to step in and steal from the person who made the indictment, the fruits of his indictment, under the full and regular course of law. We have to-day on the statutes of Parliament what is known as the Independence of Parliament Act. What is it for? It is there in order that every man who sits in this House shall be independent of the Government, as far as salary and emoluments are concerned. If I hold an office from the Crown, if I am receiving a salary from the Crown, and am elected, that election is void, so far as giving me a seat in this House is concerned. The Independence of Parliament Act is for that purpose, and no other. But how have these hon. gentlemen used it? When they wished to dispossess a man of his seat and put another in his place, they invoked a device fastened upon that law, but not an organic portion of it, and which was never meant to be an organic portion of it. They invoked the device of the Chiltern Hundreds, and said: We will get you out of your seat by giving you the appearance of an office. And they gave an office to the member for Queen's, N.S., in order to make a place for the Minister of Finance. That is not so bad, but Mr. King was elected in the province of New Brunswick, on the 23rd of June, as the representative of Sunbury and Queen's, for the next term of Parliament. In due course, an election petition was filed against him, and the required deposit of a thousand dollars was made. The petitioner thus brought the matter into court, he thus demanded that the evidence be heard and judgment given, and that, should he prove his case, the penalty provided be inflicted, namely, that the seat be voided and the whole cost of the prosecution fall against the man whose seat was voided. While that suit was before the courts, this Liberal Government stepped in and took Mr. King out of court, and, so far as that penalty was concerned, made him a free man.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). No, look at the law.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not a lawyer, but I will leave it to the judgment of the House which has carefully followed what I have said. I say that, so far as the penalty is concerned, namely, that the seat should be voided and that the party whose seat was voided, should pay the costs of the suit caused by his corrupt and dishonourable practices; as far as that is concerned, the Government have taken the case out of court, and robbed the petitioner of his due, under the Corrupt Practices Act. The post-mastership of Marsh Hill at $100 a year was given to Mr. King, and by that very fact the processes of the court were stopped. I leave it to the lawyers to argue what processes still remain, what penalties of another sort may be sued for, whether disqualification may be asked for; but if the processes of the court have not been interfered with, what follows? It follows that we might yet pursue that petition, and if the evidence be sufficient, void the seat; and then where does the second man who follows in the meantime stand with reference to the law? That is a question which I leave to lawyers. It is a nice question, but my view of it has been given. I say that nothing like it has ever been done by any previous Government in this country. I charge my hon. friends with interference with courts of law for party purposes, and I say that the verdict of this country will, when the people think the matter over, be against hon. gentlemen opposite. If you can take one man who has been petitioned against out of the courts, you can take every one of them. There are more post offices of $10 per year, and one can be given to every Liberal member protested against, and every Liberal member can, by the same process, be taken out of the court, and avoid all the costs and disgrace that attaches to the loss of his seat, and receive instead a Government office. Every Liberal member protested against can thus avoid all the dishonour, and save his pocket and reputation by having the Government interfere with the law courts.

With regard to the Governor General's warrants, the course taken is a totally new departure. It is a departure not contemplated by the constitution. It is a departure against the right of the Commons to decide beforehand what each appropriation shall be and how it must be spent. My hon. friend, at the inauguration of his Government, is committing a grave mistake, which will follow him and discredit his administration all through. He may some time, when political exigency makes it necessary—and political exigencies may be very pressing with him some of these days—refuse to call Parliament together for six months or a year, and secure his appropriations by means of Governor General's warrants. Sir, from this time out, while my hon. friend leads this Government, I shall never feel safe that they will not take that same advantage to meet party exigencies and tide themselves over a difficulty. If they can do it in one case, they can do it in another.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You were never safer in your life than now.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, when I look at my hon. friend who is speaking, I feel perfectly safe.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I will protect you.

Mr. FOSTER. I supposed that these hon. gentlemen were in favour of protection; the hon. gentleman acknowledges it. But there is another and graver point yet. A new era has certainly been ushered in as regards authoritative announcements of policy. We have before us the Speech from the Throne, and we have in the public press a speech from the man in front of the Throne. The Speech from the Throne gives us absolutely no information. The speech outside the Throne takes up a line of international policy of most extensive proportions and of the greatest gravity to this country to-day and for all future years. My hon. friend is following the bad example of his colleague who sits behind him (Mr. Tarte), who has inaugurated the interesting procedure of going to his department and looking through his papers in order to get hold of certain facts, and then, under the signature of "J. Israel Tarte," sending them to a newspaper which he edits, and which is looked upon as his own organ. That he may do, but he will find it more dangerous to himself and his colleagues than to the Opposition. But the matter to which I am now about to refer is of a different colour entirely. Here is the leader of the Government, who comes in with what he calls a strong Ministry, who declares that he hopes to remain in power for fifteen or eighteen years, who hopes to build up a strong and able Government to control the affairs of this country. But he is hardly warm in his seat before he rushes into a question of national and international gravity which might well appal the strongest and oldest and most experienced statesmen that Canada has ever had. He pleads that he opens his heart, that he is candid and honest. Well, a man may open his heart too widely, and be altogether too candid and honest in diplomatic particulars. What has he done? First, as leader of the Government, he declares to the world that he hopes, under his administration, for a renewal of neighbourly relations with the United States. What does my hon. friend mean by that? If he means anything, he means that neighbourly relations have been interrupted between the United States and Canada, and that under his administration he hopes to renew them. Well, Sir, the speech of my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) last night was a complete answer to that. You cannot go through the annals of the last ten or eleven years without seeing that Canada, though she has stood by her rights, and has been upheld by Britain in her interpretation of those rights, has done it with a consistency, with an urbanity, and with a steady courtesy, which has won the admiration of the people of the United States and the hearty commendation of the British Government itself, as expressed in the despatches. And to say, because we have rights, and maintained them and maintained them strongly, that we are guilty of endangering the relations between ourselves and another power, is to say that you must give up all rights if the power against which you urge them refuses or is loath to acknowledge them, and if there is liability of friction if they be urged. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) has simply carried out in this, what he unfortunately stated in Boston in 1891, when he declared that the conduct of Britain towards the United States in the war of 1860-66 was such as should bring the blush of shame to the cheeks of the people of Britain. He has not forgotten the sentiment that he expressed then, and he has carried it out in this correspondence with the Chicago "Record." But when all these arguments and all these despatches, and all this correspondence culminated in 1888, when the treaty was formed, as my hon. friend said, the highest authority in the United States bore testimony to the honourable and reasonable settlement that was made, and from that day to this the United States have had no fault to find with the administration by Canada of these fisheries. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman goes on then to declare that his policy on the question of the fisheries is a policy of give and take. And, to bring it down to a fine point, he announces his policy to be this: Free ports, free fishing, and free fish markets. That is what he proposes. He proposes to give to the United States, free access to our fisheries within the three-mile limit, free access to our ports in spite of the treaty of 1818, and a free market for their fish, if they will do the same by us. What did he and his party say in 1888? The result of the negotiations in 1888 came to this—that a delimitation of the waters of Canada was to be made, preserving the three-mile limit, and preserving the large bays; that this delimitation having been made, United States fishing vessels should have access to our ports for the purposes of their occupation, to get supplies and to trade in supplies alone. There was to be no fishing, there was to be no commerce. And in addition, there was the proviso that as soon as the United States gave free markets for our fish we would give free markets for their fish, and when that was accomplished, the full scope of the treaty would be covered. Contrast that with my hon. friend's proposition. And yet at that time, Sir, every Liberal paper in Canada had headlines announcing a base and ignominious surrender. The Toronto "Globe" declared that we had betrayed Canada. In this House the same criticism was made, and yet that was but a mild experiment as compared with what my hon. friend proposes. When you propose to allow the United States fishermen within our three-mile limit, and within our ports to conduct the operations of fishing and commerce, you propose to go a long way; and that change will never be made until this House has carefully looked into the matter, and has found what the compensating advantages are. Why, Sir, the old treaty did not go that far, and we got out of it $5,000,000 further compensation. And yet my hon. friend, as leader of the Government, cavalierly proposes, and sends his proposal to the people of the United States, by way of the Chicago "Record," that far greater privileges shall be granted.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). To which treaty does the hon. gentleman refer when he speaks of the "old" treaty?

Mr. FOSTER. The treaty under which the award of 1875 was made.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. You do not mean the treaty of 1854?

Mr. FOSTER. I did not say that.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. You called it the "old" treaty.

Mr. FOSTER. The one I have been describing—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is the "young" treaty.

Mr. FOSTER. No, the "young" treaty is the treaty of 1888. The leader of the Government goes further yet. He takes up the canal question, and on the authority of the leader of the Government and as though by the advice of and consent of his Government and his party, he declares for—what? For a joint deepening and completion of the canals from the head of the lakes to Montreal, and for the joint control of them after they are built. And, what is still worse, when brought to book, he defends himself by a representation which turns out to be a misrepresentation. Has the hon. gentleman the document from which he read last night?

Mr. FOSTER.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I have not. It is in the "Hansard" office.

Mr. FOSTER. Then I shall be obliged to quote it from memory. The statement the hon. gentleman made was this: That in that interview he was only following out the policy of the late Government. Then he read the Order in Council appointing the deep waterways commission in order to back up that statement, and it didn't back it up. I challenge him to rise and repeat that statement now, after he has read that Order in Council. Will the hon. gentleman say that in making that statement of policy he is only following the policy laid down by the late Government in the Order in Council? The hon. gentleman will not say so. But he said so last night. Unfortunately for him, he read the document, and that document goes into "Hansard," and is a sufficient answer to his statement. The policy of the late Government went no further than this: To appoint a joint commission on the deep waterways, to inquire into the whole matter, but to go not one single step further, nor was there the least indication of what would be the policy of the Government when the report was brought in. Has my hon. friend received that report? Does he know what the findings of that commission are? Have they told him what expense will be incurred? Has he got their opinions as to how joint control is to be arranged? No, Sir. The hon. gentleman wanted investigation and evidence in the Manitoba school question. He does not want any evidence in this case. Without consultation with his council, without waiting for a report, without a scintilla of information, he pledges himself, and pledges his party, and so far as he can, he pledges this country, to a joint building of these waterways, and a joint control of them with the United States. Fifty or seventy-five million dollars would be our share at least. Has his Council decided to do it? Are we prepared to vote that? For what purpose? To give facilities to 25 farmers of the United States where it would give them to one of our own. And what is more, Sir, he takes the dangerous initial step of allowing a control of vital waterways to be given to a great nation twenty times as powerful as we are, with all the initial complications which may result therefrom. Sir, the instincts of Canada are for a future of her own. She will develop her own property; and I say that no self-respecting people with a future, or with the high record of progress and of advancement we have now made, can remain a people and give joint control to a rival and more powerful nation in the vital waterways of that country. Now, what has been done by my hon. friend? He has announced his policy. If any negotiations take place, he is the man who will carry on those negotiations, and from this time forward when he goes to Washington, that pledge will be there to face him as the pledge of a man who is the leader of the Government; and if we go, that will be there to face us as the pledge of a man who was the leader of a Canadian government. It is most unfortunate, it is most unprecedented, and the hon. gentleman will find that he cannot play ducks and drakes with these great interests of the country and hope to escape the scathing condemnation of the people.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I have often had occasion in former times to admire the great histrionic talents of my hon. friend, but I do not know that I ever admired them more than I have done to-day on hearing him address the House under circumstances which might, perhaps, have been difficult for a less accomplished actor. In the first place, I propose to deal with one or two remarks he made in the opening of his speech, and which appeared to me, I am sorry to say, to involve a serious slur on the distinguished leader of the Opposition. The hon. member for—what is his present county?

An hon. MEMBER. York.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Oh, York.

Mr. FOSTER. Your memory ought to be good, for you have exercised it enough.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The hon. member for York was pleased to tell us that among the claims on the confidence of the Liberal-Conservative party which the leader of the Opposition enjoys, was this, that it was possible for him to have been still enjoying the sweets of a high and lucrative office if he had not chosen to come across here. Now, Sir, what an insinuation does that convey? Had not the hon. leader of the Opposition come across here, the member for York insinuates that they would have been still on this side of the House, and consequently the hon. gentleman would have been able still to enjoy the sweets of his high and lucrative office. There is no other possible construction; because I think he knows that, under existing circumstances, the sense of propriety of the leader of the Opposition would not have led him to continue in that high and lucrative office had he been there; and therefore it is perfectly clear that the opinion of my hon. friend from York is that if the hon. gentleman had stuck to his office in England, these gentlemen would have stuck to their offices here.

Sir, it is made a very grave ground of complaint against my hon. friend beside me, that he has rallied to his cause three, if not four, of the most distinguished statesmen in Canada, men who have proved their ability by the length of time during which they have successfully administered the affairs of Ontario, of New Brunswick, and of Nova Scotia. My hon. friend in that, as in many other things, has shown that he is able on occasion to arise above precedent, and his party has shown that they, too, are able to rise above precedent; and that when the best men can be got for any office, they will be welcomed, from whatever quarter they come. But, Sir, did the hon. gentleman make no attempts on their side to obtain the services of men who had at one time, at any rate, been premiers of important provinces? Why, I think the present Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec could tell a tale of distressful appeals, and vain appeals, made to him by hon. gentlemen opposite. But Mr. Chapleau was gifted with great political sagacity. He read the signs of the times. Perhaps he remembered how the hon. gentlemen in times past had treated him, and while he was not sorry to see them on their knees to him, still he was not disposed to come down from his high and lucrative office, or comfortable office at any rate, for the purpose of relieving these worthy gentlemen in their distress. The hon. member for York said, and said correctly, that there is every difference between words and acts; and sorry am I to say that a gentleman who can indulge in words so lofty, should sometimes descend to acts so small. My hon. friend beside me gave to hon. gentlemen opposite the other evening three causes why those gentlemen had justly forfeited the confidence of the people of this country. So far as I recollect, those causes were these: They had refused to inaugurate any substantial or useful reforms in their tariff; they had been shown, not once but a hundred times over, to have been guilty of such corruption and such extravagance as have rarely disgraced the annals of any country; certainly never before disgraced ours; and they had displayed both cowardice and incapacity in dealing with an extremely delicate and difficult question which, in the hands of my hon. friend, I hope will soon be settled to the satisfaction of all parties. Good reasons, excellent reasons, why the people of Canada should withdraw their confidence from those hon. gentlemen. But, Sir, there was a fourth reason which my hon. friend did not give, but which I may recall to the attention of the members of this House, namely, the disgust which all honest men of every sort and profession throughout Canada, Conservative and Reformer alike, felt at the act of treachery with which the last session of the last Parliament of Canada was heralded in. That, Sir, as hon. gentlemen right well know, was one among many reasons why the Conservative party of Canada, or a very great many of them, withdrew their confidence from those hon. gentlemen. What could they think of a government which went to the last election having within their ranks seven gentlemen who had betrayed their former colleagues and their former leader, and having carefully expurgated from their ranks every man who had been faithful to his salt? Sir, what could my hon. friend, Sir A. P. Caron, from Three Rivers, say if circumstances permitted him to give his candid opinion of these hon. gentlemen? Sir, I observe that the leader of the Opposition, in a candid moment, confessed that the result in the province of Quebec had been a great disappointment to him. Doubtless it was a great disappointment to him. I do not wonder. The hon. gentleman also told the House that he had been, for an ordinary lifetime, a member of the legislature, some four and forty years, and in all that long experience, so far as my recollection serves me—and the member for York (Mr. Foster) says it is generally tolerably accurate—this was the first occasion when he made the mistake of preferring the saints to the sinners. This was the first time the hon. gentleman ever trusted to spiritual weapons instead of to the arm of flesh. If we are to believe the hon. gentleman's statement last night, I can well believe he will never do it again. But, Sir, like the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), the hon. gentleman is capable of extracting great comfort from the electoral returns. We do not grudge it to him. I remember long ago, I think in the days of the South Sea bubble, a company was formed for the purpose of extracting sunbeams from cucumbers, but I never heard it paid any dividends. If the hon. gentleman and his friends really want the facts, I, being of an arithmetical turn of mind, can comply with his wish. The hon. gentleman was good enough to declare that they had a majority—heaven save the mark—of 19,000, no less, over the vote polled for the Liberal party at the last elections. Sir, I find that that majority, and more too, is wholly and exclusively obtained from my own province of Ontario. There the Conservative party had a majority, as they say, of 25,300 strong. How does the House suppose this majority is obtained? The majority is obtained in part by claiming for themselves all the votes recorded in favour of a well-known member of this House against whom the leader of the Opposition set up a candidate of his own: hon. gentlemen opposite claim the 4,000 or 5,000 votes accorded to the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace). I think my hon. friend will admit, being a candid-minded man, that a very large proportion of these representative votes of Liberals who most decidedly preferred him to the candidate of the hon. gentleman opposite. But that was not all: and here I come on a piece of truly excellent calculation. Sir, I find that in West Toronto, all told, 10,200

votes, or thereabouts, appear to have been polled by both parties, and of those so polled, hon. gentlemen opposite claimed 10,517. I can understand that the wisdom of the legislature may give one voter two votes, but I do not think that either by the wisdom or power of the legislature the hon. gentleman will be able to turn a man who may have two votes into two individuals; it is reserved to those who compile Conservative majorities to do that. I will give hon. gentlemen opposite a fact or two. The hon. leader of the Opposition was good enough to say that we sat here representing a minority, forsooth. The hon. gentleman arrived at that conclusion, so far as Ontario is concerned, by the trifling process of eliminating about 66,000 votes, all of which were cast at all events against the late Government, because he right well knows that the votes which were recorded for the Patron candidates, and for the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) who has just resigned his second seat, were most decidedly cast in opposition to the late Conservative Government. But here is an interesting fact, and as the hon. gentleman opposite is fond of these things, I will give it to him. There were 73 cases in Ontario in which Conservatives and Liberals stood opposed; 73 cases in which the two parties came in direct collision. What was the result? In those counties, the total Conservative vote was 149,350, and the total Liberal vote was 161,000, so where the Liberals and the Conservatives stood opposed in 73 constituencies, we had a majority of 12,000 votes. It is true there were 19 constituencies in which either Conservatives or Liberals put up no candidates. Does the hon. gentleman mean to tell the House that in those nineteen constituencies, or rather in seventeen constituencies, in which the Liberals, for good reasons of state, did not put up candidates, the Liberal party had vanished into thin air? Why, in 1891, in those seventeen constituencies (and I have the returns under my hand), the Liberal party polled well nigh 30,000 votes, and we would have polled more in 1896. If first you will deduct the Liberal vote in West York placed to the credit of the Conservative party, and place to the credit of the Conservative party the actual number of Conservative votes polled in West Toronto, and not the imaginary number which goes into the count in the memorandum I hold in my hand, and give us credit, I do not say for the vote we would have polled, but for the vote actually polled in the last election, the majority in our favour will be more like 15,000 than 5,000; and if we add together all the votes polled throughout Ontario against the Government, there were something like 227,000 votes polled against them, as compared with 191,000 votes, which they claimed, but which they did not poll. Sir, I would hardly have wasted time on this matter, because I think there are very few such tyros in political affairs as not to know what calculations of that kind mean and are worth, but for the fact that the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) saw fit to re-echo the words of his chief with respect to this matter. I am sure he is welcome to all the comfort he can extract from it, but which all the same does not, in the slightest degree, affect the fact that my hon. friend sits here with a majority of thirty-five or forty behind him, and the hon. gentleman opposite in a like minority, and that is giving the leader of the Opposition credit for the alliance which I am told was recently effected with the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), who is now, I take it, if all tales be true, the true head of the party, in place of its nominal one. One word more. Sir, that result in Ontario, let me add, was attained in the face of a gerrymander which cost, in all human probability, at least eight or ten seats at the last general elections, as it has done on many occasions before. That result was attained in spite of a Franchise Act, under which thousands of men who never should have a vote in this country were brought in, greatly to our detriment and at no small expense to hon. gentlemen opposite. But there is one curious little matter to which the hon. gentleman did not allude. I think it would be nearly correct to say that hon. gentlemen opposite have some 42 or 43 seats in Ontario, and my hon. friend beside me is likely to receive the support of 48 or 49 members from that province, if the hon. leader of the Opposition desires to know. But there is one somewhat curious fact. Of the fifty seats on the Reform side, including their friends who think with them in these matters, not even malice itself has been able to formulate against one of them a charge of holding his seat by corrupt practices.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. While on the other side of the House, out of forty-two or forty-three, or whatever the number may be, one man out of every three stands impeached before the tribunals of the country as guilty of gross corruption and bribery. When, I ask, in the annals of Parliament, was it ever known that fifty men had succeeded in gaining their seats on either side of the House from one province, and not a soul could be found to lay a charge against them?

Now, Sir, the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), aye, and the hon. leader of the Opposition, attacked—and they have a perfect right to attack, if they think proper to do so—they attacked the use which my hon. friend beside me was compelled to make of His Excellency's warrants. Sir, I do not withdraw one single syllable of the statements that I made in 1891 as to the improper use then made by hon. gentlemen opposite of the Governor General's warrants. I withdraw nothing.

I adhere to the statements I made then; but, Sir, while the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) was perfectly accurate in quoting me then, I demand, on my part, that the hon. gentleman should show that there is any possible parallelism between the case which existed then and the case which exists now. Sir, what did I condemn? What I condemned was this: I condemned the case of men who being in a Government and having the power of making provision, deliberately and of gross carelessness, as my hon. friend stated, neglected to make provision for clear and imminent expenditures, and preferred to take the course of issuing a Governor General's warrant. What is our case, Sir? Our case is this: Our case is that we succeeded a Government whose misconduct had brought about a state of things utterly unparalleled in Canadian history. Sir, my case is this: that the hon. gentlemen, in holding the last session of the last Parliament, utterly violated the entire spirit of our constitution. They offended against our unwritten law. They offended against usage, against common sense and against precedent. They did what they had not the right to do. I say, Sir, that morally, if not in a strictly technical legal sense, they had no business whatever to hold Parliament together for one moment after five years had elapsed. I never acquiesced in the doctrine, and I do not acquiesce in it now, that except in some extraordinary emergency such as never existed in their case, Parliament should be kept together for more than five years; and I take issue in the strongest possible language with the doctrine laid down by the hon. gentleman, that he had a right to ask, or that we had a right to pass estimates for six months, or for three months, and put them into the hands of a Government which we knew we could not trust, a Government which did not even pretend to represent the country, a Government which was elected on lists eight years old, and which of necessity could by no possibility pretend to represent more than a fraction of the people. I say, Sir, that we could not be called upon to put into their hands the power of remaining in office, long after the confidence of the people had been withdrawn from them. Sir, I recollect perfectly well the doctrines which were not unfrequently enunciated by the late Sir John A. Macdonald. Whatever else he may have been he was at any rate a good tactician, and an old and skilled parliamentarian. Over and over again, I have heard him—and I daresay many hon. gentlemen opposite have heard him—declaring that under no consideration would he be a party to sitting in a parliament, if he led it, which should be compelled to remain in session until such time as it dissolved by efflux of time. For that he had a good reason. I will tell hon.

gentlemen opposite what, in my judgment, they should have done. They might have felt themselves bound, under the circumstances, to have met in January, not for the purpose of hatching treason against their leader and colleague, but for the purpose of redeeming their pledge and telling us what they were going to do with the province of Manitoba. But, Sir, having met us in January, having found—as if they possessed one grain of common sense they must have seen and known—having seen that it was utterly impossible for them to hope to pass a Remedial Bill, or to hope to pass the Estimates either, it was their bounden duty to have dissolved in March at latest. It was their bounden duty to have gone to the country in April. It was their special duty to have seen to it that Parliament should meet at a sufficiently early period in May or June, so as to avoid this complication, and to have given time for those who possessed the confidence of the people to bring down proper Estimates for the year 1896-97. Sir, it was by reason of their gross violation of the usages of the constitution, by reason of their indecent clinging to office, by reason of their paltry intrigues, by reason of their cowardly and incapable handling of the Manitoba question, that it became necessary for us, under the circumstances which the hon. gentleman knows of, to obtain these Governor General's warrants, and to procure the means of carrying on the Government of this country. I would like to know, Sir, what the hon. gentleman would have us do? Would the hon. gentleman have desired that we who have grave responsibilities on our hands, would he have it that the Government of Canada, which has to conduct extensive business in railways and on canals, and which has to maintain a permanent force; would he have desired that we should have refused to pay our railway employees, or our canal employees, or the members of our permanent force, or even the poor clerks in these offices. Was that what he would have desired? And does he pretend to charge it as a crime against us that we provided, under those circumstances, for the carrying on of the public services, and avoided great injury to the various great interests which would have been hampered had we refused to ask for a Governor General's warrant. I dare say, if my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) had chosen to dodge this issue, he could have obtained from some of the banks which deal with the Government and which receive the public moneys; he could have obtained in a roundabout and in a surreptitious way as much money as he obtained by Governor General's warrant. But, Sir, considering the question fully, we thought that this was a cowardly way of dealing with the difficulty. We thought it was our duty to face it boldly, and I have authority quite as good, from a legal point of view, as any that sits behind the hon. gentleman from York (Mr. Foster), for saying that what we did was well within the scope of the Act, and that it did come within the words "a grant of sums of money which had not been foreseen or provided for by Parliament." I will grant, Sir, that in all human probability it never entered into the consideration of the framers of that Act, or of any other Canadian Act, that ever there would be a Government or a Parliament so lost to good sense and propriety, that they would continue to sit in office until Parliament dissolved by efflux of time. Sir, they were the leaders of the only Canadian Parliament that ever did it, and I trust most devotedly that they will prove to be the last. Now, Sir, I say that so far as that goes, the hon. gentleman is responsible. He is specially responsible, and his colleagues are likewise responsible, for all the evil consequences or bad precedents that may have arisen in this matter. I say more, Sir, that he has no right to hold us responsible for anything in the Governor General's warrant unless he is able to show that we have used them for a purpose which we could fairly have dispensed with. Now, when he talked of our having asked for a million dollars and only spent $600,000, the hon. gentleman was as well aware as I am, that our Auditor General, as a matter of course, is not in the habit of passing all the cheques that are sent to him unless full investigation has been made. I have no doubt, and the hon. gentleman himself has no doubt, that the full sum that was asked will be expended, and will be properly employed in the payment of the various services that have been incurred.

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend will allow me, I will say that the note appended to the return brought down gives the reason exactly as I have stated it, namely, that the estimates of the departments were greater than the requirements.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I do not think they will be found to be greater than the requirements when all the accounts come in. The hon. gentleman, as an old Minister of Finance, can well understand that there are every quarter a number of contracts—take for illustration the post office contracts—which have to be met, and he knows very well that in every case some considerable length of time must elapse, and does elapse after these sums have been asked for and checked out, before the Auditor General is perfectly satisfied with the validity of the payment. He knows that that is a matter of common occurrence. You have only to look at our annual statement of receipts and expenditure to see that month after month the expenditure appears to lag far behind the receipts, for the reason I have stated, and it is scarcely possible for the Auditor General, with all the diligence that can be used, to be at once satisfied as to the propriety of these payments. In that and in nothing else will be found a fair and sufficient reason for the discrepancy to which I have alluded. But when the hon. gentleman reads us on this side of the House a lecture because we refused to grant the supplies he asked for, all I have to tell him is that if ever there was an occasion on which our clearest duty was to refuse to grant supplies, it was in the session that terminated on the 23rd of April last. We had, I repeat, as clear presumptive evidence as was ever given or could be given, that hon. gentlemen opposite did not represent in any sense or shape the people of the country. For that reason we were justified; and, what is more, English precedent fully maintained us, as the hon. gentleman well knows, in refusing to comply with his request.

After Recess.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Mr. Speaker, there is an old adage that it is well not to prophesy unless you know, and I think my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) would have done as well not to intimate to us that he had just returned from a county and a contest in which a certain hon. member of this Government was fighting for his life. It will give him pleasure, I do not doubt, to know that his old-time acquaintance, if he did fight for his life, made a good fight for it, for the latest returns handed to me by the telegraph office show a net majority for the Hon. Mr. Blair of 550. It cannot be an instance of French domination, but I am afraid it is an instance of maritime domination, that my poor friend, Mr. Paterson, has to be content in North Grey with a paltry 413. This, Sir, will give our friends opposite the opportunity of doing a little revising of their calculation of majorities.

And now, Sir, there remain, so far as I am aware, three charges preferred severally by my hon. friend from York and by the hon. leader of the Opposition to be disposed of. With one of these I have dealt in part. These hon. gentlemen contend that we had no right, no matter what the exigencies of the state might be, to have recourse to the provision in the statute for the issue of a Governor General's warrant. They were both greatly exercised as to the shuffling policy pursued by my hon. friend with regard to Manitoba—as to which, as I see that my hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Taylor) is in his place, I shall have something more to say before I close this speech. In the next place, they are still more exercised because we do not instantly bring down a tariff to change every item of something like the thousand separate taxes which they put on in the course of the last few years. Sir, the hon. member for York took it upon himself to declare—I took down his words—that there was no need for us to call Parliament together, because, forsooth, by the free use of Governor General's warrants we might continue to administer the affairs of this country pretty much as long as we pleased. Sir, we do not so read our duty to the country, and I say that this Government did its duty in both respects. This Government is charged with seeing that the commonwealth take no injury in their hands, and in pursuance of their duty they assumed the responsibility, for which they are prepared to answer to this Parliament whenever hon. gentlemen choose to challenge us, to advise His Excellency to issue warrants for necessary purposes, and necessary purposes alone, such as the needs of the country imperatively required. Sir, that was our duty, in the first place; but it was our duty, in the second place, the moment that was done, not to lose one hour in calling Parliament together, and in explaining to them the reasons why we had ventured so to advise His Excellency. Sir, this whole question lies in a nutshell, and the hon. gentleman knows it well. The question is not, as he would have it, whether or not it was advisable under ordinary circumstances to issue these warrants. The question is this: had the late Government a right to hold the House together until the very last legal instant? And on that question I say, as I said before, that usage, precedent and common sense are all alike dead against hon. gentlemen opposite. Sir, the late Government had no right whatever under the circumstances to keep Parliament in session till so late a period that it was impossible to appeal to the people, impossible to have an election, and impossible for the new Parliament to meet in time to vote the supplies. Above all, under the circumstances, they had not the least right to ask to be trusted with the expenditure of the supplies for the future year. They had in no sense the right to say that they represented the people of Canada. As I pointed out during the course of last session time and time again—and no man on that side of the House pretended to answer my argument—that Parliament was elected on lists eight years old, and it was a physical impossibility, therefore, that it could represent the people of Canada. More than that, the whole current of the by-elections then, like the whole current of the by-elections now—and there had been a very considerable number of them, as the hon. gentlemen well know, during the few months that preceded the close of the late Parliament—went to show, in the clearest possible manner, that if hon. gentlemen opposite had ever possessed the confidence of the country, they had long since forfeited it. That being so, these gentlemen having stood on their extreme legal right in keeping Parliament together until it was dissolved by the flux of time, their duty was plain and clear, their bounded duty was to have dissolved the late Parliament in good time. Their duty was to have dissolved Parliament at such date that the elections could have been held in time to enable the new Parliament to have voted the supplies for the fiscal year. They refused to do that, for reasons best known to themselves, and which I need not discuss now. They compelled us to invoke the only means known to the constitution, in order to prevent grave injury being done to great public interests from one end of the Dominion to the other. I challenge the hon. leader of the Opposition, I challenge his lieutenants to show that we have expended under the Governor General's warrant, one cent or one penny more than we were compelled to expend for the purposes of the public service. Nor have we spent one cent or one penny more than those hon. gentlemen themselves declared to Parliament was necessary for the public service. We have acted absolutely and entirely within the estimates for which those hon. gentlemen were responsible, which they laid on the Table of Parliament, which they introduced here by a Message from His Excellency, signed by himself. It does not lie in their mouths, who created this necessity, to censure us because, under the necessity that had been created, we acted entirely within the lines they laid down. We took upon ourselves, with a due sense of the responsibility, and after having obtained the best legal advice within our reach, to act on what we conceived to be the true intent and spirit of the Audit Act with regard to just such cases, and just such expenditures as have now been laid before you. More, Sir, the country was well aware of what we were doing. The country knew perfectly well—and it was no fault of the hon. gentleman if it did not—what we had done in refusing to assist in passing the Estimates which these hon. gentlemen had brought down. The country emphatically endorsed our action. The people endorsed it before and have endorsed it since. The country understood just as well as we did, the country's instincts were, as they generally are, perfectly right, and it understood the great peril which would have ensued had we placed in the hands of men who had forfeited the confidence of the people, the power of sitting here for a year, which they would have possessed, had we voted these Estimates as they requested.

Now I come to another interesting question. I come to the charge solemnly preferred by these consistent gentlemen, solemnly preferred by the leader of the Opposition, solemnly preferred by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) against my hon. friend—the charge that he has shuffled in his policy with respect to Manitoba. On what is that charge based? Why, it is based on this, that my hon. friend has not seen fit, up to the present time, to issue a commission for the purpose of investigating the state of things in Manitoba. Now, let me ask, under what conditions did my hon. friend propose to issue this commission? For what end, and for what purpose was it to be issued? Again and again, it is in the recollection of this honourable House, and at any rate of those members who sat here before, my hon. friend declared that his policy was conciliation and negotiation. Only in the event of conciliation and negotiation failing would it be necessary to issue a commission for the purpose of ascertaining on what terms the two communities could agree. But, I repeat, that if there was one charge more than another which my hon. friend brought against the late Government, and rightly and properly brought against them, it was the charge that they had acted discourteously and arbitrarily towards Manitoba, that they had not attempted to consult the Manitoba government, that they had rushed to the extreme remedy which the law gave, without the common courtesy of hearing what the government of Manitoba might have to adduce. Have they forgotten that my hon. friend (Mr. McCarthy), who acted as the counsel for Manitoba, pleaded before them in vain for a delay of a week or ten days in order to enable the members of the Manitoba government to come down and be heard in person? Have they forgotten the indecent haste with which they rushed into that controversy, and have they forgotten that it was on those grounds, as much as on any other, that my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Laurier) condemned their action? But what was those gentlemen's policy? Ours, they say, was a Janus, a double-faced policy, but what of the policy of the hon. leader of the Opposition? What of the policy of his trusted friend and whip (Mr. Taylor), whom I now have the pleasure of seeing in his place. My hon. friend beside me last night—the hon. member for Leeds not being present at that time—took occasion to quote from the late ministerial papers, the organs of those hon. gentlemen, a certain remarkable statement made by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor), to whom I now give the opportunity, if he pleases, of withdrawing or modifying it, if he has anything to say. The statement which my hon. friend then made was that the hon. member for Leeds declared to the electors of North Grey that he had been sent up there to announce that remedial legislation was no more a part of the Conservative policy or platform. He announced further that he had been sent up there to announce that if they voted for Mr. Pater-son, they voted for Quebec domination. Now, I would like to know if those newspaper reports fairly and correctly represent the declaration made by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would just like to ask the hon. gentleman from what paper he read these statements. I have failed to see them ; but to put myself right before this House and the country, I just wish to say this, that I made no statement in North Grey or elsewhere that I had been sent up there by my leader to make any announcement. My hon. leader asked me to meet him in Toronto on Friday. When I got to Toronto, I received a telegram from him stating that he could not be there to meet a deputation from Owen Sound. The deputation invited me to go up and be present at the nomination. I was there, but my leader did not know that I had gone. As to French domination, while there I did make a statement to this effect. I said that, so far as the Manitoba School question was concerned, it was now for hon. gentlemen opposite to deal with it, that the country had pronounced against it, so far as the Conservative party was concerned, and that it was not our policy further than to hand it over to our successors in office to deal with. I made no statement for myself or anybody else, and the only reference I made to French domination was this : I said that the present leader of the Government, in apportioning the portfolios had, I thought, dealt unfairly with the province of Ontario. In the Government of to-day, Ontario had five seats and Quebec had seven. I said that in the late Government, we had one of the large spending departments, the Department of Railways and Canals.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has proceeded for a considerable time entirely out of order.

Mr. TAYLOR. I want to make an explanation. The hon. gentleman has charged me with making a certain statement, as reported in the newspapers. I want to say that if the newspapers have reported me as saying otherwise than what I am now saying, they have misreported me. I have not read them. I want now to state what I did say about French domination, and if my statement be wrong, let the hon. member criticise it. The "Globe" misrepresented me, and, in speaking there on the second occasion, I challenged the "Globe" or anybody else to contradict the statement. And I challenge gentlemen opposite now to deny that statement. In the late Government we had the Department of Railways and Canals, one of the largest spending departments. That was taken away from us and was given to the Maritime provinces. We had the Department of Agriculture, and, as Ontario is the largest agricultural province in the Dominion, I think she was entitled to it. But that was taken away from us and was given to Quebec. Now we have four representatives—the Minister of Justice, who has not a spending department, two of the tax collectors, the Controller of Customs and the Postmaster General who sells postage stamps, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce who has not a spending department. The province of Quebec have six members of the Cabinet and one member of the Government without a seat in the Cabinet. I thought Quebec had more than its fair share and I said so. The statement I made as to the numbers was correct, and my hon. friend cannot contradict it. I did not say anything more about French domination than that. I thought the hon. leader of the Government had dealt unfairly with the province of Ontario, and I think so still.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Here, Sir, is what the hon. gentleman is reported to have said, and I leave it to him, of course accepting what he has stated, to give any requisite corrections :

Mr. Taylor said that the circumstances of this campaign were different from the last, as the Remedial Bill was no longer a part of the Conservatives' policy. Sir Charles Tupper had sent word by him to this effect to the electors of North Grey, that good feeling had now been restored between Sir Charles and N. Clarke Wallace—

Does that extend to the other members of the late Government also ?

—and the other anti-remedial Conservatives. He said it was an insult to the intelligence of North Grey——Which the hon. gentleman will see they have resented——for Mr. Laurier to attempt to palm off in this riding a Minister who was defeated at home, and who did not own a cent here. A vote for Mr. Paterson would mean a vote for the domination of Quebec.

That, I am informed, is from the "Evening Journal" and it has appeared. I am assured, in a very large number of Conservative papers. The hon. gentleman, no doubt, will have influence enough to have any necessary corrections made.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that the "Evening Journal" of Ottawa ?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Yes. And it appeared in many other newspapers as well. Well, Sir, it is satisfactory to find that the hon. leader of the Opposition and his whip can dwell together in harmony. We were afraid last night that the relations were likely to become a little strained, but it is satisfactory now to find that they understand each other. Sir, I think I am not going very far when I say that the plain truth of this whole matter, so far as the policy of the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) is concerned is that, with characteristic audacity, the hon. leader of the Opposition made a very bold bid for the Catholic vote throughout the Dominion. Unfortunately for him the Catholic vote was not for sale. I do not wonder at the disgust of the speculative purchaser to find that even so good a bid met with no response. Sir, the hon. gentleman is wroth and his valliant whip is wroth with the province of Quebec. And why ?

Because the people of Quebec have shown—to their everlasting honour be it said—that they have minds and wills of their own; because the people of Quebec rallied round their chosen leader, a man who does honour to them as well as to the whole community of Canada; because the people of Quebec chose to refuse to listen to sectional appeals, chose to show that in a great crisis in the history of this country they were determined to rise superior to all these appeals, and because they have on this occasion led the van of the Liberal movement to assert the right of the people to chose men whom they can trust and respect, for their leaders throughout this Dominion.

Now, Sir, with respect to the other charge preferred so energetically by the hon. member from York (Mr. Foster). That hon. gentleman demands why we, installed in office just one month ago, having but partly completed our Cabinet—to say the truth, not having quite completed our Cabinet—having, most of us, returned within ten days or a fortnight from our re-election after being sworn in as Ministers of the Crown, do not instantly bring down a tariff which is likely to affect, as he well knows, very numerous and important changes in the fiscal system of this country. Was ever a more childish criticism offered, was ever a more childish complaint made? And, Sir, it is doubly so in the case of the hon. member for York himself. Has he forgotten, has this House forgotten, how, two or three years ago when it became expedient to make some trifling changes in the existing tariff, that hon. gentleman and his two Controllers required to perambulate the whole Dominion for an entire year, required to hold conference with all sorts and conditions of men, and how after a whole year's work, though they did propose some changes, they practically accomplished nothing. The total result of the hon. gentleman's changes, I think, amounted to one-fortieth of one per cent of the whole tariff. And this is the gentleman who considers that we are acting without due respect to the House, without due regard to our own promises, without due regard to the interests of the country, forsooth, because we ask a mere four or five months before we proceed to deal with questions of the greatest magnitude and importance affecting every single living soul from one end of the country to the other. In a case like this I do not mean to excuse ourselves for delay. I say it is our duty to take time; I say it is the duty of my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) and his colleagues to take all the time they require in order to produce a well-considered tariff suitable to the various needs of the people of this country. Why, Sir, in the first place the hon. gentleman himself a Finance Minister of many years' standing, will admit that my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Fielding) has a right to know, before he prepares his Budget, before he brings down his tariff speech and the changes it is proposed to make, what amount of money is needed for the wants of the country. And surely his colleagues, installed in office within the last ten or twelve days, may be allowed two or three months at least to prepare their Estimates, to see what savings can be effected, to ascertain what sum is actually required for the various departments over which they preside. More, Sir, the hon. gentleman knows, and every business man knows right well, that there is need of more time and more consideration when you are making reductions in the tariff than when you are making additions to it. When you make additions to a tariff, for the moment at any rate, you do not create any very great disturbance. You add, for the most part, to the value of the goods on the merchant's shelves. You may do a very great deal of mischief, as these gentlemen have done a very great deal of mischief. But that is of slow and gradual growth and increases year by year. I am sorry to say, but it does not involve any great immediate disturbance. The mischief, as I have stated, comes later. But, in the reverse case, to which I am now alluding, the hon. gentleman knows perfectly well, that however salutary the reductions affected may prove to be in the long run—as they will prove very salutary in the long run—I have never contended, no man on this side has ever contended, no man who knows anything of the business conditions of the country will contend that there is not for the moment a disturbance. And for that very reason there is double and treble need that the whole matter shall be considered fully, so that when my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) does bring down his tariff, it may be complete so that there may be no need of those incessant changes in the tariff or those incessant demands for change which have been made from time to time under the policy of gentlemen opposite. Sir, if the hon. gentleman knows, and I suppose he does, the huge number of taxes which he and his colleagues have heaped up on the people of this country—I think they amount in all to very close on a thousand different items—and he will understand, and ought not to complain, therefore, of our delay in bringing down a tariff. He will understand that it is absolutely and imperatively necessary that anybody who has charge of that complicated and difficult task, should have a reasonable time assigned to him. For my part I know something, as well as the hon. gentleman, of the temper of the people of this country; I know something at any rate of the way in which these matters are looked at by commercial and banking circles, and I do not see for my part, nor do I hear from those who are best qualified to speak with authority on that subject, any of these complaints, any of these fears, any of these alarms, of which the hon. gentleman has made himself the mouthpiece and exponent to-night. Apparently the business community have more confidence than the hon. gentleman has in the present Government, and are well content to wait the reasonable leisure of this Government in dealing with this question. Now, Sir, to return for one moment to my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. That hon. gentleman, as I have stated on many occasions, is a bold man, a very bold man, but I do not think he ever gave this House, or he ever gave the country, a greater specimen of his magnificent audacity than when he rose last night and solemnly claimed David A. Wells as an advocate of the fiscal policy which he and his friends introduced into Canada. Sir, I will recall his statement. He declared that under the ægis of the National Policy, Canada had passed successfully and triumphantly through a cyclone of disaster—if I recollect his words aright—which had tested the institutions of the United States to their very foundation; and he appealed to David A. Wells to testify to the truth of his statement, and most certainly, by inference, if not in so many words, did he allege that David A. Wells had declared in an article in the "Forum" that it was to its fiscal policy, to its National Policy, that Canada owed its exemption from this catastrophe which overtook the United States.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to correct him. He is entirely misstating what occurred. I stated the opinion I held that Canada owed to the National Policy the position which Mr. Wells had so favourably contrasted with that of the United States, and I gave Mr. Wells's statement in his own words, as taken from the "Forum."

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Exactly, as applied to the National Policy.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, no; I did not say that Mr. Wells had any reference whatever to the National Policy, but I said that under the ægis of the National Policy the condition of Canada was such as to draw the following contrast from an eminent statistician in the United States, and I gave his words.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. And implied, if words mean anything, that David A. Wells was his witness, and an advocate of the National Policy which had brought about these results.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not at all.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. If the hon. gentleman did not mean that, his quotation was utterly pointless. Sir, the fact of the matter, I suspect, is this, that twenty-four hours have elapsed since, and probably the hon. gentleman, seeing I had sent for the "Forum," has taken the trouble to look up the article which he had not read when he made the quotation. And I may observe that in reading a quotation from a scrap-book, it is a dangerous thing to take a chance sentence out of an article without knowing what that article is about, or without looking at the context. Now, I will tell the hon. gentleman what Mr. Wells was talking about, and what he was driving at. Here is the next preceding sentence used by Mr. Wells :

In the first place the immediate and principal cause—

Of the troubles in the United States, that is,

—was beyond all question a distrust of the very foundation on which the whole superstructure of trade and credit of the country rests, namely, its currency.

What Mr. Wells referred to was the superiority of the Canadian banking system over that of the United States. That is what the sentence which is quoted from Mr. Wells means, that and nothing else. He will see that Mr. Wells condemns in the same manner that I have condemned, the ignorance of political economy which led the American people to imagine that they could make themselves rich by doubling and trebling their taxes.

However, Sir, it is not with Mr. Wells, or with any misquotations of Mr. Wells, that I desired more particularly to deal. I think those in this House, and they are many, who have perused Mr. Wells's works and treatises, know perfectly well that the last thing he is likely to say is to praise the protective system of Canada, unless, peradventure, he might say that the system of his own country was a trifle worse, which it is theoretically, although the hon. gentleman and his friends will do well to bear in mind that while the United States may have, as to other nations, a higher tariff than ourselves, they have within themselves a thing which modifies its evil influences enormously, and that is the most perfect system of free trade among the numerous states which compose that nation, which exists on the face of the earth. But, Sir, as I said, this was not after all the worst of the crimes which the hon. gentleman has laid to the charge of my hon. friend beside me. Sir, what is the Prime Minister's chiefest fault, and chiefest crime? What is that offence he has committed for which, according to the hon. member for York, there can be no forgiveness and no redemption in this world, nor yet in that which is to come? Why, Sir, I shudder to say it, the Prime Minister of Canada has dared to state that he for his part felt sincere good-will towards the people of the United States. He has further dared—treasonably, apparently, according to the hon. member for York—he has dared treasonably to hint at a policy which might, if carried out to a successful completion, bring great benefit to a great number of the people of both countries. Sir, these are the grievous crimes, and the grievous errors my hon. friend has to answer for. But there is worse behind. Why, Sir, my hon. friend is so lost to all sense of propriety and shame that he dared to suggest that in other times hon. gentlemen opposite had not always been overfriendly towards the Government and people of the United States; and the leader of the Opposition charged him, with great emphasis, with having dared—I took down his words—to charge a great party with hostility to the United States, which he intimated was an extremely grave offence. Mr. Speaker, it strikes me that I have heard an hon. gentleman, who may be nameless now, charge a still greater party than the party which he leads, with a still worse crime, with that of disloyalty to the Empire of which we form a part. I think that charge was made and repeated by him, and his organs, and his followers, from one end of the country to the other; and I have grave reason to know that he abused his place as High Commissioner in England to the detriment of the party which now controls the destinies of Canada. Sir, were it my disposition, it would be an extremely easy task for me—because I am tolerably well acquainted with the history of this country, with the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite, and with the negotiations which have taken place between Canada and the United States for this many a day—it would be an easy task for me to substantiate, and much more than substantiate, all that my hon. friend hinted as to the very dubious relations which prevailed between them and the people of the United States for a good many years past. Sir, did I choose to recall the history of the negotiations at Washington, did I choose to recall the reception which was given to the propositions made thrice over in this House in 1888 and 1889 and 1890 by members of the Liberal party tending to the negotiation of a reciprocity treaty with the United States, did I choose to ransack their press as hon. gentlemen opposite have ransacked ours, did I choose to collect together all the language of their leaders with respect to the institutions and people of the United States, I could present an array of evidence which would go extremely far to show how very mild and gentle was the statement made by my hon. friend. But, Mr. Speaker, I do not choose to do that. I am willing to let bygones be bygones in that respect. I do not think I would advance the interests of Canada at the present moment if I were to recall all the language that political exigencies induced those hon. gentlemen, and in particular induced the leader of the Opposition to use towards the Liberal party of Canada with respect to our desire to cultivate amity and good-will with the United States. Sir, I am going to point out to the hon. gentleman, I hope not altogether in vain, because I am aware that in his better days and in his better mood he himself has appreciated the situation, to some extent at least, the enormous importance and the enormous desirability of cultivating friendly relations with the United States. I have not forgotten, any more than has the hon. gentleman, the language which he used in this House when advocating the passage of the Fisheries Act, in 1888. I remember right well, as does the hon. gentleman, how, on that occasion, he pointed out in somewhat strong language, that the indiscretion of his colleagues had brought about a state of things between Canada and the United States, which, as he said himself, meant commercial war within twenty-four hours, and he went on to add, that from commercial war to actual war, the distance is but a step. Sir, I say there is a more excellent way. The friendship of the United States is most valuable to Canada, it is a thing to be striven for and cultivated by all fair and honourable means. I say more. I have said long and I have said it often, I have said it on the hustings, I have said it in this House, I have said it to English Cabinet ministers, I have said it in English public assemblies, and I shall not hesitate to repeat it wherever and in whatever situation I find myself, that the friendship of the United States is not only most valuable to Canada, but most valuable to the British Empire at large. I say the truest statesmanship which any Canadian statesman can show is, I repeat, to cultivate by all possible fair and honourable means, the friendship of our kinsmen, the people of the United States. No nobler task lies before us, and if that is all the charge that can be preferred against my hon. friend, it is one in which he may well glory, and his friends may glory too. The hon. gentleman denounces my hon. friend because his utterances seem to show a great desire to cultivate the good-will of the people of the United States. Pray, has the hon. gentleman read the recent utterances of a man who, I suppose, he will admit to be in titular rank higher than himself, the Prime Minister of England, Lord Salisbury, with respect to this same vexed and disputed Venezuelan question? Has he still more had his attention called to the very recent utterance of a very distinguished English visitor to America, the Chief Justice of England, Lord Russell? Why, Sir, the language used by Lord Russell is almost exactly in spirit, if not in letter, an echo of the words used by my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Laurier), and I shall not hesitate to give the House an exact transcript of what Lord Russell said, speaking with authority, speaking practically as an envoy from the people of Great Britain to the people of the United States. Here is what Lord Russell thought fit to say:

Mr. President, I began by speaking of the two great divisions—American and British—of that English-speaking world which you and I represent to-day, and with one more reference to them I end.

Who can doubt the influence they possess for ensuring the healthy progress and peace of mankind? But if this influence is to be fully felt, they must work together in cordial friendship, each people in its own sphere of action. If they have great power, they have also great responsibility. No cause they espouse can fail; no cause they oppose can triumph. The future is, in large part, theirs. They have the making of history in times that are to come. The greatest calamity that could befall would be strife which should divide them.

Let us pray that this shall never be. Let us pray that they, always self-respecting, each in honour upholding its own flag, safeguarding its own heritage of right and respecting the rights of others, each in its own way fulfilling its high national destiny, shall yet work in harmony for the progress and peace of the world.

Sir, these words are as eloquent as they are wise. I commend them to the careful consideration of hon. gentlemen opposite, to the careful consideration of the people of Canada, the people of the United States, and the people of England, and I say that in spirit, if not in letter, these words represent exactly the sentiments to which my hon. friend gave utterance, and which hon. gentlemen opposite see fit so loudly to condemn.

Mr. IVES. Mr. Speaker, the leader of the Government in the course of his speech upon this question, favoured us with what he calls the three reasons for the victory of the Liberal party at the late general election. He said that the first reason was a fixed feeling that the fiscal policy of the late Government had failed to fulfil the expectations of the people; second, that the Government had been extravagant and corrupt; and, third, that instead of appealing to the better judgment of the people, we had appealed to sectional feelings. I shall, in a few minutes, add some further reasons of my own to account for the victory which the hon. gentleman and his party achieved, but, before doing so, I desire to refer to the three reasons which the hon. gentleman has given. So far as the first is concerned, that the fiscal policy of the late Government had failed to fulfil the expectations of the people, I desire to state before this House in the most positive manner from my own experience of the contest in the province of Quebec that such could not have been a reason for the success of the hon. gentleman opposite. The reason I give is this: That the success which the hon. gentleman obtained in the commercial centres of the province of Quebec was not obtained because of dissatisfaction with our fiscal policy, but because of the most distinct and positive pledge given, not only by the hon. gentleman himself, but by all his lieutenants and his assistants, publicly and privately, in season and out of season, day and night, that if he succeeded in being returned to power, the fiscal system of the country now existing would not be seriously disturbed or interfered with. How can the hon. gentleman, who day after day has been going around among the manufacturers and merchants of the city of Montreal whispering in their ears that they need not be afraid of him; how can he now have the audacity to stand up here before this new Parliament of Canada, and ascribe to the fiscal policy and its unpopularity the reason why he succeeded in the election. Why, Sir, one of the first steps he had to take when the battle commenced, was to put the hon. gentleman who last spoke (Sir Richard Cartwright) in leash. The hon. gentleman who last spoke (Sir Richard Cartwright), because of the experience which the people of Canada had of him from 1873 to 1878, was the bete noir of every merchant and manufacturer in the Dominion of Canada. If they had not been satisfied, if they had not been thoroughly convinced that the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) would not be Minister of Finance, and would not be in control of the fiscal policy of any new administration that would be formed, then the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) never could have succeeded in carrying the country or in carrying the commercial centres in the province of Quebec. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman from Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was so effectually put in leash, that during this great struggle, when every public man in Canada but himself was on the platform and on the stump educating the people as to his particular views, that gentleman above all others, notwithstanding his great ability, was quietly enjoying the seclusion of his own private house and was not heard on a platform in the country. At the last moment, during the last two or three days of the contest, when it was thought safe to allow the hon. member for Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) to speak, he went out and spoke in three or four of the adjoining counties, and the result was that in every constituency in which he spoke my hon. friends on this side of the House obtained a victory. Not only that, Sir; not only were the elections carried on the popularity of the fiscal policy, by the party opposite adopting it, and by their promising not to disturb it; but since the election the hon. the leader of the Government and his friends, have sought to prevent a financial crash and a repetition in Canada of the unfortunate financial crisis which took place in the United States, by promising emphatically that they would not interfere with the protective features of the tariff, and that in anything they did, they would proceed cautiously and not precipitately. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, I think with considerable reason says, it can hardly be expected that the Government should be ready at the present moment with a general tariff scheme. I admit that. I admit it if that general tariff scheme is to be in the nature of a protective scheme, but if their scheme is to be the removal of every vestige of protection, as the hon. gentleman has promised, if it is to be a free trade scheme, or a scheme of a tariff for revenue only, then what is the necessity for time or for consideration? A level duty of 20 per cent, or 22½ per cent or 25 per cent upon all articles irrespective of whether they are produced in the country or not, could be easily passed. One page of a Bill would carry into effect in the most perfect manner the ideas of tariff which the hon. member for Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has advocated, and I presume still advocates.

My hon. friend from York, N.B. (Mr. Foster) having referred to the fact that several gentlemen from the local governments had been brought in to the Federal Ministry to the exclusion of some old members of the late House who had been faithful supporters of the Liberal party, was answered by my hon. friend from Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) with this statement: that the hon. leader of the Government, if he could find better men than these old stagers, surely ought to be allowed to take them. Well, the hon. the leader of the Government thought he could find a better Finance Minister in the Premier of one of the provinces, and he took him, and I think it is an evidence that the little snubbing that the hon. gentleman from Oxford has had has improved his temper, when we find him so ready to confess that a better man was found to take the place expected.

But, surely something might be done with regard to the tariff this session. I will not occupy the time of the House in referring to the matters which my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) referred to, such as the duties on flour and coal. But there is one subject upon which the Government might at all events act with unanimity and with promptness. There is one article that we heard about on every platform in the Dominion, one tax which was referred to universally as being entirely without justification. I speak of the duty on coal oil. Pray, what is to prevent a short Bill being introduced at the present session to reduce, or to remove altogether, the duty upon coal oil. I think I can tell what will prevent it? I think the two gentlemen who represent the county of Lambton will prevent it, and I venture to say that this free trade Government, this Government for a tariff for revenue only will never seriously interfere with the coal oil industry of the county of Lambton, either in this session or the next session. The hon. the leader of the Government gave as one reason for the result of the election, that sectional feelings had been appealed to by us, especially in the province of Quebec, and he told us that there had been an earthquake all over this broad Dominion, and that we had as yet failed to appreciate its causes. Sir, as my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) showed conclusively to-day, that earthquake or landslide or whatever it might be termed, was confined to the single province of Quebec, and I believe that the extent of that landslide or earthquake, is the best possible explanation, and the best possible answer to the question as to who had appealed successfully to sectional feelings or racial considerations. Sir, the province of Quebec had been up to the present general elections, the bulwark of Conservatism. The province of Quebec before confederation was the stronghold of Sir George Etienne Cartier and of the Conservative party. The province of Quebec, ever since then, has been the banner Conservative province of the Dominion. Never has anything like a substantial majority been obtained before by the Liberal party in the province of Quebec. What do we find now? We find not only the hon. gentleman's majority in the House, but more than his whole majority, coming from the province of Quebec. What has produced that tremendous change? What has brought about that great revolution? Was it appeals to racial and religious prejudices by us, who won only fifteen seats in the province of Quebec, or was it an appeal by the hon. gentleman, and more particularly by his friends and lieutenants in the province of Quebec? Nothing could more clearly establish who has been guilty of these appeals than the result itself. Why, Sir, what was the plan of campaign of the hon. gentleman and his friends in the province of Quebec? The plan of campaign was this: First, to satisfy and to remove the religious scruples of the people of that province upon the question of the Manitoba schools. That was done by taking in one hand the mandament, which simply stated that candidates favouring remedial legislation were alone to receive support, and taking in the other hand a pledge of the most strong and binding description made by every candidate, that he would support a Remedial Bill, no matter who introduced it, or from which side of the House it emanated. Thus were the scruples of the people removed. Thus did the hon. gentleman and his lieutenants pave the way for the action of the clergy in his favour in the province of Quebec, and having secured that result, having secured the support of nearly all the Liberal clergymen—I am using the word Liberal in the sense of Rouge—then the appeal to national feeling was made upon a ground that was ripe for the harvest. Sir, the argument that carried the province of Quebec in the last two or three days may be summed up in the six words: "Hurrah for Laurier, one of ourselves." That was the potent argument, and that is the explanation of the extraordinary results which occurred in the province of Quebec.

But there were some other reasons besides this appeal to help to secure a French Canadian Prime Minister, and besides the promise that Sir Richard Cartwright should not be Finance Minister. There was another and a remarkably potent reason; that was the most lavish, the most corrupt, the most abominable expenditure of money in the constituencies that has ever occurred in that province.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. IVES. Why, Mr. Speaker, talk about sixteen to one in the United States; here was a case of ten thousand to one. Here was a case of making money cheaper than any silverite who follows Mr. Bryan ever dreamed of. Here was Confederate money bought at 15 cents a bushel, and used in all the counties of the Quebec district to purchase votes.

Mr. FOSTER. Used at its face value?

Mr. IVES. At its face value, and they could afford to give very large bills. Nothing but fifties, I believe, were used on this occasion. But that is not all. There was a case in the province of Quebec where coupon tickets were adopted. The first coupon was for so much, which the voter was to get for voting for the candidate; the second was for so much if Mr. Laurier should be returned to power; and the third was for another five dollars if the candidate should become a member of Mr. Laurier's Cabinet. The coupon system was successfully adopted and carried out in one of the counties of the province of Quebec.

An hon. MEMBER. Where?

Mr. IVES. Give me a committee and I will show you that.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name.

Mr. IVES. On this question of the Governor General's warrants, to which my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) referred, I am glad that he did not undertake fully to justify the course which the Government has taken. He tried to get round the whole question by saying that the money was necessary—that not a cent of it was expended except for necessary purposes. He even went so far as to take for his justification the fact, which he alleged, that an estimate had been brought down by the late Government, and that nothing had been paid out except what had been recommended to the House by the late Government. But he failed, and I do not wonder that a gentleman of his parliamentary experience, a gentleman who held the position which he held in Mr. Mackenzie's Administration, should have failed completely to say squarely that he considered that these warrants had been legally issued—that they had been issued in accordance with the spirit or the letter of the law, or could possibly be justified. Sir, what are the conditions which, under the Audit Act, justify the issue of these warrants, and what is the general principle upon which public money is expended? Every one knows that the general principle upon which public money is expended is that not a dollar shall be paid out that has not been voted by the people's representatives in this House. If the Governor General and the Cabinet, and the leading members of the Opposition, or the whole Opposition, and the whole Senate added, were to concur in an expenditure, it would not be any the more legal. The principle underlying the whole matter is that the public expenditure is to be entirely within the control of the House of Commons of Canada. There is just one exception, and what is that exception? That exception is: first, that Governor General's warrants may be issued if Parliament is not in session, if the expenditure was unforeseen and not provided for.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Or not provided for.

Mr. IVES. And not provided for.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). The hon. gentleman surely does not wish to misread that. Will he say which word is correct?

Mr. IVES. Not foreseen or provided for. That means that the expenditure must have been both unforeseen and not provided for. It would be senseless to say that it could be provided for if it had not been foreseen. Its having been foreseen does not authorize the Governor General's warrant to issue; it must be both unforeseen and unprovided for. It must also be urgently and immediately required. Now, it is true that Parliament was not in session; but it is also true—and this is a fact which my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) did not refer to—that Parliament was in session within forty-eight hours after the last Order in Council for a Governor General's warrant was obtained. Here is a case of a Governor General's warrant for a million of dollars being obtained by telegraph from His Excellency within forty-eight hours of the time that Parliament was to assemble. One-tenth of the whole controllable expenditure which is voted by this House, is disposed of by telegram forty-eight hours before the House met, and only a few hours before a special vote might have been obtained. What do we find? We find that those gentlemen who kept us in our seats on this side of the House hour after hour, day after day, lecturing us upon some little irregularities, actual or fancied, with regard to the expenditure of money, did, as one of their first official acts, take $2,000,000, one-fifth of the whole controllable expenditure of Parliament, out of the hands of Parliament altogether, and did this only a few hours before Parliament was to meet.

Let me say a few words with regard to the last matter to which the hon. gentleman referred, and I have done. It may be true, as the hon. gentleman says, that hostility to the United States is not desirable and that friendly relations between Canada and the United States are very desirable. I admit that. But the charge against the hon. leader of the Government is not that he is undertaking to bring about friendly relations between Canada and the United States, but that he proposes to surrender, in order to obtain those friendly relations, a portion of the control of a great waterway through the Dominion of Canada, to a foreign country. That is the gravamen of the charge; and although hostility to the United States is one thing and a thing to be deplored, loyalty to Canadian interest is another thing, and a thing which above all others we must look after. If we cannot have reciprocal trade with the United States without discriminating against Great Britain, then we must not have reciprocal trade. If we cannot have the friendship of the United States and must have the hostility of the United States unless we surrender to them an important interest, an important property right, an important matter of management and government, which belong exclusively to ourselves, then I say that we cannot have those friendly relations and must get along without them. Fancy what would be the situation, if the United States enjoyed joint control over the St. Lawrence and the St. Lawrence Canals. Flowing from that would be the right to protect those canals, to police those canals, to manage them, to join in the appointment of officers in charge of them, to assist in the collection of tolls, if any were exacted, to divide those tolls in proportion to the population or the contributions to the cost, and to develop and improve the canals; and if any difficulty should arise between any foreign country and the United States or between England and the United States, we should have, as one of the first results of this arrangement, the United States taking possession of these canals, apparently for their own protection or the protection of their own property, and we should have a similar state of things here as exists in Egypt to-day, where Great Britain maintains a garrison and controls the government of that country.

Then, I repeat, that so far from the results of the last election having followed from our appealing to prejudice, they followed, as the result in the province of Quebec shows, from the national cry which was effectively raised in that province.

Mr. STENSON. I did not intend, Mr. Speaker, taking any part in this discussion, but I feel compelled to occupy the time of the House for a very few moments in replying to a statement which the hon. gentleman for Sherbrooke (Mr. Ives) has just made, and which I must qualify as a misstatement of a dangerous nature. The hon. gentleman said that the landslide which had taken place in the province of Quebec was caused by the sectional feeling that had been raised by the Liberal party and by that party securing the support of the clergy in that province. The Rouge clergy, the hon. gentleman said, but the hon. gentleman is well aware—no one in this House is better aware—that the Rouge clergy is far from being the majority of the clergy in that province. More than that, from my own personal experience in this contest, it was very far from being the action of the Rouge clergy that had any effect on the election, for in my county, in the two joint counties of Richmond and Wolfe, there is only one Rouge, if I may so call him, who is to be found in the clergy there, and that one had to keep very quiet, whereas the others, to the number of twelve, worked and worked actively, several of them, against me in favour of the Conservative candidate, the friend of the hon. gentleman. The hon. member for Sherbrooke is perfectly aware—and were it necessary I could tell him more than that—that not only did the ordinary clergymen work to his knowledge but more than the ordinary clergyman also worked. My county, Sir, contains about two-thirds French Canadians and Catholics and one-third English Protestants; and I can say this, that certainly if I have been elected to support the Liberal party, it was not through the influence of the clergy, it was not through the influence of the French Canadian Catholics that I was elected, but I was elected by the majority of the Protestant English vote. Nor did I—and I defy the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Ives) or any one else to say the contrary—ever attempt to raise, during that contest, sectional, religious or national feeling. On the contrary, it was on the merits of the Liberal policy that the battle was fought in those counties. On that ground alone was it fought and on that alone did we conquer in those counties, which for eighteen years had been the subjects of the Conservative party. We have conquered this time because those Conservatives found that the late Government were no longer worthy of their confidence and that a change was required. Religious or sectional feeling had nothing at all to do with it. It was not through religious or sectional animosity to any one that I was elected, but because the people realized that the country had been misgoverned, and were confident that the new Government would administer public affairs better than its predecessors. I said I would not take up much of the time of the House, and I shall keep my promise, but I am forced to protest against not only the insinuation but the false assertion that was made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ives), and which he must have known to be false.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. Be good enough to take back that expression.

Mr. STENSON. I take it back. I hope I will be excused, on account of my youth in the House and of my being carried away by the assertion made by the hon. member for Sherbrooke, which I know to be not correct, and which I am perfectly aware the hon. member for Sherbrooke himself is satisfied was not exactly according to the facts.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, as a rule I would not speak on the Address, but, under the present circumstances, I think I should be doing a great injustice to the North-west Territories if I did not express the opinion which I know to be entertained there that this Address is an Address which was not to be expected, having regard to the promises and statements made by the candidates in support of the hon. gentleman who is now the head of the Government, and also having regard to the statements made by the hon. gentleman himself and by distinguished colleagues of his in the North-west Territories and elsewhere. I may say here, in passing, as it has come up in this debate, that I echo now what I said from my place when the hon. gentleman was leading the Opposition, that if the Liberal party was to come into power, no man could occupy the high position of Premier, no man could win that bright eminence, who would be more welcome to myself, if he will permit me to say so, or probably more welcome to the country, than the hon. gentleman. Having said that, Sir, I have to say, also, that when I recall the emphatic statements made by the hon. gentleman, and also the professions made time and again, and repeated in this debate, professions of a super ingenuousness of character, this Address is disappointing to those of us who have studied his speeches, and disappointing to the numbers throughout the North-west who, as I know, were influenced by promises made upon the hustings. The statement was made during the late election in the North-west Territories that should the hon. gentleman who is now at the head of the Government, come into power, the first thing he would do was to place agricultural implements on the free list. That was the statement made on every platform, and swallowed by the electors throughout the North-west Territories. And, as a consequence, I am in a position to say authoritatively, that hundreds of votes were cast for the candidates supporting the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government. And what are we told now in this Address? We are told that that cannot be done at present. If it is the intention of the Government to place agricultural implements on the free list, and thus to meet the desire of the farmers of the North-west Territories, and carry out the promises made by the Liberal candidates and by the supporters of the Liberal candidates in the North-west Territories, why delay it? Can any reason be given for delay? The hon. gentleman who just preceded me has argued, and I think has argued fairly enough, that there is no reason whatever for delay if the intention is to give a revenue tariff. And, of course, the argument made as to the effect upon the country by other speakers is an argument that is irrefragable, patent and convincing to any sound understanding. But that to which I wish to call the attention of this House and the North-west Territories is this: That we had a fair and plain promise made that if the hon. gentleman was placed in power, agricultural implements would be placed upon the free list. Therefore, the hon. gentleman is not quite free from being obnoxious to some of the suggestions and aspersions that have been made as regards his own ingenuousness. He flung across the floor of this House, and so did some of the other hon. members, notably the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright)—flung at the leader of the Opposition a taunt of disingenuousness, and of using words for the purpose of concealing thought. But, Sir, having regard to a careful study of the speeches of the hon. gentleman, having regard to his statements concerning the tariff made, now in cities, now in counties, now in the North-west Territories, now in eastern Canada, having regard also to his statements upon the school question, I was forced, and forced most unwillingly—because I am an admirer of the hon. gentleman—to the conviction that no man ever studied more closely or brought to a finer degree of perfection, the art of cloaking the naked truth. I was forced to come to the conclusion that he was a political toilet-maker, a political costumer who had studied the art how by flourishes of rhetoric and skilfully-contrived phrases to cloak defects and suggest beauties that did not exist. This political toilet-maker went to the North-west Territories. And what was the impression he gave when speaking in Winnipeg and elsewhere? Why, Sir, he gave the impression that the farmer of the North-west Territories was in a state of bondage, not perhaps so complete, to use his own language, as that in which the southern slaves were before emancipation, but essentially of the same kind. It is not merely the hon. gentleman who has given us that picture. I have here a picture drawn by the artist of the Reform party for the "Globe" newspaper, a gentleman of genius who at one time was an artist, but who now has devoted his brush to partisan purposes. He gave us a cartoon showing the farmer who is supposed to be typical of the farmers of the North-west Territories. This man is lying down, having fallen among thieves, like the man in the parable. And the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) comes to him as the good Samaritan, and is giving to him wine and applying oil to his wounds. But, as the Winnipeg "Free Press" said, the most logical thing to do would be first to knock off the gyves from his wrists, and the fetters from his ankles, and after that administer the wine of flowery rhetoric, and the oil of sunny phrases to the unfortunate and suffering man. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman need not complain, therefore, if we, coming from the North-west Territories, hold him to the description that he gave of the farmer of the North-west, because that description is given by the "Globe" newspaper in this cartoon. I wish I could find it, because I should like to show it to the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Word painting will do.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, I will do my best. The hon. gentleman is bending over the sufferer, he is bending over this man who has fallen among thieves, he is playing the good Samaritan. Why, Sir, of course the farmers of the North-west Territories who are in this state of bondage, expect him to play the good Samaritan in some way. But what do we find? We find when Parliament meets we are told that because the Public Accounts are not prepared, he cannot deal with the tariff. What connection have the Public Accounts with a revision of the tariff? What connection, above all, have the Public Accounts with the chief thing that it was necessary to do with regard to the North-west Territories in order to keep the promises of the hon. gentleman's candidates and their supporters, namely, to take off the duty on implements and admit them free? Here is the picture of the "Globe" "The North-west Territories farmers and the good Samaritan." But, Sir, when we look to the hon. gentleman to play the part of the good Samaritan, what part does he play? A man is suffering there, and the good Samaritan is asked over to break the fetters from his ankles, and take the gyves from his wrists, and give him the oil and wine of consolation. But the hon. gentleman having got into power, having reached the proud eminence of Premier of Canada, says, I will leave the poor fellow there for six, or seven, or eight months. He can lie there in his sufferings, I am not going now to break off his fetters, or take the gyves from his wrists, or to give him either the wine or the oil of consolation. Now, the hon. gentleman in doing that, I think, will lose nearly all the support he has received from the North-west Territories, apart from what might be called the strict, cast-iron Liberal support that may happen to be there and in Manitoba. Now, that I have seen what has taken place, I am not surprised that the hon. gentleman has taken that course, because it is perfectly clear that he is, perhaps, one of the most striking illustrations of the words of a great observer whom he himself is very fond of quoting. No man seems to have studied the English classics more than himself, he is fond of quoting Shakespeare, and he will remember how Brutus says, in one of the plays of which the hon. gentleman is a student, and from which he made a quotation in this debate:

'Tis a common proof that Lowliness is young Ambition's ladder,
Whereto the climber-upward turns his face;
But when he once obtains the upmost round,
He then unto the ladder, turns his back,
Looks in the clouds, scorning the base degrees
By which he did ascend.

Mr. DAVIN.

Sir, I object to have the promises to the farmers of the North-west Territories one of the rounds on that ladder on which he now looks with so much scorn. For my own part I do not care—it is a family matter, to use a phrase of his own—about the scorn with which he has treated the soldiers and followers who have fought by his side for ten or twelve years. I have nothing to do with that, but I admire him, and I wish I could learn from him the secret of the spell by which he has calmed down envy and curbed denied ambition. Sir, when I look over on hon. gentlemen opposite, and when I look at what my friend has done, I admire him. The hon. gentleman becomes Prime Minister, and I must say that he has done his best to give the country a strong Government. I give him credit for it. I say, however, that in doing that he has committed a party injustice—I say this in passing, because I have nothing to do with that—and it will have to justify itself to the party: but more than that, it will have to justify itself to this Parliament and to the country. What has he done? Here are men whose reputations are public property, men whose positions before the country are public property, men, such as the late member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), such as the member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), such as the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), as the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Landerkin), as the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister)—here are men with pretensions, men having made positions before the country, and men who fought hard for the hon. gentleman. There is the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen), too, and the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser). I say I admire the Prime Minister. He is fond also of quoting Greek dramatists, and he will remember that in one of the great plays of Æschylus, in the opening scene of Prometheus, Kratos, I think it is, who says that new power is always tyrannic. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman is, I think, one of the most charmingly endowed men in Canada. He is a man with whom a beautiful urbanity is epidemic. When he was leading the Opposition here, he was always more a courtier than a leader. I won't say that he was a vassal of the party of which he is now become the tyrant; but the moment he became Prime Minister what does he do? He looks around and he tells the country: I have brought in the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) it is true; I have brought in the gentleman that one of the Conservative members called the Bengal tiger, but I have pared his claws, and I have drawn his teeth. I have left out the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser), I left him out because I did not want to have an elephant on my hands. I have left out the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen); but I have brought in five or six perfectly new men to this House. Sir, I admire the hon. gentleman's courage, but it is a dangerous experiment on so large a scale, and it will have to justify itself, you may be perfectly certain, to the party, and justify itself to the country as well. However, the reference to his party management is only in passing. What I object to is that, as part and parcel of apparently the same characteristic, he has come to power in consequence, partly, of promises in which the electors of the North-west are deeply concerned, and those promises, by the Address, are utterly disregarded. I wanted merely to make that one point—he has disregarded them, he has disregarded the promises made to the North-west Territories, and in doing that, he has taken a course which has already been eloquently pointed out to be a dangerous one. He tells us in vague language that he is going to make great changes by a revision of the tariff. The hon. member for South Oxford told us to-night that there were something like a thousand items on which taxes had been imposed, and the impression is given that vast changes are to take place, and six, or seven, or eight months will pass by, and what will be the result? I venture to say, Sir, that in consequence of this language, in every city in Canada industries will be paralyzed; I venture to say that in Montreal, in Hamilton, and in other great centres of industry, you will have men out of work, you will have distress. The hon. gentleman having recently come into power and being full of the pleasure of place, and the pleasure being new too, he may feel pretty easy in his mind at the present moment; but in my opinion he is only putting off the evil day when he will have to be definite, when at last he will be obliged to make a statement and take action that will be definite, when the First Minister can no longer go on floating on a sea of vacuous verbiage and the good sense of this country will no longer be swallowed up in a vortex of equivocation. The hon. gentleman will find that during this winter he will have to face men out of work, he will probably have to face distress and find he has incurred very grave responsibilities, as a consequence of which I look for a very speedy reaction. Let me say one word in regard to the subject which has been raised here as to race and religion. Sir, I consider that the man who in this country—I repeat what the head of the Government said so eloquently last night, and has stated many a time—or in any country where there are mixed races tries to raise religious and racial passions is an enemy to his country and to his kind. For my own part I would abhor taking any course or uttering a single sentiment of any kind that would excite racial or religious passions, and it matters nothing whatever to me that an hon. gentleman is of this or that race or worships at this or that shrine. I say it is petty, puerile and provincial; it is narrow in the extreme to raise the question in regard to any Canadian statesman as to whether he belongs to this or that race in this Dominion, or for that matter this or that race in the Empire. I hope the day is not very far distant when we can address Canada in the language in which in the early centuries of our era a Roman poet, himself of Gaulish origin, addressed Rome, which embodied for the world of that day the ideas of thoughtful and beneficent government:

I hope that day will soon come when we will be able to say to ideal Canada as regards the races of which her people is made up: Thou hast made the different races one great race and one great nation. I could not forget when I heard the discussion raised in this connection that it was a man of foreign origin and foreign birth that gave to England what neither Greece nor Rome ever secured, the principle of representation; and I do not think we are likely to banish from the English Pantheon of English worthies Simon de Montfort because though he was an English patriot and statesman, yet he was French in origin, blood and name. I therefore take no stock in this sort of argument or in this kind of questions, only to observe that from whatever side any attempt comes to raise racial or religious prejudices it will have my condemnation and my abhorrence. Let me say here, however, and it is just to say it, that if it should turn out that in the late election the bare fact that the hon. gentleman who is at the head of the Government is a French Canadian by birth operated in the minds of a large number of the electors as a force to turn their minds from the consideration of the ordinary arguments and thus weigh with a great mass of his fellow-countrymen, it would not be a fact for us to note. It would not be a fact for which to condemn the hon. gentleman, but it would be a fact, I repeat, for us to note, and it might be a very disagreeable fact, one we might have to consider to whatever party we might belong in thinking of the future of Canada and the problems we have to face. I must say that in various places out west the voting took a form that might justify the conclusion that that fact operated on certain minds and overcame every other consideration. The practical point with which we are face to face to-night is this: not that the hon. leader of the Government does not come forward with a large Budget of legislation, not that the hon. gentleman has given the House a meagre bill of fare, for I would not expect him to give us a large bill of fare, but that no immediate act is promised in regard to the tariff on which the hon. gentleman professed himself to be fully informed. During the discussion of the last two or three years the hon. gentleman has been talking as though he thoroughly understood all about the tariff, and if he did not thoroughly understand it, the hon. gentleman who was at one time his first lieutenant, but who has had a stripe taken from his arm, the hon. member for South Oxford, professed thoroughly to understand it. The First Minister declared that an evil existed, and if he were called to office he would remedy it. When the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) in 1893 brought forward a resolution intended to condemn the policy of the then government in sending the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), Mr. Angers and the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood) throughout the country, and to express an opinion in favour of a revision of the tariff, the present leader of the Government used words to the effect that it was necessary to take action at once. My complaint is in relation to only one set of items, what are called agricultural implements. The hon. gentleman must know whether he intends or not to place them on the free list. If he does not, promises have been made which were either intended to delude the people or the policy has been changed; if the hon. gentleman does not intend to carry out this promise, the people have been deceived, and if he does so intend, no reason that will commend itself to a statesman can be brought forward why they should not be placed on the free list now.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, it was certainly contrary to any intention on my part to undertake the onerous duty of addressing the House on this occasion, and I would not do so were it not for the fact that the hon. gentleman from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has taken upon himself to speak on behalf of the North-west Territories; has taken upon himself so much on the basis of so little; has taken the whole Territories within his great grasp, and has attempted to speak for those Territories. When he has spoken contrary to what I know to be the facts, it is necessary, in my own justification merely, that I should take up the time of the House for a few minutes (and it will be but for a few minutes) in order to justify my own position in the House, and to set right the people of the Territories before the people of the rest of Canada in this matter.

By way of introduction, I may say that although a new member of this House, while the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) is an old member, I may still claim some right to represent the ideas of the people of the North-west. I have the honour to represent a constituency, which, at the general elections of 1891 returned a Conservative candidate by about 1,800 majority, and which at the last general election returned myself in opposition to the late Government, by a majority of something like 800 votes. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) who has just spoken, represents a constituency in which he has been declared elected not even by a majority of one. He is here on behalf of the smallest majority that I suppose has ever been recorded in the Dominion of Canada, namely, the casting vote of the returning officer, an official appointed by the late Government. If it could be possible to have a representative in this House who has less right to speak on behalf of the people of the North-west, I cannot conceive of him. Mr. Speaker, I will tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin), and I will tell the House, that there is no feeling of disappointment in the constituency that I represent, at any rate—and it contains a great many more votes than the constituency of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) represents—there is no feeling of disappointment at the Address which has been delivered from the Throne. The election which was carried in my constituency for the Government, was not carried by any promises made by the leader of this Government in regard to a reduction of the duty on agricultural implements. I do not know what it may have been in the constituency of the hon. gentleman, or in other constituencies in the Territories, for I can only presume to speak for the constituency which I represent; but I say that my constituency was carried not so much on the merits of the policy that was laid down by the leader of the present Government, as on the demerits of the administration of the late Government during the many years that it has governed that western country. It was a case of "turn the rascals out." It was a case in which the people of the North-west were put upon the defensive. They were compelled to fight, and they did their little share towards turning these gentlemen out of office. That was the principle upon which they voted in the last elections. I will say, further, that the people of the North-west—at least that section of them that I claim to represent—are sensible people, and they are not disappointed at the leader of this Government not doing what, in the first place, it would be unreasonable to expect of him, and what, in the second place, would be an impossibility. They do not expect a revision of the tariff at a moment's notice. But they do expect a revision of the tariff, and they expect a thorough revision. They expect a revision of the tariff that will be in their interest, and I have every confidence they will get that revision from the present Government, and that they will get it in good time. Now, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) has worked himself into a passion about the suffering that the people of the North-west will endure because the duty on agricultural implements is not removed at this session. I do not know that there is a demand, in my constituency, at any rate, to absolutely remove the duty on agricultural implements. There may or may not be, but, at all events, we look for a substantial reduction in all the duties that prejudicially affect us. I wish further to point this out. Sir: The agricultural season in that country is very nearly over, the purchase of farm machinery for the season has been made, and the reduction of the duty which will take effect during the coming winter will be just as beneficial to the people of the North-west as if it were made now. I merely make that statement in order that the House may be thoroughly aware of the deep insight and the thorough knowledge which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) has of the agricultural interests of the North-west. Now, having trespassed so much on the time of the House, I will merely say another word. It was not merely the question of the duty on agricultural implements which caused the change of feeling in the district of Alberta, amounting to something over 2,000 votes, comparing the two elections of 1891 and 1896. You cannot imagine that so small a cause would produce such a very considerable difference. There are other gyves and fetters binding down the settlers in the North-west, besides the matter of the tariff. There is the land policy of the late Government, and there is the railway policy of the late Government, and I can tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) that these questions affect us in our part of the country, at any rate, even more than do the provisions of the tariff. And, although we were lying wounded by the roadside, and although we were bound and tied, we obtained no relief from the late Administration, and it was because we could see no prospect of any relief from that Government—it was for these reasons even more than because of our objection to the tariff that we voted against Conservative rule. We look to the new Government with just as much confidence in these particulars, as we look to them for relief in the matter of the tariff. We look for relief for the North-west in all matters that shall be for the benefit of the North-west. We look for a policy which shall be in the interests of the people of the North-west, and not a policy that shall be, as it has been, in the interest of monopolies there. The North-west for the people and not for the monopolies—that is the policy we voted on, and that is the policy we voted for. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) has alluded to the disappointment that has taken hold of every person in the North-west, except the strongest party men. Well, I can tell him that I am not a strong party man, and he knows it. I can tell him that I am not bound to support the leader of the present Government, unless his policy is in the interests of the North-west. I can assure him, repeating what I said before, that the people of the North-west, being reasonable people, are willing to give the new Government a reasonable time to bring forward necessary reforms, and that our confidence in that Government is not shaken because they have shown good and sound judgment at the present time by refusing to act hastily for the purpose of making a little political capital.

They are above that kind of business, and I for one, as a citizen of Canada, am proud of them that they are. Now, the hon. member alluded, I think to an unnecessary extent, as I think did also those speakers who preceded him on that side of the House, to the disappointed ambition of members on this side. They spoke of how this, that and the other member had worked hard in the interest of the party, and had not received any reward. These gentlemen are evidently measuring other people's corn in their half bushel. The gentlemen whose ideas of the requirements of Government rise no higher than the filling of places are no men to rule this country. They have ruled it too long, as is evident from this very position they take in regard to that matter. If they know nothing of government except the holding of office, then the less they know of government the better for this country, and thank goodness that they know so little of it now.

In regard to the last matter which the hon. member spoke of, the school question, I certainly agree with him as to the undesirability of arousing racial and religious prejudices. I do not know how long the hon. member will hold that position. I do not know whether, if a vote were taken on the matter at the present time, he would be found in his usual position of speaking one way and voting the other; but I really fear that something like that might occur, for certainly what he has said here to-night does not accord with the circumstances connected with his own election campaign. As a matter of fact, every effort was made on behalf of the hon. gentleman in the line of religious and race prejudices; and while we must, of course, give all credit to the clerk of the court who did the final act of electing the hon. gentleman, at the same time, there is no doubt—and he dare not deny it—that great credit is due to the gentlemen who did arouse, and who were imported into the constituency specially to arouse, race and religious prejudices on his behalf. We may say that it is, in the first place, to the action of that official, in the next place to the religious campaigners, and, in the third place, to the horde of Government officials holding places in his constituency, that the hon. gentleman owes his position in this House, and his claim to speak on behalf of the people of the North-west.

Mr. QUINN moved the adjournment of the debate.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). My hon. friend is a new member, and I cannot, assuredly, refuse his demand. But it is only half-past ten, and if we are to have a conclusion to this debate, we shall have to sit later to-morrow.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 26th August, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

VACANCY.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that a vacancy has occurred in the representation of the electoral district of Brandon by the resignation of Dalton McCarthy, Esq. In accordance with chapter 13, section 5, subsection 2 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, I have issued my warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 2) to amend the Dairy Products Act, 1893.—(Mr. McLennan, Glengarry.)

Bill (No. 3) respecting the sale of railway return fare tickets.—(Mr. McLennan, Glengarry.)

Bill (No. 4) for the better protection of the employees of railway companies and others.—(Mr. Maclean.)

Bill (No. 5) to prohibit the importation and immigration of foreigners and aliens under contract or agreement to perform labour in Canada.—(Mr. Taylor.)

RAILWAYS IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. MARTIN asked,

Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce a measure during the present session of Parliament authorizing the construction of the Belfast and Murray Harbour Railway and other proposed branch railways in the province of Prince Edward Island?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). It is not the intention of the Government to introduce any legislation on this or other matters of a kindred character this session; but the matter will receive ample consideration.

MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR.

Mr. BOYD asked,

Has the portfolio of the Minister of the Interior been offered to any one by the Hon. First Minister as yet? If not, why not? When is it proposed to fill this office? What is the reason for the delay in filling it?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). My hon. friend is aware that these questions relate to matters which are now confidential. As soon as the appointment has been made, the House will be informed of it at once.

Mr. OLIVER.

REFORM OF THE TARIFF.

Mr. TISDALE (for Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) asked,

Did the Hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries say in a speech at Middleton in 1893, as reported in the "Morning Chronicle," Halifax: "The policy of the Liberal party, on the contrary, is the reform of the tariff by the elimination from it of every vestige of protection." If so, is this the present policy of the Liberal party?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). Not having seen the report of the speech for some years, I am not able to say anything as to the exact accuracy of the quotation. I may say, however, that I intended to refer, and think I did refer, to those duties which the ex-Finance Minister's speech referred to as having been levied for protective purposes and not for purposes of revenue. But if any persons are particularly anxious to know my exact views upon the whole question, I will refer them to my speech in full.

THE COAL DUTIES.

Mr. TISDALE (for Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) asked,

1. Did the First Minister receive a telegram reading as follows:—

Pictou, 18th June, 1896.

Hon. Wilfred Laurier, Montreal.

Conservative misrepresentations render it extremely important assurance should be given that coal interests would be guarded. Answer.

(Signed) E. M. MACDONALD.

And did the First Minister reply as follows:—

Black Lake, Quebec.

E. M. Macdonald, Pictou.

Policy to be followed as laid down in Liberal platform adopted at Ottawa convention. Coal interests will be carefully guarded.

(Signed) WILFRED LAURIER.

2. If these telegrams were sent and received, will the First Minister now definitely explain what is meant by the sentence, "Coal interests will be carefully guarded"?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Mr. Laurier received a telegram identical with the telegram now quoted, he sent an answer identical with the answer now quoted, and the First Minister now definitely explains that what was meant by this sentence, "Coal interests will be carefully guarded," was that at the proper time, coal interests would be guarded carefully.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. TISDALE (for Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) asked,

Is the following a fairly accurate report of a part of a speech of the Hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries at Sussex, New Brunswick, in January last:—

"A 17 or 20 per cent tariff was high enough to give encouragement to any manufacturer; if it were not, the manufactures should go down. The present policy developed trusts and combines, notably the cotton, sugar, oil, cordage, iron and steel. The Liberals would declare eternal warfare against them—"

2. If yes, will the Hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries say whether he is of the same opinion still? 3. If the above is not a fairly accurate report, will the Hon. the Minister say wherein the report misrepresents his views?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). My views on tariff reform were given at some length in a speech delivered in Sussex on the occasion to which the hon. gentleman refers. I do not think a quotation covering a single sentence in that speech is calculated to give a fair idea of my views. The hon. gentleman will find the whole speech very interesting and instructive. I invite his attention to it.

PROVINCIAL SUBSIDIES.

Mr. TISDALE (for Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) asked,

Did the present the Honourable the Minister of Finance write as follows to the Halifax "Morning Chronicle" under date of 1st February, 1892:—

"Mr. Jones pointed out that at the Quebec Conference which was held in the fall of 1887, certain proposals were made respecting a readjustment of provincial subsidies and the granting of additional allowances, not to Quebec alone, but to all the provinces. These proposals were agreed to by delegates representing the Governments of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Manitoba, and were subsequently confirmed by large majorities in the Assemblies of the several provinces named, Mr. Laurier, after the publication of the scheme, said he regarded it as fair and reasonable, and that he would support it. As a representative of Nova Scotia, I thank him for the assurance and I look forward with pleasure to the early coming of a day when he will be in a position to fulfil his pledge, and thus place in the treasury of the province an additional allowance of $162,000 a year."

If yes, can he now say whether the present Government proposes to deal with the resolutions of the Quebec Conference at this session of Parliament, or whether a provision for the amount of the proposed allowances to the different provinces will be asked from this Parliament at the next session?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I did write a letter to the Halifax "Chronicle" at the time mentioned, but the purpose of that letter is hardly made apparent by the quotation given in the hon. gentleman's question. The opponents of Mr. Laurier had represented that he (Mr. Laurier) had made a bargain with Mr. Mercier to give some special and undue favour, in the way of provincial subsidies, to the province of Quebec. The hon. member for Pictou, who has asked this question, had, in a public speech, given an implied, if not a direct endorsement to this charge. I felt that this was an unfair statement of Mr. Laurier's position, and I pointed out that Mr. Laurier's statement had not applied to the province of Quebec alone, but had relation to a project which, if carried out, would apply fairly to all the provinces of the Dominion. 2. It is not the intention of the Government to introduce any legislation at the present session respecting provincial subsidies, nor have the Government yet had this question under consideration with regard to any future legislation. From a Nova Scotian point of view, the subject is less important now than it was four years ago, inasmuch as since that time, under the wise legislation of a Liberal government, the finances of the province have been materially improved. But if the provinces raise the question, the matter can then be considered.

MARINE AND FISHERY OFFICERS.

Mr. TISDALE (for Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) asked,

(a.) When were the sub-agents of the Marine and Fisheries Department at Pictou, Nova Scotia, appointed?

(b.) In what manner were they appointed?

(c.) Have their services been dispensed with?

(d.) If so, upon what grounds, and what notice, if any, was given them that their services would no longer be required?

(e.) If a notice was given, what is the date of it and at what time? How much, if anything, was owing to the sub-agents by the department?

(f.) Has the amount been paid?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). (a.) Noonan and Davies were employed in connection with repairs to the "Northern Light" in 1878-79, and were advised 14th April, 1879, that they would be allowed 2½ per cent commission on their accounts; and on 11th July, 1879, advised that Minister had fixed allowance at 2½ per cent. (b.) Later the appointment was confirmed by Order in Council, 5th July, 1890, fixing salary at $400, and further increase of $50 by Order in Council, 20th January, 1894. (c.) Yes. (d.) The agent being a political partisan who actively interfered at the general election, the department, in the public interest, deemed that a new agent in whom it could have full confidence, should be appointed. (e.) Notified on 28th July, 1896. July salary still due, namely, $37.50. (f.) No funds out of which this can be paid.

THE FIRST MINISTER'S SPEECH AT SOHMER PARK, MONTREAL.

Mr. McDOUGALL asked,

Is the following a fairly accurate report of a part of a speech of the First Minister at Schmer Park, Montreal, February, 1895:—

"Protection is a fine thing only for a few monopolists. It mars the growth of all our great national industries. Now, I have been asked, what are you going to do? We are going to have a tariff for revenue, and we are going to abolish completely all the duties on raw materials."

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). My hon. friend, I am sure, is quite aware that the words which he has just quoted have been used by his leaders again and again without their taking the trouble, which he now takes, to ascertain their authenticity. I may tell him that I shall not be at all offended if he shows no more scruples on this matter than they did.

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE.

Mr. TISDALE asked,

Does the Government contemplate making any administrative changes in the Royal Military College of Canada? Will the Government, before taking final action in this matter, explain to the House the grounds of any such intended changes and communicate all correspondence referring to the subject, together with the Commandant's report for the year ending 30th June, 1896, and any opinions he may have submitted in reply to references to him on the question?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). The commandant of the Royal Military College at Kingston having resigned his position, his resignation has been accepted, and steps have been taken to replace him. Should any other change be required or become necessary, the matter will be duly considered by the Government. All correspondence on this subject was laid before the House last session and printed, except a supplementary report of the Board of Visitors, dated November 8, 1895, which appears to have been suppressed, and a report of the late commandant, dated 30th June, 1896, copies of both of which are being prepared and will be laid on the Table of the House.

FISHERY OVERSEER McBRIDE.

Mr. HAGGART asked,

1. Has Patrick McBride, Overseer of Fisheries for Prince County, been dismissed from the service?
2. If so, what charges were preferred against him, and who investigated them?
3. Has his successor been appointed, and what is his name?
4. Was Mr. McBride appointed by Order in Council?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). 1. Yes. 2. He was dismissed with a view of increasing the efficiency of the service. 3. No. 4. Yes.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILWAY EMPLOYEES.

Mr. HACKETT asked,

1. Have James Currie and Sylvain Wedge, trackmen on the Prince Edward Island Railway, been dismissed?

Mr. McDUGALL.

2. What charges were preferred against them, and who authorized their dismissal?
3. Have others been appointed in their places?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). Both James Currie and Sylvain Wedge have been dismissed. They were not considered satisfactory men, beyond this no special charges were preferred against them. The superintendent was ordered by the general manager to dismiss them. Others have been appointed in their places.

SALE OF NEWSPAPERS, ETC., ON INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked,

Who has the contract for the sale of newspapers, &c., on the Intercolonial between Lévis and Campbellton? Was it granted under tender to the lowest tenderer? What is the price? When does it expire?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). 1. The Canada Railway News Company have the contract for the sale of newspapers, &c., on the Intercolonial Railway between Lévis and Campbellton. 2. The contract was not granted under tender to the lowest tenderer. It was granted under tender to the highest tenderer. 3. The price for the whole line, excepting between Truro and Sydney, is:

For the first year—Cash.....	$2,875 00
Advertising.....	500 00
	$3,375 00
" second year—Cash.....	$2,975 00
Advertising.....	500 00
	$3,475 00
" third year—Cash.....	$3,075 00
Advertising.....	500 00
	$3,575 00

The contract expires on 1st April, 1899. The tender was accepted on 7th March, 1896. The contract is dated 24th March, 1896.

POINT CLARK LIGHT KEEPER.

Mr. CAMERON asked,

1. Have complaints been made to the Department of Marine and Fisheries, or any other department, against Mr. Rae, the lighthouse-keeper at Point Clark?
2. What were the nature of such complaints?
3. Has any disposition been made thereof? If so, what? If not, why?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). 1. Mr. Noble, foreman of works, in December last reported that John Rae, from intoxication was not giving proper attention to light. 2. Absenting himself to attend a funeral, returned in a state of intoxication and unable to attend to his light. 3. No. Rae was allowed to remain in charge of light, and in April last the foreman Noble reported that he found things very much improved, and Mr. Harty, the Inspector of Lights for that district, who has just returned, makes an excellent report of this station.

THE CONTROLLERS OF CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked,

Was any assurance given to the hon. the Controllers of Inland Revenue or of Customs, or to either of them, on behalf of the Government on taking office, respecting his position in the Government, and if so, what was it?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I think I answered that question the other day and I have no other answer to give now.

WRIT FOR SASKATCHEWAN.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to take the opportunity of asking the hon. the First Minister whether the writ for Saskatchewan has yet been issued?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). We have not received the warrant of the Speaker. Perhaps I might be allowed to explain that the reason the warrant of the Speaker has not yet been issued is, that he has not been notified according to the forms of the statute.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. the Prime Minister is correct. The Speaker has received no notice of that vacancy, and he is powerless to act.

Mr. BERGERON. Hear, hear. The proper notice should have been given.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S WARRANTS.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask, whether the hon. the Minister of Finance has been able to lay on the Table yet, the supplementary documents about the Governor General's warrants—that is to say, the Order in Council and the Report of the Minister of Justice, if there be any.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I had hoped to produce them to-day, but I expect to be able to lay them on the Table of the House to-morrow.

Mr. FOSTER. And with regard to the ten days' statement?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I have placed the ten days' statement on the Table to-day, but perhaps the hon. gentleman is not aware of it.

Mr. FOSTER. Generally it has been sent in advance to the ex-Finance Minister.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I shall be very happy to have a copy sent him.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the first paragraph of the proposed motion of Mr. McInnes, for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in answer to his Speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. QUINN. Mr. Speaker, my first duty is to return my sincere thanks to the leader of the House for the courtesy which was shown me last evening by his consenting to the adjournment of the debate until this afternoon. As a matter of fact, my short experience as a member of this House causes me to believe that sitting in the cold shades of Opposition is not merely a figure of speech, since it has subjected me, as it has many other of the younger members, to not only the cold shades but the cold draughts of opposition, the consequence of which is—perhaps the House will not regret it as much as I do—that it will necessitate my being as brief as possible in what I have to say on the subject under discussion. My next duty, Sir, and another pleasant one, is to congratulate the House, and to congratulate especially my hon. friend the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) on the calm, temperate, courteous and eloquent address which he delivered in seconding the motion now before the House. We can appreciate this the more when we consider how difficult was the task, how small the subject upon which he had to speak. The hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. McInnes) who had the honour of moving the Address, remarked "that good wine needs no push," but I think this House, judging from the address which he delivered and from the Speech from the Throne which was put into the lips of the representative of Her Majesty by the Prime Minister, will recognize that in this cause there was a good deal of push and very little wine either in quantity or quality. The only important matter mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, the only reason for which it is stated the members of this House have been called together, is for the purpose of voting supplies for the current fiscal year. Now, in order that this House, and in order that the country may appreciate fully the circumstances under which Parliament was called together, and understand, too, the illogical position which the Government, to my mind at any rate, occupies, in calling this House for that sole purpose, it will be necessary, Sir, for me to refer to a time prior to the late general elections on the 23rd of June last. Before these elections were held, the hon. members will remember, a session of this Parliament had been called for the 16th day of July. It was not then contemplated by the Ministry, I have no doubt, that they would not receive from the country a majority to support their ideas. It might have been hoped by the members of the present Government that they would receive a majority: but whether the majority was to have been Liberal or Conservative, this House had been called to meet on the 16th day of July last. We know that after the general elections the then leader of the Government, for some reason unexplained at the present moment, and for the explanation of which, unfortunately, we have not the papers relating to the circumstance on the Table, deemed it fit to send to the representative of Her Majesty his resignation as leader of the Government. Two courses were then open to the present leader of the House. The one was the true constitutional course to take. He knew at that time that there were no supplies voted for the fiscal year. He knew at that time that Parliament had been called for the 16th day of July. He knew that no constitutional means existed by which supplies could be given him for the purpose of carrying on the public affairs of the country. He knew all these things; and before him was the option, the constitutional option, consecrated by a precedent not very far to seek in England, of declining to accept the responsibility of calling for those supplies, but compelling the then Government to meet the House and ask for the supplies necessary to carry on the government of the country. But there was the other course—I will not say that it was an unconstitutional course, but it was a course which necessitated an unconstitutional proceeding. It was a course which necessitated the hon. leader of the Government adopting means other than those known to our constitution, for the purpose of providing the supplies necessary for carrying on the public affairs of the country. It was a course dictated possibly by that hunger for power which existed in the hearts and minds of my hon. friends opposite, a hunger which found no satiety during the last eighteen years, but which was on the brink of being satisfied the moment the hon. leader of the late Government placed his resignation in the hands of the Governor General. Then was repeated the incident which has been narrated in one of the novels which we have all read in our youth, written by Captain Marryat, in which he describes the first attempt of the inexperienced landsman to get into a hammock. The man does not succeed in getting into the hammock, but tumbles out on the other side. Will the hurried acceptance of power by the present Government at that time result in what Shakespeare termed the "vaulting ambition which o'erleaps itself," and which will eventually place hon. gentlemen opposite where they rightfully belong, on the benches of the Opposition?

Mr. LANDERKIN. He is getting hungry already.

Mr. QUINN.

Mr. QUINN. Mr. Speaker, I have tried to point out—and I think by the satisfaction apparent on the faces of hon. members that I have pointed out—what was the constitutional course that should have been adopted by the present Government when the late Prime Minister tendered his resignation to the Governor General. Ought not something to have been said in the Speech from the Throne concerning this matter? Ought not we to have been told why it was that the present Government refused to accept the constitutional method of compelling the previous Government to furnish supplies for the fiscal year? Would not this have properly formed one good sentence, at any rate, in the Speech from the Throne? But there is not one word of this. We are calmly asked to come together for the mere purpose of voting supplies, and placing the Government in a position to carry on the public affairs of the country. The position of the present Government in this respect reminds me of the position of the ambitious assistant who, in the management of a manufacturing concern, succeeds in supplanting the manager of that institution. For years he had been imposing upon his employer with stories attacking the honesty, the sobriety, and the intelligence of the late manager, and at last he succeeds in displacing him, and in being appointed to the position himself. He had been telling what he would do if he were manager—how he would change this and alter the operation of that, how he would economize in various directions, but no sooner is he placed in the saddle than he forgets all the promises he had made, and simply calls upon his employer to advance to him all the capital invested in the institution. I have no hesitation in saying that if such a thing had been perpetrated on any of the large manufacturers of the city for which I have the honour to sit, he would characterize it as a sort of confidence game, and would not respond as heartily as the Government expects this House to respond to the demand which is now made. Would it have been too much, Mr. Speaker, for the Government to have told the importers and the manufacturers of this country what its intention is as regards the tariff on goods which are imported from other countries, or are manufactured in this country? These gentlemen must be aware—and if they are not, they should learn it now—that at the present moment, or within a very few days, emissaries are going from the large importing houses of this country to Europe and to other foreign markets for the purpose of purchasing the supplies necessary for this country for the next year. They must know that these people are waiting anxiously for some message from the Government to inform them whether the goods they are to import are to be taxed less or more than they have been in the past. They must know that during the last few months the trade of this country has been paralyzed by the uncertainty which has existed in the minds of both the merchants and the consumers as to what would be the result of the elections. They must know that the smaller merchants throughout the country have refused to purchase goods. They must know that even the consumers have refused to buy, hoping against hope that they might be able to buy cheaper after the change of tariff than they are at the present time. They must know, over and above all, that the employees of importing houses alone, to the number of thousands, have been dismissed, or have been obliged to accept a smaller remuneration for their labours than they received before the 23rd of June last. They must know that the manufacturing industries of this country have, within the last few months, been paralyzed with the uncertainty which has existed in the public mind as to the maintenance of the present tariff. They must know that many of these industries have been closed, they must know that thousands of people have been discharged from their employment, they must know the uncertainty that exists in the minds of the owners of these factories as to whether they will ever be able to open them again or not. They must know that the poor people of this Dominion are awaiting in fear and trembling, for one word from this Government to tell them whether in the future they are to receive employment in the manufacturing industries of their country, or whether they will be obliged to go to the United States to seek there the employment which only there could be obtained previous to 1878. In view of these facts, I do not think it would have been too much for the hon. the First Minister (Mr. Laurier) to have put in the mouth of His Excellency the announcement that this House had been called together either for the purpose of reducing or increasing the tariff upon goods which are imported and which could be manufactured in this country. Worse even than that, worse than the uncertainty which exists, we heard only yesterday from the hon. Minister who represents Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) the excuse for this omission in the Speech from the Throne, that making reductions in the tariff is a much more serious matter and requires much more serious consideration than making additions to the tariff. Thus the note of warning has gone forth to the manufacturing industries of this country that the intention of the Government is to reduce the tariff on goods manufactured in Canada; but there is no word of comfort given to the importer that the goods which are to be imported from other countries are to pay a lesser duty than was levied previous to the last election.

As to the means which were adopted by the Government for the purpose of avoiding the difficulty into which they were placed by assuming the reins of office without having had sufficient forethought to see that supplies had been voted to them by this House, there can be no doubt as to its unconstitutionality. Why should the excuse be offered, for example, that it is true the money was obtained but the whole of it was not expended. The obligation to call Parliament together for the purpose of granting supplies to the Crown was not put in the law merely for the purpose of preventing theft or the misappropriation of funds, but for the purpose of preventing the possibility of even the Crown itself obtaining funds without the consent of the sovereign people. This is the object of that constitutional provision. Now, once that provision is violated, the question to debate is not whether this money has been used rightly or wrongly. The question is not whether this money has been put to its proper use or been diverted to some other use, but the question is were proper constitutional means adopted for the purpose of obtaining the money, whether it was expended afterwards properly or improperly? If we lose sight of that for one moment and allow ourselves to be led astray from the proper consideration of this constitutional question, the hour may come when we may find on the Treasury benches men less scrupulous than my hon. friend the leader of the Government, men more facile than the present representative of Her Majesty in this country, men who might consent to raise the money upon the warrants of the Governor General and the security and faith of the Government alone for the purpose of transferring the allegiance of this country even to the United States. Such a thing is possible, and keeping in view its possibility. I ask hon. members to be careful and not to consent to desecrate this principle by their votes in favour of the the province of Ontario.

Now, there is only one other subject referred to in the Speech from the Throne, and as it is one which affects probably more the province, a portion of which I have the honour to represent, than any other portion of this Dominion, I approach it with the greatest care. A good deal has been said about race and religion. It has been alleged, on one side and the other, and charged against hon. members, and charged against the leaders of the two parties, that the late election was fought on the cry of race and religion. Now, Mr. Speaker, speaking for the province of Quebec, with the sentiments of whose people I am somewhat familiar, speaking more particularly for that district of which I am the humble representative and which is composed largely of men differing from me in language, I have no hesitation in saying that the great constitutional question of the remedy to be afforded to the minority of Manitoba was overshadowed by another question in that province. It was overshadowed by the desire, the laudable ambition of a large and prosperous people to see directing the government of this country a representative of their own race and their own religion. I have no hesitation in saying that that ambition, that that desire, more than outweighed any sympathy that may have existed, and that did undoubtedly exist in the minds and hearts of the people in favour of what is known as the Remedial Bill for the minority of the province of Manitoba. And I have this to say, too, for the French Canadian people of the province of Quebec, that they have possibly put before their idea of remedial legislation their idol of the moment. They believed in his integrity, they believed in his honesty, they believed that he would put upon the statute-book of this country a law that would ameliorate the condition of the minority in the province of Manitoba. Having perfect confidence in his ability to do so; having perfect confidence in his desire to do so, they almost as one man voted in favour of his candidates throughout the province. They did so on the principle—and there is no denying it, and the hon. First Minister cannot deny it—of giving to the people of our religion a proper religious training in their youth. They did it on the principle of extending to the province of Manitoba the same rights in education as are enjoyed by the people of the province of Quebec, which produced our Lafontaines, our Cartiers, our Dorions, our Chapleaus and our Laurier. They did it on the principle which gave to our province of Ontario our John Sandfield Macdonald and other noted statesmen of that province. They did it in the hope that that education would raise the people to a higher sphere intellectually and with the belief that a proper religious training had the effect of making people not narrow-minded but broad-minded. They did it in the hope that the suffering minority in the province of Manitoba would benefit by these things, and in absolute certainty that their rights would be recognized by that idol whom they had placed upon so high a pedestal. But I have this to say also: that, great as has been their faith, deep as has been their affection, great as has been their sacrifice to, and powerful as has been their effort in what they have done,—so great, so deep, so powerful, so terrible even, will be their revenge should that hon. gentleman prove recreant to the trust which has been placed in him, and not grant to these people in Manitoba that which they have a right to ask, and nothing less than which will satisfy them—the separate schools which are allowed in the province of Quebec and in the province of Ontario.

I do think, Sir, that the Prime Minister of this country ought to have taken this House and the country more into his confidence in the Speech which he put into the mouth of the representative of Her Majesty, and ought to have told us on what lines he proposed to change the tariff and generally to conduct public affairs. We have learned, not from the Speech from the Throne, but from other sources, what we may call the foreign policy of the Government. We find in one of the American newspapers an expression on the part of the Prime Minister of the greatest friendship—I might even go so far as to say the greatest loyalty—to the United States. But, although the hon. Prime Minister thought that he might confide to this correspondent of a foreign newspaper his foreign policy, he does not seem to have thought that he was bound to confide any part of his policy to the country or to this House which he has the honour of leading.

I listened with great pleasure to the citation made by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) from the speech of Lord Russell at Saratoga a few days ago in which the noble lord spoke of the friendship which should exist between the two great English-speaking nations of the world and of the power that could be exercised by an alliance formed between these two nations. He showed how much such an alliance would make for the peace of the world and of the duties which were incumbent on the two nations and how impossible it would be to resist anything that might be advocated by them when thus united. But I do not see how the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce could quote that passage or any passage of Lord Russell's speech to the advantage of the position taken by the Government and by the Prime Minister in laying before a foreign country his foreign policy. I do not think that in that speech or in any other speech ever delivered by Lord Russell—whom I am proud to call a countryman of my own—he has ever uttered one word to the effect that England was prepared to sacrifice one iota of principle in order to retain peace with any other country. I do not think the hon. gentleman will find in any speech or writing of the noble lord any statement made that England was prepared to give up one foot of territory for the sake of maintaining peace with any other nation. And beyond that, Mr. Speaker, I challenge the hon. Minister to find in the public records of Lord Russell, in any of his speeches or writings, any intimation that a privilege enjoyed either by any British subject or by Britain itself would be sacrificed for the purpose of maintaining peace with any other country. And yet this address of Lord Russell has been quoted for the purpose of showing that Canada ought to maintain most friendly relations with the United States. That is unquestionable; that is incontestable. No member either on this side of the House or on the other, and no sane Canadian outside of the House, I hope, would say that we should live in any other manner than in perfect peace and harmony with our brethren on the other side of line 45. But I utterly mistake the sentiment of this House, I utterly misunderstand the feeling of the people of this country if the proposed action of the hon. Prime Minister would be endorsed by even a small minority of the people, thus permitting the handing over of our canals to the administration of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I have anything more to say on this subject at this time. As I am a beginner in the House, I am certainly obliged to hon. members for listening with such courtesy to the remarks I have made. I have only to conclude with an expression of that sentiment expressed in the quotation made by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) in closing his speech, that whatever we may do in this House, however we may be divided on questions of politics, I am sure it is the hope and the desire of every member, from the leader of the House down to the humblest member of the Opposition, myself, that everything we contemplate, everything we do may be fulfilled in the one thought of union amongst our people.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). Mr. Speaker, I claim the indulgence of this House for a few moments so that we on this side may not be taxed with discourtesy by allowing such an eloquent speech as that to which we have just listened, to go unnoticed. The chief complaint made by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House appears to be that this Government, formed on the 13th July last as a result of the elections of the 23rd June, has not yet formulated its fiscal policy; and further, that this Government does not represent Canada, does not represent this broad Dominion from the Atlantic to the Pacific, but that this Government represents almost exclusively the province of Quebec. Now, Sir, hon. gentlemen opposite do not appear to have realized up to the present time—and surely if they entertained any doubts on that subject, these doubts must have been dispelled by the results of the elections yesterday—they do not appear to have realized the fact that this Government has come to stay; and also, that we do not intend to deal with such an important question as that of the fiscal policy of this country, in a hysterical manner. Serious consideration, calm reflection will be given to all the diverse interests: and after these interests have been considered, and after a conclusion has been reached, a character of permanency will be given to the tariff which will reassure the public mind, and give to the people of this country the assurance that our tariff will not henceforth be tinkered with on the eve of each general election as political exigencies may require. I think I may safely go further, and say that when this revision will have been accomplished it will be found that protection has been meted out, not only to the sugar barons, not only to the monopolists, not only to the frequenters of the Red Parlour, but also to the toilers in our fields, in our mines, in our forests and in our workshops; in one word, it will be found that Canada and Canadian interests have been carefully guarded without reference to class.

The late Finance Minister (Mr. Foster), in well chosen words and delightfully incisive phrases, which in my judgment went far to show that he well bore the reputation he had acquired in this country of being a master of debate and also a master of the English language, referred to the demands that are being made upon this Government by some of its adherents for a share in the public patronage. The ex-Minister selected two cases, that of Mr. Forbes and that of Mr. King. He appears to have been surprised at their modest demands; he appears to have been unable to realize that those gentlemen could have been satisfied, the one with a salary of $100 a year, and the other with the munificent return of $10 a year. I can well understand that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House are surprised at such a condition of things; I can quite well understand that they are not able to realize that men of that calibre should be content with so little; and I fully appreciate the fact that those gentlemen have not come up to the standard fixed by hon. gentlemen opposite when they gave preferment to their political friends. But I think I may fairly ask my hon. friend from York to remember that it is not the case, that it cannot be the case, that each and every one of us can have access to his country made easy by the use of such a magnificent structure as the Fredericton bridge. I would also ask the ex-Minister to remember that if by his side sits the leader of the Opposition, occupying a place that he fills with such acceptance to us all, it is because a vacancy had been created by the translation to a higher and let us hope a better sphere of a former member for Cape Breton. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, at some future time it may be necessary for us to ask—and I trust that we shall not ask in vain—how it came to pass that one of the judges of the highest court in the province of Quebec vacated his seat to become a member of the commission for the revision of the statutes so as to create a place for a former Minister of Public Works; also it may become our duty to inquire into other appointments that were prospectively made but that were not accomplished, and at some future time we may have to deal with that. Now, the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) drew a comparison between the conduct of Sir Oliver Mowat, the hon. Minister of Finance and the hon. Minister of Railways, and that of Sir Charles Tupper. Now, I admit, Mr. Speaker, that I am myself a bit of a hero worshipper; I admit that when I saw the hon. leader of the Opposition come down from his high place full of years and honours, and step manfully into the arena, I felt a certain degree of admiration for him. I must confess further that when I saw this venerable gentleman, if he will pardon my using this expression, bearing so lightly his three-score years and ten, traverse this country from one end to the other, doing yeoman service for his party, I entertained a feeling of admiration for him. But it was suggested to me that in the year 1891 this veteran of political warfare, this veteran of political strife, this beacon light about which alone the shattered forces of the Conservative party could rally—it was suggested to me that in 1891 he had done almost the same thing; and then it occurred to me that possibly he also was fighting for the flesh pots, and that the atmosphere of London had a charm for him that he could not forget. In any event, I am not concerned to look for motives; but I think the leader of the Opposition will permit me to say that I at all events believe he has proved in the fights that have gone by that he is entitled to that chivalrous treatment which a foeman worthy of the steel of our leader, is entitled to receive. Now, Sir, why should Sir Oliver Mowat, the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Finance leave their positions? Did not Mr. Taillon, the Prime Minister of the province of Quebec leave his position, and what was the result? He got left. Mr. Angers and Mr. Desjardins followed in his steps, and what happened to them? They got left. But in so far as those two gentlemen are concerned, we may hereafter have to deal with the motives that prompted them in resigning their senatorships, and upon their resignations hangs a tail, or, to speak more correctly, to those resignations hung a tail. In any event the action of provincial ministers in entering the federal arena has, I think, been fully justified by public opinion. If we take the case of Mr. Fielding, Minister of Finance, we find he was elected by acclamation, and in the province of Nova Scotia, all the by-elections have gone in favour of his party. If we take the case of Mr. Blair, public opinion appears also to have ratified his choice, and on that question there is no more competent authority than the ex-Minister of Finance, if rumour speaks truly of the role he played in the election.

I will now deal with the question of the Governor General's warrants, in respect of which complaint has been made against the Government. The practice and doctrine, I believe, to be that Parliament gives the Executive each year a certain amount of money to provide for the public wants. If, at the end of the fiscal year, the funds for the new year have not been provided, then Parliament must be assembled, and in the interval nothing can be done with regard to the finances. But cases may arise, exigencies may occur which require the intervention of an authority outside of Parliament. That intervention has been carefully guarded, and can only be exercised subject to certain conditions. Now, what does the Audit Act say? It says:

(b) If, when Parliament is not in session, any accident happens to any public work or building which requires an immediate outlay for the repair thereof, or any other occasion arises when any expenditure not foreseen or provided for by Parliament is urgently and immediately required for the public good, then upon the report of the Minister of Finance and Receiver General that there is no parliamentary provision, and of the Minister having charge of the service in question that the necessity is urgent, the Governor in Council may order a special warrant to be prepared, to be signed by the Governor General for the issue of the amount estimated to be required which shall be placed by the Minister of Finance and Receiver General to a special account against which cheques may issue from time to time, in the usual form, as they are required.

That is to say, expenditure, unforeseen or unprovided for, urgently and immediately required for the public good. Now, I ask, Mr. Speaker, whether or not the expenditures necessitated by the working of our canal system and our railways, involving the performance of manual labour, are not matters of urgency? If, in order to enable those works to be carried on it is necessary to obtain public money, is not that a reason for the application of the provisions of the Audit Act? And is not the Government fully justified in applying for the issue of Governor General's warrants to secure the money to be used for such purpose? Was this expenditure unforeseen, was it unprovided for? That it was unprovided for is undoubted. That it was unforeseen, one is almost forced to conclude by the conduct of the late Government. Let us see what occurred. There was a session which ended in July, 1895. During the course of that session, funds for 1895-96 were provided. Then we had a session in the month of January, 1896. During the course of that session, called for a special purpose, for the purpose of dealing with the Manitoba school question, no Estimates were passed by this House. Consequently, for 1896-97 no supplies were provided. What condition of things have we got? Who is responsible for the fact that supplies were not passed, and was the Opposition of that day perfectly justified in preventing the passing of those Estimates? Let us see. We had a session called for 2nd January, 1896, for a specific purpose, for the purpose of dealing with the Manitoba school question. Why was that session not called at an earlier date, hon. gentlemen knew the condition of the public mind on the Manitoba school question, they knew that the latent passions and prejudices of the people had, in consequence of the manner in which they had dealt with that question, been aroused, and they could not legitimately hope in the short time between the opening of the session on January 2nd and April 25, when Parliament must lapse, to pass a complicated law on the school question. The Government called Parliament together on 2nd January for the purpose of considering and passing that legislation, and we find that when they met Parliament the Government had many other questions to settle among themselves, and many difficulties to adjust, so that they did not bring the Bill down to the House before 22nd February, 1896, and did not ask the House to deal with it before 2nd March, very little more than a month before the expiration of Parliament by lapse of time. What have you further? You have a Government formed under conditions still fresh in the minds of the House. The Government formed in January, 1896, was organized as the result of a conflict such as the history of the country does not make mention. Again the fact was announced to the world that the Government was only a temporary one, and that so soon as Parliament was dissolved the intention was to form a new Government, which would go to the country at the elections and have control of the money granted in the Estimates. We have, therefore, this fact: The Opposition were expected to vote the Estimates to be given to a Government to be formed, which was not then in existence, but which was to be brought into existence after Parliament had expired; that is to say, a Government was to be brought into existence without the people having an opportunity to pronounce on the merits and demerits of its members, and without any control of Parliament being exercised. It was to a Government to be formed under those conditions, after the events that had transpired in January, that the then Opposition were expected to vote the supplies so that the Government might have them after the elections. For what purpose? Probably to enable the Government to remain in power for a year from that day, because it is apparent from what we know that on 7th July, fourteen days after the elections had taken place, the then Prime Minister had not realized that his Government had been defeated at the polls. If he had not realized it on that day, when would he have realized that fact if he had had the supplies for the year voted? More than that, if those hon. gentlemen really had any proper regard for the public service and for the public interest, and desired to do their whole duty towards the country, what might they have done? We all know they had prepared the public mind for elections in 1895; that the session of 1896 was convened for the purpose of dealing with the Manitoba school question; that at the end of that session we might have had the elections held immediately; that the public were prepared for them, that the two questions, the fiscal policy and the Manitoba school question, had been thoroughly debated and were then fully understood; and yet Parliament was allowed to expire in April, 1896. Why did not the Government have the elections in May, and summon Parliament in time to obtain the necessary supplies before 1st July, 1896? They did not wish to adopt that course, and perhaps before this session closes we will understand what the intention was at that time.

Now, the hon. leader of the Opposition referred to the Manitoba school question, and among other things, he said:

I entered upon this question, as I say, under the conviction that the Government of Canada were bound by every principle of right and justice and of statesmanship to carry out a policy which they believed to be for the maintenance of the law and the constitution of the country, as expounded by the highest judicial tribunal of the Empire.

Further, he went on to say:

I entertained the belief, and I entertained it sincerely, that it would be a cause of deep resentment on the part of the great body of the Roman Catholics of this country if the Parliament of Canada refused to carry out the law and the constitution of the country, as expounded by the highest judicial tribunal of the Empire.

Why he should say that we should limit that deep resentment to the Roman Catholics of this country because the law and the constitution would not be carried out, I fail to understand. Sir, the law and the constitution of this country are as sacred to the Protestants as to the Catholics, and to the Catholics as to the Protestants. Then the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) further said:

Under these circumstances, I say, I found that I attached much greater importance to this question—

And the question, Mr. Speaker, was respect for the law, respect for the constitution, respect for the judgment of the highest court of the Empire. He, the leader of the Opposition, discovered that he attached too much importance to that question: and why? Because he found that the elections in the province of Quebec went against him. Right had ceased to be right and justice had ceased to be justice: the constitution need not be interfered with, whatever may be the fate of the minority in Manitoba. And why? Because the people of the province of Quebec, asserting their right as free men, refused to sell these rights for a mess of pottage. And let me say one word more. What was the condition of this question of the Manitoba schools so far as our province was concerned? We know that this question was brought up to do duty for the Conservative party as far back as 1890. We from the province of Quebec know that that same question was made to do duty during the course of the Federal elections in 1891, and that then it had some effect upon the people of the province. I admit that they hesitatingly accepted the promises that were made, but still the people of our province were influenced by them in 1891. What occurred? The question then ceased apparently to be a factor in politics. It was put in the courts and after having dragged its weary way from one court to another, finally it was resuscitated on the eve of the election of 1896. But then the farce had ceased to draw; the people of the province began to understand what it all meant, and they were, I say, justified in the conclusion that it had been treated by the late Government as a farce, and a ludicrous farce, from the outset. Let me explain myself. The judgment of the Privy Council was rendered in January or February, 1895. In March, 1895, the remedial order was passed. In April, 1895, Parliament was assembled, but was there anything said about this question? Was it dealt with then? Not at all. Nothing was done until the eve of the prorogation in July, 1895, when we had what we may call the first "bolt." Then what occurred? We had the promise of a second session in the month of January, 1896. The House was called on the 2nd of January of that year, and naturally the people from the province of Quebec expected that this matter would be dealt with then, but the second "bolt" came, and there was no Remedial Bill. It would be idle now to discuss the causes of the bolt, or to refer to it at any length, for the fact is so well and familiarly known throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion that I need not rehearse what took place, nor need I repeat the epithets which were exchanged between the parties to the "bolt." Further, on the 2nd of January, 1896, these gentlemen knew perfectly well that Parliament must be dissolved by the efflux of time in April of that year. They waited until the 27th of February to bring down their Bill, and it was the 2nd day of March before it came up for consideration before the House. Now, Mr. Speaker, what took place in the meantime? On the occasion of the first "bolt" a member of the Government made a speech in the Senate. I refer to the Hon. Mr. Angers, and he then said:

What will be the position of the Dominion Government if they come before Parliament in January with such a declaration? The minority will have been put out of the fort, it will be standing out again in the open field, and the Government will be unable to determine the House to take action. That was my objection to that part of the declaration of the Government, and I offered the one which I have just read to you; but it was voted down. The declaration made by the Government admits of a doubt as to the actual jurisdiction of Parliament. The one that I offered granted a delay but raised no suspicion as to jurisdiction. I have read that declaration to show that I did not want to be hasty. However, my conviction is that between this day and the day that Parliament meets again, such an excitement will go over the country in opposition to the granting of remedial legislation that if the Government hesitates now, it will be then afraid.

That is what the Hon. Mr. Angers said when giving his ministerial explanations after leaving the Government, and when explaining the condition of things existing at the Council board when this matter was dealt with. He told us that such a wave of indignation would go through this country that it would be impossible for the Government to deal with this question, and he told us further that in any event they would be afraid to deal with it. These were the words pronounced in July, 1895, by the Hon. Mr. Angers. These were the words that were sent broadcast throughout the province of Quebec. These were the words that were known in every town and village and hamlet in that province; and these words were supplemented by articles which emanated from the Hon. Mr. Angers' friends, published in his organs which were known to be the mouthpieces of his opinions, and in which he indicated by name his colleagues, and said: So long as these gentlemen remain in the Government no remedial legislation will pass.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with these facts in the public mind, with these facts known in the province of Quebec, and in view of the subsequent conduct of the late Government, what conclusion were the people of the province of Quebec necessarily forced to, except that to which I pointed a few moments ago, namely, that the whole thing was a ridiculous farce, that this Remedial Bill was kept in abeyance for no other purpose than to serve as a cloak, for what I may call in a political sense, the iniquities of the late Government, so as to enable them to ride back into power, if possible, upon the wave of fanaticism and prejudice that they hoped to arouse. The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Ives)—and I regret that he is not now in his seat—stated to the House last evening that in the province of Quebec the cry was: Hurrah for Laurier, one of our race. I believe that the hon. member from St. Anne's, Montreal (Mr. Quinn), re-echoed that sentiment to-day. Both these gentlemen must allow me to say that they are mistaken. Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary history of my province proves that there is no province within the Dominion of Canada in which representative institutions are better understood, or in which the political pendulum oscillates more freely. In no province of the Dominion, Sir, are the words of Junius better understood: "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." Let me prove it. We had a federal election in 1874, and the result in the province of Quebec was forty-seven Ministerialists and eighteen Opposition. Then we had the local elections of May, 1878, and what was the result? The local election in May, 1878, gave to my hon. friend in front of me (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) a majority in the province of Quebec.

Mr. DUPONT. No.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes, gave him such a majority as enabled him to carry on his affairs, and when he was wrongfully dismissed—

Mr. DUPONT. No.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes. I am not going to bandy words across the floor of the House about this. When he was wrongfully dismissed from office by reason of a corrupt bargain that will for ever disgrace the annals of parliamentary history in Canada, the electors gave him a majority of six; and that corrupt bargain had the effect of driving from public life every person who was a party to it, with the single exception of the man who is Prime Minister in the province of Quebec to-day. We had a federal election in September of the same year, and what was the result? The pendulum swung the other way; the Conservatives carried the day. In 1886 the Liberals again came into power in the province. In 1887 federal elections were held, and the Conservatives again had a majority. Now, here is the important point. In 1890 we had an election in the province, which gave the Liberals a large majority, and in 1892, two years afterwards, we had another election, when that majority was wiped out, and a majority of 33 was given the other way. Can I not say truthfully that the political pendulum in the province of Quebec oscillates between one party and the other? Can I not say that in our province eternal vigilance is the price of liberty, and that eternal vigilance, whether rightly or wrongly, has been exercised by the people? Now, if the recent election has resulted more favourably to this Government in our province than elsewhere, what was the determining cause? The determining cause, I venture to say, is that the people of our province were more audaciously deceived than the people of any other. They have been deceived on the school question, and in other respects they have been more audaciously deceived than the people of any other province. I will call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to this fact, that the people of the province of Quebec have had the advantage of two object lessons. In the district of Quebec we had the Louise Embankment and the harbour improvements, well known to my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte). The other object lesson, which we had in the district of Montreal, was the Curran Bridge; and with these two object lessons before them, one can understand how the people of the province of Quebec went in the direction they did.

Now, let me look at the question of nationality. How has the province of Quebec as a whole acted in regard to that? You have had as Prime Minister of that province the Hon. Mr. Joly, a French Protestant, elected by a population of which 90 per cent was Catholic. More than that, you have as Premier in the province of Quebec at the present time an Irish Roman Catholic. These facts go to show the attitude of the province as a whole towards its public men, and how far the province as a whole considers these questions of nationality in meting out its political favours. But still more than that. From the condition of things existing in the province as a whole, let us come down to particular instances. Let us take Bonaventure, where certainly 75 per cent of the population is French Canadian and Roman Catholic. Whom did that county return to Parliament? My hon. friend Mr. Fauvel. Take Quebec West, and what do you find? You find that that constituency, containing almost a majority of French Canadians, and certainly a very great majority of Catholics, returned my friend the Hon. Mr. Dobell, who is a Protestant. Now, take the county of Portneuf, in which 90 per cent of the population is French Canadian and Catholic. The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Ives) spoke yesterday about the Rouge curés of the province of Quebec. If I wished to refer to the role played by certain gentlemen in the last elections, the opportunity is now afforded me; but I do not think it desirable or necessary under the circumstances to do so. But this good French Canadian and Catholic constituency of Portneuf returned my hon. friend, Sir Henri Joly, notwithstanding the appeals, which I may characterize as desperate, that were made against him by men high in authority. Then, take my humble self. I represent the county of Quebec, which was formerly represented for many years by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron), and in which at least 90 or 95 per cent of the population is French Canadian and Catholic. I contested that county in the local election in 1890, and my hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) can well recall certain allusions which were made to my nationality at that time; but those allusions did not materialize, for I was elected by a very large majority. In the last contest the same thing occurred again. The same allusions were made, but they did not materialize then either, and you see the result before you to-day. Under these circumstances, is it not fair for me to say that in our province nationality and religion play but a very small role? If the members of this House would only come down to our province, and see our people in their homes, and the steady, industrious, virtuous lives they lead, there is not a man in this House who would not feel for them the same affection which we who live amongst them entertain. Mr. Speaker, I trust that we have now done with all these questions of nationality and religion. I trust that in this House we, who are the chosen of the people, will, by precept and example, show that the avenues which lead to places of power and power are open to all, and that no man's religion or nationality ought to be used either as a barrier or as a stopping-stone. Let the only question be citizenship and capacity to do service to the State. Now, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, let me say that the Prime Minister ought to be proud of the result he has obtained in the province of Quebec. If he had had his majority in the other provinces, I am quite sure—to borrow an expression from the eloquent member for York (Mr. Foster)—that we would have heard the welkin ring to the tune of "He's got no power among his own people." But it seems to me it ought to be something for him to know that the province in which he has lived for over half a century, that the people among whom he has laboured and by whom he is best known, have given him a majority that we are proud to see in this House. It must be some comfort to him to feel that those who know him best love him and trust him the most.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Speaker, I would have preferred to have spoken earlier in the debate. Questions of great and varied importance which have come up during the discussion have already been dealt with by hon. gentlemen on both sides; so that it is almost impossible for me at this period to discuss those questions without repeating what has already been said. In addressing myself, however, for a few moments to the attention of Parliament, I do so more particularly for the purpose of putting my views before the House and country upon some of the points which have been brought out during the discussion, but I must at the very outset, following in the wake of those who have spoken before me, offer my congratulations to the gentlemen who were charged with the duty of moving and seconding the Address—a duty difficult to perform the first time it becomes the duty of a young member to move the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. The hon. the mover (Mr. McInnes) expressed his views in a very forcible manner. It was quite evident that he brought to the House of Parliament that energy and determination which characterizes the far-famed western country. The hon. gentleman expressed his views in such a manner as to convince every member of this House that with further parliamentary experience he should lose no opportunity or representing the views of those who sent him here, in such a forcible manner as to bring conviction to his hearers. If I have one reproach to make to the hon. gentleman, it is that his energy pushed him so far that if what he has asked the leader of the Government to grant to his province were granted, the older portions of the Dominion and the more eastern provinces would be left out in the cold. The hon. gentleman demanded for his province nothing less than a mint, the payment of ten million dollars to be returned to his province which he claims that province has contributed in excess of what is received from the Dominion. He also asks for Cabinet representation. I hope, in the interests of the Dominion at large that all his demands will not be granted, but the hon. gentleman certainly has acquitted himself of the duty which he had to perform in a manner which did him credit.

When I now come to the seconder of the Address (Mr. Lemieux), I must say that during my extended parliamentary career, I have seldom heard a speech delivered in a more eloquent manner and spoken in more perfect and classical French—that language wherein the poet and the orator and the historian have found the channel to communicate their labours and their thoughts to the civilized world. I differ from the hon. gentleman upon some parts of his speech. For instance, I have noticed that within comparatively few years, some four or five years, hon. gentlemen belonging to the Liberal party in the province of Quebec have endeavoured to place upon the pages of their political history the names of those distinguished men whom we consider to have been the founders of the Conservative party. The hon. gentleman in his speech referred to Lafontaine and to Morin and to Cartier as being connected with the party with which he is working to-day. Reading history as I read it, it becomes very difficult indeed for me to trace back to such men as the Morins and the Cartiers and the Lafontaines any connection with the old Liberal party or the party which has succeeded to it in the province of Quebec. I see that the leader of the Government, the Hon. Mr. Laurier, proclaimed in Quebec that Lafontaine was one of the greatest Canadians we ever had in that province. In that expression of opinion I am quite prepared to agree with the hon. gentleman, but I must say that those with whom he is in sympathy have not all spoken of Lafontaine in the terms used by him. In a speech which he made in the city of Quebec, on the 4th June, 1894, the Hon. Mr. Laurier, after quoting, amid the plaudits of the Liberals who composed his audience, the words used by Mr. Cartier on the union which confederation was likely to effect between the different races composing the Canadian people, he proceeded to use the following language, which with the permission of the House, I shall quote in the language in which it was delivered. Mr. Laurier said:

I am happy to find a Liberal meeting applauding such words. They are great, weighty, noble, generous words. It is the language of a man who also cared for the duties suggested to him by the special position in which his race stood. I am well aware, and do not forget, that the Liberals of Lower Canada dreaded confederation. I do not forget that Sir A. A. Dorion and the French Canadian Liberals feared that confederation would be the end of things, which we always consider as a sound inheritance; but Sir George Etienne Cartier had no such fear, and I, Dorion's disciple, pupil of Dorion's school, have no hesitation to say that my ideas in this respect are common with those of George Etienne Cartier, and not with those of Sir A. A. Dorion.

And some time later, on the occasion of the publication of Cartier's speech, he wrote that, of all the political leaders, he was the one who had "that clearest notion of the duties which the condition of the French race imposed upon him," and that he had "no superior outside of Lafontaine." Now, it is ignoring our history to refuse to acknowledge the fierce and spiteful struggle of which Lafontaine, Morin and Cartier were the objects. Lafontaine went out of politics, disgusted with the outrages with which he was overwhelmed by the Liberals. Morin, his successor, was insulted, slandered, and abused by these same Liberals. Cartier, the continuator of their work, was crushed by the Liberals, and haunted with their enmity, even while lying in his grave. The party founded by Papineau cannot reckon Lafontaine and Morin among its authors. The party that had Dorion for its leader cannot declare itself connected with Cartier.

I refer to this utterance of the leader of the Government merely to show that the very men who, like Sir George Etienne Cartier and the others, were instrumental in founding confederation and who were attacked so violently at different periods by the old Liberal party of Quebec, are now recognized by the Liberal party as the great men, whose opinion, upon one of the most vital and important question which has ever arisen in the history of Canada, should have been taken instead of the opinions of such men, able as they were, as Sir Aimée Dorion and other Liberals. It required, indeed, all the eloquence and ingenuity of the hon. gentleman to build up such a speech as that he has made upon such a flimsy foundation as the Speech from the Throne. I must say that ever since I entered Parliament I have heard the taunt thrown across the House that the bill of fare in the Speech from the Throne was very scanty, that there was very little in the political programme which the Government was submitting to the representatives of the people. But I am sure it would be difficult to find in the history of Parliament, since confederation, at least, any precedent Speech from the Throne in which so very little was indicated to the people of the policy which the Government intended to follow. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that the leader of the Government hardly attempted to defend the charge made against the Administration of having given no intimation of his policy in the Speech given by His Excellency. But he stated that at this season of the year too generous a diet would be deleterious to a delicate stomach. Whether he considers that the Canadian stomach is too delicate to receive more than he has given them or not, it is hard for me to say. But I am quite sure of one thing, and that is that Canada will certainly run the risk of inanition instead of dying of surfeit if the hon. gentlemen stick to the homœopathic practice which they have followed on this occasion in distributing in the tiniest globules the information which the people are entitled to. If the Speech is looked into, I think it will be found that it can be reduced to two items. The first is the reason given by the Government for calling Parliament at this inconvenient season. Well, Sir, I wish to ask any man of impartial mind, I will put it to any hon. gentleman on either side of the House, if it is not the fact that the reason why Parliament was called at this season of the year was that the gentlemen who are sitting on your right, Mr. Speaker, the members of the Government, during the last session of an expiring Parliament, had recourse to a system of obstruction, a parallel for which it is impossible to find in the history of any parliamentary assembly. Hon. gentlemen opposite, knowing that Parliament could not sit beyond a certain period of time and knowing that the Government had submitted to Parliament one of the most important questions which has ever come under the consideration of an assembly of this kind—the Manitoba school question—forgetting the duty which they owed to the country, determined by means of obstruction, to prevent the Estimates from being passed. The eloquent member for the county of Quebec (Mr. Fitzpatrick) said that it was right to refuse to give supplies to a party who intended to change the Government existing at that time, and to form another. But every effort was made by the Government of the day to meet any objections that could be raised. It was proposed that the Estimates should be voted only for the Civil Service, if Parliament would agree to that; it was proposed that the Estimates should be voted only for six months, if Parliament would agree to that, or for three months if Parliament would agree to that. And if any of these reasonable propositions had been accepted, if gentlemen opposite had thought only of the interests of the country at large, and had forgotten party strife and party advantage for the time being, this session need not have been called, and the Canadian people would have been saved an expenditure of $10,000 a day, or $300,000 a month. Could these supplies have been used for any other purpose than that for which they were voted? Was it possible, under the rules of the constitution, and with an Auditor General in office, for the Government to apply Estimates otherwise than as Parliament directed? How, then, could any risk have been incurred by accepting one of the reasonable propositions which were then made? But they were all rejected, and it is for that reason that we are called together at this inconvenient season, and at a very large expense which will have to be explained to the people of Canada—and I think that when the time comes for the people to consider the reasons why they have been put to this very large expenditure, they will see that it was not the Conservative party who placed them in that position, but the hon. gentlemen who now sit on the Treasury benches. There is another question which, from my standpoint, certainly should have been mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. It is impossible, as we know, to change the fiscal policy of the country without causing widespread disturbance of industry. Within a comparatively short period we have seen a great disturbance take place in the United States, through President Cleveland's changing the old protective policy which had obtained in that country and trying to interfere with the tariff which at that time existed. I think that the Speech from the Throne should at least have indicated—without going into details of policy or stating particular changes—the general lines upon which these changes were to be made. In the declarations made by hon. gentlemen opposite, from one end of the country to the other, it is plain that every possible fiscal policy has been accepted at one time and rejected at another time by the hon. gentlemen. We know of instances in the province of Quebec and in the province of Ontario, where manufacturers have reduced their establishments, and where intended investments have been held back until the policy of the Government was known. Sir, it is impossible not to realize that the great mass of the people of Canada are favourable to the National Policy; they are favourable to that policy because they have had an opportunity of judging of both systems. Who can forget the difference which exists between the Canada of 1874 and the Canada of to-day? Who can forget that under the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, after the Liberal party came into power under Mr. Mackenzie in 1874, the trade of Canada, the industries of Canada, the credit of Canada at home and abroad, were on the verge of ruin? It is impossible to deny it. But when Sir John A. Macdonald, sitting on the Opposition benches with but a small following at his back, sounded a note of encouragement to the industries of Canada by propounding his National Policy, then we saw Canada revive, we saw new industries started, the credit of Canada improved, everything seemed to partake of new life, and it was properly called the National Policy because it was a policy which gave life to the nation; it was properly called the National Policy because its far-reaching effects on the future of Canada are felt even to-day to a greater extent than one could have expected when it was first inaugurated. Sir, we are told that the people of Canada, on the 23rd of June last, reversed their former verdict. I deny that in the province of Quebec from which I come, and in the great manufacturing centres of that province, the opinion of the people has changed as regards that policy. I should like an opportunity to test the question whether public opinion is still in favour of the National Policy, or whether it is favourable to free trade, or would go in for continental free trade, or go in for any other one of the shifting policies which, one after another, hon. gentlemen opposite have been trying to get the people of Canada to accept. Sir, four times since 1874 the people of Canada have been called upon to pronounce upon the National Policy, and four times the people of Canada declared that that policy was suitable to the wants and to the requirements of this country. Free trade may be all right, and it might be proper to discuss the expediency of adopting free trade under such circumstances as it was adopted in England when, after England had been protected to a degree not reached by any other country in history, when England had been protected to such an extent that she required all the markets of the world in which to distribute her goods, then she went in for free trade. But having, as we do, alongside of us an enterprising, a rich and industrial people like the United States, it would be detrimental to the best interests of Canada to change our policy and to go back to the system under which Canada was nothing else but a slaughter market for the surplus of the manufactured goods of the United States. Sir, I think the people of Canada—and I do not now speak in any party spirit, should have been told in the Speech from the Throne, the lines upon which the Government proposed to make modifications in the tariff, and they should have been informed in what direction the changes were to be effected. Sir, if you go among the industrial population of Montreal, Hamilton, Toronto, or of any other industrial centre, you will find at this moment that there is stagnation, there is a want of activity, there is hesitation to invest in capital so as to increase the output of those manufactures as it would have increased if people were sure that this policy would not be reversed. Now, Sir, I wish to say a few words about a question which has agitated, not only my own native province, but the whole Dominion of Canada, a question which is now known to history as the Manitoba school question. Upon that question, at another time and in a different place, I have on more than one occasion stated my views, and I wish to state here to Parliament and to the country that I stand upon that question now where I stood as a member of the Administration of Sir Mackenzie Bowell. We have heard a great deal about that question having been used, on account of its importance, in a way that it ought not to have been used in the recent election. Sir, when we saw Sir Mackenzie Bowell, a strong Protestant gentleman, take his political life in his hands and fight the battle of the Manitoba minority, certainly his course did not indicate any fanaticism. When I saw the present leader of the Opposition fighting one of the most brilliant battles that any man has ever fought for a cause and for a principle, when I saw him at his time of life going from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean and pleading that justice should be done to a Catholic minority, I was convinced that if fanaticism exists in Canada at all, as it does exist in every other country, it exists probably to a lesser degree in Canada than in any other country in the world. Now, what was the explanation of the fact that Catholics and Protestants met on the same platform to fight on behalf of the minority? It is this, I never looked upon that question as a religious one. I looked upon it as a constitutional question, and we had the decision of the highest authority in the judgment of the highest tribunal in the British Empire, a tribunal far removed from our political strife, that under the constitution these people had been deprived of rights which should be restored to them. Sir, if I understand rightly the meaning of our federal compact, unless you can prove to the minorities, Catholic or Protestant, that that compact is comprehensive enough to protect their rights, I say confederation is a failure, and cannot meet the wants which it was devised to meet. I place my opinion upon record, that I fought on behalf of the minority of Manitoba because I thought it involved a question affecting the future of this country. I considered that what had occurred in Manitoba might take place in other provinces of the Dominion, and unless the people of Canada were satisfied that the provisions of the constitution would be applied impartially to every race and creed, to every province and portion of the Dominion, the people would lose confidence in the constitution and it would prove a failure; and I fear not to affirm that here. We know well that within a few years public opinion has been growing in favour of Imperialism, I mean in the sense of a closer union between the colonies and the mother country. I am an Imperialist to this extent, that I desire the closest possible union between the colonies and England. I know not what Providence has in store for Canada, but I sincerely hope that the connecting link between this Dominion and the Empire will ever be maintained. At no period of the world's history was a people more completely protected, or no country has developed more rapidly than Canada as a portion of the British Empire. It has not been necessary to spend the money of this country in maintaining a consular and diplomatic service, in building fleets to enforce our treaties, and without treaties we cannot expect to become a commercial nation. Under the British flag our commerce is respected the world over, and thus we are enabled to apply the resources of this Dominion to the construction of railways connecting the eastern portion of this country with the Pacific province, thereby opening new territories, and attracting capital from the old world for investment here. Lately I read a report on the development of Rossland in British Columbia, and if half of the progress reported is true, there is certainly a future for that province as regards mineral development that will prove unequalled. Mr. Speaker, I affirm that my position on the Manitoba school question is one based on the constitution under which I am proud to live. Any hon.

member, be he Catholic or Protestant, who comes down to Quebec will see people of the two different races and different religions living side by side in peace and harmony, prepared to help each other when the time of trial comes. One day it may be a Protestant helping a Catholic and the next day a Catholic helping the Protestant; in fact, Quebec is a model in this respect not only for the other provinces of the Dominion but for any country where different races live side by side. It is a model province for the most perfect accord exists among its people and there the school system is understood so perfectly that it is impossible that any trouble should arise between the different religious elements. If the constitution recognizes, as it does, that certain educational rights had been granted to the minority of Manitoba. I shall not be satisfied until those which have been taken away are restored, and I should have been pleased to learn from the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat on what lines he wishes to settle that very difficult question. Sir, it is important to the whole country to obtain this information. This question has been agitating the country too long already, and it seems to me that all the facts connected with the issue are perfectly well known, but I must admit that it is impossible to ascertain from the hon. gentleman's remarks on what possible lines hon. gentlemen opposite can be brought together to agree upon a line of policy. For instance, the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) in his manifesto on the eve of the election, said:

The removal of the Manitoba school question from federal politics would be a blessing, but we must wait awhile before we know whether the amicable settlement which Mr. Laurier promises will meet the demands (of Mr. Choquette).

In his recent manifesto the member for Montmagny declared:

For a settlement of the question of the schools in a manner efficient and practical, and on the basis of recognizing and of making the local authorities of Manitoba recognize the rights and privileges of which those authorities have despoiled our co-religionists in their province.

If the question was settled according to the policy enunciated by that hon. gentleman, I should be quite satisfied; if the rights of which the Manitoba minority were deprived were restored to them, I should be perfectly happy. Satisfied as I was in regard to this policy, I read to-day in the Montreal "Gazette" a statement regarding a different policy, and with the permission of the House I will read a letter issued by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) which appears in that journal. It is as follows:—

Mr. Dalton McCarthy, who had the unusual honour of being elected for two constituencies, North Simcoe and Brandon, Man., resigned the latter seat in the House of Commons to-day.

and elected to sit for the Ontario riding, with which his name has so long been connected. In a letter which he issued this evening to the electors of Brandon, Mr. McCarthy makes a statement of public interest regarding the school question. The letter is as follows:—

I have delayed determining for which of the constituencies I have been returned for I should sit, until, by usage of the Imperial Parliament (we have no settled practice, nor, as it happened, any precedent in Canada), the time has come that I ought to announce my selection. My nomination as a candidate for your division, and my election therefor, was, as I understood it, to manifest in the clearest possible way your settled opposition to Dominion interference with your school system; and I have to consider whether in the interest of that cause, which I represented in the last Parliament and in the contest which has just been brought to a close, I should retain the seat to which you have done me the honour of electing me, or hold that for North Simcoe, for which, for nearly twenty years, I have been continuously returned.

Recent events have enabled me to reach a conclusion in this question without much difficulty. Did there appear to be a possibility of the coercion of Manitoba, my duty would probably have required me to remain one of Manitoba's members, but, happily, coercion is dead and the victory for the opponents of interference with Manitoba is complete and decisive, and, moreover, it is announced that negotiations are pending between the Government of the province and the new Administration here for a settlement of the question, which, there is no reason to doubt, is based on the principle of leaving the province absolutely free as to the management of its own school system. Whatever may be conceded by the province of her own free will, to be carried out by her own legislature, and so far as I have been able to ascertain by the terms of the negotiations now on foot, the province is not called upon to yield anything which does not leave the principle of national schools undisturbed, nor more than may reasonably be asked for by those who believe in religious education in our public schools. But, however that may be, it is clear that my usefulness as your member is gone when the question is removed from the arena of Dominion politics.

I ventured to say in my place in the House of Commons last session, when the leader of the House practically announced the withdrawal of the Remedial Bill, that the House had seen the last of the Remedial Bill at either that or any future session. Is it presumptuous to refer to the accuracy of this forecast? Under these circumstances you will naturally expect that I should leave the constituency of Brandon free to be represented by one more conversant with your local requirements than I, a resident of Ontario, could possibly be, and who will in that view, and possibly in other respects, more fittingly represent you. While thus severing the short connection that has existed between us, I may be permitted to say that, as is not unnatural, I have been able to acquire more information and a greater insight than I hitherto was possessed of respecting the position and legislative and administrative wants of the province, which may, I trust, in the future, enable me to be of some service to it; and I can assure you that, as the only poor recompense in my power for the honour you have conferred upon me in electing me, an outsider, and personally unknown to the vast majority of you, as your representative, it will be my duty as well as my pleasure to promote and further in every way that I can the political and material wants of the great province of which you form a part, and more especially those of the electoral division of Brandon.

Now, Mr. Speaker, here are two very divergent statements made by two of the leading members supporting the present Liberal Government. One insists upon the school question being settled upon the basis of restoring schools to the minority. For one I agree to that extent, that the rights which were accorded to that minority under the constitution should be respected and should be restored. But on the other hand, we have quite an opposite view given. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) says: Did not I tell you all along that nothing would ever come out of the school question; did I not tell you last session that it would not come before Parliament again? And now, Mr. Speaker, when the gentlemen opposite, who through their obstruction prevented us from getting a vote beyond the second reading of the Bill, when they are in power, they have these two contending and antagonistic elements within their ranks. I say that the people of Canada had a right to have some intimation given them as to the lines upon which these negotiations were going on, and as to what was the policy of the present Government upon that question. Sir, I venture the opinion that until that question is settled, this unfortunate agitation will not be allayed. No man deplores more than I do such an agitation in a country like ours. Every patriotic man should try with all his energy to put an end to these irritating questions which divide race against race, and religion against religion, and which distract the attention of the people from the great problems which they have to solve for the advancement of their country. Now, Sir, I wish before concluding to say another word upon this other point. I have heard hon. gentlemen speak of the hon. the leader of the Government—some approving and others not appearing to approve of his selection as the Premier of Canada because of his coming from the province of Quebec. Sir, I think Canada has outgrown parish politics. For my part, I am proud to see, and the province of Quebec is proud to see, one of her French Canadian sons occupying the high position which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) occupies. Is it strange that a descendant of that race which opened up the whole of this North American continent to civilization and Christianity, and which has assisted so much in its development—is it strange, I ask, that a descendant of that race should occupy the highest position in the gift of the people of Canada? But, Sir, I shall never select a man for any position because of his nationality, or because of his village, or the city or the town where he was born. If a French Canadian is deserving of this high position, why should he not have it? I am glad, Sir, to say that in the present Premier of Canada, the province of Quebec is represented by one of her most gifted sons. Differing from him as I do on almost every political issue that has come before the House, I am yet prepared to say here, as I have stated on every occasion and before different audiences, that I am proud as a French Canadian to see Canada represented by a French Canadian Premier. But, Sir, that is not enough for me. Beside the fact of his talents, beside the fact of his origin, beside the fact of his being a man who is fully capable of representing us in every path of life, I want from him a policy that will help on our country. I want him to be equal to the long list of patriots who have contributed towards the progress and the building up of this country. I want him to come forward with measures which will develop our country. If he should do this, it will be a glorious day for the French Canadian race to be able to say that under a French Canadian Premier the country had continued to develop and improve. But, Sir, how fatal it would be to us if, on the contrary, history will have to record that under the reign of a French Canadian Premier the progress of Canada was retarded, and that we did not realize from him the great expectations that we had hoped for.

Mr. LISTER. Don't be afraid, you won't have to say that at all.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am quite prepared to take the opinion of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lister) on that subject, and it is because I am prepared to take his opinion that I should like to tell him what will satisfy me in the shape of a policy that will develop the country, so that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lister), with his great influence over his leader, may induce the Premier to adopt it. I promise to tender whatever help I may be able to give to the hon. gentleman in accomplishing the end which I desire. For instance, Sir, because the Premier comes from the province of Quebec, I would not, as a Canadian, consent to see the great waterways of Canada handed over to a foreign country. I would not consent, as a Canadian, to allow the Americans, rich and powerful as they are, to come over here and pay a proportion of the cost of our public works. I think the national pride of Canada would be hurt by that, and I believe that the future of Canada would be jeopardized if we permitted such a transaction. Let us take our time if need be. If we can develop these great natural waterways which we have inherited, so as to transfer our produce through the great lakes to Liverpool, let us do it, and if need be let us take our time in doing it. If we are not rich enough, and if our population is too small to improve these waterways in a few years, let us take more time, but do not let us divide the bill of expenses between the Americans and ourselves. Sir, how is it possible that any public man in Canada could dream of sharing the fisheries—our greatest heritage—with any nation of the earth, except upon the condition of receiving full compensation for the great privilege accorded. Instead of such a policy as that, let us have a national policy. I am for friendship and amity with the United States. I admire the people of that country. I have many friends who live in the United States, and frequently it is my great pleasure to enjoy their hospitality, to admire their great national wealth, and to see the wonderful development of their industries; developed under a protective policy similar to the policy which the Conservative party has applied to Canada. But, Sir, I hope never shall we hear in the precincts of this Chamber, or outside either, a Canadian who would advocate the handing over of our fisheries or the sharing of our fisheries, with any other nation unless we get full value for that great privilege.

In that Speech, I should have liked also to see some announcement as to the intentions of this Government with reference to the question of a fast Atlantic service, the measure for which the late Government, the Government of Sir Mackenzie Bowell and the Government of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, fought so long and so successfully—a measure in regard to which they succeeded in inducing the Imperial Government to share the views of the Canadian Government, so far as to agree to contribute a very large subsidy from the Imperial treasury to help to establish that great service. I would like to hear the opinion of my hon. friend from Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) on that important question, because I have heard it rumoured that he advocates a line of seventeen knots. We should have been informed in the Speech from the Throne what the policy of the Government is on that very important question. I quite understand that it would be unreasonable for us to ask the hon. gentlemen who have just come into office to lay down a programme so detailed as to be final and complete. I quite understand that even if that information were given to us, we on this side of the House ought not to delay the session in order to take up so important a measure; but we should know something about the policy of the Government in regard to it, so that Parliament would be in a position to give it full consideration in another session. But nothing is said in regard to it, and are we to run the risk of losing that Imperial subsidy which possibly may never be offered to us again. My hon. friend who leads the Opposition had a great deal to do with that important question when in England. It was due in great part to his energy if he succeeded in getting that Imperial subsidy. But are the British Government going to give a subsidy for a seventeen-knot line? Never. Why should they? We have a line of steamers at present which is not a seventeen-knot line, it is true; yet the difference between the present line and a seventeen-knot line would not be great enough to induce the Government of England to help to establish the new line by an Imperial grant; because the object of that Government is to obtain a means of communication between the extreme east and Liverpool and London in the shortest possible time. It was part of the policy propounded by the late Government to have the steamers built under the supervision of the British Admiralty, and it was upon that condition that the Imperial Government were prepared to contribute a large sum of money towards their construction. Sir, I have but one word more to say. The hon. member who preceded me, the hon. member for Quebec County (Mr. Fitzpatrick), to justify the issue of the Governor General's warrants, instanced the railway service. Why, Sir, I remember the day when a resolution was moved in this House by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), condemning an expenditure of $300,000 which was required for the Intercolonial Railway, under a Governor General's warrant. So that upon that question, again, it seems to me the authorities differ. I desired, Mr. Speaker, in as short a speech as I could make to express my opinion more especially upon a question—the school question—with which my name has been identified. I fought the question from the beginning upon the grounds I have stated to the House, and I still adhere to the same grounds.

After Recess.

Mr. MONK. Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to claim your attention or that of the hon. members of this House. I had formed the project rather of listening to this, the first debate which I have witnessed in this House, in order to obtain information and to adopt some guidance for my conduct in the future, in so far as I might be called upon to take part in the debates of this honourable House. If I am induced to break that resolution, it is due to the silence of the hon. leader of this House (Mr. Laurier) upon a question which deeply interests the constituency I have the honour to represent. I feel, Sir, that it would scarcely be fair to those who have honoured me with their mandate for me to remain silent and not to join my voice to those of the many who have been heard before me in soliciting from the hon. leader of this House some categorical utterance regarding the fiscal policy of the party which he leads—some statement of the governing principle which will guide him and his colleagues in the examination of the tariff, which is the task

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

they are to enter upon as soon as we separate. Permit me to tell you, Sir, and the hon. members of this House, that I represent a large constituency with two-fold interests—with great interests that can be secured, protected, and safeguarded by a few words, which it is my duty to-day to ask the hon. leader of the House to utter as soon as he can possibly do so. The constituency which I represent is contiguous to the city of Montreal, the metropolis of this Dominion. It lies to the north-west of that great city. As you leave the city limits and enter the constituency of Jacques Cartier, you find a large number of manufactories which extend far into the county, as far as Lachine. These manufactories have been encouraged by the sacrifices of the local municipalities in which they are established. But, Sir, there is something more. They have been built up and have prospered and are standing there to-day in virtue of the policy which has controlled the destinies of this country during the past eighteen years. I am not in a position now to say what is the capital invested in these large industrial enterprises, but I think I am safe in saying that millions have been invested in them by serious men who are anxious to know if the fiscal policy under which these enterprises have begun and have prospered is going to be continued, or, if modified, in what sense, in what direction is that modification going to tend. Of these vast sums of money invested in these enterprises, there is this view to be taken, namely, that the continuance and maintenance of them engrosses the care and attention of a large class which, I think, is entitled to the earnest consideration of this House and Government. I speak of the numberless workmen employed in the maintenance of those industries and in their operation. And let me tell you, Sir, that a more intelligent, a more diligent and a more thrifty class of people I have never met, although I have travelled much all over the world. Now, Sir, as you go west from that part of the constituency which is settled in the way I have indicated, you meet with a large agricultural population. That population has in its possession a farming country of the richest quality, and they have sought to carry out in their farming operations all the improvements which modern progress and science can suggest. That class is also deeply interested in the knowledge of what the fiscal policy which is about to be inaugurated is going to be—at least what is going to be its leading principle. Not only is that class interested in agricultural pursuits, but the properties upon which they live, being in the immediate vicinity of Montreal are undergoing a continual change. In other words, what is an agricultural property to-day, in view of the continual progress and enlargement of the city of Montreal and its extension in every direction, loses its agricultural aspect and obtains a market value as town sites. This class, therefore, which is a numerous one in that constituency, is deeply interested in the progress of the city of Montreal, is deeply interested in the increase of its industries and in the maintenance of the industries which exist there already. Now, let me tell you, Sir, in a few words, in so far as our fiscal policy is concerned, what was the attitude of both parties in that constituency during the last contest. By explaining this, I think I will give you some justification for the request, which, on behalf of those I represent, I make to the hon. leader of the House, to give us some clear and categorical intimation of what his fiscal policy is going to be. Well, I believe that the contest in that constituency began at an earlier date than it did in most of the other constituencies of this Dominion. The issue, as far as the fiscal policy was concerned, was a clear one. My adversary and those who supported him, and who supported the hon. leader of this House, advocated openly the policy of a tariff for revenue only. There was, in their estimation, no other policy suitable to the present economic conditions of this Dominion. And they pointed out to the agricultural classes of that constituency that, under such a policy of tariff for revenue purely and solely, the taxes—that was the expression used—the heavy taxes which they were called upon to pay every time they purchased agricultural implements, would be abolished, and that in future, in the immediate future, they would have a right to expect that upon the purchase of these implements they would have no taxes whatever to pay. It was stated also, Sir, to these same classes that the agricultural depression which afflicted them as it afflicts most of the agricultural classes of this country and of other countries as well, would disappear completely, if they gave a favourable verdict to the party, then out of power, on the 23rd of June. We were told at every meeting that we would have a market for our agricultural produce, a paying market, a better one than we have at present. Well, Sir, on my side, it is needless for me to say, we advocated a different policy. We maintained that the fiscal system under which the industries which I have mentioned and the city of Montreal, in whose welfare our own is to such a great extent bound up, could only be maintained by the continuance of that policy which has been called the National Policy, the object of which is the protection of our industries and the development of our own natural resources. I believe, Sir, that in that part of the country the policy of a tariff for revenue only was not popular. At any rate it was condemned at the polls. But, Sir, while in my constituency the contest had assumed the character which I have indicated, I think I am right in saying that in several constituencies in the immediate vicinity, notably on the Island of Montreal, many of the supporters of the present Government, some of them unquestionably, were in favour of the maintenance of the policy of protection. In view of this state of things and the various utterances which from time to time have fallen from the lips of the hon. leader of the House, is it too much to ask that upon this, the first opportunity which is given him since assuming the reins of power, he should tell us in clear and unmistakable terms, not exactly what the details of his tariff will be—this would be a demand which, in my opinion, would be unfair—but, Sir, to tell what is going to be the guiding principle which he will adopt in working out the details of the tariff which he promises to lay before us within a short space of time? It seems to me there is nothing unreasonable in this demand; it seems to me, on the contrary, that it is only just, not only to those classes which I have the honour to represent here to-day but to the country at large. I feel convinced that there are many in the same position as my own constituency. It seems but fair, Sir, that to the country at large the hon. leader of the House should state now what is going to be his governing principle during the examination which he is about to make. That, at any rate is a demand which I feel justified in making; and I trust that, as soon as possible, and certainly before we separate, in the interest not only of those whom I represent, but, as I have said before, in the interests of the whole country, the hon. leader of the House will find it possible to give us clear information of what his principles are upon that most important subject. It has been urged that it is impossible upon so short a notice for the hon. leader of the Government and his colleagues to give us the information that we crave. But, Sir, I submit to you that the subject upon which we require him to enlighten us is one upon which he has been pondering for a very long time. It seems to me, Sir, that during the long period of time that the hon. leader of the House has spent in criticizing the acts of the late Government and its predecessors, he has had ample leisure to make up his mind upon this question, which is a simple one. Eighteen years ago, Sir, the hon. leader of this House began the task of examining which would be the most suitable fiscal policy for this young Dominion. Why, Sir, at that time I was a mere stripling. Since then I have practiced law for what seems to me to be a very long period of time, I have brought up a family; and I think that the elapsed years have been amply sufficient for the hon. leader of the House to have made up his mind not, as I have already stated, as to the full details of the tariff, but as to what will be the guiding principle of the policy which he will adopt in framing a tariff to replace the one he finds so much fault with. I can remember that in my constituency during that long, and, as it seemed to me, interminable contest, it was urged on my behalf that the prospective Minister of Finance was the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and from past experience it was urged that the policy that had built up the city of Montreal and had so largely contributed to the aggrandisement and prosperity of my own constituency would be abandoned. Well, Sir, I have a distinct recollection that on many occasions it was publicly stated by my adversaries that there was no such danger. It was stated that the position of Minister of Finance would not be occupied by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), but that another position was reserved to him to which his high abilities undoubtedly entitle him, that he was going to the United States, and that he would there negotiate a treaty which would afford a magnificent market for the agricultural classes of my constituency. But, Sir, what have we to-day? I heard yesterday the hon. member declare that there were hundreds of items in the tariff upon which he and his colleagues intended to lay hands. That statement will go forth side by side with the continued silence of the leader of the House, and I claim that that is not fair to my constituents, that it is not carrying out the pledges which were given at the time of the election. In view, therefore, of the circumstances which I have just indicated, it seems only right that I should not lose the opportunity which is afforded to me of asking the leader of this House, on behalf of the classes whom I represent, to state to us, categorically, that which he ought to be in a position to state, to wit, what his fiscal policy is, and what principles will guide him in the task which he is about to enter upon. No more than that will I ask, and it seems to me that not only those whom I represent, but the country at large, are entitled to some clear statement upon that subject. Now, Sir, there was another question extensively debated during the campaign which terminated on the 23rd June last, I refer to the Manitoba school question. I do not wish to take up the time of this House at any length upon that question, because I believe that it is right that, at the present juncture the hon. leader of this House should have an opportunity of settling that question, as he has promised to do. I will, however, say this, that during the election we were told that the measure which we were defending before the people of this country was totally inadequate and unsuitable, we were told that it afforded no adequate relief to the minority whose defense we had taken up; we were told, moreover, in the province of Quebec, and more particularly in my own constituency, that as soon as the elections were over, and that a strong hand would have been given to the leader of this House, a commission would issue to make a full and complete examination into the grievances from which the minority were suffering. That commission was to be addressed to the then leader of the Ontario government, who was extolled to us as a man who would, in the shortest possible space of time, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, see that every one of the grievances of that minority should be righted, and that they should obtain complete redress. In all, or nearly all, the constituencies of that province, candidates on both sides pledged themselves that if redress upon some terms or other was not immediately afforded, then unquestionably a Remedial Bill would be passed. It was urged by those who opposed us that the Remedial Bill which they would introduce would go a great deal further and be much more complete than the one which had been accepted as sufficient by the parties aggrieved. Now, what do we find to-day? That commission has not been issued, no inquiry into those grievances is set a-foot. There is another commission which has been withheld, and it seems to me that as there has been a Remedial Bill, that withheld commission may properly be called a curative commission, because it unquestionably possesses strong medicinal properties, judging from the going and coming which has resulted from the withholding of that commission up to the present moment. Be that as it may, I will say frankly that I belong to those who were of the opinion that the minority had a grievance, that that grievance had been sufficiently set forth, that we were sufficiently enlightened upon that grievance, not only by the discussion which had taken place, but by the judgment of the Privy Council, and that under the circumstances, with which most of the members of this House are familiar, there was no other possible means of redress, there was no other duty incumbent upon us, but the passage of that Bill. As I have already stated, I am anxious that the leader of this House should have a fair opportunity of obtaining, by means which are best known to himself, that redress which I deem the minority is entitled to, and which I trust they will obtain before long.

A few words more and I am done. It has been stated that the change which took place in my native province was due solely to a race cry. It seems to me, for I have had occasion to observe and study the state of public opinion in that province, that that is not a fair statement. There were other causes operating which resulted in the change of public opinion that occurred; and I am anxious, as being deeply attached not only to that province, but to the people who inhabit it, that it should not go abroad that the people of Quebec, having to choose purely and simply between a constitutional redress which was due to a minority in another province and the opportunity to place one of their own people in power, abandoned and set aside the constitutional remedy which they should have supported, and were influenced purely and solely by a sectional cry. Many causes, in my opinion, two or three at least, besides that one, operated in my native province. I have no hesitation in saying that the business depression which has existed for some time not only in that province but in the whole country, contributed in some measure, in no small measure, to the change to which I have just adverted. It is undoubtedly the case that the depression which has existed not only in Quebec, and not only in this country but in other countries, operated as a factor, urging the people in that blind way which undoubtedly is followed under circumstances of that kind, and to vote or express their desire for some kind of change. I remember, Sir, in my own constituency an old French Canadian said to me: There are many speakers here to-night, but there is one who attends every meeting, whom you cannot keep away, and who is working steadily against you. And when I said: who is that speaker? he said: It is Mr. Crisis. In other words, there was undoubtedly in my own province a feeling that business was bad and that a change would not make it worse, and that even possibly some beneficial result might be obtained by a change. But in furtherance of the object which I have in view, the vindication of my province from the accusation that the people voted blindly for one of their own race, I will say this, that even in regard to that great constitutional question which was so lengthily discussed during the election campaign, there was undoubtedly in the minds of the people of my province a feeling of doubt. There was a feeling of doubt, which I think it is easy to understand when all the circumstances are considered under which that question came before the people for solution during last spring. This question was discussed at length and formed a subject almost unique for discussion during the by-elections which took place in my province last autumn or in the early part of the winter. It must not be forgotten that upon those occasions the leaders of the party then in power solicited the support of the people upon the distinct understanding and promise that that question was going to be settled and that the Remedial Bill would be passed without a doubt at the then ensuing session of Parliament. Of course, the causes which led to the non-fulfilment of that pledge, which resulted in the failure to carry out that promise, are well known to you, Mr. Speaker, and to all the members of this House; but to the people at large it appeared strange, after the pledge given, that they were not carried out. It was difficult for them to understand why they should not have been carried out. Then, again, undoubtedly operating as a factor to contribute to that state of doubt in which the people of my province found themselves, there was the withdrawal at a critical moment by Mr. Angers from the then Ministry. It is to me clear that the non-passage of that Bill during the last session, the peculiar circumstances, not easily intelligible to everybody, which accompanied the non-passage of that Bill, the position taken up by certain members of this House, and the state of business and trade just on the eve of the elections, were elements which contributed, at all events in my province, to some extent, to the result which became known to us on the evening of 23rd June. But, Sir, I will not deny that operating with those causes there was also side by side with the pledges given by every candidate favourable to the advent to power of the hon. leader of this House, a feeling among the French Canadian people that everything considered they would have one of their own race to lead the Government of this country. Well, Sir, in view of the circumstances which I have indicated it will not be for me to blame them. It is a feeling which to me is intelligible. It is a feeling which I can understand and with which I can sympathize. But, at the same time, it seems to me that this confidence which they have placed in one of their own, invites him in a particular manner to the performance of his duty towards the electors of this country, and of his own province. I trust, Sir, that he will see fit without undue delay, to give us a clear, outspoken, and categorical exposé of what his policy is, not only in regard to trade matters but also in regard to that question which I have already spoken on. For my own part, Sir, I hope that we will hear very little during the present Parliament of race questions, for a great deal too much it seems to me has been said about these questions hitherto. I will not speak of French domination.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Why?

Mr. MONK. I do not believe that there is such a thing as French domination. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that it would be better not to speak of the inhabitants of my province as Frenchmen. There are no Frenchmen properly so called in my province. They are now British subjects, and, as has been very ably said by one of our past statesmen: they are British subjects speaking the French language. They are not Frenchmen properly so called. They are Canadians, and on the morrow of that eventful day, nearly 150 years ago, when they passed under British domination they were allowed to abandon this country and to return to the country of their birth. Many of them did so, but the descendants of those who remained here are loyal subjects to the British Crown. Their history from that period onwards is one which does them infinite credit. What they ask to-day, is merely, that they be recognized as forming part and parcel of this great Dominion, as being co-heirs in the inheritance of all these great constitutional rights which belong to a free man who can proudly call himself a British subject. And, Sir, the people of Quebec, as has been pointed out this afternoon, are undoubtedly a broad-minded and generous people. Instances of this were given here by the hon. member for Quebec County (Mr. Fitzpatrick), and these instances are remarkable. But, Sir, you must live among them, you must go down and see them, you must see them in the everyday relations of life; and you must be with them, in order to appreciate all the noble qualities they possess. And, in the midst of these racial cries which existed,—and which I trust will soon be hushed for ever—it is a satisfaction for me, and it goes some way to illustrate what was stated this afternoon, that as between me who am but half a Frenchman, and as between my opponent who was wholly one, they elected me in the last contest.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONK. I hear an hon. member ask me: who I am. I remember upon one occasion, an adversary saying to me at a public meeting: Look at this man, he is neither a Frenchman nor is he an Englishman; he is on the fence, and there he will remain for the balance of his life. Well, Sir, part of that statement was true. I am not an Englishman nor am I a Frenchman, but that gentleman to whom I refer omitted to state that I was a Canadian. It is due to that quality of mine that I am sitting in Parliament to-day. I felt it proper, Mr. Speaker, that I should express these feelings upon this occasion, when to many people the results obtained in Quebec seem unintelligible. I believe, Sir, that the causes which I have mentioned operated together. I believe that the electorate of that province are intelligent to the highest degree. They follow political events carefully, and to those causes together, and not to one only, is due the result of the elections in the province of Quebec. The population of the province of Quebec has my entire sympathy. I have lived with them all my life. It has been my good fortune to teach law in a university where I had occasion to meet hundreds of the French Canadian youth of my province. It is a pleasure for me to say, upon this the first occasion of my speaking in Parliament, that a more intelligent and brighter set of young men I have never met. They are anxious and desirous of becoming thoroughly acquainted with the working of that great constitutional system which it was my duty to inculcate to them. I see some of them here to-day, Sir, and not the least among them is a former pupil of mine, the member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux), the seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONK. Of a turbulent disposition he was, Sir, frolicsome, and possessed of a spirit of independence which the gentle hand of time has mollified, but not entirely eradicated. But I am happy to state that not a more brilliant pupil left the university than the hon. member to whom I have just referred.
Mr. MONK.

Now, Sir, if the hon. leader of this House, for the reasons which I have indicated, has my sympathies so far, he must bear in mind, he who is so well read, what a great French orator stated, that there was but one step from the Capitol to the Tarpeian Rock; and if the hon. leader of this House fails to give to the country that satisfaction which, in the name of my own particular constituency, I have just demanded from him, if he falls into evil ways or strays into doubtful company, neither the race to which we both belong nor the language which we have learned upon our mothers' knees, nor the religion which we both profess, will save him from an adverse verdict when he comes before the people again.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of entering into this debate; but some remarks which have fallen from the last speaker, the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), lead me to enter a protest as a humble member of the great manufacturing class of Canada. It is said that the manufacturers of this country are at the present time standing in a state of timidity and tremor as to what the Government intend to do with the tariff, and are demanding an explicit declaration on the part of the hon. leader of the Government as to what his policy in detail is, notwithstanding the fact that only two months have elapsed since he was placed in a position which would enable him in any case to make any statement as to the nature of that policy. Now, I desire to state that the manufacturers of this country are not an unreasonable class of men. I do not believe there is a single manufacturer in Canada to-day who has stated publicly that he desires a detailed statement in regard to the tariff, ahead of the time when the new Government might be reasonably expected to have their tariff ready to present to the country. A great part of the capital invested in industrial establishments in this country is owned by Liberals; and in the late election we found the city of Montreal, part of the city of Toronto, including a large portion of the manufacturing district, the city of Kingston, the city of Quebec, the city of Hamilton, the city of Charlottetown, the city of Halifax, and various other cities throughout the Dominion, deciding in favour of the Liberal policy of tariff reform. The manufacturers who so voted on that occasion are not an unreasonable class of men; they are a practical, hard-headed body of men, willing to do justice and to give British fair-play to the Government thus placed in power. Now, I do not intend to take up the time of this House on the present occasion. I do not propose to enter into a discussion of all the questions that have entered into this debate ; but I did feel as a manufacturer that it is unnecessary for the members of the Opposition and the Opposition press throughout the country to make such strenuous efforts to squeeze, as it were, a policy from the Government before they are practically able to give it. It is an unreasonable expectation ; and I do not believe they have any right, knowing that the people of this country have decided in favour of the Liberal party, to make this demand. I know that the people of Canada to-day are not looking for such a statement, and are not expecting it before the coming session of Parliament. As a manufacturer myself, I have perfect confidence in the Government of the Hon. Mr. Laurier, and I believe they will so re-arrange the tariff that the business interests of this country will be thoroughly protected in its true sense.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FROST. That is all right. There is no doubt about that. I could point you to scores of industries in this country to-day which are not protected by the so-called National Policy, which has failed in every particular from the time it was inaugurated down to the present time.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name them.

Mr. FROST. There is not an industry in this country to-day—except a few that are monopolistic in their character and that have been especially fostered and looked after by the late Government—which is not languishing and in a state that requires immediate attention ; and I am positive, from the declaration made by the Government, that attention will be given to those industries. I have every confidence as a manufacturer that when the tariff is brought down, it will be found to work advantageously, not only for the manufacturers, but for the consumers and all other classes of the community, and will do away with the depression which we have heard so much about in the last two or three years, and bring back prosperity to the country. For my part I repudiate the assertion that the manufacturers are over-eager for the tariff policy of the Government to be declared. They are willing to give fair-play to the Government and to await the proper time for them to bring down their tariff, knowing that it is going to be right. It was only two years ago that we were told that tariff reform was to be brought about by the hon. ex-Finance Minister, and what was the result ? After he had made many changes in the tariff, which he claimed would effect a reduction of a million and a half of dollars in the revenue, we found that nearly every item in the tariff was put back in its original place, in consequence of the importunity of the followers of the Government ; and the result was that we got no tariff reform at all. There was not a single mouldering branch lopped off—not one ; and it now remains for the present Government to take that matter up and do justice, not only to the manufacturers, but to all the people of this country.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I crave your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, and that of the House for a few moments while I offer a few remarks upon the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne which we are now asked to consider. My hon. and learned friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), in giving the figures, this afternoon, of the results of the different elections in the province of Quebec, which have taken place since 1874, was rather consoling. He said that the political pendulum did move in the province of Quebec in such a way that at one time one party got into power and at another time another party got into power. That is consoling to us, for if at the last general election the Liberal party carried the province of Quebec with such a majority, it stands to reason, according to the historical sketch made this afternoon, that at the next general elections the province of Quebec will return an overwhelming majority of Conservative members. But my hon. and learned friend the Solicitor General was a little out when he talked about the majority which my hon. friend the Controller of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) got in 1877. Why, Sir, after the elections of 1877, on the first motion which was made in the House upon the issue which had been before the people, namely, the constitutional question—the question whether or not the late Lieutenant-Governor Letellier had the right to dismiss his Ministers—my hon. friend, who was then First Minister of the province of Quebec, was left in a minority of two. After that, I must say he had a solid, undivided and indivisible majority—the majority given him by the vote of the Speaker of the House.

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). During the whole session ?

Mr. CASGRAIN. Yes, during the whole session. While speaking of my hon. and learned friend (Mr. Fitzpatrick), I cannot help but call the attention of the House to the joy which must have filled the heart of my hon. friend from Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) in seeing the hon. member for the county of Quebec (Mr. Fitzpatrick) obtain the position to which he has been called and which he occupies with so much distinction in this House. I believe that my hon. friend from Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) was a little disappointed, however, when he saw that my hon. friend the Solicitor General did not get a Cabinet position, and I have heard it said—I do not know whether the rumour is true or not—that my hon. friend from Montmagny had actually got a round robin signed by the members of the district of Quebec asking that my hon.

friend the Solicitor General be appointed to a Cabinet position.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. You are not serious ?

Mr. CASGRAIN. No, of course I am not serious. It is the reverse that is absolutely true, as my hon. friend knows. But if my hon. friend from Montmagny was disappointed at seeing the Solicitor General in the place he now occupies, he must have some solace and consolation in the fact that the other day he was elected Chairman of the Debates Committee. If that is not sufficient consolation, I would ask my hon. friends on the other side, if I can give any gratuitous advice to them to tell my hon. friend from Montmagny, when he goes to them to-morrow with that dead meat scheme which he has put before his colleagues in the House, that they will take it into their most serious consideration.

I do not see here this evening my hon. friend from Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier). I am sorry I do not see him here, and I am sorry the hon. the leader of the House is not here, because I would like to call the attention of the hon. the leader of the House to the past services rendered his party by my hon. friend from Quebec Centre. For twenty-five long years has my hon. friend worked hard and well for his party, not only in the Dominion Parliament but also in the local legislature, and I am sorry to see that he has been left out in the cold. Among the many merits of the hon. member for Quebec Centre, I might draw attention to this shining one. It is said that at one time, when the purse of the Liberal party was very low, my hon. friend, by putting his name to certain promissory notes, which were afterwards taken up in the way we know, managed to raise the wind and got a certain sum of money for the political fund of the Liberal party in Quebec. But all the merits of my hon. friend from Quebec Centre have remained unacknowledged and he is not in the Administration. But for him as well as for my hon. friend from Montmagny there is also a solace, and that is the admission of the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) into the Cabinet in the very seat which my hon. friend from Quebec Centre would have liked to occupy.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Who occupies your seat in the Quebec Government ?

Mr. CASGRAIN. I must claim the indulgence of hon. members. I am but a young member in this House, unaccustomed to speak to a House of this kind, and I hope, Mr. Speaker, you will protect me. But, Sir, I remember full well, and my hon. friend from Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) remembers those tender epistles which were written by the hon. member for Quebec Centre concerning my hon. friend from Quebec West, at the time when the member for Quebec Centre was mayor of Quebec and the hon. member for Quebec West was a harbour commissioner. I believe at that time my hon. friend from Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) was endowed with a prophetic spirit, because he told my hon. friend from Quebec West, in those letters which were published in a Quebec newspaper that he would always feather his nest, no matter what happened, and the prediction has come true. There is something to me rather surprising in the fact that my hon. friend from Quebec West is now sitting alongside my hon. friend the Controller of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) and the hon. the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) and the hon. leader of the Government (Mr. Laurier). Why, Sir, I always knew my hon. friend from Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) to be a dyed in the wool Tory. He was a Tory of the Tories, a Conservative of the Conservatives, an Imperial Federationist—he had all the virtues of the best Tory in the land. Why, up to the 23rd of June last, there was no sign whatever that my hon. friend had changed or repented of the course he had thought fit to follow until then. Why, we have heard in this House the denunciations of my hon. friends against what they call the scandals of the Conservative party, but my hon. friend from Quebec West stood by the Conservative party through all these scandals and was never scandalized. On that very day, the 23rd of June last, when it was heralded all through this country that the hon. leader of the House was to be Prime Minister of Canada in a very few days, one of my friends, who had been appointed a committee of one, waited on the hon. gentleman, and asked him to ride in the carriage which was to drive the leader of the House through the streets of Quebec in triumph. That committee of one obtained the answer that the hon. member for Quebec West would not ride with those men through the city of Quebec and through St. Roch. I might say that the electric light was not very strong that night and the light of the torches was dim, and probably the light that was thrown upon the leader of the House was such that the face of my hon. friend could not have stood out in that prominence he desired, and the next day the papers could not have heralded throughout the country that my hon. friend had driven through the streets of Quebec with the prospective Premier of Canada. But how has this change come about in my hon. friend from Quebec West ? I do not know whether it is true or not, but I heard the story that one afternoon when my hon. friend was riding, not on the road to Damascus, but on the Grande Allée towards his beautiful seat at Beaumanoir, the spirit met him and said : If you turn your coat on the other side you will see that it is trimmed with gold lace, and you will wear a cocked hat and sword, and probably at no distant day a star upon your breast, and we will have a new Sir Richard—we cannot have too many of them. Sir, the spirit moved him, and the metamorphosis was completed. But my hon. friend will allow me to tell him that if honour and glory come to a man, the greater the glory and the honour, the more onerous are the duties and obligations imposed upon him towards the city and the district he represents. Now, there are matters which are not mentioned in the Address. Not many questions have been touched upon in this Address. There is one in particular which, to my mind, is of paramount interest to the city and district of Quebec which my hon. friend represents in the Cabinet. Let me take, for instance, this question of a fast line. My hon. friend was probably in the House the other day when this question was put to the Government:

1. What is the amount of the lowest tender for a fast steamship service between Canada and England? 2. From whom was the tender received? 3. Do the Government intend to award the contract to the parties who have made the said tender, and when?

And Sir Richard Cartwright answered:

Two tenders have been received, one from Messrs. Allan and the other from Mr. James Huddart. Neither of these tenders is in accordance with the specifications, and the Government proposes to make further investigations before final action in the matter.

Sir, to my mind that means that this question is shelved for a long time. Now, my hon. friend knows that for some years the citizens of the district and city of Quebec have thought this question of a fast line of paramount importance to them. They have thought that if they could get a fast Atlantic service between Liverpool and Quebec, it might tend to bring to the old capital of the province of Quebec a return of that prosperity which she enjoyed for some time. But, Sir, it is an open secret, it is rumoured in the city of Quebec, that my hon. friend is against the fast Atlantic service, that he is not in favour of a twenty-knot service, but he is in favour of a seventeen-knot service. I trust that he will re-assure this House, that he will re-assure his district and his constituency by telling us here this very evening that this is not correct, and that he is in favour of the fast line. Sir, if we are to have a service at all between Quebec and Liverpool, between Canada and England, we want the best that can be procured. Talk about a seventeen-knot service! Two years hence it would not be as good and as profitable to the district as the service we have now. It would not be able to compete with the fast lines whose steamers leave New York every day. And, as I have said, what we want, if anything, is the fastest and best line that we can get. Not only because it will develop the trade of this country, but because it will be one of the best advertisements we ever had, just as the Canadian Pacific Railway has been. To-day we are the highway by which the travel, traffic and trade between Great Britain and China and Great Britain and India pass, and if we have the fast Atlantic service it will be an advertisement of the same kind, and the best that Canada could ever have.

Now, Sir, there is another question which interests the citizens of Quebec, and which has interested them for a very long time. Ever since I first had anything to say in political matters, which is some time ago, I have always met my hon. friend in meetings in which the question of a bridge in front of Quebec or in its vicinity was discussed. My hon. friend, by his speeches and his writings, and by joining delegations time after time from Quebec to Ottawa to interview the Ministers, has tried to impress upon the Cabinet the necessity, at least, of contributing a good round sum toward the construction of this bridge. Was the hon. gentleman in Council when the answer to the question put by my hon. friend from Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) was decided upon? Can it be possible that my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) was sitting at the Council board when this answer was prepared. Here is the question that was put by my hon. friend from Quebec Centre, with the answer given to that question:

Mr. LANGELIER—Whether it is the intention of the Government to build a bridge in front of Quebec, or in the vicinity, to connect the Intercolonial Railway with the Canadian Pacific Railway, or to aid in the construction thereof by a subsidy or otherwise?

Mr. LAURIER—It is not the intention of the Government to build such a bridge. The Government have no application before them for aid in the construction thereof.

Surely it cannot be that the hon. gentleman was in his seat at the Council board when this answer was written, for the hon. gentleman knows full well that for the last ten or fifteen years a demand has been before the Government of the Dominion for aid, and for substantial aid, for the construction of this bridge in front of or in the vicinity of Quebec—not only one demand, not only one request, but dozens of requests, dozens of demands: my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) must have the record of these demands in his possession to-day.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Where is your old motto, "No bridge, no vote"?

Mr. CASGRAIN. I never said that—I deny it in toto.

Now, allow me to refer to the last paragraph of the Speech:

I hope that when you will have given the necessary attention to the consideration of the year's supplies, I may be able to relieve you from the duty of further attendance at this session of Parliament.

I take it, Sir, that this is a rather cavalier manner of dispensing with the services of the legislators who have been convened for the session. There is only one conclusion that I can come to after reading that paragraph, and after noting what is contained in other parts of the speech, and it is this—that what we have said time and time again upon the hustings, and what our press has re-echoed through the country is absolutely true, and that is that the Liberal party has no policy, that it has no programme, that it has no platform upon which it can stand. We have the evidence of it in the Speech from the Throne, and the silence which has been maintained from the very beginning of the session by every member of the Administration upon this great question is still further proof of it. But what about the programme elaborated in 1893? It is well known that Liberals from all parts of the country were called to meet in this great city of Ottawa to elaborate a platform, and that platform was elaborated. The delegates to that convention discussed the policy of the Government of that day, and declared the remedy which they said should be given at that time to the country. Where is that remedy to-day? I do not want the hon. gentlemen to come before the House and state to us that they are going to change such and such an item in the tariff and to change it in such and such a way. Not at all. I understand that since they came into power they have not had sufficient time to go over the tariff item by item so as to be able to tell the House the result of their deliberations. But what I say, and I think I am at liberty to insist upon it, is that they should tell us the principle upon which they are going to work. What is it that we are to have?—is it to be commercial union, unrestricted reciprocity, continental free trade—

Mr. LISTER. Read the resolutions.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Which resolution—the resolution passed in 1893, or the resolutions passed after the speech made by the leader in Montreal in 1895? Why, Sir, my hon. friend (Mr. Lister) would be at a loss himself to state to-day the principle upon which the changes are going to be made. But we have another programme, which was elaborated with great pomp and ceremony in Quebec in 1887. It will be within the memory of gentlemen in this House, and particularly of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), that in 1887, or the beginning of 1888, a great conclave of Liberals—

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). And some Conservatives.

Mr. CASGRAIN. And one Conservative, Sir—and he had to say he did not represent there his province.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. He was representing the Government of the province of Manitoba.

Mr. CASGRAIN.

Mr. CASGRAIN. We shall see, when I read the resolution, that it is not stated that Mr. Norquay represented his Government. The hon. Minister of Finance knows these matters much better than I do, of course, as he attended this conclave; but, as far as I remember, the fact is that Mr. Norquay was not there as representing his province officially. At all events, at that time this conclave was held, to elaborate a programme for this poor party, which had no platform and no programme. And this after the delegates had been notified months in advance to come with a programme, after having deliberated in their respective provinces. They did not go there unprepared. They came forward with an elaborated scheme, a scheme couched with great care in the resolutions which were adopted at that time, and which, from that day to this I have always understood formed an important plank in the platform of the party. It is a curious fact that there were present, Sir Oliver Mowat, a member of this Government, the Minister of Railways and Canals, the Minister of Finance, and representatives from the then Liberal Government of the province of Quebec. In their programme laid down in the resolutions which were adopted at that time, what did they say? First of all, you have a resolution about disallowance, that disallowance should not be practised as it was then, but that the power of disallowing at will all Acts passed by provincial legislatures should be withdrawn from the Governor in Council, and given only to Her Majesty in Council, as it was before. What has become of this plank in the platform? That has gone, like a great many other planks, and the platform is going also. Now, you have another plank in the platform, and probably that is gone, as to the constitutionality of the statutes, both federal and provincial. Could not something have been said in the Address about that? Could it not have been stated that that was one of the principles which were to be advocated, and upon which legislation was to be introduced and carried through this House? Then, again, you have the Senate. Why, the Senate was to be reformed altogether, the Senate was an institution no longer adapted to the spirit of the times, and we were to have a Senate elected by the people, or by the provinces. Has that plank gone from the platform also? But the principal plank was to increase the subsidies which were given to the provinces by the Dominion of Canada. Has that plank also gone? I say that even out of respect to those resolutions which had been adopted by the Quebec conference, by this plenary council of the Liberal chieftains of the whole party, it should have been mentioned in the Speech from the Throne that the Government adhered to that platform and to that programme which had been carried out at the Quebec conference. Not a word of all this; and the only reason I can find why this is not stated, is that these gentlemen in the different provinces, speaking at different places and in different parts of the country, have different policies; but now that they have got together, they cannot agree upon one single policy, nor upon one single plank of that policy, nor upon one single principle of politics.

Mr. LANDERKIN. When will your convention be held?

Mr. CASGRAIN. Very soon; in time to beat you at the next general elections. Now, let me refer to the fifth paragraph in the Speech from the Throne which, to my mind, is a most important one:

Immediate steps will be taken to effect the settlement of the Manitoba school question, and I have every confidence that when Parliament next assembles this important controversy will have been adjusted satisfactorily.

I am not going to weary the House at any length with this question, which has been fully debated, not only in the last session of the House, but also for many sessions. But it seems to me that I may call attention to the manner in which this question is treated in the Speech from the Throne, so as to show the divergence of opinion which exists between the views which were held by the hon. gentlemen when in Opposition, and the views they hold now that they sit on the Ministerial benches. This paragraph was supplemented by the declaration made by the leader of the House on the first day of the session, and also on the 20th inst. in his speech in this House, when he told us that the Attorney General of Manitoba had been invited to come down, how far we do not know, but to come down as far as Ottawa, at all events—and that a satisfactory settlement is in view, and further deponent saith not. That is all we know about the question, that is all we can gather, either from the Speech from the Throne or from the declarations of the hon. the leader of the House. Now, Sir, let us contrast this policy for a few moments and these declarations of the First Minister, with his declarations and his policy when he was in Opposition, and not only announced in this House, but also in the province of Quebec, and particularly in Quebec district. In 1894, I believe it was, I had not then the honour of being a member of this House, but, being a member of the Executive Council of my province, I had the honour of occupying a seat upon the floor of this House. At that time the school question came up, and I heard my hon. friend the leader of the House distinctly state here that if these schools were Protestant schools, and if Catholic children were obliged to go to these schools, it was an outrage against which he would protest, not only in this chamber, not only in every county, but in every district in the Dominion. Now, Sir, has he found out since Parliament met that these schools are not Protestant schools? We have not heard that any commission has been appointed to inquire into this matter. He must have found out, at all events, that there was a grievance, because if he had not found out that there was a grievance, he would not have invited the Attorney General to come down here to meet him in conference on this question, and to try and come to some settlement. But, Sir, during the elections it was stated, especially in the province of Quebec, it was stated as the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) mentioned a few minutes ago, it was stated all over the province, that as soon as the hon. gentleman became Premier he would appoint a commission to inquire into the grievances of the Catholic minority of Manitoba, and he was to devise a way by which to settle this question and redress the grievances from which these people suffered. Now, it was held all through the province of Quebec that one of the principal reasons why we should accept this commission was that it was to be headed by Sir Oliver Mowat, who had been held up to us as the great defender of separate schools in the province of Ontario. But, Sir, what was the declaration of my hon. friend the leader of the Government in his own constituency in Quebec. Here again he advocated the appointment of this commission, he told the people that within six months he would settle this question by the appointment of a commission, headed by Sir Oliver Mowat. He said: I will try the sunny ways of peace. I will try conciliation. But he went a step further and said: If conciliation does not succeed in restoring to those people the rights which they have under the constitution, then I will take the means provided by the constitution, and will use those means to the utmost. Those were his declarations to his constituents in St. Rochs. Sir, these declarations of my hon. friend the leader of the House were implemented to a great extent by the declarations made by his supporters all through the province of Quebec. In almost every county in the province where the majority was Catholic, a pledge was distinctly given to the electors, the promise was absolutely made, that every man of them would vote for a Remedial Bill. That I may not be accused of exaggeration in this matter, let me call the attention of the House to what was said by my opponent in the county of Montmorency. My opponent, the Hon. Charles Langelier, is a bosom friend of the leader of the House, is one of his henchmen, a gentleman who has accompanied him in many meetings, speaking side by side with him upon the hustings in Quebec. Sir, what did Mr. Langelier write over his signature to the electors of the county of Montmorency?

If I am elected, as I am sure I will be,—

There is many a slip between the cup and the lip.

—I solemnly promise to vote for an efficacious remedial law which will restore to the Catholic minority the rights and privileges which have been recognized as belonging to them by the Privy Council, the highest tribunal in the country.

And he went still further and gave a written pledge to every curé in the county that he would vote for a Remedial Bill which would be approved by the hierarchy of the province of Quebec. He was not the only one who did that. I can appeal to the hon. Solicitor General, who made the same declaration in his county; I can appeal also to the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), and to the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Angers), and to a great many other hon. gentlemen who made the same promise and pledge over their signature to the electors of the province of Quebec. So, Sir, war was waged against the Conservative party on this ground, that the Remedial Bill, which had been introduced during the last session of Parliament, was not worth the paper on which it was written, that it was an unsatisfactory Bill, and among others the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) gave reasons why it was unsatisfactory. He declared that the Bill did not give Catholics the right to choose their own school books, that it did not give them one cent wherewith to run their schools. It was announced that if the hon. gentleman who now leads the House came into power, he would give the country such a Bill as would restore all the rights taken away from the Catholic minority in Manitoba in 1890, that the Bill would be framed precisely and clearly on the lines of the remedial order and of the judgment of the Privy Council. This statement was emphasized by this declaration: how can you rely more upon an English Protestant like Sir Charles Tupper than upon a French Canadian Catholic like Mr. Laurier. These were the statements and declarations with which we were met in Quebec, and yet hon. gentlemen opposite would like to have the country believe that we raised national and religious cries. The religious, national and racial cries were raised by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, not only on this question but on every question which touches religion and nationality, and they are first in seeking to sow the seeds of discord and disunion in Canada. Even in regard to the paltry matter of $3,000,000 to be expended for buying arms, on every hustings in the province of Quebec it was said: they have no money to give for Catholic schools in Manitoba, but they have money to buy arms with which to fight for Great Britain. Those are the hon. gentlemen who tell us on this side of the House that we raised religious and national cries, whereas the charge should rest on hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You never did anything for religion over there.

Mr. CASGRAIN.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Those were the declarations made by my Liberal friends on the other side of the House when they were in opposition. But things have changed; they are there and we are here, and it seems to make all the difference in the world. Those were declarations made in opposition; but now that the responsibility of office weighs on the shoulders of the leader of the Government, now that he has the onerous duty of settling this question, he dare not come before this House and state his policy and the line upon which he is going to endeavour to make a settlement between the Catholic minority of Manitoba and the province of Manitoba. He hopes that this important controversy will be adjusted satisfactorily. But I ask, satisfactorily to whom? Settled satisfactorily to those who took away the rights of the minority in 1890, or satisfactorily to those who since 1890 have been fighting the fight of the constitution for the rights of those people which were taken away by the law of 1890? The hon. gentleman has been good enough to tell us that he could not satisfy everybody, that there is a certain class of people in this country that would not be satisfied with the settlement, and I believe he called those people the extremists. When this settlement comes to be known to the country the hon. gentleman will find there are many more extremists than he thinks exist at the present moment. We have been told that the Attorney General of the province of Manitoba came down to Ottawa to confer with the leader of the House and try to arrive at a compromise. But let me ask this House, who were the parties to this compromise? It seems to me whenever a compromise is to be effected the interested parties have to be present, and if they are not present, they must be represented by parties holding power of attorney and duly authorized to act. Who are the parties to the compromise which it is sought to bring about? Sir, the parties are the Attorney General of Manitoba and the Premier of the Dominion of Canada. And whom does the Attorney General of Manitoba represent in this matter? He represents not the Catholic minority but the government, which in 1890 wrested the rights of the Catholic minority from them, and has denied them their rights since. Whom does the leader of the Government represent in this matter? Can he show me in the Statute-book, in the constitution of this country one line which authorizes him to make a binding compromise in this matter, a compromise binding on any one, binding on the province of Manitoba, binding on the Dominion Government or binding on this Dominion Parliament? Upon whom, then, will the compromise be binding? Will it be binding on the Government of Canada or the Parliament of Canada, or on the legislature of Manitoba? Why, Sir, it is not even stated in the Speech from the Throne, it cannot be stated now that Manitoba will ever be asked to pass an Act setting out that this compromise is binding on anybody. But even if a law were passed, it would be valid only for a time, only so long as it was not repealed. There is only one way indicated in the constitution by which this question can be finally settled, and it is the course adopted last session by the present leader of the Opposition. It has been said often, and it was repeated in this House yesterday by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that Manitoba in this matter has been treated with indecent haste. Nothing has been said, however, of the indecent haste with which the rights of the minority were taken away in 1890. But let this question be as it may, I say this: There was no indecent haste, and I speak from the book, in the proceedings which took place before the remedial order was issued or before the law was sought to be passed by this Parliament. Let me in a very few words and as rapidly as possible, for I do not wish unduly to occupy the time of the House at this late hour, go over in chronological order what passed before the Order was adopted by Council. After the law was declared valid in 1892, a communication was sent to the Government of Manitoba, saying that an appeal had been lodged with the Governor General in Council, asking that redress should be given the Manitoba minority. Now, Sir, just mark what took place then? Did the Governor General in Council decide immediately that their right of appeal existed and that these grievances should be redressed? Not at all. It was decided that this case should be argued before the Privy Council of Canada, and the province of Manitoba was invited to appear. Manitoba was further informed that the case would be submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada, and it was submitted. Afterwards it was submitted to the Privy Council in England, but in the meantime on 26th July, 1894, the Dominion Government sent a communication to Manitoba:

Expressing the most earnest hope that the legislature of Manitoba may take into consideration at the earliest possible moment, the complaints which are set forth in this petition, and which are said to create dissatisfaction among the Roman Catholics, not only in Manitoba, but likewise throughout Canada, and may take speedy measures to give redress in all the matters in relation to which any well founded complaint or grievance be ascertained to exist.

And what was the answer of Manitoba to this communication. The answer was:

The executive of the province see no reason for recommending the legislature to alter the principle of the legislation complained of.

And further, the judgment of the Privy Council was rendered in the month of January, 1895, and before any remedial order was mooted, and before any remedial order originated, the Manitoba Government said this, in the Lieutenant-Governor's speech at the opening of the legislature:

Whether or not a demand will be made by the Federal Government that that Act shall be modified * * * it is not the intention of my Government to recede from its determination to uphold the present system.

And a resolution was passed in the legislature of Manitoba, saying:

That this House will, by all constitutional means and to the utmost extent of its power, resist any steps which may be taken to attack the school system established by the Public School Act of 1890.

Sir, the remedial order was passed on the 20th March, 1895, and sent to Manitoba. A session of this Parliament was convened, and when the time arrived in the opinion of a great many, that a Remedial Bill should be brought before this House the Federal Government still held back, because they thought they could compromise the matter in some way, because they thought they could get these people in Manitoba to redress the grievances themselves, and so they sent the following communication to Manitoba in July, 1895:—

It by no means follows that it is the duty of the Federal Government to insist that provincial legislation, to be mutually satisfactory, should follow the exact lines of this Order,—that is the Remedial Order. It is hoped, however, that a middle course will commend itself to the local authorities, that federal action may become unnecessary.

To this the Manitoba Government replied:

It is therefore recommended that, so far as the Government of Manitoba is concerned, the proposal to establish a system of separate schools, in any form, be positively and definitely rejected.

That was the answer made by Manitoba to these frequent communications from the Government of the Dominion of Canada. That was not all. A special session of the Federal Parliament was convened for January, 1896, to pass this Remedial Bill, and the Government still held back. Instead of inviting the Attorney General or any other member of the legislature of Manitoba to come to Ottawa to meet them, they went so far towards conciliation as to send to Winnipeg three of the most distinguished members of the Parliament of Canada, Sir Donald Smith, Senator Desjardins, and the Hon. Mr. Dickey, then Minister of Justice. But still the government of Manitoba said they would do nothing in the matter, and that they would not even come to a compromise, or an agreement, or an understanding between the parties. But, Sir, we are now told that my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) is coming to some satisfactory settlement of the question. What does this mean? I take it that the Premier is on the horns of a dilemma. If this satisfactory settlement can be brought about; that is if separate schools are re-established, then the Premier stands convicted before this House and before the country of having been a party to a bargain, to say the least of it, the most extraordinary which has ever presented itself in the political history of this country—a bargain, Sir, by which religious strife, discord and dissensions have been raised and continued in this country for six long years: a bargain, Sir, by which, and in virtue of which, these people in Manitoba have been deprived for years of that which has been called their right by the Privy Council of the Empire. And for what reason? For the sole reason of assisting my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) and his colleagues to mount the Treasury benches.

Sir, if that is not the case—and from what has happened I do not believe it to have been the case, because of the following facts. Did you notice that the Attorney General of Manitoba was here for a few days? The hon. leader of the House announced on the first day of this session that a satisfactory settlement was in view. Did you further notice, Sir, that the hon. member, the father probably of all this strife in this country, the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) resigned his seat for Brandon a few days afterwards, and came out with a letter in which he said: that what he improperly called coercion was dead, and that separate schools would never be restored to Manitoba? Therefore, I am inclined to the belief that it must be the policy of my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) not to give the Catholics of Manitoba their separate schools, and not to give them their rights which have been recognized to them by the remedial order of the Privy Council of Canada, and by the decision of the Privy Council of England. It seems to be the policy of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier), to make some compromise with his friends in Manitoba which would be satisfactory to nobody at all. Sir, if this is the case, then I say that the other horn of the dilemma is this: that my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) is recreant to the trust which has been imposed upon him by the people of the province of Quebec from whom he gets his majority. But, Mr. Speaker, in all this I see a graver question—a question which affects the future of this Dominion of Canada; a question which has already been alluded to by my hon. friend from Bagot (Mr. Dupont) in a speech delivered in the year 1895. I was not then a member of this House, but I was an attentive listener to the speech of that hon. gentleman (Mr. Dupont) and a most remarkable speech it was. My hon. friend (Mr. Dupont) drew this picture to the House. He said: Now this is only the beginning of compromises and settlements of questions in which it is sought to promulgate the doctrine of non-interference with the provincial Acts in a sphere which concerns the Dominion and not the provinces. Sir, this doctrine of non-interference has had a trial in other countries, situated constitutionally as we are ourselves, and as my hon. friend (Mr. Dupont) remarked it was initiated in the United States much in the same way as it has originated in this Dominion. May it never have the same results in this Dominion, and may we not reap the sad harvest from the seeds which have been sown by my hon. friends on the other side of the House, in this important matter. I do not want to be misunderstood. As has been said many a time, this is not a question of separate schools. It is simply and solely a question of the constitution. I want the wrongs of my fellow-citizens in Manitoba redressed, not because these people are French, or not because they are Catholics, but because under the constitution they are entitled to these rights, and because the highest tribunal of the Empire has pronounced that they are entitled to these rights. The constitution of our country is the same constitution for every loyal subject of this land. The constitution is intended for every subject of this realm, and it is no disqualification that a citizen of Canada should be a Frenchman, or should be a Roman Catholic. That is the stand that I take, and that is what I contend for. Sir, I hope that upon this question, as upon all other questions that affect the constitution of this country, whatever may be my predilections, or even my prejudices—for I must have some—I shall always be found in the front rank of the defenders of the constitution.

Mr. CHAUVIN. Mr. Speaker, in order to be shorter and to be surer in the few remarks I have to make, I beg the favour of this House to pronounce them in French. I suppose that, under that French domination which has been alluded to as existing, it will be allowed, even to a member of the Opposition, to speak in that language which is the language of the leading majority of this House. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, the two main issues which have been debated during the last electoral campaign, are the tariff question and the Manitoba school question. I think I am quite in order in asking the Government of the day to emphatically declare to the House where they stand on those two questions, the more so as no mention is made of them in the Speech from the Throne. The hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) remarked the day before yesterday that he did not expect a revision of the tariff at a moment's notice, and that the duty on agricultural implements could be removed later on. No doubt the removal of the duty on agricultural implements could be put off, as it affects the interests of but one industry. Without sharing the opinion of the hon. member, I believe that, so far as the tariff revision is concerned, it might as well be put off to another session. It is, however, none the less true that, by reason of the silence of the Speech from the Throne on that question, the various policies exposed by the Liberal party at different times are hanging like the sword of Damocles over the country. But as regards the Manitoba school question, I believe that it is not one of those questions which can be delayed to another session, without making heavier the burden of taxation on the shoulders of the Catholic minority in Manitoba, and without, at the same time, rendering unbearable the yoke under which they are groaning, in connection with a question of such paramount importance as that of education. Mr. Speaker, we are here by the will of the people; we are the delegates of our respective ridings, and our electors have a right to know from us what pledges the Dominion Government means to give to the downtrodden Catholic minority in Manitoba. The Speech from the Throne announces that the question is put off till the next session of Parliament; and in so doing, the Government seemingly adhere to their old policy, to the tactics resorted to by them when in the Opposition; they are still moving as it were, the six months' hoist. But, Sir, apart from the Speech from the Throne, we have a statement from the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Laurier) to the effect that this important question was settled, but the silence of the Speech from the Throne on the same matter is ominous. It is far from containing all the wealth the Government lay claim to. Instead of the horn of plenty the hon. Premier (Mr. Laurier) promised to give us, during the late electoral campaign, the Government of the day, the Speech from the Throne gives us only Pandora's box. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, it was through sheer modesty that the Government, while bragging of their wealth of the organ of their leader, have provided such a meagre bill of fare in the Speech from the Throne. They should have put in the mouth of His Excellency some announcement as to their political programme, so as to give us an insight into all the wealth of information and the treasures they lay claim to in connection with this Manitoba school question. If the settlement they are about to make of this question is to be satisfactory to the people of this country, why have not they taken this House and the country into their confidence? Let them make to this House an emphatical and unequivocal statement on this question. How can this House believe in the sincerity of the Government, when we see banded together the very men who formerly declared that they were unable to agree upon the solution of this same school question, and who, now declare that with a legerdemain, by simply exchanging salutations in the office of a Minister they have set at rest a question about which the Liberal party was at loggerheads for six years, and which, I confess, also did mischief among the Conservative party. Now, Sir, either there was a secret understanding between the Government of the day, the Opposition at the time, and the Manitoba government, or there was no understanding. If there was an understanding between the Manitoba government and the Liberal party when in the Opposition, in connection with the settlement of this question; and if such understanding was entered into so as to create an agitation throughout the country; in short, if it was understood that this agitation would cease only at the time when the Liberal party should come into power, I say, Sir, that this was a criminal plot entered into with a view to creating and fostering a most dangerous agitation in this country. Now, if there existed no such secret understanding between the Liberal party and the Liberal government of Manitoba, why then all this talk about conciliation and negotiations? and on what authority does the Prime Minister announce on the floor of this House that this question is settled with the provincial government? How can the leader of the Government tell us that the province of Manitoba has desisted from opposition, and that she is willing to grant more than she has ever promised to do. How happens it, Sir, that it was only necessary for Mr. Sifton to set his foot in the capital, to pay his respects to two or three Ministers, to enable him to go back to Manitoba and declare that the question was settled to the satisfaction of the interested parties in the province of Manitoba? We have a right to exact more from the present Government than we did from the defunct Cabinet, because the former promised more. If we have no right to exact more from them, we, at least have a right to exact as much, because of the promises made by them in connection with the settlement of the school question. If the Liberal party, when in the Opposition, could settle this question, a fortiori they can do so now that they are in power. The hon. leader of the Government (Mr. Laurier) is now in a position to give us a full and efficacious measure. He is now bound to introduce as efficacious a Bill as that framed by the late Government. As I said before, the hon. Premier is in duty bound to introduce a better measure than that of the late Government, because he has given to the people of this country pledges which bind him more strictly. The hon. Premier has told us of an earthquake, an upheaval which shook the whole of Canada and resulted in a revolution in the respective state of the political parties in this country. The hon. Prime Minister, no doubt, recollects that this cyclone swept over the province of Quebec, with the result that this province threw herself into his arms. I say that the province of Quebec threw herself into his arms and now she asks him to be faithful to the promises made to her people and to redeem his pledges; she claims with good reason the fulfilment of those pledges. In connection with the Manitoba school question, the position to which I committed myself, during the electoral struggle, before the electorate, was independent enough to enable me to tell the hon. Prime Minister that if he introduces a measure calculated to do justice to the Manitoba Catholics, I shall cordially support it. And in so saying, I believe I am but re-echoing the declarations made by the hon. leader of the Opposition himself (Sir Charles Tupper) who, on the day following the elections of June last, also emphatically declared that the Prime Minister of the day would receive his most cordial and fair support in the settlement of this question. Moreover, I think I am but re-echoing and voicing the sentiment of those who, on this side of the House, preceded me in the debate and more particularly the feelings of the French speaking members from the province of Quebec, when I state that we are all proud to see a Catholic French Canadian Premier at the head of affairs in this country. But we shall be proud of that honour conferred on our race only inasmuch as the hon. Prime Minister will constitute himself the champion of the interests of the province of Quebec, and in so far as he will uphold the cause of the Manitoba minority, a cause which interests not only the province of Quebec, but the whole Dominion, inasmuch as it is the cause of fair-play and justice in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. HACKETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a few observations on the important questions now being discussed by this honourable House, and as it is now nearly half-past ten o'clock, I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I am sorry to say to my hon. friend that I cannot agree to his motion. I stated yesterday that we would have to sit to-night at least to the usual hour, half-past eleven.

Mr. HACKETT. Mr. Speaker, in rising to make a few remarks, it is not my intention to detain the House very long. In fact, I do not know that I should have addressed the House at all this evening had I not felt it a duty devolving upon me, as representing a very important portion of this country, to state my views on the important questions under discussion.

At the beginning of this discussion, the hon. mover of the Address spoke of the great resources of the province of British Columbia. As to the greatness of those resources there can be no doubt. They are well-known to the whole Dominion of Canada. The people of this great country, from the province of British Columbia on the Pacific to the island of Cape Breton on the Atlantic, all know perfectly well the great resources of the province of British Columbia. I was surprised, however, to find the hon. gentleman stating that he was pleased that a party were now in power in Canada who would accord to the people of that province more generous treatment than had been given to them by the late Government. He went on to say that the people of British Columbia were paying into the exchequer of Canada a very much larger amount than they were receiving therefrom. Now, I am not going to dispute the justice of the hon. gentleman's complaint; he may have a reason for that complaint; but it is a most difficult matter, indeed, for the representative of any province to state the exact amount paid into the exchequer of the Dominion by the people of that province. While we can calculate exactly the amount received therefrom, we cannot state exactly the amount paid in. But I say the province of British Columbia should be the last province to complain of having to pay in a larger amount than it receives from the Exchequer of Canada. We know that the Canadian Pacific Railway, which was undertaken by the Conservative party, opened up the resources of that great province. We know that the building of that railway was denounced at the time by the party who the hon. gentleman now says will accord to that province more generous treatment. The money required for the building of that railway was contributed by all the provinces of Canada. I come from a province down by the sea—in fact, it is a province surrounded by the sea—and the people of that island have not received any benefit direct or indirect from the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway; yet they are to-day contributing their share to pay the interest on the money borrowed for the construction of that work. Now, I say it ill-becomes any representative of a province or a section of a province of this country to complain that a supposed amount is being paid into the exchequer by that province or section in excess of the amount received therefrom. All the provinces of this Dominion are contributing equally with the province of British Columbia. Sir, the building of that great railway afforded means of transit through the province of British Columbia as well as through the whole Dominion, from one ocean to the other, and the placing on the Pacific Ocean of a fast line of steamships is due to the enterprise and energy of the company that constructed that railway, making a highway from the east to the west for British traffic through the province of British Columbia, so that large quantities of goods which are consumed in other parts of the country are entered there. The hon. gentleman had very small reason indeed for his attack on the late Government for their treatment of the province of British Columbia. I remember, when I had the distinguished honour of being a member of this House some years ago, when a gentleman named Mr. Bunster came here from the province of British Columbia, and made a provincial complaint in this House as to how the interests of British Columbia were being neglected. At last his expectations were fulfilled. The Government of this country, led by the late Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, gave a contract for the building of a portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway west of the Rocky Mountains. Mr. Bunster was highly delighted at what was done by the Government; but what was the action of the leader of the party who now sit on the Treasury benches? Mr. Blake, the most distinguished member of that party who sat in this House, during my time, at least, characterized the province of British Columbia as "a sea of mountains." He held up before this honourable House a map showing the province of British Columbia, and stated that the mountains were painted brown, and, Sir, the whole of British Columbia was painted brown. He was doing it up brown. But, owing to the great energy of the hon. gentleman who now leads this side of the House, the contract was carried through, and afterwards a company was formed for the building of the whole line of railway, in the face of the most strenuous opposition offered by the gentlemen who are now sitting on the Government side of the House. Was not this generous treatment for the province of British Columbia? No more generous treatment could have been given to any province. We were all glad of it, because we all felt that the solemn compact entered into should be carried out. It had been agreed that British Columbia should be brought into communication with the other provinces by the construction of a railway, and we all felt it incumbent on us, and in the interests of the Dominion, that this railway should be built. I want to show to the hon. gentleman who moved the Address that the party he is now supporting, and from which he expects most generous treatment, has always been opposed to the progress and prosperity of British Columbia. In proof of this, I shall give him, not my views, but the views of a gentleman who, in 1881, represented a constituency in that province, a gentleman of mature years and great experience, and who had then become the father of a fine boy, who has now the honour of sitting in this House as a representative of that distant province. I shall give the hon. gentleman the views of Mr. McInnes to show what Mr. McInnes expected from the then Opposition with regard to the province of British Columbia. In 1881 Mr. McInnes said:

Mr. CHAUVIN.

If it was not that British Columbia was a remarkably strong and vigorous child, the life would have been crushed out of her long ago by the treatment of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake).

He went on further to say:

If it had not been for her great recuperative powers, she would have been crushed to death, and the member for West Durham would have been placed on his trial, not only for assault and battery, but for infanticide.

This was the opinion of Mr. McInnes with regard to the treatment which the province of British Columbia was then receiving from the gentlemen now sitting on the Treasury benches. Then he went on to refer to a statement made in 1879, when the National Policy was being introduced, by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). He then quoted this extract from the hon. gentleman's speech:

Who undertook the building of the Nova Scotia and New Brunswick Railway? The Hon. Finance Minister (Sir Leonard Tilley) and his associates. Who undertook the enlargement of the St. Lawrence canals but his hon. friends and his associates? Who undertook the Welland Canal but those hon. gentlemen? Who undertook the public works at Ottawa and the public buildings of the Dominion but his hon. friend and his associates? Who undertook the building of the Pacific Railway, the most destructive and ruinous of all? Who undertook to fix upon this Dominion that incubus of British Columbia, that cancer financially of British Columbia, that was eating into the vitals and entailing a heavy financial burden upon the country for all time to come? Who undertook that but the Hon. Finance Minister and his associates?

What kind of treatment, then, can the hon. member for Vancouver expect from the gentlemen now sitting on the Treasury benches who expressed themselves in that way at so late a period? Sir, it would have been no great trouble for the hon. gentleman, if he wished, to inform himself of what these gentlemen did in the past to have gone to the library and searched through the records, and he then would have become enlightened to such an extent that he would never have ventured to charge the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) with neglecting British Columbia, or ventured to expect from hon. gentlemen opposite better treatment.

Referring for a moment to the Speech from the Throne, I must say that I cannot see very much in it to comment upon. It contains so very little, and that little has been so much commented upon by hon. gentlemen who have preceded me that there is scarcely anything left for me to say. But the speech refers to one matter, and that is the tariff. We are promised that an investigation will be had into the workings of the tariff during recess, and that action will be taken at the next meeting of Parliament. I trust that nothing will be done to take off the duties on raw materials, as promised by the hon. leader of the Government. There are some articles of raw materials, at all events, which should be protected. While Prince Edward Island, which I have the honour to come from, is not a manufacturing island, while the people there are an agricultural people, and while a certain portion of them are engaged in fisheries yet we are interested in having certain mines and minerals in the neighbouring province of Nova Scotia protected. We know that since the inauguration of the National Policy a great industry has gone forward and flourished in the province of Nova Scotia. I refer to the coal mining industry. We know that in 1878 that industry was in a languishing condition. The mines were then being closed up, the miners were being thrown out of employment, the greatest want was being felt by those people; but by the introduction of a protective duty, a stimulus was given that industry, and it went on increasing and prospering until now it has attained great importance. Around these mines, owing to the large output of coal through the encouragement given by the National Policy, towns have sprung up, and the people of Prince Edward Island find to-day in those towns and villages their best customers for their surplus market products. Around the coal mines and the iron mines and those manufacturing centres in the province of Nova Scotia, we find that we can sell our surplus products, our oats, our pork, our butter and cheese and other articles, while a few years ago no such market at all existed. Now, this is largely due to the imposition of the duty on coal, and I would therefore ask that, in the interests of the great portion of the lower provinces, nothing could be done to discourage those industries, but that instead every protection be given them. Speaking of protection, we know very well that oats are being sold at the seaboard in the city of Boston for about the same price as in the city of Halifax. Only remove the protection which the farmers have of 10 cents a bushel on their oats, and you would have the markets of the maritime provinces flooded with American oats, and take away from us the only means we have of disposing of our surplus products. Therefore, while you keep the duty on the raw material of coal and iron, you also need to keep it on the raw material of oats and pork and other products which come in from the south of us where they can be produced so much cheaper than we can produce them, bringing undue competition to bear against our farmers and driving us out of our own market. I have no objection whatever to a reciprocal treaty with the United States. I trust the hon. leader of the Government will be able to negotiate such a treaty. But, while they impose upon our products a heavy duty and thus shut us out of their markets it is only fair and just and right that the people of Canada should be protected in their own markets and the people to the south of the line kept out with their products.

I pass to another matter, which is not referred to in the Speech from the Throne, but which has been largely commented on here—the statement made by the leader of the House to the reporter of an American newspaper that certain important interests of the people of this country would be surrendered to the people of the United States. I want to say here, and I say it in all sincerity, that it would be a most serious thing for the people of the Maritime provinces if their valuable fisheries should be handed over to another country. This is the heritage of our people down by the sea and a great many of them gain their living from the wealth of these waters. It would be a suicidal course, a course unworthy of a statesman, a course that would not be approved by the people, but would be condemned by them at the first opportunity, to hand over these valuable resources to a foreign nation without any compensation whatever. Sir, we know the result of giving the use of these Atlantic fisheries in years past to the Americans. To-day we have thousands of people sailing over these waters looking for that most valuable fish, the mackerel. But that fish is not now to be found in these waters. Week after week and month after month our fishermen are out, returning often without any reward for their labour which should afford support for themselves and their families. What is the reason for this? It follows from the use of purse seines introduced in these waters by American fishermen. That engine of destruction has driven from our waters this valuable fish. Are we to hand over without compensation these fisheries which with proper protection must be such an inexhaustible source of wealth? I am glad to see the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in his place, and I trust he will protect the interest of the people who have sent him here. But, as I have said, it would be a most unwise and unstatesmanlike thing to hand over these valuable fisheries to foreign control without receiving due compensation. I am not speaking now of the canals, to which I hear reference has been made; I confine my remarks for the present to the question of the fisheries.

It will not be necessary for me to refer at greater length to these matters of local interest. I come now to a question that was discussed on every platform from the Atlantic to the Pacific in the late contest. With us, I am glad to say, no race or religious cry was raised because of it. We discussed the question there calmly and fairly and with good sense, although it was a question that created a great deal of feeling all over this country. I refer to the Manitoba school question. We were led to believe, by the decision of the Privy Council, the highest judicial body in the Empire, that certain rights possessed by the minority in Manitoba were taken away by the provincial legislation of 1890. And we defended the action of the leader of the late Government and his colleagues. We believed that every step in the way of conciliation had been taken by the Government of the Dominion but that the Government of the province had shown that they had no desire to settle the question amicably or in a kindly and generous spirit, that they would insist upon having a public school system. Therefore, we could see no way out of the difficulty except by means of remedial legislation in this Parliament. The hon. leader of the House says that the matter is now in a fair way of settlement. I, for one, trust that he will settle the question satisfactorily to the minority in Manitoba and as well as the majority of the people of Canada. But I fear, from the statement made by the hon. gentleman the other evening, that he does not expect to be able to accomplish this. He said he could not hope to please the extremists, who would insist upon the pound of flesh. There is no question of demanding the pound of flesh; it is a question of maintaining rights guaranteed under the constitution. He declared, in that eloquent manner for which he is noted, that there were people who would see their country bleeding at their feet and still insist upon their pound of flesh. What part of the country is bleeding to-day and has been bleeding for the last five or six years? The minority in Manitoba. They are asking for the maintenance of their rights. It is from that the pound of flesh has been taken, and the hon. gentleman will allow the present state of affairs to go on for six long months more instead of settling the question. If the hon. gentleman can settle this question, let him settle it now so that it may be at rest for ever, let him not go on concealing, as he has great ability to do his real ideas upon this subject—as his great countryman said, using words to conceal his thoughts. I do hope that this question may be amicably settled and settled in a manner that will bring peace and harmony in that country. For this Canada of ours is a good country and requires the attention of her statesmen for the development of her resources. If we are to prosper and progress, we cannot afford to dabble in race and religious differences. There should be concord and peace among all classes. Let the Englishman, the Scotchman, the Irishman, the Frenchman or the German and every other go to work like true Canadians, putting aside questions of race and religion, and unite in building up Canada into a country such as it should be made.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) I wish to move the adjournment of the House, to which, I hope the hon. Premier will kindly condescend to give his assent, owing to the fact that one of the French stenographers is sick and incapacitated from doing his work.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). (Translation.) I regret exceedingly to be unable to accede to the desire of my hon. friend, because if we are anxious not to unnecessarily protract this session, it becomes our duty to proceed with the debate up to midnight, at least. Yesterday, we adjourned at half-past ten, and, under a rule of this House set up by the late Government during the previous sessions, a rule I approve of, we ought to continue sitting until half-past eleven at least, if not midnight.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) The hon. members on the other side of the House, Sir, have, at the opening of the session, given expression to their satisfaction as well as to their surprise at finding themselves sitting on your right. As far as we on this side of the House are concerned, our surprise and our astonishment at this change has not been so considerable as that experienced by the hon. members who sit on your right. Long since, under the ordinary run of events, the hon. members who have sat for eighteen consecutive years as members of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition, should, in our opinion, have crossed the floor of this House and found themselves in the position they now occupy. I have no manner of doubt that, if, in 1887 and 1891, the Liberal party had professed, in connection with the fiscal and financial policy of the country, the same views they thought fit to advocate at the opening of the last electoral campaign, I doubt not, I say, but that the hon. gentlemen opposite would have, long since, reached the ministerial benches, a consummation so long and devoutly wished for by them. For many years past, the hon. gentlemen obstinately combated public opinion, entering into a hopeless contest with the leading manufacturers in the country, opposing the views of the great farming community, those of the important mercantile and commercial classes, but I have no hesitation in telling the hon. gentlemen that had they yielded to the demands of those classes they would have long since crossed the floor of the House and reached the Treasury benches for so many years coveted by them. In order to compass that end, they had to modify their views and felt it necessary that their fiscal policy should receive its quietus. It was not the platform of the Liberal party that came out victorious at the polls at the last general election, it was the Conservative programme. Wearied as was public opinion with the protracted continuance in office of the Conservative party, I believe I am warranted in saying that had the hon. gentlemen opposite gone to the country upon their old fiscal policy, instead of sitting where they now sit, they would be sitting here. The hon. First Minister himself, at several large meetings held in the commercial metropolis of Canada, endeavoured, many and many a time, to allay the fears of the manufacturers and of the merchants of the city of Montreal. In the course of the electoral campaign, his candidates, his political ensign-bearers during the last struggle, gave to the farming community the most emphatic and, at the same time, the most contradictory assurances, stating that the burden of taxation created by the Conservative Government when imposing high duties on manufactured products coming from foreign countries, would be lightened, because the Liberal Government, or the Liberal party had a secret policy, but that policy they have not yet unfolded neither before the House nor before the country. But in virtue of that secret policy, they were going, they said, to lighten the burden of taxation which pressed upon the farming community and, at the same time, continue giving the same protection to the manufacturing industries. I have, Sir, taken a pretty active part in the last electoral contest: it was my privilege to address public meetings in various ridings in the province of Quebec, and to debate political issues with the hon. gentlemen who now sit on the Treasury benches; and upon those several occasions, it was a surprise to me to hear the Liberal speakers abjuring and going back on their free trade policy, and giving, as I said, formal pledges to that effect to the farming community, to the working classes, as also to the manufacturing interests of great cities. I do not intend, Sir, for the moment, to pursue that matter any further than to say that, later on, I shall go into details which may prove very interesting for the hon. First Minister and to his friends, and especially to those who come from the province of Quebec.

When addressing the House the other day in those terms which we all admired, my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, gave expression to certain doubts as to the merit of the policy carried out by him with a view to the maintenance of the constitution in connection with the rights of minorities, whether Protestant or Catholic, English or French. My hon. friend confessed that he had greatly overrated the importance attached by the Catholic population of Quebec to the rights of the Manitoba minority. My hon. friend may have been led into error, as to the wisdom of his own attitude, from the verdict given by the electorate of the province of Quebec. The hon. leader of the Opposition, indeed, who has made such a vigorous campaign through the length and breadth of the land, so as to strike with admiration and astonishment the whole electorate, from British Columbia to Prince Edward Island, my hon. friend, I say, could not, perhaps, get as full an insight as we did into the tactics of the Liberal party, into the strategy of their leader, and of his friends who, according as they addressed the electorate in cities or in rural constituencies, whether they had to deal with Catholics or Protestants, with French or English hearers, resorted to contradictory pledges and assurances, and to tactics which I shall not qualify as unfair, not to use an unparliamentary expression, but which I may say were open to suspicion, and not creditable to the hon. leader of the Government and to his friends.

Mr. Speaker, I intend first to address myself, in the few remarks I am about to make, to the tactics of the hon. gentlemen who will give their support during this Parliament to the hon. leader of the Government, both on the fiscal and financial policy, and on other issues debated during the last campaign; and I shall also deal with the way in which the Dominion Government should redress the grievances and right the wrongs of minorities, whenever provincial authorities overstep their jurisdiction and encroach upon the rights and privileges guaranteed to them by the constitution. The hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) and the hon. gentlemen who took the floor before him, have all told the House about the pledges given by the Liberal chieftains and candidates in the province of Quebec. In the debate of yesterday, we have been told of the pledges given and of declarations made by the hon. gentlemen to the French Catholic electors of the province of Quebec, where the Liberal speakers declared before the people on the hustings that, should their leader come into power, the interests of the minority would be safe in his hands, and that their rights would be restored to them, in their entirety. Such were the declarations made and the pledges given by the hon. gentleman to further the Liberal cause and the success of the present Premier at the polls. I am surprised now to hear the hon. Premier talk of compromise. I am surprised to see his colleagues from the province of Quebec who, during the last electoral campaign evinced such a zeal in favour of the minority, telling the electors that the Remedial Bill introduced by the late Government was wholly inadequate, and that they would go a great deal further. I am surprised, I say, to see the same hon. gentlemen who proved themselves such obstructionists during the last session, preventing the Remedial Bill from passing into law, now sitting speechless, standing mute in their places. None of the hon. gentlemen dare say a word in reply to the serious charges brought down against them. None of them dare ask a word of explanation, not only from the hon. gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches, but also from those who sit behind them, and who seem so averse to speaking about the pledges given by them to the electors, in order, no doubt, the more easily to forget them. As I just said, Sir, it was my privilege to address many public meetings in my native province, and, let me tell you what I saw and heard upon those several occasions. First, everywhere I heard the same language spoken in connection with the school question; everywhere, I heard the same pledges given to the electorate of the province of Quebec; everywhere, the people were told that the safety of the minority depended upon the coming into power of the hon. First Minister and his colleagues. Let me first read to the House some reports of the speeches delivered, taken, not from Tory newspapers from the province of Quebec, organs of the late Government, but from public sheets expressly founded by the hon. Premier and his friends, in order to propagate his political ideas and doctrines during the last electoral campaign. One of the hon. members from the province of Quebec, who was returned to this House on the 23rd June, the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Bazinet) gave to the French Catholic electors of his constituency the pledges I am about to read. Here is the report of the "Soir," a newspaper edited in the city of Montreal, in connection with the speech delivered before a large public meeting held in the county of Joliette by my hon. friend, the present member for that riding in the House of Commons. The article bears the date of the 17th June, 1896, and is headed "Large political meeting held at Joliette; the Liberal candidate in attendance." Let the hon. members opposite who would be tempted to charge the Conservative party and its followers with making a traffic of religion, listen to the edifying utterances of the hon. member for Joliette. I do not blame him for proclaiming aloud his creed and religion, but I say, Sir, that whenever Conservative candidates or speakers go from platform to platform in the province of Quebec making loud-mouthed professions of their nationality and creed, the Liberals never fail to arraign them on that score before the House and the country. The hon. member for Joliette spoke as follows:—

I am a Catholic and a French Canadian, and you, gentlemen, who know me, are aware that I have as much personal devotion as any one else to the interests of my race and religion. I shall always look upon as my first duty to vote for any measure calculated—

As you see, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman from Joliette is hostile to any compromise, but will be satisfied with nothing more nor less than a measure calculated, as he says:

—to give redress to the grievances of our Manitoba compatriots, and will meet with the approbation of the bishops of this province.

Such was the language used by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Bazinet) when urging the electors of his constituency to give their support and their vote to the hon. Premier. Far be it from me to lay any blame on any member of this House for making public professions of his religious or national views; and in that respect, Sir, I think I am more liberal-minded than some of the hon. gentlemen opposite. I shall not cast any blame on them for appealing to the national feelings of their compatriots, and for giving them pledges that should the hon. First Minister come into power, justice would be meted out to the Catholic minority in Manitoba, as surely as if the hon. leader of the Opposition of the day were put at the head of affairs. But I say it is unfair from the hon. gentlemen opposite to pretend that the hon. leader of the Opposition had not put before the country a well-defined programme. Quite different in that respect from that of the hon. Premier who had one platform for Ontario and another for Quebec, as evinced by the statements of his own organs, while the hon. leader of the Opposition had one and the same programme for the whole country, for Protestants as well as for Catholics. The hon. leader of the Government had not the same language for all his fellow-citizens from British Columbia down to Prince Edward Island. It is on record from the reports of his own organs that he had, when he spoke in Ontario a different policy from that propounded by him before his faithful electors in St. Rochs whose representative in the Commons he has now been for so many years. The "Soir" has been indiscreet, and since the elections are over, the hon. gentlemen are no doubt loath to hear it quoted. Many statements have been made in that organ which the hon. gentlemen opposite would rather had not been made. The hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Bazinet) does not stand solitary among the hon. members who have committed themselves to such statements as the one I have just read to the House. There are many other reports of political meetings, published by that paper, in which similar statements to the one referred to were reported as having been made by other Liberal stump speakers. Why, in the old parish of Varennes, in the county of Verchères, that paper has put on record the words fallen from the lips of an hon. member of the Government, no less a personage than the hon. member for Verchères and Chambly (Mr. Geoffrion). The House will see whether the hon. gentleman has talked of a compromise, and in what language he addressed to the electors of that constituency, in order to obtain the 400 votes majority polled in his favour in that riding. He also was obliged to give a solemn pledge to his constituents, a pledge to have justice meted out to the down-trodden minority in Manitoba. Here is what the "Soir" published on the 11th June, 1896:

Meeting at Varennes; over two thousand people attend the meeting.

Therefore, as stated by that paper, the chief Government organ—and I doubt not it is quite within the mark in making that statement—there were two thousand people attending the meeting. Let us listen to the statement made by the hon. member for Verchères, now a member of the Government, when standing in presence of the French Canadian electors of that county, to induce some Conservative electors to poll their vote in his favour, and thus secure the signal triumph he has achieved over his opponent, the Hon. Mr. Taillon, whose candidature I was supporting. Here are the very words uttered by the hon. member for Verchères and Chambly (Mr. Geoffrion):

I am here to make the declaration imposed upon me by my bishop in the mandement which has been read in all the churches of the province. That mandement presses upon the voters—
The House will see what a devoted and dutiful son of the church the hon. member proves to be:

—the duty of registering their vote only in favour of those candidates who shall take the solemn and formal pledge of supporting an adequate remedial law, restoring to the Catholic minority the rights which have been taken away from them.

Now, I invite the attention of the House to the following words of the same hon. gentleman :—

Now, gentlemen, I am here to publicly make in your presence the declaration imposed upon me by my bishop, and I now take before you a solemn pledge to that effect. I shall vote in favour of a remedial law, such as required by the bishops, an operative law restoring to the Catholics of Manitoba all the rights adjudicated upon by the Privy Council judgment, but, at the same time, I declare that I shall see to it that their rights and not crumbs be given back to them ; for the Catholics do not ask charity ; they are not mendicants ; they claim their own rights.

Now, the " Soir " further says :

This solemn declaration was greeted by prolonged applause.

Such, Sir, were the statements made by the hon. member who has since been taken into the Cabinet of the hon. Premier ; such are the emphatic and solemn pledges given by the hon. member as recorded by the newspaper mentioned. But, Sir, the " Soir " does not stand a solitary witness in the case ; I also did hear, upon several occasions, the hon. gentleman make as emphatic and as positive declarations as those reported by the organ of the First Minister. I hear the plaudits of the hon. gentlemen opposite. I doubt not but that the hon. gentlemen are delighted over the fact that I should now put on record before the House the statements made by them during the electoral campaign. They appear, however, to have quite forgotten those statements. Wherefore did they put in print those statements? Why did the " Soir " publish those advertisements if not to cause these solemn statements to reach the poorest hamlets in the remotest corner of the province of Quebec, in order to influence public opinion and impress upon the compatriots of the hon. First Minister the fact that the cause of the Manitoba Catholic minority would not be jeopardized, would not run the least risk in the hands of that hon. gentleman, but, on the contrary, that the Catholic minority would secure better protection from a Catholic French Canadian Premier than from the hon. leader of the Opposition of the day. The hon. member for Verchères and Chambly (Mr. Geoffrion) and the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Bazinet) do not stand alone as having given such pledges. There is also the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Préfontaine). That hon. gentleman, one of the luminaries of the Liberal party, was one of those whom public opinion was pointing to as a colleague of the hon. Premier in the Government, destined to sit side by side with the hon. member for Verchères and Chambly. The statements made by the hon. member are also on record. On the 3rd of June, there was held at the town of St. Jean Baptiste, a meeting presided over by Alderman Grothé. The hon. member for Maisonneuve, when dealing with the school question, which, said he, was looked upon by his opponents of such paramount importance that they declined speaking of any other matter, stated, among other things, that he also pledged himself to have complete justice awarded to the Catholic minority and, moreover—and I invite the attention of the House to the words of the hon. member—" that all the rights enjoyed by them previous to 1890 should be restored to them either through means of conciliation or by a Remedial Bill, but not such a farce as the measure introduced in Parliament last session." Mr. Speaker, the hon. members opposite show again by the plaudits with which they greet this statement, that their views on the question remain unchanged, and I cannot help rejoicing at the fact, as a sincere friend of the Manitoba minority, because I now realize that those papers which have thrown out the hint that the hon. First Minister was about making a compromise of some sort or other, have simply tried to set public opinion on the wrong scent. I therefore trust and sincerely hope that the hon. members who, by their cheers, show that they still entertain the same views, will, under all circumstances, join hands with the hon. leader of the Opposition, who has declared that the hon. First Minister had his most cordial wishes for a happy and speedy settlement of this question, and that anything he could contribute to that end would be at all times cheerfully done ; a co-operation, I may say, which the Premier was not entitled to expect, from the course pursued by him and his political supporters during last session. Since the views of the hon. members opposite remain unchanged, and they are still willing to have complete justice dealt out to the Manitoba minority, since they want to have all the rights the minority enjoyed previous to 1890 restored to them, and not only crumbs, as stated by the hon. member for Verchères and Chambly, but their complete rights and privileges, I trust and sincerely hope that the hon. gentlemen will join hands with my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, and will work in accord with him to afford an adequate measure of justice to the minority. My hon. friend, the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Parmelee), and English-speaking Protestant, has also proclaimed himself the champion of the rights of the Manitoba minority, the friend of that minority. He made a declaration to that effect in my presence, and in the presence of thousands of electors during the electoral campaign. " What I want to secure for the Manitoba minority, he stated, is not only crumbs, but I want complete justice dealt out to the Catholics of that province," and, addressing the Catholic French Canadian portion of his auditory, he added: " You have all the desirable guarantees in the person of the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Laurier). He is a compatriot of yours, a man professing the same religion as you do, a man belonging to your race ; therefore, you cannot but trust him, and you may be sure that he will restore to your fellow-countrymen in Manitoba their complete rights in educational and language matters." Such are the solemn pledges taken by the hon. gentlemen opposite in presence of their electors, and now the cheers coming from the same hon. gentlemen go to prove that they wish to be true to their pledges in that connection. No trouble need be anticipated, Sir, on the matter, as the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) has promised the hon. First Minister his most cordial co-operation, to ensure the maintenance of the constitution of our country and secure the respect of the rights of minorities, regardless of race and creed. The hon. Premier's policy is bound to triumph. We are not, on this side of the House, I say so without fear of contradiction, in favour of a policy of obstruction, like that carried out during the last Parliament by the hon. Premier (Mr. Laurier); no, we do not wish to climb into power over this question, nor do we wish to perpetuate in this country, religious and national strife, in order to reach the Treasury benches. Now, the hon. First Minister is sure that his policy will triumph, should it square with the promises given to his fellow-countrymen and which his present supporters in this House have pledged their word to have carried out.

I am also satisfied that the views of my colleagues from the province of Quebec and of the First Minister himself on that question still remain unchanged, and should it happen, next session, that the Manitoba government had failed to give justice, of their own free will, to the Catholic minority, then, as stated by the hon. member for Verchères and Chambly (Mr. Geoffrion), by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Bazinet), as well as by the other Liberal candidates in ten or fifteen ridings which I visited during the electoral campaign, the hon. gentlemen sitting on the Treasury benches opposite will award entire justice to the Manitoba minority and give them back the rights they enjoyed previous to 1890. And the Government, in that case, may surely rely upon our co-operation and support. Not only does the hon. leader of the Opposition proffer his co-operation and support, but the hon. members on this side of the House have made up their minds, come what may, that the constitution of the country shall be upheld and carried out.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) Your whip (Mr. Taylor) stated quite the reverse.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) Wait till the whip gets up in his seat in this House and you will see what he will state.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) He stated the contrary in another place.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) I would not cast any blame on the hon. Prime Minister should ten or fifteen followers of his refuse to support him on this question, but let him rest assured that, in that case, he might rely upon the support of at least seventy-five members on this side of the House, which would amply make up for the loss of the former. With the hon. leader of the Opposition and the whole phalanx of able men whom I see sitting behind him, the hon. First Minister need not feel uneasy about victoriously carrying out his policy, and this national and religious issue would thus forever be removed from the arena of federal politics. The hon. gentlemen opposite, as I just stated, have thrown out a few hints about the exercise of clerical influence during the last election.

Some hon. MEMBERS. (Translation). No, no.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) Let the hon. gentlemen have patience and wait until I have offered the House a few remarks in this connection. Let them not get impatient now; all I have to say on the matter will be said with fair-play and above board. In the counties which I visited during the electoral campaign most emphatic pledges were given to the voters in connection with the school question. The House has just listened to the utterances fallen from the hon. member for Verchères and Chambly (Mr. Geoffrion) such as reported by his own organ "Le Soir." I have also placed on record the declarations made by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Bazinet), by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Parmelee) and by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Préfontaine). I could also mention in this connection the name of the hon. member for L'Assomption (Mr. Gauthier). "Le Soir" actually printed what follows:—

Mr. Gauthier having stated that he acquiesced in the collective mandement of the bishops, this circular cannot prejudicially affect his case.

All the members from the district of Montreal whom I had the honour to hear addressing public meetings, did actually adhere to and acquiesce in the collective mandement of the hierarchy. And commenting upon the mandement, they said: "As you see, gentlemen, the collective mandement of the hierarchy is nothing but a censure passed upon the course pursued by the leader of the Government" alluding to the leader of the late Cabinet.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DUPONT. As I see, the hon. gentlemen opposite are in a very joyful mood, but let me tell them to keep cool, and treasure up in their memories this remark, for their future guidance, and it is this, that a government begins to die on the very day it is born, and further that their Government might be short-lived, or at least, that quite possibly it may not enjoy such longevity as the late Government did. Now, a life of eighteen years for a government is equivalent to one of 120 years for an individual. As just stated, Sir, the hon. gentlemen opposite nearly all accepted and acquiesced in the mandement of the hierarchy, going even to the length of asserting that it was a direct censure of the measure introduced in the House last session, which was evidenced, they stated, by the fact that the mandement required from the candidates that they should pledge themselves to vote in favour of an effective Remedial Bill. The Liberal stump-speakers further said: "The Bill introduced by the Conservative Government last session, therefore, was inoperative, ineffective and it was introduced solely in order to throw dust in the eyes of the Catholic voters of the country." That is the reason why I say that the hon. gentlemen opposite who supported the leader of the Government of the day during the last campaign have made a scandalous abuse of the mandement of the hierarchy. I have, upon several occasions, heard another objection urged to the effect that the large mass of the clergy were sympathizing with the Conservative party. Let the hon. gentlemen allow me to make one remark in this connection. The Roman Catholic clergy of the province of Quebec have sided for a great many years with the Conservative party. For a number of years past, the Liberal party has inured itself to war against the Conservative party and against clerical influence; they have all along opposed the clergy, as evinced from the well-known fact that it was the Liberal party that first raised before the tribunal of justice the issue of undue clerical influence or intervention in elections. This celebrated issue of undue clerical influence at the elections was brought before the courts in Canada by the hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, on the very day when they thought fit to avail themselves of the episcopal mandements, they forthwith made an unblushing and scandalous abuse of the same. Upon all occasions, they never refrained from availing themselves of undue clerical influence, as it was styled by them. I have before me a list of the names of priests from whom the Liberal candidates have extorted letters which they later on circulated and spread broadcast among the electors and in the public prints, and whose purport was to show, in connection with the school question, that the voters could, with a safe conscience, support my hon. friend the leader of the Government of the day (Mr. Laurier), and claiming in his favour the support of French Catholic voters. I have here a list of a number of priests who thus affixed their signatures to letters which the Liberal candidates would read to their supporters in order to convince them that the policy of the leader of the Opposition, the then Premier ought not to be approved of nor supported by the electorate of the country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name them.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) Here are the names of some of those priests: the Rev. Messrs. Dugas, Proulx, Vézina and a host of others. I may further say, Mr. Speaker, that whenever a priest declares in favour of the Liberal party, he always carries along with him a number of partisans, because it is a well-known fact that, as a rule, the priests side with the Conservative party. So, on the very day when the hon. gentlemen opposite were enabled to prevail upon a certain number of priests to advocate and champion a policy favourable to their party, they were seen hawking around letters obtained from those priests, and the mandements of the hierarchy, and fiercely attacking the leader of the Conservative Government who, they stated had brought forward an ineffective legislation in favour of the Manitoba minority. Mr. Speaker, as the only French shorthand writer now available is, I presume, beginning to feel pretty tired, and as the regular time fixed by the hon. leader of the Government is up, I hope the hon. gentleman will allow me to move the adjournment of the debate. As my hon. friend acquiesces in my demand, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.35 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 27th August, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PARIS UNIVERSAL EXPOSITION.

Mr. LEMIEUX asked:

Whether it is the intention of the Government to take part in the Paris Universal Exposition in 1900.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The Government has not yet considered that question.

PURCHASE OF BAIE DES CHALEURS RAILWAY.

Mr. LEMIEUX asked:

Whether the Government have entered into negotiations with the Quebec Government for the purchase of the Baie des Chaleurs Railway? Has there been any correspondence between the two Governments on the subject?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). The only negotiations that have taken place are contained in certain correspondence upon the subject between the late Government of the Dominion and the Government of the province of Quebec. The Quebec Government having written suggesting that the Dominion Government purchase it. The latter Government by Order in Council, replying that a purchase could only be made by authority of Parliament, but that the proposition should receive consideration at an early date.

JOSEPH LEMIEUX.

Mr. LEMIEUX asked :

1. Were complaints made in 1895 against Mr. Joseph Lemieux, Inspector of Fisheries for Mont St. Louis, county of Gaspé ?

2. If so, what is the nature of the said complaints ?

1. Yes. 2. Fraud in connection with payment of claims for fishing bounty and in rendering accounts for disbursements not incurred.

BREAKWATERS, &c., AT P.E.I.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to place a sum in the Estimates for the current year for the repair and extension of the breakwater at Belle River, also for the pier at Mink River, and the wharf at Red Point, in the province of Prince Edward Island ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The breakwater at Belle River is not under the control of the Government, neither is the wharf at Red Point. With regard to the pier at Mink River, the matter is under consideration.

DREDGING AT P.E.I.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

Does the Government intend to give orders for the dredging of Vernon River and Murray River, in the province of Prince Edward Island, during the coming autumn or ensuing fall ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). No.

CAMPBELL COVE BREAKWATER, P.E.I.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's) asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to carry out the contemplated repairs to Campbell Cove breakwater, in Prince Edward Island, during the present year ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The matter is under consideration.

ANNANDALE WHARF, P.E.I.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's) asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to proceed with the repairs to the wharf at Annandale, Prince Edward Island, during the current year ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). No.

LIGHTHOUSE AT ST. PETER'S BAY, P.E.I.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's) asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to rebuild and repair the block on which the lighthouse is erected at St. Peter's Bay, Prince Edward Island, during the current year ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). My department is conferring with the Department of Marine in reference to the requirements at this place.

STEPHEN'S PIER, P.E.I.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's) asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to proceed with the repairs to Stephen's Pier at Montague, Prince Edward Island, during the current year ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The matter is under serious consideration.

NEWPORT WHARF, P.E.I.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's) asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to proceed with the extension of the wharf at Newport, Prince Edward Island, during the current year ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). No.

PUBLIC WORKS IN P.E.I.

Mr. HACKETT asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to repair and improve during the current year the following public works in the province of Prince Edward Island, viz :—Tignish Breakwater, Miminegash Breakwater, West Point Pier, Bras Breakwater ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). It is the intention of the Government to repair the breakwaters at Tignish and Miminegash. The question of constructing works at West Point and Brae will be considered during the recess after the close of the present session.

PORT PHYSICIAN—ST. JOHN, P.Q.

Mr. DUPONT asked :

Whether Dr. George Tassé, port physician of St. John, P.Q., has been discharged from his position ?

If so, for what reason was he discharged, and at whose instance was the dismissal effected; who has been appointed to succeed Dr. Tassé, and by whom was such successor recommended?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies.) 1. Dr. George Tassé was employed to attend sick seamen requiring relief under the provisions of the Sick Mariners Act at the port of St. Johns, but there was no appointment and no salary for such position. His remuneration consisted in fees for patients attended. On the 11th August last instructions were given to the Collector of Customs to employ Dr. H. Moreau of St. Johns, in all cases when it was found necessary to employ a doctor to attend a sick seaman. Dr. Moreau was recommended by the member representing the district.

THE WRIT FOR SASKATCHEWAN.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the leader of the Government, if he is able to inform the House at what time he will make his selection as to which seat he will sit for, having been selected for two. You, Sir, said yesterday, that you had received no notice as to the issue of a writ for the Saskatchewan district.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). My selection of a seat has been made long ago. I had been elected for both Saskatchewan and Quebec East, and when I accepted office both seats became vacant. I selected to sit for Quebec East.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I ask this question in consequence of my understanding Mr. Speaker to say yesterday, that he had no notice of the Saskatchewan seat having become vacant, and consequently that the writ could not issue. I would like under those circumstances to ask, Mr. Speaker, when the writ for Saskatchewan district would issue.

The PRIME MINISTER. Probably, as soon as my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) from his seat in Parliament chooses to notify Mr. Speaker that the seat is vacant; or, when two other members outside of the session choose to do so. That is provided for in the statute.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then, Mr. Speaker, I beg to inform you of the vacancy that has occurred in the district of Saskatchewan by the selection of the leader of the Government, on accepting office, to sit for Quebec East.

Mr. McCARTHY. It seems to me that the more regular way would be to move for the issue of a writ. The House has control of its own proceedings.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In accordance with that suggestion, which I have no doubt is entirely correct, I beg to move:

Mr. DUPONT.

That Mr. Speaker do issue his warrant for the issue of a writ for the election of a member of Parliament for the Electoral District of Saskatchewan.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would mention to the House that no notice whatever had reached the Speaker of the vacancy, and the Speaker until notified in this way, or by two hon. members outside of the session, cannot officially know of the vacancy, and cannot act without such notification.

Mr. McCARTHY. The vacancy occurred before your election as Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes, but it might have happened that I had received notice since my election.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S WARRANTS.

Mr. FOSTER. I beg to remind the Minister of Finance that I have not yet received the additional papers in re the Governor General's warrants.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). A portion has been sent to me. The remainder, I expect, will be here before the close of the sitting.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) has everything except the Orders in Council.

Mr. FOSTER. And the legal opinion.

The PRIME MINISTER. The legal opinion we have. The Orders in Council are not material, do you want them?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

ADDRESS IN REPLY TO THE SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. McInnes, for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in answer to his Speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) Before the adjournment of the debate, last night, the point I was making was this, that the reason why the gentlemen who now support the policy of the Government succeeded in carrying the elections, was solely because they adopted the programme of the Conservative party, and, above all, that portion of the platform relating to the Manitoba school question, and also because they pledged their word that they would do a great deal more for the Catholic and French Canadian minority than what was granted to them by the Bill put before Parliament last session. In the course of my remarks, I endeavoured to point out to this House the deep religious fervour evinced before the electors by the hon. member for Verchères and Chambly (Mr. Geoffrion), by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Préfontaine), and by several other supporters of the Government from the province of Quebec. My remarks in this connection were not made out of derision, nor prompted by a desire to be offensive to any of my hon. colleagues in this House; on the contrary, this new departure of the Liberal party in their attitude towards the hierarchy and the religious leaders of the overwhelming majority of the population of the province of Quebec is a source of gratification to me as also to the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House; the more so as the members of the Liberal party and their ancestors had proved quite refractory to that clerical influence, as the name goes in the province of Quebec. Let the hon. Prime Minister also allow me to offer him my congratulations for having fearlessly reprov'd a celebrated journalist of Montreal, the editor of the "Patrie," who had fancied that, under the leadership of my hon. friend, the Liberal party could, on the hustings and in the press, go farther than their predecessors in the direction of animadverting upon the acts of the clergy. I wish also to congratulate him on account of the direction given to his party, which, I believe, will prove beneficial, not only to that party, but also to the general interests of the province of Quebec. Now, I doubt not but that the reason why the hon. Prime Minister, who has entered upon that course and committed his party to that policy, resorted to the appeals I have referred to before the electorate of the province of Quebec, was simply to ward off the effects of the position taken by the leader of the Government at the time. There are still left, however, in the party, some unruly political friends to whom the hon. Premier shall not fail, I doubt not, to give a good lecture. The hon. member from Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Monet), whom I now see in his seat opposite, is one of those unruly members. But the hon. gentleman has also deemed it prudent to tread, from a distance in the footsteps of his political friends, in order to secure a majority of voters in his constituency. I had the opportunity to hear his statements before the people, his comments on the collective letter of the bishops of the province of Quebec concerning the school question, and, if I mistake not, at a public meeting held in the county of Laprairie-Napierville, which I attended, the hon. member stated that his programme on the Manitoba school question had been approved of by his bishop.

Mr. MONET. (Translation.) No. I never said so.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) I understood the hon. gentleman to say so; if I misunderstood the nature of his statement, I am quite willing to withdraw what I have said. But I understood that my hon. friend had read to the people at that political meeting, a letter to the effect that high ecclesiastical dignitaries approved of his course. I freely confess that the meeting in question was very unruly, and that, perhaps, explains why I could not catch the exact meaning of the letter I alluded to. At any rate, Sir, I may say that the behaviour of the hon. gentleman towards two members of the church to which he professes to belong, and which obtains the obedience of nearly all the voters of the riding he represents here, his behaviour, I say, towards those distinguished prelates, who command the respect of the whole Catholic population of Quebec, as well as that of the English-speaking and Protestant population, was simply shameful. One of them is an old missionary who has devoted his life to the cause of education among his compatriots; who has taken part in the colonization and civilization of the North-west, thus laying down the foundation of the future prosperity of those regions, paving the way for the creation of the provinces which have since been carved out in the west, and of other prospective provinces. I say, Sir, that the attitude of the hon. gentleman towards those two prelates calls for the most unqualified condemnation at the hands of all his colleagues in this House. I am satisfied that his colleagues on the other side of this House do not approve of the extravagant and discreditable conduct of the hon. gentleman towards those two high dignitaries of the church.

Now, Sir, to return to the point I was making last night, previous to moving the adjournment of the debate, I am satisfied that my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition in this House (Sir Charles Tupper) did not overrate the importance of the school question, nor the strength of the public feeling among the electorate of the province of Quebec in connection therewith; and, in order to substantiate that statement, I did put on record the views advanced by a certain number of hon. gentlemen who now sit opposite. But let us proceed. The hon. member for Laval (Mr. Fortin), in the course of the electoral contest, also made use of a letter from a priest, although not a parish priest in the province of Quebec. The hon. gentleman, in order not to be out of countenance, as he could not prevail upon the clergy in his riding to approve of his programme, applied to a member of the clergy outside of his electoral division, endeavouring to secure an endorsement of his programme, which he might oppose to that of his opponent, in order to induce the electors of his riding whose votes he was canvassing, to believe that his ticket had the approval of the clergy. The hon. gentleman actually stated that he also was willing to uphold the cause of the Manitoba minority, to which the rival candidate and the Conservative party had pledged themselves; and that he was even decided, in gambling parlance, to go one better than the Conservative. The paper, "Le Soir," published the following note:—"Mr. Fortin, the candidate, has a letter from a former missionary," and that candidate was the member for Laval. Then followed the letter which I shall dispense with reading to the House. That letter bore the signature of the Rev. Mr. Vézina, a former missionary to the United States. There are also other hon. gentlemen from the district of Montreal who sought to ingratiate themselves with the electors by proclaiming aloud their good intentions towards the Manitoba minority.

If I make these remarks, Sir, it is not with a view to pointing out the facts alluded to as grievances, nor do I wish thereby to level them, as charges or injurious imputations at my hon. colleagues opposite. Quite the contrary; I congratulate them on their having gone back on their former policy and coming back to better views on the matter. I congratulate the hon. gentlemen upon having entered upon the contest in the province of Quebec as champions of the rights of the Manitoba minority, thus treading in the footsteps of my hon. friend, the hon. member from Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil), and of the former member for the county of Ottawa (Mr. Devlin), now member for Wright County. Both these hon. gentlemen, at the last session of Parliament, pointed out to the Liberal party the true course to be pursued, in order to secure the signal victory they gained in the province of Quebec.

Mr. DEVLIN. (Translation.) If what you say is true, why then did your party oppose me so bitterly at the last election?

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) I am not speaking of the last electoral contest.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. (Mr. Tarte). (Translation.) They are a lot of humbugs.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) Let the hon. gentleman have patience. I will tell him, by-and-by, what people think of him. If the hon. member for Wright was offered opposition, I may point out to him that I am neither the leader nor one of the leaders of the party, that I am not manager of the Conservative party in my province, and that I have never been but a simple soldier in my party, just as he is himself in his own party. If the hon. gentleman was offered opposition at the last election, it was probably owing to the fact that, at a certain meeting, he expressed his regret at the course—

Mr. DEVLIN. (Translation.) Let the hon. gentleman prove his statement, and I pledge my word to him that I will resign my seat immediately.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) The report to which I refer was not published in the Conservative press but in the Liberal papers. From the reports of the Liberal press, I gather that at the meeting held at Sohmer

Mr. DUPONT.

Park, in Montreal, the hon. gentleman let it be understood that he was beginning to regret having pursued the course he had taken last session. Such was the interpretation put upon the speech delivered by my hon. friend, and such was, as I think, the reason why he was opposed at the last election. Now, let me tell my hon. friend that I had nothing to do with that opposition offered him, and I merely suggest to him the reason which I have heard alleged at several meetings, why opposition had been offered my hon. friend in his county.

Mr. DEVLIN. I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but if I may be permitted to make one observation—

Mr. SPEAKER. It would be better perhaps that the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) should ask the permission of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Dupont) to make a correction, and no doubt the permission will be given, and the gentleman who has the floor will take his seat; otherwise the interruption might give rise to unnecessary confusion, and two hon. gentlemen would be on their feet at the same time.

Mr. DEVLIN. I merely wish to correct the hon. gentleman from Bagot (Mr. Dupont) when he states that I expressed regret for my position on the school question. If he can prove that, I am quite ready to resign my seat immediately.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) The statement made by the hon. member is so general, so loose, that witnesses could hardly be found to decide the issue. But I shall not take the time of the House in bringing forward evidence and looking for witnesses to prove what the hon. member for Wright may have stated, last spring, at Sohmer Park. I have, so far, made good the fact that the hon. gentlemen who now support the Prime Minister have been returned to this House solely because they gave pledges that they would go far beyond what the Conservative party had done in connection with the Manitoba school question. They have endeavoured by all means in their power to lead the electors of the province of Quebec to believe in the sincerity of their pledges to the effect that they would restore to the French and Catholic minority in Manitoba all the rights and privileges adjudicated upon by the Privy Council judgment. Further, they did give their pledge that they would vote for a measure approved of by the hierarchy of the province of Quebec. Such are the means resorted to by the hon. gentlemen opposite in carrying on the contest upon the Manitoba school question, and that explains the error fallen into by my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition who, lacking the necessary information on that point, could not get an insight into the true position of affairs during the electoral contest in Quebec, and who was therefore led to believe that he had over-rated the importance attached by the electorate of the province of Quebec to this question. I have further charged the hon. gentlemen opposite with having appropriated to themselves the fiscal policy of the Conservative party. I may further add, Sir, that not only did they steal from the Conservative party their fiscal policy, but they did much worse. As I have stated previously, I took an active part in the electoral contest in several ridings of the province of Quebec, and I heard my hon. friends who now support the Government preaching pro and con, and altering the nature of their statements on the fiscal policy, according to the needs of the hour. Now they would pledge themselves to maintain the protective tariff for the benefit of manufacturers and of the manufacturing industries of the country, and to do nothing that might imperil the existence of those industries, and therefore not to cut off the duties imposed by the Conservative Government; now, they would attack the same tariff, and run down the Conservative fiscal policy, when in presence of the rural constituencies. In the latter constituencies, they would strive to point out to our good rural population that the protective tariff was a tariff that imposed heavy taxes upon the farming community, and that the imports thus levied upon the farming class were so levied solely with a view to the aggrandizement and enrichment of the fortunate manufacturing interests; and that it was through the imposition of taxes levied upon the farming community that the great millionaires had sprung up in Montreal and other large cities of the Dominion; further, that it was through the instrumentality of that same fiscal policy and of the taxes levied under it that had been reared those large palaces, those immense industrial establishments that were to be seen in Montreal; and therefore, they would wind up their speeches by asking the farmers to repudiate and vote against such a policy. They would tell the rural voters that it was through the taxes levied upon them, to the benefit of the manufacturing classes, that had built up those castles whose splendour dazzled their eyes when visiting the city. All that wealth of the larger cities, all those manufacturing establishments, it is all very fine, no doubt, would they say, but you, rural voters, what did you get from the Government? Why, all that wealth is not yours, but the monopolists, who have sprung into existence under the fostering policy and who have grown fat, enriched themselves at your expense. Such, Sir, was the language used in the province of Quebec by the friends of the hon. Premier, when making their onslaughts upon the protective policy before the electors in the rural constituencies. Now, to return to Montreal, to the county of Maisonneuve, now represented by my hon. friend (Mr. Préfontaine), hearken to the words uttered by the hon. gentleman before immense meetings: "You will be told that the Liberal party is hostile to a protective tariff, but I tell you, gentlemen, that the Liberal party will never hurt nor disturb one single industry in Montreal."

It was because they varied their policy, according to the interests of their hearers, and because of the conversion which I already referred to with regard to the school question, that the candidates of the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Laurier) succeeded in carrying the elections. The hon. gentlemen opposite, having modified their views on that important issue, the electors believed in their conversion. I trust that they are sincerely converted and that they will strive to redeem their pledges and frame for the relief of the Manitoba minority a more perfect measure than the one introduced at the last session of Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, I shall now deal with the causes which brought on the return to power of the hon. Prime Minister. The hon. gentleman, in his speech, pointed out three causes which account for his accession to power. He said the hon. leader of the Opposition was defeated at the polls, first, because the Administration of public affairs under the late Government had been extravagant and corrupt; in the second place, because the tariff policy had bred monopolies, and lastly, because the Government had been guilty of negligence in relation to the Manitoba school question. My hon. friend, with his wonted eloquence, endeavoured to create in the House and the country the impression that such had been the causes of the downfall of the late Administration. To my mind, there are other causes than those pointed out by my hon. friend, which materially helped him to climb into power. There is, first, the cause which I pointed out, in my opening remarks yesterday, namely, that the Conservative party had been eighteen years at the head of affairs. That the Conservative party should have succeeded in retaining so long the reins of power is, indeed, to be wondered at. I may tell the Prime Minister that such a long lease of power is unparalleled in the history of any other British colony. Neither in the parliamentary annals of the metropolis, nor in those of any other country enjoying popular freedom, could there be found an instance of such a long lease of power. In the parliamentary records of Great Britain, we find that the celebrated William Pitt, one of the greatest statesmen of England, succeeded in holding the reins of power from 1783 to 1800. But, by what concurrence of circumstances was Pitt enabled to remain for so long a period of time at the head of affairs? We all know that it was owing to the French revolution and to the wars of the republic and of the Empire. During these eventful years, when wars raged without interruption throughout devastated Europe, William Pitt was invested with unbounded confidence of the British nation. The British voters reposed in the political genius of William Pitt a confidence which they have since withheld from all other public men. With this extraordinary concurrence of circumstances, Pitt held the reins of power only eighteen years. Since that time, governments have succeeded each other almost at fixed and regular intervals, and statesmen of genius like Gladstone, Disraeli, Derby, Palmerston, and other were unable to hold power for a longer period than one parliament, with the exception of Gladstone who, when resigning office in 1874, confessed that he did no longer enjoy the confidence of the House of Commons. In every free country, the popular mind is always variable. Ever since the people were free to overthrow governments at pleasure, the popular mind has always been fickle.

Let me also invite your attention, Sir, to the record of the republics of old. Those who are conversant with the history of the free peoples in ancient republics, no doubt recollect this anecdote which shows how fickle-minded is the multitude. You remember, Sir, having read about that illiterate plebeian holding out a shell to Aristides, and asking him to write down his name on it, which meant condemning him to exile. But, asked Aristides, what grievance have you against me? None at all, replied the plebeian, except that I am wearied with hearing them call you the "just." This anecdote, Sir, evinces the fickleness of the popular mind, and of public opinion in free countries. Why is it that the hon. Prime Minister could not, ere now, reach the Treasury benches? It was certainly not through any lack of ambition or efforts on his part or on that of his followers. All that the hon. gentleman wanted was such a programme as was calculated to give satisfaction to public opinion, and that programme the hon. gentlemen have found, in despoiling us of our policy.

There is a further explanatory cause of the change of Government, brought on at the last election. A party, in the long run, gets disgusted with power. Do the hon. Prime Minister and his friends call in question the accuracy of that statement? Perhaps the hon. gentlemen are not yet tired with being in power, but let them wait a little longer, and they will realize the truth of my statement. The leaders of a party, in the long run, get disgusted with politics, and all its concomitant troubles, which overtask the patience of those at the head of affairs. Out of patience, wearied with public administration, the Ministers sometimes neglect to vindicate their policy and to educate public opinion. Such was the case with the Conservative party. Still, let not the hon. gentlemen fancy that we have been dumbfounded or disheartened over the defeat of our party. The Conservatives are prepared to do their duty on the Opposition side, to help the Prime Minister to carry out his programme and to achieve all the great reforms he has pledged himself to carry out; but we shall also battle for the triumph of our principles.

Another reason why the downfall of the Conservative Administration occurred, is found in the ever-growing vigour which develops among the members of the Opposition, in proportion as the Government grows old. Bonaparte was wont to say that in rhetorics he knew of but one figure, that of affirmation and repetition. If, as stated by Bonaparte, there is but one figure in rhetorics, that of affirmation and repetition, the hon. leader of the Government (Mr. Laurier) and his friends have used it to satiety. Over and over again, and often without meeting with any contradiction from the adverse party, they have asserted that under the Conservative Government, the country was on the high road to ruin. For years past, the First Minister has travelled from one end of the Dominion to the other, spreading broadcast his promises to the electorate, and repeating that the Administration was corrupt, that the protective tariff was framed in favour of monopolists. Those harangues of the leader of the Government, repeated to satiety by the phalanx of brave friends who supported him, took hold, in the long run, of public opinion. It was through those affirmations and repeated statements which, to my mind, are unfair and wrong, that the hon. First Minister succeeded in educating the country and leading public opinion to believe that it was high time for a change of Government, and that, should he come into power, he would work wonders, and that he would protect the interests of all classes in this country. It is in the task of performing those wonders which the hon. gentleman has pledged himself to work, that the loyal Opposition of Her Majesty intends to co-operate with him. I may here remark, Sir, that I do not believe the present Ministers to be lavish of promises, but I may add that their supporters and those forming part of the Government have been very lavish of promises. A careful study of the political records of free countries teaches us that governments composed of heterogeneous elements are not remarkable for their longevity. Possibly the personnel surrounding the Prime Minister may not be one calculated to secure to his Ministry a long lease of power. The Cabinet of my hon. friend is not a Liberal one. It is neither more nor less than a coalition Ministry. Why, Sir, the hon. Prime Minister has taken into his Cabinet to help him in the administration of public business, the hon. member for St. John-Iberville (Mr. Tarte), the defeated candidate in Beauharnois. That defeat was a blow struck at the Government in the very province of Quebec. The hon. gentlemen opposite who support the Government have shouted themselves hoarse about the great triumph achieved in that province by the Liberal party, and have given credit for it to the Minister of Public Works. I remember, Sir, that when the First Minister was, for the first time in his life, taken into the Mackenzie Cabinet, I went, with the hon. member for St. John-Iberville (Mr. Tarte) and with many other hon. gentlemen from our province, to the county of Drummond and Arthabaska in order to give a lift to the hon. Prime Minister, that is, to help ousting him from the position he had accepted as Minister of the Crown. The hon. member for St. John-Iberville, now Minister of Public Works, displayed, during that struggle, all his well-known energy. With the co-operation of all the friends of the Conservative party, he succeeded in expelling the Prime Minister from the county of Drummond and Arthabaska.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) He regrets it now.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) I believe that the hon. First Minister had within the ranks of his party all the necessary elements to form an exclusively Liberal Cabinet. But, I ask, Sir, why is it that the Liberal chief-tain who, one day, enacted this aphorism: "It is not given to everybody to be Liberal, but one should be born a Liberal." thereby hinting that, should he ever be called upon to form a Liberal Administration, he would take into his Cabinet none but those who were Liberal-born, who had been life-long Liberals—how is it, Sir, I say, that the hon. gentleman has taken into his Cabinet the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), who joined but yesterday the Liberal ranks? Why did he overlook the past services of hon. gentlemen fully as well qualified as the Minister of Public Works and, in the judgment of the Premier's political friends, a great deal better qualified than the member for St. John-Iberville happens to be, for the position? How happens it that the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil) was not invited to enter the Cabinet? He is an old political fighter who has done his party yeoman service. At the very time when the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil) was fighting the battle of the Prime Minister, the hon. member for St. John-Iberville (Mr. Tarte), not so very long since, was combating him with his wonted energy and violence. There are undoubtedly among the First Minister's friends, other hon. gentlemen who ought to have been chosen. Admittedly, the hon. First Minister has a phalanx of distinguished men, representing the various constituencies of our province. There is the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Préfontaine) a Liberal born, a life-long Liberal, and I ask, how does it happen that he has not been taken into the Cabinet? His sound Liberalism, surely, should not stand in the way of his political preferment: still, his merits have been overlooked, and he had to give way to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte).

Mr. PREFONTAINE. (Translation.) I was not born a Liberal.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) I always knew you to be a Liberal: how long have you been a Liberal?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. (Translation.) Ever since I reached the age of discretion.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) There are two other gentlemen opposite, whom I now see in their seats, my friend the member for Lotbinière (Mr. Rinfret), and the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Bernier), and I ask, how comes it that those two hon. gentlemen, who are old political fighters, having taken an active part in all the electoral campaigns, in order to bring about the triumph of their party, have not been taken into the Cabinet? As the hon. gentlemen all know, and the Liberal party as well, the electors in the country look unfavourably on the Ministry, such as constituted, because the Liberal party is not really represented by the present Cabinet, at least so far as our province is concerned. It is neither more nor less, as I said, than a coalition Ministry. How comes it, I ask, that the hon. gentlemen whom I have just mentioned, have not been selected, that their merits were overlooked, and that others should have been selected in their place? How happens it that the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) was not invited to join the Cabinet, the preference being given to men of loose and ill-defined political opinions, over life-long Liberals, known throughout the province of Quebec as having fought the battles of the party, and secured the triumph of the First Minister? That such men should have been left in the cold, outside of the Cabinet, is beyond my comprehension and I have this to say to the hon. Premier, that his political friends in the province of Quebec are puzzled to find out by what fascination, by what secret power the hon. member for St. John-Iberville (Mr. Tarte) was enabled to guide him in the composition of the Cabinet, and by what means he was enabled to lead the Premier into believing that himself, the hon. member for St. John-Iberville, was entitled to take the lead, instead of those who had secured the triumph of the Liberal party, through long years of stubborn fight. It is sought to create the impression that to the hon. member for St. John-Iberville (Mr. Tarte) is due the credit for the victory achieved by the Liberal party on the 23rd June. No, Sir, the victory gained by the Liberal party at the last election was not secured through the efforts of that gentleman. The party has won the day independently of the hon. gentleman. The party has triumphed owing to the fact that, for many years past, grievances had piled up against the Conservative party, and also through the policy of affirmation and repetition adopted by the Liberal speakers, and without the intervention of the hon. Minister of Public Works being at all necessary. The Liberal party in our province fail to understand how it came about that this man who turned Liberal but yesterday, with his ill-defined and loose political opinions, was allowed to usurp in the Ministry the position which, to the mind of the Liberal party, and I may say of all the electorate, rightfully belonged to the old fighters who had won their epaulets but have been deprived of them. As for us, members of the Conservative party from the province of Quebec, we are quite unconcerned about that issue, although there is very little room for rejoicing at such a want of fair-play. To my mind, a Liberal policy, a Liberal platform cannot be properly administered, nor fairly and freely carried out by a coalition government, but only by a Liberal one. I believe that the Administration formed by the hon. Premier is one that has no hold on public opinion, one that will be torn up by domestic dissensions, and it often happens that such a government proves to be a scourge for the country whose affairs it administers, because it has no hold, no grasp on public opinion, and because also instead of being homogeneous it is composed of heterogeneous elements. Just observe what actually occurs in connection with the Manitoba school question. I do not say that the First Minister is ready to make concessions, nor that he has made any; but, if we were to judge from appearances, and from the ambiguous and double meaning of his utterances, and therefrom draw inferences as to what he is going to do, one could not help presuming that he is on the eve of entering upon a course of concessions which might prove fatal to the Manitoba minority, notwithstanding that he has pledged his word that he would not make any. The supporters of the hon. gentleman have taken before their electors the solemn pledge of making no concessions; but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier), accustomed as he is to flounces of rhetoric, and with his wonted eloquence has once more resorted the other day to his flowery rhetoric to prepare public opinion. The hon. gentleman told us that he knew full well that whatever settlement of the school question he might make, he did not expect to satisfy extreme men. He should have explained his meaning and told us who are those extreme men. I will simply tell my hon. friend that I do not know of any extreme men in this House, with the exception of those who are endeavouring to rob the Catholic minority of their rights guaranteed to them by the constitution of this country. Those are the extreme men; and I know of no others. There are no other extreme men but those who, under the cover of night, are feloniously sharpening their knives to cut off the rights and privileges guaranteed and confirmed to the minority by the constitution. Are those the men pointed out by the hon. Premier, with that flowery rhetoric of his so artistically presented to the House? Be that as it may, I trust he did not mean, under the appellation of extreme men, to throw a hint at those who object to having the rights of the French and Catholic minority in Manitoba sacrificed through a compromise. Before bringing my remarks to a conclusion, allow me, Sir, to draw attention to a charge levelled by the hon. Premier at the hon. leader of the Opposition. The Prime Minister, referring to the severe but just rebuke administered to him by the leader of the Opposition with regard to the interview he had given to an American journalist, and in the course of which he undertook to surrender to our American neighbours the control of the great waterway of the St. Lawrence, on condition that they should pay half the cost of the deepening of our canals, the hon. Premier, I say, stated, in reply, that the leader of the Opposition had not the weakness to be so candid, when in 1891 he had deceived the electors of this country, and that the best diplomacy was to be honest in speech and action as well and not to deceive one's countrymen. I have looked over the papers relating to the negotiation of the reciprocity treaty of 1891 between Canada and the United States of America, to find out the truth of the charge levelled at the leader of the Opposition, and I confess that I found nothing whatever of a nature to justify the use of the unfair and unwarrantable epithet applied by the hon. leader of the Government to the hon. leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Speaker, the leader of the Opposition is well known throughout Canada for a long career wholly devoted to the welfare of the country, and for the unsparing and unstinted use he has made of his great talents for the furtherance of the same cause. And, of late, Sir, with a self-devotion which has elicited the admiration of all his friends, we have seen the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) after having resigned the remunerative functions of his high office in London, throwing himself, in spite of his age, into the thick of one of the most hard-fought electoral contests on record, with a vigour which has fired with enthusiasm all his friends and won the admiration of all those French Canadians who realize the meaning of true self-devotion, and which sent a thrill of terror through the heart of the hon. gentleman opposite. The hon. gentlemen, I think, would do better to modify somewhat their language, when they choose to attack the leader of the Opposition. Their language should bear the stamp of generosity, fair-play and truth. They should not, in my opinion, inconsiderately level charges at an old patriot, who, in the judgment of the country, has rendered eminent services to Canada, with the sole view to depreciating and running down the Conservative party which under his leadership, I have no doubt, and with the skill and self-devotion he will display in the future as in the past, will achieve a signal triumph before the electors of this country.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Speaker, I rise to address a few observations to the House on the subject now before us. I must say that I do not feel quite at home on this side of the House, and I suppose that many gentlemen on the other side of the House have a similar feeling. Let me express the hope that we shall not remain long enough in our respective seats, to feel at home. The Conservative party to which I have the honour to belong has now been in power for about eighteen years. Their record is before us, and it is a record of which any political party might be proud. They can point to the opening of the North-west, to the deepening and enlargement of the canals, to the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway, an undertaking which challenged the admiration of the world. They have been during these eighteen years a party of courage. They have not accomplished these great works without vigorous opposition from the Liberal party, for I think I may safely say that in almost all these great enterprises they have been vigorously opposed, and suggestions have been made from the Liberal party which would have rendered these works useless. But, Sir, because they were the party of courage, they have gone on with the works in the face of this great opposition. Sir, the Conservative party was the party having faith in this country. I have sometimes wondered as I listened to the speeches made by members of the Liberal party when in Opposition in this House, and especially speeches made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). I have sometimes wondered what opinion he could expect outsiders to form of this country, as he proceeded to paint everything in the most gloomy manner, as he talked about the black flag floating over every farm in the land, and as he told us that mortgages were everywhere as a result of the policy of the Conservative party. The members of the Conservative party have not talked in that way about their country. I call them the party of faith in Canada. They had faith in the future of Canada and they have faith in it still. And, Sir, not only were the Conservatives the party of courage and the party of faith, but they were the party of convictions. They had a policy and they knew what that policy was. When they went before the people they did not go with something indefinite which nobody could ascertain what the meaning was, but they went before the people with a definite policy; a policy which they presented clearly and which could be understood by all. Sir, not only were they the party of courage, and the party of faith, and the party of convictions, but I think we may truly say that they were the Canadian party. They were the party who always stood for Canada first. They were the party who, when it was proposed to surrender some of the rights of this country to a foreign country, when it was proposed to barter away some of our privileges, they were the party who stood for Canada, and, Sir, they stand for Canada to-day. During the last five years this party has suffered great losses. The greatest loss of all was when Sir John Macdonald, who had for thirteen years ruled the destinies of this country, was called away. I think I may say without exaggeration that he was one of the greatest statesmen the world has ever produced, and I may also say that his loss to this party and to this country was irreparable. But, Sir, not only did that loss fall upon the Conservative party, but the man who was next called upon to lead the fortunes of the party, a man of great ability, Sir John Abbott, was also called away from this life. And, as if a series of misfortunes had come upon the party, our next Premier, a man who was recognized by all who associated with him as towering above his fellows in ability, the late Sir John Thompson, was also called away. And so, in a very few years this party suffered the loss of three premiers, a loss which I think no party ever before sustained in so short a time. But, Sir, although these men, who were the leaders of the party, were taken away from it, still the party did not despair. It continued to pursue its policy, and to develop the resources of this country. But, Sir, to-day we look around and we find this great party, which for 18 years ruled the destinies of this country, in Opposition. I propose to ask why this is so. Well, Sir, I believe one reason is that the party was so long in power. Eighteen years is a long time for a party to rule a country like this. It may be said that the Liberal party has been longer in power in the province of Ontario; but in that province the interests are not so diverse as they are in a country like the Dominion of Canada. In this country the east has a different idea of what it wants from the west. Then, this party was so long in power that the idea seemed to pervade the minds of many people, some Conservatives among them, that the time had come for a change—that a change would be a good thing for the country. I found that idea myself among many Conservatives. Why was this? Because the times were hard and business was dull. The hard times in this country were caused largely by the dullness of business in the United States which has existed during the last four or five years, and we in this country always feel the influence of hard times there. Our people felt that the times were hard, the prices of their products were low, and many of them talked as if the change of Government could not make matters worse, and might make them better. Not only were times dull, but the people were told over and over again that the dull times were the result of the protective tariff. That was impressed upon them over and over again until I believe some who doubted it at first came to believe that there was something in it, and they thought they might like to try a change of some kind. Added to the statement that the hard times were due to the protective policy of the Conservative party, great promises were made as to what would be done if the Liberals came into power. Sir, we heard these promises repeatedly; they were made all over the country. The Liberals said: "Put us in power, and you will find things improve. It is because you have the Conservative party in power, with their protective tariff in force, that you have business depression; but put us in power, and you will find an improvement in the state of affairs." A good many people said: "Well, we will try them; we will take them at their word; they say things will improve, and we will see whether they will or not;" and to-day we have the Liberal party in power in this country. But, Sir, notwithstanding all these causes, the Conservative party would be in power to-day but for another reason. I find that the province of Ontario disappointed the hopes of the Liberals, and I may say that it exceeded the expectations of many Conservatives. The great province of Ontario did not go back on the Conservative party, but showed that it still believed in the policy of that party. I find that the majority by which the Government is sustained to-day came from the province of Quebec. Now, I say that notwithstanding the causes which I have mentioned, the Conservative party would still be in power if it had not been for that unfortunate Remedial Bill about which we have heard so much. I hold that the Conservative party is in Opposition chiefly because of the dissensions in the party on that measure. I believe it is that to which the Liberal party owe their advent to power. Now, Sir, I think most of the members of this House know my position on that Bill; they know the attitude I took; they know that I was against the Government policy, as many others were. But while I was conscientious in my opposition to the Bill, I believed that those who supported the Bill were just as conscientious as I was. I believe so still; I have no reason to doubt it. But I am satisfied that the great reason why we are out of power to-day is the dissensions that existed among us on that Remedial Bill. But, Sir, there is another reason, which I consider an equally important reason, that is, the attitude of the Liberal party on this question. What was their attitude? Why, Sir, in Ontario the cry was, "Hands off Manitoba; no interference with Manitoba." Why, the only thing my opponent had against me, though I opposed the Bill very strongly, was that I had not opposed it strongly enough; and the Liberal party supported him and opposed me on that ground. But in Quebec what was their position? Last session in this House I heard a prominent member of the present Liberal Government say that the reason he objected to the Bill, and would vote for the six months' hoist, was that it was not strong enough. He said: "This is said to be a remedial Bill, but there is no remedy in it at all." And so I am given to understand that in a great many constituencies in Quebec the Liberals said: The Bill which the Conservative party brought forward as a remedial Bill is no remedial Bill at all; it will not amount to anything in the way of helping your poor, suffering compatriots in Manitoba; we want you to vote for a party that will give you a stronger Bill, a Bill that will have something in it." I only know that this is so from rumour; but I have no reason to doubt that such was the case, and I think it unfortunate that any great party in this country should take such a stand. I think it unfortunate that in the great province of Ontario they should be so much opposed to interference with Manitoba and make that their rallying cry, while in the province of Quebec they should say, "The Bill offered to you is not strong enough, and we will give you a stronger Bill if you will put us in power." Sir, we have heard a great deal of the race and religion cry. Personally, I am opposed to such a cry. I believe the French have as much right in this country as the English-speaking population. I think, as a speaker said yesterday, that they are not French, but Canadians, as we all are. Whether we speak English or French, I think we are proud to call ourselves Canadians. I take no stock in the race cry; I would disdain to use it. I may say the same about the religious cry, but there is no doubt there are men in this country who are influenced by the religious cry. I have heard it said about myself, that I used this cry. Well, in the province of Ontario I did complain in the legislature there that in the public schools in eastern Ontario, where the majority are French, English was not taught; but in discussing that question I carefully abstained from saying anything about any one's religion. I said, as I say to-day, that a man's religion is a matter between himself and his God, of which no one else has any right to complain or with which no one has any right to interfere. But there is no doubt this cry is used at the elections, and I believe it was used in the province of Quebec. Now, I have indicated briefly what I consider some of the reasons why the Conservative party is in opposition to-day, and as I do not intend to speak long, I shall not say more on that subject.

I intend to say a word or two regarding the criticisms made on the First Minister's interview with a Chicago newspaper concerning our relations with the United States. I may say that I have always advocated the most friendly relations with the United States. I have frequently taken occasion in this House to express the opinion that our relations should be most friendly, that the United States was a country which we should seek to have as our friends, that, situated as we were, so close to one another, being mixed up with each other in business and social matters, there was every reason why we should be most friendly. I have always taken that attitude and spoken in that sense, and I believe that my Conservative friends around me have always done the same. I was therefore very sorry to find that the First Minister (Mr. Laurier) implied in that interview that the Conservative party had been unfriendly to the United States. Sir, I repel that insinuation, I deny it most emphatically. The Conservative party is not, and has never been, unfriendly to the United States. It is a party which is just as friendly to the United States as the Liberal party. But while we are friendly to the United States, we want, at the same time, to be loyal to Canada. We want to be Canadian and British; we do not wish to show our friendliness by giving away something which the United States have no right to expect. We have no call to seek to be friendly by truckling to them, and I believe that if we should do what the hon. First Minister suggests, we would lose their respect. I believe that they will respect us all the more if we insist on our rights. We have rights as a country which we are bound, as Canadians, to maintain, and no self-respecting country like the United States could possibly lose its friendly feeling for us because we insisted on our rights. While it is true that the United States are close to us, while it is true that it is most desirable to have them as our friends, and while we should do everything in reason to secure their friendship, at the same time we must not forget who are our real friends. Our real friends lie across the ocean, and not close at hand. We must never forget that we are part of the British Empire. In this country, some people, because the United States are so close to us, because they have friends and relatives in that country, are apt to forget that we belong to the British Empire; and sometimes, in disputes between the two nations, they are apt to take the part of the United States and give their sympathies to that country. In so doing, they are going too far, because, while we desire to have the United States our friends, we must not forget that our real friends are the British people across the ocean.

Now, I intend to consider, briefly, the clause in the Address about the tariff. That clause reads as follows:—

The operation of the tariff will be made the subject of careful inquiry during the recess, with a view to the preparation of such a measure as may, without doing injustice to any interest, materially lighten the burdens of the people.

I think the latter part of the sentence "Such a measure as may, without doing injustice to any interest, materially lighten the burdens of the people" is a very good specimen of fine phrasing. If the Government could do that, they would be a Government that was governing in the interests of the country. But it all depends on the meaning you attach to the word "injustice." As I read that sentence, as I see how indefinite it is, as I see that you can take any meaning out of it you wish, I cannot help recalling resolutions which have been placed on the Order paper in this House, year after year, by members of the Liberal party, asking that corn, coal oil, binder twine, agricultural implements, and so forth, be placed on the free list. Why, Mr. Speaker, one of the charges made against me during the campaign was that I had voted against the duty being taken off binder twine. That seemed to be a cardinal plank in the platform of the Liberals who opposed me. They thought that I should not be returned because I refused to vote for the total abolition of the duties. I said that I supported the Government in reducing the duty from 25 to 12½ per cent, but declared that I was opposed to completely taking the duty off. Hon. gentlemen on the other side have, over and over again, asked that this should be done. Will these same gentlemen advocate it now? Why are these resolutions not placed on the Order paper to-day? Have they changed their minds on this question? Do they think that these articles should have a duty imposed upon them? Do they think that they should be protected? Were they sincere at that time, or are they sincere now? I leave them to answer that question in this House. Now, I admit that we could not expect a new tariff to be brought down now. We all admit that. It would be impossible for any government coming into power as recently as the present Government has, to frame a new tariff to be considered this session, but I claim that it is quite fair to ask what is their fiscal policy. They have had many policies when in Opposition—policies almost without number. We could not fix them down to any one policy because their policies were constantly changing. Now, I would like to ask which of the many policies that they have brought before the country have they settled on, or have they not settled on any one policy at all? Some people who supported the Liberal party are expecting free trade. That may seem absurd, and no doubt it is, but it is a fact that there are people scattered throughout the country who are expecting free trade because they were told by some of the Liberal speakers that they were going to get it. I do not think that requires any answer from the Government to-day, because such a proposition carries its absurdity on its face. But there is one proposition that has been laid down, over and over again, by the Liberal party, and that is this. They believe in the complete elimination of protection from the tariff. The changes have been rung on protection over and over again. The hard times, the exodus, the mortgages, the low prices of farm property, the low prices of farm produce—all, they declared, were caused by protection. Protection they have called a curse and legalized robbery, and I do not know how many other bad names. Now, I want to know this: Have this Government agreed to adopt this view of protection? Do they still think that it is a curse and the cause of all the trouble in this country, the cause of hard times, the mortgages, the exodus? Do they think that still, and do they intend to eliminate protection entirely from the tariff? I have some reason to think that they have changed their minds a little on that question. Why, during the elections, they were a great deal more moderate. We did not hear so much about protection being the cause of all these troubles. What did we hear? We heard the manufacturers told not to be afraid, that the Liberal party were not going to do them any injustice, that they could safely support the Liberal party, and need not be afraid at all that their industries would be injured. But most significant of all, where was the hon. member for South Oxford then? Where was he during the election? We did not hear him. We had been used to hear of him going all over the country enunciating his views, denouncing protection, but where was he? I leave the Liberal party to answer that question. I do not know where he was. No doubt they knew where he was. He was able to be out and around but he was kept at home, I suppose, somewhere out of sight, so that he could not enunciate these views to the people. But more significant than the question, Where was he then? is the question, Where is he now? Where is the hon. member for South Oxford now? He expected to be Minister of Finance. That was the expectation he entertained for years. He was financial critic for his party from first to last. And now where is the hon. member for South Oxford? He is Minister of Trade and Commerce, a portfolio which, it is said, is soon to be abolished, and then, I suppose, he will not be in the Cabinet at all. To me who believe in moderate protection these things seem a good sign. The fact that the hon. member for South Oxford was not allowed to go through the country airing his views on protection, and the fact that he is not our Minister of Finance are good things from my point of view. But why not tell the country plainly what the policy of the party is? Before the election, business men were waiting to see what the result would be, and business moved along slowly, because they were uncertain how the elections would go this time. Now they ask, are they to be kept waiting six months longer and after the Liberal party who have been denouncing a protection are returned to power. I ask the Government to let the country know the principle upon which they are going to revise the tariff. We on this side do not ask for details; that would be unreasonable; but we ask the Government to declare whether they intend to retain moderate protection or to adopt a purely revenue tariff. I think this is a fair question and I believe the country will so regard it. We have a right to know whether gentlemen opposite entertain the views they entertained when in opposition or whether they have changed their minds. Business is dull now, we know, and the winter is approaching. On behalf of the workingmen, I ask for some definite statement. I was amused at the remarks of the hon. member for North Leeds (Mr. Frost) who said that he was a manufacturer and knew that the manufacturers of this country were not impatient to know the policy of the Government. I myself know that that is not a fact. Manufacturers have spoken to me on this subject, and manufacturers, generally, I believe, regard this as a very serious question. Whether there is to be moderate protection or no protection at all will make all the difference to the manufacturers and to the workingmen of the country. Sir, I should be glad to hear that they will maintain protection. In such a policy they should have my support, for I believe in protection. They talk about lowering the tariff. Duties are lower now than they were on account of prices. A few years ago prices were one-third higher than they are to-day, and thus ad valorem duties are lower than they were. The consequence is that we have less protection as well as less revenue than we had. In some cases the duties should be raised rather than lowered.

Mr. GIBSON. On leather, for instance.

Mr. CRAIG. As the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gibson) has referred to that matter, I wish to tell him what perhaps he does not know, and what, I think, the parties who opposed me did not know. We have the same duty on leather to-day as we had under the Mackenzie administration.

Mr. GIBSON. Your friends did not attend to your wants.

Mr. CRAIG. Yes; they attended to them. The duty was 20 per cent and they made it 17½ per cent. They made a mistake. To-day leather is coming into this country, laid down here at prices lower than it can be made here for, and thus the duty is so low that it does not afford any adequate protection at all. Therefore it is that I say we have not only less protection but also less revenue than we had. Now I wish to say something in which perhaps the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) will agree with me. For my own part I should like to see the fiscal policy of the country taken out of politics altogether. I see no reason why, with a change of Government, we should change the tariff. That is a bad fashion. It is not the fashion in England, for there the fiscal policy remains the same no matter which party may be in power. I trust that the Liberal party which is now in power here, after they looked over the situation will decide that it is not necessary to reduce the tariff, but that in some cases they will increase it. But again I urge this point, and urge it as strongly as I can, because it is for that very reason that I rose to speak—that the Government should frankly tell us whether they intend to retain moderate protection or whether they intend to remove all protection and enact a purely revenue tariff. I have been asked why I am a Conservative. I am a Conservative because I believe in protection to our farmers, our workingmen and our manufacturers. I object to Canada being made the dumping ground of the surplus of the United States. I believe that the home market is the best market. We talk about getting markets outside, and I believe in that. But the market the farmers want to-day is the market at their door, the home market. I have said before and I repeat now that a farm near a prosperous town where a great many workmen are employed is far more valuable than a farm equally fertile a great many miles away. We all know that to be the case, and I hold that to be an argument in favour of protection and the home market. I want to develop the home market, and I believe that can be done only by protecting in a moderate way our manufacturers. I want our workingmen to use beef and flour raised by Canadian farmers and the farmers to use boots and shoes, clothing and other articles made by Canadian workingmen. That is the only policy that will build up our country on a solid foundation; and it is because I believe this that I belong to the Conservative party. And in closing I would say that because the majority of the people believe in that policy—for this Government's majority is from Quebec and was obtained on the question of the Remedial Bill and not on the question of the tariff—I am confident that the Conservative party will soon again be called upon to control the destinies of this country.

Mr. MORRISON. I do not rise to reply to the remarks made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Craig) who has just taken his seat, nor yet to the speech made by the hon. gentleman from Bagot (Mr. Dupont). If it were in order for me to speak in my mother tongue as the hon. member for Bagot has given his eloquent speech in his mother tongue, I would tell him, in the words of the immortal poet Ossian—

Lean an irinn's nì i du 'lìghe dìreach,
Chau 'ne a bhan ann sa bheatha so
Ach anns tì tha re tighinn.

I say this is as applicable to-day and in this House as it was in those pre-historic days when the Gaelic language was the universal language. I do not rise as I said before, to reply to either of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken, but I have risen to reply to the remarks made by the hon. member for Prince

West (Mr. Hackett) last night, at least to those parts of that hon. gentleman's speech which referred to the province of British Columbia. The hon. gentleman displayed an Egyptian darkness of mind in relation to the matter in hand which surprises me the more because the hon. gentleman has the honour as he no doubt deems it, and as I should certainly consider it, to come from the province of Prince Edward Island, a province which produces very able men, men who when they undertake to seek the suffrages of the electorate prepare themselves and make some show of acquaintance with the matters upon which they address this House. The hon. gentleman, in his remarks stated, if I recollect aright, that the province of British Columbia was murmuring, as evidenced by the address of the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. McInnes), because, forsooth, they had not received sufficient appropriations under the late Administration; that the province was murmuring because the appropriations were not commensurate with the revenue derived from that province. He also took issue with the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver who had mentioned the fact that the revenue derived from British Columbia far exceeded the appropriations given to that province. The hon. member for Prince West (Mr. Hackett) took issue with the hon. member for Vancouver in that statement, and the ground upon which he based his contradiction was that there were no means of ascertaining what the appropriations to, and the revenues from, the various provinces are. Now, I think that the hon. gentleman in making that statement is not at all familiar with his subject. I would remind him of the facts which are given in the Statistical Year-Book, which was compiled under and during the late Administration, and I presume he will not contradict or minimize anything appearing in a compilation made under the late Administration. He will find that in the Statistical Year-Book for 1894, or 1895, in the one item of fisheries alone, the revenue from the province of British Columbia is put down as something like $30,000; and he will find in the same Year-Book that the amount of the appropriations in respect to the fisheries in that province, was only something like $5,000. That might not be a matter of comment if we did not find in the same Statistical Year-Book a reference to the revenue derived from the province of Nova Scotia from her fisheries, which was something like three or four thousand dollars, and the amount of appropriations in respect to the fisheries of that province during the same time was in the vicinity of $200,000. Now, I do not complain of the province of Nova Scotia getting that incommensurate amount of appropriations as compared with the revenue derived from her fisheries; but I say there is an appearance of discrimination against British Columbia, remembering as I do, and as the hon. gentleman ought to know, that the fisheries of British Columbia are stated in that same Year-Book to be the richest, not only in Canada, but in the whole world. I think these facts would afford a sufficient pretext for murmuring if the people of British Columbia thought they were not getting their due, or not getting appropriations commensurate with the revenue derived by the Government from that province. Now, I might go on through the various industries of that great province. I venture to say that the same remark would apply to the lumber industry and to the mining industry.

The hon. gentleman stated that the province of British Columbia owes its development to the fostering care of the late Administration; he particularized the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway and asked that a great deal of credit be given to the late Administration for the promotion and completion of that great road. He stated that inasmuch as that road had been built during the late Administration, the province of British Columbia had no reason to find any fault with neglect in matters of detail. He has forgotten, if he ever knew, that British Columbia does not owe the Canadian Pacific Railway to any party. He ought to have known, but he apparently does not, that British Columbia made it a condition precedent to her coming into confederation that that transcontinental road should be built. No doubt there are hon. gentlemen here who will remember that even as far back as thirty-five years ago this question of a transcontinental road was mooted in eastern Canada, particularly in Ontario, and it was then conceded that Canada could not become a united nation until her territory stretched from the Atlantic to the Pacific. With that end in view, British Columbia, as I stated, made this condition precedent to her coming in; she was promised this transcontinental road, and this compact or promise that was made to her was binding on both parties, and upon all Administrations. Therefore, I think the hon. gentleman went a little out of his way to display a lack of knowledge of the subject in hand in saying that gratitude was due from British Columbia to the late Administration for the construction of that great work. He ought also to remember the circumstances under which that line of railway was undertaken and completed. He ought to remember that it was commenced under the Mackenzie Administration, and that before that Administration had time to complete the work, it went out of office. He ought to remember that if the road had been completed as at first intended and commenced by the Mackenzie Administration, it would have cost less than it has cost the country, and the country would now own the road. But as the case now stands, the Canadian Pacific Railway has cost the people of this country something like $89,000,000, or about $10,000,000 less than the subsidy granted by the people to this company, and the country does not own the road. The Canadian Pacific Railway syndicate got control of it and built it. Under these circumstances, even assuming this road is a credit to this country, I say that it has cost the country very much more than it ought to have cost, and very much more than it would have cost had the Mackenzie Administration completed it; and not only would it have cost less, but the country would now own that magnificent line of railway. Now, I do not wish to minimize the advantages to British Columbia or to the Dominion at large arising from that transcontinental road; but while the charter remains as it is at present, and while that company has the privileges it now enjoys, there will always be differences of opinion as to circumstances militating against the people of this country in regard to freight rates. The hon. gentleman seems to have forgotten, if he ever knew, that the Canadian Pacific Railway is practically independent of the Government and of the people in regard to freight rates, inasmuch as the Government are not permitted to regulate those rates until the dividends on the amount invested come up to 10 per cent; so that the Canadian Pacific Railway is virtually independent of the Government, as I submit, it should not be. However, I simply refer to this remark of the hon. gentleman to show how fallacious his statements in regard to British Columbia are in their entirety. I will say nothing further on this occasion, as I trust to have an opportunity during this session to make some further reference to the manner in which the province of British Columbia has been treated by the late Administration; and I did not wish to let this opportunity pass without controverting some of the statements made by the hon. member for Prince West (Mr. Hackett). I waited until now, expecting that other members from British Columbia senior to myself, and who have interests in that province at least as large, and perhaps larger than the interests I have there, and who ought, therefore, to have the interests of that province at heart, as I have; I expected to hear from those two gentlemen who sit on the opposite side of the House, some reply to the statements of the hon. member for Prince West; and the fact that they did not undertake to challenge his statements, is my apology for taking up the time of the House at this late stage of the debate.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the hon. gentlemen on the Government benches have so soon lost all interest in this debate, and have apparently so early in the session applied the cloture, at all events to their own side of the House. I venture to say that this discussion has not been without considerable interest to the country, and that, from many points of view, it is most timely, and has involved very serious questions, indeed. Nothing has stood out, in my mind, so prominently as the absolute want of preparation of the great Reform party for the position they were unexpectedly called upon to fill in this year 1896. Whatever hon. gentlemen may think about the propriety of the issue of Governor General's warrants—and that is a subject I shall later on discuss briefly—it is clear that there was an event “unforeseen” by the hon. gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches, and that was the success of the Reform party at the polls at the last election. The fact is that though the election took place on 23rd June, and the Conservative Government resigned somewhere about 10th July, we have now reached 27th August, and yet that wonderful Reform party, that wonderful aggregation of all the political talent of Canada, is unable, at the present moment, to form a Government for this country. The helplessness of that party was exhibited in a marked degree when they had to tear in pieces all the British precedents and constitutional practice in regard to meeting Parliament and the time when Parliament was to be met after a dissolution of Parliament and general elections had taken place. I venture to state, and I have looked somewhat into the question, there is neither in Canadian parliamentary history nor in the history of the mother country in modern times any justification for the extraordinary course pursued of proroguing Parliament until the day in August, when it was called to meet for the despatch of business, after Parliament had been regularly and duly summoned for the despatch of business in July last. Contempt for Parliament in regard to Governor General's warrants is one thing, but it is another evidence of absolute contempt for Parliament when those wise precedents in regard to procedure and practice which have been so carefully and regularly followed in the mother country, are ignored. Let me give two or three examples, and show not only what the practice is in Great Britain on that point, but incidentally point out to this House and to the country, if I possibly can do so, the difference between a great party that is ready to take office, that has reasons for taking office, and a party taken suddenly unawares, without any preparation for office and without having any programme to carry out when it accedes to power. In 1868 there was a dissolution of Parliament in England in November. It was called to meet for despatch of business on December 10. In consequence of defeat at the polls, the Government resigned on 2nd December. Mr. Gladstone, as leader of the triumphant party, promptly formed a government, which was completed on the 9th December, and sworn in, and Parliament met on 10th December. Again, on the resignation of the Gladstone ministry, Parliament was dissolved, and it was called for despatch of business on March 5th. A government was formed by Mr. Disraeli, owing to his success at the polls, on 24th February, and he met Parliament in due course, and, according to the regular practice, on the day when it was summoned for the despatch of business, and that was at the earliest possible day after the general elections. The last case to which I will call attention occurred in 1880. The Disraeli government were defeated at the general elections. Mr. Gladstone accepted office on April 28th. Parliament having been called to meet on April 29, Mr. Gladstone met Parliament on that day, with his Cabinet. In regard to this matter, it is interesting to refer to “Hansard,” and I will do so briefly to show how difficulties and inconveniences in connection were dealt with, because hon. gentlemen know that the extraordinary and unprecedented course followed in Canada was adopted solely for the convenience of the Ministers, because it was more convenient to discuss with their friends from various quarters their arrangements, and the difficulties incident to the formation of the Cabinet, and also to get over as many by-elections or elections for office as possible. That is clearly the only possible reason which exists in the case we have in hand. But reference to any of the authorities, and I have before me the record of the proceedings in 1880, shows that the procedure was for the Government of the day to meet Parliament with such of the party as it had at its back, to elect a Speaker, and then to suffer the inconvenience while Parliament is adjourned for such number of days as Parliament decides in its pleasure, of holding the elections for Ministers, and, as soon as possible afterwards, meet the House and proceed with the consideration and discussion of the Address from the Throne. Further, Mr. Speaker, to contrast a great party with a weak party, a party with principles with a party that has no principles worth carrying out, or principles which members of the party are not at all times ready to acknowledge, on those different occasions, it will be found that although the Parliament was a new Parliament, the Government never met it with a Speech from the Throne that did not represent far more than a request or demand for supplies. Every one of the Speeches on those different occasions to which I have referred mentions important legislation or pressing measures that require consideration at the hand of the people's representatives. The only case in Canada when, after Parliament was summoned for the despatch of business, it was almost immediately prorogued to meet on another day for the despatch of business was in 1881, was not after a general election, when the Government of the day, for state reasons in connection with negotiations at Washington touching the treaty of 1888, undertook to advise His Excellency to prorogue the meeting of Parliament for about twenty-three days. But that does not interfere or clash in any respect with the long line of parliamentary precedents in the mother country, which, in all these matters, have been guardedly and carefully followed here. The difficulties that prevented hon. gentlemen opposite from following in the straight and regular course were political difficulties, as every day becomes more apparent. The helplessness of the Reform party was shown once before. In 1873, for instance, Mr. Speaker, you will remember, and every hon. member is probably familiar with the fact, that when a party long out of power, when a party claiming that it possessed leaders of great ability and a policy worth trying, was given an opportunity, it was unable to form a Cabinet out of its own material, and so they whipped out of the ranks of the Conservative party, men who, while professing Conservative principles, showed very clearly that they had no principles whatever, when it came to a question between principle and office. They took, for instance, two inveterate Tories, two gentlemen who are in the present Cabinet, but two men who had given very fair and very faithful support to Sir John Macdonald and to the principles which he had advocated. I refer to Mr. Scott, the present Secretary of State, and to the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). Those two men were whipped out of the ranks of the Conservative party and, attracted by the sweets of office, they agreed to assist the great Reform party in forming a coalition Government. Mr. Coffin, Mr. Ross, Mr. Burpee, Sir Albert Smith; all of these gentlemen were given office; the Reform party at that time not having within its ranks the material to make a strong Cabinet. And again, true to this practice of theirs of violating precedents and of showing, on serious occasions, their weakness, we find, in 1896, a most extraordinary procedure adopted in connection with Cabinet-making. Take, for instance, the shock that went through this country—I hesitate not to say that Canada and Canadian public opinion received a shock in connection with the advent to office of the representative of Quebec West (Mr. Dobell). He was a life-long Conservative, a dyed-in-the-wool Conservative, a friend and ally of the Conservative Government for years in Quebec, a gentleman who went to the electors as an independent Conservative candidate for their suffrages, a man never professing Liberal principles, a man who, up to the time he was appointed to office would have utterly scouted the idea that he had sympathy of any kind with the leaders of the Reform party, a gentleman, who, if he is not done injustice to by the rumour, is reported to have refused indignantly a request to drive in the same carriage with the present leader of the Government, after the last general election. After all this, after this parade of political independence, a Cabinet office proved too much for him, and he sits there a member of what is no doubt a coalition Government, because we have had no public recantation of his views, although we have had him showing that he cannot withstand the temptation of the gaudy trappings of office. The offer of a cabinet position proved too much for his principles. Without desiring to say anything offensive, Sir, it is absolutely necessary for me to ask: What is the difference between the conduct of that hon. gentleman (Mr. Dobell), who is a member of the present Government, and the case of the poor wretch who, in the excitement of an election contest, sells his principles for $5? The one act would be stigmatized as corrupt. For such an act, a man could be punished, and I believe that for the action of the gentleman from Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) when the electors of his constituency have an opportunity they will take means of exhibiting their indignation at the manner in which they were trifled with.

Now, then, there is the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte). This Government had occasion to resort to the principle of coalition. No member of this House has ever heard the present Minister of Public Works boast of any change of heart or of principle. The hon. gentleman, it is true, claimed our attention on many occasions as an upholder of purity in public life. His name—many of his friends consider—is synonymous with the best kind of political purity that can be devised. In connection with corruption, too, we have heard of his name being mentioned, but I have yet to learn of any public utterance of that hon. gentleman in which he recanted the principles of the Conservative party, in which he repudiated the National Policy and the various lines of the platform of the Conservative party, for which he so ably and energetically fought until a very recent period; and so, these two Conservatives are sitting in office. These two Conservatives are used to bolster up this Reform Cabinet and to enable it to make these extraordinary boasts of which we have heard so much in the last few days. I believe, Sir, also, that the Parliamentary Companion shows that the present Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) was proud to place his name there as a Conservative in 1879. Nevertheless, he has been induced to leave a province in which he gave considerable trouble, I am free to confess, to both Conservatives and Liberals on various different and exciting occasions. I could mention the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) and the Minister from Verchères and Chambly (Mr. Geoffrion). On the question of remedial legislation these two gentlemen are as far apart as the poles, and yet, for the purpose of assisting in the formation of a partly organized government, they agree to sit together to-day. Now, let me see whether the offence of these gentlemen, judged by their own leaders of the past, can be considered as a subject worthy of the attention of Parliament, or a matter of serious consideration in the country. I find that the leader of the Reform party in 1871 laid down with great clearness his idea of this system of attempting to form a government in a free country. Mr. Mackenzie then said :

There are only two ways of carrying on a government ; one is by having a government composed of men who are entirely in harmony on all leading subjects, or by a coalition of different parties who are determined to carry on the administration of affairs in any way they can manage, the only possible way being to bribe a certain number of constituencies.... To procure good government, it is necessary that a Premier should strictly select his colleagues from the party whose principles he intends to carry out. To bring into the Cabinet the member of an opposing party is coalition.

And he denounced, and his party denounced coalition, until it is true the time came for these gentlemen to put their principles into practice, and then they acted as they have acted since ; going back wholly and completely upon their principles, one and all. Now, then, I venture to remind the House that the Reformers in Opposition and the Reformers in power are no more peculiarly before the public now than they were in 1874. There is one of the leaders of the Reform party who, in his day, was active, and who, by his activity, was of great benefit to the Reform party. He is now forgotten and unhonoured by Cabinet rank. I refer to Mr. Jones who was Minister of Militia in the last Reform Government, and who, for many years, has been one of the most active opponents of the Conservative party in the province of Nova Scotia. I find this hon. gentleman taking to task the Government from his seat in the House, as I am endeavouring to do, in connection with the political crime of professing one thing in Opposition, and of practising the other thing when power is obtained. Mr. Jones, in 1876, brought the Government to book for the change of front in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway policy, and the hon. gentleman who last spoke from British Columbia (Mr. Morrison) makes this reference the more important, because it will give him a certain insight into the history of the country in a particular, to which I am sure he has given as yet very little attention. Mr. Jones reminded this House that when in Opposition, the Reformers had opposed the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the incurring of obligations such as were necessary to carry it out in the manner they proposed when they attained power. In 1876 he said to them in this House :

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Roscoe) who had just sat down had stated that since the Government came into power a series of blunders had been committed by them with regard to British Columbia. He quite agreed with him. When the Government occupied seats on the other side of the House they took the position that the terms of union were incapable of fulfilment. The amendments which the party then moved, the objections which they urged and the mistakes which they pointed out had all received moral vindication and fulfilment. The present Government had made a mistake in not repudiating, when they came into power, the whole arrangement ; but brought in another Bill in order to carry out in a more gradual way such a policy.

I refer to that because it is the testimony of one of the allies of hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, I propose to show that they have not improved by time, that they are as ready to violate the principles which they professed in Opposition when they attained power as ever they were. Their conduct before made the phrase, "an organized hypocrisy" synonymous with Grit rule in Canada. An organized hypocrisy confronts us to-day—an organized hypocrisy not very palatable to some of the gentlemen who are forced to support it ; an organized hypocrisy made up of those gentlemen to whom I have referred, differing from each other on the principles I have alluded to, and none of them daring to debate in this House the grounds on which they won on the fiscal question in the last election ; none of them daring to declare the principle on which they propose to deal with the tariff ; none of them venturing to put before the House and the country their own idea of the principle upon which they were elected, and the principle upon which they will stand and fall in connection with that subject, but trying to turn the attention of the people to such matters as the leader of the Government alluded to the other evening—that of race and revenge. And, forsooth, they charge the Conservative leaders and the Conservative party with endeavouring to create ill-will between the French race and the English race in Canada by the cry of French domination. I have a word to say about that, Mr. Speaker, and it is this. I have never had any other opinion than one in regard to the happy fortune of Canada in having the representatives of two of the great races of the world living side by side. I rejoice at every growing sign of union between those races, union in every conceivable way, and I have evidences of the growth of that union. I believe myself that it is a happy thing for this country that those two proud races are dwelling side by side under the same laws, respecting the same institutions, and loyally serving the same Queen. But it was not always so. There have been attempts by demagogues, by men who disagreed with the views I have just uttered—attempts to set the English people and the French people at each other's throats. The cry of French domination is an old cry. It came from Liberal ranks against the late Sir John A. Macdonald. Time and again he was charged on every hustings and in every school-house in Ontario with having played into the hands of Roman Catholic and French Quebec. The air rung with the old charge of French domination, and every means was taken to stir up the prejudices of the people of Ontario against Sir John A. Macdonald's strong and sturdy allies who came from the province of Quebec. I have under my hand the proof; and, in view of the bold statements that have been made in this House, from which it might be inferred that upon our shoulders rested the responsibility of raising such a cry, I propose briefly to give the authorities for my counter statement that that despicable cry came entirely from the Reform party. For instance, take the "Globe" of 1882, the representative organ of that party. In an article headed "Government by the Bleus," here is one sentence:

If Ontario were properly represented in the Dominion Cabinet, its invasion of the rights of this province would be more wonderful.

Again, on February 4th, 1882, in an article on "Provincial rights," speaking of Sir John A. Macdonald, it said:

Is he playing the double but dangerous game of pandering to the prejudices and the dread of progress of our French fellow-citizens at the same time that he is using them to check Manitoba and punish Ontario? If this were all, the case would certainly be bad enough. It would certainly be most discouraging to the progressive provinces to find themselves hampered at every step by their connection with their compatriots on the lower St. Lawrence.

Language of that kind does not tend to create the best entente between the two races. Another article on February 13th, 1882, says:

When the Act of Confederation was passed, the people of Ontario fondly hoped that the days of Lower Canadian domination were at an end.

Again:

They had so long been fettered by French non-progressiveness.

Again:

The solid French vote is Sir John A. Macdonald's reliance on every emergency, and the leaders who in reality control that vote are much too astute to sell it for nothing. They insist upon their own terms, and they practically get them. Those terms are dictated scarcely less by jealousy of Ontario's power and progress than by the inveterate Conservatism which is the bane of the French race in Canada.

Again, on February 14th, 1882, in an article entitled "Anti-federalism at Ottawa," here is a sentence or two of the Hon. George Brown:

We in Upper Canada have complained that the minority of our representatives, the party defeated at the polls in Upper Canada, have been year after year kept in office by Lower Canadian votes, and that all the local patronage has been dispensed by those who did not possess the confidence of the people. We have complained that the land system was not according to the views of our western people. We have complained that local works of various kinds—roads, bridges and landing piers, court houses, jails and other structures—have been erected in an inequitable and improvident manner. The people of Upper Canada will hereafter have the entire control of their local affairs, and will no longer have to betake themselves to Quebec for leave to open a road, to select a county town or to appoint a coroner.

And the article goes on to show how the evils of old days were coming to pass again by the subservience of Sir John A. Macdonald to the province of Quebec. From another article headed, if you please, "French domination and official patronage," on April 27th, 1882, I will give an evidence of where this dangerous suggestion emanated from:

As to Mr. Tassé's complaint of Ontario's jealousy of French domination, it is unfortunately too true that we are under the necessity of maintaining that eternal vigilance which is declared to be the price of liberty, in order to prevent our dearest interests from being sacrificed by our rulers in obedience to the behests of the Quebec phalanx.

And, again, here is a sample of the feeling which still existed in the breasts of the Reformers of Ontario as late as the 23rd of January, 1891, on which date the "Globe" said:

In Quebec, cradled in the excessive paternalism of Colbert, the people have been trained to regard the state as the one and universal provider.

And does he forget the insult offered to the gentlemen from Quebec and their present revered leader by the Toronto "Globe" at the time of the adoption of the French treaty. The "Globe" accused him then and those who went with him into the lobby to vote for that treaty of pandering to sentimentalism and voting for it because it was French.

But this session we have indeed witnessed the irony of fate. There are several gentlemen on the other side who have been bitterly punished. Some know why they have been punished; but some who are not on the Treasury benches at present, and are dissatisfied, but who were ready to go there if they had been favoured as others have been, do not perhaps know why they have been punished. How hard it must have been. Mr. Speaker, for the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) to have sat quietly through the inaugural proceedings in this House, while the First Minister of Canada, the leader of the Reform party in 1896, was nominating you, Sir, into the Chair. How that scene must have recalled to the hon. gentleman—I sometimes forget his Canadian constituency—from Norfolk the words which he wrote a few years ago when, thinking of how he had been brought up at the feet of George Brown and imbibed the teachings of the Toronto "Globe" and contemplating French domination, he thus unbosomed himself in a letter to a friend:

With a French Canadian leader and under the manipulation of such unscrupulous machine politicians as J. D. Edgar, et al., I have not the utmost confidence in the Reform party.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). Rather a chestnut, that.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. A chestnut, yes, but a good one. I say, in all earnestness, that I never had the slightest particle of objection to a leader being chosen for the Opposition side from the French Canadian race any more than I would have on any occasion shown opposition to the votes of the Conservative party being given to a French Canadian leader, but it is rather singular, to say the least, to find these hon. gentlemen opposite throwing the taunts they have done across the floor of the House this session on this subject when we have before us the living evidence of where is to be found the deepest antipathy to French domination.

Mr. LANDERKIN. He never bolted.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He would like to. I can understand why the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) was punished. He cannot have Cabinet rank, that is clear.

Mr. LANDERKIN. He could be made a Solicitor General.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Why was the late member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) deserted? He had spent a long life in the service of the Reform party. I fancy he was the senior in Cabinet rank, in the late Government of Hon. Alex. Mackenzie, to the present leader of the Reform Government. Why was he thrown over? He was a man who had in Parliament, on various constitutional questions, rendered us great assistance. He was a loyal Reformer, true to his party. Even on this Remedial Bill he showed his loyalty, because he spoke one way and voted the other. He voted with his party against his convictions. He did everything a man could do, desperate or otherwise, to support his party, and as yet we do not know what is going to happen. I am told that the newspaper with which he is connected gives evidence of dissatisfaction.

Again, there is the Hon. Alfred Jones, formerly member for Halifax. He expected better treatment at the hands of his party.

Mr. FIELDING. There are a lot of unhappy people in the House to-day.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, and I am dealing with some gentlemen who are out of the House owing to the fact that the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and others are in it. The hon. gentleman knows that the claims of Mr. Jones on his party were such that there could be no comparison with them on the part of any other Reformer in Nova Scotia. He was the head and front of the Grit party in that province. He gave a great deal of ability, industry and application to the work in the Reform interests, but he has been deserted in these happy days and laid to one side.

Then there is the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister), who was a vigorous supporter of the Liberal party in this House. His energies were called into play on many occasions, and he did his work well. He was a leading member of the House of Commons. How is it that such men as the hon. member for Lambton have come to be omitted from this galaxy of talents, this aggregation of all that is wise and wonderful, not only in the Reform party but in the Dominion? Why should he be omitted from the "gathering of statesmen" which the hon. member for South Oxford says his leader brought about. I have suspicion that one of the reasons why such active men as these I have mentioned were left out is that they were too active. They have put themselves on record, and I found on casually looking over a speech of Mr. Gladstone that he supplies perhaps the reason why these old war-horses have been stalled, said Mr. Gladstone, in 1880:

I will therefore content myself with echoing words used by the leader of the Opposition. I entirely agree with him that a party acceding to power from Opposition is not thereby entitled to disown principles on which it has spoken and acted when it occupied those benches.

The fact is these gentlemen would have suggested considerable difficulties to the astute Prime Minister in those twistings and turnings in which it has been his custom to indulge. This session and during the remainder of his Cabinet career, I fancy his difficulties will continue, though they would have been a great deal more trying had some of these old friends been called by him to his assistance in forming a Cabinet.

But the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) says that no matter how the Government have trod on the loyal feelings of their loyal supporters, no matter how they have sent these veteran statesmen to the right and to the left, his leader has "gathered around him three of the most distinguished statesmen of the day," and of course one of these gentlemen took the post of Finance Minister. Personally I am glad to see the hon. Finance Minister in the House. Politically I will do all I can to make his career as brief as possible in his present position and in this House, but although it is natural for the hon. member for South Oxford to have the highest opinion of the man who was chosen to be put over him and who is over him, and notwithstanding all my good feeling to that hon. gentleman and my welcoming him as I do personally to this House, I would like to know from the hon. member for South Oxford the grounds for giving the hon. gentleman this high rank and precedence as a statesman.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Everything is comparative.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I know, and it is just this comparison between the hon. member for South Oxford and the hon. member who fills the position which the former swore he would fill that I should like the hon. member for South Oxford to explain. I want to show the hon. gentleman the kind of a man who is chosen in his place. I want to give him an index of the statesmanship that is preferred to his own, because if Nova Scotia can give us the information, there were certain aims and ambitions of the present Finance Minister when he entered the local political arena—

Mr. LANDERKIN. Tell us about the nest of traitors.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am discussing seriously the position in which certain of our friends opposite are to-day, and, Mr. Speaker, I shall have to ask you to give your attention to any disorderly elements that may be behind those hon. gentlemen. Let those gentlemen who want to interrupt speak from their feet if they have the courage to do it and are able to stand, but order must be maintained. Now, Mr. Speaker, that hon. gentleman, the Minister of Finance, came into public life with certain aims and ambitions, and they were clear and distinct. He was a Reformer of the reformers in a local way. He was going to abolish the legislative council—and that legislative council has withstood his attacks and his assaults and is in exactly the same position as he found it in fourteen or fifteen years ago. He undertook, and swore by all the gods that he would accomplish his end, to tear Nova Scotia from out the Dominion of Canada. He gained power in Nova Scotia by the agitation in favour of the province seceding from the Dominion. And he did his best, and did it very well for a time, to set his native province against all the western provinces. His great aim, as he knows and will admit, was, at that time—in 1886, not so very long ago—not only to wrench Nova Scotia from out the Dominion, but to establish a union of the maritime provinces apart from these western provinces, with whom we had nothing in common, as his argument was. But he also threatened any man who would trifle with this question or go back on his professions of repeal, which did good service for him in 1886. But, thank God, Mr. Speaker, to-day, notwithstanding that that was one of the great aims of the hon. gentleman's political life, the Dominion of Canada was never welded together more firmly than it is in this year, 1896. The

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

hon. gentleman carried these feelings of hostility to such a length that it was only the other day, and, I think, after he ceased to be Prime Minister of Nova Scotia, that the school children of that province were allowed a holiday on Dominion Day. Even during the last session in which he sat in the provincial assembly, a motion was presented by a Conservative member to make the first day of July a national holiday and have it observed in the schools of Nova Scotia, and this was voted down by him. And I do not believe that though that hon. gentleman was Prime Minister of Nova Scotia for many years and up to the time he came into this Cabinet, the Dominion flag has been allowed to float over the provincial buildings of Nova Scotia. He has failed in all these puny efforts which were directed to tearing down the legislative council or tearing to pieces the Dominion of Canada. And yet the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) says the hon. gentleman is a statesman and calls upon us to admire him. Certainly we cannot admire him for what he has done, but, as in the case of other Reformers, we shall have to admire him, if we can, for what he intends to do. The hon. gentleman came into power on the cry of economy. The provincial extravagance before his time he thought appalling. His policy was retrenchment. He was able to show that we were spending too much—several hundred dollars too much. I think the hon. gentleman's figures showed—on the Lieutenant-Governor's garden. The garden in which vegetables were grown, the patch of land at the back of Government House he showed to be a drain upon the resources of the province, and he promised great reforms and the saving of several hundred dollars every year. But, to his credit be it said, as soon as he took office he forgot all about that, and he has increased these perquisites, and altogether deserves, as I will admit, considerable credit for having gone back on himself and having treated the Lieutenant-Governor with proper respect and made that gentleman's position as comfortable as he could. Before these days of retrenchment we never enjoyed the luxury of a public debt, but we have one now, thanks to the services of his protégé the hon. member for South Oxford. He has rolled it up, and rolled it up pretty quickly too. I think he is able to show an expenditure of $300,000 a year, over and above that required under the administration of his predecessor. And out of the largesse of the National Policy we have furnished him the funds to spend right and left. The royalty on the coal, the mining industry having been fostered by the Conservative Dominion policy has enabled the hon. gentleman to do these great things to which I have referred.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Considering the position which the Minister of Finance occupies in this Parliament, it is only fair that I should add something to the reference that I made this afternoon to the career of that hon. gentleman, that new, bright and shining light in this galaxy of all the talents, treating the subject more particularly that I proposed to do when we rose. I find the apostle, as he was called, of retrenchment and economy, involved in a rather curious career in the province of Nova Scotia. When the Government of which he was first a member, but not Provincial Secretary, came into power in Nova Scotia, the gross debt of the province, in 1882, was less than $100,000. Within the next two years after they had the aid of this financial genius, they added nearly $300,000, making the gross debt, on 31st December, 1894, over $371,000. Then the hon. gentleman took charge, and we find from the following return presented by him to the provincial Parliament, some interesting information which may guide us as to what that hon. gentleman can do in the way of economy and reform if given charge of the Dominion finances for any length of time. The financial condition of Nova Scotia on 31st December, 1894, is represented in a return of his to the provincial House, as follows: Gross debt, $371,570.89; assets deposited at Ottawa, $1,052,945.84; miscellaneous assets, $411,533.14; total assets, $1,469,498.98. Showing a surplus of $1,092,928.09. The financial condition of that province on September 30, 1895, according to the return of the hon. gentleman laid on the Table of the local House, was as follows: Gross debt, $3,346,899.99; assets, deposits at Ottawa, $1,056,238.58; miscellaneous assets, $302,767.59; total assets, $1,358,006.17; deficit on capital account, $1,988,063.82. So that that financial genius changed a surplus of a million dollars in 1884, into a deficit on capital account of nearly two millions on September 30, 1895; in other words, he expended $3,081,021.91 more than income between December 31, 1894, and September 30, 1895. So all these gentlemen who are pressing the Minister of Public Works for additional expenditures, may take heart and feel that the chances for a very lavish and heavy expenditure are tolerably good when the finances of this country are in the hands of the hon. gentleman. Now, to recapitulate, the gross debt under his management of $371,000 in 1884, became, in 1895, $3,346,000 odd. Let me refer, for instance, to the expenditure on Government House. Long and loud were the complaints of that hon. gentleman in regard to the excessive extravagance of his predecessors. From 1879 to 1882 the Conservative record shows an average expenditure of $3,840 on Government House, and it was almost a crime in the eyes of the hon. gentleman. He was given the reins of power, and from 1883 to 1895 the expenditure amounted to $16,000, or an average of $4,840 as against that lavish and extravagant expenditure under the Conservative Government of $3,840 a year. I need not go into other subjects, because it would become a little too provincial, but the tale is the same in regard to the expenditure on the provincial building and items of that character. Now, those are some samples of many showing the differences between Grit professions in Opposition and Grit practice in power. Why, Mr. Speaker, if in this House there has been one thing more than another that our friends opposite have dwelt upon, it was the fearful advantage taken by the Government of the day in regard to non-simultaneous polling. The Government of the day, they used to tell us, ought never to take advantage as so to arrange by-elections that one could influence another. Now, Sir, these gentlemen have already given us quite a lot of material to comment upon in a very brief period, and without going into all the various ministerial by-elections. I will take the elections in the province of Nova Scotia. There were only two members to be returned, and it was not deemed wise to any extent to follow the rules they laid down in Opposition. If my memory serves me right, there was fully a week between the time fixed for the election of the Minister of Finance and the day fixed for the election of the Minister of Militia, both in the same province. No explanation has been given why these hon. gentlemen did not hastily seize the opportunity of showing how much they believed in their professions, by holding the elections, in that province at any rate, on the same day.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Were they sworn in at the same time?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Whether they were sworn in at the same time, I am not able to say, but at any rate they were Ministers together.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No, they were not.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. They came to the province as Ministers together. The hon. gentleman sees a distinction. You may whip the devil around a stump in many ways, I suppose; so these gentlemen had to arrange that they should be sworn in on different days, and forsooth, the great principle of simultaneous polling had to vanish into thin air. At any rate, they so arranged that these elections did not even take place on the same day in that one province, yet hon. gentlemen know full well how these have varied in different provinces. We are thus only at the beginning of the great examples shown by a Reform Administration in regard to this important subject.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). The election in North

Grey and in Queens-Sunbury were held on the same day, and with the same result.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, and carried by the same means; and I will give the hon. gentleman at once a sample of how they did carry those constituencies. It was a crime on the part of a Conservative Government to mention public works or public undertakings upon the hustings. Why, if a Minister went to Moncton and spoke a few words of encouragement in regard to a local enterprise there, a graving dock, the changes were sounded long and loud as to the iniquity of the whole proceeding, as virtually involving the corruption of constituencies, holding out hope of reward by means of railways and public works. Is there a man who has gone through Grey, or Queen's and Sunbury, or who has followed the speeches of the Ministers, who does not know that these desperate means were chiefly resorted to, above ground and on the platform, in order to influence the electorate? In regard to that again I must refer to the Minister of Finance, as well as to the Minister of Railways. They had scarcely been appointed Cabinet Ministers when they prepared to tear to pieces and absolutely to scout some of the boldest professions of their present colleague, the member for South Oxford. Now, even if he has been put in the background, even if the cherished object of his ambition has been denied him, even if he cannot keep faith with the constituents who elected him on his solemn pledge that he would be Minister of Finance, surely he should be treated with more respect than he was treated by the Minister of Railways and Minister of Finance. How did these hon. gentlemen talk to their constituents? First of all, let us remember that the present Minister of Trade and Commerce had written a carefully prepared letter to the Patrons of Industry in the province of Ontario, in which he told them that when they advocated that there should be no railway bonuses, they were in line with the Reform policy, and that the Reformers had fought against all the provincial railway subsidies, that it was a cardinal plank in their platform, and that under good Grit rule there would be no railway bonuses. Sir, we know that time and again we were charged with an effort to corrupt various constituencies by holding out that a part of our policy was to take federal money to build provincial railways. The hon. Finance Minister had no opposition in his constituency. That hon. gentleman knew that in Queen's and Shelburne there is an intense desire on the part of the people, a very reasonable and proper desire in those railroadless counties, to have railway facilities such as are enjoyed by similar important constituencies in Canada. Those people have demanded from time to time that attention should be given to this subject. The attention of the late Government had already been directed to the constituency in that regard, and though the Finance Minister had no opposition and was elected by acclamation by the people, yet out of the goodness of his heart and with his idea, which is not the prevailing idea of the Reform party of the way to handle the public money, he there and then went back in the most direct and absolute manner on those professions to which I have referred as emanating from the late financial exponent of the Reform party. He held out the hope, a hope which I trust he will fulfil, and he will follow out to the letter the declarations he made in the constituency, that railway facilities would be provided, and he led the electors to believe that the great object of his life in this Cabinet would be to supply them with the transportation facilities they required.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Quote any promise I made.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I can come pretty nearly doing so. The "Morning Chronicle" contained a speech delivered by the hon. gentleman. But I find hon. gentlemen opposite have wonderful memories. I have asked several questions in regard to statements made by Ministers to the electors, who were captured by them; but I find that the promises were only on paper, and pretty bad paper at that because it will not be honoured.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman will not be able to quote from that paper or any other paper any promise made by me to give Queen's and Shelburne a railway; but if he means that I expressed my sympathy with the people there and my desire to serve them, that is correct.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I accept the hon. gentleman's statement. The hon. gentleman misunderstood me if he imagined that I did not ascribe to him considerable astuteness. The hon. gentleman held power too long in my province to lead me to reflect on his extraordinary ability, in not binding himself particularly, but in inducing electors of his province to expect great things from him. The language he used was uttered in the absence of a contest, with no enemy in front or behind.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. After I was elected.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. On the day of the hon. gentleman's return. The hon. gentleman should understand that I am not pressing the argument which was used against us, that these were promises born in bribery. The hon. gentleman was not opposed. But I am showing that it has taken the Government a very little time to go back on the loudest professions they made when in Opposition. Here is the way the hon. gentleman spoke.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I was not going to the people, but I had already won the election.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman was saying in public what he had no doubt already said many times in private. The hon. gentleman said :

One question in particular had long occupied a foremost place in their minds, and that was the question of railway extension. While most of the counties of the province enjoyed the benefit of railway extension in some degree—some of these perhaps only in a very small degree—it was a striking fact that the counties of Shelburne and Queen's were totally without railway communication.

In the history of railway legislation in Nova Scotia, that hon. gentleman showed his utmost contempt for all parliamentary ideas, and control was given by the majority that would do his bidding by which the hon. gentleman was able to obtain the most extraordinary powers ever placed in the hands of any body of men called the Executive, whereby he could by Order in Council, if he pleased, bind the province in thousands of dollars for any railway project that might meet with the approval of his Cabinet. The hon. gentleman thus obtained most extraordinary powers, such as hon. gentlemen behind him in this House would not think of placing in his hands.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. And not in yours.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Certainly, and very wisely so, for I would not ask them.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. This is somewhat parish politics.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What does the hon. gentleman say ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The reference you are now making to Nova Scotia politics.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman objects to my reference to Nova Scotia politics as being parish politics. And yet the hon. gentleman was one of the leaders of his party in the maritime provinces ; and I ask, did he tell the people of Nova Scotia that the question of railway extension, which is so interesting to that province, was only parish politics ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I merely suggested that the discussion of purely provincial topics is hardly apropos of a debate on the Speech from the Throne in this Parliament.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If such is the hon. gentleman's view, he will probably be able to give the House the benefit of his advice at a later stage, but he should remain quiet now and not even discuss parish politics. Hon. members, however, must be allowed to proceed with the debate on the Address.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What we complain of is that you are not debating the Address.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If this is parish politics, the Finance Minister knows nothing else. Who introduced parish politics here ? The Minister of Trade and Commerce referred to the hon. gentleman, who had supplanted him, as one of the three great statesmen surrounding the present Prime Minister. I have been looking to the Finance Minister for a sign of genius. He has been a parish politician, and a successful one ; if it is necessary to go into parish politics, that is his forte. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries has the habit of interrupting me—perhaps it is useful in keeping me to the subject—but if he will allow me I will refer to a speech and make a quotation. I did not introduce this subject, but the Finance Minister wanted grounds on which I based my argument, which I propose to follow up, in which I contended that hon. gentlemen opposite in an extraordinarily brief space of time have gone back on some of their most solemn promises made while occupying seats on this side of the House. In addition to what I have already quoted from the speech delivered by the Minister of Finance, the hon. gentleman said :

The Coast Railway Company being now satisfied that they would have all fair consideration—

From whom ? No doubt from the Finance Minister, and properly so.

—not only from the local government, but from the Dominion Government as well had announced their intention of vigorously prosecuting their work.

The hon. gentleman knows as well as I do that the late Government placed on the Table of this House a promise to grant Dominion aid, but through the obstruction of hon. gentlemen opposite no action was taken on the resolution presented. The hon. Finance Minister cannot do more than implement the promise we made, and secure a grant of Dominion money for a local railway, and this right in the teeth of the declaration made by the member for South Oxford that the Reform party was opposed to any grant of that kind. I am not going to read, for I have not the record here, but I am going to refer—and the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) is a witness—to promises made not on the day of the election (that is the great point made by the Finance Minister after he is out of the woods), but in the heat of a contest by the Minister of Railways of a similar character to those presented by the Finance Minister when he was elected. That was bribery and corruption, gross and outrageous corruption in our time, according to hon. gentlemen opposite; but this is not only following our policy, but it is repudiating the speeches of members of the Administration made to the Patrons of Industry. Well, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) though out of the Finance Department is not out of public life—although it is hinted that he is going soon. He was kept pretty well out of public life during the last campaign, much as I regret it. One of the wisest things done, was the action on the part of the First Minister in keeping that hon. gentleman far in the background. I remember that the hon. member for Halifax—I do not know whether you would call him the senior or the junior member for Halifax, so I will take the liberty of mentioning his name (Mr. Russell)—was quoted in the county of Pictou in my contest, by Mr. John Thomas Bulmer, who came to oppose me there, as being responsible for saying, that he stated with authority, that the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) would not be Finance Minister in Mr. Laurier's Cabinet if that hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) were returned to power. It was one of the strongest points against me in the county. It did a great deal to lower my old-time majority; the fact of it being said, that the Prime Minister would have very little to do with the hon. member for South Oxford. But there was a great deal of wisdom in that, although I fancy it cost the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) a pang to be compelled to make that promise and pledge to the electorate of Canada. Nevertheless, the hon. gentleman from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) is a member of the Government, and according to Mr. Gladstone's authority, his statements as a leading member of the Reform party largely bind that party. That hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) said, and said more than once, when we asked him for his policy: that he was like the physician, ready to prescribe when he was called in. Has he been called in, Mr. Speaker? If he has, he has not been ready to prescribe. He has spoken in the House. He has used the old worn out adjectives. He has abused his opponents as vigorously as ever, but his anathemas against the National Policy seemed to have departed. The hon. gentleman spoke, and spoke vigorously, for some time the other night without in any way pretending to prescribe. Let us follow him a little further. In that very important letter to the Patrons of Industry, an organization that threatened trouble somewhere, the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) in 1894, made pretty positive statements in regard to subjects that have been discussed on this side of the House and which have been avoided by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. I want, for instance, particular notice to be taken of this pledge. In this letter, describing the position of the Liberals, published in the

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

"Globe" on the 25th October, 1894, addressed to the Patrons of Industry by Sir Richard Cartwright, he says, speaking of the tariff:

I believe the necessity for immediate action to be urgent.

Now let us see what he is referring to. In the latter part of this same letter, an official letter, a letter as binding upon the party as any leader could write, he makes certain statements. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to contrast them with the language used in this debate. I ask you to contrast it with that halting, limping, apology for inquiry, that plea for the lapse of a long period while these hon. gentlemen make up their minds. In the meantime they hope to run a few by-elections under the happy conditions that heretofore existed, whereby in each constituency the Liberal candidate may have his own policy and swear that it is the policy of his leader though they all differ one from the other. This is what the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) informed the Patrons of Industry:

The time is ripe—

Ripe, mark you, Mr. Speaker, in 1894, but not ripe in 1896.

The time is ripe for very extensive and far-reaching reforms. We have suffered much, and have, it is to be hoped, learned something. I, for my part, would be sorry to see the issue dwindle down to a mere question of revenue tariff.

Think of the contempt for a revenue tariff involved in that sentence, and then remember the earnest advocacy the other evening, by that same hon. gentleman, of a revenue tariff, and a revenue tariff only. He continued, to the Patrons:

This is a good thing in its way, but very much more than this is needed now, and very much more than this can be got, if only our chances are not thrown recklessly away. We need among other things a radical readjustment, not only of our tariff, but of our whole system of taxation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not underrate the ability of the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright). I know his ability and his unpopularity. They are undoubted, and hon. gentlemen opposite understand both of those features of his character as well as I do. But he knows the meaning of the English language, and I say that that statement, while more definite than anything that has come from the Treasury benches in this debate, is as different as possible from the hints and suggestions that each individual of the Ministry is endeavouring to make on the present occasion. Now, how many months are required for the Liberals to bring forth this policy of theirs? It seems not to be denied that the period is ominous. For some nine months are to elapse before this tariff policy can be brought forth. In matters political I think that an unreasonable period. I do not know an occasion in Canada where the reform of the tariff, or changes in the tariff, ever required that period of gestation.

Well, Sir, I am not going, if I can avoid it, to travel over the arguments that have been used in advance of me, but it is impossible in a free Parliament, it is impossible at this time and in this year of Our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-six, to avoid comment upon the extraordinary and dangerous condition assumed by the Government of the day touching this special and reserved power of His Excellency to issue warrants upon the Treasury. The hon. gentlemen opposite have not outdone us in any particular in regard to the importance of that subject. If their position be right, if what they have done is within the law, and they profess to have been acting on legal advice—though it is significant that at this late period in the session relatively they have not given us the benefit of the advice of which they have acted—if their position be sound, then parliamentary government is an absolute farce. Hon. gentlemen have referred to the necessity for calling us here, but if these gentlemen can spend our money at the rate of $1,000,000 a month by means of a special warrant, and by postponing Parliament for one month after it has been called for the despatch of business, then what is the use of calling Parliament at all. I call attention to the fact, that no one on the opposite side of the House has yet attempted to answer the arguments from this side. If they can spend our money by special warrants for two months, what is to prevent them going on month after month? They seem to say that a majority of the people of the country said they could do so. God forbid that the people of the country should say that. It will not meet the argument in this House, for the Prime Minister to abruptly say that he has canvassed his supporters, that they agreed to put in his hands the conduct of public affairs, and that he challenges us to a vote, that he stops debate, that he sends the whip through his party, and that he will leave all the debate to us and will assume the voting power at the earliest opportunity. We demand, and we have a right to demand, the reasons, and not to be satisfied, as the hon. member for South Oxford said, with the Government sheltering themselves behind the mere language of the statute or a statement that there was legal advice that this conduct was right. Let the members in this House representing the law department, rise in this debate and give us the reasons. Let us have their complete position on the subject, not for party purposes, but for the advantage of the public at large.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). The hon. gentleman could not have heard the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick).

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I did not hear the Solicitor General. I did not know he had spoken in this debate.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He has.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Did he discuss the subject of the Governor General's warrants?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He did.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. As the subject will come up again, I readily apologize to the House for travelling on a line which I would not, of course, have taken had I heard any hon. gentleman representing the law department speak on the subject. It will, however, come up again, and, in the meanwhile, I shall have the opportunity of reading what the hon. Solicitor General has said. But on the general question, I ask the attention of the House to one or two principles which I think have not been mentioned in the debate hitherto. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was utterly unable, with all his undoubted ability, to get away from his own idea of this extraordinary power on the part of the Governor General, pronounced in 1891. But I want to go back to another period. I want to remind the hon. gentleman that there was no principle more vehemently fought for or advocated by the Reformers before confederation, or since, than the sanctity, so to speak, of this principle of parliamentary control over the expenditure of public money. Not to go before 1867, let me give the opinion of the late leader of the Liberal party, the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, as reported in the "Globe," of July 6th, 1872, in the following words:—

The policy of the Liberal party is to make the parliamentary government supreme; to place the Government directly under the control of Parliament; to take from them all power to use any portion of the people's money without a direct vote for such service.

I will not repeat the language of the hon. member for South Oxford, as we have already heard it; but equally strong was he in 1891 on the position that not only must the circumstances be exceptional, but—and I ask the particular attention of the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), who the other evening, interrupting my hon. friend from the eastern townships (Mr. Ives) to contend that nothing hinged on the word "or"—that the expenditure was to be within the spirit of that Act, and strictly unforeseen. But, skipping that reference, let me come to the leader of the Government's own declaration in 1896, in the very campaign which has just ended, speaking, I think, in Toronto, on June 13th, shortly before the responsibility of the Government devolved upon him. I ask particular attention to his language, in which the case was well put. I do not say the application of it was right, but the principle he there enunciated makes the action taken by him subsequently when in office all the more reprehensible, in my humble judgment. On that occasion, as reported by the "Globe," he said :

If you scan English history you will find that the pages of that history, from the Plantagenets up to the revolution of 1680, show that the one feature which is more conspicuous than all other features is that the people maintain the struggle against the Crown of England in order to obtain the control of the expenditure of public money—the control of the money which was paid by the people in the form of taxes. That struggle went on for generations, nay, for centuries, as you all know. It cost the life of one King and the crown of another King, but the English people were relentless and would not give in until at last they obtained from the Crown the recognition of the principle that all moneys should be voted by Parliament, that all authority for the expenditure of public moneys should originate in Parliament. This is the law of the land ; we received it from the Parliament of England. We boast that we are British subjects, we boast of our parliamentary institutions, and to-day I invite the attention of friend and foe to this salutary principle, that all moneys are to be controlled by Parliament, that no appropriations are to be made except upon the floor of Parliament.

With that language I do not quarrel in any particular. It is sound, it is healthy, it is necessary to the well-being of Canada ; but I charge to-night, and later on I think we shall make the charge good, that the hon. gentleman was hasty in violating that sound doctrine enunciated by him on the eve of the last election. Legal advice now ? Why did not these hon. gentlemen ask for legal advice before ? Why were these hon. gentlemen so quick in their charges and so eager in their representations of what the statute meant ? The hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., for instance, interrupted my hon. friend the other night to contend that much depended on whether the word of the statute was "or" or "and."

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman is unfair. I did not make any reference to the statute. The hon. member used the word "and," whereas the statute used the word "or." I simply called attention to the fact, that is all.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Quite so, and the hon. gentleman, in calling attention to the fact, insinuated that there was a difference between "and" and "or," or else his remark could have no bearing on the subject. The point of our contention is that that word "or" must be read as "and," and I say solemnly and earnestly that if that word "or" is not to be read as "and" and you are to say that any expenditure not provided for by Parliament may be made by a Governor General's warrant, parliamentary government or responsible government is a farce. We do not argue that the expenditure was not honest. No man suggests that these hon. gentlemen since coming into power have spent a single dollar corruptly ; no man has contended that they have not taken care that the money expended has been honestly expended ; but the principle is far-reaching. The principle is this : If they have the right to make that expenditure for good and substantial reasons, if they have the right to construe that power as one to be exercised in regard to an item found in the Estimates, then I say they can expend the whole of the money of the people of Canada at one executive blow. One executive whim will do the whole thing : and placed in the strait, while they are honest to-day they may be dishonest to-morrow. And the action of the Auditor General is something I cannot understand. So far as the papers go, he never raised a hand or suggested a difficulty as regards this very important question, which lies at the very door of parliamentary government, of parliamentary control over expenditure. So I hope that, if I have done nothing more, I have emphasized the position which I take in regard to this matter. We do not propose to charge the hon. gentlemen with any corrupt intent ; that is not necessary. We do propose to point out to them that having improperly and contrary to parliamentary practice and procedure further prorogued for despatch of business the Parliament called after the general election to meet on a certain day for the despatch of business, they, in the meantime and without parliamentary sanction, made an illegal use of the powers vested in the Governor General concerning special warrants.

Then, again, I think it not untimely, in this debate, to point out the extraordinary position which they now take regarding another important financial matter. Those hon. gentlemen were very much exercised at one time with regard to the financial readjustment of the federal aid to the various provinces, and they summoned the Prime Ministers from every province in Canada to meet in the city of Quebec for the purpose of considering the urgent necessities of the various provincial exchequers. At that convention these local premiers came to a certain decision with regard to the grant of money that should be paid year after year out of the federal treasury in aid of the local treasuries of the different provinces, and having submitted their decision, contrary to good political usages in the mother country, to the leader of the Opposition, who is now leader of the Government, they extracted from him a pledge. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) said that in that transaction the leader of the Government was bought and sold by Mr. Mercier. He charged him here squarely one night with having been bought and sold by the late Mr. Mercier, and be cause of the pledge which the leader of the Government then gave to implement the resolutions at Quebec, Mr. Mercier promised that hon. gentleman in federal politics a large majority. And I think a colleague of the First Minister, the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell), was with the Conservative party when they denounced that bargain or that arrangement and working in unison with them. I think that in 1887 the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) was working hand in hand with the Conservative party and had no sympathy and never expressed any sympathy with the party then in Opposition.

Mr. DOBELL. The hon. gentleman is drawing largely on his imagination and it is not the first time he has done so. I shall be happy some time to have the opportunity of calling attention to the way he has done so.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman has interrupted me, but he has not done me the courtesy of saying whether my suspicion is correct, that he was then a good, solid and substantial Conservative working with the Conservative party.

Mr. DOBELL. That is not the suspicion to which the hon. gentleman gave utterance. That to which he did give utterance was absolutely false, and the hon. gentleman has been wrong in other utterances he has made.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not think that either side of the House appreciates the style of the new Minister. I have quarrelled, as my right was, with a very important act in that gentleman's political career; I have challenged his conduct, as my right was, and I have done it in parliamentary language, and he has not the courage to answer the fair question I put, although he did have the audacity to interrupt me. The hon. gentleman does not deny and cannot deny—and I give him the opportunity of doing it—that he himself was a member of the Conservative party in 1887 and acted with it, when those resolutions were passed at Quebec. He dare not, he cannot deny it. We have, then, this Government in this singular position. We have the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) so full of the old spirit of secession, that though he was willing to sit at that round table and arrange how much more money Nova Scotia should get out of the Dominion, he would not allow that conference to rise until it was solemnly recorded that he would take all he could get without prejudice to his right to go on and fight for secession. And these hon. gentlemen imagine to-day that instead of being backed by so narrow a majority that they were afraid to meet Parliament on the day it was called and in the regular and constitutional way go for their elections and let this Parliament adjourn from day to day, they are supported by an enthusiastic and overwhelming and hide-bound majority. When we mildly and in parliamentary form put before them the solemn professions and resolutions—a bargain, as the hon. Minister of Finance has intimated, in a letter over his own name—whereby the conference resolved that so much federal money should be spent, and when we cite the hon. Finance Minister's declaration that he had Mr. Laurier's pledge that when he was in a position to do it he would give the provinces these extra grants, that hon. gentleman gets up in his place, as he did yesterday, and gives an entirely evasive answer and suggests that no action, forsooth, will be taken by him, now that he is snugly ensconced in a federal position, unless the local authorities further press it upon him, and then, forsooth, this mighty Government will take the matter into their consideration. We have the solemn bargain put before the people of Nova Scotia whereby the finances of Nova Scotia are to be strengthened as a reward for Liberal success in the Dominion, and a bargain to which the First Minister is committed, yet, forsooth, when these gentlemen are in a position to carry out the pledge they are not able to say whether the pledge will be acted upon but will only promise that if it is put before them they will take it into their consideration. That may be satisfactory to them, but I do not think it will bring much comfort to the colleagues whom the Finance Minister has left to their own resources in the province of Nova Scotia.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. They are having a very comfortable time jut now.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman says they are, and he looks as if he were having a still more comfortable time.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If my hon. friend will permit me, he looks as if he were not having a very comfortable time.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Looks may be deceptive. The hon. gentleman looks as if he were having a happy time, and I look as if I were not. In that case, he must be having an unhappy time for I certainly am enjoying myself very much. Now the hon. gentleman seems to insist that we are miserable over here. Why, we have not begun any blue ruin story. We have left hon. gentlemen opposite the finest country the sun ever shone on, and we have left it in a far better financial condition than the different provinces of Canada are in which have enjoyed Grit regimes for the last eighteen years. We have left hon. gentlemen opposite a position in which they ought to be happy, at any rate, for a time, and I can assure the hon. Minister of Finance that if he thinks there is misery here, he is certainly speaking without the book. We propose only to remain here during the hot weather. We have not any intention of remaining longer and there is a great deal of amusement afforded from that side. First of all, there is the rapidity with which hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches can swallow every sacred profession they have hitherto made. There is a sad side to it, but there is also an amusing side.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. For example, the Remedial Bill.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Well, the hon. gentleman, I believe, is swallowing that too. The principle may stick a little but I think it has got to go down. For instance, here is our genial friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). Is it not sufficient to make us happy over here to find him unable to lift up his voice. Why, there never was a session that lasted this long in which we did not hear him before this. I declare to you, Sir, that I have not seen that hon. gentleman with a blue-book in his hands this session. I have never heard him ask a question. There are some other reasons perhaps that also make the situation not as humorous to him as it seems to us, for he was one of those industrious and indefatigable men who are certainly entitled to better treatment at the hands of their party than they are receiving to-day. However, he may be the Minister of Interior at a later period. We shall hope so. Now, Mr. Speaker, hon. gentlemen opposite not only insist that we are miserable, but they cannot understand our anxiety about this question of the tariff. I have heard a good deal in the debate, but I venture to say there are reasons for the anxiety, whether on the side of the House or in the country, in regard to the extraordinary position that the Government are attempting to assume. Gentlemen on the Treasury benches have had the assurance from leading members on this side of the House of hearty co-operation with them if they are only in a position where they can declare to us and to the country at large that the principle of protection in the tariff will not be disturbed. A simple assurance of that kind and the supplies required could be voted, and everything else that is to be done in this Parliament quickly done. There is no obstructive spirit on this side, and I hope there will never be. But we do ask, we venture to ask on behalf of the business men, some answer to that question. Take my own county—this may be said to be parish politics, nevertheless there are gigantic interests involved in that county in the shape of iron and coal industries. If hon. gentlemen opposite were to say that they would not disturb the iron and coal policy, and if a by-election were to take place in my county, it is possible that I should not be returned; for I would give every credit—I hesitate not to say it—to the Government for regarding these two great interests that have grown up during the last eighteen years. But I would thank them, in the interests of my country and in the interest of these huge industries to know that much. On the other hand, is it not fair that if they propose to stick in the knife and root out the principle of protection in that tariff as regards coal and iron, is it not fair that if, peradventure there should be a by-election, the voice of the people pronounce fairly and unmistakably on that policy. And what is my case is the case of many others. The hon. gentlemen may say: You are careful of your own position merely as a member of Parliament. God forbid. I say the same with regard to other items that I do with regard to iron and coal. Take the item of coal oil. The advocacy of the abolition of that duty did its work in the province of Nova Scotia and in other places. But aside from politics altogether, we know there is an enormous amount of capital involved in that industry, and business men wish to know—and it seems to me they have a right to know—the principle that is to be applied. I need not mention other articles, for those I have given sufficiently illustrate the case. We do not ask for items, because we know how unreasonable that would be. But we say: You have advocated policy after policy differing one from the other just as the localities differed in which they were presented. We ask you to have the courage of your convictions, as we had in former days, to tell us on what principle you are going to touch that tariff. Are you going to exclude the principle of protection? Is there no hon. gentleman who will tell us "Yes" or "No"? Is there no one who will show that courtesy to this side of the House. We will take any answer that is given—we are bound to take it. But on every ground of fair-play and reason we have a right to an answer. You, Mr. Speaker, with your proclivities in favour of the Government of the day, as I know they are, you know that British fair-play and a fight man-fashion demands that in politics as in everything else you should show your colours to your adversary. Yet these gentlemen try to fight us behind masked batteries, keeping within the lines of Torres Vedras. Is this style of guerilla warfare to continue? I do not think that such a course will commend itself to the country. This side of the House asks no definite particulars as to the exact amount of duty on every item. But we trust they will not cease to demand before this House rises, such definite information as will satisfy not the Opposition merely, but the commercial community at large. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who notwithstanding the position he now occupies in the Government, is considered an authority on these things, has told us that it is possible to have a revenue tariff without incidental protection. That is an important statement. Hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that we are going to have a revenue tariff, but they stop there and do not tell us, according to the two distinctions that they themselves refer to, on what basis it is to be arranged—whether it is to be a revenue tariff with incidental protection or a revenue tariff without incidental protection. Then again, can we imagine that these hon. gentlemen have any respect for the mandate of the people. I have heard something about that, but what I know is that there has been no mandate from the people to eliminate the principle of protection from the tariff. I challenge any hon. member of this House to show the contrary. You cannot give the names of the majority of this House in favour of that principle. And yet we know how the mandate of the people may be treated. It is no assurance for us to know how the votes have gone, because we know that when in 1891 the hon. leader of the Opposition, acting differently from his action of 1896, had the courage to issue a manifesto, so that all who declared themselves his supporters could be bound to something definite, he supported unrestricted reciprocity, and came back defeated. And yet, to use his own language, he said that, notwithstanding the verdict of the people, he intended to continue the advocacy of the policy of unrestricted reciprocity. That indicates how much he regards the mandate or the voice of the people. Then, in regard to these assurances that no interests would be needlessly disturbed, I would call the attention of the House to the fact that in that debate of August 4th, 1891, the present leader of the Government, then the leader of the Opposition, said that whether unrestricted reciprocity had a disturbing effect or otherwise on the interests of the country, the benefits attaching to it were so great and so overwhelming that his party would not hesitate to advocate the instant adoption of it as soon as possible. So we have nothing definite to guide us in this maze of varied policies. But the Minister of Finance or his friends will say: Did not we promise you that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) would not be Minister of Finance, and have not we redeemed that promise? Yes; and that is the only promise they have redeemed. Then, it is said, you need not be afraid because the Minister of Finance is not known in this House as a radical and violent tariff reformer. Now, Mr. Speaker, it becomes my duty to give the hon. gentleman some introduction to the House in respect of tariff matters. For, though it was another vital principle of the Reform party that there should be no coalition of federal and provincial governments, the hon. gentleman was the head and centre of a federal Grit committee for the province of Nova Scotia while we were paying him as Prime Minister in local affairs. So the hon. gentleman is not unknown in his own province in connection with federal politics, and I ask you to say, in view of his utterances which I shall quote to you, whether we have not reason to fear that if the hon. member for South Oxford would have chastised us with whips, the present Minister of Finance will chastise us with scorpions.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Now let me give you a few ideas of his on this question of fiscal reform, and I do it for the purpose of pressing upon hon. gentlemen opposite the reasonableness of our inquiry for definite information at this stage. For instance, I find that hon. gentleman said, speaking in St. John, as reported in the St. John "Sun" of 25th August, 1893:

The tariff discriminated against the poor man. The Liberals had declared for free trade. The Government, on the other hand, said they would stick to protection. Surely we did not need an Act of Parliament to compel us to buy flour from Ontario. Let us have freedom of trade, and we would buy all we could from our own manufacturers and producers.

Then, further on, he said:

The National Policy was a mockery, a delusion and a snare. In closing, Mr. Fielding called upon all to help to bring about free trade.

It is of no use putting the question on the paper, these gentlemen meet us with gibes and jeers. I do not mind the jeer in the slightest, but as representative of a large body of people, I have attempted this session to see how much there was in all these pre-election statements. Let me go on and give you some of these statements, and hon. gentlemen opposite in whose presence I give them, may state, if they are so inclined, whether they are correctly given, and in what particular they do not agree with them. For instance, in the Halifax "Chronicle" of 4th October, 1893, speaking at Middleton, the present Minister of Finance is reported to have said:

Let us go to the root of the evil and condemn this system of so-called protection and the Government who are responsible for it. Let us have a Parliament and a Government who recognize the harm that is being done, and are prepared to apply the remedy of a sounder trade policy.

And again, I find that hon. gentleman threatening the manufacturing industries of this country, and therefore all the industries of this country, saying on the 5th October, 1893, as reported by the "Morning Chronicle," a paper friendly to him:

The Liberals protest against the doctrine of compulsion, they protest against the restriction of trade. Restriction may be necessary in dealing with poisons, but in dealing with bread the Liberals demand that the people shall have liberty to buy wherever they wish, and that no penalty shall be imposed upon them for so buying.

This is absolute free trade without doubt. On another occasion, and as reported in the same paper on the same day, he says :

True tariff reform, such as the people want, cannot be expected from the present Ottawa Government. Indeed, they admit as much, for in order to propitiate the manufacturers they have had to declare that they will stand by the principle of protection. Upon that principle the Liberals take issue with them. While the Conservative leaders cling to the principle of protection, the effects of which I have endeavoured to present to you to-day, the Liberals denounce that system as wrong. While the Conservatives declare that they will move forward on the lines of protection, even if they have to increase the average duty up to 50 per cent—such is the statement of the Minister of Finance—the Liberals declare that the true policy is to move in the very opposite direction. That is the issue between the two parties. We ask the people of this province, regardless of past political connections, to join us now in this war against the protectionist system, and to assist in placing in power at Ottawa a Government headed by Hon. Wilfred Laurier, charged with the duty of bringing the country back as rapidly as possible to the sound free trade principles which we learned in the long ago from the mother land, the operation of which gave to our people a measure of prosperity which experience has shown cannot be obtained from the policy now in force.

Nothing could be stronger than that. The hon. gentleman is an out-and-out free trader, and yet he dare not tell me now, after the answers I have received from his colleagues, that he would repeat those statements as being the present policy of the Government of which he has become a member. I challenge him to do so. I challenge him respectfully in this debate to be as definite to the people of Canada in 1896 when in office, as he dared to be when out of office in 1893, after the celebrated resolutions of the Reform convention held in this city in June of that year. Then we have had some references outside of Parliament since this Government was formed. The leader of the Government stated in this House the other day that he was unable to give me definite information upon a very important aspect of the tariff, that referring to coal and iron ; but what did the hon. gentleman say at the candidature of the Minister of Public Works, at St. John's, Que. ? He is reported to have said :

What we advocated in Opposition we shall put into practice when in power.

To meet that hon. gentleman fairly and above board, I put a question on the Notice paper I said : This is what you advocated in Opposition in regard to interests that I particularly represent, in regard to interests that vitally affect my province, in regard to interests that affect us both from a federal and a local standpoint, in regard to interests that have been discussed in the files of your organ, the Toronto "Globe"

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

for almost every day in the year, ever since you have been in Opposition. Here is a crisp cut sentence from your lips that the first thing you will do when you get into power and deal with the tariff, is to put coal and iron on the free list, and I ask you respectfully, were you reported with substantially accuracy on that occasion ? You, Mr. Speaker, know the very extraordinary answer, the evasive, the cowardly, the disrespectful answer—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What word is distasteful ?

An hon. MEMBER. "Cowardly."

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Well, then, if the hon. gentleman thinks that it is the act of a brave man to dodge a straight question, I withdraw the word "cowardly." But does any hon. gentleman tell me that the answer he gave was not evasive ? They have not been fighting, as I fought, in a coal district with a Laurierite candidate advocating not only a duty on bituminous coal but a duty on anthracite, and insisting that it was part and parcel of a revenue tariff, and denying that his leader had ever stated that he would take the duty off bituminous coal. Perhaps if hon. gentlemen had been in my position, they would have some sympathy with me in putting the question as to whether he was accurately reported when, in addressing the manufacturers of Montreal, and later on in the presence of western manufacturers, he held out the tempting bait that coal and iron would be put on the free list. The President of the Grand Trunk Railway is reported to have said the other day that he had a pledge of free coal. Hon. gentlemen opposite have voted for free coal on this side of the House time and again, whenever the question was submitted to them. Their leader goes to Montreal, the great commercial metropolis, and shows what a huge duty it is, amounting, he says, to 60 per cent, an outrageous duty. He tells them before the election, When we get into power you will have free coal and free iron. He gets into power, and I ask him, Did you say that you would have free coal and free iron ? "I cannot charge my memory." is the reply of one of the bright and shining lights of this agglomeration of statesmen. Will you tell me that that answer, not to me alone but to the people whom I represent, is either satisfactory or respectful ? Is it according to parliamentary usage ? He had not the courage, and he dared not deny that the statement, published throughout the country at the time, was absolutely correct. He knows the use that was made of it, he knows the canvas that was based upon it, and having got the advantage of that—I shall not describe his position, I shall not characterize it accurately lest I offend the sensitive ears of hon. gentlemen opposite, but who were not quite so sensitive when they sat on this side of the House. But the people who are concerned, Mr. Speaker, can deal with them and deal with them adequately. I wonder if hon. gentlemen think it would be parliamentary for me to say that the leader of the present Government has a certain ability in concealing his principles. My authority for that opinion is the hon. Minister of Public Works. He wrote statements in regard to his present leader that I would not dare to mention in the presence of these sensitive gentlemen. I would be at once called to order. The most insulting statements from his vitriolic pen that the mind of man can conceive were written by the hon. gentleman who now sits behind the First Minister. I recall one mild sentence: "He possesses a certain ability in concealing his principles." I am ready to take the responsibility, for once in my life, of agreeing with the Minister of Public Works. We have had a warning from the late Minister of Finance that I commend to the silent and dumb members who represent the great Reform party, and that is that if they are half-hearted in their policy, and I suppose that means in the advocacy of it, their ministerial life will be short and limited. We would, of course, all regret that. We would much prefer, of course, that they should be bold and commanding. One of their late leaders used language which I think I should repeat, that a man who taught one thing in Opposition and another in power was a demagogue in whom the people could have no confidence whatever. This opinion was expressed by Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, who was at one time considered an authority. I commend it to the consideration of hon. gentlemen opposite. The din of battle has hardly died away, the smoke has hardly cleared before our eyes, and so it is not necessary for me to argue long as to the necessity of having something definite. What have been the policies on the tariff we have had to meet? On our side there was a clearly-cut and honest position—protection to Canadian industries. We have had to meet all the tactics of the enemy, and attempts to set farmers against manufacturers, and so on. Let me run over some of the policies which have enabled hon. gentlemen opposite to live out the storm, and finally to occupy the Treasury benches, and recounting them, as I will briefly do, hon. gentlemen opposite will see that it is not for the purpose of satisfying our curiosity, but in the interest of Canada and in their own interest that they should quickly and now give Parliament something definite on these important questions. Hon. gentlemen opposite have advocated—and the advocates, I can name in this House—free trade straight, free trade as they have it in England, free trade to come in forty year's time, a gradual swoop, not a sudden swoop, as it was described in the graphic language of the First Minister. They have advocated a revenue tariff, a tariff for revenue only, and only a tariff for revenue. The differences are, perhaps, hard to follow, but these have been advocated by hon. members in this House. Then they have advocated incidental protection, protection itself, and the other night the First Minister, in our hearing, used a new phrase, that the issue was not free trade or any of the policies I have referred to, but it was National Policy intact as opposed to a revenue tariff. What is that policy? Ought we not to be allowed to look behind the veil; ought we not to be allowed to have a glimpse of this new policy, which is not free trade or revenue tariff, but National Policy intact as against revenue tariff. Such policy would enable hon. gentlemen opposite to leave the National Policy as a whole and to modify it only in certain particulars. Then we have had reciprocity and we have had it advocated by free traders. An English free trader would laugh to scorn any idea of reciprocity. Then they have advocated unrestricted reciprocity, commercial union, free trade, and protection as to coal. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan), who is, I believe, a loyal supporter of the First Minister, a man who triumphed over an hon. gentleman who was one of the ornaments of the last Parliament, was, during the campaign, if I do not misunderstand the reports, a free trader in general, a revenue tariff man, but a protectionist up to the handle on the item of coal, and there is a coal mine in his county. Then we have heard from the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister). He is a free trader and holds all the other variations of view under that head, but he has always been a consistent protectionist as regards the item of coal oil.

Mr. LISTER. I should like the hon. gentleman, who is very industrious in hunting up what hon. members have said, to hunt up my statement on that subject.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. As the hon. gentleman is not in office, and I am not in office, and we have, therefore, some spare time, we could go together to the library, and no doubt we would be able to collect some information on that point. I do not, of course, wish to misrepresent the hon. gentleman.

An hon. MEMBER. Take it back.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I will take it back if I misrepresent the hon. gentleman. In this House the hon. gentleman has advocated the interest of refiners. I ask whether I am wrong in understanding the hon. gentleman to be an advocate of the present duty on coal oil?

Mr. LISTER. When we go to the Library together we will talk that over.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman seems to be prepared to run to the Library or to go on the street, but this House is the place in which to settle this question. I have stated candidly his position, and he is too candid a man to controvert the record as it appears in "Hansard."

Mr. LISTER. You took the duty off coal oil, but you kept it on coal.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Certainly, and I hope the duty will never be taken off coal.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentlemen opposite reduced it on coal.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Then the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) is strongly in favour of protection for Canadian fruit.

Mr. GIBSON. You required Mr. Montague to tell you what my special line was.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. And also for Canadian wines. These facts indicate some difficulty on the Treasury benches in regard to duties which they intend to cut off? Then we have the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell), who is a free trader in everything but flour. I think he is right as to flour, but he should be consistent as I am and be willing to have protection all around. Then the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has a little weakness about canned goods.

Mr. CHARLTON. What did the hon. member for North Norfolk say about that subject? Please quote his words.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Hon. gentlemen found fault with my quotations a little while ago, and now an hon. member asks me to quote his language when I cannot do so. He has, however, a weakness in the direction I have indicated. Then there is the member for Queen's, who has a weakness for pork. He is a free trader out and out; he has used all the illustrations of the motherland, and has told this House of the duties imposed there, for there is an inland revenue tax on nearly everything; but the hon. gentleman while advocating free trade in coal and other products not produced on the island, is very sound on the subject of protection for pork. Then there is the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil), who is strong on free trade in general, but is a protectionist as regards beet-root sugar.

Mr. LISTER. The published cartoon will save a great deal of trouble.

Mr. GIBSON. They are all set out there

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not need the cartoon when all the hon. gentlemen are in front of me. This is I suppose a delicate subject, and while perhaps some amusement has been derived from it, after all that no doubt is the secret of the sphinx-like attitude on the part of the Treasury benches. I appreciate their difficulties, but I think the country would be more lenient with them if they face these difficulties like men and to some extent run amuck of these differing and discordant views of the hon. gentlemen of their party, and give us clearly and distinctly the policy upon which they ask to be allowed to govern this country for some time yet to come.

Before I sit down, Mr. Speaker, as a comparatively old member of the House and yet a young Canadian, I want to join in the protest that has gone up in this Parliament against that Chicago platform of the leader of the Canadian Government. I may be supersensitive, but to my mind, Mr. Speaker, there is something entirely revolting in the idea that the First Minister of a proud land like ours, and of a land that has already assumed such importance as Canada, should hasten with such indiscretion to Chicago, and supplement the policies and platform of the Republicans, and the Democrats, and the Populists, and the Silverites, and all that, with the policy of the Canadian Government; and that mark you, in advance of any utterance in this country or in this Parliament. If he spoke by the book, if he was authorized by his colleagues to tell the people of the United States of these extraordinary reforms and changes in the tariff that he was prepared to make for a certain bargain to which I shall refer, why is it that these hon. gentlemen opposite cannot discuss with us a great deal more of their fiscal policy than they have deigned yet to do, or than we have even asked them to do. If the Prime Minister of this country was speaking as a business man or a man of affairs, to the people of the United States, telling them that he was able to make these huge and radical changes in the tariff of this country for a consideration, surely before he did that he had estimated all the money he required, he had considered exactly what reductions we could stand, and was consequently in a very different position from that which he and his colleagues pretend to be in during this session of the House. I say that that line of action on the part of the Prime Minister is regrettable. I do not regard it merely as a party man, or as an opponent of his. While he is Prime Minister I wish to see him respected abroad and respected at home as well. I want to see him the representative of Canadian nationality and Canadian commercial independence. I want him to hold the honour of our country high. I say, Sir, that it is humiliating to a spirited people to hear that halting, and that lame, and that weak appeal to the people of the United States, not only for favours, but for money and for pecuniary aid in solving these national problems, which we can satisfactorily grapple in good time out of our own resources. Such an appeal offends the patriotism of the people of Canada, young or old. I say that earnestly and seriously. I think our people have good reason to feel offended when the hon. gentleman endeavours to charge us and to tell the American people that there has been hostility on the part of the people of Canada to them. What mischievous purpose has he in view; what fell designs lurk there. Mr. Speaker, I can tell you who has done us harm. That speech is not the first utterance that has done harm to Canada in the eyes of the people of the United States. That speech is not the first utterance that has put further away from us, even a valuable bargain with the people of that country. In another speech gross wrong was done the people of this country. This is not the first utterance in the United States on the part of the Prime Minister. When he was leader of a great Canadian party in opposition, when he represented thousands and thousands of his countrymen, he dared to say in the city of Boston what he has never dared to say in Canada, namely: that the conduct of both England and Canada during the American civil war was a disgrace to both of those countries. That was a statement contrary to historical facts. Surely, Sir, the effect of such statements is not to encourage very friendly feelings towards us on the part of the people of the United States. Then, when the Prime Minister hastens to go upon his knees before the people of the United States, and to say that if they will get us some money, if they will give us some cold cash, if they will put their money into the development of our canal system, we will throw away our commercial independence, we will throw up the proud position of the races in this country, and we will part with our sovereignty over all that belongs to Great Britain on the American continent. When he tells them that we will allow them to have joint control over Canadian public works, how humiliating it is. If you give a foreign nation joint control over the canals or public works of Canada where can you stop? They could help us to work out our post office system. We have a deficit in connection with that, and the people are asking for greater postal facilities, and if all our national pride is to be sunk we might make such a bargain that the United States mails would be known all over the land instead of Her Majesty's mails. They might do it on the cheap for us. We might also save a lot of money on our militia, if we should put ourselves straight into their hands. I say, Sir, that such language gains nothing for us. I say that our neighbours like ourselves respect men who value their independence, and if any people ought to have an independent spirit surely it is the people of Canada under the ægis of the British Crown. I believe too, Sir, that there are no money terms upon which to-day we would as heretofore even share the user of our fisheries. The fishermen of the coasts of Canada will resent that suggestion. I throw out as strongly as I can, my warning to the First Minister to retrace his steps, and to abandon as quickly as possible the Chicago platform as pronounced by him in this Presidential campaign. I ask him to look to the Canadian Parliament only, to consult that Parliament alone; and he may rely upon it, that no matter how much we may feel annoyed—as we have reason to be annoyed for hon. gentlemen opposite not taking us already into their confidence—I can assure him speaking for myself, and speaking without the slightest hesitation, that whenever the Prime Minister and his Government submit any proposition to this Parliament in the interests of Canada, or any part of Canada, I will give them my loyal and hearty support. And as they fight for Canada and Canadian commercial independence, they can rely just as much on the support of this side of the House as they can upon the gentlemen who sit beside them. I, for my part, do not wish to press the Government unduly, but I press them earnestly to be definite and to be candid. Surely, Mr. Speaker, that is not an unreasonable request.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to participate at any length in a debate which has been going on these four days past, but I think it proper to set the hon. gentlemen opposite right concerning certain facts which they have apparently forgotten, or which they would throw into the back ground.

Now, Sir, judging from the remarks fallen from the hon. gentlemen opposite, it strikes me that they have not yet recovered from the stupefaction they have felt at the result of the popular verdict of the 23rd June. They are apparently unable to realize the suddenness of their change of fortune, and how they happen to find themselves in the cold shades of the Opposition. As they still have five long years left to ponder over their defeat, we are quite willing to let them busy themselves with that unprofitable and unsavoury task.

There is still another matter about which the hon. gentlemen concern themselves a great deal: they want to find out what is the fiscal policy of the Liberal party. They pretend to have forgotten the emphatical statements made upon so many occasions, either on the floor of the House or outside of it. That policy has been solemnly enunciated and placed before the country by a convention composed of thousands of delegates of the Liberal party from all the provinces of Canada, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, published in all the newspapers, and discussed upon all the hustings. It was on the lines of that programme that was based the appeal made to the country. And it was endorsed by an immense majority of the electorate throughout the breadth and length of the land. Now, in what does that policy consist? It consists in a gradual and prudent tariff reform, in the interests of the masses, without doing any injustice to any class of the population.

Now, allow me, Sir, to quote, in its very terms, that solemn declaration, accompanied by some of the explanations given of its articles by the hon. leader of the Government of the day (Mr. Laurier). The resolution carried at the Liberal convention held at Ottawa, reads as follows :—

That the highest interests of Canada demand a removal of this obstacle to our country's progress, by the adoption of a tariff, which, while not doing injustice to any class, will promote domestic and foreign trade, and hasten the return of prosperity to our people.

That to that end, the tariff should be reduced to the needs of honest, economical and efficient government.

That it should be so adjusted as to make free, or to bear as lightly as possible upon the necessaries of life, and should be so arranged as to promote freer trade with the whole world, more particularly with Great Britain and the United States.

No more explicit language, it seems to me, could be used. We are in favour of a reduction of protective taxation, so as not only to materially lighten the burden which presses upon the shoulders of the people, but also to encourage our home and foreign trade, chiefly our trade between Canada and Great Britain. In the speech delivered at the opening of the convention by the hon. leader of the Government, who was then leader of the Opposition, the hon. gentleman gave utterance to the following words, which preface, so to say, the resolution :—

Nothing is more difficult—that is one of the evils of protection—than to wipe away protection, because under it interests have been established which every man who has at heart the interest of all classes must take into consideration. It is always easy to increase the tariff, because by so doing you increase the private fortunes of certain individuals, but whenever you decrease the tariff it has always to be done with careful consideration, and I am sure that when the Liberals are in power, they will not be indifferent to this primary truth.

That speech was the prelude to the resolution which I have just read to the House. The policy then endorsed by the Liberal party, they still want to carry out. We want a reform of the tariff, but such a reform as will be effective and operative, without injuring the existing interests. It is urged that the Liberal party has varied on that point. I am ready to show that ever since that resolution was endorsed by the Liberal convention held at Ottawa, in 1893, the language of the Liberal party and of its leader has always been the same. Let me quote an extract from a speech delivered by the hon. leader of the Government in 1894 at the session which immediately followed the Ottawa convention. The hon. First Minister (Mr. Laurier), at the sitting of the 12th April, spoke as follows :—

What is the lesson to be deduced from this state of things? It is this—and this is the proposition we rely upon on this side of the House): As the price of agricultural products has been reduced to the lowest point, it should be the aim of the tariff to reduce the prices of manufactured goods also to the lowest point. The farmer is bound by his circumstances to sell in the freest and cheapest market, so also ought he to be privileged to buy in the cheapest market, consistent only with the imposition of such duties as are necessary for raising the revenue of the country. That is the proposition on which we stand.

Mr. BERGERON. (Translation.) Who said that?

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL. (Translation.) The hon. Prime Minister, on the 12th April, 1894.

During the electoral campaign which ended on the 23rd June, the hon. leader of the Opposition, who is now leader of the Government, had the opportunity again to deal with the question. He dealt with it at Elmira, county of Waterloo, where he anew laid down the fiscal policy of the Liberal party. After stating that free trade, as they have it in England, is not applicable to Canada, and that revenue, under a Liberal Administration, would be levied by means of customs duties, the hon. Premier further said :

The Liberal party on several occasions declared it, and I also over and over again stated so, but the Conservative press tries to stir up the fears of the manufacturers and to lead them to believe that should we come into power, we would ruin all the industries, whether they have been benefited by the National Policy or not. Gentlemen, we have no such thing in view. We are not revolutionists. We shall continue to raise a revenue by custom duties on imports, but we would raise it so as to cause the masses to benefit by it, and not some classes.

Such has been the invariable policy of the Liberal party, from the time of the great Ottawa convention in 1893. We want an efficient tariff reform, one that will protect the masses and not certain classes; in short, a gradual and moderate reform, so as to injure no interest. A tariff revision is not a matter to be done inconsiderately; it should be carried out so as not to decrease the revenue, and in such a way as to cause the least injury to vested interests, while, at the same time, benefiting the masses and encouraging the farmers who, for over eighteen years, have been weighed down by burdens, without deriving any benefit. It is necessary that the Government should make a careful survey of the position and master all the details, they have to take information about the economic position of the country and get an insight into the requirements of the public service. They cannot reduce the taxes without taking into account the exigencies of public administration, for the taxes should not be immoderately reduced, as it is necessary to provide for the services of the country. Such an inquiry cannot be brought to a conclusion in a day or in a month; and if, in February or March next, the Government are through with their work, they will have done more than their duty. It is a serious task they have undertaken to bring to bear, and they should have all the necessary time to carry out their reform. It will be necessary for the Government, first, to inquire into the means of reducing the expenditure, in order to operate a corresponding decrease in the taxation. Those two things should go together. Therefore, it is necessary for the Government to go cautiously about their work. If they proceeded otherwise, they would prove to be lacking of foresight. We are in favour of tariff reform, but we are not in favour of radical changes. On the contrary, those changes should be made gradually, and should be very moderate. The revenue, as stated by the hon. Prime Minister, having to be raised by means of duties on imports, the home industries shall benefit by it. That reform, therefore, will be made in the interest of the masses, and not with a view to protecting certain classes to the prejudice of the public. On the other hand, the services of the country shall not suffer from the contemplated changes.

It is urged by some that the delay asked for would be prejudicial to the manufacturing interests. I maintain, on the contrary, that such a delay is necessary in order to allow the manufacturers to dispose of the surplus of their output and get ready for the change resulting from the new order of things.

It is customary for France, the United States and other countries always to fix a date for the coming into force of tariffs and commercial treaties affecting commercial and manufacturing interests. It so happens that the interested parties, have all the necessary delay for providing against the change brought about in the economic position of the country. And in that way commercial crises and disturbances are warded off. Now, Sir, I wish to say a word or two about a much debated issue in the course of this discussion, the Manitoba school question. I have taken a well defined stand on that question, and it remains unchanged to this day. Last session, I voted against my leader because I was of opinion that a remedial legislation was necessary in order to reach an immediate settlement of that vexed question, and also because I looked askance at the results of a general election carried on amidst appeals to racial and creed prejudices, as those which were actually made to the people. I was under the impression that an immediate settlement of the question was desirable and necessary. I have nothing either to take back, to alter in my position, or to excuse, but I say it is a matter of regret that, from the very moment it was known that negotiations had been entered upon between the Dominion Government and the provincial authorities to bring about an understanding and set the question at rest through conciliatory means, it is to be regretted. I say, that French Canadian and Catholic members of this House should have withheld their sympathies from the Prime Minister in the difficult task he has entered upon. It behoves us to help him in bringing about a satisfactory and peaceable settlement of this vexed question. I am ready to allow the Government all the necessary delay to carry on negotiations, earnestly hoping that they will result in giving full satisfaction to the interested parties and meting out justice to them, as they are entitled to under the constitution. I shall wait until the result of those negotiations is known, to appreciate them, as they merit. My hon. friend the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) laughs. My remarks, I presume, are not to his taste. I regret that the hon. member is unable for once to rise above the spirit of partisanship and judge of the question upon its merit. The hon. gentleman, should brush aside all party considerations, and mind only the interests at stake.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) The hon. gentleman is in favour of strokes of policy (coups d'éclat).

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL. (Translation.) I maintain that the Manitoba school question should be considered from a higher standpoint. As I said, at the outset, in 1893, when the question came up for the first time before this House, I attach a very high importance to it. I believe that it is a duty for all French Catholic members to give all the assistance they can to the hon. Prime Minister and not to aggravate the difficulties of his task. The troubles which might be raised here to-day would prove prejudicial to the cause of our co-religionists out west, and would entail for us a very great responsibility, in case the Premier failed, through that opposition, to carry those negotiations to a successful issue. Those are the few remarks I wished to offer, and I thank the House for its kind attention.

Paragraphs 1 to 7 agreed to.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved :

That the said Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General by such members of this House as are of the hon. the Privy Council.

Motion agreed to.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved :

That the said Address be engrossed.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved :

That this House will, on Friday next, resolve itself into a committee to consider of a Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved :

That this House will, on Friday next, resolve itself into a committee to consider of the ways and means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY— ESTIMATES FOR 1896-97.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows :—

ABERDEEN.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, Estimates of sums required for the service of the Dominion for the year ending 30th June, 1897, and in accordance with the provisions of "The British North America Act, 1867," the Governor General recommends these Estimates to the House of Commons.

Government House,

Ottawa, August, 1896.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE moved:

That the said Message, together with the Estimates accompanying the same, be referred to the Committee of Supply.

Motion agreed to.

CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES OF THE WHOLE.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved :

That Louis Phillippe Brodeur, Esquire, member representing the Electoral District of Rouville, be appointed Chairman of Committees of the Whole House.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the House adjourns may I ask the Minister of Finance whether the Estimates which have been laid on the Table to-night are all the Estimates that will be submitted for the current year, or whether there is a Supplementary Estimate to be expected hereafter?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). There may be a Supplementary Estimate to be submitted later.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. DOBELL. Before the adjournment I would like to say a few words on a personal matter. I happen to have been the object, to some extent, of attacks made last night and to-night, and I should like to give a few words of explanation with reference to these attacks. One hon. gentleman last night accused me of going over to this side of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not like to interrupt my hon. friend, but I may say that this will lead to a prolongation of the night's proceedings.

Mr. DOBELL. That will do no harm.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not sure it is in order unless the hon. gentleman wishes to make a motion.

Mr. SPEAKER. There is a substantive motion to adjourn the House, and considerable latitude is generally allowed on a motion of that kind. The hon. gentleman will remember that he must not transgress another rule by referring to a past debate, except for a personal explanation.

Mr. DOBELL. I hope that I may claim the indulgence of the House, and if I should transgress any of the rules I shall be happy to be called to order and conform to the rules. I merely wish to trespass on the time of the House sufficiently to reply to some personal charges made against me by hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) charged me with having come to this House with the object of gaining some distinction. Such a thought never entered my mind. To-night the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) made the charge that I could be bought for $5.

Mr. FOSTER. I again call the attention of the House to this irregular proceeding. The hon. gentleman is taking advantage of this motion to adjourn to reply to charges which were made against him in the course of the debate which has just closed. Surely he cannot be allowed to do that? He had a perfect right to make his reply before the debate closed.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member has undoubtedly only the right to give a personal explanation on this occasion. If he wished to enter into debate, it would have been proper for him to do so before the Address was passed.

Mr. DOBELL. I have no intention of doing anything beyond giving the reasons why I joined gentlemen on this side.

Mr. FOSTER. I submit again that is not a personal explanation.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). Before you rule, Sir, I desire to submit that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) is attempting to put a limitation on the freedom of debate which I never heard in this House before. This is a motion to adjourn the House. I have seen some of the most important debates that ever took place in Parliament arise on such a motion.

Mr. FOSTER. So have I.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It may, as the hon. gentleman says, give rise to a prolonged debate, but I think the hon. gentleman who has been unduly attacked has a right to be vindicated even if it does take an hour or two of the time of the House. The night is young, it is only twenty minutes past ten, and I think even if the hon. gentleman was verging towards a breach of the rules of the House, the courtesy which is always extended towards new members of the House, and more particularly to one occupying a high position in the Government of this country, should be extended to the hon. gentleman, and he should be permitted to make his explanation.

Mr. FOSTER. I have moved my point of order, and I leave it, Sir, entirely in your hands. All that I ask for is that the rules of the House shall be properly enforced, and it does not make a whit of difference to me whether it is a gentleman high in position, as my hon. friend might say in comparison, or a gentleman not so high. We all have equal rights on the floor of the House. The hon. gentleman has entered into a defence of an attack made on him in a debate which is closed. He was sitting in the House before the debate was closed, and he was aware that those charges were being made, and had every opportunity then to reply. He should then have made his defence, and should not be permitted in this way, even through courtesy—and I will go as far in courtesy as is fair and right—to defend himself in this way against the rules of the House.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I submit that it will be in order for any hon. gentleman on the occasion of a motion to adjourn to state the reasons which have induced him to enter the Government, even if he had to strain his feelings by withdrawing from the charming society opposite. I think that that is perfectly in order and very edifying.

Mr. SPEAKER. My ruling is that, as I suggested to the hon. gentleman, that it would be out of order for him to refer to a debate which is closed on this occasion, but I think the hon. gentleman may make a statement to the House with reference to his own position, so long as he avoids referring specifically to a past debate.

Mr. DOBELL. I must thank you. Mr. Speaker, and the House for giving me this privilege of making a very brief statement of the reasons which induced me to join the Government, and I hope I shall make my statement a clear one. The only reason I had for joining this side of the House was that I lost all confidence in hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. CASGRAIN. At what date?

Mr. DOBELL. I do not intend replying to interruptions of that kind, but intend only giving my reasons for joining this party and Government. When I became aware of the reckless pledges that were made by hon. gentlemen opposite and of the treachery that existed amongst themselves, I thought it was time to change sides, and I have felt myself fully justified in that course by the attempts which I have heard have been made by gentlemen on that side to disturb the harmony that exists here. Hon. gentlemen opposite laugh, and I am glad to be able to put my opponents in good humor. I would much rather put them in good humor than excite their angry passions. I can only say that the conduct and the tactics of hon. gentlemen opposite are a graphic reminder of the misery and despair which Dante describes as existing among those unfortunate souls who contemplate the happiness of the blessed ones on the other side. I must say that to-night I feel more than happy at being here where I have found harmony and peace and good-fellowship and loyalty to our leader. I believe that our loyalty to our leader will carry us over a long series of prosperous years for Canada.

Mr. BRITTON. Might I ask the leader of the House when the Committee appointed to arrange for the Select Standing Committees of the House will make its report. I have special reason for asking.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I may say to my hon. friend that the committee has not yet met. It is not usual for these committees to be struck until after the debate on the Address has terminated. We are happily surprised to find so peaceful a termination to-night. I have no doubt that within two days at the outside the standing committees will be struck.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 28th August, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

WRIT FOR SASKATCHEWAN.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that in obedience to the Order of the House, of yesterday, I have issued my warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery for the issue of a new writ of election for the electoral district of Saskatchewan to fill the vacancy caused by the acceptance of an office of emolument under the Crown by the Honourable Wilfred Laurier.

CORRESPONDENCE IN RE CHANGE OF GOVERNMENT.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I beg to move :

That an Address do issue to His Excellency praying His Excellency to lay upon the Table of the House certain correspondence between His Excellency and Sir Charles Tupper.

Motion agreed to, and the Prime Minister laid the correspondence upon the Table of the House.

The PRIME MINISTER. Mr. Speaker, I beg to move :

That the papers just presented to the House be printed immediately, and that Rule 94 be suspended in relation thereto.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to say a word before that motion is carried. I think there is a notice of motion on a cognate subject, and it is important that the two should be printed together and come down to the House. I imagine my hon. friend has no objection at all to the passing of the motion, which is for the appointments made by Mr. Mackenzie in the period intervening between the general election of 1878 and his resignation, and the appointments made by the late Government between the period of the election and their resignation. As the discussion would range over both of these, probably it would be well to have them printed together if my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) would agree to the subject-matter of the motion.

The PRIME MINISTER. No, Mr. Speaker, I have to inform my hon. friend that when that motion of Sir Charles Tupper comes up for discussion I intend to move some amendments to it.

Motion (Mr. Laurier) agreed to.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 6) to further amend the Dominion Elections Act. He said: This Bill was introduced last session by me, but for obvious reasons it was not dealt with or considered. It is an adaptation of the English Act on the same subject, and for the convenience of the House, as the English Act is short, I propose to read the clause which has been adapted as far as possible for our purpose. Chapter 40 of the Imperial Statutes, 1895, is as follows :—

Mr. SPEAKER.

1. Any person who, or the directors of any body or association corporate which, before or during any parliamentary election, shall, for the purpose of affecting the return of any candidate at such election, make or publish any false statement of fact in relation to the personal character or conduct of such candidate, shall be guilty of an illegal practice within the meaning of the provisions of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, and shall be subject to all the penalties for and consequences of committing an illegal practice in the said Act mentioned, and the said Act shall be taken to be amended as if the illegal practice defined by this Act had been contained therein.

2. No person shall be deemed to be guilty of such illegal practice if he can show that he had reasonable grounds for believing, and did believe, the statement made by him to be true.

Any person charged with an offence under this Act, and the husband or wife of such person, as the case may be, shall be competent to give evidence in answer to such charge.

3. Any person who shall make or publish any false statement of fact as aforesaid may be restrained by interim or perpetual injunction by the High Court of Justice from any repetition of such false statement or any false statement of a similar character in relation to such candidate, and for the purpose of granting an interim injunction prima facie proof of the falsity of the statement shall be sufficient.

4. A candidate shall not be liable, nor shall be subject to any incapacity, nor shall his election be avoided, for any illegal practice under this Act committed by his agent other than his election agent, unless it can be shown that the candidate or his election agent has authorized or consented to the committing of such illegal practice by such other agent, or has paid for the circulation of the false statement constituting the illegal practice, or unless upon the hearing of an election petition the election court shall find and report that the election of such candidate was procured or materially assisted in consequence of the making or publishing of such false statements.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES ACT.

Mr. DAVIN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 7) to amend the North-west Territories Act. He said: Mr. Speaker, this Bill is entirely on all fours with the Bill that I introduced last session, and covers precisely the same ground as the Bill that Mr. Martin, the late member for Winnipeg, introduced and which passed a second reading. Unfortunately that Bill did not pass into law. The object is to restore the franchise in the North-west Territories to the same position it was in before the legislation complained of so strongly by my hon. friend (Mr. Martin), and which did not allow the elector on going forward to the returning officer's desk to make an oath that he was a qualified voter, but which required that the name should be on the list two days before the election. The legislation which my hon. friend (Mr. Martin) and I myself sought to undo, never had my approval, and now, after a trial of the franchise as it exists under the obnoxious legislation, it is, I am persuaded, still more desirable that we should pass this Bill. The Bill, as I say, will be found to be precisely the same Bill as my hon. friend (Mr. Martin) introduced last session and which passed a second reading. How it came that we had no legislation in the matter, it would be hard to say.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). The Government opposed it.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, I do not know that they did oppose it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The Minister of the Interior did oppose it distinctly and emphatically.

Mr. DAVIN. It passed a second reading, anyway. I think it highly desirable that this Bill should pass into law.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE RAILWAY ACT.

Mr. GIBSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 8) in further amendment of the Railway Act. He said: Mr. Speaker, the intention of this amendment to the Railway Act is to cover the case of what has been known as a "buffer contractor" coming into Canada from a foreign country and taking a contract, and afterwards sub-letting it to sub-contractors, thus standing between the railway corporation and the sub-contractors who supplied the material and did the work upon the railway. It often occurs that such contractors at a convenient season either fail or run away, and the sub-contractors consequently have no redress against the railway company, in consequence of which large sums of money are to-day due to Canadians who have been engaged in the construction of railways under this system. The object of the Bill is to provide that all materials supplied and wages due in connection with the construction of a new railway, shall become a first lien upon the said railway company.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved:

That for the remainder of the session, Government Orders have precedence on Wednesdays after six o'clock p.m., after Private Bills, and on Thursdays.

He said: I make this motion, Mr. Speaker, because, as has been intimated already, the Government have no intention of bringing in any legislation during the present session. By the rules of the House, as they exist at present, Mondays are devoted first to Private Bills, and then to Notices of Motion, Wednesdays are devoted to Notices of Motion until six o'clock, and after six o'clock to Private Bills and Public Bills and Orders, and on Thursdays, Public Bills and Orders have precedence over all others. Therefore, I suggest that we might perhaps take for Government business, Thursdays and that portion of Wednesdays consecrated to the consideration of Public Bills and Orders. As I say, the Government have no legislation to bring in, and, looking over the Public Bills which have been introduced up to the present time, though they are all of some importance, and some of them of more than ordinary importance, yet none are of such a pressing character that they cannot be well deferred until next session. Under the circumstances, I think that it will meet the wishes of the House that the session should be as far as possible a short one, and if the proposition I make is accepted, I think the business of the session will be accelerated.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, there is no disposition on this side of the House, I am sure, unduly to prolong the session, nor to interfere with the purpose of the Government, which, I understand, is to get the supplies as expeditiously as possible, in order that the House may adjourn. But while that is true, I still think the private members of the House have certain rights outside of what may be the Government's intention with reference to the conduct of their business. The session has hardly commenced; the Address has just been passed; private members have had no opportunity at all for what constitutes a large part of the business of private members in a session of Parliament; and if the Government, at this early date take from them practically two days of the week, there is very little time left to them for Notices of Motion and for Public Bills in which they may have a great deal of interest. When the Government moves for Supply, of course grievances can be ventilated; but it is impossible to get information on various points except by motions regularly carried in the House. I submit to the House that my hon. friend is taking away from us that open door too early in the session. If he would take a suggestion, and allow matters to remain as they are for the next week, bringing his motion up at the end of that time, I think it would meet all the requirements of the case on both sides; and I think my hon. friend would find that the business of the House would go on just as well.

The PRIME MINISTER. I have every desire to meet the wishes of my hon. friend, and I think there is some misapprehension between us. I see the force of what he said a moment ago, that members of the House should have every opportunity to bring up Notices of Motion so as to get what materials and information they desired to have for the discharge of the public business. If my hon. friend will look at the motion, he will find that I do not propose to interfere in any way with that part of the time of private members. By the rules of the House at present, as he knows, Mondays are devoted first to Private Bills and then to Notices of Motion. We do not interfere with Mondays. Wednesday afternoons are devoted to Notices of Motion up to six o'clock. We do not interfere with that. After six o'clock on Wednesdays, Public Bills and Orders are taken up. This is the time we wish to have, with Thursday, which is also devoted to Public Bills. So that the only two portions of the time of private members which we ask for are those portions devoted to Public Bills. The time devoted to Notices of Motion is left entire. If the hon. gentleman will look at the Public Bills on the paper, he will see that there are none so urgent in their character that they cannot be deferred until next session.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think there are one or two Bills on the paper entitled to consideration, and there seems to be no reason why they should be postponed. The Bill which I have had the honour to introduce this afternoon is one which it will be well to adopt, and the sooner the better. There is also an important Bill with regard to the immigration of foreigners and aliens, known as the Alien Labour Law. It is a measure which has provoked discussion outside of the House, and which large numbers of people are inclined to support, and I think it is a Bill which it would be well to consider, and to consider at an early day. I think the hon. gentleman might perhaps let his motion stand owing to the exceptionally early time at which it appears, until he sees what progress is made with the business which the Government desire to press, and bring it up again in a few days. As this is Friday, there may be some hon. gentlemen who do not happen to be in their places to-day, who may be very anxious to have the opportunity of mentioning some subject which they desire to discuss at an early day.

Mr. CHARLTON. As a private member, perhaps I may be allowed to say a word or two on this subject. I came here this session thinking that only such Government legislation as was absolutely necessary was to be brought before the House; and as a private member having in my charge one or two important measures which I desire to advance, I have refrained from introducing them for that reason. If the purpose of the Government is to be carried out, the present motion of the hon. First Minister is a perfectly proper one. If the legislation of an ordinary session is to be proceeded with, then the objections raised by the Opposition are proper. In view of the fact that this is an emergency session, called for the sole purpose of passing the supplies, and in view of the fact that the Government has announced its intention to abstain from introducing any legislation, and that it is asking private members of the House to forego no more than it foregoes itself, I hold that the motion of the Government is a perfectly proper one.

Mr. FOSTER. The purpose I have in view would be very well met if the hon. gentleman left out Wednesday for the present, which would leave Wednesdays after six o'clock for Public Bills, and let the motion be simply for Thursday.

The PRIME MINISTER. Very well. I will make the motion in that way.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, if he proposes, when going into Supply, to make any explanatory or somewhat extended remarks with reference to supply. Of course I do not expect my hon. friend to make a Budget speech, because that has been made; but considerable time has elapsed since then, and I notice, in looking over the Estimates, that considerable changes have been made and that pretty large sums are asked for. I should like to know whether the hon. gentleman proposes to make any extended remarks upon the motion to go into Supply, and I should like to know also if he can tell us when the Supplementary Estimates will be brought down or what their probable amount will be. The hon. gentleman will see that while we have been asked for about $38,000,000 or $40,000,000 and are told that there will also be Supplementary Estimates, the House is in no condition to judge how it shall treat Supply in relation to the total amount that is asked.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). It may have been the practice of my hon. friend to make that candid announcement at the beginning, but certainly I am unable at present to fix the precise date at which the Supplementary Estimates will be brought down or to give the probable amount. It is not my intention to make any extended remarks on the motion to go into Supply. The Estimates now submitted are, to a very large extent, those prepared by the hon. gentleman himself. Where they differ in the aggregate amount of any department, they differ, as a rule, on the side of economy. The general result of the changes to be made in the Estimates makes the amount of appropriation somewhat less than hon. gentlemen opposite proposed to make it. I will frankly say for myself, and I am sure my colleagues will take the same view, that we have not been long enough in office to have become as familiar with the details of the Estimates as it is desirable we should, but the circumstances under which we are assembled, I think, warrant us in believing that the House does not expect from us that familiarity with the Estimates which my hon. friend had when he prepared his statement. Speaking generally, subject to what change may be made in a few instances, we propose to ask the House to vote the Estimates very largely as they were prepared by my hon. friend. But on this understanding, however, that we will have during recess the opportunity of continuing our investigation into the various departments of public business, and will have the right to withhold these moneys in any case in which, in our judgment, such expenditures may be found necessary. In the preparation of the present Estimates, there is a joint responsibility, if I may so express myself, between the hon. gentleman and myself. When it comes to next session, we will be prepared to accept full responsibility for the Estimates which we will submit then. As we proceed in committee, the various Ministers will explain any changes or where changes have been made in the various departments.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S WARRANTS.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) laid on the Table the Orders in Council and the opinion of the hon. Minister of Justice in relation to Governor General's warrants.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Is it the intention to have these papers relating to Governor General's warrants printed?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). If my hon. friend will make a motion, I will agree to it.

Mr. SPEAKER. That would not be in order except with the unanimous consent of the House, as the Orders of the Day have not been called.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER moved that the papers which have been laid on the Table be printed forthwith, and that the rule of the House to the contrary be suspended.

Motion agreed to.

RESIGNATION OF MAJOR GENERAL CAMERON.

Mr. TISDALE. Might I be permitted to ask, without giving notice, whether the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence will bring down the resignation of the Major General and the letter explanatory of its having been written which have not been brought down? Will he be kind enough to ascertain whether he can find them and lay them on the Table.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden, King's). I shall do so.

SUPPLY—THE DISMISSAL OF PUBLIC OFFICERS.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I desire to call the attention of the House, in a general way, to the subject of the dismissals of public officers. I put a question to the hon. Minister of Marine a day or two ago as follows:—

(a.) When were the sub-agents of the Marine and Fisheries Department at Pictou, Nova Scotia, appointed?

(b.) In what manner were they appointed?

(c.) Have their services been dispensed with?

(d.) If so, upon what grounds, and what notice, if any, was given them that their services would no longer be required?

(e.) If a notice was given, what is the date of it, and at what time? How much, if anything, was owing to the sub-agents by the department?

(f.) Has the amount been paid?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). (a.) Noonan and Davies were employed in connection with repairs to the "Northern Light" in 1878-79, and were advised 14th April, 1879, that they would be allowed 2½ per cent commission on their accounts; and on 11th July, 1879, advised that Minister had fixed allowance at 2½ per cent. (b.) Later the appointment was confirmed by Order in Council, 5th July, 1890, fixing salary at $400, and further increase of $50 by Order in Council, 20th January, 1894. (c.) Yes. (d.) The agent being a political partisan who actively interfered at the general election, the department, in the public interest, deemed that a new agent in whom it could have full confidence, should be appointed. (e.) Notified on 28th July, 1896. July salary still due, namely, $37.50. (f.) No funds out of which this can be paid.

It seems to me that this brings up more distinctly than any other similar instance in days gone by the questions as to how the public officials should be dealt with in this connection. I wish to compare this with the answer given in a case of the kind put by the hon. gentleman from North Huron (Mr. Cameron):

Is the Government aware that Capt. A. M. McGregor, of the survey boat "Bayfield" has been an active political canvasser and partisan on behalf of Conservative candidates in the west riding of the county of Huron for the last fifteen years.

And then follow some questions with reference to that. To these the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries replied:

The Department of Marine and Fisheries has no official knowledge that Captain McGregor has been an active political canvasser.

The hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries does not pretend that in this case Mr. Noonan and the others received anything in the way of a trial.

He does not and cannot pretend that there was the slightest investigation or official inquiry made as to whether Messrs. Noonan and Davies, public servants against whom no complaint had been made, had forfeited their right to the confidence of the Government. The office is comparatively a small one, and that has an important bearing on this question; and it seems to me, too, that as the Government were not in a position to pay these men the amount admittedly due them, they certainly had at least a further title to consideration which has not been given. From the answer given by the hon. Minister of Marine,—and he can correct me if I am wrong—there appears to have been no Order in Council rescinding the Order in Council under which these gentlemen were appointed, and if that be so, there has been a very grave irregularity in connection with the treatment of these men. The hon. gentleman does not pretend that in this case he has been so careful as he evidently proposes to be in the case of Captain McGregor. I think the answer in the case of Captain McGregor in reference to the charges against him was very proper and in accordance with the practice that obtained touching rumours; and I know that the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) himself if he has any charges of that kind, will demand and will see to it that in the investigation of them, Captain McGregor shall have what every public servant is entitled to before dismissal, a fair trial. Now, in this case, these men have been, so to speak, flung out of the department, evidently, from the hon. gentleman's answer, on a charge made behind their backs. And what does that charge amount to? That they were political partisans—that is, that they voted for the Government or candidate of the Government of which they were officers. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) will correct me if my memory is astray, but some sessions ago I recollect that hon. gentleman expressing the opinion in this House that civil servants should be disfranchised, giving as reasons the position in which they found themselves to-day according to the practice that obtained under different Governments, and that was that while it would be offensive and improper on the part of a public servant to actively oppose the Government, active support would not be and had not been considered an offence, and therefore the voter, if a public servant, was not in as free and independent position as other electors were, as a matter of course. And the view that obtained on all previous occasions, I think, was that, certainly in regard to these quasi civil servants or petty officers, whose remuneration as in these cases, is nominal, it was idle to expect that subserviency or decorum in regard to political matters that the Government could exact in the case of highly paid officials or civil servants proper. I have here a reference that was made in debate some years ago where this idea, which I am now putting forward, received some support at the hands of the Toronto "Globe." The "Globe," of 26th February, 1879, laid down the doctrine as follows:—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

In the public interest there are but two considerations which can justify the substitution of one official for another, except in cases where the holder of a place has been guilty of misconduct—the new appointee may be better qualified for the situation than the old or he may be able to save the country a certain sum every year.

Again, the same journal says:

When country postmasters are displaced for political reasons, something like a revolution in our public life has occurred. They have hitherto hardly been considered as public servants at all. Their salaries are merely nominal, and they have been held free to take what side they pleased. It has been left for the men who were to introduce a "broad policy" to satisfy political hate by their sacrifice, and thus to take the first step towards establishing a Tory propaganda with the country postmaster bound to do the work of the party in power.

I make that reference simply to show the view that obtained, a very proper one. I think it was, and so admitted by the Government which was being criticised by the "Globe" at the time, that, in regard to the offices mentioned a different treatment should be given and a different course pursued from that in the case of a man who was bound for his salary to give his whole time to the public service and to act with great caution in matters outside of that. These men were by Order in Council sub-agents of the Marine Department. There are agents at Charlottetown, Halifax, Victoria, St. John and various other places in the Dominion, and these gentlemen were sub-agents in the town of Pictou. Undoubtedly they were supporters of mine, but the hon. gentleman knows that that characteristic is common to a good many of the officers appointed during the last eighteen years. And he would not pretend that, if he finds that all these gentlemen have supported the Conservative party—and have not exercised their rights as electors offensively—and otherwise have a clear record that he proposes a general decapitation of these officials. And I cannot understand why such treatment has been meted out to two of the most respectable citizens of the county I have the honour to represent. Their worst enemy could not call them offensive in anything. They are two gentlemen, young men, who succeeded to the office held by their father now deceased; and these gentlemen, I feel bound to say, discharged their duties without offence to any one; and, having represented that county since 1882, I am quite safe in saying that, while I knew them as my supporters and ranked them as such, I never was aware of any particular activity in political matters on their part. I believe they were members of the committee of a political organization, and I knew that when I was Minister of Marine there was nothing particularly active in their political work or offensively partisan, and I feel confident that an investigation, properly conducted, would have enabled them to refute such a charge in a moment. But this is not the only course of treatment that seems to be meted out by gentlemen holding offices of comparatively minor importance or in connection with which the salaries are comparatively small. I will ask the attention of the Ministers who are in charge of the several departments to the way in which some of these men are being treated. For instance, I am informed that in my county immediately after the election, Roderick McLeod and Robert McLean, who were at work on the railway bridge crossing the harbour—attending the draw, and receiving, I suppose, the ordinary labourer's salary, were dismissed. They were restored for a short time. And this month they were dismissed finally, and two political opponents of mine, and supporters of this Government, Thomas Fraser and A. Thomas, were put on in their place. No cause was assigned whatever to these two men who had been summarily discharged from a position in which, so far as my information goes, they had always given satisfaction. They were in a position, as I am informed, and believe, to have shown, on investigation, that in no sense could they have been considered offensive partisans, or offensive workers in the elections. Then in the case of Noonan and Davies, who had as the warrant for their place, an Order in Council, they are thrown out on the street by order of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and the secretary of the Liberal organization in the town of Pictou is appointed, under letter and instructions of the department, in their place. These two men, I believe, were members of a political committee—I do not know that for a certainty, but I believe it—they were certainly friends and supporters of mine, and they are thrown out of office without any complaint being made against them that they had an opportunity of answering, and in their place is appointed by order of the Minister, they having been appointed by His Excellency the Governor General in Council, a rabid political opponent of mine, and the secretary of the Liberal organization in the western part of Pictou county. The next case is really an extraordinary one, because, for a nominal sum, the services of a man could be obtained to do certain work about the fish hatchery in that county. A man named John McDonald—who, mark you, has not been paid for his services either, owing to the present situation of the finances—who had done his work apparently to the satisfaction of the department, and had served at the small sum of $5 a month, is thrown out without any charge being made against him—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). Is the hon. gentleman sure of that?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not at all; I say so far as my information goes, there is no charge against him, certainly there was no investigation, or none to which he was summoned, and that is sufficient for my point. In his place a friend of the Government is appointed at $5 a month and some allowance besides, as my correspondent mentions. Now, the next case is an extraordinary one. There is an island off Pictou county, which the Minister of Marine and Fisheries knows well, Pictou Island, where a considerable number of hardy Highlanders, very heroic men, live. They have done wonders there in the way of saving life, and almost every family there is distinguished for heroism. They are a quiet and unoffending people, both those who support me and those who do not agree with me politically, live there on the best of terms. There was a man named Donald McLean, a captain of the Pictou Island lifeboat. That man is universally respected upon that island, and looked up to. The office, of course, is important in one way, and he has discharged his duties, up to the time I left office, to the satisfaction of the department, and at considerable risk to life, and for those duties he received a very small stipend. He has been charged with no fault, he has not been summoned to answer any complaint. I would ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to be kind enough to follow this case.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am paying every attention.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I did not intend to bring this matter up without notice, but I have not been able to give it because I did not know this motion would come up to-day. In fact, I did not observe last night the motion that was moved under which the present order is taken up. I call the hon. gentleman's attention to these cases, not supposing that he can deal with them off-hand, but that he may give them consideration, and also consider the principle which, if my information be correct, has been violated, the principle that, under any circumstances, every public servant should have a fair trial before he is turned out of office. This man, the late keeper of that lifeboat, was deemed by me and those who advised me, eminently qualified for that position. He was not a young man, it is true, but Mr. Alexander Currie, who has been appointed in his place is about his age, or a little older. There was no complaint against the former occupant, and the only suggestion that occurred to the minds of those who looked into it, was that perhaps the department intended to put a younger and more vigorous man in his place. But between these two men there is no difference whatever on that score: I know them both. Well, I have mentioned these two or three cases as samples—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman has mentioned all that have occurred.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. All that have been brought to my notice so far, but these all came up so quickly that the Marine Department appears to be disposed to play havoc with these men whose only offence, so far as I know, is that, in the exercise of their franchise, they voted for me in the last election. I have no doubt they were supporters of mine, though I am not certain in regard to every name. That is the only offence, however, so far as I am aware, that these men could be guilty of. I suppose the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will say that the information upon which he acted went to show that these men were offensively partisan, or acted in a way inconsistent with their duties as public officers. But even under such circumstances, I would press him, and press his colleagues, that before final action be taken, there should be an investigation into their conduct. I do not remember whether the keeper of that lifeboat is appointed by an Order in Council, but in the case of Noonan and Davies, I challenge the right of any Minister to dismiss them under such circumstances. I think the hon. gentleman will admit that where an officer is appointed by an Order in Council, his office can only become vacant by either death or resignation, or an Order in Council rescinding the one under which he held office. In that case there is a protection, because, before any Minister will go to His Excellency for such a purpose, he would have to satisfy the Government that there had been a regular investigation, and a report which justified the proposed action. It may have been overlooked in that case. But these people are not appealing to me in forma pauperis at all. Their offices being small, the hon. gentleman can understand that they are not absolutely helpless by being turned out on the streets, but the principle is far-reaching, and if the Government propose to go along in that course, I take it they will not confine their attention to the county I have the honour to represent, but that in other departments, as they can overtake these cases, there is to be a regular revolution in the service, and that, having begun in this way, no one knows where it will end. I press, in the strongest manner upon the department that no action of the character to which I have referred should be taken, until after a fair investigation had been held.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Mr. Speaker, it is obviously inconvenient to discuss the facts connected with the cases of those dismissed without having the papers before us. The House will see that the gravamen of the charge which the hon. gentleman makes is that there were two labourers on the Intercolonial Railway, who worked in his county, discharged. As regards myself, I know nothing of those facts.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. They are known to the Railway Department.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I know those men were dismissed by order of the general superintendent, and as to those men and to other names to whom the hon. gentleman has referred, the cases never came directly or indirectly before me or the department; but in the exercise of his proper discretion the general superintendent for the maritime provinces discharged them. I know nothing about them.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will inquire, I suppose?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I shall be very happy to inquire. The hon. gentleman also referred to some changes made in connection with manning the lifeboat at Pictou Island. Those changes were made by myself after I had had an opportunity of consulting with the gentleman who contested the county with my hon. friend, and I had ascertained the necessity of reorganizing the crew of that boat that it was in the best interest of the country that changes should be made. If the hon. gentleman wishes to go into details he shall have them.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Did the hon. gentleman act upon an official report?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am coming to that point. I propose to tell the hon. gentleman the principles on which I have acted and on which I propose to act, at all events until I am overruled by my colleagues. The hon. gentleman referred to the matter of the agents of the department, Noonan and Davies. This is a small appointment.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman, before he deals with that case, state in regard to the crew of the lifeboat whether he acted upon the statement of my opponent or upon an official report?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I acted upon statements made to me by the hon. gentleman's opponent and by those in whom I had perfect confidence. There was no necessity for a report with respect to the statements made to me, and the hon. gentleman will be satisfied on that point if he makes an examination into the facts. I do not wish to make the statement here. This is a trifling and trumpery matter; there is no pay attaching to it except nominal pay. The main charge with respect to Noonan and Davies made by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) was that they had been summarily discharged. That is perfectly true. They were summarily discharged on my advice, and summarily discharged for the very best reasons in the world.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. After an investigation ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Let the hon. gentleman possess his soul in patience for a few moments. Noonan and Davies are known to have been and to be active, violent political partisans.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I deny that.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They were members of the hon. gentleman's committee, actively promoting his election and using their power and influence to defeat the Liberal candidate at the late elections and previous elections. They are known to have enjoyed to an extraordinary extent the confidence of the hon. gentleman in political matters. They are known to have been active and violent political partisans in the town of Pictou.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman has been exceedingly ill advised.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Many of those facts are known to myself.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The charges are absolutely unfounded.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That they have been active political partisans of a very pronounced type and stripe is known to myself, from conversations with those gentlemen and from the very best evidence in the world a man can have ; and when a Minister is personally aware of a fact, surely there is no occasion to have an investigation. I state to the hon. gentleman that if in my own county I were met on the platform and blackguarded as I have been by political supporters of the late Government, and the whirligig of time brought its revenge and my party came into power, I would not institute a royal commission to ascertain whether I saw them on that platform or heard them make the statements, but I would act upon the knowledge that I possess myself. I would never discharge a man for voting for his party. That is a right he possesses, a sacred right which ought not to be interfered with. I have no right to inquire how he voted ; I will decline to inquire how a man voted, because in exercising that right he is merely exercising the rights of a citizen in which he should be protected and encouraged at all times. But I say when a public official not only discharges his duty as a citizen and votes, but takes an active political part in the canvass preceding the election and makes himself in that sense politically offensive, he takes his life in his hands, and if the party which he so actively supports is unsuccessful, his political head comes off.

Mr. FOSTER. Otherwise it is all right.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. So far as my power can be exercised, and I am able to take it off.

Mr. FOSTER. That is might and not justice.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman says that is might and not justice. That is the principle I understand upon which the hon. gentlemen acted when they were in power.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman laid it down very clearly and distinctly in several cases I have in my mind's eye. I remember a case of most cruel injustice, and that was the case of the keeper of the St. Paul's Island lighthouse. He is an old man holding the highest certificate of character, and he had discharged the duty efficiently for 25 years. He had a letter stolen from him, a private letter which he had written to one of his friends. The stolen letter was brought to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and on the information obtained from that stolen letter the man was discharged and was thrown on the cold world after 25 years faithful service, receiving no superannuation, no gratuity and no thanks. He had no inquiry made into his case.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I state that is absolutely incorrect.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What is incorrect ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In regard to the action taken on the stolen letter.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I say the letter was stolen.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Has the hon. gentleman knowledge of that ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It appears in the papers brought down, which you placed in my hands.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That the letter was stolen ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It appears from the papers brought down by the hon. gentleman himself, and the hon. gentleman knows that the man was discharged. Why ? How had he offensively acted ? He was alleged to have written to a friend urging him to support a certain man at a municipal election, because if he did so it might help the Liberal party in the Dominion elections. That was the sum and substance of the charge. For that offence, the hon. gentleman opposite, who was then Minister of Marine and Fisheries, dismissed him without any hesitation. He did not falter for a moment. The poor man lost the work of his lifetime, and he has never received any superannuation. I am not going to discuss these matters in detail. But what I believe by common consent to be the understanding of both political parties here is that a civil servant has an unquestionable right to vote for whom he likes without being called to account by anybody, or asked for whom he voted, and that in doing so he does not put in peril his position or right to promotion; but when a civil servant goes beyond that, becomes one of a political committee to promote the political success of one political party, takes an active part in the canvass or otherwise acts offensively to his opponent in the political campaign by becoming a heeler or actively assisting in the election of members, in my humble opinion by doing so he takes his official life in his hands and renders himself liable to be dismissed. I do not think he could complain or anybody else could complain. That was the position laid down by Lord Dufferin in the celebrated speech made by him on civil service reform some years ago. That is the position I understood to have been taken by both parties in this House. That is the position I propose for one to adopt in the discharge of the duties with which I have been entrusted; and I would go one step further and say this: that if in conducting my campaign I find men holding Her Majesty's commission standing on the platform alongside me and abusing myself and abusing my leader, and abusing the party to which I belong, calling us all kinds of names, calling upon the people to support them and denounce us; when the power comes to me their commissions will be revoked and the official life shall cease.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I understand that I have no right to address the House again, but I want to ask you a question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman says he wishes to ask the Speaker a question.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that with your permission and with the permission of the House, I am ready to answer immediately the very serious charge which was made against me in connection with the St. Paul's Island light. I understand that I have no right to do so, and if any one objects I will not do it. But I am ready now to answer and to meet the erroneous statements that have been made.

Mr. DAVIES.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman understands perfectly well that having spoken once on the motion "that I do leave the Chair," it would be out of order to permit him to speak again.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is quite true, Sir, that if any hon. gentleman objects he can prevent me:

Mr. LISTER. Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House now complain about dismissals in the public service, they have themselves very, very largely to blame for it. Eighteen years ago when they defeated the then Liberal Administration, the first action of these hon. gentlemen was, not to dismiss civil servants and public officials one by one, but they repealed Acts of Parliament which dismissed hundreds and hundreds of them throughout the country. I say here to-day, without fear of successful contradiction, that these hon. gentlemen by the course they have pursued for eighteen years past, have made of almost every official in Canada nothing but a political heeler. Why, Sir, go where you like through this country, and you will find that the men who were the foremost supporters of the late Government were men holding official positions and receiving the money of the people of this country, which money belonged to Reformers and Conservatives alike. These hon. gentlemen opposite, over and over again, from the highest to the least prominent of them, have stated that they were going to be in power for fifty years, and that we would never get there. Well, we are there now, but the effect of the statements they made has been to encourage these officials to disregard the position which they ought to occupy, and the conduct which they ought to follow, and so they have become in many, many instances offensive partisans, insulting the party to which they were opposed on every occasion, and encouraging men to speak of that party as they themselves were encouraged to speak by the leaders of their party in this House. Sir, I take it that the principle propounded by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is the true principle. Every man in this country so long as the law does not deprive him of the right to vote has that right. I would oppose to the very utmost the interference by anybody with that right. But the moment an official goes beyond it, the moment he becomes a partisan, then he takes his official life in his hands, and if the fortunes of war go against him he must have to cease to be a public servant in this country. I say, moreover, that if the Government do not do their duty in this regard they will disappoint the Liberal party in this country, and further, they will disappoint certain office-holders because they expected to die officially if we succeeded to power. What is the law on the subject? What are the rights of these people? It is laid down in Todd's "Government of the British Colonies," in these words:

But an active interference in political contests in opposition to the existing administration would constitute a sufficient offence to justify the removal of any public officer.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. "Opposition to the existing Administration."

Mr. LISTER. Yes. This is the existing Administration. It is right here; it is on this side of the House. Does the hon. gentleman pretend to argue that because they did not oppose his Administration, but opposed the men who were opposing his Administration, that they are to go scot free. Is that the argument and reasoning of the hon. gentleman?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is what you read.

Mr. GIBSON. If that is what the law means, it is all wrong.

Mr. LISTER. In my town we have in the service of this country what are called secret service detectives, under the Controller of Inland Revenue. I say here to-day that these men have nothing to do, and they do nothing officially. I believe they number over two hundred in the country, and they are political heelers and organizers and bribers from one end of Canada to the other. You find them everywhere at every election, strutting about the city of Toronto, drawing salaries from the treasury of this country, while as a matter of fact they are there simply to promote the election of hon. gentlemen now sitting on the other side of the House.

Mr. CLANCY. Would the hon. gentleman name one in the town of Sarnia?

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman lives in the town of Sarnia if you want to know, and you know it and you need not ask it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. LISTER. Order what?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for a moment forgot himself, and addressed another hon. member directly, not referring to him in the third person.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) need not ask the question, for he knows where I live as well as I know where he lives.

Mr. CLANCY. Will the hon. gentleman pardon me a moment.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CLANCY. What I asked the hon. gentleman was not where he lives, but—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. LISTER. Perhaps that is the way they may interrupt in the local House, but it is not allowed here. Sir, what do we find? In my town the custom-house officer, appointed by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), or the Government of which he was a member, gets leave of absence when the elections came on. He is requested to go to Haldimand and formal leave of absence is given him. He leaves his important duties at the custom-house in Sarnia and he goes to the county of Haldimand to promote the election of the present hon. member (Mr. Montague), and he is away for a month. The Government pays his salary, and I do not know what the party paid him. Then, Sir, we have the superintendent of the canal at Sault Ste. Marie. What did we find in his case? Instead of being up there attending to his duties during the busy portion of the season, why he is down in another part of the province of Ontario, promoting the election of his political friends, and when the elections are over, Mr. Boyd, the superintendent, returns to the Soo. He expects to keep his position. If he does, these men are not the kind of men I take them to be. Then, Sir, we have in the town of Courtright a man appointed to a position in which there are absolutely no duties to be performed. His principal business was in the township of Dawn, in the county of Bothwell, steering a certain vote in that county for my hon. friend from there (Mr. Clancy). He expects to be kept in the public service. The officer of that port attends the convention of the party; he helps to nominate the hon. gentleman; for three years he has been denouncing the Liberal party of this country, saying: "They are not going to get into power; but if they do, I have my resignation written out to send in, because I would not serve under a Grit Government." He has not resigned yet. I expect that the Government, in the performance of its plain duty, will see that the gentleman resigns or does something else. This is a matter that involves no particular argument. These gentlemen know that in their offices they were working for all the Canadians of this country, not the Tory Canadians alone. They knew that we, as well as my Conservative friend from Pictou, were contributing to pay their salaries, and they had a right to be neutral. They knew that if they were not neutral the consequence would be serious to them; and if they are not serious, they will be disappointed, and we do not want to disappoint them. Sir, it is plain that every civil servant of this country who attended to his duty, who was neutral in politics, vote or not just as he liked, should not be disturbed at all. His promotion should not be interfered with. There should be no difference made between him and any man that the Liberal Administration to-day might appoint. But the man who forgot his duty as a civil servant and became a partisan, and oftentimes an offensive and bitter partisan—I say the Government to-day would be derelict in its duty if it did not dismiss such men, not as a revenge, but as a warning to the civil servants of this country that when they accept their positions they are not to interfere any further in political matters. Why, Sir, it is scandalous, simply scandalous, that the hon. member for Pictou should get up in this House and question the Government on that subject, at the same time being bound to admit that the men who have been dismissed were open members of his committee. What right had they to be on his committee? What right had he to allow them to be on his committee? Was it not his duty to have told them: "You are my friends; remember that a political battle is like a real war—we may be beaten one of these days, and then look out." It was his duty to have told them that; but no! The hon. gentleman knew that they were on his committee; he apparently encouraged them to stay on his committee, he accepted their services; and he, knowing that and not warning them, and they knowing it and acting as they did, they must accept all that they get. I say, Sir, and I believe I voice the feeling of this country from one end to the other—that men who became offensive partisans in the recent election are not fit men to hold office in this country. These men became bold. Election after election the Tory party had won at the polls. They read the speeches which hon. gentlemen opposite made over here, in which they said: The Liberal party can never get into power; unless you change your policy it will be fifty years before you get into power; and those poor fellows no doubt felt that they would be dead by that time, and that it made little difference to them what would be done after that. But, as my hon. friend says, the whirligig of time bring its revenges. We have beaten you—beaten you badly. You think you are going to get into power again in two years. Do not deceive yourselves. I tell you, confidentially, we are going to stay here for twenty years, and we will stay longer unless we commit political suicide, as you people did. I want to tell you, moreover, that there is no nest of traitors on our side. We are true to a man to that leader. Hon. gentlemen think they can create a little dissension by naming this man or that man who did not get into the Cabinet. We are Liberals; we are not looking for the loaves and fishes. We are fighting for great principles, and it is a matter of indifference to us whether we are in the Cabinet or out of it. All we want are the principles, and we want a man in whom we have confidence to lead us in fighting for those principles, and we have him here to-day. There is not one man on this side of the House, let me tell you—not one man—who will be found wanting to Mr. Laurier whenever he is called upon. And more than that. In this House there are men who have been elected as independent members. When they find out the party that has been assailing us, when they become familiar with the policy of that party, when they become acquainted with the terrible corruption that has characterized the history of that party, when they know our leader better, and when they know our Liberal friends better, independent though they be, they will be bound, because conscience will drive them, to ally themselves with the Liberal party. Now, the Government is acting in no spirit of revenge. We want the public service of this country to be kept pure. We want public officials to know that the moment they take a commission from the Government, they are to cease to be partisans, and to devote the rest of their lives to the public interests of this country; and the only way to make them know that is to place upon them an iron hand, to make them feel that a departure from this sound principle means that they can no longer serve this country. They have of course the right to return to the occupation they left in order to enter the public service, and to enter into competition with the other people of the country. But as civil servants they have no right to remain; and I only repeat that if the Government falter in this policy, they will be disappointing their own friends, and not only their own friends, but the Conservative party in the country, who knew that if we succeeded to power those men must go out.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Speaker, I was not permitted by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) the courtesy of setting him right, in the interruption I made when he was speaking. The hon. gentleman was quite wrong if he imagined that I asked him so stupid a question as where he resided. I knew perfectly well where he resided. But I did ask, what seems to me a very simple and pertinent question. I asked him to name one of the parties to whom he made reference. The answer I received was not a very courteous one; and I am bound to say that if any hon. gentleman in this House risks its indulgence, I am afraid that he does, and "Hansard" will give abundant evidence of it in the speeches of the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman says that the Liberal party is fighting for great principles in this country, and he has given a striking example of what those principles are. Now, Mr. Speaker, if there is one principle above all others on which we can hope to govern this country, it is that every public servant of the country does not hold his office at the smile or beck of any political party—that whether he shall retain his office or not shall entirely depend on his respectability and his competency to discharge the duties of that office.

Mr. LISTER. And his non-partisanship.

Mr. CLANCY. I will come to that later, and we shall see whether my hon. friend has acted on the principles he has enunciated this afternoon. I repeat that no public official in this country should be discharged on any ground except that he is not discharging the duties pertaining to his office or is not qualified to discharge them. My hon. friend, I presume, was going to give us some authority, and I am not going to question his authority, but I would ask him to reconcile his practice with the authority he was about to quote. Just let us see what the grand principles and the practices of those hon. gentlemen are. My hon. friend knows perfectly well that the local machinery to which I am about to refer is about the most aggressive that could be instituted—one more overpowering in its influence and capable of helping a political party in a larger degree than any machinery pertaining to the Dominion Government. Just let me take the list. I may begin with the division court clerks and bailiffs. What is the position of those men? Their position is such that they may not only persuade a man and make public speeches and use the legitimate influences that belong to every citizen in this country, but they can put the screws on those who cannot be persuaded, they can promise the debtor a little longer delay, if he will vote for their candidate. They can say to him: We will not press this execution, or such an execution will not issue; and there is no influence greater than the one which the creditor can exercise over the debtor. Then take the license commissioners, who are they? I need hardly call the attention of the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) to their influence, because he has these men for his most active canvassers. Are the influences which they wield those of ordinary citizens who go so far as to be abusive, according to the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries? That hon. gentleman seems to have been particularly unfortunate in having been abused. Why, Sir, a man who holds a license in the province of Ontario, holds it at the peril of his bread and butter. If he is a Conservative, he is told that if he does not vote for the Liberal party, he must at least be silent; and he cannot be silent long, if he is silent during one election he must vote for the Liberal candidate at the next or lose his head. Hon. gentlemen opposite must see that they cannot have all the profits that come from that sort of thing without also sharing the odium that comes of it, and they cannot comfort themselves by laying down those grand principles for which my hon. friend is ready to lay down his life while following practices entirely at variance with those principles. If the hon. member for Lambton's practices are to be consistent with his professions, he should lay down a new rule. He should go to West Lambton and tell his friends that they have not acted properly, he should tell the division clerks that they must cease to be his canvassers, emissaries and heelers, he should tell the commissioners the same thing. For the first time in the history of this country, the Liberal party is prepared to lay down a new rule, and their sole motive is to clean out the offices which are held by Conservatives in this country. I was astounded to hear the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries say that it was not necessary to hold an investigation in such cases. The hon. gentleman is a lawyer, and I am led to believe a good lawyer. I ask him if that is the means by which justice is done in this country? I ask him if that is the way persons are treated in the courts of this country? Let me tell the hon. gentleman that no sound rule or practice affecting the right of any individual may be departed from—I care not whether he be a public official or not, and I care not whether sentence be pronounced against him and carried out by the Minister of the Crown, or one of the courts of the land—such a sound principle cannot be departed from with impunity. If you were to start a practice of that kind, you would at once open the doors to the vicious system that obtains across the line, under which the dominant party makes a clean sweep of the appointments held by friends of the defeated party.

Mr. LISTER. We will cure the evil.

Mr. CLANCY. It is very strange that my hon. friend wants a cure just now. It is very strange that he did not try to cure the evil at home. The hon. gentleman who was leader of the Ontario Government for so many years winked at that sort of thing for many years, and took all the profits that came from it; and now my hon. friend, when he has got into office, says there is a great evil and that he intends to eradicate it. I say that if we enter upon the system contemplated by hon. gentlemen opposite, it will simply mean that every public official will be in the hands of a dominant political party, and his liberty, as a man, will cease to exist. I would like to ask where we are going to draw the line? Must a man go quietly and give his vote? Must he conceal it from both sides? Is he not to be allowed to say that he belongs to the one political party or the other? As soon as we open the door for that kind of thing, so soon will hon. gentlemen lay down a new rule and practice in this country. I do not believe in men being unduly active or in any sense offensive in political contests, whether they hold office in either one or the other government of this country. But I do believe that we should take these things as we find them, and be prepared to give such treatment to our political opponents as we would be willing to have meted out to us in similar circumstances. I could point out to you, Sir, that the most active workers in the contest in the county of Bothwell were the officials of the Ontario government. My hon. friend from West Lambton (Mr. Lister) wants to know whether I will give him the names. They are very respectable gentlemen, and I have nothing to say against their character, but I do say that I know they were the most active agents of my opponent. They had the weapons in their hands, and they used them most unsparingly in the contest. I do not propose to go further in this discussion, but I do say that it would be the most unfortunate thing that has ever taken place in Canada if hon. gentlemen on the other side were to lay down and carry out the rule and practice enunciated by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries to-day. What would such a rule mean? It would mean that any gentleman in an office is disqualified if he has been a partisan and has taken an active part in a political contest, either in the present or the past.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I never laid down any such rule. He may have been in years past an active partisan, but I spoke of his having acted in a partisan way after he became a civil servant.

Mr. CLANCY. Quite so. Then we will take the case of a man who is an active partisan after becoming a civil servant. That seems to be the reason in the mind of the hon. gentleman why he should be dismissed. But it would appear that the hon. gentleman has found, as specially qualified to fill his place, a man who had been guilty of just the same thing in supporting the party who are in power to-day. I would like the hon. gentleman to justify the rule. I would like him to point out why, if the one man were to be dismissed who, upon the ground of taking an active part in the contest, another should be placed in that position who had offended in the same way against the party going out. These things are absolutely irreconcilable, and show that in attempting to reconcile them the hon. gentleman is entirely wrong. He will have to have a very large basket if all the heads are to go into it. It is a custom that has grown up in this country, but I do not say that it is a good custom; but I say the hon. gentleman has a herculean task before him if he intends to make places for his friends on account of the sins or alleged sins of which his own friends furnished the most striking example.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The matter now before the House is one of considerable interest to a large number of people throughout the country at the present time. But I shall detain the House only with a few words. I am glad to hear the announcement made by the hon. gentleman representing the Government here to-day that no member of the civil service has imperilled his position because he voted in the late election, or even took an honourable part in supporting his party; and I do think that as a new member, the hon. gentleman from Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) has not done justice to himself in misrepresenting the position taken by a member of the Government. I hope the

Mr. CLANCY.

Government will be generous in dealing with this matter, that no postmaster, for instance, will be dismissed without an investigation being made, unless the Government are satisfied beyond any doubt that he has been guilty of improper action of the worst kind. I say that because I want men holding positions in the civil service to feel that, so long as they discharge their duties properly and behave themselves as citizens occupying these positions, they will not be interfered with by any political party. But, Sir, I hold that there is something more than party interest involved in this: we have to consider the public interests of this country. During the last election, and for several elections past, we have found men occupying good positions in the civil service emboldened in doing wrong, not only being active partisans, but being dishonest and corrupt in their actions during the elections; and that, I say, is against the public interest, and it will be an injury to the country to allow that kind of thing to be backed up by any party. In the interests of the public service I trust that men, when they accept these positions, will understand that they are to be faithful in the discharge of their duties and that, while they have the right to vote and to take an honourable part, as honourable men, in the elections, they are not to be blackguards, they are not to be guilty of dishonesty and corruption. But if any of them are so guilty—and there are hundreds of such cases which have been brought to my notice in the election—then, not only in the interests of a party but in the public interest, their conduct should be taken notice of by this Government. There were men who declared publicly while taking part in the election that they were prepared to give up their positions, and in many cases these were the first men to come around and say that they had not done anything that would justify their being interfered with. I know men who declared that they would resign if the Liberals were successful. But no man who had the courage to give up his position would make use of such methods. Their object was simply to make the electors believe that it was quite impossible that the Liberals could come into power. One of them went so far as to say: Do you suppose that I would serve under a Papist Premier. That is the sort of canvass that we had to meet, carried on actively and openly on the streets.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Hon. gentlemen laugh. I said to one of the men who was talking in this strain: How about your late leaders? And his answer was: Oh, I forgive them; they were only trying to humbug the Roman Catholics and get their votes. So far as I am concerned, I do not wish to see this Government do, or to support the Government in doing, the slightest injustice to any man in the civil service.

On the contrary, so long as he even more than voted, but acted as an honourable man, I have nothing to say. But where an investigation is held and where it is found that a public servant neglected his duties and was guilty of dishonesty, of corruption, of trying to debauch public opinion in this country, then, as the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) says, the Government will meet the wishes not only of the Liberal party, not only of the civil service, of a great majority of Conservatives who found fault with members of the civil service who were emboldened by the late Government to engage in the operations to which I have referred, if they will punish those officials by dismissal.

Mr. CASEY. I am rather amused at the style of the discourse with which the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) has chosen to make his first appearance before this House. It would seem that it is entirely impossible for him to remember that he is not sitting in the legislative assembly chamber in Toronto, for the bulk of his speech was made up of an arraignment of the government lately led by Sir Oliver Mowat, for its conduct, or rather for the conduct of its servants, in past elections. So far as that goes, we are not concerned to defend the Ontario officials in respect of their actions in the Ontario elections: that is a matter with which we have nothing to do. But I beg to call the attention of the House to one fact—that my hon. friend who now represents Bothwell, and the Opposition with whom he acted in the legislative assembly, have been trying for twenty-three or twenty-four years to induce the people of Ontario to dismiss what we used to call the Mowat government, on the ground of the interference of its civil servants in local elections, and to this day they have been signally unsuccessful. The Opposition conducted on such picayune lines, conducted in the spirit of the hon. gentleman's speech here to-day, has been successful in reducing its numbers from a considerable percentage of that House to a miserable fraction of it. I hope the hon. gentleman will continue these tactics here, for I feel that such speeches as his will have the same effect on the numbers of the Opposition in this House as they have had upon the numbers of the Opposition in the local House.

But the hon. gentleman has another grievance. He tells us that Ontario government officials, who are mostly Liberals, of course, are wicked enough to interfere in Dominion elections. He says that some of them were bold and bad enough to organize opposition to himself in Bothwell. I do not see any reason why Ontario government officials should not interfere in Dominion elections. They are not appointed by this Government; they are not responsible to any Government that may be in power here. I do not see why the officials of the local government should be disfranchised in connection with Dominion elections, even to the extent of being prevented from taking an active part in these elections.

However, that is a purely speculative opinion on a subject with which this House has no concern. What we are concerned with is the conduct of officials appointed by this Government, and the conduct of the Government. But first I must correct one misstatement with regard to these officials. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) charges that the Ontario government puts the screws on license commissioners, bailiffs and others under their control. He tells you that the men who hold licenses to sell liquor in Ontario, hold them in fear and trembling, and dare not use their vote freely under stress of threats. Well, Sir, we on both sides of this House who represent Ontario constituencies, know that that is simply not so. I cannot put it in parliamentary language any clearer than that. But those from the other provinces may not be aware of the fact, and I think it therefore worth while to deny that statement as directly as any statement can be denied in parliamentary language. We all know that a majority of the license holders in Ontario are Conservatives; we all know that those Conservative license holders exercise their franchise as freely as anybody else, that they take the most active part possible in election campaigns consistently with the fear of injuring their own business by offending political opponents. Every tavern-keeper on either side of politics, takes his side actively, so far as he dare—

Mr. BENNETT. Hear, hear.

Mr. CASEY. I repeat, so far as he dare, with the chances of losing custom if he makes himself too great a nuisance to his political opponents. Every Ontario man knows, and the member for Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) knows, that the statement that Ontario license holders are bulldozed by the Ontario government or their commissioners, is simply fictitious.

Now, dropping Ontario altogether we come to the Dominion officials. My hon. friend from Bothwell would have us believe that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is introducing a new plan of action when he says that men should suffer for partisan conduct during the election, if the other party should happen to come into power. It may be a new doctrine to my hon. friend from Bothwell, because he has not been long enough in politics to witness a change of administration in the only Parliament with which he has been connected. But it is no new doctrine in Dominion politics, nor British politics, nor in the politics of any country in the world. It must be clearly understood by all public servants that they are servants of the public, and that from the day they accept office, their duty is not to the party who appointed them, but to the public at large, and that if they make partisan use of their position as public servants, even if while public servants they adopt an offensive and improper partisan tone, if they identify themselves with a party instead of with the public service, they are liable to go out with the party who put them in office and with whom they have bound themselves up. If they choose to commit suicide it is their own business. It is no new doctrine, it has always been the doctrine, though it has not always been properly followed out. Men have been dismissed improperly, and men have not been dismissed who should have been dismissed. But it has always been the accepted doctrine by both sides of the House.

My hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) quibbles with the wording of the quotation read by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) as to the interference of public servants against the Government of the day. He would have you believe that it is all right for public officials to interfere on behalf of the Government, but all wrong for them to interfere against the Government. Well, that has been his doctrine, no doubt, while in office, and the doctrine of his party. They have not only allowed, but encouraged and compelled, public servants to interfere on behalf of the Government, and not one of those public servants dared raise his voice or so much as "cheep," to use a Scotch phrase, against the Government. Now, Sir, has that ever been the recognized policy of any great party? Never. That was an innovation, a malpractice, introduced by hon. gentlemen opposite when they held the reins of power. They simply adopted this, as well as other notions, from our cousins across the border. They adopted the Yankee system of bulldozing public servants, as they adopted the Yankee system of subsidizing minorities in the shape of monopolists. The course they pursued of compelling civil servants to support the Government of the day, was going far to Yankeeify our whole public service, and to put it in that condition in which the uncovenanted service of the United States now is. In that service they have gone of late years a little further than we have; they have what we may call a covenanted or reformed branch of the civil service. But, speaking of the civil service at large in the States, it is expected to be the organ of the party in power. It was attempted to introduce that system and that principle here, and it went as far and continued as long as the country kept the hon. gentlemen opposite in power. Now, my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries proposes to introduce the English practice, the doctrine which has always been considered to be sound doctrine, that neither for nor against the government of the day, should any civil servant take an active part in politics. I say it would be the greatest curse to this country if that old system had been perpetuated, if it became to be understood that for all the future the civil service was to be the organ of the party to whom they owed their appointments.

The older members of this House will know that I have urged, and am still prepared to urge, that the civil service should not be partisan, either in its appointment, in its action, or in the promotion of those who are already in that service. It may be too soon to get that reform carried into effect. This does not seem, perhaps, to be the most proper time to talk about it when such a large number of people are looking for places; but in the name of goodness let us take no step backwards. If we must maintain the system of political appointments, let us put every safeguard around the service to prevent it from being made a political machine after the appointment of its members. Now, that is all I understand the Government of the day intend to do. They intend to punish those who have made themselves, or allowed themselves to be made, political tools of the party that was lately in power. I hope they will enforce the same rule upon those whom they may appoint themselves, that they will tell these men: It is not your business to fight for the Government on the platform, or the hustings, or anywhere else, but to do your duty to the public in the position in which you have been placed. I hope and believe the Government will do so.

Now, the hon. member for Bothwell also made the totally gratuitous assumption and statement that this Government proposed to make way for their friends by turning out a great lot of people. Sir, many of us on this side of the House, whose mail is loaded with applications from day to day for positions in the public service, might be very apt to complain rather that the Government of the day has been very slack in creating vacancies for its friends. As a matter of fact, the number of vacancies it has created has been extremely meagre and small. I do not feel myself in a position to attack the Government for their moderation in creating vacancies; I believe they have laid down the proper policy and will follow it out to its conclusion. I cannot tell how many that practice may remove before it is fully carried out, but I think they are showing a grand example to the people of the country and to the members of this House, in not yielding to the pressure which has been undoubtedly put upon them to gratuitously dismiss people for the purpose of putting their own friends in office.

Mr. SPROULE. I have no complaint to make with the principle laid down by the hon. member who has just taken his seat, because I regard it is a proper one; nor with the remarks of the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), for his views are very largely my views, that a public servant, as long as he faithfully discharges his duty, although he may take a part in political contests, if he does it fairly, that man should not be dismissed until a proper investigation is made and sufficient evidence is forthcoming that he did otherwise. But I should like to know how that can be reconciled with the principle laid down by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who was very specific and very emphatic. He understood a civil servant could take no part, either active or inactive, against the Government of the day without running the chance of being removed from his position. The hon. gentleman would allow a civil servant the privilege to vote, but no more. If that were the case, it would be practically shutting out men from using the franchise, because under the Ontario law it is easy to tell how a man voted, and so long as the party knew how he voted there is no doubt his public position would be in danger.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) laid down another principle, and I thought it a very good one if it could be lived up to. It was that a man when he took office under the Crown was working for all the people, and that being a public servant he should be neutral. I believe that principle to be a sound one, comparatively speaking; but I wonder if the hon. gentleman considered the public officials in Ontario, of whom he must know so much. I wonder if he is prepared to admit that the principle should apply to Reformers as well as Conservatives. The hon. gentleman could not have considered this point, or he would not have declared that the principle was a sound one, because if it was a sound one, it was flagrantly violated, offensively and audaciously violated by the public servants appointed by the late Mowat Administration. There has not been a provincial election or a Dominion election during the last eighteen or twenty years in which those public servants have not been most active partisans on behalf of their friends in the country. There has not been an election run in my part of the country for the last twenty years in which those officials have not been the most active men on the committees, working day and night, and very often proving the most offensive political partisans in the community. Take the last election in North Grey at which the Controller of Customs was returned. Who took the most active part in that contest? We have heard a great deal about Dominion returning officers being partisans of the Government and not faithfully doing their duty, and it has been frequently stated that if we employed the sheriffs and registrars, as is done by the Provincial Government of Ontario, they would do their duty and nothing more and not act as partisans. Was that the case in the late contest? On that occasion the sheriff was appointed revising officer. The deputy of the sheriff was the most active man in the contest. Even when he was engaged in posting the proclamation he at the same time was putting up pictures of the leader of the Government. I met him over and over again, and he and other officials were engaged not only in trying to influence the electors, but I am informed, and I believe my information to be correct, that they were absolutely buying up votes, and almost incessantly going their rounds day and night.

Mr. GIBSON. Did you sleep?

Mr. SPROULE. I slept sufficiently for my need. But I was alive to the situation. I saw the deputy sheriff. I met him and his myrmidons time after time at hotel after hotel, engaged in influencing men to go out of the riding, to stay at home, or making preparations to haul them to the polls, and in every way influencing them.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. You did not want a royal commission to ascertain those facts which you saw for yourself?

Mr. SPROULE. I am not talking about a royal commission; I am discussing whether this official was a partisan. I am talking about the principle laid down by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), that so soon as a man became a public servant he should not be a partisan. I say to hon. gentlemen opposite: apply that principle to your own friends. Whom did we find actively employed in that county? Division court clerks, bailiffs, license commissioners, the license inspector. The license inspector for North Grey to my knowledge went around day after day influencing voters. He was in the polling booth, officiously dealing with men opposed to the party; and I say there was no stronger or more active partisan than the inspector of licenses in North Grey. What took place in the local election took place in the Dominion election. It does not matter with them whether it is a provincial or Dominion election; at all times these officials prove most offensive partisans in our part of the country. This is a crying abuse. Conservatives sometimes will not employ bailiffs and put cases in the division courts because they are afraid they will not get justice.

Mr. GIBSON. Do bailiffs try the cases?

Mr. SPROULE. They go around and collect the money, and that is more important work than trying the cases. Would the hon. gentleman employ a bailiff to levy an execution when he knew the bailiff would not attempt to collect the debt? What has he to say in defence of men who will not do their duty in that respect. The suspicion that justice will not be done is so strong that in many cases they are not employed; I have heard the statement made more than once.

Men in charge of post offices have been afraid to go to the polls lest they should be subsequently dismissed. I have heard this threat made in my own presence during the last fifteen days. They had been so intimidated that some of the postmasters refused to vote, although Conservatives in principle, and had been so during their whole lifetime. Why? They were afraid they would be turned out of office, because friends of the parties who have been active agents of the Government candidate told them time after time in my own village and in several other villages that if they dared take part in the election they would be turned out of office. That is unfair and unjust. I do not believe the Postmaster General, from what I know of him, would so act; but we are justified in bringing this matter to public notice because the threat has been so flagrantly made by supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite who have taken an active part in the recent election. If the principle is good, that a public servant should refrain from taking an active part in elections, it should hold good as regards provincial as well as Dominion officials, and when the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) has applied this principle with respect to his own friends, then it will come with more force when he seeks to apply the principle here. It would be better to let charity begin at home, and for hon. gentlemen opposite to reform their own friends before they attempt to teach a lesson to others in this House. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) pretended to lay down what Lord Dufferin said with respect to this question when he was in Canada. I distinctly remember listening to His Lordship at that time, and I entirely disagree with what the hon. member for Lambton has stated. I think the whole tenor of Lord Dufferin's advice was that we should not adopt the American system,—to the victors belong the spoils, but that so long as a public official discharged his duties faithfully and honestly he should not be removed. I regarded it as a sound principle then, and I do the same to-day. I have been eighteen years in public life, and on many, many occasions, have friends of the hon. gentlemen opposite holding public positions in my riding taken a most active part against me. I refused to ask for their dismissal because they did so. I held it to be the sound principle, that so long as any of these men discharged his duty faithfully no political party should interfere with him. Mr. Speaker, I was glad to see a letter published in the press some time ago, written by yourself, Sir, in the year 1878, with regard to this very question, and the principles enunciated in your letter were entirely in accord with my view of what is correct. I rose more particularly to refer to the offensive active partisanship of the public officials connected with the Mowat government in Ontario, either in Dominion or provincial elections, and to say, that there are men supporting this Government to-day who knew these things, and who winked at them, and who never remonstrated with their friends. It is not for these men to-day to read a homily to hon. gentlemen here about the violation of this principle. Take the division court clerks, the division court bailiffs, the license commissioners, the license inspectors, the issuers of marriage licenses, and there is not a political committee appointed in Ontario in which three or four of them are not to be found taking a most active partisan part. That is wrong, and I have always held it to be wrong. The sooner a reform is made in that respect the better, and the greater the credit to hon. gentlemen will be, if they try to set their friends right in this respect rather than to condemn the friends of their opponents.

Mr. TISDALE. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to detain the House long, but in one way I consider this a very important discussion, and I think it most important that both sides of the House should have a distinct understanding with respect to it. I do not propose like a number of gentlemen on both sides of the House, to discuss the motives of others. I wish as far as possible to get a distinct understanding of what the leaders of the Government think the proper principle is. I am most desirous for that, because I confess that to-day I have been given a different view of it from that which I believed to be the correct one, and from that upon which I have acted for the last ten years, having had some experience in matters of this sort. I did not understand the Minister of Marine to say exactly what my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) understood him. I did not understand him (Mr. Davies) to say that a man had no right to do anything more than vote. He said, that an official had a perfect right to vote, but I did not understand him to say anything more than that if an official acted as an offensive partisan, he thought he should be dismissed. If that is the rule I for my part have no objection to it. The difficulty will arise in all such cases to draw the line as to what partisanship is, and we must depend upon the fairness of hon. gentlemen on both sides to apply that rule. I can understand very well that it is impossible to make such a rule hard and fast. I should regret most exceedingly if the opinion on either side of this House, was, that a narrow construction should be put upon the principle, and that it should be laid down that those who have the right to vote, should be deprived from expressing their opinions like men in an honourable and straightforward, but at the same time not a prominent manner. If men appointed to these positions are fit for their duties, it would be making slaves of them to prevent them expressing their opinions on political questions, always providing that they express them in a proper way. I do not believe, from anything I have heard yet, that it is the intention of hon. gentlemen opposite to prevent men expressing their opinions fairly and moderately. So far as I am concerned I have always acted on that principle. The first time I had the honour of a seat in this House, in 1887, the Secretary of the Reform Association in my riding was postmaster in quite a large village, where the salary was a consideration to him. He was a gentleman; he did not go on the stump; I knew he was in the committee of my opponents, but I knew of nothing dishonourable or discreditable or offensive in any manner in his actions. I was asked by my committee to have him removed, but I told them, that I would not present such an application to the Minister unless they could prove the charge that he had not properly fulfilled the duties of his office. We all knew that he was a Reformer, and he was appointed because he was a Reformer by a Reform Government, but that was the action I took in the case, and in some other instances I took the same view. I believed until to-day that this was the proper view for both of the great political parties to adopt, and I shall much regret if any narrower view is taken. I am quite prepared to concede that occasionally both political parties in applying the rule as to what is offensive have in my opinion made mistakes. I have heard cases discussed in the House and if I had a vote upon them, though it was the action of a Minister whom I supported, I most certainly would have voted against him. I believe that if we give officials the right to vote, they should have the right quietly and calmly to express their opinions. I do not mean that they should go on the stump and become speakers or active men in that sense. But it is the right of an honourable man in connection with his franchise to express his view in a proper and a moderate manner. I am very glad, that as I understood the Minister of Marine, he did not go to the narrow extent that my friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) seems to have understood.

Mr. SPROULE. I must have misunderstood him, then.

Mr. TISDALE. I am sorry that I have to disagree with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries on one point, and I ask him to reconsider his position in this particular. What he knows of his own knowledge may be sufficient to guide him, but I am entirely against him if he puts himself in the pale of discharging a man even of his own knowledge, without giving that man the right to reply. Far be it from me to make any attack upon the Government in reference to this. It is too serious a matter for the officials concerned, and it is too small a matter for great political parties not to have a fair understanding about it. I do not propose to refer, even to the conduct of Ontario officials, although it is not satisfactory. We will try and redress that. I quite agree that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House were justified in bringing forward such cases from the conduct of officers of provincial governments, in answer to my friend from Lambton (Mr. Lister) who is always a hard hitter. I ask the Minister (Mr. Davies) to reconsider his position. I ask him to have an investigation and to give an officer a chance to reply even though the Minister knows certain things of his own knowledge. That was always my belief. I have expressed it before in regard to action taken by my hon. friend beside me (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) in regard to a gentleman in his department, from my county, and I pressed upon him that the officer should have the right to be heard. I believe that the better sense and judgment of both sides of the House will agree with that, and I trust that hon. gentlemen opposite will take off the head of no man without giving him a chance to make his defence.

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). The charges made by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) with reference to certain officials in my department are very serious, and they are not the first accusations that have been brought before me as Controller of Inland Revenue. Now, I should consider it my duty to give a careful investigation to every one of these accusations, and if a public officer is found guilty he will be dismissed at once, whether he is found guilty of neglecting his official duties or whether he is found guilty of taking such a partisan part in elections as his common sense and his feeling of justice should tell him not to take. If he is found guilty after having had a fair chance of defending himself he should be discharged, and I believe that on both sides of the House such an act would be upheld. It is very difficult to define the exact limits within which a public officer can properly exercise his franchise as a citizen; but I think that he ought to have not only such a feeling as ought to characterize a gentleman in whatever position he finds himself, but also the common sense to understand that a public official is not a servant of a party, but a servant of his country.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I am sure the House has listened with a great deal of pleasure to the distinguished gentleman who occupies the position of Controller of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière), and it appears to me that he has come nearer than any of the hon. gentlemen to whom I have listened in defining the principles upon which he proposes to act. As I understand, he first states that no officer will be decapitated until he has an opportunity of answering the charges made against him. That is the first principle which we have well defined, and it is a very important admission and a very important announcement from the Government of the day. As the hon. gentleman was speaking, I am sure, with the full authority of the other members of the Government, that opinion is of course concurred in by his leader and the other gentlemen who sit around him.

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. I must beg the hon. gentleman's pardon if I interrupt him for one moment. I may say that I did not consult any of my colleagues in making this declaration, though I feel sure that every one of them would endorse it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. An announcement made by a member of the Government is an announcement of the entire Government, if I understand the principle of parliamentary government; otherwise the hon. gentleman must retire from the Government that is if, upon an independent matter of this kind, he differs from his colleagues. That is the first principle the hon. gentleman laid down. The second question on which I wish a declaration of principle is this: What is to be considered offensive partisanship? Is the action of a Conservative office-holder working for his party to be considered offensive partisanship?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Certainly.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I hear a general consensus of approval. Then I want to ask the other question: Is the action of a Liberal office-holder working for his party to be considered offensive partisanship?

An hon. MEMBER. Certainly.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Certainly, say some of the members of the Government. Then, I ask, if, on account of the decapitation of Conservative office-holders for working for their party, I bring to the attention of the Government charges that Liberal office-holders, men who for years have held their positions under Conservative administrations, have been acting in support of the Liberal party, will they be dismissed?

Mr. SOMERVILLE. There are mighty few of them.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is not an answer to the question which I am asking the members of the Government. I concur decidedly in the opinion of the distinguished Controller of Inland Revenue that a man appointed to a position in the public service is appointed to serve his country; but, Sir, I do not think that government by party has become so partisan in this country that partisanship on one side shall be considered an offence, while partisanship on the other side shall be considered meritorious and defensible on the part of the Government. Sir, if we are to have partisanship cleared entirely out of the public service, let us have partisanship on both sides cleared out of the public service. I do not now speak of provincial government employees;

Mr. MONTAGUE.

I speak of Dominion Government employees; and I can give my hon. friends, if they will promise me to act upon them, the names of a number of Dominion civil servants who did their best, both offensively and otherwise, for hon. gentlemen who sit on the Treasury benches to-day; and what I want from them is an answer to the question, whether, if these facts are laid before them, they will act with regard to them as they declare they will act towards men who hold Conservative principles, and who were men enough to back up those Conservative principles in the receipt campaign.

Mr. McMULLEN. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) has waxed very warm in the discussion of this matter. He says he can give the names of a number of Dominion officials who acted as partisans on behalf of the Reform party in the recent contest. I would like to know, Sir, where those men got their appointments. The hon. gentleman knows very well that the Conservative party were in power for 18 years, and the men who have held appointments for a longer period must certainly be very few. Not a single Reformer to my knowledge has been appointed to a public position in this Dominion by hon. gentlemen opposite for the last 18 years.

Mr. DAVIN. I can give you some.

Mr. McMULLEN. And the Reformers appointed by the Mackenzie Government who remain in the service must certainly be very few. So that I cannot understand the statement of the hon. member that he can name a number of men in the public service belonging to the Reform party who took part in the elections. The hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) would like to know to what extent a man is allowed to express his views with regard to a candidate—whether a man merely is permitted to record his vote, and nothing more. I think, Mr. Speaker, that anything beyond the simple recording of his vote as an elector is improper on the part of an office-holder. I do not think any man drawing public money from the Dominion treasury should take any active part, or even go so far as to express his views publicly or privately with regard to the party that should hold office in this country, seeing that the money he draws belongs to both classes in the country. But I can easily understand why hon. gentlemen opposite are very anxious to have a broad and liberal view taken of this whole matter. A great many of the relations of hon. gentlemen opposite are no doubt office-holders, and these people have no doubt taken a very active part in the last election, not only on behalf of the party but on behalf of their own blood relations; and therefore these gentlemen are very anxious to secure a very liberal construction of the rights of officials of this kind, so that they may possibly escape losing their official heads under the rule that has been laid down by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies). Now with regard to another point which was touched upon by the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale), namely, that a certain postmaster took a very prominent and active part against him in 1887, and did all he could personally, by the exercise of any little influence he had, to secure his defeat. I can offset that complaint by stating that in the riding where he lived, a postmaster, who was president of the Conservative association there for some time, did all he possibly could against me in the elections, and was a most active partisan. I have not named him and do not intend to, but my hon. friend must know that he is not the only individual who has suffered by an opponent of his politically taking an active part against him, because in many other cases men have taken a very prominent and active part in the elections who hold public offices, and who, I am sure, will not be visited with that punishment that, in many instances, in my humble opinion, they deserve. I think that in this matter the principle should be laid down and applied to both sides, and I am quite satisfied that it should apply to provincial officials if you like. I do not think that we should at all encourage the idea that men holding public official positions and drawing public money should be permitted to take an active and prominent part in the elections. I do not think that this should be tolerated, and I believe that an example should be made of men who take their official life in their hands, by calling upon them to resign, and by dismissing them if they do not resign. We must have an end of this kind of thing. A great many complaints have been made with regard to the conduct of Ontario officials who may have taken a prominent part in the elections; but when it comes to the time of hon. gentlemen opposite to get on the Treasury benches in Ontario, we shall have no objections to their applying the same rule that we apply here. But while we are dealing with officials belonging to this House and Government, we should carry out the principle that men who will publicly take their official life in their hands by entering into a bitter and determined opposition to one of the political parties in this Dominion and by fighting for those who gave them their position, they must be made to realize that they must suffer the consequences. I hope that in every department where men have been guilty of that conduct, there will be some standard of justice by which all shall be judged, and that no exception will be made in the case of any man guilty of impropriety of that kind.

Mr. TAYLOR. If I understood rightly the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) last night, he informed the House and the country that he had left the Conservative party and gone over to the Reform party because everything was not happy and there was not union among the Conservatives, whereas he had found a land flowing with milk and honey and full of peace and harmony on the Government side. Well, Mr. Speaker, after having heard the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) lay down one platform and the hon. Controller of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly) lay down another, I could not help coming to the conclusion that all is not peace and harmony on that side. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) comes down with his sledge hammer and declares that if any official has taken an active part in politics, his head shall be cut off and that if the Government did not follow such a course, they would not meet the expectations of their friends in the country. We have the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) making the statement that he himself had dismissed an official without giving him a trial, without judge or jury, although that official had been appointed by Order in Council. And then we find the genial whip, the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) laying down the rule which all must obey, as a sound one, and threatening with the lash all who do not obey it. Well, I hope that hon. gentlemen opposite, and particularly the members of the Government, will apply the rule thus laid down in a case which I shall submit to them, and in which that rule is particularly applicable. I draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Justice (Sir Oliver Mowat) to the case of Dr. Chamberlain, the Inspector of Prisons for Ontario, and would ask him to put that rule in force with regard to that gentleman.

Mr. LISTER. He is not in the Dominion civil service.

Mr. TAYLOR. We are talking of the civil service generally. I want to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Justice to the conduct of an official of his, Dr. Chamberlain.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). What has he to do with him?

Mr. TAYLOR. He is an official of the Ontario Government, of which the hon. Minister of Justice was the head for years.

Mr. DEVLIN. The Ontario Government is not here.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That makes the difference.

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, it makes a difference whose ox is gored. I wished to say that Dr. Chamberlain came to my county on the 16th May last to organize for the Reform party, on behalf of my Grit opponent, Mr. Fredenburg. At the same time he steered the Patron candidate, and managed both meetings, and presided at the joint meeting. He organized all through the county. He stumped at every meeting held by the Reform candidate. He spoke at the nomination both in favour of the Reform and Patron candidates. He went throughout the country collecting subscriptions, and on the Sunday preceding the nomination, which is what I want to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Justice (Sir Oliver Mowat) particularly to, he travelled throughout the county with his satchel, visiting every town and village, calling on the leading men, and thus spent the whole Sabbath day. Whether he distributed boodle or not, I do not know. He certainly visited all the headquarters of the gang throughout the county carrying his bag, and the bag, we know, had lots in it. Then he went to North Grey.

Mr. DEVLIN. On Sunday?

Mr. TAYLOR. No; I was up in North Grey, and the first individual I met there was the same Inspector of Prisons, Mr. Chamberlain. Now, if public officials are to have their heads cut off for having taken a prominent part in the elections, and an offensive part, such as my friend, Dr. Chamberlain, did in the South Leeds election—for he was very offensive to myself both on the street and on the hustings—I ask my hon. friends to apply that rule to their friends in Ontario. What is a fair law to lay down here ought to be a proper one to apply in the local House. I believe in the principle laid down by my hon. friend and colleague, the whip of the Government, but not the doctrine laid down by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) of chopping a man's head off without giving him a trial. The Conservative party will not dismiss any man without first giving him a fair trial, and will not dismiss him for giving his vote and conducting himself as an hon. gentleman ought to in advocating honourably the claims of his party. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, however, cuts a man's head off first and tries him afterwards.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He does not try him at all.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). I have hundreds of charges made, and have not acted upon any of them except those in which the facts were within my own knowledge.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman knows that he has dismissed one gentleman, who was appointed by Order in Council, without giving him a trial at all, and he did that on his own authority. I ask him and the hon. Controller of Inland Revenue to settle the difficulty when they meet at the Council board. Now, if this medicine is to be applied by the hon. gentlemen who are now in power here, surely they will go to their friends in the local government and ask them to give their officials the same medicine. I may refer particularly to a gentleman who receives a salary of $2,500 a year from the people of this province for services in connection with the prisons, but who spent five weeks away from the prisons of the province, remaining in a riding in which an election was going on, and taking an active part in that election—and this while Sir Oliver Mowat was Premier of the province. My hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) referred to the license commissioners and bailiffs, and the work they do in attempting to control the votes of the people. And not only did Sir Oliver Mowat allow these officials to do this work, but he put a number on every ballot, so that if the holder of a hotel license did not vote as he was directed and as the inspectors insisted they should, he could ascertain that fact. He would not do as this Government has done—give the people a really secret ballot, but he kept a check on all so that he might know those who did not carry out his directions, and support his candidates. My hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Casey) made the statement that no license commissioner ever interfered with a man on account of his politics. In this very city of Ottawa, a few years ago, the late John Graham, keeper of the Grand Union hotel, was informed by the commissioners that if he took an active part in the election he would not get his license. His license was cancelled, and only after a letter had been written by the late Alexander Mackenzie was his license restored. I was stopping in the house at the time, so the case came under my own observation. Mr. Mackenzie, who was boarding there also, wrote the letter I refer to, and a permit was granted to Mr. Graham, and the next year he got his license. And there are hundreds of cases all over the country of the license law being made to do duty for the Reform party in the province of Ontario. I merely rose to draw the attention of my hon. friends opposite and of the Minister of Justice (Sir Oliver Mowat) to conduct that I consider outrageous on the part of an officer of the provincial government of Ontario during the last campaign, and to express the hope that when they get around the Council board to discuss this question and agree upon a policy—for it is evident from the statements made by the Ministers that they are not agreed yet—they will decide to commend that policy, it is a fair one, to the attention of their friends in the provincial governments.

Mr. McDOUGALL. If I understand the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) he charged the Liberal-Conservative party with dismissing officials who took part in the elections against that party. If that was the statement he made, I wish to take exception to it with respect to the county I have the honour to represent. This is the thirteenth successive session I have sat in this House, and during that time I have run five elections. During every election I ran I was opposed by Dominion officials, some of them occupying important positions in my constituency. Yet I never asked the Government, or any member of the Government I was supporting, to dismiss any official on that ground. But as the hon. Minister has made the charge, I think it only fair that I should take this opportunity of stating circumstances within my own knowledge as to the manner in which Dominion officials have been dealt with in my county. I could name a number of gentlemen who occupy the Government positions in my county who took part in the elections against me and against the hon. member of the late Government running in the same county.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Did the hon. gentleman say that he would mention their names?

Mr. TAYLOR. I could give the names of several in my county.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I will give the names of some of those I refer to, as the hon. gentleman has asked it. One of these is Dr. McGillivray, Marine Hospital physician at Sydney. Another is Captain Lorway, port warden of Sydney.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Are not both these officers paid by fees?

Mr. McDOUGALL. No. Dr. McGillivray is the physician for the marine hospital. The hon. gentleman knows that that is a salaried position.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Did not the hon. gentleman reduce Dr. McGillivray's salary in order to drive him out?

Mr. McDOUGALL. I did not. I never attempted it. I never heard about it being done or attempted. I would like to know what the Minister of Finance means by asking whether I reduced Dr. McGillivray's salary?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am bound to accept the hon. gentleman's statement, and I do accept it. But he has asked me to explain, so I may say that I have been informed that the effort was made to drive Dr. McGillivray out of office by reducing his salary, and he intimated that if they wished to dismiss him, they might do so, but if they reduced his salary even to $10 a year, he would not resign.

Mr. McDOUGALL. This is the first I ever heard of it. As I said before, I never brought the matter of his conduct to the attention of the Minister of the department nor that of any member of the Government.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Was his salary reduced?

Mr. McDOUGALL. I know nothing as to his salary. I never interfered with regard to it. I never had an application made to me with respect to his salary, so far as I can remember. I will continue the list of names from memory. There is the light-keeper at the west point of Scatterie Island, a Mr. Burke. There has not been an election in which I have run as the representative of the party to which I belong but this gentleman and family have taken a most active part against me. The light-keeper at Low Point has also always been recognized as a strong opponent of the Liberal-Conservative party. I am sure he never voted for me, but he has canvassed and spoken against me and my colleagues. I could name a number of postmasters throughout the county who have also taken part against me. Any person who knows anything about the post office service of the country must know that there must be a large number of postmasters still in office who were appointed by the Liberal party when in power. There are several in my own county who take an active part against me and my colleagues in our election contests in the county. When the Minister of Marine and Fisheries spoke a few moments ago about the dismissal of the light-keeper at St. Paul's Island, it occurred to me that I had gone to visit the department and talk to the Minister about it. I know Mr. Campbell who occupied that position. I know him personally very well, we were on the most friendly terms with each other, and I was induced to approach the Minister, and to express my opinion that perhaps it would be as well not to dismiss him.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I desire now, Mr. Speaker, to say a few words on the subject of the dismissal of the late light-keeper at St. Paul's Island, referred to by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Before proceeding with that part of the question, I beg again to refer to the part that was taken by certain government officials in my county in the several elections I have had the honour of conducting during the last thirteen years. I have already given the names of a number of those officials, and the names of some others have come to my mind since, gentlemen who have always taken an active part in my county against myself, and against the candidates of the Liberal-Conservative party in that county since I have had the honour to be in politics. Mr. Christie, postmaster at Little Bras d'Or, has always taken an active part against the Liberal-Conservative candidate in the county, both Dominion and local; and his sons, acting as assistants, have done the same thing. Mr. Luke Day, postmaster of George's River, has taken a similar part in all the elections that I know of in the county, and he was appointed postmaster some time previous to my coming into this House. This gentleman, I may say, was at a meeting which I was addressing in a certain section of the county during the recent election, and undertook to get up and interrupt me at the meeting in a most insulting manner. I never made a complaint against him, this is my first reference, in public or otherwise, to the fact, and I would not have referred to it to-night were it not for the manner in which those matters were referred to by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Mr. George Ball, postmaster at Ball's Creek, also took an active part against us in our election, and against my hon. friend and colleague when he went to the county for election last winter. Mr. Thomas Fortune, a postmaster at Victoria Mines, took a most active part in all the elections that our party ran in the county since I can remember. Mr. Fortune could not find words bad enough in the vocabulary of slander to use against the Conservative party and the Conservative Government. Still, I never made a complaint against him, although many of my friends had called my attention to it and urged me to bring about his dismissal for his conduct. A man named Michael McMillen, filling the position of postmaster at Rear of Ball's Creek, was also an active opponent of ours. He was dismissed from office some time about a year ago, but not at my request, and not to my knowledge, as I knew nothing of his dismissal until the Postmaster General requested me to make a nomination for the place rendered vacant by his dismissal. So far as I could understand, the ground on which he was dismissed was violation of duty, or some neglect, or some malfeasance of the duties of the office which he held. There were a number of other postmasters who have always taken an active part against me in the county, but I made no complaint against them, and some of them have died. Now, that is my experience, Mr. Speaker, with the conduct of government officials filling the position of postmaster and other positions in our county. Everybody knows that a postmaster can wield considerable influence in his district, because he is in daily communication with the people who come with their mails and for their mails to the office. He has access to the public papers and correspondence that comes open to his office, that is read in his office by opponents of the Government, and so on. In that way he is the medium by which people who frequent his office get a great deal of information they would not otherwise get. A postmaster is therefore an influential man in a community when he takes any part in politics. In my relations with these men, as I stated to the

Mr. McDUGALL.

House before six o'clock, I remember no instance in which I made complaints to the Government, or to any member of the Government, during the 13 sessions I have sat in this House, notwithstanding that they had acted towards me and towards my party in the manner I have described. In regard to the conduct of public officials, I feel that the principle I have always acted upon is a fair one; I feel that a public official has no right to take an active part against the Government under which he is serving for the time being. I feel that if, on the other hand, he takes part beyond voting against the Government whom he has served for the time being, he takes the life of his position in his hands by so doing. That is the view I take of this question.

Mr. LISTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. McDUGALL. Well, I cannot see where my hon. friend gets any comfort from my remarks in view of the way in which gentlemen on the Government side have addressed themselves to this question during this debate. Those officials who took part in the last election, whether on behalf or against the Government of the day, did so in respect of the Government that was defeated on the 23rd June last. Now, I consider that it was quite proper for any official to take part in favour of that Government up to the time that Government ceased to be a government; while on the other hand, I contend that it was highly improper for an official of the Government to oppose that government beyond voting until they were turned out of power, or resigned.

In reference to my remarks made before six o'clock in regard to the conduct of Dr. McGillivray, marine hospital physician at Sydney, the Finance Minister interrupted me, and since then I have been trying to think the matter over which he mentioned, and I cannot recall a single instance in which the salary of Dr. McGillivray was brought to my notice, or that I interfered with it in any respect whatever. Before proceeding further with my remarks, I would ask the Finance Minister if he has come into possession of any facts bearing upon this question which he can give me to refresh my memory in any way after the statement I have already made to the House. If he can refresh my memory by any information that has come to his knowledge since that time, I will be glad to hear it.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I was informed by an authority which I believe to be reliable, that Dr. McGillivray had been appointed to the office mentioned by the hon. gentleman some years ago. But after the change of Government in 1878, efforts were made to retire that gentleman from that position; that no substantial charge could be found to have been made against him ; that he has not been an active partisan—and I wish the hon. gentleman to note that remark as a denial of the statement he made that Dr. McGillivray had been an active partisan—but that with the view of compelling his retirement from the office his salary was reduced. I am not in a position to state here—and so far as that is concerned, I can relieve the hon. gentleman from the matter, as I have been informed of it since the transaction occurred, through the agency and by the representation of another gentleman—but I am not in a position to state that the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall) had anything to do with it. But that Dr. McGillivray's salary was reduced at the time when his duties were not reduced was and is a fact.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I desire to say in reply to the Finance Minister that if there was any attempt made to interfere with Dr. McGillivray in his position, either by a recommendation for his dismissal, or a reduction of salary with a view to his resignation, it was entirely unknown to me, and must have taken place before I had the honour to sit in this House, and that is thirteen years ago. I cannot see in what manner the Finance Minister has strengthened his position by giving this fresh information to the House. The reason why I called his attention to this matter was because I saw him in consultation with the gentleman who opposed my hon. colleague (Sir Charles Tupper) and myself in Cape Breton, and I thought if there was any other information to be communicated in regard to Dr. McGillivray, the Finance Minister would make it known to me if I had made a mistake. I now feel that I did not make any mistake, and the hon. gentleman cannot remind me of any circumstances rendering the position different from that which I presented to the House before six o'clock. As regards this question, my record is before this country and before my constituents with respect to interfering with officials, regardless of whether they acted for or against me. I am prepared to place my record side by side with the record of the hon. Finance Minister in so far as it relates to officials in my constituency and their treatment. I think it is only proper, in view of the discussion which has arisen on this point, that I should give to the House what I know as to the manner in which the Minister of Finance dealt with officials in my constituency. The local legislature of Nova Scotia, in connection with the passing of what is known as the Municipal Incorporation Act, provided that certain county officials whose duties are under the direction of the laws of the legislature should be appointed by the municipal councils. Among those officials are ferrymen. In my county, owing to the number of rivers and bays, there are a large number of ferries. Under the Act the municipal councils appoint the ferrymen and grant them licenses ; there is no other means by which ferrymen can obtain licenses or legal authority to act as ferrymen. The Government of the province, at the head of which has been the present Finance Minister for a long number of years, provided from year to year a grant for the ferries. The county or municipality supplements these grants with aid from the municipality, which is derived from the county taxes. What do you think, Mr. Speaker, the Government of Nova Scotia, at the head of which the Finance Minister was, did with respect to those ferrymen appointed by the municipal councils and appointed under the law and holding their licenses ? The Government entirely disregarded the appointments made and licenses granted to those ferrymen in every instance where the municipal councils did not appoint a Liberal or one who supported the Government of Nova Scotia. Wherever a ferryman was appointed by the municipal council and given a license to conduct a ferry according to the laws of the province, and it was impossible to put a man in competition with the licensed ferryman, the Government cut off the salary of the ferryman ; but where they could put a man in opposition, they gave him the salary and let the man who was properly licensed go. That is the way the present Finance Minister treated officials in that county.

For some time before I became a member of this House I was a representative in the municipal council for the district in which I reside. I continued to be so for some time after I had the honour of a seat in this House. Opposition was put up against me time after time, but without any success on the part of my opponents. The Government of which the present Finance Minister was the head introduced and passed a Bill by which it would be impossible to elect a member of the House of Commons to the position of a municipal councillor. There was only one other hon. member besides myself occupying that position, and he happened to be my colleague from the same county, who represented a district within any of the municipal councils of the province. These are some of the measures to which the Finance Minister resorted with a view to having officials displaced and the will of the people set aside in regard to either Dominion or local officials. I might refer to the Act passed by the hon. gentleman's Government which disfranchises Dominion officials as regards voting at local elections. That to my mind is a very unreasonable and unfair Act, for under it a large number of people in the province are disfranchised because they happen to hold Government positions. With respect to the dismissal of the late keeper of the station at St. Paul, a return was brought down to this House in response to an address in March, 1894, and in this return I find the following correspondence :—

House of Commons, Canada,
Ottawa, March 10th, 1893.

Hon. John Costigan, P.C.,
Acting Minister Marine and Fisheries :

My Dear Sir,—I beg to call your attention to the fact that Samuel C. Campbell, lightkeeper of St. Paul's Island, in the county of Victoria, has ever since his appointment in 1874 taken a very active, violent and outspoken part in politics, and more particularly since the Conservative Government came into power in 1878.

I may say that since that time, as opportunity offered, he has been using his position and influence, and any patronage in connection with his office against the Government and its supporters.

At the time when the relations between our country and the United States were strained, he was then loud in his denunciations of the Government and its supporters, and actually, as I am informed, sold or supplied to American fishermen out of, I am informed, Government stores, against the laws then existing.

In December, 1890, he wrote to one John J. McCharles, who had then been lately elected councillor for one of the municipal districts of the county of Victoria, strongly urging him to assist the Liberals in the council, and thus secure a majority for the Liberals, and, after strongly urging him to do so, he wrote as follows, among other things :

"It would greatly assist Mr. Ross for the Dominion. You can scarcely understand how largely interested I am in Mr. Ross's election. This is becoming an important station, and if I had a friend at headquarters I would get $200 added to my salary.

Then I am getting old and would like to leave here altogether. If Ross was returned, I could be pensioned, as in a few years I shall be thirty-five years in the service. So you see it is almost life or death to me who is returned by the county of Victoria at the next Dominion election. Then again, I would not give up the situation, unless I was assured a friend would get the place, and if it would suit you to take it, I could make you pretty sure of it, as I know of no one I would so soon see in my place as yourself, or one who could fill it better. John A. Macdonald is a sworn enemy of mine, and if he is again returned for the county, will do his utmost to have me dismissed, and I am sure you would not like to see me and my family set adrift without a pension. Now, my friend, you have no personal interest in the matter that could be better served on the Liberal side than on the Tory side. Free trade is going to carry the day everywhere. I see by the papers that the Americans have gone free trade in Congress by one hundred majority at the election last month. It will be so in Canada, and the Liberals will be in power before long."

The Mr. Ross he refers to is the Hon. William Ross, who was a candidate and contested the general election for the Dominion in 1891, and at the by-election in 1892 for the county of Victoria. I am the John A. Macdonald referred to. I may say that his reference to my having any desire to turn him out of office at that time was false, to his knowledge. I never asked for his dismissal, and never thought of doing so up to the time I saw his letter to McCharles, from which I have taken the foregoing extract.

I now think, if the foregoing be true, of which I have not the slightest doubt, and which I am prepared to prove, Mr. Campbell ought not any longer be in the employ of this Government.

I am, &c.,
(Sgd.) JOHN A. McDONALD.

Department of Marine and Fisheries,
Ottawa, 31st May, 1893.

S. C. Campbell,
Supt. Humane Establishment,
St. Paul's Island.

I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 8th instant replying to the charges preferred against you by Mr. McDonald, M.P., and with reference to the statement that garbled statements were given from the letter you wrote to Mr. McCharles. I have to request you to state in what respect you have been misquoted or your letter garbled. I have also to request you to inform me as to the subjects on which you wrote twice to Mr. McCharles in November and December, 1890.

(Signed) WM. SMITH.

St. Paul's Island, 26th June, 1893.

Wm. Smith, Esq.,
Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries,
Ottawa.

Sir,—I beg leave to acknowledge receipt of your letter dated 31st May last, No. 9805, just received. In reference to Mr. McDonald's charges against me, my letter to Mr. McCharles had reference to the municipal council. I have no copy of the letters or I would inclose them. I understand Mr. McDonald is in possession of the originals; let him produce them and they will read for themselves. I may here state that I am in the Dominion service for over twenty-two years, and during that time I tried honestly to perform my duty, according to the best of my ability, and never yet had a charge preferred against me until Mr. McDonald made his charges. Since my appointment to this island nineteen years ago, I have taken no part whatever in politics and seldom left this island at all; when I did so, it was on purely business matters. I am happy and proud to say, without fear of contradiction that I can number among my warmest friends a large number of the leading Conservatives in Cape Breton, all of whom would, I am sure, be sorry to have me removed at the request of Mr. McDonald. Feeling confident that the Government will deal justly with me,

I am, &c.,
(Signed) SAM. C. CAMPBELL.

Baddeck, 4th December, 1893.

William Smith, Esq.,
Deputy Minister Marine and Fisheries,
Ottawa.

My Dear Sir,—I received a letter from Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper asking me to forward the letter written by S. S. Campbell to John McCharles in December, 1890, and which is now the subject of investigation. My house with all its contents was destroyed on the 24th November, 1891, including that letter.

As soon as I discovered that it was destroyed, I wrote to Mr. Bertram, the editor of the "North Sydney," asking him to return me a typewritten copy of it I had sent to him during a controversy I had with the Hon. Wm. Ross. I told him that I had lost the original, and he told Mr. Campbell that it was lost. I was not aware of Mr. Bertram's telling him so until I saw it stated in the Stellarton "Trades Journal," a Liberal paper printed at Stellarton, N.S.

Mr. Campbell knows very well that the original letter was lost by fire in December, 1891.

I am, &c.,
(Signed) JOHN A. McDONALD.

Baddeck, 23rd December, 1893.

Sir C. Hibbert Tupper, P.C.,
Minister of Marine and Fisheries,
Ottawa.

My Dear Sir,—I am in receipt of yours of the 20th instant, and in reply may say that this extract contained in my letter to Mr. Costigan is a true extract from Mr. Campbell's letter of December, 1890, to Mr. McCharles.

In that part of it referring to the free trade majority in the States, he at first wrote 1,000, but put his pen through the last cipher. In the same way he wrote the word "office," and put his pen through it and wrote "station" over it. In the line in which the word "service" occurs, there was written over it these words, "20 under the Dominion and 9 under the old Nova Scotia Government." These words were almost illegible, and I believe they were corrections made by him. Every other letter, word and sentence are the same as in the original letter. I compared the original letter with the extract in "Hansard" of July 13th, 1891, page 2169 of Vol. 2, and found it to be as stated by me.

John McCharles, warden of the county, to whom the letter was written; Thomas S. McLean, county treasurer; John McDonald, collector of customs, both of Baddeck; Donald McQuarrie, of Middle River, fishery overseer, and Alexander J. McDonald, of Inlet, with others, were present when I compared the original letter with "Hansard." I am confident they will corroborate what I write. I sent written copy to Bertram from Ottawa. After I discovered the loss of the original, I applied to Mr. Bertram for the copy, but he stated that he either destroyed or mislaid it. I sent others to him also, to whom he gave the same answer. I was not then aware that Mr. Bertram and Mr. Campbell were such warm friends, and I have every reason to believe that he informed Mr. Campbell of the loss of the original. Mr. McPhee, solicitor of North Sydney, informs me that he told Mr. Bertram that the original was lost, and that he believes Mr. Bertram informed Mr. Campbell and his friend of the fact.

I am, &c.,
(Signed) JOHN A. McDONALD.

Baddeck, C.B., 27th December, 1894.

Sir Charles H. Tupper, P.C.,
Minister of Marine and Fisheries,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—I am in receipt of a note from John A. McDonald, M.P., who is to be absent for a few days, requesting me to forward to you a statement of what I may know regarding a letter written in December, 1890, by S. C. Campbell, of St. Paul's, to Warden McCharles, of South Gut. In compliance with his request, I beg to say that early in January, 1891, Warden McCharles called at my office, and in the course of conversation remarked that he had recently received a very flattering letter from Mr. S. C. Campbell congratulating him on his election as councillor and eulogizing his abilities, and asking him to support the Liberal party in the council, advising him that it would be to his interest to do so as the Liberals would carry everything before them at the ensuing elections, and that as he, Mr. Campbell, was getting old, he was anxious to retire from St. Paul's, and that McCharles could get the situation if he wanted it. On my expressing surprise that Mr. McCharles should have the temerity to write such a letter, and to make promises that he was not in a position to fulfil, Mr. McCharles offered to send me the letter for perusal, that I might see and know its contents. In a few days I received the letter, and it remained in my possession for a long time, and I became thoroughly acquainted with its contents. Extracts from this letter were read in the House of Commons in the session of 1891 and the Grit papers charged that the extracts were garbled. Those of us who had seen the original letter knew that such was not the case, and took the earliest possible opportunity of comparing the original letter with the extracts from it as published in "Hansard," and found that they were exactly the same with the exception of a very few erasures and interlineations which had evidently been made by the writer of the letter, and did not make any material difference between the text of the letter, and the "Hansard" report of it. A number of gentlemen belonging to the county were present when the comparison of the original letter and the "Hansard" was made. Speaking from memory, these were present: John A. McDonald, M.P., John McDonald, collector of customs; Alex. J. McDonald, trader; Donald McQuarrie, fishery officer; Warden McCharles, Alex. C. McDonald, John Patterson and Thos. McOulay, councillors, myself and some others that I cannot call to mind at present. I may say in conclusion that I am familiar with S. C. Campbell's signature, and have no doubt that it was his that was attached to the letter in question.

Yours truly,
(Signed) T. S. McLEAN.

After that correspondence comes a certified copy of the Order in Council, which is as follows:—

Privy Council, Canada.—Certified Copy of a Report of a Committee of the Hon. the Privy Council, approved by His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the 17th January, 1894.

On a report dated the 28th September, 1893, from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, stating that he received a communication from Mr. John A. McDonald, Member of Parliament for the county of Victoria, province of Nova Scotia, an extract of which is appended hereto.

The Minister states that it appears that Mr. Samuel C. Campbell, keeper of the humane establishment on St. Paul's Island, wrote the letter complained of, which contains an offer of a Government office as an inducement for a vote at a municipal election, a scheme for improperly inducing the executive to increase a Government officer's salary, and discloses that this officer was endeavouring to influence public sentiment against the Government of the day.

The Minister is of opinion that Mr. Campbell should no longer be continued in Government service, and he therefore recommends that Mr. Campbell be dismissed and his appointment be cancelled.

(Sgd.) JOHN J. MCGEE,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

As hon. gentlemen will see, this correspondence extends over a period of about a year, and I might say that during the time it was taking place, Mr. Campbell called on myself on more than one occasion to ask me to intercede on his behalf with the Government to prevent his dismissal. Mr. Campbell and myself have been strong personal friends for many years, and I had the warmest feeling for him. I took him on his own statement with regard to the part he had taken, and, notwithstanding that he admitted pretty nearly what is contained in this correspondence, I undertook to advise the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries not to interfere with him. I did so on account of the personal feeling I entertained towards Mr. Campbell. I did so because it was not my practice with respect to the patronage of my county to deal in that manner with the officials who took part in elections against me. I repeated my opinion, I think, more than once to the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I subsequently recommended granting to Mr. Campbell a superannuation allowance, but I was informed that on account of his dismissal he could not be superannuated, under the rules governing the granting of superannuation. I regretted personally the dismissal of Mr. Campbell; but in view of the claims made by the hon. gentlemen who now sit behind the Government as to what should constitute a sufficient reason for dismissing an official, I cannot help saying that I consider that the conduct of Mr. Campbell comes very strongly within the reasons which they advanced as a sufficient cause for dismissing a public official who had taken part in an election. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to occupy the time of the House any longer except to say this. Before I came to this meeting of Parliament, I was informed by several people in my constituency that it was the intention of the Liberal party, having got into power, to dismiss every official who had not voted for them in the recent election. I was told further that one of the gentlemen who undertook to run against my hon. colleague and myself in the recent election, had left the county before I left home, to come to Ottawa with a list of those officials who were to be beheaded by the Government of the day. This may or may not be true. I make the statement as I got it before leaving home. I want to say this to the Government, that I know of no instance in which a public official in my county went to any unreasonable extent in canvassing or otherwise on behalf of my hon. colleague or myself; and the extent to which the officials there went, within my knowledge, I consider quite proper. That is, I consider it quite proper for an official of the Government to go to the polls and poll his vote; I consider it quite proper for him to speak in a reasonable manner, or to use a reasonable argument in support of the Government he is serving.

Mr. LISTER. He is serving the people.

Mr. McDOUGALL.

Mr. McDOUGALL. He is serving the people, certainly; but I say it is a very dangerous thing for a public official to criticise the Government under whom he is serving. I say it is a dangerous thing, because I do not believe he can discharge the duties of his office properly or with that faith that should be expected from him towards the Government that directs the manner in which he shall discharge the duties of his office. Therefore, I consider it quite improper for a man to take an active part against the Government he is serving under. I also consider it quite proper for him to use reasonable arguments and reasonable means to aid his friends to support that Government, so long as he does not use any misrepresentations or any other wrong or improper means. I do not believe it is proper for a man who is a Government official to take the public platform to abuse and vilify and misrepresent the opponent of the party who is carrying on the Government. Under these circumstances, I only want the Government of the day to treat the officials in my county as the previous Government has treated them since I have had the honour of a seat in this House. If any official, no matter whether he is a supporter of mine or not, goes beyond what I say I consider to be proper and reasonable conduct on his part at the time of an election, then I say, let him take the consequences; but if an official simply goes to the poll and votes, or simply attends a meeting and takes part in it to a reasonable extent, then I say that is not a sufficient cause for turning him out. Rather than to act upon such a principle as that, I would say that it would be the duty of the Government to disfranchise every official. With these remarks I shall not take up any more of the time of the House. I hope that in dealing with dismissals, the Government will deal as fairly with the officials of my constituency as the late Government dealt with them during the time that I have had the honour to sit in this House.

Mr. DEVLIN. I may say that I agree with a little and disagree with not a little of what has been said by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. He has made the statement that he has heard it is the intention of the Government to dismiss every official who did not vote for a candidate of the Government during the recent election in his county. I venture to contradict that statement at once and to assure him—and in this I am confident that I express the views of the Government—that no man will be dismissed because he has voted. I think that the assurance was given out this afternoon that the conscientious convictions of men shall be respected by this Government, but there is a big difference between voting and taking an offensive part in an election. The hon. gentleman tried to draw some special distinctions, but I think he was mistaken in the manner in which he put them before the House. Complaints have been made to the Government, and will be made to the Government again in regard to members of the civil service, not because they voted but because they appeared upon the public platform, and, in the speeches which they addressed to the electors from the platform, were abusive, and denounced the leader of the Government as a traitor to his race and his faith; and because they absented themselves for weeks and weeks from the departments here in Ottawa, drawing pay all the time from the Government, and, as was pointed out this afternoon, also drawing pay perhaps from the sources that employed them as well. I admit that the case which the hon. gentleman has just cited, that of S. C. Campbell, is one of the saddest that could be brought before the House. But the dismissal of Mr. Campbell was not made by a Liberal Government but by the Government which the hon. gentleman supported so many years. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that I think he put forth an unwholesome doctrine when he said that the civil servants should not only vote for the Government but should be allowed to go out and advocate the claims of the Government. The civil service is not the special service of the Government, but the service of the masters of the Government, and the civil servants are the servants of the people. They are paid by the people to do the people's work, and are not paid by politicians to do political work for any political party. They are paid to do the work of the people, and their place is not out upon the public platform but in the departments to which they are appointed; and when a civil servant comes out upon the public platform, and attends committees and makes himself offensive by taking part, in a very marked and pronounced manner, in a campaign, he should be dealt with just as Governments are dealt with, and punished by the people. That is the doctrine which should hold. It must not be imagined for a moment that all the dismissals which have taken place since this Government have been in office, are due to political reasons. Far from it. A number of gentlemen's services have been dispensed with, I believe, in the Department of Public Works. Were these gentlemen dismissed for political reasons? No, but simply because they should never have been there, simply because there was no work for them, simply because they were idle and drawing pay for work which they did not perform. And if the stories that are in circulation are to be believed, Liberals were dismissed just as freely as Conservatives. At all events, it is notorious to-day that many of those who were removed from the Public Works Department are declaring that they are Liberals; but so far as that goes, I need not dwell upon it, because there is not a Tory in the whole civil service to-day. I am not going to deal with the cases brought up by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies). I think those cases have been all justified. As far as I am personally concerned, I know that if at any time during the next five years I should recommend to the Government the advisability of dispensing with the services of public servants, I shall, in this House, when the Government are challenged, be only too happy to justify the course of the Government. I am bound to accept the statement which has just been made by the hon. gentleman with regard to certain officers, and I do accept it, and I hope he will accept my statement as well. My statement is this, that I am informed that Mr. John Peters, of whom he spoke, is keeper of the Low Point Light, that Mr. Peters has been non-partisan in the elections, that he has taken no active or offensive part in them, and that at no time did he speak from any platform or make any canvass.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I did not say that he did.

Mr. DEVLIN. Mr. Peters was appointed before confederation. I believe that his father-in-law was appointed to the same office by the British Government. At all events, during the last two elections this man, who was supposed to be a violent partisan, who was left in his office through the generosity and magnanimous spirit of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, is supposed to have voted Conservative, if he voted at all, and has not been credited by the Liberal party of Cape Breton as being a Liberal. I take up the hon. gentleman's next point, that Mr. James Burke, of Scatterie, was an active partisan.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Most violent.

Mr. DEVLIN. The information which I have to give to the House is that Mr. James Burke, of Scatterie, hardly ever leaves his home to vote. Now, a man who will not even take the trouble of going to the poll to vote cannot be a very violent partisan. The next one the hon. gentleman mentioned was Captain Lorway. He has been looked upon as one who was not a violent partisan. I do not think it can be said that even in this last election, he appeared upon the public platform or attended Liberal committees or canvassed or made himself in any way offensive to the Conservative party of Cape Breton and the Conservative Government.

Mr. McDOUGALL. He was active enough to drive a horse and a sleigh to the poll all polling day.

Mr. DEVLIN. When did he do that?

Mr. McDOUGALL. At a very recent election.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Did you have snow down there on the 23rd of June?

Mr. DEVLIN. My hon. friend who has just interrupted me has stated something

I was going to state. My hon. friend well knows that the statements I have just made are perfectly accurate, and that during a great number of years Capt. Lorway took no part in the elections.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I say he took an active part in elections. The hon. gentleman knows nothing of what he is talking about. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman to give his authority.

Mr. DEVLIN. If my hon. friend will give me his authority. I will be only too happy to give him mine.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I am the authority myself. Having represented the county for eighteen years, I am in a position to know the facts.

Mr. DEVLIN. I have in my opinion even a better authority, the hon. gentleman's opponent.

An hon. MEMBER. He is not here.

Mr. DEVLIN. But he is not far from here, and he is a good authority on this subject. He tells me that the late election was the first in which Capt. Lorway took any part and the only part he took was to express his opinion, not upon the public platform but privately. And what was the treatment meted out to Capt. Lorway? He had the Port Wardenship of Sydney. Some years ago the office was divided and that portion which virtually brought no salary was left with Capt. Lorway and the other and remunerative position was given—to whom? To a violent partisan of the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall). With regard to his charges against Dr. McGillivray, who is the physician to the Marine Hospital at Sydney, my information is to this effect: At the date of his appointment Dr. McGillivray received a salary of $400 a year. Later on, when Messrs. McLeod and McDonald represented the county of Cape Breton—two friends of the hon. gentleman—the salary was reduced to $200. Generous treatment, this; some of the generous treatment the hon. gentleman was speaking of. And still, Sir, Dr. McGillivray was non-partisan and took little or no part in the elections.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I am sure the hon. gentleman does not wish to misrepresent me. I was not referring to the time before I had the honour to represent the county.

The FINANCE MINISTER. This is the record of the Conservative party on the question.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I do not go so far as to deal with the record of the Liberal-Conservative party; I was dealing with my own record.

Mr. DEVLIN. We will deal with that afterwards; and it is worse than the other. My information is that this salary was reduced from $400 to $200 by gentlemen supporting the party to which the hon. gentleman belongs. That cannot be denied. The hon. gentleman will not attempt to deny it.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I know nothing about it.

Mr. DEVLIN. And yet, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman undertook to speak for nearly an hour about Dr. McGillivray. And this is the manner in which Dr. McGillivray was treated. It is true that a portion of the salary was restored to him. Was it by my hon. friend (Mr. McDougall)? No, not at all. It was when Mr. Dodd represented the county. The real facts are these—gentlemen opposite were most anxious to get this position from Dr. McGillivray in order that they might replace him with one of their friends. But Dr. McGillivray told them that he would not resign if they reduced the salary to ten cents per year.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Dollars.

Mr. DEVLIN. No; ten cents a year.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The Finance Minister said $10 a year.

Mr. DEVLIN. The Finance Minister is a good authority—$10 a year.

Mr. FOSTER. If you always obey as well as that they will be satisfied.

Mr. DEVLIN. I think it will not be difficult to obey such gentlemen. It will not only be not difficult, it will be pleasant, because it will be following in the line of duty. As I was saying, Dr. McGillivray's salary was afterwards restored to $300. But was that a salary to give to a man in such a position? Everybody who has visited Sydney and is acquainted with the duties which Dr. McGillivray must perform knows that those duties are onerous. Dr. McGillivray has charge of the sick seamen who come from Cow Bay, Glace Bay, Victoria mines, and, in fact, all those portions surrounding Sydney. He has charge of the Marine hospital at Sydney, and not a day in the year passes when his medical attendance is not required at that hospital. And, Sir, I venture to say that there are Tory physicians down there receiving from the Government for services less than those performed by Dr. McGillivray, salaries of from $700 to $800 a year. So you perceive that when this boasted generosity is honestly analysed it presents a very different appearance. I venture the statement that the iron heel of Tory despotism, whether political or commercial, is felt in no part of Canada so severely as in the county of Cape Breton.

Mr. McDOUGALL. How do you know?

Mr. DEVLIN. I have travelled through Cape Breton. I know that no man employed on the Intercolonial Railway during the last two years was free to call himself a Liberal. I know that if he called himself a Liberal that moment his services would be dispensed with.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I challenge the hon. gentleman—

Mr. DEVLIN. Let the hon. gentleman keep his seat.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I challenge the hon. gentleman to name one man dismissed within the last thirteen years on political grounds.

Mr. DEVLIN. I know well that the authority of the hon. gentleman is very great; it is so great and is so thoroughly respected that even the Intercolonial Railway bows to him, and stops at his very door for from twenty minutes to half an hour to do him honour. They not only pay respect to him, but perhaps they pay a few odd dollars into pockets that are not far from his own.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I do not want the hon. gentleman to misrepresent me in this House. I want to say that I defy him to find one single syllable written or spoken by me asking that the trains should stop at that place. The train stops there because it suits the public interest to have it stop there.

Mr. DEVLIN. The train stops; and I would like the hon. gentleman to stop for a little while too. The hon. gentleman cannot deny the statements I have made.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I deny that I had anything to do with the train stopping at that point.

Mr. DEVLIN. The hon. gentleman knows the facts, and he knows better than I do why the train stops there.

Mr. MILLS. He gives the reason.

Mr. DEVLIN. The hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Mills) comes from Nova Scotia, and he must know the reasons. I will let him give them afterwards.

Mr. MILLS. You admit that the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall) knows better than you do.

Mr. DEVLIN. I would never admit anything that you admit.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DEVLIN. I was in error, Mr. Speaker. I was called to order once and I do not want to be called to order a second time. I only wished to say that I would accept none of the hon. gentleman's admissions. But what I have stated is known not only to members of this House but throughout the county of Cape Breton, and I stand by that statement. Not only has despotism of the worst kind been exercised by representatives of the Government in the county of Cape Breton, but the system prevails throughout the whole province of Nova Scotia. Travel where you would, you could hardly find, before the 23rd June last, an employee belonging to the Intercolonial Railroad that could call himself a Liberal. And, Sir, not only were they brought to the polls, but they were driven to the polls. Since we are upon this question, I venture to state that not only the employees of the Intercolonial Railroad, but the employees of the departments here were employed for the special purpose of sending out political literature, free. Take the county which I represent; that county was flooded with letters, signed by whom? Signed by my opponent. Stamped by whom? With a three-cent stamp of this country? Not at all; stamped by and sent free by the then Minister of Agriculture, sent free by the then Minister of Railways and Canals. And the country was robbed, not only robbed because of the stamp, but robbed because of the time which was taken up by the employees of the Government in that department in sending out that literature. I know instances where employees of the Government were obliged to go out and work against their will in favour of the party in power. And we hear of the generosity displayed by the late Government! There was no generosity displayed by them, there was cruelty displayed by them, tyranny displayed by them, and now they make a lame attempt to defend it.

I come now to a statement made this afternoon by my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) in regard to certain licenses given to hotel-keepers by officers of the local government in Ontario; and as well as I could understand him, the statement was to the effect that if a hotel-keeper worked against the local government of Ontario, he was most likely to lose his license.

Mr. CLANCY. Hear, hear.

Mr. DEVLIN. I am glad to hear my hon. friend cheer. I want to know if the same hon. gentleman, the member for Bothwell, did not make on the floor of the local House the same charge a few years ago; and I want to know further more if the Premier of Ontario at that date, who is now Minister of Justice, did not at once say that if the hon. gentleman could make good his charge, the inspectors and the commissioners would be dismissed; and he never could make good his charge. My hon. friend knows perfectly well that his statement is unfounded. If he had made good the charge which he made on the floor of the Ontario legislature, he knows well that the Premier of that province would have acted up to his word, and that justice would have been done in the matter.

Mr. CLANCY. I am afraid the Minister of Justice would scarcely care to be bound by the statements made by the hon. gentleman. I say that on no occasion did the Minister of Justice make any such a statement as mentioned by the hon. gentleman. I can tell my hon. friend another thing, that the Opposition at that time made these charges in the House and asked for a committee to investigate them, and they were refused.

Mr. DEVLIN. The statement I made was this, that the hon. gentleman, upon the floor of the Ontario legislature, made a charge similar to the one he repeated this afternoon, and that the Premier of Ontario then and there gave him an opportunity of proving the charge which he made, and promised that if he could make it good, those men against whom it was made would be dismissed. I know whereof I speak. I have taken the trouble to find out the facts, and I give them to the House. Will the hon. gentleman say that in the province of Ontario to-day the license holders are confined to the Liberal party? Will the hon. gentleman pretend that in this city of Ottawa, which is in that province, only Liberals hold licenses? I venture the statement that if he will look into the facts he will find that the licenses of this city are held in a great majority by Conservatives. I am perfectly sure that if he goes to the city of Toronto, which he knows better than I do, he will find that the great majority of the hotel-keepers there are Conservatives.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh, oh.

Mr. DEVLIN. Yes, I make that statement; eye, and with respect to the town in which the hon. gentleman lives, I make that statement, and I know perfectly well that I am right. Now, my hon. friend the whip of the Conservative party, the member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) wanted us to see that Dr. Chamberlain should be dismissed. I have taken the trouble to look up the records of the Department of Justice, and I could not find the name of Dr. Chamberlain in it. Dr. Chamberlain is not an officer of the Department of Justice, does not belong in any way to that department; still, that hon. gentleman spoke nearly an hour this afternoon in explaining to us the case of Dr. Chamberlain. I would like to know from my hon. friend whether, if his friends got into power to-morrow in the province of Ontario, they would retain the services of Dr. Chamberlain? Not much. Dr. Chamberlain would go, and nobody would find fault.

An hon. MEMBER. Why?

Mr. DEVLIN. Because of the doctrine which the hon. gentleman is putting before the House. Why, Sir, he refers to cases belonging to the provinces. How cruel he was to some of his own colleagues! How cruel he was to the member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain), the late Attorney General for the province of Quebec. When the Hon. Honore Mercier, who was Premier of that province, fell from power in 1893, were those appointed by him and who were supposed to have been friendly to him, retained? Far from it. The political axe was applied at once, heads disappeared as fast as they could. I know that even in the county which I represent, during the late contest the registrar of the county, a man holding a high office, a judicial office, appeared upon a public platform and spoke as strongly as he could in favour of hon. gentlemen opposite. If the hon. gentleman finds fault with one party in the province of Ontario, let him find fault with his friends in the province of Quebec. But no danger of him doing so. And does he forget what occurred only 18 years ago—and these are the facts with which we have to deal. We have not to deal with acts of the Ontario or the Quebec governments, but we have to deal with matters belonging to the Government of the Dominion. Does he forget that when Alexander Mackenzie's Government was defeated, although he had been in power for a little more than four years, and had made very few appointments, the very first act of the Government which succeeded that of Mr. Mackenzie, the very first act of his own political associates, was one which was not an act of generosity? Did we then hear of those beautiful sentiments, those magnanimous sentiments, of justice and generosity which we have heard poured out to us here this afternoon? No, Sir. But when they found men who were supposed to entertain Liberal opinions, they chopped off their heads; and when they could not suit their own political friends by making ordinary dismissals, they passed Acts repealing other Acts which enabled them to dismiss officials by the hundreds; and, Sir, within a short time afterwards, they re-enacted those Acts in order to appoint their own friends to the same offices. Let them recall that history, history as sad as ever was recorded in any country, history as sad as that which was related here this afternoon by the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall), when he referred to the case of Campbell, Poor Campbell, dismissed by his own friends. Sir, I hope the Government, I am sure that the Government, will deal with this matter in a generous spirit, in a just spirit. But so far as I am concerned, I will not ask mercy for a man who has gone about and black-guarded the Government of Canada; I will not ask mercy for a man who has gone out and abused that Government, canvassed against that Government, vilified that Government in the newspapers, and upon the public platform. Sir, I say that the men who compose the civil service of this country must be men who will respect the Government of Canada. They must be men at all events in whom the Government can have confidence, otherwise it would be impossible for the Government to treat with the service or the service to treat with the Government of Canada. I am satisfied that the statement which was made by my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Lister), this afternoon, is a correct statement, and a correct representation of the position of the Liberal party. We have not fought for offices; but what we have fought for is the triumph of the great principles which constitute the basis and foundation of the Liberal party. We have fought for tariff reform, and tariff reform we will have. We have fought for the reform of the civil service, and the reform of the civil service we shall have. We have fought for the improvement of our trade and our commerce, and the improvement of our trade and commerce we are sure to have. We have fought for retrenchment and economy, and before we are many months older those hon. gentlemen will perceive that the time of extravagance and of corruption came to an end on the night of the 23rd of June last, when the people of this country, understanding their duty, placed in power the Government now occupying the Treasury benches. With respect to the charge made a moment ago by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), I know as a matter of fact that when he made his several charges in the Ontario legislature, the then Premier of the province, who is now Minister of Justice, informed him that if he would name and designate one official who had ever interfered in the manner indicated, the hon. gentleman would be given a committee of inquiry.

Mr. BRITTON. It seems to be pretty nearly agreed that the policy which should be pursued is not to interfere with those whom the law does not disqualify from voting at the elections, but that some action should be taken with respect to those who are active partisans, who act on committees, who appear on public platforms, and who are ordinarily called active political campaigners. If that is so, then I think we are pretty well agreed as to what ought to be done in respect to those who so acted during the last electoral campaign. I, for my part, agree pretty nearly, as well as I understood the remarks made, with what was said this afternoon by the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale), and I appreciate what that hon. gentleman said in regard to the difficulty of dealing with cases of this kind, because no doubt difficulty will arise on the question to what extent a person has become an active partisan. It seems to me we have wasted considerable time this afternoon, perhaps I shall be accused of wasting a little more, in dealing with this question of Ontario officials and those who took part in the last election while holding office under the Provincial Government. The Ontario Government has certainly acted very liberally with their officials. It is very well known that, although the Ontario Reform Government has been in power a very long time, there are more Conservatives in the employ of the Provincial Government than there are Liberals in the employ of the Dominion Government. There is no doubt about that; and those Conservatives in the Ontario Government have been allowed to do, both as regards speaking and acting, just as they liked at elections. I am aware of the Act disfranchising Dominion officials in provincial elections, but I am speaking of active campaign work done by Dominion officials. An hon. gentleman this afternoon, in speaking of Dominion officials included the division court clerks and bailiffs. I will ask hon. gentlemen, and no doubt they will be candid in the matter, to say if in their experience, they do not know that there are more Conservatives holding positions as division court clerks and bailiffs than there are Liberals.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. BRITTON. Even in the constituency of the Whip of the Opposition, a Conservative, a worthy man, occupies the position of division court clerk, and I simply give that as an instance where an office holder has not been disturbed notwithstanding action taken against members of the Ontario Government party at elections; in this way very great liberality has been shown towards them, and I am sure they would be as willing as any hon. members to have some well defined rules adopted in matters of this kind. If the discussion to-day should result in bringing about that result a good end would be accomplished. I may say in regard to my own constituency that there are unquestionably very great difficulties to be met. We there have not only the officials of the penitentiary, but a large number of officers in the Inland Revenue Department, at the Custom-house, in the post office, including letter carriers, and further there is the battery and other Government employees. So it is hard enough for any Liberal to stand a show of victory if these men vote,—and no one can complain of their voting,—but when they enter on the canvass, and abuse not only the candidate and his friends and supporters but members of the Government, then it requires, as happened at the last election, some question which will sever the party ties that generally hold men together in order that a Liberal may carry an election there. It amounts to this, that if those men are allowed to act at coming elections as they did at the last election, no Liberal can be elected. All we ask is that those men should have done to them just what they expected when they were taking part in the election; at all events that some action should be taken in regard to them because of their conduct. Take the action of the officers of "A" Battery. The men of that battery have no interest in Kingston except as regards drawing pay from the Government. They are on the voters' list as income voters, and some of them were put on the list unfairly. These men are marched in a body to the polls, and the polls were blocked until all these men had polled their votes. When any conversation was had with the men they were silenced by the peremptory command of the officers. You know your duty. I do not ask for any action to be taken, but conduct of that kind should be spoken of, so that the Liberals in the House and the people of the country should know the difficulties against which the Liberals had to contend at the last elections throughout the whole of the province. In regard to the case put this afternoon with respect to the deputy sheriff's conduct in Grey, I desire to state that the deputy sheriff is not an officer either of the Ontario or Dominion Governments, and in that case he was merely acting as clerk for the returning officer. For the purposes of the election and as returning officer the sheriff was a Dominion Government official. He is an Ontario official, and the policy laid down and acted on by the Liberals is that it is better that elections should be conducted under some person who holds a judicial position, either sheriff or registrar, and that if those officers are employed the elections are more likely to be fairly conducted. Unless you understand whether this terrible work was done according to the account we had of it this afternoon, the deputy sheriff was either sheriff's officer appointed by the sheriff and paid by the sheriff, or he was the officer of the returning officer, and therefore perhaps to that extent may have been a Dominion official. I do not know anything of course of the facts of what he did. Mr. Speaker, if the House is agreed in regard to what ought to be done, then good will be accomplished by this discussion. Before I take my seat I want to call attention for a minute or two, to another class of officials that it seems to me this Government ought to deal with. There are two classes that they ought at all events to say some thing to and have some rule in reference to them. There are in the first place, those who sat and voted in the last Parliament and who held offices in their pockets. These men were told during last session that if it was true they had offices in their pockets and were therefore violating the spirit of the Independence of Parliament Act, they would be remembered if new men came into power. Now, Sir, they did have their offices in their pockets. They boasted themselves that they had the promises of these offices, and one or more of them said they had the promise for two years previously, yet they sat during two sessions under these conditions. These promises have been redeemed for them, and these gentlemen now sit in very comfortable and valuable offices. It seems to me that some action ought to be taken in reference to some of these at least. In stating this I do not wish to state anything against them as men, nor anything against them in reference to them in their offices since they held them. I only mention what everybody knows, and that is, that during the last session of the last Parliament there were men who in violation, at all events of the spirit of the Independence of Parliament Act, sat here and voted. There is another class against whom I have nothing personally to say—especially not against one of them—but I refer to the class who were active campaigners in the last election doing a great deal of most effective election work, and taking part in the elections on different platforms, and these men since the last election have been appointed to very lucrative offices. It seems to me the question is germane to the subject under discussion. Notwithstanding the difficulties I had to contend with in my campaign, I for my part wish that every man shall be justly and fairly dealt with. I want to see that if an officer has been doing what we have agreed upon this afternoon he should not do, he should be asked to give up his place. Many of these men must themselves admit that they have taken an active part, because as has been stated this afternoon, I have heard it said by officials in my hearing: I do not care for your office, I am an officeholder it is true, but your party are rebels and traitors and everything that is bad, and I do not want to hold office under such men. I think every hon. gentleman in this House will agree that persons who have acted in that way towards Liberal candidates and the Liberal party—and we are not rebels but loyal men—can expect nothing else but that their heads should come off.

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to prolong the discussion upon the question of the dismissal of public officials who took an active part in the recent campaign, nor do I wish to speak at length as to the policy which hon. gentlemen opposite intend to adopt respecting that matter. However, I cannot allow the opportunity to pass without making reference to the position which hon. gentlemen opposite have assumed in laying down the policy which shall now guide them in dealing with these officials. It has been said that it is not germane to this discussion to refer to the conduct of Ontario government officials during the recent elections. But, in my humble judgment we can by reviewing and comparing their conduct, have a better opportunity of examining into the sincerity of the professions which the supporters of the Government are giving expression to now. The officials of the Ontario government have been the appointees of the political friends of hon. gentlemen opposite, and these hon. gentlemen in their respective constituencies have not hesitated to take advantage of the services of these officials. I think I am correct in saying that there is not on record in any department of the provincial service, a protest made by a single gentleman opposite against the employment of Ontario officials in the work of advocating their interests. Under these circumstances we may look with some suspicion, at least, upon the new found zeal of hon. gentlemen of the Liberal party, for the purity and efficiency of the public service of the Dominion. The officials of the province of Ontario are public officials in the same sense that the officials of the Dominion are. They are paid from the public funds of the province of Ontario contributed to by Liberals and Conservatives alike. The taxpayers of the province of Ontario have a right to demand from these gentlemen opposite, if they are honest and sincere in the expressions they profess on the floor of this House, that they shall use their influence with their political friends, who have been in power in Ontario for twenty years, to see to it, that the great majority of the officials of that province shall cease to be the active agents and political partisans and supporters of hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches, and of their friends who are in power in Ontario. For twenty years past the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite have ruled in Ontario, and during that long period they have made hundreds if not thousands of appointments. Many of these appointments are excellent ones; they are gentlemen who do their duty faithfully and efficiently and who do not act in a partisan manner at election times. But I may say, Mr. Speaker, and I say it without fear of successful contradiction, that in every centre of population in Ontario there are to be found in the provincial service, as violent partisans as can be found in the public service of the Dominion, or of any other province in the confederation. It is hardly consistent for hon. gentlemen opposite to take the position they do to-day, and to state that public officials should only vote—we are thankful that they are permitted even to vote—and that they should not take any active part in the elections; while at the same time the political fortunes of those gentlemen had been helped by the active and untiring exertion of officials who are appointed by the Liberal administration of Ontario. Take the case of West Toronto in the recent elections. A public servant of the province of Ontario was selected as the standard bearer of the Liberal party in that constituency. He was a paid official when he accepted that nomination—I am sure that neither my colleague nor myself had any objection to his being our opponent—but I point to that case, because since the time that gentleman became a candidate for a seat in this House, the gentleman who was then the Premier of the province of Ontario has become a very important member and holds a very important portfolio in the Cabinet of the Prime Minister of Canada. Let me ask: what view did the present Minister of Justice entertain as to the propriety, or the impropriety, of a public official of the province of Ontario becoming a candidate for a seat in the House, and taking an active part in the campaign? Did he offer any objection to it? No, Sir. After the campaign had closed and the electors of West Toronto had rejected the candidate of hon. gentlemen opposite, how was he dealt with for his violent partisan conduct on that occasion? Was his head cut off? Was he treated as hon. gentlemen now propose to treat some Conservative officials of the Dominion, who took an active part in the recent campaign? Not at all. He resigned his office—a lucrative and most important one in the province—the day after he received the nomination for West Toronto, and the day after he was defeated for West Toronto he was reappointed to that office. And that, Sir, is the condign punishment that was meted out to the gentleman who opposed my colleague and myself, and who tried to obtain the representation of West Toronto. Sir, I am bold to say that if hon. gentlemen will examine the lists of delegates who composed the conventions of the Liberal party in the city of Toronto, they will find in those lists the names of many gentlemen who occupy positions in the civil service of the province of Ontario; and before they can expect the country to believe that they are sincere in their profession that the civil service should not be composed of political partisans and heelers, they should see that where their party have control of public offices, the officials should be models of public propriety—voting as their consciences dictated, but abstaining under all circumstances from partisanship or from taking an active part in political elections. The statement of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) has been questioned as to the state to which the liquor traffic of the province of Ontario has been brought by partisanship being introduced into it. I can tell hon. gentlemen opposite that not on one occasion only, but on several, on the floor of the legislative assembly of this province, the Government were challenged to appoint a commission to examine into the operation of the liquor license law. Not only have the commissioners and inspectors acted as partisans, but the mouths of the licensees have been closed in many cases, and they have been afraid to exercise their franchise freely lest their licenses should be taken from them when the time came to renew them on account of the heavy hand laid upon that traffic by the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite. I entirely concur in what the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) has said, that it would be well, in the interest of the public service of the Dominion, that some clearly-defined line should be laid down as to how far public officials should have a right to interfere in political contests. I am one of those who believe firmly that the civil service of the country would be better than it is if there was not so much activity displayed by public officers at election times. Those officers are public servants, paid by the people of all classes and creeds, and they should first and foremost attend to their public duties. But the public will not believe that gentlemen opposite are honest in their condemnation of civil servants who are or have been Conservatives when they refuse to condemn civil servants who are Liberals, and who are as violent partisans as can be found anywhere. I will not take up the time of the House any further, for I have already made arrangements to leave on the night train. I will heartily co-operate with hon. gentlemen opposite in supporting any measure that will remove the civil service of the Dominion from the political arena as far as it is possible to do so; but I repeat that it would be unfair and unjust, and would be playing a dangerous game, now that hon. gentlemen opposite have got into office, if they should introduce the guillotine, and attempt to cut off the heads of those who, simply exercising their franchise as they had a right to do, voted want of confidence in them, and stood by the Conservative party with whom they had been identified before they accepted office, and in whose policy they still believed when in office. If hon. gentlemen opposite proceed fairly in this matter, they will not be found fault with by those who sit on this side of the House; but if they attempt to decapitate public officials by wholesale merely because they did not approve of the policy of those hon. gentlemen, they will make a mistake, and be guilty of an act that will undoubtedly sooner or later recoil on their own heads.

Mr. INGRAM. Mr. Speaker, I will occupy the time of the House only a very few minutes, and in doing so I wish to say that I entirely endorse the remarks of the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke). I also endorse the latter portion of the speech of the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton), in which he said that great care should be taken in dismissing officials who are supposed to have taken part in the last Dominion election. In the beginning of his remarks, however, he said that he was afraid that the time of the House was wasted in discussing this question. I do not think that the time of the House has been wasted in discussing it, and why? The day before yesterday a question was asked the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) and in consequence of the answer given on that occasion, my hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) found it necessary to-day to bring this question before the House. In the question asked the day before yesterday, I find these words:

Have their services been dispensed with? If so, upon what ground, and what notice, if any, was given them that their services would be no longer required?

The answer to these two questions was this:

The agent, being a political partisan, who actively interfered at the general election, the department, in the public interest, deemed that a new agent in whom they could have confidence should be appointed.

Mr. CLARKE.

Now, what has the hon. Minister said to-day? He has said that he dismissed these gentlemen because they were active partisans. Now, Sir, personally I have no doubt the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries would not intentionally do an injustice to an employee. But, Sir, that is not the point we have to consider now. The point we have to consider is this, whether or not the head of any department, simply by noticing any Dominion employee taking part in any election, should have the power, without a proper investigation, the report of which would be available to the hon. members of this House, to dismiss that employee. That is the principle which I understand is discussed here to-day. Some heads of departments may not take the view of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. They may not be quite so careful to do justice to the Dominion employees who have taken an active part against them in the election. Now, there are three or four different classes of Dominion employees. There are members of the civil service who are paid sufficient salaries to keep them all the year round. There are employees who receive $100, $200, $300 or $400 a year, and who are engaged in other lines of business. There are a large number of employees of that kind in this country who, while receiving small salaries from the Government for certain services, decline to sacrifice their interest in political affairs, to keep their mouths closed, or to abstain from taking part in elections. That rule applies to Reformers as well as Conservatives. Now, it has been said here to-day that some established rule should be laid down. I am one of those who believe that there should be some established rule laid down. We have heard Liberal members say what they believe should be done, but we have yet to hear one word from the hon. First Minister as to what his policy is on this particular question. It is important that the civil service of this country should be placed in the very best possible position. Reference has been made to the manner in which the civil servants of Ontario take part in elections. It is a well-known fact that they do take an important part. But I have no intention of taking up the time of this House by complaining of the conduct of some of the Ontario officials. It has been stated that the hotel-keepers of Ontario are largely Conservatives, and hon. gentlemen opposite have endeavoured to base an argument on that fact. I say, however, that one of the curses of the Liquor License Act of Ontario, is, is this, that there is a large number of Conservatives engaged in the liquor traffic in that province who are coerced by Ontario officials to support Liberal members. And why? Because the supposed secret ballot of that province is not really a secret ballot, and the hotel-keepers are told that if they support Conservative candidates, their vote will be found out, and they will not receive a license in the future. So far as the officials of the Dominion Government are concerned, I agree with the hon. gentlemen in this House who have taken the stand that if a Dominion employee or an Ontario employee, or any other employee, paid out of the public fund, takes any part on the political platform of this Dominion, or in any of the provinces, he has no right to be continued in the employ of any government. I believe that an employee has a perfect right to vote for whatever candidate he chooses; but if he goes beyond that, then I say that his conduct should be open to investigation, and that investigation should be had in a straightforward and honest manner, and those who are interested in the dismissal of these employees should have the opportunity of seeing the records in connection with that investigation. This matter was discussed at the first session of the last Parliament, and it is now being discussed in the first session of this Parliament. Why is it discussed today by a number of our friends on this side? Because the word has gone forth that a large number of Dominion employees are to have their heads cut off, and it is important that the people and the employees of this country should know whether that report be true or not. If it be true, we ought to know whether these employees are to have the chance of defending themselves or not, and I should be very happy to hear the hon. First Minister state what his policy is on this important question.

Mr. HACKETT. I think it only due to those men who have been dismissed from office that their cases should be brought before this honourable House and discussed. I regret that the agents of the Fishery Department, whose cases were brought up by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) Messrs. Noonan and Davies, should have been dismissed, as they have been for many years in the employ of the department, and have always given great satisfaction to the people in the discharge of their important duties. The people of Prince Edward Island are very much interested in the winter service between the island and the mainland. These gentlemen were acting as agents of the department, and it is just as necessary that these agents at that point should be experienced and able men as it is necessary that the captain in charge of a ship should be a man of skill and experience. The people of the island feel that the maintenance of this winter service is of the greatest importance. Under the care of those gentlemen, that service has been carried out efficiently and well, and if others with less experience are appointed in their place—able though they may be—it will take them some years before they can obtain equal experience to assist in the maintenance of that service. I therefore regret, on account of this important service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, that these men have been dismissed. I know that the hon. Minister himself desires very much that that service should be maintained efficiently, and I think it was not from any personal feeling that he dismissed these men, but simply because of the pressure that was brought upon him by political partisans to exercise his power of dismissal. There is another matter to which I wish to refer, and that is the dismissal of the fishery overseer for Prince County, P.E.I. I asked a question the other day with regard to the dismissal of that gentleman, and I was told by the Minister that Mr. McBride, the overseer, was removed to promote the efficiency of the service. I asked also if any one had been appointed in his place, and the hon. Minister replied that no appointment had been made. Then I asked him if Mr. McBride had been appointed by Order in Council, and he said, yes.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Was he dismissed without Order in Council?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No.

Mr. HACKETT. I saw Mr. McBride a day or two before he left Prince Edward Island, and he told me that he had received a letter, not from the department at Ottawa, but from the agent of the department at Charlottetown, Mr. Lord, no doubt, acting under instructions, informing him that he had been dismissed because of the change of Administration. That is the statement made by Mr. McBride to me a day or two before I left the Island. I could scarcely believe Mr. McBride. I said he must have been mistaken, that a reason of that kind could never have been given. You were appointed by Order in Council. I said, and I have always believed that a servant of the Dominion who was so appointed should be dismissed by Order in Council, and that before being dismissed he should have an opportunity of having the charge made against him investigated, and be given a fair trial for his life. In this case Mr. McBride assured me that the letter simply said it was on account of the change of Administration he was dismissed. I say that that is the introduction of the spoils system. We have in the Dominion, in the service of Canada, as fine, able, intelligent and prudent body of citizens as you can find in Canada. To what is that due? It is owing to the permanency of the service. It is owing to the fact that these men were appointed because of their ability to fill those offices, and, having been appointed, they have been continued in office, and it is a serious matter indeed that the permanency of the service should be disturbed and those gentlemen dismissed at the word of the Minister, and without a moment's warning. I say that will lower the standard of the civil service and have a bad effect upon the interests of the country at large. The Minister referred to the efficiency of the service and, as I said before, inefficiency would be a good reason for dismissal. I know that the hon. gentleman would desire to protect the fisheries of Prince Edward Island. We have on the shores of that island a very valuable fishery—the lobster fishery, which annually brings in about half a million dollars. It is most important in the interest of the whole province that that valuable fishery should be protected. Knowing that the hon. Minister desires to protect the fisheries I can quite believe that he did not make this dismissal of his own free will, but that he must have acted under extreme political pressure to dismiss the only active officer he had in the midst of the fishing season when the greatest vigilance was required.

THE MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Will the hon. gentleman tell me whether in all the years this gentleman was an officer of the department he ever prosecuted a single case except one in which he was found to be entirely wrong and had to withdraw the prosecution, or ever made a report to the department?

MR. FOSTER. What has that to do with the question?

THE MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. member is speaking of this being an active man who faithfully discharged his duties. Now the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hackett) was inspector of fisheries, and this man was an overseer under him. I ask him can he recall a case in which this gentleman acted efficiently in the prosecution of offenders?

MR. HACKETT. Yes. I am well acquainted with Mr. McBride. For eight years we have been associated in the protection of the fisheries. He was not required to report to the department, but to the inspector his superior officer. But he has made reports to the department and these remained in the records of the department.

THE MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Was it not in the county for which this gentleman was overseer that there were flagrant, notorious violations of the law?

MR. HACKETT. I can assure the hon. gentleman that no such thing as open and flagrant violation of the law took place under Mr. McBride. But it is going on at present. I was going on to say that the hon. gentleman made a great mistake. I know that he would not do such a thing intentionally, because he desires as much as any person to protect the fisheries of the province. Therefore, I say, political pressure must have been brought to bear upon him, as it would be contrary to his own good judgment to cut off this officer's head in the middle of a season when he should have been closely attending to his duty.

MR. HACKETT.

Take the case of the Dunk River, one of the most important fishery streams in the province. Mr. McBride resided on the banks of that river and it was his duty to protect the fishery there during the trout season, and the run of the salmon in the fall. But his services were dispensed with and no other man was appointed. And what is the result? That river is being netted day by day, until there is practically nothing left. Here is what a local paper in Prince Edward Island says on this subject:

The action of the new Liberal Government, in cancelling the commissions of the fishery officers who were charged with the protection of Dunk River, has already had a serious result on that river as a fly-fishing resort. No officers have yet, we are credibly informed, been appointed to replace those whose services were lately dispensed with, the reason being, we understand, that the candidates for the vacancies are about as numerous as the fish in the river now are, and the meetings called to select wardens have ended in disagreement and total failure, so far as any practical results are concerned. Meantime the river is being ruined by netting, and for angling it is at present almost valueless. For the past three or four weeks, during which time the river has been without protection, netting has been carried on wholesale. It is said that smelt nets are being used, by which the small fish, as well as the large ones, are taken, and it will be years before the stream, even with the most careful and strict supervision, will recover from the injury it has sustained this season. Under the watchfulness and care of the late officers, Mr. McBride and his assistants, instances of netting were rare; now, however, with no protection, the stream is being netted at a rate that must soon, if persisted in, leave it with trout as scarce as doubloons on the Queen's highway.

Here we have the result of the dismissal—the illegal dismissal, as I believe it to be—of this officer at a time when strict supervision was required for the protection of the river as well as other important fisheries on the coast.

Now, Sir, with regard to another matter that came up, the dismissal of employees on the railways. Two men who were working as trackmen on the Prince Edward Island Railway, and who have been so employed for many years, were dismissed. No cause was assigned. The Minister said they were dismissed because they were not satisfactory men. I am well acquainted with both of them. They are young, active men, accustomed to hard work and willing to work, and they have been performing their duties to the entire satisfaction of their foremen. To take these men off is a dangerous proceeding. The men who have taken their places have had no experience in railway work. It is most important that the track should be in good condition. The slightest carelessness or neglect may occasion an accident, and lives may be lost. It has not been the practice in Prince Edward Island to dismiss men occupying such positions, without a moment's warning. Some section men have been removed, but they were first granted an investigation, charges were preferred against them, which charges were inquired into and only those men dismissed who were found guilty of neglecting their duty. But men were never dismissed before in this manner. This marks the introduction of a vicious system which must tend to lower the tone of the civil service. The hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) spoke of dismissals in 1878 and said that when the Government of the late Sir John A. Macdonald came into power there were wholesale dismissals, men being turned out simply because they were Liberals. My experience is very different from that. I was a candidate in 1878 in the Conservative interests in Prince County. My most active opponent, except the candidate on the other side, was a gentleman who occupied the position of sub-collector of customs in the town of Alberton. He attended and spoke at meetings and canvassed energetically for my opponent and went all over the county with him doing everything he could to gain support for him. I felt much annoyed, as also did my friends. They said: This is a public officer, and he should stay at home and attend to the duties of his office. He should not go through the country and act the part of a political heeler. When I came to Ottawa I went to the Minister of Customs and he said to me, I can do nothing in the matter, you have no charges to lay against this man. If you can show me that this man has neglected his duty by attending these meetings and taking part in politics, I will have him dismissed, but otherwise I cannot dismiss him. I replied that I had not been watching the work of his office, and could not tell anything about it except that I knew he had taken this active part in politics. I was so annoyed about the matter that I had a private interview with Sir John A. Macdonald, the leader of the party in this House at that time, and Sir John told me the same thing. He said: This is a free country, we allow a man free speech and a free vote. Although we want to keep our civil servants as efficient as possible, and attending to their duties as well as possible, yet we are not going to close their mouths or to deprive them of the rights of free men. But he said, as the Minister of Customs said, if you can establish a case, give us one instance where this man neglected his duty, where the duties of his office were not faithfully performed on account of his taking part in politics, he will be dismissed; but I am not going to dismiss him because he exercised the right of a British free man. So nothing was done in the matter. Now, Sir, in 1873, in the province of Prince Edward Island, when the Mackenzie Administration came into power, and when that province came into confederation, it was believed that the gentlemen who occupied public positions in that Island would be reappointed to the civil service of Canada, but they were nearly all dismissed, and so we had on the Island the spoils system. Now, the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) also made some remarks this evening, saying that there were very few men now in the service who were appointed by the Mackenzie Administration. Sir, that is not the case. The hon. gentleman did not seriously consider his statement. I know that in the province of Prince Edward Island we have railway agents, we have postmasters, we have collectors of customs, who were appointed by the Mackenzie Administration, and who have been retained in office from that time, although they are strong Liberals, and some of the most rabid opponents I had in my last election were railway station agents appointed by the Mackenzie Administration. But those men are being retained in office because they are good officers, they faithfully discharge their duty, and therefore it would be improper to remove them. The hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) made an attack upon the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall) because the railway train happened to stop where that hon. gentleman lives. He says that the hon. member's word is so powerful on that Island that he made the railway trains stop at his door. Now, that is not an argument to use in this House. The railways of the country are run for the accommodation of the people, and if the hon. gentleman happens to live in a town or village where the railway stops to accommodate the people, I think it would be a very extraordinary thing for the Government to run that railway five miles further on in order not to stop in his town. That was an absurd argument to use, and I do not think the hon. gentleman considered what he was saying. I, therefore, trust with regard to these civil servants that none will be dismissed until charges are proved against them. But where you find men are actively and intelligently discharging the duties of their office, leave them there, do not remove them; and if you remove them, do so only after investigation and after proof that they have neglected their duty. By doing that you will promote efficiency in the service, and by not doing it you will degrade the service to the level of the American system, and with every change of Government you will have a change of the service.

Mr. YEO. I rise for the purpose of correcting a statement of the hon. member who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Hackett). He has said that no officials had been dismissed in Prince Edward Island without their conduct having been inquired into. Now, he is quite mistaken in that respect. The hon. gentleman must remember that shortly after the election of 1891, two competent men who were employed on the railway there, were dismissed without any reasons being assigned, and without any inquiry of any kind. They were capable men, had been a long time in the employment of the railway, they gave good service, and no complaint was made against them ; but because they were suspected of voting for the Liberal candidates they were dismissed.

THE MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Hear, hear.

Mr. YEO. Those are only two instances. The hon. gentleman has also referred to the sub-collector at Alberton, who was appointed under the Mackenzie Administration, and who, he says, ought to have been dismissed. Well, he may have been a strong Liberal, perhaps a partisan, but the hon. gentleman says that he could not be dismissed without some cause being assigned. Well, I do not think they were very long in making out a good reason, at least assuming they had good reasons for dismissing this gentleman. He was only allowed to retain office for a very short time before he was dismissed. Then there is the case of the section foremen on the railway who were dismissed in 1891. They were told one evening that after the next evening their services would be no longer required. Although I was one of the candidates in that county, I did not know how those men voted, but I knew they were inoffensive to either party, and fulfilled their duties well. That is the only reason I have heard assigned for their dismissal. We know as a fact that in Prince Edward Island no Liberal was employed to even shovel snow on the railway in the winter. A train may be blocked there and men may be required to shovel snow, but if they are supposed to have Liberal proclivities, they cannot get work. The system which has obtained in Prince Edward Island has been disgraceful to the Government. That is a well known fact to Liberals and Conservatives alike, and it is condemned. I may say, by every respectable Conservative who knows what has taken place there in this respect.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would like to ask whether the hon. gentleman was referring to the dismissal of the fishery officers of 1891 ?

THE MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, but to the section foremen on the railway.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It is with great diffidence, after so many gentlemen much more experienced than I am in public affairs have dealt with this question, that I venture to submit a few ideas to the House on this subject. I was much pleased with the way in which the Controller of Inland Revenue, the member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) and one other gentleman on the same side of the House, dealt with this question. It seems to me that, in the first place, we have to consider it in the light, not of the interest of any particular party, be it Liberal or Conservative, not in the light of the interest of any office holder, not in the light of any influence which may be brought to bear upon the members of this House, but entirely in the interests of the civil service of Canada. Looking at the question from that standpoint, it seems to me, with all deference to gentlemen more experienced than I am, that the fact of the payment of the public money to public officers for their services, ought not to enter very largely into the question as to how far these gentlemen should participate in election contests. It is not the money of the Liberal party or of the Conservative party which is paid these gentlemen for their services ; it is the money of the country, and the fact that these gentlemen worked for either party, so long as they worked openly, honourably and fairly, ought not to weigh against them if, at the same time, they do not neglect their duty as public officers. It seems to me that those gentlemen who are in the civil service of this country ought to have the same right, as other electors not only to vote, but to work during elections, subject to certain limitations which I shall endeavour to submit to the House. In the first place, I entirely agree that if any such official is guilty of any corrupt or dishonourable conduct in an election contest while working for one party or the other, such conduct ought to have only one result. In the second place, if, for the purpose of supporting one party or the other, he neglects his duty in any way as a public servant, and employs the time for which the country has paid him in furthering the interests of either party, it seems to me that such conduct is reprehensible and ought to be punished. I would be willing to go a little further than some of the hon. gentlemen opposite and have a further limitation, namely, that if an officer is in confidential relations with a Minister or with a superior officer, he ought not to take such part in an election as would interfere with the discipline of the office which he holds. I would be prepared to concede that ; but it does not seem to me that a consideration of that kind would apply in the way the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries seems to indicate it would apply in his judgment. I can well understand why it is impossible that a Minister of the Crown should meet on a public platform a subordinate officer in his department for the purpose of discussing public questions with him, but it does not seem to me that a public officer discussing in an honourable and straightforward manner a public question of absorbing interest with a gentleman who afterwards succeeds to office as a Minister of the Crown ought necessarily on that account to lose his office. I should think, indeed I believe, that the hon. Minister is too large a man to deal with any question of this kind in a spirit of revenge, although he did use the expression that the whirligig of time brings its revenge.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not in regard to an officer.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). No, and I should hope that the hon. gentleman would not deal with a question of that kind in such a spirit, although if one were inclined to give literal meaning to some of the expressions that he used such a meaning might be extracted from his language. But I do not believe for a moment that the hon. gentleman had any such idea in his mind. If you say that the question of the payment of public money to an officer is to control questions of this kind, where are you to stop? I am a taxpayer of Nova Scotia, and interested in the money paid to the employees of the local government of that province. I have just as much right to complain when those gentlemen go out and fight political battles against me as if they were employees of the Dominion Government doing the same act; but I think it would be a little difficult to carry out the scheme of dismissing such officials for such reasons so long as they conduct themselves fairly and properly in advocating views which they are endeavouring to put before the people. For example, at the last Dominion election in Halifax a very prominent officer of the local government of the province, who is a warm personal friend of my own, although a political opponent, took the stump against me. I would not for a moment suggest that if the Conservative party came into power in local politics in that province that gentleman should be dismissed for that reason, but if you applied some of the arguments put forward before the House to-night, the necessary and logical result of those arguments would be that that gentleman should be dismissed from the office he holds. I do not go that far. Unfortunately, as I think, in some of the municipalities, if not all the municipalities of Nova Scotia, and even in the city of Halifax, politics enter to a greater or less extent into municipal affairs and the result is that the officers of those municipalities and the officers in the city of Halifax, to a certain extent, I think, are selected on political lines. I as a ratepayer in the city of Halifax am interested in the moneys which go to pay the officials of that city, and I think I may say, if I can at all rely on what has been told me by gentlemen in whose veracity I have every right to believe, that the officials of the city of Halifax did work and did use the civil machinery to some extent against me during the last Dominion election. I would not venture to say that those gentlemen, so far as any expression of their views is concerned, who worked against me in that contest, should suffer in any way, even if the administration of the city of Halifax should be selected on party lines and be Conservative instead of largely Liberal, as it is at present. I venture to say that if the question of an official's politics is to be considered when the new government make up its mind whether or not it will dismiss him from office, or if a government ventures to deal with these questions from the standpoint only of an official's political opinions, or if an official has given expression, even on a public platform, to his views on any public question—if these things are to control in determining whether or not a man is to remain in the service, we shall have approached very closely to the American spoils system, which I for one hope will never be introduced into Canada. I venture to submit to the House a statement made by a very able man with respect to the effect of that system throughout the United States. He says—I am reading from Mr. Leckey's latest work, "Democracy and Liberty":

The evil of the abominable spoils system in the United States is not so much the incompetency of the officers—an American's adaptiveness enables him quickly to learn the routine duties of an office—nor in the waste of public money (because in a community so rich in productive power as the United States the amount which speculation can take from it is a burden easy to be borne)—but the main evil is that the spoils system demoralizes both parties, and makes contests which should be for principle mainly for plunder.

And to show how far they seem to be ahead of us in England on this question, I may take the liberty of reading another sentence from the same work of that writer. He says:

The gigantic corruption which exists in America under the name of the spoils system has not taken root in England, though some recent attempts to tamper in the interest of party with the old method of appointing magistrates in the counties, and some claims that have been put forward by members of Parliament to dictate the patronage in their constituencies, show that there are politicians who would gladly introduce this poison germ into English political life.

Sir, I should welcome the day in Canada when this question of patronage would occupy much less of the time of members of Parliament than it does at present. I know from what has been said in this House, that a good deal of the time of members on the Government side must be taken up with matters of this kind, and I for one sympathize a great deal with them on that subject, and particularly with my colleague from Halifax (Mr. Russell), a constituency in which a very great amount of patronage exists. I also venture to believe that a good deal of pressure which may come upon the Government with regard to dismissals, comes, not so much from members of Parliament who would be content, in many instances, to allow matters to remain as they are, but comes from certain elements of the party which are not, in all cases, the very best elements. I shall welcome, as I have no doubt many of us would welcome, the day in Canada when members of Parliament and Ministers of the Crown would have more of their time to devote to the business of the country, and would require to devote less of their time to matters of this kind, which ought to be dealt with in Canada more upon the lines on which they are now dealt with in England. Mr. Speaker, I have not attempted in these remarks to be very practical so far as my own constituency is concerned with respect to these matters, and I do not intend to do so at present. I hope and trust that the new Administration will deal with this question in a way which will be in the best interests of the country, and inexperienced as I am in public life, I venture to suggest to these gentlemen, that if they do deal with these matters in the best interests of the country, they will also, at the same time, deal with them in the best interests of the Liberal party as a party. I believe that, politically speaking, it would be far better for the Conservative party, that the Liberal party in Canada at the present time should make wholesale dismissals, but I would regret that such a step should be taken, because, in the end, it might result—we are weak, human nature is weak—it might result in reprisals in the future. I for one should most sincerely deplore a condition of affairs in Canada which should have any such results as that. It would be bad for the public service, it would be bad for the public interest, and it would have a most injurious effect on public opinion and on public morals.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words upon this subject. I was very glad, indeed, to hear the remarks that fell from the Treasury benches upon this important question, because all over Canada, after the 23rd of June, there were evidences that some persons scattered all through the Dominion, thought that we had entered on an era when the old policy, the English policy of a permanent civil service would be abandoned and the spoils system adopted. When that idea was expressed out west, I ventured to say myself that I had confidence that with the present Prime Minister at the head of affairs, and with other members of his Cabinet whom I knew in authority, there was no danger whatever of such a degrading step being taken. The language which we have heard to-night from leading members of the dominant party, and from leading Ministers, is calculated to give assurance that the worse course is not likely to be adopted. Mr. Speaker, it is only right to say, in defence of a body of men—the major part of whom we may assert with confidence earn well whatever money is paid them by Canada—it is only just to say that it is cowardly, it is wanting in fairness, to speak of our civil servants, as some gentlemen speak of them, without an opportunity of reply being given them on their part. To speak of these gentlemen, because they are in the employ of the public, as though they are not to have opinions of their own, or are men to be driven into a certain course by the mere idea of self-interest—as coarse and vulgar minds are apt to speak of them—is to do a great injustice to a body of men, whether in the permanent service or in the outside service, who are a credit to Canada. Any view that would denude these men of their political manhood, any view which would necessitate Canadian civil servants taking a lower position as citizens than their fellow men, is not merely unjust to the civil service, but it is unjust to Canada, and inimical to the public welfare generally. When we look at the action of civil servants, in the elections, we meet with cases like this: Here is a man who, for instance, has held certain opinions. He has been appointed on the recommendation of a politician connected with the dominant party, or we will suppose connected with the party out of power. He has been appointed before the dominant party came into power. The election is on, and this man not merely votes, which it is admitted he has a right to do, but he expresses his opinions in private, which it is admitted he has a right to do. It has been admitted to-day from the Treasury benches that an official has a perfect right to exercise his citizenship in the fullest possible manner, and not merely to vote, but to express his opinions as a free man in a free country, and the only barrier put around his liberty of action is: You are not to become an offensive partisan. It is not that he is not to be a partisan, not as I understand, that he is not to advocate his views, but he is not to offensively advocate them. Well, Sir, in defining what "offensive" is, the Minister who has to do it should certainly, from the point of view of justice, consider the whole circumstances of the case.

I can easily understand what the course of a Minister should be in the case of a man who says, Not merely am I to have the advantages which belong to the civil service, but I am also to have the privileges which belong to public life, and who insists on going into public life. I do not think there can be a doubt as to how that man should be treated. But take the case of a man who has been appointed to office on the recommendation of a public man. I do not care now whether he works for the dominant party or for the party that is trying to storm the seats of power. Provided his action is merely an expression of what might be called exuberant zeal, provided he has only shown himself zealous for the cause of the person he has tried to serve, surely no Government or Minister who has any justice in his heart would punish any man in such a position as that. I may say that I have very little interest in this question personally, because I do not think that any of my supporters in Western Assiniboia erred in any way that will call for a large stretch of mercy at the hands of any Minister. But I have heard of a case of dismissal of a man, a teamster, who had been accustomed to team from the Indian Office to Regina, and who never took the least part in public affairs so far as I ever heard. I think that was a very unworthy circumstance. Perhaps it is susceptible of an explanation not so sinister as that it was actuated by political motives. I may say to the Government that in the North-west Territories we have not applied the strict rules of patronage to the public service. I have had something to do with the patronage there, for something like twelve years, and during those years men have got into the service who were Liberals, who were outspoken, and properly outspoken, in their advocacy of Liberal views; and we never resented their zeal or their activity or their outspokenness, and never cancelled their appointments. In the election of 1891 some of my Liberal friends who were in the public service did not scruple to show their leanings or to express their opinions; but that never caused the least political resentment in my bosom, nor did it mitigate or militate against our friendship. It is a matter of great gratification that such sound opinions should have fallen from such leading statesmen on the Liberal side as we have heard to-night, because the fact entirely throws to the winds the views I had heard freely expressed outside. Now, Sir, reverting to what my own knowledge enables me to speak of in regard to the conduct of the Conservative party towards those who had taken part in elections, when I ran in Haldimand in 1878, officials there were active against me, spoke on the platform against me; and I may tell you what happened when I heard that we had won. You will remember that the first little shower showed a loss for the Conservatives. One Conservative seat after another went, and when I got to Cayuga and heard how things were, I merely said, "We are scooped." But the next morning, when I learned that we had won, I at once drove to Caledonia, where I met a man who was as active against me as one public man could be against another. I saw that he was very much afraid of what might happen to him, and I said to him, "You may go in peace; if every hair in your head was an offensive official not one of them should fall." Not a man in Haldimand was dismissed for taking action against me in that election, and so far as I heard there was not anything like a vengeful course pursued by the predominant party in 1878. So far as my own experience and my own action has gone in the North-west Territories, we have not applied any strict rule. We have been very liberal towards the Liberals there.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did not know you had any Liberals in office there. I thought they were all Conservatives.

Mr. DAVIN. Then you do not know much about the North-west Territories. One of the leading government officials in Regina is one of the most active—I am not saying improperly active—and one of the most astute and enlightened Liberals in Canada.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Who is he?

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. Minister knows who he is as well as I do. He is a personal friend of my hon. friend. But during the time I have had something to do with the patronage there, two gentlemen, strong Liberals, who were active against myself in the last election, and also in 1891, were appointed, and I did not object to it. I may say that I myself gave the patronage to leading Liberals in Regina. In one department the whole patronage was given to Liberals. I just say that because I think it is desirable that it should be known what course we have taken in the North-west Territories.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman might be accused of trying to seduce the allegiance of those gentlemen.

Mr. DAVIN. Oh, no. The best answer to the suggestion of my hon. friend is this, that I never said a word to either of the gentlemen I speak of, and in fact it would be useless, because they are very strong and very zealous Liberals. Mr. Speaker, I merely rose to make these few remarks on a subject that is of great importance, and to express my gratification at the sound views, true to the best traditions of Canada, true to British traditions, and I believe in the best interest of the country, which have fallen from the Treasury benches this evening.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, as the hour is late, and a large number of members have gone home over Sunday, and as the subject under discussion evidently arouses a great deal of interest, I beg, with the indulgence of the First Minister, to move the adjournment of the debate.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I cannot agree to that.

Mr. BENNETT. In the somewhat protracted debate upon the Address from the Throne, a large number of hon. gentlemen complained that the manufacturers of this country were not being properly treated, that no pledges were made and no intention evinced by the Government as to the position they proposed to take on the question of the tariff. It will now be, I think, a further most reasonable complaint to make that while no intention is evinced by the Government as to what they propose to do with the tariff, a large class of the community, the office holders of the Dominion, have had some intimation of what the Government propose to do in their regard. This has not been so much perhaps evinced by words as by acts, and it is only fair perhaps on this occasion to the civil service of the country—and when I say civil service, I do not refer alone to those who may be in the employ of the Dominion in the different offices in this city, but to the civil service throughout this whole Dominion—that we should draw attention to the fact that they have had intimations given to them, to at least a certain extent, as to how the Government propose to deal with them. It is a most serious thing that men who have worked in the civil service for years and made it their only means of livelihood, should be summarily dismissed because they may have taken some part in the elections which have just taken place. And I think it would be a matter of consolation to the service to know that the intimation which has been made to-day from the back benches of the hon. gentlemen opposite, that to the victors belong the spoils, does not convey the sentiments of the Ministers. The hon. Minister of Public Works has not seen fit to express his intentions or ideas as to how he proposes to move in the premises, but if the newspaper reports are correct, he has, at least by his actions, shown how he is disposed to deal with those in his department whose services he considers should be dispensed with. Not being conversant with the facts, I will not allege that the hon. Minister of Public Works has seen fit to dispense with the services of clerks in his department by reason of their political proclivities. But if the reports are correct, I think the hon. Minister of Public Works has not done what he should have done in the premises. He has sheltered himself behind the defence that these officials were dispensed with, not on investigation by himself but by reason of reports made to him by those who are their superiors, but who are subordinate and inferior to himself. I contend that that is a very unfair principle to follow and very unjust with regard to those employees who have been thus dismissed. It must of necessity follow that if one of his chiefs be actuated by animus or ill-will towards a subordinate and has vested in him this very large power, he has every opportunity of venting his spleen on the officials under him, and I think that the principle adopted by the hon. Minister of Public Works in this regard is not one that should commend itself to the sense of fair-play of any one. I would compare his action in that regard with the statement made to-day by the hon. Controller of Inland Revenue (Sir H. Joly de Lotbinière). I think I was an honourable and manly statement which was made by him, and one which will commend itself to both sides of the House and the public at large. The Controller of Inland Revenue announced to-day that his policy would be this: If any complaint were preferred against any one in his department, it would be his duty and he would make it his duty to at once inquire in a most searching manner into the matter. It is a principle which should be conceded by all to be fair and proper and which we must all admire, that no man should be first convicted and afterwards tried. The hon. gentleman has said fairly and courageously that he proposes in every instance where a charge is preferred against any subordinate or official in his department, that an investigation shall be conducted into the charge, fairly, openly and above board, and if it be shown that the accused acted in a manner not proper or consistent with his position as a public officer, then he will decide upon the merits of each individual case. I would wish that the hon. gentleman had gone further and said that no matter whether an official was of Liberal or Conservative proclivities, the same measure of justice would be accorded in each and every case. Now, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries has taken a course which I am sure, on mature consideration, will not be followed out in the future. I am sure that he must see that in the cases which have been cited here to-day, fair-play has not been accorded to those men. Now, so far as I have heard the debate—and I think that the facts are not disputed in some, at all events, of the cases—complaints have been made by political antagonists of these officials, and after the preferring of these complaints, these men were, in the most arbitrary manner, decapitated. They were politically guillotined without ever being permitted the opportunity of meeting their accusers face to face. I say that this discussion will be read with the very deepest interest by a large number of people throughout the Dominion. It will be read, not only by the office holders themselves, but by their friends, irrespective of party, and more particularly in the province of Ontario. We always claim that in Canada we are guided by precedents, and I believe it is well that we should be guided by precedents, and it is an admitted fact that in the province of Ontario, both in federal and local elections, a great deal of interest is evinced by the officials in political contests. I am not going to contend, and have never contended, that political decapitation should be inflicted on those who may have politically opposed the Government. During the term of the past Parliament, I have had in the constituency which I represent the active and most unqualified opposition of men holding positions under the Federal Government. I recall one case in particular in which, had I permitted vindictiveness and a wish for reprisal to rule, I had opportunity to do great injury to another and could easily have deposed him from an office under this Government which he held. The man to whom I refer occupied the position of lighthouse-keeper. It was a notorious fact that he was much opposed to me in my elections. There was not only his own influence, but a large family influence was, in a most hostile spirit, thrown against me. That man was convicted by the fishery overseer of harbouring through the winter—and it was a notorious fact that he did it—some two or three men for the purpose of illegal fishing. He was rightly convicted before a magistrate and justly fined. Every hon. gentleman here will admit that a man holding a position of lighthouse-keeper having been convicted and rightly convicted, as the records show, of having been a law-breaker, might naturally look to be dispossessed at once of the office of which he was the incumbent. But, while I had the pleasure to participate in the patronage of my riding, I never felt that my duty in life was to endeavour to do harm to those who might be politically opposed to me. If there is nothing more in politics than giving vent to one's spleen against political opponents, then I can only say that there must be but little in politics. I had hoped that during this long debate some hon. gentlemen opposite would have justified the principle of dispossessing men who are in possession of offices otherwise than on the principle, as it has been argued, that if we ever attain power in the province of Ontario we shall have full leave and license to retaliate upon the office-holders of that province. There is a principle at stake in this matter, and it is this—first to be just, even generous to all; and, in the next place, if you have the advantage, if you have the power, use that power in a merciful manner. So far, in my constituency, I have no cause to complain, because there have been no removals; but I know that if hon. gentlemen opposite are prepared to give full sway to my political opponents in that riding there will be an emptying of a great many saddles of the present office-holders there. If the principle followed out by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries in the cases referred to is to prevail in that riding, I think it will be contrary to the spirit of fair-play, of justice, and a sense of right as between man and man. And I would ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and every other hon. gentleman who has charge of a department, that before any dismissals are made in that constituency—or in any other constituency, for that matter—a spirit of fair-play should be shown by bringing the accused face to face with those who believe that they have cause of complaint, and giving him an opportunity to defend himself fairly and above board. To believe the statements made here to-night one would believe that the greatest possible horror is manifested by the Ontario government at the interference of office-holders in election matters. There was an election the other day in North Grey; and not only those holding subordinate positions participated in that contest, but, Sir,—and I say it was a most regrettable thing—the First Minister of the province, Premier Hardy went upon the public platform in the town of Owen Sound and made use of language such as should never have been heard upon the public platform and such as I trust will never be heard again. In the exercise of his privilege, Mr. Hardy went to Owen Sound on behalf of the Controller of Customs and, addressing a large meeting of the people of that town, which is much interested in shipping and in marine matters, said:

I am not talking politics to you to-night, but business. I want to know what you Owen Sounders have to lose by electing Mr. Paterson. (Cries of "Nothing.") What have you to gain by electing Mr. McLaughlin? (Cries of "Nothing.") Some of you say "Nothing." That is the point you must keep before you. Do you want a feeble commerce and a decaying population, or do you want the opposite? Shall Owen Sound stagnate for five years to come or perhaps ten years to come, or will you put yourselves in a position to be in sympathy with the Government.

I say it would have been more fair if he had given them fair promises if they would support the candidate he favoured. But he goes out of his way to threaten the town that the influence of the Government would be thrown against the town, damaging it and causing it to stagnate if at all possible. When that example is set, do you stand in amazement to know that every official in the province, whether his position be a humble one or whether it be an exalted one, takes a strong interest—aye, more than a strong interest, as has been stated here to-night by hon. gentlemen who preceded me. The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke) cited the case of Mr. Preston, who resigned the position of Librarian of the local legislature in order to become a candidate in the Dominion election, and, after his defeat was at once replaced in his position. Why, there sits in the House here to-day as representative of the city of Ottawa, a gentleman who held a position of trust under the Ontario government, which he resigned in order to become a candidate of hon. gentlemen opposite. And I have little reason to doubt that had that hon. gentleman been defeated, he would at once have been restored to a position he had vacated. Not only that, Sir, but a gentleman whom I had the honour, and I may add the pleasure, of defeating in my constituency, was also an employee of the local government. Going through the whole chapter, going through the whole list, it may be said, as has been alleged here by hon. gentlemen to-night, that the whole power, the whole machinery of the local government is used in federal elections and in elections for the legislative assembly, in the interest of hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite should, I think, be fair. I think they should be prepared, as I said before, to accord that principle of British fair-play to all officials. If an official has voted against the Government they admit the principle that he is perfectly within his rights in doing so. They admit furthermore that if he has acted in a fair manner—and it is hard to determine what is meant by a fair manner—that then, too, he should not be interfered with. Why, Sir, who is to be the judge? Who is to decide as to the extent to which an official under this Government or under any Government may interfere in election matters? The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) complained—after all when the complaint is sifted I think there is but little in it—that the officers and men in the Battery at Kingston marched to the polls in a body against him. Now, had it been an election contest for the local legislature, I would say there was something in the complaint of the hon. gentleman, because, with a friendly returning officer and numbered ballots such as they have in the province of Ontario, every facility would have been given to the party in power to see exactly how these men voted. But under the rights of the ballot which is in vogue for members in the House of Commons, every secrecy is provided, and though the men may have gone in a body to the polls, each one had the privilege to vote as he pleased. Now, before this discussion closes I trust the First Minister will announce to the House what the intention of the Government is in regard to these officials. The hon. gentleman is credited, and I believe credited rightly so far as my intercourse with him in the past extends, with being of generous impulses and of kindly nature. Now, the hon. gentleman must know that throughout the whole country there is a large number of men holding positions under the Government, and not only are those men keenly interested in the tenure of the office they hold, but they have wives and families, and these are dependent upon the sweet will of hon. gentlemen opposite. Therefore, before the debate closes, I trust the First Minister will announce that not only will he accentuate the statement made by the Controller of Inland Revenue, but that he will go even a little further, and will announce to the office-holders of this country that before any dismissals from office are made, each case shall be fully and impartially investigated. It is not a pleasant task for any Government to dismiss officials, because it must of necessity carry in its train a large amount of hard feeling. I trust that before the debate closes the hon. the First Minister will repel the insinuation which has been made by hon. gentlemen, ministers of the exterior, if I may so term them, that the principle shall be carried out that the Liberal party having been successful at the polls, shall adopt the motto, "To the victors belong the spoils," and a wholesale decapitation shall ensue of those holding positions under the Government.

Mr. BELL (Pictou) moved the adjournment of the debate.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I am sorry to say to my hon. friend that I cannot accede to his demand. We must go on.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It is a subject that concerns every constituency.

Mr. BENNETT.

The PRIME MINISTER. It is an important subject, and my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) has pointed out its importance. But I do not think we can adjourn at this hour.

Mr. FOSTER. Before my hon. friend makes up his mind, I would like to be allowed to say a word. One reason I have for voting for the adjournment of the debate is this: I do not think we can overrate the importance of the subject we have been debating to-day. I have listened with the greatest pleasure and interest to the discussion, so far as it has gone, and to the expressions of opinion which have gone forth from both sides of the House, and which, in the main, I think, have been very reasonable opinions. But it is undeniable that the country is looking with a great deal of interest to the action that will be taken by the incoming Government on this subject. It is being widely discussed throughout the country. Claims are being advanced of a very preposterous nature which I do not think any Government in this country would allow; others of a more moderate nature, and there is a great deal of discussion and a great deal of curiosity aroused in the country with reference to the matter. Now, it is not for the purpose of lengthening the session or preventing supply that we have thought it right to provoke a discussion upon this subject. Certainly the interest in the debate has not been confined to this side of the House. We have not yet come to any conclusion, neither have we got any authoritative statement from the leader of the Government and the important members of the Government, in reference to this subject. We are now face to face with the Estimates for the whole of the civil service and the contingent employees of the country, and on the eve of entering into the consideration of those items it is not unreasonable that we should discuss a matter of this kind and that we should have some reasonable expression of opinion from the leader of the Government and the prominent members of the Government as to the policy they propose to pursue. For my own part I should like to say something on the subject in hand, as I am pretty certain would a large number of other members. The leader of the Opposition is not present with us to-day, but he will be at the next sitting of the House, and he will have something to say on this subject. It will not add to the length of the session, or detract from the rapidity of Supply, by having a reasonable discussion on this matter, which is a most important one. It is not raised for the mere purpose of discussion, but for reasons entirely different from that. So I would like to press upon the leader of the House whether it is not reasonable to adjourn the debate at the present time.

Mr. DOMVILLE. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has spoken of dismissals. I should like to bring to his notice the case of a postmistress in his own county, or what was his county, or what might be his future county. Why was Mrs. Nase dismissed from office and the position given to his friend Mrs. Waters, a schoolmate of his early days. The hon. gentleman is always surprised. When I met him in Queen's the other day, before he cleared out as he did from King's, he was surprised at everything. He expressed surprise when I endeavoured to cut adrift some of the statements made by him that were not directly to the point in issue. The hon. gentleman talks about officials interfering with elections; and yet his nominee, Mr. Morton, who holds the office of Judge of Probate, was trotted out to fight me in the constituency that the Minister had left, because it had left him. I shall have something more to say when we get further into this debate, and then I will be able to give the House, if necessary, sufficient evidence to show that the hon. gentleman's speech to-night is as untenable as his position has been during his previous history.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman has asked me a question, and I suppose it is necessary to answer it. The question he asked was, why I had dismissed Mrs. Nase, who was postmistress in King's, and appointed a Mrs. Waters, who was an old schoolmate of my own. In the first place, I never was aware that Mrs. Nase was postmistress, and to my certain knowledge she never was. In the second place, Mrs. Waters was never a schoolmate of mine. I hope when the hon. gentleman proceeds with his further disclosures he will try to keep a little nearer to accuracy than he has done now.

Mr. DOMVILLE. When I make a further statement, I shall be able to prove that Mrs. Nase was postmistress and also that Mrs. Waters was a schoolmate of the hon. gentleman.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think the leader of the Government has now obtained a reason from the hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Domville) why this debate should be adjourned, namely, that he may have an opportunity of looking up these important facts and reporting to the House at its next sitting.

The PRIME MINISTER. That, perhaps, is a good reason for adopting the motion to adjourn. But I must insist that next week—and I hope I shall have the support of hon. gentlemen opposite in this matter—the House shall sit at least until 12 o'clock. I do not want to quarrel so early in the session, and I shall therefore agree to an adjournment for this week, at all events.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The PRIME MINISTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 31st August, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

LIBERATION OF CONVICT HAYES.

Mr. DAVIN (for Mr. Bergeron) asked :

Is it true that Walter C. Hayes, a convict who was undergoing a sentence of seven years in the St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary, has been liberated by order of the Department of Justice? If so, when, and for what reason?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). Yes, an order was sent on the 21st instant to the warden of the penitentiary to release Hayes. The prisoner had by good conduct earned all possible remission (448 days) allowed under the prison rules upon a seven years' sentence and had actually served five years, five months and three days, and his sentence would have by lapse of time expired on the 6th November next, and it having been represented to the Minister of Justice and established by statutory declaration that the convict's mother was on her death bed, and from the best advice of physicians could not live more than one or two weeks; that she was expressing great anxiety to see her son before her death, and that it would be an act of humanity if the sentence could be commuted or the prisoner released in order that he might see his mother before her death, and it being further represented to the Minister that Hayes would go directly upon his release to Chicago where his mother was, the Minister thought fit in recognition of the prisoner's good conduct during his imprisonment to recommend the remission of the two months and sixteen days remaining of the sentence.

THE CHICAGO DRAINAGE CANAL.

Mr. WALLACE (for Mr. Maclean) asked :

Has the attention of the Government been drawn to the prospective injury to Canadian shipping and other interests by the construction of the Chicago Drainage Canal? What steps does the Government intend taking for the protection of Canadian interests in this matter?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). Yes. The late Government appointed Mr. O'Hanly, civil engineer, to report on the effect of the Chicago Drainage Canal on the levels of the great lakes. His report has been printed, and will at once be distributed. The whole subject will receive from the Government the consideration its importance demands.

MILITIA CAMPS.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

Have arrangements been definitely concluded for the holding of the militia camps this year, and have any expenditures therefor been yet incurred or any payments therefor been made?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). Arrangements have been concluded for the holding of militia camps in September next, in accordance with general order, a copy of which I lay on the Table of the House. No expenditure except what is absolutely necessary has been incurred, and no payments have been made.

Mr. FOSTER. I am to understand, then, that some expenditures have been incurred?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Authorized, yes.

THE SONGHEES INDIAN RESERVE.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

1. Has the Government received any information as to the proceedings of the commission appointed by the late Government to inquire into the best means of coming to a satisfactory settlement with the Indians on the Songhees Indian Reserve?

2. If not, is it the intention of the Government to instruct their commissioner to report forthwith?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). In a despatch of the 31st January last, the Lieutenant-Governor of British Columbia transmitted a minute of his Executive Council embodying a resolution passed by the legislative assembly of that province during the then ensuing session, which resolution requested that the question of the removal of the Songhees tribe of Indians from their reserve to a more suitable locality be referred to a special commission. By an Order of His Excellency the Governor General in Council of the 1st April last a commissioner was named to act for the Dominion Government. By a despatch of the 3rd June last from the Lieutenant-Governor of British Columbia the Dominion Government was apprised of the appointment of a co-commissioner; but it was at the same time intimated that the definition of the scope of the proposed special commission, as set forth in the aforesaid Order in Council of the 1st April, was not sufficiently clear. No instructions were given to the commissioners named by the Governments to proceed, and consequently no report has been received from them. The question of defining the scope of the proposed commission is at present under consideration, and no instructions can be sent to the Dominion commissioner until an understanding is come to between the two Governments as to the scope of the commission.

RAILWAY SUBSIDIES.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to ask Parliament during the present session to grant a subsidy to a railway running from Bute Inlet, northward? If not, why not?

Is it the intention of the Government to ask

Mr. FOSTER.

Parliament during the present session to grant a subsidy to a railway running from Nanaimo to Comox, and thence northward? If not, why not?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). It is not the intention of the Government to ask Parliament to vote any railway subsidies during the present session.

THE VICTORIA AND CARMANAH POINT TELEGRAPH LINE.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to take steps at once to improve the telegraph line from Victoria to Carmanah Point, either by taking the line by another route or by doing more clearing on the present one?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). This matter is under serious consideration.

HATCHERIES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to erect a new fish hatchery on the Fraser River, and also one on the Skeena River this year?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). No. Steps are being taken toward the selection of sites for hatcheries on both rivers.

PUBLIC WORKS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

1. Is it the intention of the Government to ask Parliament this session for the necessary funds to erect the following works in British Columbia:—

(1.) Fog alarm at entrance to Victoria Harbour?

(2.) Light beacon on Fiddle Reef?

(3.) Lighthouse at entrance to Vancouver Narrows?

(4.) Light on Sisters Island?

(5.) Pole light in Chemainus Harbour?

(6.) Light beacon on Botchie's Ledge?

2. If so, is it the intention of the Government to have those works carried out this year, at once?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). The necessity for the erecting and constructing of these public works to which the hon. gentleman's question refers has been lately pressed on the Government by the members from British Columbia, and also by memorials which we have received from Messrs. Templeman & Milne, of Victoria. The arguments used in favour of the construction of many of these public works are very strong, and I am in hopes that when the hon. gentleman sees the Supplementary Estimates his heart will be somewhat gladdened—perhaps not as much as he expects.

SMUGGLING BETWEEN BRITISH COLUMBIA AND THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

1. Is it the intention of the Government to provide by purchase, or otherwise, a steamer to be used for the purpose of putting a stop to the smuggling now going on between the United States and British Columbia; also to protect our deep sea fisheries in British Columbia from American poachers?

2. If so, will the vessel be ready for use this year?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). The question of fitting up the steamer "Sir James Douglas" for the purpose of patrolling the coast was under the consideration of the late Ministry. It would require $10,000 at least to make the necessary repairs to the hull and machinery and no appropriation has been made for the purpose. Consequently no action can be taken in the matter until the present Ministry have the opportunity of fully considering it.

CARRIAGE OF MAILS.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron) asked :

1. Who has the contract for carrying the mails from the Canadian Pacific Railway station, in the village of Gorrie, Ontario, to the Gorrie post office?

2. When was the contract given, and when will it terminate?

3. Was the contract given by tender or by private agreement?

4. What is the amount paid annually for carrying those mails?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say: 1. Henry Perkins. 2. Contract was given on 1st January, 1893, and will terminate on the 31st December, 1896. 3. Contract was a renewal on the same terms and conditions as the prior contract. 4. $160 per annum.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron) asked :

1. Who has the contract for carrying the mails from the Canadian Pacific Railway station, in the village of Fordwich, to the Fordwich post office?

2. When was the contract given and when will it terminate?

3. Was the contract given by tender or private agreement?

4. What is the amount of the contract annually?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to give him the following information:—1. Robert Mahood. 2. The contract was given on the 1st January, 1896, and will terminate on the 31st December, 1899. 3. The contract is a renewal on the same terms and conditions as that immediately prior to it. 4. The rate is 18 cents per trip; the annual payment will be $112.68.

BONAVENTURE RIVER MONEY ORDER OFFICE.

Mr. FAUVEL asked :

1. At whose request was a money order office established at Bonaventure River post office, in the county of Bonaventure?

2. What has been the amount of receipts from the said source since its opening?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). In answer to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say: Establishment of money order business applied for on 8th April, 1895, by Napoleon Poirier, Alfred Arsenault and fifteen others. Made a money order office, 1st July, 1895. Number of orders issued—5. Amount—$75. Amount paid, nil. Money order business discontinued 30th July, 1896.

POSTMASTER AT QUEENSTON, ONT.

Mr. LANDERKIN (for Mr. Gibson) asked :

The name of the postmaster at Queenston, Ontario, the date of appointment and the salary paid?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The name is Charles Lowrey, the date of his appointment, 7th July, 1896, and his salary, $156.

THE CRUISER "ABERDEEN."

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (for Mr. Casgrain) asked :

Whether the Government are aware that the cruiser "Aberdeen" was placed at the disposal of the leader of the Opposition, in the legislature of Quebec, F. G. Marchand, Esq., and Mr. Dechesne, M.L.A., during the present month of August to convey them to the Magdalen Islands?

Who, if any one, gave instructions to the commander of the "Aberdeen" to convey these gentlemen to the Magdalen Islands?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). In reply to the first question, No. In reply to the second, the usual permission was granted by the department, subject to the customary conditions that it would not interfere with the duties upon which the vessel was engaged and that the daily charge for subsistence while on board should be exacted.

PROHIBITION PLEBISCITE.

Mr. CRAIG asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to ascertain the mind of the people on the question of prohibition by means of a Dominion plebiscite? If so, when?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). As my hon. friend is aware, this is a part of the programme of the Liberal party. The Government intend to take a plebiscite, but the date cannot be fixed at present.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY LOCOMOTIVE BOILERS.

Mr. LISTER (for Mr. Britton) asked :

Was the material as specified in the contract for six locomotive boilers for the Intercolonial Railway, two of which boilers were to be delivered on the 1st July, 1896, two on the 1st August, 1896, and two on 1st September, 1896, actually used in the construction of said boilers? If not, what change was made? When and by whom was such change authorized, and what allowance, if any, was made by reason of such change?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). In the absence of my hon. colleague, the Minister of Railways and Canals. I beg to reply to the hon. gentleman as follows:—There are two contracts for locomotive boilers for the Intercolonial Railway. One for six boilers with Carrier, Lainé & Co., Lévis. Two to be delivered on July 1st, two on August 1st, and two on September 1st, 1896. None have yet been delivered and when the inspector visited the shops a week ago, work had not been commenced on them, and the material was not on hand. No change of material has been made, and no change has been authorized or any allowance made. The contract is with John McDougall & Co., Montreal, for six boilers. Two to be delivered on July 1st, two on August 1st, and two on October 1st, 1896. None of these have yet been delivered. The inspector was at the John McDougall's works on the 24th August instant, and reports one will be ready for delivery in about a month—the material specified in the contract was actually used in the construction of the boiler. No change of material has been made and no change has been authorized, or any allowance made to contractors.

CHIEF JUSTICE OF BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. McINNES asked :

Whether the Government are aware that Hon. Theodore Davie, Chief Justice of British Columbia, was engaged in canvassing during the late election? If so, is it the intention of the Government to inquire into the matter?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The Government is not aware that Mr. Justice Davie was engaged in canvassing during the late election. The facts have not been brought to the attention of the Government yet.

SENTENCE OF SHORTIS.

Mr. BERGERON asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to investigate the commutation of the sentence of Valentine Cuthbert Shortis to be hanged on the 3rd of January last, into imprisonment for life, as promised by the Minister of Public Works during his campaign in Beauharnois?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). This subject is now engaging the attention of the Government.

FREIGHT RATES IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

Whether the First Minister was rightly reported by the Moose Jaw "Times" as having said at Moose Jaw, on the 28th September, 1894 :

"I understand the freight rates you have to pay are outrageous. This condition must have a solution. I speak here as an honest man and any pledge I make to you will be carried out to the letter. There must be competition. There must be a solution for this unbearable condition, and I promise and pledge myself that at the proper time the solution and remedy shall be applied."

Does the hon. the First Minister intend to inaugurate legislation respecting freight rates?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I may say I cannot answer for the language at this distant day, but the sentiments are sound, and it is very likely that I gave utterance to them. If I did I must have added—I am pretty sure I did add—that one of the causes of the present high rates of freight in the North-west Territories is the present tariff, which, instead of promoting trade, is contracting trade, and that the reform of the tariff by forcing an expansion of trade, would also force the lowering of freight rates, as the reform of the tariff on lumber in 1894 has already produced a lowering of freights on that class of article, as my hon. friend knows. It is the intention of the Government, not this session, but next session, to introduce that legislation respecting the tariff which will compel the lowering of the freight rates as well.

SUB-COLLECTOR FOR THE PORT OF LOUISBOURG.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough) asked :

1. Is the Government aware that Mr. Patrick O'Toole, of Louisbourg, Cape Breton, sub-collector for that port, is engaged in business as a general merchant?

2. Have the Government had any communication with any parties in reference to this matter?

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir H. Joly de Lotbinière). In the absence of the Controller of Customs, I give the answer to the hon. gentleman's question as follows:—1. The Government is aware that Mr. Patrick O'Toole, of Louisbourg, Cape Breton, sub-collector, at a salary of $150 per year, at that port, is reported to run a general supplying store. 2. Communications from W. H. McAlpine, of Louisbourg, have been received in reference to this matter, in May and June, 1896.

LAND TRANSFERS.

Mr. OLIVER asked :

Have all the lands earned by the Calgary and Edmonton Railway Company, Regina, Qu'Appelle and Long Lake Railway Company, Manitoba North-western Railway Company and the Alberta Railway and Coal Company been transferred to these companies, and are the transfers recorded so that the record is available to the public?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier.) 1. Calgary and Edmonton Railway Company. The lands earned by this company are not yet all selected. The company's officers and agents, however, are at the present time engaged in the work of examination and selection, their selection being subject to approval by the Governor in Council. 1,590,288.98 acres have been scheduled by Orders of the Governor in Council, and the balance of 298,159.02 acres will be similarly dealt with as rapidly as possible. The record in this case is in the Department of the Interior and open to the public. 2. Regina, Qu'Appelle and Long Lake Railway Company. The Government and this company have not yet come to an agreement as to the lands which are to be scheduled and conveyed to the company under the statutes and Orders in Council providing a land subsidy in aid of the construction of this road. 3. Manitoba North-western Railway Company. A tract of land sufficient to provide for the land subsidy to which this railway company is entitled has been under reservation since 4th of October, 1884, the schedules of the townships out of which this grant may be made having in the meantime been altered and amended, but the area under reservation not diminished. The whole of the area to which the company is entitled on account of construction has not yet been transferred to them, but land warrants to the full amount of the area earned have been issued by the company, endorsed by the Government, and on selection by the holders of the warrants the lands are patented to them. 234,293 48-100 acres of land have been patented to the company or their nominees, and 1,267,082 52-100 acres remain still to be patented. Under an arrangement with the government of Manitoba, however, from which aid was obtained by the company, under the Provincial Railway Subsidies Act, the Government of Canada has undertaken not to issue patents for more than 5,000 acres per month, without the express consent of the Manitoba government. The provincial government in each month are furnished with a schedule of the lands patented to the company or their nominees. The record of these patents, in the Department of the Interior, is available to the public, and so, presumably, is the record in the possession of the government of Manitoba. In so far as concerns that portion of the land patented which is situated in the North-west Territories, the registry office at Regina and Prince Albert, from which the certificate of title issue, also contain a record which is open to the public. 4. The Alberta Railway and Coal Company. This company is entitled, in consideration of the construction of their line of railway from Dunmore to Lethbridge, to 700,000 acres, of which 691,872.58 acres have been scheduled to them, leaving a balance of 8,928 yet to be selected and scheduled. In consideration of the construction of that portion of their railway from Lethbridge to the international boundary they are entitled to 413,568, of which they have selected 409,756, leaving a balance of 31,812 acres to be selected. The record in this case also is in the Department of the Interior and open to the public. All these railway companies are required to pay at the rate of 10 cents per acre to cover the cost of survey before patents can be issued to them.

Mr. OLIVER asked :

What amount of land in the North-west Territories, earned by the Canadian Pacific Railway on account of grant has not yet been transferred to that company? If any land so earned has not been transferred, why has it not been, and when will it be?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The Canadian Pacific Railway Company is still engaged in the selection of the lands earned by the construction of the road. The original land grant was 25,000,000 acres, reduced by 6,793,014 acres under the operation of the Act 49 Victoria, chap. 9. Of the 18,206,986 acres of which the company were still entitled after the settlement under this Act. 13,844,871 have already been selected, and the company and the Government are together prosecuting the work of completing the company's land grant as rapidly as circumstances permit. No specific portion of the company's land grant is under the statute to be found in the North-west Territories, but 11,338,187 acres of the selections already made by the company are situated in the Territories. Only a small percentage of the land in the Territories has been patented to the company or their nominees, and the balance of their land grant is still subject to the mortgage created under the Act 51 Victoria, chapter 32, under which the hon. the Minister of Finance of Canada, John Turnbull, G. M. Clark and R. B. Angus are the trustees. Any patents that are issued to the company direct are subject to this mortgage, and patents can only be issued to purchasers upon a form of release of the mortgage being recorded in the Department of the Interior. The lands are not available for sale to settlers or others until released from the mortgage.

UNOPPOSED NOTICES OF MOTION.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I was going to suggest to the hon. leader of the Government whether it would not expedite business to take the unopposed motions, as we sometimes have done, and in that way reach all those that are not opposed, and, later, have an opportunity for discussion on the others.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Very well.

Mr. SPEAKER. By the consent of the House the notices of motion will be called, but only those which are not subject to debate and which are unopposed will be taken for the present, and the list will again be gone over when that portion has been eliminated.

SUPPLIES FOR REPAIRS OF VESSELS.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER moved for :

Copies of all correspondence since the 20th of July last between the Department of Marine and Fisheries at Ottawa and the officers thereof or others respecting supplies for repair of vessels and steamers under the control of that department which are in the habit of visiting at the port of Charlottetown, Georgetown and Pictou, and are employed either for the protection of the coast fisheries or in the supervision and maintenance of lights.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have no objection at all to the motion, but I do not understand that there are any papers. Would the hon. gentleman indicate more definitely what he refers to ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. For instance, there were instructions in regard to supplies which those vessels should take at the different ports of distribution, and in regard to the patronage connected with those vessels, at the time those gentlemen took office. Since then, I understand, these vessels do not take supplies at Pictou : and in connection particularly with one ship which went in there to coal : she was ordered out of the port after coaling, and sent over to Charlottetown to be supplied there. I take it that in connection with that matter there must have been instructions cancelling previous instructions, though I know nothing of it. But, as the hon. gentleman has no objection to the motion passing, if there is correspondence, it will be brought down ; if not, there can be no harm done.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have no objection.

Motion agreed to.

CULLING OF TIMBER.

Mr. QUINN moved for :

Return showing the number of cubic feet of square, round and waney timber of every description and the number of standards of deals and other lumber exported from the port of Montreal, in each year from and including 1890 to the 30th June of the present year 1896, giving the names of the exporters and the quantity of each kind of timber or other lumber shipped by each exporter and the amount of culler's fees paid by each exporter ; and in cases where fees have not been paid, the return to show what amount should have been paid and by whom.

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir H. Joly de Lotbinière). There can be no objection to that motion, but I would make a suggestion to my hon. friend, in order to save a good deal of useless work in copying some letters which, though they may indirectly allude to this matter, are really of no importance. I hope my hon. friend will do me the pleasure of calling at the office, and I will look over the papers with him in order that we may agree upon those that he may consider indispensable.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. SPEAKER.

SUBSIDIES TO NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. OLIVER moved for :

Copies of all memorials, resolutions or other documents from the legislative assembly of the North-west Territories for an increase of subsidy, and all correspondence in connection with the same.

He said : Mr. Speaker, I would ask the House to listen for a short time to an explanation of the object for which this motion is made. The motion is moved in order to afford information to the House on a subject of considerable interest to the House and to the country. It is a subject in regard to which efforts have been made for the enlightenment of the House in the past, or rather for the enlightenment of the late Government, but the information never reached the House, and it seems to me it would be well to take up a short time of this sitting in order to arrive at an understanding of this question. The motion relates to the financial condition of the legislature of the North-west Territories in its connection with this Government. The position occupied by the Territories at the present time is very similar to the position of a province, that is to say, the territorial government and legislature have all, or nearly all, the responsibilities of a provincial government or legislature, and at the same time they have much greater responsibilities than the government of any province, owing to the immense area of country they are expected to govern and the difficulties of carrying on that government. While the North-west government and legislature have almost equal power and greater responsibility than the government of a province, the government and legislature are confronted with the position that they have not adequate finances, and those finances have been inadequate for some years past. The area under the government of the North-west Territories is, roughly speaking, something like 600 miles square : it is very much larger than the settled area of all the eastern provinces of the Dominion, and settlement being scattered more or less over this great area, the expense and difficulty of carrying on the government are proportionately increased. It is not only that there is a great area over which settlement is scattered, but there is also diversity of interest. There is the wheat raising interest in the east, the cattle raising interest in the west, the coal mining in the mountains, and the trading interest in the far north—a diversity of interests that renders legislation and government in that country more difficult probably than in any province, or, at all events, in any province having a similar population. The population of the Territories in 1891 was stated as 66,799, and the subsidies at that time derived from the Dominion Parliament amounted in 1892 to $211,200. Since that time the population has increased, so that in 1894, according to the census then taken by the police, the population was 86,000, and taking the same rate of increase down to the end of the current fiscal year, it may be placed in the neighbourhood of 112,000. While the population has increased from 66,000 to 112,000, the subsidy on which the government of the Territories is based, has increased only from $211,000 to $242,000: that is to say, that while the population has nearly doubled, the subsidy on which the government of the Territories is conducted, has only increased by 15 per cent: to be more accurate, while the population has increased 70 per cent, the subsidy has increased only 15 per cent. There was difficulty in governing those Territories in 1891 with the then subsidy, but the difficulty is much greater now, with not only a larger population, but a population that has gone into new portions of the country, while at the same time the Territories have received comparatively less subsidy. The duties of the government of the Territories are much the same as the duties of the governments in the older provinces, and one of the first charges on the treasury, both in the Territories and in the provinces, is the maintenance of education. In 1892 there were in the Territories 245 schools in operation; in 1895 there were 395 schools in operation, and in 1896 there are 489 schools organized, of which nearly all are in operation, so that in connection with that particular charge on the treasury there has been nearly a doubling of the expense. The cost of education in the Territories is now nearly double what it was a few years ago, while the grant out of which that cost has to be paid has only increased to the extent of 15 per cent. I admit that the grant in aid of education in the Territories is comparatively large, that is to say, the aid granted by the territorial legislature to the school districts in the Territories is relatively large, but it has to be large in order that education shall be carried on there at all. This is on account of the system of land grants which have prevailed in that country. It is provided that twenty sections out of every thirty-six, that is twenty square miles out of every thirty-six, shall be reserved from settlement. Instead of schools being supported by people settled on every quarter section in a township, they have to be supported by such settlers as may be on sixteen out of the thirty-six sections. The scattered settlement in that country, is what makes it more necessary that there shall be a large grant in aid of the schools. Without that large grant these schools could not be conducted, and without schools you cannot hope to attract settlement, nor can you even expect to retain the settlement you have. When a settler is not sufficiently interested in the education of his children to demand a school as one of his first requirements, the chances are that such a settler is no good to the country. The school expenditure which in 1893-94 was $97,000, has increased to such an extent that it will amount to $120,000 this year. These are the amounts that have been granted to schools out of the subsidies allowed to the Territories. It therefore will be plain to the House, that the greater proportion of the total subsidy voted to the territorial legislature by this Parliament, has been expended on education. Although at first sight the grant would appear to be large it will be found upon inquiry that it is not larger than the case requires.

Public works are the second great charge on the revenues of the Territories. As we all know, in the case of the organized provinces, the greater part of the expenditure upon public works is borne by the municipalities, and the provincial legislatures bear only a small proportion of the cost of such works. In the Territories, owing to the scattered settlement of the country, and owing to the nature of the country, it is simply impossible to have such an organization as you have in the older provinces, and as a consequence the territorial legislature has to bear a larger proportion of the cost of works which is usually borne by the municipal organizations in the provinces. There is therefore a special charge upon the territorial treasury, which does not bear upon the treasuries of the provinces, and that charge exists because of the peculiar condition of the Territories. This peculiar condition in its turn is a result of the administration of this Parliament in holding in reservation from settlement such a large proportion of the lands. Parliament having taken upon itself a certain responsibility in regard to that matter and having laid down a certain policy, must certainly be held responsible for the results of that policy. When Parliament has absolutely, as may be said, prohibited settlement in the greater part of that country, it seems to me that Parliament must be prepared to make good the deficiency in the revenue necessary to carry on the proper business of the country. As in the case of schools it is in the case of public works, especially roads and bridges. These roads and bridges which would be kept up if there was settlement on every section, simply cannot be kept up when settlement is on less than half the sections. If we are to have public improvements in that country, the burden must be borne to a very great extent by the treasury of the Territories, which again must be supported by a subsidy from this Parliament. There are not only roads and bridges to construct and maintain, but there is also the question of the water supply throughout a great portion of that country. Without an improved water supply, which can only be secured by the expenditure of money, settlement cannot increase as it ought to or as it otherwise would. There are other special expenditures which have to be made, expenditures which are not needed in any of the older provinces. For instance, during one year, $8,000 was paid for wolf bounty, in order to protect the cattle in the ranching country against wolves. This is an expenditure peculiar to the Territories, and it is one which has to be incurred in the interests of the cattle industry. There are also special expenditures in the wheat growing country, such as the money which has to be paid to try to keep down the gopher pest. This gopher pest exists chiefly by reason of the fact that there is so much vacant land. The gophers do not propagate on the cultivated land but on the land that is unoccupied, and the protection of the cultivated land from the gophers has cost $4,000 in one year. There is also the question of the relief of distress which has to be provided for by the Territories. There has to be provision made sometimes for the relief of distress, and to compensate for losses of crop by hail storms and otherwise. In the older provinces the municipalities take care of distressed persons, but in our country, on account of there being no municipal organizations, that must be done at the expense of the territorial government. The cause of humanity must prevail in the Territories as well as in the provinces, and people cannot be allowed to suffer or to die for lack of pecuniary assistance. We have also a number of hospitals which have to receive governmental assistance. These hospitals receive $4,000 a year. When that grant was made the idea was that each hospital should receive 40 cents per day for each non-paying patient treated. However, owing to the increase of patients and the increase of hospitals, the grant now only amounts to 27 cents per day for non-paying patients. This is a charge that has increased from year to year and it is a charge that must be provided for. There has also been $3,000 paid out for the encouragement of the creamery industry, and this, I may say, is a most desirable policy and a wise expenditure. I allude to all these matters for the purpose of showing in the first place, the necessity for them, and in the second place, the advantage of the money being expended in the manner in which it is expended. The expenditure is not only of advantage to the Territories, but it is of advantage to the whole of Canada, for I need not remind hon. gentlemen that whatever assists the improvement and development of that country is also of advantage to the entire Dominion.

While large sums have been used for education and public works, and these sums have been on the increase from year to year, those charges which are for what you may call the running of the machine, have not increased in proportion to the increase of population. The grant for clerical assistance in 1892 was $16,701, and in 1895 it was $12,460; so that that expenditure has been decreased very materially under the present North-west administration. The cost of the executive, or cabinet, has stood at $5,500 a year for the last five years; the expenditure on printing account, which was $6,000 in 1892, was reduced to $4,000 in 1895. So that, if a question is asked as to how the assembly expends the money which is granted by Parliament, I think it can be shown that the money is expended judiciously, both in matters of improvement and in matters of routine.

There are two grounds upon which the territorial government or legislature are entitled to an increased grant. One is that the territorial government is a creation of this Parliament. It was at one time merely a branch of the Department of the Interior, and money was provided through that department for the purpose of carrying on the business of the Territories. Now, Parliament, having created a certain institution in the North-west Territories, is in duty bound to provide the funds necessary to carry on that institution. On the other hand, the people of the Territories are entitled to stand in exactly the same position as the citizens of any province. They are citizens of this Dominion as much as are the people of the provinces. They contribute their share to the revenues of the country, as do the people of the provinces; and, having been granted control of their local government, they are entitled to fully as much subsidy for their local purposes in return for the amounts they have paid into the general treasury as are the people of the provinces. Calculating on that basis, I will give you a few figures to show that in asking for an increase on the moderate amount that has been granted during past years, they are not asking for more than they are entitled to. Taking the increase of population that occurred from 1891 to 1894, and assuming the same percentage of increase until the end of the present fiscal year, we would have a population of 113,000. In the case of Manitoba, the amount payable per head is based, not on the actual population at the time, but on the supposed or expected population, two and a half years in advance, that is to say, the subsidy per head is re-adjusted every five years, and the amount is fixed at what it would be on the basis of population when half the term of five years is up. Applying the same calculation to the North-west Territories, it would give us a supposed population of 141,000, which, at 80 cents per head, would entitle us to $112,000 a year. On debt account, the present actual population would entitle us to $156,000 a year. Taking the amount allowed to Manitoba for the cost of government, that is to say $50,000 a year, and an allowance on account of the land, such as given in Manitoba, say $125,000 a year, the Territories would be in a position at the present time to claim, in a readjustment of the subsidy, in the neighbourhood of $440,000 a year. They are not asking for that amount at the present moment; but they are asking for a substantial increase in the amount which has been granted in past years, so as to catch up to some extent with the present requirements. Let me say that the manner in which the subsidy has been calculated in the past has been this. The territorial government made up an estimate of what was required. The Department of the Interior granted either that amount or as much less as it saw fit. The territorial government was compelled to keep within the amount voted. When the territorial government, next year, sent down an estimate for an increased amount, the department here, I suppose, argued: "Well, you got along with so much last year; you can certainly get on with the same amount this year." So the amount has been kept at about the same figure for the last five years. This, it appears to me, is putting the matter on a false basis, which is neither in the interest of the North-west, in the interest of this Dominion, nor in accord with the dignity of this Parliament in its dealings with the institution which itself has created.

In regard to the grant on account of the land, I would say a word or two. The province of Manitoba has been granted $100,000 a year in consideration of its public lands having been administered by Parliament. In the Territories there is, I suppose, four or five times as much land as there is in the province of Manitoba; and, while it may be argued that the land is not profitable to the government, that the administration of it has not returned a financial profit to the Government, let me put the matter to you in this way. Parliament has seen fit in the past to grant off these lands to the Canadian Pacific Railway, which is a national work and not a North-western work simply, to the extent of 25,000,000 acres. I understand that that land has been bonded to the amount of $1.25 an acre; so that its value stands, under these bonds, at something like $31,000,000, which, at 4 per cent, is equivalent to a million and a quarter dollars a year. This is not any fancy calculation, but a calculation on the basis of actual cash. So that, when we say that the Territories are entitled to consideration on account of the amount of Government land there, we are not going beyond the mark when we say that we should be dealt with at least as favourably as the province of Manitoba, particularly when we call your attention to the fact that the province of Prince Edward Island has received a special grant of something like $40,000 a year, in consideration of the fact that at the time of entering confederation it had not any public land at all; and that the province of British Columbia has been granted $100,000 a year, in consideration of what is known as the railway belt, in which belt the province still holds the precious metals, which, I suppose, are really the most valuable part of the land. Now, a statement has been made by the local government, asking for a certain increase in the annual subsidy, based on actual requirements. Not that they do not want a readjustment of grant on the basis of the provincial subsidies.

The papers I asked for are for the purpose of showing what is absolutely required for the carrying on of the government of the North-west Territories during the current fiscal year and not for the purpose of making a permanent arrangement. The government of the Territories, however, as will be shown by the papers, are prepared at any time to enter into an arrangement for a permanent subsidy on a provincial basis suitable to the special position and circumstances of the Territories.

Mr. DAVIN. I am glad my hon. friend has made this motion and brought the claims of the Territories before the House. I do not know whether I understood him to say that he was bringing these matters before the House for the first time.

Mr. OLIVER. I said that I understood that these papers have never been laid on the Table.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, I am exceedingly glad that my hon. friend has brought this matter before the House. As the House is well aware, I have annually brought before it the claims of the Territories, and made an argument in favour of an increased subsidy, somewhat in the line of that which my hon. friend has made. There cannot be any doubt that not merely now but, as I pointed out, either last session or the session before last, the North-west Territories were long ago entitled to far more money than was given them year after year, and in fact I think it was either last session or the session before last that I argued that there was something like a million dollars or more of arrears due the North-west Territories, bearing in mind what should have been paid, on the basis of the calculation made by my hon. friend in his able speech this afternoon and comparing that with the amount which has been given. In 1889, the legislative assembly of the North-west Territories submitted a memorandum to the then Minister of the Interior in which they submitted the argument that, with an estimated population of 150,000 as a basis to go on—and that was not too much even then, taking what had been done for Manitoba—the subsidy at the rate of 80 cents per head, which was allowed the provinces, would amount to $120,000. They further submitted that on debt account the Territories are entitled to 5 per cent interest on $27.77 per head on an actual population of 100,000, which would amount to $138,850, and that the specific grant for governmental purposes should be at least as liberal as that made to Manitoba, that is to say, $50,000. And they, further submitted that:

Owing to the vast area of the Territories and the widely scattered nature of the settlement, all the local business of the government is rendered more expensive proportionately to population than in any of the provinces.

For these reasons they asked a specific annual grant for the five years term of $100,000, and claimed an aggregate sum of over $400,000. Any man who has listened attentively to my hon. friend this afternoon will agree that with the population they then had, and proceeding on the ratio that had been dealt out to Manitoba in 1870, the North-west Territories in 1889—that is several years ago—were entitled to a grant of $400,000. On the 27th February of that year, I made a motion in this House somewhat similar to that made by my hon. friend this afternoon. I moved for copies of all memorials addressed to the Government by the legislative assembly of the North-west Territories which had then sat recently at Regina, and I presented, as best I could, the claims of the North-west Territories, as set forth by the legislative assembly of which my hon. friend was then a member and had been for some time. As will be seen by reference to page 355 of the "Hansard" of 1889, I pointed out that the old council of 1887 petitioned for responsible government, and I stated what the memorial set forth, and I pressed for a subsidy very much larger than what had been given up to that time or than what has been given since. And I pointed out that we might take a leaf out of the book of the United States and follow the example set by that country in dealing with its territories. I pointed out that Minnesota, Wyoming, Dakota and Montana each got in lands, a large extent of territory for subsidizing branch lines. That is something which this Government has never contemplated doing for the government of the Territories, but I contend that the sooner we give the giant in the North-west its limbs the better. The sooner we give that North-west people, now far in excess of numbers of what Manitoba was in 1870, what it is entitled to, the better; and as anybody will see who visits the giant, as the hon. Prime Minister did, at the time when the legislative assembly was sitting, the representatives in that assembly will compare well with the representatives of any assembly in the provinces. What is the reason this Government should keep that giant in leading strings all these years? I appeal to the hon. Minister to cut those strings. He is fond of regarding himself as a breaker of manacles, let him break those manacles that are on the limbs of the North-west Territories, let him give the Territories provincial autonomy and the annual subsidy to which it is entitled by reason of its population, according to the calculation so ably set forth by my hon. friend this afternoon. I would go further than was done in the case of Manitoba, and would give the young man, so to speak, when I set him up in life, all the implements of manhood. I would give him the means of building his own railways. Here is what happened in these Territories which have been very successful, as I need not say, below the line. Minnesota with 83,000 square miles (Assiniboia has 93,000 square miles) received land for subsidizing 1,800 miles of railway, and with the swamps, started in possession of one-third of the territory. What does that policy enable these Territories to do. I read from my speech seven years ago:

It gives them, while young, that nutriment and vital force, without which anything young cannot thrive. As the Right Hon. the Prime Minister is now acting Minister of Railways, I should like to call his attention to this fact. At this hour the government of Minnesota receives an income of $600,000 a year, 3 per cent on the gross earnings of the lines of railway that it chartered and subsidized since 1849, when it was organized. But it may be said: "Ah, but those territories were very populous." Not at all. In 1849, when Minnesota was organized, it had only a population of 6,000—

I think my hon. friend said our population in 1894 was 84,000, and it is more to-day.

—and the aggregate population of all the four territories at the respective dates of their organization did not equal by five or six thousand the population of the North-west to-day. That is the point which I submit as well worthy of the consideration of the Government, because I think we may err on the side of keeping the strings too much in our hands here in Ottawa, and not giving sufficient scope for the young giant, for which I plead here to-day, to develop his limbs. Now, it will be said to us, no doubt, you have got the mounted police. So we have, and we are very glad to have them; but elsewhere you have batteries, militia, and military schools, and we pay for those just as well as you pay for the mounted police; and before you know where you are, I believe in the next five years, you will find we shall have a population in those Territories which will be subscribing to your military schools, and batteries, and militia just as much as you are subscribing to the North-west mounted police. And remember that in any case the cost of defence would fall on the Federal Government; so that you cannot fairly make anything of our having the mounted police.

Now what I point out there is of great importance—that the United States government, in dealing with territories is more generous than the Government of Canada. And as I repeat the argument, I repeat to the hon. gentleman opposite the appeal I made to the Government of Sir John Macdonald, and I say to him that not only will these facts justify him in complying with the demand made by my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) this afternoon, but they will justify him in going further. They will justify him in giving to the Territories responsible government. They will justify him in giving the Territories not $260,000 as a grant, but $400,000 a year as a subsidy, and they will justify him in going still further—in giving them lands by which they will be able to build small local railways, so that in ten years from now, they may be in the position that Minnesota is found to be in to-day—drawing a large income from investments in these railways. My hon. friend very properly pointed out that the government of the North-west Territories really has a more difficult problem before it than any provincial government. As he told you they have a great area—a far greater area than any province—they have scattered settlements and diverse interests. I was very glad to see that he is a supporter of a policy that, before I came to this House at all, I pressed upon the attention of the Government and which, since I have been in this House, I have on several occasions, pressed upon the attention of Parliament. I refer to what the hon. gentleman said concerning the odd sections which, as now dealt with, work a very great evil. They cause a scattered settlement; they enable, as my hon. friend pointed out, the gopher to have a great hunting ground; and not only that, but to-day, half a township minus four sections has to do the work of a whole township. For supporting schools, for making roads and bridges, for all the work of a township, you have not half a township, but only the settled even-numbered sections, minus the four sections, two for the Hudson's Bay Company and two school sections. I have advocated a radical change, and I am glad now to note that I shall have my hon. friend's support, or—which is the same thing to me, if he proposes the reform—he shall have my support. It is a matter of perfect indifference to me who proposes or who carries out anything for the North-west Territories, whoever proposes anything for the good of the Territory will have my strenuous support in this House; and, if a proposition to deal with the odd sections should come from my hon. friend, he may be perfectly certain that he shall have my strong support. Now, Mr. Speaker, when the idea occurred to me of dealing with these odd sections, I went and saw Sir William Van Horne, then Mr. VanHorne. I told him what the conditions of the North-west Territories was and what I believed would be the advantage to the Territories and to Canada if these odd sections were thrown open to settlement. For I apprehend that nothing could be done so far as the land that has been granted to the Canadian Pacific Railway without the co-operation of that company. I pointed out to Mr. Van Horne that if he was ready to agree to convey these lands to the Government—or what would probably be the literal truth, if he were ready to forego selecting this land—it would pay his railway to do so even on a very small, or what might seem a small, consideration. For it is palpable that if these odd sections are thrown open for settlement and if they are taken up by settlers the result must be the Canadian Pacific Railway will get double the quantity of freight and double the number of passengers. And not merely that, Sir, but, as we know very well, if you had a whole township instead of half a township the increase in business would not be measured by the mere multiplication by two, as the business would become certainly much more than double what it has been. Sir William Van Horne, who, as we know here, is an enlightened and far-seeing man, and knows well what is for the benefit of his railway, said to me that the proposal seemed to him a good one, but he said I am, of course, in the hands of my directors. I ventured then to say what I think is probably the case, that if Sir William Van Horne advised his directors in a course that, in his opinion, would be for the good of the railway, the chances are that his directors and himself would see eye to eye. My idea was this, that the Government might buy back the lands for $1.25 an acre, and, if they did so, the money paid would be well spent by the Government, it would be a proper use of public money, and it would be a profitable transaction to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Well, what happened during the late election? One of the planks in my platform was the settlement of the odd sections, and the gentleman who was running against me, held me up to opprobrium, held me up to popular condemnation, because, as he said, I wanted to get the Government to give vast sums to the Canadian Pacific Railway for these odd sections. To my surprise, I found in many parts of my constituency, settlers who took the view that they did not want the odd sections thus disposed of. It is only fair that I should tell Parliament this. It would not be just to Parliament if I stated an argument in favour of the Government re-assuming those odd sections, it would not be just to the hon. gentleman—and I could not be unjust to him—it would not be just either to the Government or to Parliament, if I stated an argument in favour of the Government assuming control of those odd sections once more, if I did not also mention the fact that I found, in going through my constituency that a number of settlers took a strong view against that proposal. Not only so, but a very prominent and active gentleman in the neighbouring constituency, Mr. Hawkes, has written, I think, to the Regina "Leader" a long letter, taking my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver) and myself to task because of the views we are known to hold on this subject of the settlement of the odd sections. So my hon. friend who is at the head of the Government will be aware that a prominent supporter of his considers that it will be a dreadful course to take to expend vast sums to get hold of these odd sections. However, that supporter is not in this House, and is not likely to be; but the other supporter, who urges him here to-day to do something with these odd sections, is in the House, and his vote has to be considered, and I hope he will have more influence with the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government than any person who denounced the proposal when made by myself. It is desirable, as the House knows is my own opinion, that we should have a great deal more help than we have had in the Territories for creameries, and I think it is desirable that all that should be done by the local government. But how in the past, or how in the present, could the local government do it, when the grant to them is so contemptibly small and so utterly inadequate to the needs of the situation? But if an adequate sum is given them, the local government, being on the spot, could attend to all needs. For instance, we know that in a vast area like the North-west Territories we may have good crops in one part extending over hundreds of thousands of square miles; and in another part we may have a failure of crops. Now, the proper government to deal with that question is the government of the North-west Territories; but how could the government of the North-west Territories deal with it, when, up to the present, the amount doled out to them has been weighed, as it were, in an apothecary's scales with the utmost nicety, so as to measure it out as regards the admitted needs of these Territories? Mr. Speaker, it was a great pleasure to me to hear my hon. friend's voice once again, and I hope that in this House he and I, while we are colleagues, whether for a long or a short time, will use our united efforts for the good of the Territories, and for the support of any proposal, come from whatever side it may, that will be for the good of the Territories, and let us not turn our efforts against each other at the bidding of either party or faction.

Motion agreed to.

BRANCHES OF GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER moved for :

Copies of all returns, reports, papers and documents, showing the branch railways connecting with the Intercolonial Railway, the capital invested, subsidies contributed, gross and net earnings and earnings per mile of each railway.

Also, reports and other information showing the effect upon the receipts and expenditures of Government railways by the operation of the Rivière du Loup, St. Charles Branch, Oxford and New Glasgow, Eastern Extension, Cape Breton and other additions to the Intercolonial Railway as originally constructed and operated.

Also any report or papers dealing with the policy for acquiring all connecting branch lines not already owned by the Government.

He said: I simply want to add a few words in explanation of the object I have in view in making this motion. The subject of the operation of these railways has been for some time engaging the attention of the communities touched by the Intercolonial Railway and by the various lines connected with the main line. Many of those branch railways—and there are quite a number of them, particularly in the province of New Brunswick—are, I fancy, in considerable difficulty in connection with the management of those lines, and the people are not served as they would be served, nor is the business of that district of country in such a condition as it would be, if they had anything like the advantages arising from such an operation as obtains on the Government line proper. I think, if the Minister of Railways, for the purpose of meeting this return, would direct the attention of his officers to the whole subject, a very interesting report could be prepared for Parliament, and in that connection we would obtain information as to the effects, partially, of the policy suggested in this motion. For instance, the line to which I refer, including the Eastern Extension and the Cape Breton road, before they were taken over by the Intercolonial Railway, were supposed by many to be likely to involve a very heavy expenditure and lack of revenue; whereas from the best information I can gather those lines have contributed to the business of the Intercolonial Railway and proved of very great financial benefit to the Railway Department in the handling of business along the main line. It is obvious in connection with such branches as the Albert Southern, 16 miles, the Baie des Chaleurs, 80 miles, Caraquet, 68 miles, and Joggins, 12 miles, and various other companies operating short lengths of roads, that the expenditure in connection with the rolling stock is so heavy as to hamper them in the efficient management and control of the roads; whereas if many of those lines could be acquired by the Government, it would not be necessary to increase to any extent the regular rolling stock as regards those branch lines, and therefore it goes without saying that many of those lines could be operated by the Government more efficiently and with less cost to the people who require those transportation facilities. So it occurred to me that before going into this question, which involves very serious consideration indeed, it would be convenient and useful to obtain at the earliest possible time a report dealing with the subject that I have outlined. For the benefit of the Minister of Railways, or whoever represent him at the present moment, I will mention the different lines that would be affected by this proposal, as follows: Albert Southern, 16 miles; Buctouche and Moncton, 32 miles; Baie des Chaleurs, 80 miles; Central Railway, 75 miles; Caraquet, 68 miles; Cumberland Railway and Ccal Company, 46 miles; Elgin and Havelock, 27 miles; Joggins, 12 miles; Kent Northern, 34 miles; New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island Railway, 36 miles; Salisbury and Harvey, including Harvey Branch, 52.25 miles; Temiscouata, 113 miles; Canada Eastern, 136 miles. I do not suppose it possible to obtain all those lines, even if the proposition were favourably entertained. I desire, however, at least to point out the lines that are actually connected with the present system.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). What is the total mileage ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. About 700 miles ; but a considerable number of these are independent and self-supporting. Several of the companies, as is known to the Minister of Finance, coming as he does from the province of Nova Scotia, are in financial difficulties and are very much hampered by the expense involved in providing a large quantity of rolling stock for a very short mileage.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I did not quite understand from the language of my hon. friend if he had made up his mind as to the wisdom of the policy of the Government acquiring those lines. I did not understand him to express any definite opinion.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. A tentative opinion ; but perhaps I did not make myself clear. From the information in my possession, which is by no means thorough, I thought it was a wise policy, but before coming to any conclusion and asking the House to express an opinion, it seems to be desirable to seek for the very best information that possibly can be obtained in connection with the proposal.

The PRIME MINISTER. In my judgment it would be rather premature to express an opinion on this subject, which is a very important one. There is no objection to bringing down the papers asked for, but my hon. friend will admit that we may not be able to submit all the information sought. In the second paragraph the hon. gentleman asks for :

Also, reports and other information showing the effect upon the receipts and expenditures of Government railways by the operation of the Rivière du Loup, St. Charles Branch, Oxford and New Glasgow, Eastern Extension, Cape Breton and other additions to the Intercolonial Railway as originally constructed and operated.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It would be merely an approximate statement.

The PRIME MINISTER. It would not be an approximate statement, but it would be largely a matter of speculation ; however, the Government will furnish the hon. gentleman with the best possible information on the subject.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This question is a very important one, and it is one to which no hon. member would perhaps feel disposed to commit himself unreservedly as a question of public policy. The fact remains that the Government has expended very large sums of money in aiding those branch lines. Subsidies have been granted, very large expenditures made by Parliament, and considerable sums of money have also been expended from private sources and from local subsidies. The result taken as a whole has been very disappointing. The very important object the Government and Parliament had in view in promoting the extension of branch lines was that we should bring an increased volume of traffic to the Intercolonial Railway, and thus while benefiting the various sections of the country through which those lines were constructed, we would at the same time largely increase the traffic on the line of railway in which the country is directly and immediately interested, and in which the Government has so much at stake. The result has been to a large extent that the expenditure has been unproductive, either of benefit to the particular localities or to the Government by increasing the volume of traffic on the Intercolonial Railway, for the reason which has been stated, that the operation of the various lines as separate organizations in regard to management, has been attended with considerable expense, which would be saved to a large extent by using the central organization of the Intercolonial Railway. The fact has been referred to that a very much smaller amount of rolling stock, supplied by the Intercolonial Railway, and a central organization, would effect the object in view and accomplish it more effectively than by working these different lines as separate and different branches. If it be found in a large number of cases, as I am quite sure it will be found, that the country is not well served owing to the inability of those companies to operate their roads vigorously and successfully, and also that the Government has not obtained increased traffic over the Intercolonial Railway from them, and if it be found, as I believe it will be, that the parties owning those branch lines would be only too glad to make an arrangement with the Government by which the roads would be amalgamated with the Intercolonial Railway, and the parties interested would receive some return, those companies would then be placed in a much better position than they now occupy. I think it would be well worthy the attention of the Government to ascertain upon what terms these lines could be obtained ; not perhaps to become absolutely the owner of them, but that they might be placed under the management of the Government. I am inclined to believe that if the Minister of Railways directed his attention to that subject, he would find that the communities would be only too anxious, and the parties now owning the roads would be only too anxious, to meet the views of the Government, and bring these various lines into such communication and co-operation with the trunk line of the Intercolonial Railway. This, I believe, would greatly benefit the district in which these roads have been constructed, and at the same time cause a much larger return to the Intercolonial Railway, because of the greater volume of traffic which would thus be obtained. Therefore, while it is very desirable to obtain this information, I think the Government might well be warranted in going further, and in making a tentative investigation into the question as to the most favourable terms on which these lines could be placed under the organization of the Intercolonial Railway. The Government would thus be in a position to form its own judgment as to the wisdom of adopting that policy with the objects that have been indicated.

Motion agreed to.

THE LANGEVIN BLOCK.

Mr. CAMERON moved for :

1. A copy of all contracts between the Government and the contractors respecting the construction of the Langevin Block.
2. A copy of the tenders and specifications relating thereto.
3. A detail statement, with dates, of the various amounts voted by Parliament for this work.
4. A detailed statement of the various sums paid on such contracts, with dates.
5. A copy of the Order in Council of the 6th July, 1896, and of all other Orders in Council relating to a claim made by Charlebois on the Government for $296,257 and of all other papers relating thereto.

He said : Mr. Speaker, I desire to discuss for a short time the history of what is known as the Langevin Block ; one of the public buildings erected in the city of Ottawa for the convenience and benefit of the people. I make bold to say, Sir, that the history of the construction of the Langevin Block discloses a most startling condition of affairs. I think, if hon. gentlemen follow my observations which I will arrange in chronological order, they can arrive at but one conclusion, and that conclusion is, that from the moment the Government of Canada undertook to construct the Langevin Block, there was a conspiracy as clear and distinct as ever was revealed in any court of justice, to defraud the public treasury of the Dominion of Canada. I desire to say, Sir, that the papers already submitted to Parliament, and the information placed at my disposal, will exhibit a most shocking condition of affairs in relation to the construction of that block. I believe, thoroughly believe, they will disclose an attempt to raid the public treasury ; and an attempt that in the end proved successful to the extent of very nearly half a million of money. Sir, some of us who were in the Parliament of Canada some years ago, know something of the history of the construction of the Langevin Block, and of the terrible frauds that were disclosed before the Public Accounts Committee. It is known, Sir, that in 1883 tenders were called for for the construction of this building. It is known that several tenders were submitted to the Minister of Public Works of the day. I am not concerned with the discussion of any of those tenders except the one, that of Mr. Charlebois, to construct the main building for $295,000. That tender was accepted by the Government of the day, but it did not cover more than the construction of the main block. The iron roof, the iron joists, the heating apparatus, the elevators, and the staircase, were all subjects of separate tenders called for by the Government. The tender of Mr. Charlebois for the construction of the main block at $295,000, was accepted by the Minister of Public Works of that day. Tenders were subsequently called for, for the construction of the iron roof on the building. Several tenders were submitted. The tender of Rousseau & Mather for $42,975 was accepted by the Government. Tenders were also called for, for the iron joists, and the contract was awarded to Carrier, Lainé & Co. for $16,627. Subsequently, tenders were called for, for the heating apparatus, and the contract is awarded to Garth & Co. at $15,500. Subsequently tenders were called for, for the elevators, and the contract was awarded to John Fenson for $39,877. Subsequently tenders were called for, for the iron stairs, and the contract for that work was awarded to Charlebois, the man who had secured the contract for the construction of the main building, at $11,040. Now, you will find that all these tenders for the construction of the Langevin Block, from the attic to the cellar, aggregated the amount of $421,519. But a deduction of $27,113 must be made from that aggregate amount, for the following items : Work not done under the old contract, $22,113 ; and work not done by Fenson, $5,000 ; in all, $27,113. Deduct that from the $421,519, the aggregate amount of all the tenders for the construction of the building from the cellar to the attic, and you will find that the building was to cost us $394,406. That does not include the price of the land for the site. That land, I find, with commissions and so forth, cost $95,000. So that the whole building, including the land, cost $489,406. Now, I have stated that the history of the Langevin Block reveals as rank a conspiracy between the contractor and the Government of the day as ever was disclosed in any court or as ever was revealed before a committee of any Parliament. I propose to make good every word I utter on that subject, and then I will leave it for hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, who were then sitting on the Treasury benches, and were parties to this transaction, to explain how it was that the public treasury was raided by those men for nearly half a million of money.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh.

Mr. CAMERON. Oh, half a million of dollars is nothing—a bagatelle, especially if it is raided in the interest of a favoured contractor. Let us see, Mr. Speaker, what the building really did cost us. I will tell you what we have expended so far. On the 30th April, 1883, as will be found in "Hansard" of that day, page 907, the then Minister of Public Works declared in his place in Parliament :

The lots will cost some $83,000 to $85,000, and the building between $400,000 and $500,000.

And on that day Parliament voted $200,000 for the work. I find that subsequently, on the 28th March, 1884, as will be found in "Hansard" of that year, at page 1190, the Minister of Public Works stated :

When the work is complete, it will cost $593,000, including the site, which cost $85,000.

On the same day Parliament voted towards the construction of this building $150,000. On the 26th of June, 1885, as will be found in "Hansard" of that year, page 2916, the Minister of Public Works stated :

The total cost is estimated at $503,000.

On that day Parliament voted for the purpose, $175,000. I find that on the 7th of May, 1886, as recorded in "Hansard" of that year, at page 1154, the Minister of Public Works in his place in Parliament declared :

As I stated last year, the total cost, including the site, will be $594,000.

On that day Parliament voted $110,000 for the construction of this building. I find that on the 11th June, 1887, as recorded in "Hansard" for that year, at page 916, the Minister of Public Works told us :

The total cost including the site, heating, furniture, etc., will be $650,000.

Parliament on that day voted $200,000 for the construction of this building. It will be observed that in 1883 that building, including the site, was to cost between $400,000 and $500,000, while in 1887 the amount had run up to $650,000, or $150,000 more than the Minister had declared before, would be the total cost. I find that on the 22nd of March, 1889, the Minister of Public Works, in answer to an inquiry respecting this building, as recorded in "Hansard" of that year, at page 799, declared :

The total cost, including the land, will be $707,000.

Or an increase of over $200,000 over the amount he had declared in 1883 the building would cost. On that day Parliament voted for the construction of this building, $90,000 more. I find that on the 13th of March, 1890, as recorded in "Hansard" of that year, at page 1859, in reply to a question put by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) the Minister of Public Works declared that the Government had paid on the building to the 1st March, 1890, $608,096, exclusive of the site, and that there were claims for extras made by Charlebois for $393,954; that there were extra claims made by a man of the name of Garth, who got a contract for one of the minor portions of the building amounting to $9,233; and by a man of the name of Fenson, amounting to $3,015. You find that on the 9th of May, 1890, page 4096 of "Hansard," the then Minister of Public Works, Sir Hector Langevin, told the House that the amount which had been expended up to the 1st of March, 1890, was $711,000, or $211,000 more than he assured Parliament in 1883 the building would cost. Will anybody explain, will the hon. leader of the Opposition or any member of the late Government explain how it is possible, when there were no contracts under the Great Seal signed by the contractors to construct this building for $486,000, including the site, that in 1890 we had already paid the contractors $600,000 and that there were claims amounting to $393,000 not settled for. Sir, on proceeding further I find that in the same year the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright, asked the then Minister of Public Works what the total cost was. The hon. member for South Oxford summed up, from statements made by the then Minister of Public Works in Parliament, what had been paid up to that date, and he found it amounted to the enormous sum of $867,000, upon which he went on to remark that this building, upon which we had up to that time expended $867,000, the Parliament of Canada had been assured would only cost $486,000. Sir Hector Langevin, who was then Minister of Public Works, replied :

I cannot say that we could hardly make an estimate at the beginning because we did not know what the land would cost.

Now, I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, whether any responsible Minister of the Crown ever made such a ridiculous and misleading statement? The then Minister of Public Works and every member of the Government at that time knew perfectly well that the contracts were let in 1883 and that the whole cost, including the site, was only to amount to between $84,000 and $500,000, and yet we were told that the Government could hardly make an estimate at the beginning because they did not know the price of the land. Why, the then Minister of Public Works declared, in 1884, from his place in Parliament that the price of the land was from $80,000 to $85,000. It was really $95,000, but that included $10,000 for commission and conveyancing and extras. The statement of the then Minister of Public Works was misleading. The whole thing was, so far as one could judge, a wholesale raid on the public treasury up to that time of over $300,000. But that does not finish it. On the 24th of March, 1894, Sir Hector Langevin said :

When the building is complete it will cost $593,000, including the site, which cost $95,000.

Why, we were told in Parliament that up to the date I have previously given, we had paid on this building the enormous sum of $867,000. On the 9th of May, 1890, as you will find in "Hansard" of that year, page 4696, the hon. Minister of Public Works, in detailing the various items of what had been paid on the contract, said that they brought the expenditure up to $867,000. On the same date Parliament voted $150,000 for the construction of the building. Now, let us see what the Parliament of Canada has voted in cash to pay for that building which was to cost $486,000? It voted the following amounts:—

On the 17th of April, 1883 .....	$200,000
On the 28th March, 1884 .....	150,000
On the 26th of June, 1885.....	175,000
On the 7th May, 1886.....	110,000
On the 11th of June, 1887 .....	200,000
On the 22nd of March, 1889 .....	90,000
On the 9th of May, 1890.....	155,000
Session of 1891.. .....	6,000

Total .. .. . $1,086,000

Voted by Parliament to construct the building which was to cost, including the price of the land, according to the tenders and the statement of the then Minister, $486,000. I cannot find in "Hansard" that the hon. gentleman who then administered Public Works gave any explanation of this wholesale robbery from the public treasury. And I challenge any member of the late Government to account for it. I challenge them to show where the money went to and who got it and how the difference between the contract price and the sum voted by Parliament was disposed of. I do not mean to say that the whole $1,086,000 was paid to Mr. Charlebois and the other contractors, although in "Hansard" and the Estimates we can find no re-votes except one of $100,000 which I have not calculated at all. If it is true that the late Government did not spend it all, but only spent $867,000, according to the statement of the then Minister of Public Works, that is still over $300,000 more than they assured Parliament the building would cost. Is it possible that we cannot construct a public building in this country without the estimates being overrun by 50 to 100 per cent? That appears to have been our experience under the late Government. The history of the Langevin Block discloses it beyond all reasonable doubt. Supposing that we only did pay Mr. Charlebois $867,000, we find that the contract price was $489,000, which left $378,000 that, in my judgment, was a direct steal from the public exchequer. Hon. gentlemen may laugh and call it what they like. When hundreds of thousands of dollars are squandered and purloined, hon. gentlemen laugh, and that is all the satisfaction one gets.

I find that not only in the case of the Langevin Block itself, but in connection with other portions of the work let to other contractors, there are clear and unmistakable indications of a huge and gigantic steal. I find in "Hansard," the late Minister of Public Works making this statement with respect to a portion of the work on the Langevin Block:

I am informed by my chief architect that there is very little painting connected with the building and what there is is included in the contract of Mr. Charlebois, who was the lowest tenderer for the whole work. The oil and varnishing, of which there is a good deal, is also included in the contract.

Will it be believed that when this matter was investigated briefly before the Public Accounts Committee, the sum of $19,281 was found to be charged for painting? Although the Minister of Public Works of that day, in his place in Parliament, declared that the painting was included in the contract with Mr. Charlebois, yet $19,281 are found to have been paid over and above the contract. Is it possible that the late Government paid for this work twice? They cannot account for it otherwise. That sum was found to have been paid apart from the contract, and yet Sir Hector Langevin declared that it was included in the contract.

There are two or three other contracts on which I wish to say a word or two. The contracts so far, of which I have spoken, only deal with the main building, and I have shown that there was a clear raid on the public treasury to the extent of over $300,000 in that connection. But tenders were called for for five other contracts. I have pointed out to you what they were for. Three of these, by a system well known to the late Administration—the system of freezing out—passed into the hands of Mr. Charlebois and there remained two independent contracts. Now, I shall deal with those, and show that although there was a huge steal somewhere in connection with the Langevin Block on the main contract, there were besides some minor steals, amounting to a very considerable sum in the aggregate, in connection with the other contracts. Several tenders were submitted. I am concerned with the consideration of only two of these. The lowest tender was that of Rousseau & Mather, and their tender for the construction of the iron roof was $42,975. There was a tender by the same precious Mr. Charlebois, which amounted to $77,500. In the call for tenders and in the specifications upon which Rousseau & Mather based their tenders, there were two conditions and two only which it is important to consider here. The first was "That the contractors shall find the piling ground which may be required for the storing the roofing materials;" and the second condition was "That the contractors shall be required to sign a contract containing the ordinary conditions as now issued by the Department of Public Works." These were the main conditions upon which the tender was called for, passed and accepted, and Messrs. Rousseau & Mather so understood it. They were the lowest tenderers, and, of course, the contract was awarded to them—although they did not do the work, as I shall presently show. Now, Mr. Speaker, right here it is well for us to consider for a moment how it was that Rousseau & Mather, who were the lowest tenderers by $35,000, did not secure the contract for the iron roof. How is it that they were passed over and the contract ultimately given to Mr. Charlebois? One would naturally suppose that in the interests of the public the lowest tenderer, other things being equal, would secure the contract. What is the object, pray, Mr. Speaker, of calling for tenders at all, unless you award the contract to the lowest tenderer? Mr. Mather, one of the partners, in reply to a telegram from the Minister of Public Works, appeared in Ottawa on the 12th August, 1886. He had an interview with the Minister of Public Works with respect to this contract. The Minister told Mr. Mather that before he could award him the contract, he (Mr. Mather) would have to make some arrangement with Mr. Charlebois having the contract for the main building, the contention being that Mr. Charlebois having the contract for the main building, he was in absolute possession of the land upon which the buildings were being erected and all the land in the neighbourhood belonging to the Government, and that the other contractors could not get access to the building to carry on their work unless they made arrangements with Mr. Charlebois. Well, Mr. Charlebois was an accommodating man. He was willing to make an arrangement with them. But the terms upon which he was willing to make an arrangement were that they should pay him 25 per cent of the amount of the contract before he would allow them on the land. Now, was there ever a more scandalous or more outrageous piece of rascality? I think I am using moderate and modest language in thus describing such a transaction. I say there never was in the whole history of public contracts a more scandalous conspiracy between the Department of Public Works and the main contractor for a building to make a raid upon the contractors for the subordinate parts of the work. Here let me observe that this statement that Mr. Charlebois was entitled to exclusive possession of the land until the buildings were completed was submitted for the opinion of the Minister of Justice, and the Minister of Justice of that day declared that the claim was wholly inadmissible, and that Mr. Charlebois had no right to exclude from the building the other men who had contracts for the heating apparatus, the iron roof, and so on. Is it not as plain and clear as the smiling face of my hon. friend opposite, is it not self-evident, that the other contractors must be impliedly entitled to access to the building? Else how could they carry on his contract? Well now, this matter has been partially investigated, and perhaps it will be best explained by a reference to the sworn testimony of one of the contractors.

He is asked by the present Postmaster General:

814. You came to Ottawa?—Yes, sir.

615. And saw, I suppose, Mr. Fuller?—Saw Mr. Fuller—

That was the architect.

—and saw Sir Hector Langevin.

616. What did they tell you?—Well, we were told that we had to make arrangements, I think, with Mr. Charlebois.

What had Charlebois to do with the contract for the iron roof?

617. What arrangements did they say you would have to make with Mr. Charlebois?—Well, I understood we were to get permission to get on to the building, and get on the grounds—that he had full control of the grounds, and would not allow any other one to go on there without his consent.

618. Did you make that arrangement with Mr. Charlebois?—We tried to, but could not come to any settlement.

620. I believe that at a certain stage in the negotiations you withdrew your tender?—Yes.

621. Why was that?—Because we could not come to any arrangement with Mr. Charlebois.

Now, under pressure, you see, Mr. Speaker, of the Minister of Public Works of the day, to carry out the conspiracy that, I charge these people had made to defraud the public treasury, under coercion, this man Mather, who was not, as I am informed, a keen, active business man—under the pressure brought to bear upon him through telling him that his firm could not get access to the buildings without the consent of Mr. Charlebois, and that Mr. Charlebois would not give access to the buildings except upon the payment of the outrageous sum of 25 per cent of the amount of the contract—wrote the following letter to the department:—

Ottawa, 11th August, 1886.

A. Gobeil, Esq.,

Secretary of Public Works.

Sir,—By reference to the specification, and after seeing Mr. Charlebois, the contractor for the new Departmental Building, we have come to the conclusion that we cannot execute the work tendered for by us without interference with Mr. Charlebois, and that we should have to pay such a remuneration as would prevent us from fulfilling satisfactorily the contract; and under these circumstances we prefer, before any decision is arrived at by the Government, to beg leave to withdraw our tender and the accepted cheque accompanying the same.

Your obedient servants,

ROUSSEAU & MATHER.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Mather was not the only member of the firm. The other member was a keen, level-headed Frenchman by the name of Rousseau, who was not to be humbugged, or trifled with, or toyed with. He was not present when the Minister of Public Works declared to Mr. Mather that he would first have to make arrangements with Mr. Charlebois before the contract would be awarded to him.

He left Montreal on the night train the day after the letter was written, and reached Ottawa at midnight. He had an interview with his partner. He said to his partner: You have no business to make such an arrangement. We have that contract, it is awarded to us. There were no conditions imposed upon us that we should make arrangements with Charlebois, and we will not submit to the imposition of any such conditions, and we insist upon getting the contract. The result was that they had an interview with the Minister of Public Works and with Charlebois, and with what took place upon that occasion I shall trouble the House with reading, because it is detailed there under oath better than I can give it. He said:

I took the night train on the Canadian Pacific Railway and arrived here at midnight. I went to Mr. Mather's room at the Windsor Hotel and knocked at his door. I was admitted, and asked him if he had closed with the Government. He looked discouraged. I said: "What is the matter?" He said: "I think I have done wrong." I said: "What have you done?" He said: "I have cancelled our tender." I said: "What was that for?" From one word to another he gave me to understand that Mr. Charlebois took him to his office with Mr. Duval, Clerk of the Supreme Court, and, as we say, "scared him out of his pants," and that he made him write a letter. He told me: "I saw from his talk that we would have a lot of trouble and I thought it better to cancel the contract." I said: "Mr. Mather, you had no right to cancel the contract." I said: "You have not the right, and it is not valid until it has my signature." I went with Mr. Mather in the morning to see Sir Hector Langevin, and I told him that the letter was not valid. He said: "You come in the right time, because I was going to grant the contract to Mr. Charlebois." So I said to him there and then that we were ready to sign the contract."

You see, Mr. Speaker, that on the 12th he frightened the man out of his pants. At midnight on the 12th he came to Ottawa and insisted that he had a right to get the contract, because the signature of one party was not sufficient. On the morning of the 12th they went to Sir Hector Langevin's office, and he said: Oh, you just came in the right time, as I was going to award the contract to Mr. Charlebois. Then the witness goes on:

Were you allowed to sign it?—No; we were not.

Why?—There is, if I remember right, two drafts of the contract made. The first was, as we say in French, a 'brouillon,' that was presented to me by an Englishman there who has large whiskers, and he showed me that by clause 7 the right of way was not inserted. The second draft, which took some two or three days, had clause 7 inserted. I went to Sir Hector Langevin, and I said: "It is not according to specification. We are not prepared to buy the right of way from Mr. Charlebois."

Now, you see in the Department of Public Works they had two contracts prepared, one without the obnoxious clause that he should bargain with Charlebois for access to the buildings if he had the contract; and the other, after a day or two deliberation and consultation with Charlebois, had that obnoxious clause inserted, and of course the contractors stood upon their rights and refused to sign the contract with the obnoxious clause. Then, Mr. Chapleau asks the question:

Those are not the words?—I am positive in these things, and I told you about it before, you remember. I was here two or three days, and I went to Sir Hector and said: "We do not provide for this clause. We put in our tender," says I, "that we were going to tender like anybody else, and that we would have the privilege of putting on the roof, as anybody else; but that we would not put on the roof until after the masonry work was done. We were not going to interfere with Mr. Charlebois." I said: "If the building belongs to you, you had the right to call for tenders. If it does not belong to you, you had no right to call for tenders."

Then Mr. Lister interjects a question:

What did he say?—I saw that Sir Hector was held by the throat by Mr. Charlebois.

Will hon. gentlemen tell me why Sir Hector Langevin was held by the throat, unless from the inception of this gigantic scheme there was a conspiracy entered into, I won't say between Sir Hector Langevin and the contractor, but I will say between the Department of Public Works and the contractor, that the public treasury of this Dominion should be raided almost without limit in order to supply Mr. Charlebois with funds for himself, and for other purposes which hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House well understand. Then the present Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) interjects a question:

On the second occasion you went to see the contract you found it had in it a clause that was not in the first?—It had a clause that was not in the first.

Was that the reason you did not execute it?—Of course; I could not consent to purchase the right of way.

Did you ask Sir Hector to give you further time to negotiate with Mr. Charlebois?—He told me to ascertain how much it would cost from Charlebois.

How much did he say?—I think I went to Charlebois, and he said it would cost $10,000.

Just think of a raid of $10,000 upon a contract of $42,000; if these men had to pay $10,000 for access to the building, the tender would be just so much worse by $10,000.

I asked Sir Hector to raise my tender by so much, as we had not provided for that. He said he had nothing to do with that.

On the second occasion you went there you saw the contract engrossed, as we call it in English—ready to be signed—and you found this strange condition in it—clause 7. You then objected to sign it with that condition in it. Did you ask Sir Hector to give you further time to try and arrange with Mr. Charlebois?—No. I tell you candidly I did not want to have anything to do with Charlebois. I told Sir Hector: There is that one clause. If you are the owner of this building you had the right to call for tenders ; but if the building belongs to Charlebois, you had no right to call for tenders. Charlebois had scared my partner at first. * * * *

You called next morning ?—Yes, sir.

On the 12th of August you were in Ottawa ?—Yes, sir,

You wrote to Sir Hector then, asking for two or three days?—Yes.

I presume this letter followed the interview with Sir Hector ? During the interview he probably asked you to put it in writing ?—I wrote that letter after Sir Hector told me to see Charlebois and try to come to arrangements with him.

It was then, he said, you had just come in time to cancel the withdrawal ?—Yes.

That he was just about to let the contract to Mr. Charlebois for the roof ?—Yes.

I understand he gave you very few minutes to complete the arrangements with Charlebois ?

Now, Mr. Speaker, listen to the answer of that question :

—Fifteen minutes.

Think of the outrageous conduct of the Minister. Here is a contract involving a large sum of the public funds of this Dominion ; here is a contractor who claims to stand upon his rights and who was standing upon his rights ; here is another contractor who is exacting what the law does not justify him in claiming and the law did not allow him to exact, and the Minister of Public Works, when he made that statement to Charlebois, had before him the letter of the Minister of Justice declaring that the claims of Charlebois in that respect were wholly inadmissible. And yet he allows this man only fifteen minutes to arrange with Charlebois, a man that he swears had Sir Hector Langevin by the throat. Then he is questioned by Mr. Lister:

He gave you fifteen minutes to complete the arrangement with Charlebois ?—That was in the presence of Mr. Gobeil and Mr. Fuller. It was fifteen minutes to decide. I said : This is not treating us fairly. If you are the owner of the building you had the right to call for tenders. I told him what I repeated a short time ago, he said in French : I will give you fifteen minutes to decide. * * * *

Mr. Chapleau told you that you were badly used ?—He told me that the Minister of Justice said they had no right to put in such a clause.

The Minister of Justice was right. That is the specification, is it not, for this work ?—Yes.

The contractor shall find, at his own expense, the piling ground which may be required for storing the roof materials from their delivery until such time as he will be notified to begin the work of erection and during the progress of the work. You understood what that meant ?—Oh, yes ; we understood what that meant perfectly well. We went to look for piling ground elsewhere, as there was no room there.

Then Mr. Haggart asks a question :

Did the Minister assign any reason for changing the specifications ?—No ; he said : you have to sign the contract in the present shape or else your deposit will be forfeited.

There he was taking Mather by the throat.

He says : If you did not sign the contract with that clause in it compelling you to make a bargain with Charlebois, then you will forfeit your deposit that you put up when you put in your tender.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. CAMERON. When, Mr. Speaker, you left the Chair at six o'clock I was proceeding to read an extract from the evidence taken before the Public Accounts Committee touching the charges levelled against the Department of Public Works and Mr. Charlebois in connection with the construction of the Langevin Block. I will now read a short extract. The witness said :

He (the Minister of Public Works) never assigned the reason at all ?—No. He gave me to understand that, when I found the clause which required me to make arrangements with Charlebois, was there, somehow he looked embarrassed. When we were out in the corridor my partner said to me : " I think we had better give it up. They will make it so hot for us we will not make anything out of it." I considered the position of Sir Hector ; I did not tell him at the time, but I thought I would render him a service. As a matter of fact I thought Charlebois held Sir Hector by the throat. That is the reason I was induced to withdraw—to get him out of a difficulty.

Then Mr. Lister asked a question :

You are his friend ?—I am his friend yet.

And you thought Charlebois had him by the throat ?—Oh, yes ; I think he had.

You did not think you could get him by the throat ?—No ; it is not my habit to get hold of anybody by the throat.

I wish we had a few more contractors like you ?—Well, perhaps, it would be several thousand dollars saved to the Government.

Then a question was asked by Mr. Mulock, the present Postmaster General, as follows:

What do you mean when you say that he had Sir Hector by the throat ?—I mean that there was a certain clause in this contract by which he could compel the Government to do just as he pleased. Mr. Fuller gave me to understand that they had had a good deal of bother with Charlebois, and that that was the reason why they put the clause in.

By Mr. Chapleau :—

You understand by the conversation you had in the department that Mr. Charlebois pretended he had full control of the building—that he could impose any conditions on the sub-contractors ?—He gave me to understand that I could not go on the building, and he said I would lose money on my contract, I said : Mr. Charlebois, if I sign the contract I will go on the building." He said : " There will be a row." I said : " Let there be a row ; I will go on the building." That is what I told him at the time, but he overreached me.

You did not go on the building ?—No ; except as a visitor.

The further examination in this matter was then postponed until another meeting.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I may pause here for a moment to consider the terrible obstacles that the department threw in the way of these bona fide and honest tenderers. First, the Minister had two contracts prepared. One contract was without the objectionable clause, and that contract this firm were willing to sign, and a second contract contained the objectionable clause which prevented parties entering on the premises without making some arrangement with Mr. Charlebois. The second contract, as they call it, these tenderers refused to sign. The Minister of Public Works insisted that the contractors should make some arrangements with Charlebois before they signed the contract. He further gave them fifteen minutes in which to make the arrangement with Charlebois. They were on the ground ready to sign the first contract, a contract framed according to the terms and conditions of the specification and tender. They informed the Minister of Public Works of their conclusion, but he would not assent to these proposed contractors going on the premises except upon the payment of $10,000. Rousseau & Mather properly refused to pay this extortionate demand, this wholly illegal demand, as advised by the Minister of Justice of the then Administration, and they properly refused to sign the contract. You will recollect, Mr. Speaker, that only fifteen minutes were allowed Rousseau & Mather to make an arrangement with Charlebois. They refused Charlebois's terms; and on 12th August, before leaving Ottawa for Montreal, they addressed the following letter to Sir Hector Langevin:

Ottawa, 12th August, 1886.

To Sir Hector Langevin,

Sir,—After an interview with Mr. Charlebois, we have decided to go down home, in order to consult together on this matter: and we beg that you will be good enough to wait two or three days longer for final answer.

Your humble servants,
ROUSSEAU & MATHER.

The Minister of Public Works made no answer to this communication. He was silent, dumb as an oyster, said nothing. The men went down to Montreal, and they appear, so far as one can judge from the correspondence, to have been exceedingly anxious to obtain the contract, and honestly believed that they would have a good thing in the contract. On reaching Montreal, on the evening of the 12th, they sent the following letter to Sir Hector Langevin, and it shows their intense interest in the contract and their desire to obtain it:

Montreal, 12th August, 1886.

A Gobeil, Esq.,
Secretary of the Public Works Department,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—We beg to inform you that if the Government favour us with the contract for departmental buildings roof, we are prepared to carry out the conditions of our tender and deliver works on November 1st, as called for. As the time presses, we would feel obliged to you for an early answer.

Yours truly,
ROUSSEAU & MATHER,
Per A. Rousseau & A. A. Mather.

You will observe, Mr. Speaker, that after that interview with Sir Hector Langevin they were still insisting on their rights, they were still insisting on getting the contract. I have read the second letter to Sir Hector Langevin, dated 12th August, pressing their demands. In addition to sending that letter, to which they received no answer, on 14th August, two days afterward, they sent the following telegram to the department:

Montreal, 14th August.

We are prepared to sign contract. Give orders to send us blue prints. Wire us acceptance so we may cable to England to fill order. No time to lose.

(Signed) ROUSSEAU & MATHER.

One would naturally imagine that if the head of the Department of Public Works, the great spending department of the country, had desired that justice should be done to the contractors, and at the same time justice meted out to the taxpayers of the country, that telegram would have been answered, and the contract awarded. But there was no answer sent, and the department remained dumb, silent and did nothing. So on the 16th August these men sent the following telegram to Sir Hector Langevin's department, addressed to the Deputy Minister:

624 Craig Street,
Montreal, 16th August, 1886.

A. Gobeil, Esq.

Sir,—We telegraphed on Saturday about 10 a.m. to Sir Hector that we are ready to sign the contract for the roof of the public building at Ottawa, and asking a reply and the blue prints. We to-day confirm our telegram.

Yours truly,
ROUSSEAU & MATHER,
Per A. R.

Was any answer received to that message? Not the slightest; and recollect that up to this time the contract with Charlebois for the iron roof had not been signed. The Minister of Public Works was not only blind but deaf, he would neither see nor hear; he did nothing, and according to the evidence submitted he was in the hands of Charlebois. I should like to obtain some information of the extraordinary conduct of the Minister of Public Works. I should like to hear some justification for this evidently clear and manifest attempt, which ultimately succeeded, to raid the public treasury of very nearly half a million dollars. No explanation has ever been given; but to my judgment the answer is plain and simple—it was simply carrying out the conspiracy entered into between the contractor and the Department of Public Works at the very initiation of this contract, by Charlebois, who had, as a witness said, Sir Hector Langevin by the throat. Sir Hector could not move; his hands were tied, his eyes were closed, his ears were stopped, he was deaf, blind and incapable of moving, because the contractor had Sir Hector Langevin by the throat. This man Charlebois—I do not know him, but I judge by the correspondence—appears to have been a genius. He had a way of getting over everything, and he suggested to Sir Hector Langevin a way to get out of this difficulty. I find in a communication sent to Sir Hector the following words used:

Honourable Sir,—As you have had the kindness to tell me some days ago, that you were satisfied with the execution of the works that I have undertaken for the Government, and that you would be satisfied if I could say at the conclusion of the works that the whole of it had been completed, even to the iron work, roofing, &c., which ought to be given after tender had been made by me, I believe that considering that I have been obliged to make arrangements with the corporation for the use of the street, &c., and to incur other expenses for tools, and besides that under my contract I am responsible for all damage to the building until the date of delivery and that you have not inserted a clause permitting others except officers of the department to have the right of admission on the works while under my control, the Government might avoid all misunderstanding and protect me by inserting a clause requiring tenderers before sending in their tenders to make arrangements with the contractor for the use of his land and scaffold and plant, tools, &c., which might be necessary to put the roof in position.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
(Sgd.) A. CHARLEBOIS.

There you have a clear and distinct admission that in the original specifications, on which Rousseau & Mather based their tender, there was no clause prohibiting them to go on the premises unless an arrangement was made with Charlebois: that in all the tenders subsequently called for there was this restriction. The Minister of Public Works was prompt enough in dealing with Charlebois and was prompt in agreeing with him that in all minor contracts that clause should be inserted; and it was inserted in the other contracts. There were six tenders, one for the main building and five for other portions of the building. All tenders subsequently issued had this clause inserted. Rousseau & Mather were men of some energy, perseverance and determination, and they held out against the attempt made by the Minister of Public Works so long as holding out might prove available. But the Minister of Public Works and Charlebois were altogether too much for Rousseau & Mather. In the end Rousseau & Mather's tender was passed over, and the contract for the iron roof was awarded to Mr. Charlebois, not for $42,000, but for $60,000, or at a loss to the people of Canada, of the difference between $42,000 and $60,000. Sir, the Minister of Public Works—as the leader of the Opposition knows—in order to do this had to ignore the terms of his own specifications and had to override the advice of the Department of Justice who gave an opinion upon this matter. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) will find that advice on the records of the Department of Public Works now. The Department of Justice advised that the claim made by Charlebois was wholly without foundation, and that subsequent tenderers had a perfect right to enter the premises for the purpose of completing the contract. But that was not the only difficulty the then Minister of Public Works had to encounter. He got rid of Rousseau & Mather and he gave the contract to the next tenderer, but he had to satisfy the Executive Council, and he had to prepare a report to Council to get over the difficulty. The Minister of Public Works was equal to the occasion and he prepared a Minute of a report to the Executive Council in which I find the following words:—

On a memo. dated 20th August, 1886, from the Minister of Public Works, representing that in answer to public advertisement three tenders were received for the construction and placing in position of the iron roof for the new departmental building, Wellington Street, Ottawa, at prices ranging from $42,975 to $75,500, the lowest tender being that of Messrs. Rousseau & Mather, of Montreal, which was so much below the estimate made by the chief architect ($58,800), that it was apparent they had made some mistake or omission;—Messrs. Rousseau & Mather were telegraphed to come to Ottawa, and on their doing so explained that in their tender they had not made any provision for making arrangements with the present contractor for the stone work of the building, either as regards hoisting and erection of the roof or for providing a "piling ground" for the delivery of all material ready for placing in position, all of which were required by the specification, and asked to be allowed a few days to consider what arrangement could be made. This was granted, but on the 12th inst. they wrote that they had been unable to make satisfactory arrangements, and asked leave to withdraw their tender and have their security cheque returned to them. Subsequently Messrs. Rousseau & Mather asked leave to reconsider this determination, and after consultation with Mr. Charlebois, the contractor for the stone work, expressed their willingness to sign the contract, but on its being submitted to them, they objected to the clause making them responsible for all arrangements with the present contractor, and as this clause was considered essential, and could not be expunged, they declined to sign the contract and renew their application to be allowed to withdraw their tender.

Now, in that Minute of Council I charge that there are four or five distinct and deliberate falsehoods. The evidence submitted so far in no sense sustains the statements in that Minute of Council. Rousseau & Mather made no mistake. They were willing to accept the contract up to the last moment until they were ruled out. It is true they came up here and that one of the parties withdrew the tender but it is just as true that the very next morning they called upon the Minister of Public Works and insisted upon their right to get the contract and do the work. The report of the Minister of Public Works made to the Executive Council is wholly misleading and wholly false, and his statements rest upon not the slightest foundation. This false report was submitted to the Privy Council but was not approved of by them until the 24th day of August, 1886; twelve days after these men first began the negotiation. During all that time they expressed their keen and earnest desire that the contract should be awarded to them. It is not true, as reported to Council by the then Minister of Public Works, that in the original specifications there was a clause, that before tenderers could get access to the building, they would have to arrange with Charlebois. I challenge any hon. gentleman on the opposite side of the House to point out any such clause in the specification. They swore it was not in the specifications, and they declared it over their own signature in letters and telegrams and other statements. I say that the tender of these men was ruled out fraudulently and improperly, and that the contract was illegally awarded to Charlebois for $60,000. Now, did Charlebois construct the iron roof for $60,000? Verily, no, Sir. The records show that for this same work Charlebois was paid over $101,000. In other words, this economical Government which one day sat upon this side of the House, paid Mr. Charlebois $101,000 for doing a piece of work that Rousseau & Mather offered to do for $42,000. The hon. gentlemen who once held power in this country may think that this is administering the affairs of Canada in the interest of the great body of the taxpayers, but in my judgment it is consistent only with one thing, and that one thing I stated at the opening of my remarks, namely, that there was a conspiracy from the beginning that Charlebois's pockets should be lined for some purpose, and whether the lining remained there always or not I will not venture to say. This is a sample of how the Government dealt with the contractors for the minor portions of the building.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us see how the other contracts panned out under the manipulations of the Public Works Department. There was another tender called for the iron joists of the building. Several tenders were submitted, but I am not concerned in discussing any but one, and that was the tender from Carrier, Lainé & Co.; and their tender was the lowest and amounted to $16,627.13. Did they get the contract from the Government? Not at all. They were frozen out. They were squeezed out of the contract by this same process adopted by Mr. Charlebois, aided, assisted and abetted by the Department of Public Works, to extort from these men who put in a low tender a commission of 25 per cent. The result of it all was that the contract was awarded to Charlebois at $15,327. Did Charlebois do the work for that? Not at all. I find that he got extras amounting to $6,080, and I find further that he actually charged the Government $295 for hauling his material to the building. In all, Charlebois was paid $21,702 for doing a piece of work that Carrier, Lainé & Co. offered to do for $16,000. That may be economy in the sense that the late Government understood the term, and it may be considered by them proper management of the Public Works of the Dominion, but I do not understand it so.

Then there were tenders called for an iron staircase, and by this time it became known to the tenderers that no man could get admission to the building without the permission of Mr. Charlebois.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman give me the reference to the evidence?

Mr. CAMERON. Which evidence?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. A reference to the evidence that shows Charlebois was paid for hauling the joists from the station to the building.

Mr. CAMERON. You will find it in the statement submitted.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Has the hon. gentleman the evidence under his hand?

Mr. CAMERON. No.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Because the evidence is all to the contrary.

Mr. CAMERON. I have every item of it here, and I can give the hon. gentleman the whole amounts in detail if he is anxious to have them.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I merely ask for proof of the statement which I challenged.

Mr. CAMERON. I did not want to take up the time of the House too far, but as I understand it, it appeared before the Public Accounts Committee in an account put into the Public Works Department for the extra claims. I have every item of it here, and it amounts to $101,792.97.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I wish to remind the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cameron) that the joists were not taken from the station to the building. They were hauled from Nepean Point to the building, and hauled for nothing.

Mr. CAMERON. There is an item for hauling of $295.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not from the station to the building.

Mr. CAMERON. It was for hauling from somewhere. I do not know where they could haul it from except from the station to the building, as I suppose that the joists came by car to Ottawa. When the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) interrupted me I was speaking of the iron staircase. Tenders were called for and no one tendered, for the simple reason that it was known that Charlebois charged 25 per cent commission in order to allow contractors admission to the premises. I find that Charlebois got the contract for $11,040, and that he charged for extras and loss $6,823. Was that right? This information I have in my possession and I have it from the public documents which are on record. Then there were the elevators to be erected, and tenders were called for them. Tenders were called for and the lowest tender was that of John Fenson for $29,877. Now, Mr. John Fenson knew when he put his tender in, that Mr. Charlebois exacted a commission of 25 per cent and he added the sum of $8,000 to the tender to cover that commission. As I understand it, he was paid that $8,000 and he was also paid $5,222 for extras. In other words, we had to pay for extras over $5,000, and by reason of the exactions of Mr. Charlebois another $8,000, making in all $13,222, which the country had to pay extra on account of this transaction. Then, Sir, there was another tender called for the heating apparatus, and the contract was awarded to Garth & Co. who were the lowest tenderers at $15,000. They also knew when they submitted their tender of the exactions that were likely to be made by Charlebois, and they added $3,750 to their tender on account of that, and they were paid that and likewise $9,233 for extras. In all, a piece of work that ought to have cost the country $15,000, actually cost the people of Canada $28,483. Now, will any member of the old Government tell us exactly why all these extraordinary extras should be paid? In some cases the extras amounted to very nearly as much as the contract, in some cases to 50 per cent of the contract, in all cases to exorbitant sums; and no one could understand why they should be there. What was the object of all these claims? Why did hon. gentlemen opposite permit them? Was the object to enable Mr. Charlebois to get from 50 to 75 per cent more than the contract prices, or that the Minister estimated that the building would cost? What was the object? Or were there raids on the Minister that he could not resist? The whole transaction reminds me of a story told by Sir Charles Dilke in "Greater Britain" about the Rajah of Travancore, who wished to build a bungalow. He called his architects and contractors before him, and said to them: "I will give you 10,000 rupees for the construction of the bungalow." One of the contractors agreed to take it, and went away. But in a few days he returned, saying: "I cannot take the contract, your Highness." The Rajah asked: "What is the trouble? Why don't you go on with the work?" The contractor replied: "Well, your Highness, out of the 10,000 rupees I have to pay to your Prime Minister 5,000 rupees; I have to pay to the Prime Minister's secretary 1,000 rupees; I have to pay to the servants in his office 2,000 rupees; I have to pay to the ladies of his harem 1,000 rupees; I have to pay to the commander of the forces 500 rupees, and I have to pay to the builder of the bungalow 500 rupees, and what is left for me?" That was the position of Charlebois: "If I submit to all these demands, what is left to me? Nothing." And so his contract prices were supplemented to the extent of 50 or 75 per cent. Perhaps the members of the late Government will tell us confidentially how many rupees of these enormous sums went to the bosses of the party, how much to the labourers in the vineyards, how much to the reptile fund, how much to the commander of the forces, how much to the ladies of the harem, and how much here and there. They might take us into their confidence, and let us know something of that. It is admitted, and everybody who was in Parliament in the session of 1891 knows, that the frauds and the stealings from the public treasury in connection with the Esquimalt Graving Dock were extraordinary. Every one of us who sat in the Parliament in the session of 1891 knows that it was practically admitted that the stealings in connection with the Quebec Harbour Works were shocking; everybody knows that the frauds and forgeries in connection with the Kingston Graving Dock were startling; but I tell you that the stealings in connection with the Langevin Block—using no harsher word, and I do not wish to use strong language—stand out in bold prominence as compared with the stealings in connection with the three works I have mentioned. Let hon. gentlemen opposite explain, if they can, how it was that these extraordinary large sums were paid to these men. Now, Sir, I supposed that this thing was at an end. I supposed that we had heard the last of Mr. Charlebois. I supposed, after the disclosures that were made in the Public Accounts Committee in the session of 1891, that we would hear no more of any demands being made on the public treasury on his account. After we had paid him, according to the Minister's own statement, made on the floor of Parliament, $867,000 for works originally estimated to cost $489,000, and which were contracted for that sum, one would naturally imagine that that was the end of the whole business. But the end was not yet, Mr. Speaker. It is true, that to some extent the scene has changed since 1891. The old men who were here then, a good many of them, are not here to-day. Some of them have gone to their reward, and some of them have gone elsewhere. But although the scene and the men are somewhat changed, Charlebois appears to have been to the fore; and in January last, upon the eve of a general election, when it was in plain view, when everybody knew that it could not be delayed more than a few months, Charlebois appeared upon the scene once more. He was right. The Conservative forces were then marshalled by a man who understood that sort of business to perfection; nobody knows it better. Charlebois made his raid. He put in a claim to the Government for $298,000, for something in connection with the Langevin Block. I wonder if this claim was made during the reign of Sir John Abbott, or Sir John Thompson, or Sir Mackenzie Bowell; or was it left until the Hon. Sir Charles Tupper appeared once more upon the scene, and was it then for the first time that this extraordinary claim was presented to the Government? Why, everybody knows that the claim ought to have been at once rejected. Is there not a clause in the contract under which these works were undertaken and completed, that prohibits any demand on the Dominion Government, unless with the sanction of the chief architect? Is there not a clause which says that the chief architect's certificate must precede any demand made on the Government for extras? But, Sir, Charlebois knew that his hour had come, and he knew that his man had come, and Charlebois was not the man to stay his hand when the hour and the man were to the fore. Sir, I see it stated in the public press—and I have no doubt it is true, but it is to obtain the absolute proof of it that I make this motion—that, either shortly before or shortly after the late Government were spewed out by the people of Canada at the general election, they passed an Order in Council referring this claim—not to the Exchequer Court; oh, no, there would be there legal rules and principles and intelligent construction of legal documents; but they referred it to a friendly arbitration. One of the arbitrators, I am told, was the chief organizer and heeler of the Conservative party in the city of Montreal; the other was a friend of hon. gentlemen opposite and a friend of the contractor. It is true, that the name of Mr. Walter Shanly, in whom I have every confidence, was given as that of the third arbitrator; but, pray, what could Mr. Shanly do when the other two arbitrators were political friends of the Administration? Even if there were nothing in the way, the enormous amount of the claim itself ought to have aroused the suspicion of the hon. leader of the Opposition; and his Government ought to have stayed their hands, or at least ought to have referred the claim to the Exchequer Court. They ought to have insisted, in the case of a man like Charlebois, on the strict legal rights of the Government under the contract, and ought to have recognized no claim that was not sanctioned by the chief architect of the department. Sir, the claim was referred to this friendly arbitration. Fortunately for the good name of the country, fortunately for the public treasury, the watch-dog was at hand, watching the farmer's ricks, and the Order in Council was cancelled. The Order in Council was cancelled, and the little scheme, the little conspiracy which was concocted, has failed in result so far. How far it will fail in the future, I do not know, but I have every confidence that the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) will stick to the letter of the law and the fairness of the contract, and, at all events, refer the matter to the judge of the Exchequer Court, who, no doubt, will do justice in the premises. Sir, I wish to get these papers. I want to know the reason why the Government waived their right under the contract. I want to know why they referred this matter to a friendly arbitration—I mean, friendly to the contractor and the Government. I want to let the people understand exactly how their money has been squandered for the last eighteen years. I want to let them into the true inwardness of the workings of the Public Works Department during the last eighteen years. I want to let the great body of taxpayers understand that the affairs of this country have been managed, not only with extreme extravagance, but extravagance verging—nay, more than verging—on corruption of the worst possible type and kind.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In the conclusion of this most extraordinary speech, to which we have had to listen, the hon. gentleman himself disposed of many of the wild and reckless statements which he inflicted on the House. Whatever we may think of the extraordinary adjectives and superlatives in which he has indulged, it is somewhat satisfactory to know that he has had to confess that he does not believe implicitly himself, if at all, in his own statements, because, after having stated that the object of the last Order in Council was to perpetrate a raid on the treasury, he confesses that the object of his inquiry is to ascertain why this claim was referred to arbitration. He admits that it is information he seeks, and it must be satisfactory to those who are so sensitive as to feel at all hurt by the wild language in which the hon. gentleman has revelled, to know that he does not himself credit his own statements. No doubt, a great many members of this House, who have some knowledge of the Langevin Block matter, which was investigated by a committee of this House in the session of 1891, of which House the hon. gentleman was then a member, cannot be expected to be in a position now, after this lapse of years, to deal with garbled extracts from the evidence adduced before that commission.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). Order.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What is the point of order?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The expression "garbled" is unparliamentary.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have a perfect right to use the expression "garbled extracts," and propose to do so.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I appeal to the Chair.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am sorry to say that I did not catch the exact words which the hon. gentleman used.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I shall repeat them, because I am quite certain that I am within the rules of debate. What I stated was that, considering that this question was dealt with in 1891 by a committee of the House, of which the hon. gentleman who has just spoken was a member, and considering that the question then was not made the subject of any formal resolution or debate after the evidence had been taken by the committee and printed and circulated, no hon. gentleman can be expected now to be prepared to deal with garbled extracts from that evidence or the falsification of public documents.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I rise to order.

Mr. SPEAKER. In my opinion, the hon. gentleman must not charge any hon. member of this House with using garbled documents.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have not said that the hon. member for Huron did garble the documents. We may think what we like and still be in order, and I shall think what I like with regard to the manner in which the hon. gentleman has treated this question and treated his absent colleagues of a Parliament that has passed away; but the rules of debate will not permit me to make a direct charge against the hon. gentleman—

Mr. SPEAKER. Or an indirect one.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Or any charge of having garbled the evidence; but I say that no one can expect that any hon. gentleman could be in a position tonight, without notice, to deal with garbled references and garbled extracts from the blue-book

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman is now referring to garbled extracts.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think that the hon. gentleman, in the sense in which he has last spoken, does impute that the hon. member did knowingly make use of garbled extracts.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have not said so, but will defer to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, as I am always happy to do. I propose to draw your attention, Sir, to another remarkable feature in connection with this debate. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat is an old member of Parliament; but I venture to say that you will look in vain in the records of this House or through "Hansard" to find an attack of such a vicious character made upon either a member present or absent without the slightest hint having been given him in advance or the slightest suggestion that such an attack was to be made. The hon. gentleman put an apparently perfectly harmless motion upon the paper; and, under cover of that motion, which only intimated his desire to obtain information, he asks this House to listen to a laboured argument containing frequent reference—what we are bound by the rule of Parliament to believe are references—to the evidence; and he asks this House to accept an ex parte statement, distinguished mainly for reckless invective, in which he was encouraged by the cheers of the sensitive gentlemen seated around him. The language he used was so extraordinary that I dare not characterize it as it deserves to be characterized without following the bad example of the hon. gentleman. Nor shall I attempt, for the same reason, to characterize as it deserves the conduct of the hon. gentleman in attempting to base upon this apparently harmless motion the gravest possible charges against the character of public and private gentlemen in this country. But I think there can be only one opinion, and that not confined to one side of this House, with regard to the violation of all the rules of taste and the canons of fair-play of which the hon. gentleman has given such a melancholy and deplorable exhibition. It will be my duty, in justice to some of the people whose names have been mentioned by the hon. gentleman in connection with his serious charges, to puncture a great deal of the extraordinary case which he has set up to-day, by the very simple, though tedious, process of reading, not portions or disconnected sentences of the evidence, but the sworn testimony of the officials.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The whole of it?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, but a much more extended reference to the evidence than the hon. gentleman has given, which will at once dispose satisfactorily of his heated charges. Listening to the hon. gentleman, one would imagine that tried and trusted officials who have long served their country, and who are now in the Public Works Department, and who were examined with reference to this so-called steal, were not worthy of credence.

And explanations, none of which were referred to to-day, none of which were given to this House, were put on record. And after these explanations had been recorded, the responsible Ministers sitting in this House had the satisfaction of finding not even the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cameron) prepared to make an accusation upon that evidence before their faces and in their presence when he had an opportunity to do so.

But the hon. gentleman has waited until—a fact which he himself referred to—these gentlemen have disappeared from this Chamber, until these responsible Ministers who were in Parliament with him at that time are no longer here. And this is the opportunity, this is the time, according to that hon. gentleman's idea of what is fair and parliamentary—this is the time and on such a motion as this calling for papers and information, to make these serious charges. Now the evidence, which the hon. gentleman must have examined because he held in his hand a very lengthy brief, shows that the officials of the department not only were responsible so far as they could be responsible in connection with the form of a contract and the peculiar terms of it which gave rise to the complications to which the hon. gentleman referred—these men, experienced for over twenty years in the Public Works Department, serving under different Administrations, Reform and Conservative, testified upon oath that the clause in the contract which gave rise to these difficulties which were reported upon by the Minister of Justice, were common to all the contracts with which that department had had to deal, were common to the contracts for all the buildings that had been built by Canada. And, further, Mr. Speaker, disposing at once of the silly charges that were made to-day, these officials testified that the same conditions, the same difficulties, existed in connection with all these various blocks, with every public building in Canada, and that after the Minister of Justice had advised, the form of the contract was, in that year 1891, for the first time changed, in order, if possible, to surmount a contingency of this character. And, before I come to the evidence, which may be a little tedious, let me give you the summing up of the results and the comparative expenditures made, under Conservative rule, if you will, as contrasted with the expenditure upon similar works made under other Administrations and made in previous years under Conservative rule. Mr. Ewart, one of the architects of the Public Works Department, was called and examined, and his testimony, while not very long, is very much in point upon this question :

948. Can you state how the price of the iron roof compared with that of other roofs of a similar character?—Yes; we considered it a fair rate—6¾ cents.

949. Is that about the general thing?—The general thing for that class of work is from 6 to 7 cents.

950. Can you give us an idea of the price of the heating apparatus compared with the price paid in other cases?—As regards heating apparatus, the general rule is this: We rate them so much the cubic foot for the extent of the building. Quite a number have been put in recently at 1¼; I think they nearly always cost 2. In the North-west we have paid more than that.

951. Of course it would be scarcely fair between the Langevin Block and the North-west?—No.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

952. You are an architect, Mr. Ewart, are you not?—Yes.

953. And generally make estimates of the cost of public buildings?—Yes; as a general rule.

954. You are accustomed to making calculations?—Yes. When any buildings are complete we take out the cubic contents.

955. Can you inform the committee how the cost of the Langevin Block would compare with other public buildings—such, for instance, as the Western Block?—The Western Block cost 32 cents per cubic foot, and some buildings cost a great deal more than that. The Langevin Block cost 26½ cents, as against 32 cents for the Western Block. Of course, it depends a great deal upon the building. The Hamilton post office, for instance, cost 24 cents per cubic foot. A plain brick building generally runs from 3 to 16 cents; stone and brick from 16 to 20. Buildings all stone generally run from 20 to 24.

956. The Langevin Block you consider as cheap as any of the public buildings that you have referred to?—I consider—

And I call the particular attention of the House to this :

The cheapest building that has been erected since I was in the department over twenty years ago.

Could any man reading that evidence, putting it before the House, hope that this House would take seriously the statement made by the hon. gentleman when he attempted to characterize the nature of this transaction. And then as to the suggestion that because estimates had been exceeded, that because estimates had been almost doubled there must be something wrong—why, we have had time and again in this House the evidence, and the best evidence, that in connection with all the great public works of Canada, whether under the late Government, under the late Mr. Mackenzie or in the previous period of Conservative rule after 1867, work has been found to be of such a character that it could not be done for the estimate and the estimate has been doubled or trebled. So in connection with the works outside of this country. For instance, the Manchester Ship Canal, the original estimate, made by skilled engineers, was, I believe, trebled before the canal was completed. And no one has ever heard in connection with that work a single suggestion of wrong-doing. Of course there may be fraud and there may be thieving in these things. In that case, of course, the cost to the country would be increased; but no person should jump to such a conclusion, from mere comparison of the estimates with the actual cost. A serious charge of that kind can only be proved by evidence of the very strongest character. Then Mr. Fuller, the chief engineer of the department, pricked all these bubbles long ago. But the hon. gentleman who has addressed us for such a length of time did not do the late Government or even Mr. Fuller the justice, as the architect who assumed so far as he could assume a great deal of responsibility in connection not only with this work but in connection with the recommendations that were taken to Council to read what he said. Mr. Fuller was called, and after a great deal of the evidence by the disappointed contractors, Messrs. Rousseau and Mather upon whom the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cameron) so strongly relies, he gave evidence first of all that the contract that Mr. Charlebois was acting on his report, that it was taken to Council and acted upon. That report was submitted, and, in order to dispose of the hon. gentleman's argument, I think it necessary to put that report before the House. It is as follows:—

Memorandum.—Re Tenders for Iron Roofs, New Department Buildings, Ottawa Tenders:

Rousseau & Mather.....	$42,975
Hamilton Bridge Works .....	46,000
A. Charlebois .....	77,590
Estimate by department.....	$58,800

The tender of Messrs. Rousseau & Mather being so much under what was considered by the department to be the fair value of the work, there appeared to have been some mistake or omission. Therefore, by direction of the hon. the Minister, Messrs. Rousseau & Mather were telegraphed on the 31st ultimo to come to Ottawa. In order that explanations might be obtained as to what arrangements they had made to execute the works if the contract were awarded them.

Messrs. Rousseau & Mather arrived here on the 2nd instant, and stated that they had not made any arrangements with the contractor for the building, either as regards the hoisting and erection of the roofs, or for providing a "piling ground" for the delivery of all material ready for placing in position, all of which were required by the conditions of the specifications. Before deciding to accept the contract they asked to be allowed a short time in order to see what arrangements they could make. This was granted. At this interview Messrs. Rousseau & Mather stated that there was a mistake of several thousands of dollars in their tender; but, of course, they did not expect that to be allowed them.

On the 12th instant they wrote (No. 69833) that they were not able to make satisfactory arrangements, and preferred, under the circumstances to withdraw their tender and accepted cheque.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). That is the report that the hon. gentleman is reading

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The report of Mr. Fuller, the Chief Architect.

The second tender, that of the Hamilton Bridge Company, was informal, as it contained conditions not called for by the specifications, and which would materially alter the amount of the tender. The third tender, that of A. Charlebois, was considered unreasonably in excess of what the department estimated a fair value of the work. To call for new tenders would have caused a great delay, and have given the contractor for the building a claim for damages, as he had notified the department that the walls would be sufficiently advanced by the 1st November next to allow the erection of the iron roof to be commenced. It was considered advisable to ascertain from the second tenderer if any terms could be made by which the work might be progressed without delay. The manager of the Hamilton Bridge Company was, therefore, summoned here by telegraph and arrived here on the 13th instant.

In the meantime, Messrs. Rousseau & Mather wrote (No. 69879) that they had another interview with Mr. Charlebois, and asked to be allowed two or three days before giving a definite answer. This was granted. On the 14th instant they wired (No. 69914) that they were prepared to sign the contract and asked that acceptance be at once telegraphed them so that they might cable England to fill the order for iron. The reply telegraphed was that no authority could be given until the contract was signed, and that it would be ready for signature on or before noon the 17th instant.

The hon. gentleman, I think, spoke of their being pressed. Here were gentlemen on the 14th asking that their tender should be accepted at once, and the answer was: We cannot accept by telegraph, but the contract is ready for acceptance on arrival at Ottawa:

On the 16th instant Messrs. Rousseau & Mather wrote (No. 69928) in confirmation of their telegram of the 14th.

Owing to pressure of business the contract was not ready for signature until the 18th instant, after perusing it, Messrs. Rousseau & Mather objected to the clause making them responsible for the arrangements to be made with the contractor for the building, so that there might be no disputes or delays hereafter in the prosecution of the work of hoisting and erecting in place the various portions of the iron roof, and asked that the clause be expunged. This could not be allowed, as the clause was necessary, and also covered the purpose for which the application of Messrs. Rousseau & Mather for the reconsideration of the withdrawal of their tender was granted, and, when the matter was submitted to the hon. the Minister they positively declined the contract. At the interview of the 14th instant with the manager of the Hamilton Bridge Company, he stated that, in making up their tender, no arrangements had been made with the contractor for the building for hoisting or erecting the iron work of the roof, nor had any provision been made for a "piling ground," that the tender submitted was made low under the supposition that an extension of time for the delivery of the material until April 1st as stipulated by the company would be granted; that under ordinary circumstances, all the work might be delivered by the 1st of November, as called for by the conditions and specifications, but that they could not undertake it without a considerable addition to their tender owing to the large amount of work they had on hand, though he was not then prepared to state the terms upon which the company could be induced to assume the work.

As the prosecution of the work is very urgent, and, as before stated, to call for new tenders would entail delay of probably at least one year in the completion of the building, it was considered advisable to ascertain what terms could be made with Mr. Charlebois so that he should assume all responsibility of every description and guarantee that the work would proceed without delay.

After a full explanation and discussion of the whole matter, Mr. Charlebois stated that the delay which had been granted Messrs. Rousseau & Mather would oblige him to pay an increased amount to induce reliable parties to undertake to deliver the work on time, still, as it was of great importance to him as well as to the Government that the building should be completed as speedily as possible, he would undertake the whole work, assuming the entire responsibility for the sum of $60,000, and guaranteed to have sufficient portions of the iron principals erected in position to enable him to have the whole covered in so as to form a thorough protection, and thereby enable him to proceed with interior work during the winter, which would materially hasten the completion of the building.

Unless arrangements could have been made between the respective contractors, it is believed that both parties would have caused endless disputes, involving delays, and thereby claims for heavy damages, which would have entailed large legal and other expenses, besides a delay of probably another year in the completion of the building.

Therefore, under all the circumstances, and with the view to as early occupation of the building as possible, I consider it would be in the public interest to accept the offer of Mr. Charlebois to undertake the whole of the work and assume all the responsibility for the sum of $60,000, which amount is only $2,000 in excess of the department estimate.

I would further recommend that the cheques of the other tenders be returned.

No man can accept the view of the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) without considering that Mr. Fuller is absolutely unworthy of the position that he occupied then, or occupies now. But no hon. gentleman since 1891, after hearing that gentleman's testimony, ever suggested, ever whispered, that Mr. Fuller had not maintained the highest possible character in his administration, and in the performance of his duty as chief architect. Mr. Fuller goes on to give a recital of the different tenders. I can only speak on a few points, because I sent for this document while the hon. gentleman was speaking, and I am not in a position to sum up, as I know with very little time I could do, a clear and complete answer to every statement the hon. gentleman made. Take, for instance, a reference to one of the last subjects, and one to which I called attention while the hon. gentleman was speaking, to show how inaccurately he has taken notes to make up his argument :

With relation to question 307, with respect to the hauling of iron joists from the station, what explanation do you desire to give?—I think, in my previous evidence, I said something about the Canada Atlantic station.

That was in reference to piling ground?—No ; hauling. The joists were to be hauled to the Government ground on Nepean point, and carried from that point by the Government.

Did the contract provide for the delivery of the joists by the contractor?—Yes.

Why did you take them to Nepean Point?—When it was decided to take the placing of them out of Carrier's hands, it was necessary, before the men could be paid that the joists should be delivered on Government ground, and, therefore, he hauled them to Nepean Point instead of to the building. That was a longer distance than to the building and the Government paid for their delivery.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Did you pay the contractors anything extra for taking them from Nepean Point to the building?—No.

Why did you send them to Nepean Point instead of the building here?—There was no room here.

Was the building ready for them when they were delivered?—No.

Consequently, you had to send them to some other place in the building? Certainly.

The hon. gentleman being a member of the bar, does not require me to go on and show that in the arrangement there made under the terms of the contract, the department acted very wisely indeed. Now, Mr. Speaker, this officer was examined on two occasions. I refer to the last occasion when he was examined. When he was in the hands, I think of the chairman, he was asked :

Were the conditions in the original contract with Charlebois for the construction of the main building, the same in the specifications as is usual in your several contracts for public buildings? They were exactly the same, but since this difficulty has occurred, we have always put it in the contracts that they are to allow people to go in.

Now, I call attention to another portion of his evidence. After having stated that they had awarded the contract to Charlebois upon his report :

And subsequently, about the time you were going to advertise for tenders for the roof, Charlebois wrote the department a letter advising the department that in regard to further contracts, for instance the roofing, to avoid any further misunderstanding you should put in a condition in which the tenderer was required to show that he had made his arrangements with Charlebois? Yes.

He must show you he had got Charlebois's consent to tender for the roof?—He had to find his own piling ground.

And to get Charlebois's consent?—No.

You swore so the last time, I think?—If I did I made a mistake then.

This is a correction which the hon. gentleman had overlooked. Mr. Chapleau examined one of the contractors, Mr. Mather, to whom the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) declared, as follows:—

Did the Minister speak to you about the specification—you had read the specification for your tender?—Yes.

You know there was a clause in that specification which said an arrangement had to be made with the main contractor?—Yes.

And did the Minister tell you it was in your specification, and you were obliged to do it?—Yes.

That is what he said?—Yes.

This shows that when the contractors went into this speculation or business they knew they were in the hands of Charlebois to a large extent in connection with that tender, and that was not peculiar to Charlebois's contract, but was the stereotype form which had been used for many past years in connection with contracts for public buildings. I am going to ask the attention of the House to Mr. Fuller's evidence on some of the points to which Mr. Ewart refers :

With respect to question 432, were the conditions in the original contract with Charlebois the same as the usual specifications ?—I want to add to that some instances. In 1870 the finishing of the Parliamentary Library was by separate contracts under precisely the same conditions. The contract for the masonry, iron roof and putting on the roof were separate. The Western Block extension in 1875, the contract for the foundation was let to one person, the masonry and brickwork to another, the carpenter and joiner work to another, and the iron joists and iron roof to another.

I call attention to the work on the Western Block extension, which was carried out in the good old Reform days in 1875. The contract for the foundation was let to one person, the masonry and brick work to another, the carpenter and joiner work to another, and the iron joists and iron roof to another. What about the attempt to steal in 1875 ? Where is the memory of the hon. member for South Huron in that regard ? How was it that he did not discover all those diabolical schemes and plotting, where they divided up contracts in the same way with interested parties and carried out a system of connivance, collusion and fraud to divide up money which should properly belong to the public treasury. The hon. gentleman never referred to cases that occurred in 1875. Yet if we are to follow the hon. gentleman in his argument, it will appear that this fraud, rascality and villainy has been rampant from 1867 down, and was not stopped by the Reform party, but was carried on between 1874 and 1879 ; and it was not until this corrupt Administration to which the hon. gentleman has referred, took the matter up that Mr. Fuller prepared a clause, by which the condition enabling this rascality to be carried on was eliminated from the form of contract. The witness goes on to say :

The Hamilton post office, in 1882, is another instance. The contracts for the main building, heating and elevators were all separate. We had no trouble of any kind whatever. In 1883, the contract for the Montreal drill hall included separate contracts for the masonry and iron roof, and there was no trouble of any kind. These were all under the same conditions. In 1885, there were the Montreal armouries. The contracts for the masonry, iron girders and the iron roof were separate. The iron roof was put on by Rousseau & Mather under the same conditions precisely.

Here are these poor men driven out of the business on account of this clause read by the hon. member for South Huron. But they had worked on a contract in Montreal under precisely the same clause. Here they put in a tender. And the hon. gentleman accepts the interested statement made by them as against Mr. Fuller's official evidence and all the rest of the testimony, when they set this up as an excuse for not accepting the contract and for the purpose of building up a claim against the Government for damages in connection with the withdrawal of their tender. Mr. Fuller is further examined :

From which we learn, that although the contracts in the past, from 1870 to the present time, until you had this difficulty, have never had a provision in the contract to compel the contractor for the masonry work to permit access, there has been no trouble ?—We always took it for granted that they had the right.

And that was subsequently decided by the Minister of Justice ?—Yes.

Turn now to question 445 ?—The same answer as previously, with respect to the specification.

Mr. Fuller then explained that this particular condition is not new, but that it was the usual one, and so he explained all the evidence on which the hon. gentleman had tried to base a case. Further on his evidence is as follows :—

Then look at questions 782 to 807 ?—Rousseau states that Sir Hector told him : " You have come in the right time, because I was going to give the contract to Charlebois." This must have been on the 12th of August, as the letter of withdrawal was dated the 11th, and Rousseau states he arrived in Ottawa at midnight on that date and waited on the Minister next morning. This remark could hardly have been made at that time, because the next tender was from the Hamilton Bridge Company and they had not then been asked if they were prepared to enter into the contract.

I do not think it necessary to attempt more than I have already attempted in a debate of this kind, sprung upon the House suddenly. I was very suspicious under the circumstances, seeing the state of indignation into which the hon. member for South Huron worked himself, finding an old parliamentarian, as the hon. gentleman undoubtedly is, resorting to such a motion to make such charges, in regard to the motives animating the hon. gentleman. I confess I thought the hon. gentleman had been a little restive at being placed on the defensive and compelled to support an Administration of whose policy he is just as ignorant as I am, who has been kept in darkness as we all have been as to what they are thinking about, what they are going to do and as to what they imagine they may be able to get through this House and yet politically live, and consequently he has endeavoured to draw a herring across the track. He does not desire that the public mind should be drawn to the Government in the regular and constitutional way and that its members should be kept under the fierce light that a Government, if it lives, must exist under ; but he has endeavoured to hark back and dig up some old scandals and charges, and I am certain he has not put them in any more formidable shape than did those who attempted to make political capital out of them in years gone by. But the hon. gentleman thinks there has been fraud and corruption, and he scents them in an Order in Council, which I think the country was somewhat surprised to first learn from the lips of a Cabinet Minister on the stump. It seems to me that if hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches are seriously considering the situation of the country and are making a bona fide effort to develop a policy to be announced at an early day, they should not be occupied with ransacking the records and files of the department and scampering out on the stump, and with making behind the backs of gentlemen affected and behind the backs of their opponents wild statements such as the Minister of Public Works made, because he found, forsooth, under an Order in Council that there was a reference of a dispute between the Crown and a contractor. Did the hon. gentleman from Huron (Mr. Cameron) never hear of the hundreds of references that were made in the time of Mr. Mackenzie, and did the settlements of claims and the payment of more than the contractor could legally recover from a court of law convey to him than indications of dishonesty or jobbery? Did the hon. gentleman not learn before insinuating such serious charges, that the statements he made in regard to that Order in Council and that reference are altogether inaccurate? He has referred to those gentlemen to whom the reference was made in a rather questionable manner. Well, Sir, the House knows Mr. Shanly and his standing in Canada. I do not know the other gentlemen, and I do not know that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cameron) knows either of them, but he has probably picked out of some Grit newspaper of low standing charges against their character. It is enough for me that Mr. Shanly would sit with them. In the absence of any evidence to support the statement of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cameron), it is enough for me, and it will be enough for most hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House to know that Mr. Shanly was one of the arbitrators. That distinguished engineer has a character in Canada that would not permit him to take so ill-advised a course as the hon. gentleman from Huron has suggested. But what are the facts? If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cameron) did not read the Order in Council, it was hardly fair for him to attack the character of any one in connection with it. The Order in Council authorizes a reference to these gentlemen, but nothing in connection with the reference made the opinion of these gentlemen binding upon the executive. It was an inquiry directed upon the terms of the Order in Council, and when that inquiry is finished—should it be gone on with as contemplated—it would then be for the Executive to consider its value, and after having considered it, to decide whether they would take the responsibility of acting upon it. That time never came, and so I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cameron) has, in ignorance of the facts, rather precipitated his opinion upon this House. The Government had in every sense the right to refer to these gentlemen to ascertain their views, and before they could be open to the suspicion which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cameron) has suggested, some executive action would be required from which it would be impossible for the Government to retrace their steps. In speaking of the Hon. Mr. Desjardins, who is not now a member of either House of Parliament, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cameron), who has apparently followed the newspaper reports, might have in justice to Mr. Desjardins, given his explanation of the facts, and made it unnecessary for me to have said a word on that score. Mr. Desjardins says that his chief architect admitted in dealing with this matter, that he could not give an unbiassed report. I accept that statement, and in view of that, surely no dangerous course was pursued in referring the question to this board for their opinion. But, whenever we step aside from the cast-iron provisions of these Government contracts, some hon. gentlemen labour under the delusion—and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cameron) is conspicuous in that—that there is an irregularity of a serious character involved. I hold in my hands a report of the Auditor General of Great Britain of date 1893-94, and in that, Mr. Speaker, you will find that in a dispute between a Government engineer and a contractor, the usual course is to refer to an arbitrator. The form of the contract is set out in that report, and while the contractors are in the hands of the engineer, there is a clause which says:

In case of disagreement in respect to any of the matters mentioned in the last paragraph, the matter in dispute shall be referred to arbitration and determined by E. Murphy, Esq., Government arbitrator.

The fact that the chief engineer has one opinion or another does not tie the hands of the Executive, nor would it be in the public interest to lay down any hard and fast rule of that character. I am satisfied that when the House is put in possession of the further information moved for by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cameron), and when hon. gentlemen take the trouble to study this blue-book, which gave us some time and trouble in 1891, it will be found by any impartial investigation, that whatever be the difficulties in the matter and whatever the additional expense, this building was one of the most satisfactorily accomplished public works ever undertaken in Canada, if we are to believe the officials; and that the difficulties and jarring between these claimants was due to no such idea as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cameron) has conveyed to this House to-day, due to no corruption of any kind whatever, directly or indirectly; but due to this usual and regular form of contract, the weakness of which was first discovered in this matter. The contract was practically at the bottom of all the difficulties. This report also gives a statement at the end of it, showing that a great many of the extra allowances were the ordinary and usual allowances in connection with such a work. These allowances were determined by the chief architect, and the opinion of that gentleman has not yet been attacked. I wish to make a remark before I sit down with regard to the reference of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cameron) to Mr. Raza. He said that Mr. Raza was a Tory heeler, and I suppose he did not mean that in a complimentary sense to Mr. Raza. I am informed, and my information, I hope, is better than that of the hon. gentleman, that Mr. Raza is a well known architect of high standing in Montreal.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). Mr. Speaker, the debate arises on the motion made by my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. Cameron) for all the papers in connection with the construction of the well-known public building on the south side of Wellington Street in this city. My hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has apologized to-night for his inability to grapple with the argument of my hon. friend (Mr. Cameron) by stating, somewhat fairly, that he only was able to read a few portions of the evidence while the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cameron) was making his speech.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I admit that his argument was scrappy, and that his defence was very poor, and I accept his apology that he had not time to prepare it. But, I think the question of sufficient magnitude to justify this House in giving time to the hon. gentleman to mature and deliver the fullest defence that is possible under the circumstances. Sir, I followed with some care the speech made by my hon. friend from Huron, and I have some knowledge of the facts myself as I followed pretty closely the evidence taken before the committee in 1891. Although my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. Cameron) did use very strong language in condemning the conspiracy and the corruption which has surrounded that work from beginning to end, I venture to say that he did not use one adjective which the circumstances does not justify. My hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) says that if he had time he could give a complete and clear answer to every one of the charges made by my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. Cameron), and I hope the debate will assume such shape that he may have ample time.

It will give me great satisfaction to find that the charges, which I believe to have been proved up to the hilt, of corruption against public men of this country, are without foundation. If the hon. gentleman can establish that fact, and can whiten and clear the characters of those public men who have been under a cloud for the last 10 years in connection with this matter, he will deserve the gratitude of this House; and I propose, before I close, to move that this debate be adjourned in order that the hon. gentleman, after he has had the amplest time to study every scrap of information he can obtain in connection with this subject, may confirm the statement he has made here, of his ability to give a clear and complete answer to every charge of corruption made against public officials in connection with this matter. The hon. gentleman appears to be a good deal agitated, not only to-night, but on almost every occasion on which he has arisen since this House met, about what he conceives to be the absence of a policy on the part of the Government. The hon. gentleman is about the only one I know of who is at all troubled.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Don't you believe that.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If there is one feeling that I have heard of more than another from British Columbia to Prince Edward Island, in connection with the advent of this Government to power, it is the feeling of complete and profound satisfaction which animates every class of the community, in the larger cities particularly, the fact of the relegation to obscurity of the late Government, and the accession to power of my hon. friend on a policy which has been defined so clearly in the last three years that nobody has any doubt what it means—a policy, Sir, which he has not only the intention to carry out, but which I am proud to tell hon. gentlemen opposite he has a good majority at his back to enable him to carry out; a policy which will give satisfaction, not only to the mercantile and manufacturing community, as my hon. friend from North Leeds (Mr. Frost) so very well said the other night, but which I believe will give equal satisfaction to the great farming, lumbering and fishing communities, who have been looking in vain for relief for so many years past.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Explain.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Now, Mr. Speaker, without going into the details of this matter, let us look at a few of the more salient points connected with the letting of the contracts for this work, and ascertain if possible wherein the facts before this House, apart from any extraneous evidence, justify a charge of conspiracy and corruption. There was a contract made for the erection of a great public building in the centre of Ottawa. After plans had been carefully prepared by the chief architect, and submitted to the Minister of Public Works and approved of by all the officers of his department, the late Government came down to this Parliament and asked it for $300,000 to construct that great public building. They told us, away back in the year 1882—it was just after I had taken my seat in this Parliament that the congestion which existed in the then departmental buildings was such that more room had to be found, and that after the most careful examination and preparation on the part of the chief architect and his assistants, they were enabled to inform the House that if the House entrusted them with $300,000, they would give this country a building complete in every particular—there were to be no extras. On that statement the House voted the money, and the then Minister of Public Works let the contracts, and went on with the construction of the building. At the end of three years he discovered, or he told the House that he had discovered, that the contract which the Government had let for a complete building was a contract for the walls of the building, without a roof at all. We had entered into contract, $200,000 or $300,000 of public money had been spent, and the House was then coolly asked to vote some $60,000 more to these gentlemen to enable them to put a roof upon the building which they had constructed. That sum was voted in 1886. Then, in the year 1888 they found that they had no staircases in the building to get from the basement to the upper storeys, and Parliament was called upon to vote some $11,000 extra to build staircases. Our hands had been tied, we were not free agents, and we voted the money to the extent of $366,000. What happened then? My hon. friend has given in detail, with a lucidity which requires no comment from me, the history of the letting of these several contracts. He has pointed out to the House how it is apparent on the face of the very calling for tenders and every letting of contracts, that there was a deep-seated conspiracy on the part, not, as he carefully guarded himself to say, of the head of the department, but of the department, that every one of those contracts should fall into the hands of one man; and no matter who tendered or how much money others could put up or how much political influence they had, Charlebois was always able to squeeze them out and get the contracts. What did he do? After entering into those three contracts for $366,000, he came down with claims, for extras on the main building amounting to $137,412, for extra work on the iron roof amounting to $3,800, and for extra work on the iron stairs amounting to $6,823, from which was deducted for work provided for in his contract which he did not perform, $22,000. And so this gentleman, who entered into a contract to construct the building originally for less than $300,000, was paid by the late Government, $490,000 odd. Sir, I have never heard yet in this

Mr. DAVIES.

Parliament a public man, who valued his reputation, attempt to defend that payment except my hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) to-night; and when my hon. friend takes the time he asks this House to give him, I do not think he will venture to say that these are a series of transactions which he can approve of. And now, after the whole thing is over and $490,000 has been paid for the building, Mr. Charlebois comes to the Government and makes a claim for an additional extra of $296,000. Why, Sir, has this claim remained so long unpaid? Sir John Macdonald was leader of the Government when he first put in his claim, and it was not allowed then; Sir John Abbott followed him, and the claim was pressed from time to time, and was not allowed then; Sir John Thompson followed him, the claim was again pressed, but was not allowed; and lately we had the Government of Sir Mackenzie Bowell, under whom the claim was further pressed, and not allowed then. And why?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It has not been allowed now.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Because the chief architect told each successive Government that there was nothing in the claim at all. Because the chief architect stated on each successive occasion that he could not certify to the claim, that it was utterly baseless, and because the several contracts under which Mr. Charlebois constructed the building, contained a clause, clear and specific, that if he had any claim for extras that claim was to be determined upon, solely and exclusively, by the chief architect. Sir, the contract had made the chief architect the umpire who was to decide between the contractor and the Government, the contract was clear and explicit that the chief architect's decision should be final and irrevocable, and that decision was given, time and again, with wearisome iteration, and I say that at the last moment, just on the eve of the elections, twelve or thirteen years after the claim had matured and been repudiated, for a Government, not fresh from the people, which had never received a mandate from the people at all, and which had been selected, owing to the peculiar and untoward circumstances of the time, to carry on the legislation, from day to day, until the people's verdict could be recorded—for such a Government to step in and reverse the verdict of four succeeding Governments and recognize, in the way they did, this extraordinary claim, thirteen or fourteen years old, for $296,000, was an act which has no parallel, I venture to say, in the preceding history of Canada. What does the contract say? It says explicitly in its thirty-third clause:

That all matters of difference arising between the parties thereto—that is between the Crown represented by the Minister of Public Works, on the one hand, and Mr. Charlebois on the other—on any matter arising out of the contract shall be referred to the award or arbitration of the chief architect, and that the award of such chief architect shall be final and conclusive.

Sir, the chief architect had made his award. Time and again he had represented to Mr. Charlebois and the Department of Public Works that there was not the shadow of a basis for this claim of $296,000; yet in the face of that and of the further fact, which ought to be always borne in mind, that the chief architect was peculiarly qualified in this case to give judgment, because the building had been constructed, from the cellar to the iron roof, in his daily presence, and he knew therefore all the details and was not basing opinion on a report of the sub-engineer from some part of the Dominion, one would have supposed that this old and musty claim of twelve or thirteen years ago would have been relegated to the limbo of the past. But no, this Government, of which the hon. leader of the Opposition was the head, on the 6th of July—a fortnight after it was defeated by the people, and when it was established beyond peradventure that it did not and never had enjoyed the confidence of the electorate—passed an Order in Council, taking it out of the power of the chief architect to give any further decision, and vesting it in the hands of three or four gentlemen, two of the names of whom my hon. friend says he never heard before. How can that be justified? Who gave that Government the mandate to relegate to these arbitrators the decision of a matter which had been determined by the recognized legal authority?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not the decision.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What was it referred to them for?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Investigation and report, leaving it free for them to act.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Let me read to the hon. gentleman what the terms of his reference were:

That in the event of Mr. Charlebois refusing to accept that specific sum, authority be given to refer the claim, as above stated, amounting to a total of $296,257 to three arbitrators, the said arbitrators to be Messrs. Alphonse Raza, and J. O. LaForest, C.E., with Walter Shanly, C.E., as third arbitrator or referee.

That seems plain enough.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That part, yes.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Is there any doubt about that? Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that if that were a legal document binding on the Crown, and they had gone to an arbitration, and the arbitrators had made an award, any Government or Parliament could afterwards in equity repudiate it?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I mean to say that the effect of that document was simply to give the Government the benefit of the opinion of those references, and that after they had reported in favour of the claim, the Government could, for any reasons that might seem proper to it, decline to pay, and the claimant could not bring an action and enforce his claim.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The effect of that document was precisely the same as the effect of any other reference the Government may make. The Crown is only bound legally when you get a judgment against it in the Exchequer Court, but it is bound by motives just as high as a legal obligation to abide by the decision of arbitrators to whom it makes a reference. If the Crown refers a matter to arbitration, the Crown is bound, in equity and good conscience, by the result of that arbitration, unless it can show fraud in the reference or award. As I understand, this Order in Council refers to the three arbitrators the determination of that claim of $296,000, and I say that in so doing the late Government went beyond its power.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Has the hon. gentleman a copy of the Order in Council?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Would it be too much trouble for the hon. gentleman to read the order?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What I have read is the only part which touches the point now before us.

That in the event of Mr. Charlebois refusing to accept a specific sum, authority be given to refer the claim, as above stated, amounting to a total of $296,257 to three arbitrators, the said arbitrators to be Messrs. Alphonse Raza and J. O. LaForest, with Walter Shanly as third arbitrator or referee.

That before any action be taken on the finding of said arbitrators, their award be laid before His Excellency the Governor General in Council. That the cost of the said arbitration be paid by the contractor should the award not exceed the sum of $19,000 above named, but in case of an award exceeding that sum said cost to be paid by the Government.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Exactly, that is my clause.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I see no importance in that. In every case where there is an award, before action is taken notice has to be given to the parties interested. There is no use, in my hon. friend trying to lead the House to believe that this was not an attempt to take that matter out of the hands of the chief architect, in whose hands the contract had left it, and refer it to three arbitrators who, he believed, would give an award in favour of the contractor, which the chief architect refused to give.

I shall not detain the House in discussing the matter further. I promised only to touch upon a few of the most salient points in connection with it. I trust the debate will not close to-night. I trust that the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) will have the ample opportunity he desires of going thoroughly into the matter and answering, if he can, the damaging speech which has fallen from the lips of the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron). With that object in view, I may close by moving that the debate be adjourned.

Motion agreed to.

THE DISMISSAL OF PATRICK McBRIDE.

Mr. HACKETT moved for :

Copies of all letters and papers relating to the disposal of Patrick McBride, late overseer of fisheries for Prince County, Prince Edward Island.

He said : The other evening, on the general subject of dismissals, I took the opportunity of referring to this case. I wish again to say that Mr. McBride, who was a very competent official, a gentleman who had had very great experience on fishery matters, was dismissed from his office after the advent of the present Government to power, no sufficient cause being assigned for that dismissal. No charge whatever was preferred against him ; he was dismissed simply at the command of the Minister. Mr. McBride was appointed by Order in Council, and it has always been believed that officials appointed by Order in Council should be dismissed by Order in Council. But in this case Mr. McBride was simply notified, not through the regular official channels by the department, but by the agent of the department at Charlottetown, Mr. Lord. Now, Mr. Lord is a thoroughly competent man, and well understanding his duties in connection with the fisheries of Prince Edward Island. He would not have sent this letter to Mr. McBride unless he had been instructed by the Minister or somebody else in authority. This letter stated that Mr. McBride was dismissed simply because there was a change in the Administration.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). Do I understand the hon. gentleman to quote from the letter ?

Mr. HACKETT. No ; I have not the letter by me. But I was informed by Mr. McBride that he had received such a letter. I did not think it necessary to ask him for it, but I felt it my duty, in justice to Mr. McBride, to bring this matter before the attention of the House. If we are going to have an introduction of the spoils system here, if officials are to be dismissed for no cause but that a change of Administration has taken place, the result must be that the tone of the civil service will be lowered, the service will be degraded, and the men who are faithfully doing the work of the country will be discouraged. I do not blame the Minister in this matter, as I feel that pressure must have been brought to bear upon him. A number of office seekers, no doubt, have been urging him to make changes, and he felt that he should do something to satisfy them, and found that Mr. McBride was his easiest victim. He saw there was no difficulty in dismissing Mr. McBride, and he dismissed him in order to make way for some one who, as he thought, had claims upon the party. The hon. Minister is a good-natured gentleman, who would not wish to do any man a wrong, and he dismissed Mr. McBride without considering that gentleman's claim, and without considering the large interests entrusted to Mr. McBride's care—the interests of the fisheries. I took occasion, the other evening, to read to the House an extract from a newspaper published in Prince Edward Island, stating that one of the finest angling streams in the province, the Dunk River, which not only affords good trout fishing, but which, in the fall of the year, is the great salmon-breeding ground, has been utterly neglected. Mr. McBride lives near this stream, and has had special charge of it. He was the overseer, and had one or two guardians under him, so that for years it has been well protected. Since Mr. McBride was dismissed, as I said the other evening, this stream has been neglected, and is being netted to-day, and thus one of the most valuable fishing streams on the Island is being made valueless. In speaking of Mr. McBride, the other evening, the hon. Minister said that Mr. McBride had not paid sufficient attention to his duties in connection with the lobster fishery. This is an exceedingly valuable fishery, affording employment to a large number of people of Prince Edward Island. It brings into the province about half a million dollars a year, which to a population of 120,000 is a good deal of money. This fishery requires the paternal care of the Government, and I know, that it has all the care the hon. Minister can give it, for he feels as much as any man the necessity of protecting this fishery, and he desires as much as any man to advance the interests of those engaged in this industry. It is a singular thing that about the time the fisheries should be closed, when the close season should be strictly observed, the hon. gentleman should take the opportunity of dismissing Mr. McBride. The hon. gentleman stated the other evening that Mr. McBride had not shown himself an active and attentive officer. I know very well, from my association with Mr. McBride, that he has paid great attention, not only to the lobster fishery, which is of great importance, but also to the oyster fishery. The oyster fishery of Richmond Bay, which is one of the finest in Canada, is right in the vicinity of Mr. McBride's place, and he has been paying great attention to that fishery. I am informed on good authority that that fishery is not at present receiving the attention and the protection which it should receive at the hands of the department. But, to show what care has been taken of the lobster fishery in Prince Edward Island during the last few years, I will give the House some statistics which will show the hon. Minister that Mr. McBride has not been neglecting his duty. The quantity of lobsters canned in the province of Prince Edward Island in the season of 1887 was 2,009,107 pounds. That was the lowest quantity the pack of the Island has reached. In 1894, seven years after, notwithstanding that it was supposed the fishery was nearly exhausted, the pack increased, owing to the protection given, and owing to the more intelligent regulations and the greater attention given to the fisheries, to 3,173,084 pounds, or an increase of 1,163,977 pounds in the seven years. These figures show that, not only had that fishery been preserved, but it was producing a larger amount than it did seven years previously, at which time it was believed that the fishery was about exhausted, that, in fact, the lobsters were well nigh exterminated. Now, let me show what was done in Prince county, where nearly one-half the whole amount is canned. This county was specially under Mr. McBride's care. In Prince county, in 1887, the total pack was 1,206,567 pounds; in 1894 the pack was 1,498,528, or an increase of 291,961 pounds, showing that Prince county, which was more specially under Mr. McBride's care, had not deteriorated, but had improved, although it was supposed in 1887 that the fishery was about exhausted. I trust, therefore, that the hon. Minister will consider these facts, and that he will recognize now that Mr. McBride was dismissed without cause and without any charge being preferred against him; that he was attending strictly to his duty, and that he will see that Mr. McBride is again restored to his position, in order that he may afford that protection to the fisheries of Prince Edward Island which they were receiving in the past.

Motion agreed to.

BRANCH RAILWAYS IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. MARTIN moved for:

Copies of all correspondence, petitions, resolutions and other papers in possession of the Government relating to the proposed branch railway from Southport to Murray Harbour, and other proposed railway branches in the province of Prince Edward Island.

He said: With the indulgence of the House, I would like to offer a few remarks on the subject of this motion. And this is the first time I have ventured to address the House, I shall have to crave your indulgence for any lack of knowledge I may display in the a b c's of debate. This question has been brought before the House on previous occasions, and is no doubt familiar to some hon. members: but as there are some new members in this Parliament like myself who may not have been present on former occasions when this question was discussed, it may be well for me briefly to state the grounds on which the province of Prince Edward Island bases her claim. Prince Edward Island was admitted into the confederation in 1873. When confederation went into effect in 1867, the Island was invited to join, but the people at the time did not consider the terms offered were sufficiently advantageous. One of the difficulties in the way was the isolation of the province, on account of which we did not think we would be able to participate in the benefits of the public works which might be constructed in other parts of the Dominion. They considered they were entitled to better treatment than was offered, and waited for a few years before deciding to enter confederation. The terms offered in 1873 were accepted by Prince Edward Island, but I must say that some of those terms have not been fulfilled by the Dominion up to this present day. One of them relates to better communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland; but the subject of my motion relates rather to railway extension in that Island. The railway mileage in the province of Prince Edward Island is 211 miles. Although it is a small province there has been no proper system of railway extension. No less than $3,250,000 have been devoted to building a railway on the Island. This sum had been spent by the province itself—out of its own resources—and though Prince Edward Island has been over twenty years a province of the Dominion of Canada little has been done by the Dominion in building any railway or railway branches, which forms a subject of complaint in the province. For many years, especially since 1883, when a departure was made from the terms on which the Island entered confederation, large expenditures for railway purposes have been made in other provinces of the Dominion. The Island claims that it has not been benefited by those large expenditures made in other portions of Canada. When we entered confederation the terms on which the Dominion were to construct railways was embodied in the British North America Act, which reads as follows:—

Lines of steam or other ships, railways, canals, telegraphs, and other works and undertakings connecting the province with any other or others of the provinces, or extending beyond the limits of the province:

Lines of steam ships between the province and British or foreign country:

Such works as, although wholly situate within the province, are before or after their execution declared by the Parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada or for the advantage of two or more of the provinces.

My idea of the object of the clause in the constitution is to preserve a proper balance of power between the different provinces. It was well known that the larger provinces had a preponderating influence in the confederation, and that the clause to which I have referred was placed there as a guarantee that a fair share of the expenditure should be divided between the provinces as a whole. No railways were to be constructed in one province that would be of no importance to the other provinces or connect other provinces. That arrangement met the requirements of the Dominion for a number of years, in fact until 1883, when it was determined to still further open up the country and undertake larger expenditures. The Government undertook to make expenditures larger than those which we considered to be justified by the constitution. They undertook the construction of railways that were in no sense of Dominion importance. The Island, I repeat has not benefited by those large expenditures; we have not to any appreciable extent benefited by the expenditure since 1883. I may further claim that previous to 1883 the Island has not benefited by the large expenditure on public works, especially on railways in the Dominion. This I shall prove to the House by extracts from the utterances of public men, which I shall quote. I first refer to a speech delivered by Sir Charles Tupper in 1886, when a delegation from the Island proceeded to London, and claimed that the treatment the Island was receiving in regard to Dominion expenditures was not satisfactory. Sir Charles Tupper in reply said:

I have no hesitation in saying, from my knowledge of the province of Prince Edward Island extending over all my life, and from my experience as Minister of Railways in Canada, that if the Prince Edward Island Railway was connected with the Intercolonial Railway, that the Prince Edward Island Railway would be a paying road.

I will now read an extract from a memorial submitted to this House in 1886:

The undersigned having been deputed by the Government of Prince Edward Island to confer with the Federal Ministry relative to the financial arrangement existing between that province and the Dominion, and referring to their interview of to-day, with the Prime Minister of Canada on the subject, desire to bring under the consideration of the Privy Council, the justice and propriety of augmenting the subsidy payable by Canada to Prince Edward Island. These are the principal grounds upon which this application is based:

1. The expenditure by the Dominion upon great public works, in the advantage of which Prince Edward Island, owing to its situation, cannot participate, has been greatly in excess of what at the time the Island joined the confederation, it was estimated such outlay would reach.

2. The policy adopted by the Canadian Parliament, subsidizing lines of railway of a local as well as of a general character, has been extended to every province of the confederation except Prince Edward Island. The construction of 11 miles of railway at Cape Traverse in the Island, cannot be regarded as embraced in this policy, such work having been done in pursuance of that part of the terms of union which provides for the maintenance of continuous steam service between the Island and the mainland.

3. The island has been debited with the entire cost of the construction of its railway under contract when the union took place in 1873. The undersigned therefore submit that the amount of the expenditure for constructing the Prince Edward Island Railway should be transferred to the credit of that province in its account with the Dominion.

This was one of the complaints which the people of the Island made in 1886, and it was embodied in this memorial, part of which I have read; and the claims which were made then hold good to-day. Although Prince Edward Island is the Rhode Island of Canada, still we expect fair treatment from the general body forming the confederation. I now desire to submit some figures showing the nature of our claim. The reason I desire to make this statement is that the contemplated expenditure by the Dominion in 1873 on railways was not to exceed $34,552,148. I shall proceed to show, Mr. Speaker, that the expenditure on railways has very largely increased over what was contemplated in 1873. I have taken some time to compile from the blue-books the actual expenditure since 1873, and to compare it with the contemplated expenditure in that year. Up to and including 1895, there was expended on Dominion railways, the following sums as set forth in the Statistical Year-book for 1895:—

Before confederation.....	$13,831,461
1868....	483,354
1869....	282,615
1870....	1,729,381

1892....	417,425
1893....	712,917
1894....	585,749
1895....	376,815

Total.... $122,750,702

In all the expenditure on railway construction and rolling stock by the Dominion of Canada amounts to $122,750,702. There was expended of this sum, before Prince Edward Island entered the union, $30,707,580 which we must, of course, deduct from the gross sum and which leaves a balance expended since the year 1873 on Dominion railways for rolling stock and construction, amounting to $92,043,120. Besides that, there has been also expended in subsidies a very large sum. The system of subsidizing railways was introduced in the year 1883, and since then the following subsidies were paid out each year:—

For the Fiscal Year—

1883-84.....	$ 203,000
1884-85.....	403,245
1885-86.....	2,171,249
1886-87.....	1,406,533
1887-88.....	1,027,042
1888-89.....	846,722
1889-90.....	1,491,595
1890-91.....	1,079,106
1891-92.....	1,061,616
1892-93.....	624,794
1893-94.....	1,043,285
1894-95.....	1,123,949

Total.....$12,487,136

Since the year 1883 we have thus paid in subsidies to railways directly $12,487,136. I wish to call your attention, Sir, and the attention of the House to the fact, that in addition to this twelve and a half millions, there is the additional subsidy to the Canadian Pacific Railway amounting to $25,000,000, the additional subsidy to the Canadian Pacific Railway extension to Quebec, $1,500,000, and the subsidy to the Canada Central Railway amounting to $1,525,250. There is also the annual subsidy of $186,600 payable for twenty years to the Atlantic and North-western Railway Company under chapter 58, Statutes of 1885. There is the annual payment of $119,700 to the province of Quebec, being the interest on $2,394,000 under the Act of 1884, for the line between Ottawa and Quebec. Already $1,119,700 has been paid on account of this. We have a further item which I think may properly be charged to these subsidies. There was in the first place, 25,000,000 acres of land granted to the Canadian Pacific Railway which has been subsequently reduced to 18,206,986 acres. I compute this land is worth $1 an acre, which I think was the price set upon it at that time. This will add $18,206,986 to the amount granted to railways which I have already cited. There are in addition several railways, having in the aggregate 4,473 1/4 miles, which have been subsidized by grant of lands to the extent of 32,257,200 acres, which I presume also to be worth $1 an acre, and which adds $32,257,200 to the sums already given. Now, Sir, when I add up all these items, I find that since 1873 there has been an expenditure by the Dominion Government for railways—railway construction, railway stocks, subsidies to railways, and land granted to railways—of the large sum of $186,533,044. The statement will then stand as follows:—

Expended by the Dominion Government in construction of rolling stock up to the year 1873.....	$ 92,043,120
By subsidies from 1883 to 1895.....	12,487,136

Mr. Speaker, in order to show the House that I am taking every pains to make a correct statement, I propose to give credit to the Dominion for $20,000 a year which was added to the subsidy to Prince Edward Island. I think in the year 1886. That sum capitalized would amount to about $500,000. That would make $1,096,693.96 as the share received by the province of Prince Edward Island for the construction of railways since 1873, leaving a balance due to Prince Edward Island of $2,702,829. In this statement I do not take into consideration at all the large sums which have been expended on canals and on other public works throughout the Dominion from which Prince Edward Island derives no benefit. I take into consideration merely the railways in the railway system of Canada. Now, I will quote a statement made at the conference at Charlottetown previous to confederation, as to the treatment which Prince Edward Island might be led to expect when she joined the Dominion:

We viewed the British North American provinces as a portion of one great family, who owed and were bound to pay common allegiance to our noble Queen. This was not a question of bringing foreign elements together; he regarded it rather in the light of a family arrangement, in which the island, as the youngest and smallest member, naturally looked after its own interest.

Now, I ask this House if that is the kind of treatment Prince Edward Island has received since she entered the union. I think the figures I have read will go to prove that it is not. To show further that I am making a fair statement, and one which has been corroborated to the utmost by the utterances of the public men of this Dominion, I will read from the Order in Council, making the addition of $20,000 to the subsidy for Prince Edward Island in the year 1886 :

1st. From the insular position of the province they (the Governor in Council) are of opinion that the construction of the Pacific Railway and of the Intercolonial Railway has not effected to the same extent that it has the other provinces, and the island has not had the benefit of the advantages which accrue to the other provinces from these lines, and on this ground it is entitled to some consideration.

2nd. The sub-committee think also that consideration should be shown on account of expenditure for the construction of the above-named railway having been greater than was anticipated at the time these works were taken into consideration and the terms upon which Prince Edward Island entered the union, having been in a great measure based upon the estimates thus formed for the completion of these roads.

This is exactly the ground which I take, and the ground which was admitted to be good ground at that time, as will appear from a speech delivered in 1887 by Sir Charles Tupper, which you will find reported in the "Hansard" of that year, volume 2, page 814, as follows :—

The attention of the Government was called to the fact that in the arrangements for admission of Prince Edward Island into the union, they were not in a position to derive the same amount of advantage from the expenditure on the Intercolonial and Canadian Pacific Railway as the other portions of the Dominion, which were on the mainland and which were in immediate railway communication with those roads.

The question then was raised that, as the expenditure on both those railways was so greatly in excess of what was estimated at the time the island was brought into the union, they ought to receive some corresponding consideration on that account.

I wish the House to pay particular attention to that statement :

Then there was the further question that Parliament had adopted the policy of subsidizing lines of railways in the other provinces—that in Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick there had been considerable expenditures in connection with the construction of railways and Prince Edward Island had not received any corresponding advantage. No subsidies had been granted for the construction of railways in Prince Edward Island, and on those two grounds it was claimed that there should be additional consideration given to the Island.

Now, this also corroborates the ground which I have taken. It has been said that in Prince Edward Island we have quite a large number of miles of railway compared with its population. In answer to that, I wish to say that before Prince Edward Island ever entered confederation, she had almost every mile of railway she now has. In that Island there are 211 miles of railway, for which it has not to thank the Dominion, because the Island has paid for its own railways. In our account when entering confederation with the Dominion Government the sum of $3,255,000 is debited against the province as the sum expended on railway construction. I submit that taking the statistics which I have prepared with great care and laid before the House and the deductions therefrom, the Island has a good valid claim for railway expenditure. I may also say that this question received the attention of this House in the year 1894. A statement was made in this House by the then Minister of Railways, which showed that the Government of that day were anxious to do something for Prince Edward Island. That question was brought before the House by the then member for King's, P.E.I. (Mr. Macdonald), and the then Minister of Railways, (Mr. Haggart), in reply to a similar motion to the one I am now making, said as follows :—

I have a good deal of sympathy with the hon. member for King's (Mr. Macdonald) in his complaint that large sums have been expended constructing the Intercolonial, the Canadian Pacific Railway, the canals, and other public works in different parts of Canada, and that while these may be regarded as works for the benefit of Canada at large, still this little Island has not received even indirectly very much benefit. On that account he claimed that there should be a larger expenditure in Prince Edward Island in return for the larger contributory share which she pays for the public works of the Dominion. There may be a good deal in that argument.

I may state for the information of the House in what direction the petitions are. They are in favour of a line of railway :

From O'Leary station, westward.....	8
" Summerside, northward.....	3
" Emerald, northward ..	7
" North Wiltshire station, southward.	10
" Royalty Junction, northerly.....	9
" Harmony, eastward .....	8
" Southport, south-eastward .....	60

Total ..... 105

To show you that this will not be a very great drain on the resources of the Dominion—this proposed construction of 105 miles of railway—the hon. Minister of Railways had an estimate prepared of the cost of building those 105 miles of road. The cost would be as follows :—

COST OF OPERATING.

Forty-seven miles of the six small branches, say a train to double the road each day, equals 29,432 train miles at 47c .....	$13,828 34
Snow-plough train, say 1,000 train miles per year at 47c.....	470 00
Sixty miles of South Port line, one train each day, each way, 37,460 train miles at 95c .....	$35,587 00
Snow-plough train, say 2,500 train miles at 90c.....	2,250 00

Estimated cost of operating per year. $52,135 34

EARNINGS.

Six short branches at $250 per mile of railway, 47 miles.....	$11,750 00
South Port line at $750 per mile of railway, 60 miles.....	45,000 00

Estimated earnings ..... $56,750 00

This would not bring the building of these roads within any appreciable distance of the amount which Prince Edward Island claims from the Dominion. As a proof that the burden of building these 105 miles would not be any great strain on the resources of the Dominion, I may mention that the revenue expected to be derived from the operating of the 105 miles would be as follows:—The estimated cost of operating for the first year, was as follows:—

Working expenses.....	$52,135 34
Earnings .....	56,750 09

Estimated probable amount....	$ 4,614 56
-------------------------------	-------------

I may say also that one and a quarter million dollars would not be a very serious expenditure for this Dominion to undertake. At 3½ per cent the interest would only amount to $38,900 per year. That is the extent of the drain which the little province of Prince Edward Island asks at present in order to obtain at least a share of the claim to which she is entitled. That would be at the rate of a little less than a cent per head of the population of this Dominion. It is not a large sum, and is one by which a small part of that which is justly due to Prince Edward Island. Besides, we must consider her isolated position, which deprives her of any benefit from the railway system and the canal system of the Dominion. Her case is made stronger also by the fact that the winter communications which we were promised at confederation have not yet been provided to the extent contemplated and expected by the people of Prince Edward Island at the time of the union. This House is well aware that this is a question that perhaps requires a good deal of time. I think that, while the settlement of that question is pending, these railways should be proceeded with without further delay. It may be said that Prince Edward Island already has a number of railways in operation. But it is not to be forgotten that Prince Edward Island, as the statistics show, is more densely populated than any other province of the Dominion; and while it is true that she has many harbours, these harbours are all small and nearly all suitable only for small vessels. It is necessary, therefore, for the advancement of Prince Edward Island that these railways should be built, and necessary also in order to give Prince Edward Island a fair share of public expenditure in proportion to the other provinces. Prince Edward Island pays as much per head for interest on the public debt as any other part of the Dominion, and it appears a little unjust that she should not participate in these expenditures. Therefore, I trust that, if not in the present session, then in the very near future, Prince Edward Island may receive fair treatment at the hands of the authorities of the Dominion. I have here a copy of the report of the proceedings of this House for the 21st

April last. I find that the then Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole tomorrow to consider the following proposed resolution:—

That it is expedient to authorize the Governor in Council to build and operate, as part of the Prince Edward Island Railway, the following lines of railway, that is to say:—

And here follows a list of these railways. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is desirable that all, irrespective of party, should favour this means of developing Prince Edward Island, and that the Government should take hold of this question and proceed with the construction of these roads. This is the first time that I have attempted to address the House, and I feel that I have overlooked many branches of the subject. But I remember one argument having been used against giving Prince Edward Island these railways, and I think, before I close, it would be well for me to refer to it and refute it as well as I can. It is said that there is a pretty large loss at present on the railways already being operated in Prince Edward Island. That deficit is rather more apparent than real. On all the Dominion Government railways, without exception, there is a large loss. There may not be a large deficit as between running expenses of the road and the receipts, but there is a large loss in the shape of interest on the money spent in the construction of the road. On page 638 of the Statistical Year-Book I find the following:—

Mr. Mulhall, in a paper entitled "Our Colonial Empire," published in the "Contemporary Review" for May, 1895, and dealing with recent years only, says: "The average cost of construction per mile in Canada was £11,900. The net earnings were £211 per mile. The net profit in 1893 on every £100 invested in railways was £1 15s. 6d. in Canada. The annual loss on Canadian railways, that is the difference between the net profits and the interest on capital, appears to be £4,000,000."

That is a statement which bears very directly upon the question before us. It is now being said that the Intercolonial is a paying road. But if we calculate the interest on the money which was spent on building the Intercolonial, I think we shall find that it is not a paying road at all. The interest on the $55,000,000 which the construction of the Intercolonial cost would be $2,200,000 a year. Now, you have this to say with regard to the little railway in Prince Edward Island, that you lose no interest on the money it cost for construction, for the province of Prince Edward Island paid for that construction itself. Supposing the Prince Edward Island Railways made a loss every year of $140,000, it would then be in as good a position as the Intercolonial Railway. But as a matter of fact it does not make such a loss as that, or half of that loss. Little Prince Edward Island has literally made a present of a road which has cost that province three and a quarter million dollars, for the Dominion Government has not paid interest on the cost of construction the same as it has done on the Intercolonial Railway, and on other railways belonging to the Dominion; and therefore the deficit on the Island railway is more apparent than real. I trust, Mr. Speaker, I have shown the House the justice of the claim of Prince Edward Island for a share, at least, of the amount that is due her for public works, the most important of which is the construction of these branches to which I have alluded. I am not going to refer to what has been said in Prince Edward Island in regard to that matter. I wish to discuss this question without any display of party views. I am pleased, however that the late Government has taken a good hold of this question, and that the Government of the day appear to have done the same. The statement has been made by the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries that if the Liberal party got into power they would proceed with the construction of these roads.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). No. Too many of them were promised.

Mr. MARTIN. At least some of those roads; and if the hon. gentleman denies that statement, with your permission, I will read —

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I will withdraw my denial if you will stop.

Mr. MARTIN. If the Minister thinks I am not quoting him correctly, I will read from a paper in Prince Edward Island, which is his organ, the statements in and which I think he will accept as correct, not only in regard to this proposed railway, but in regard to another undertaking of even more importance, a bridge across the Hillsborough River to connect this railway with Charlottetown, and which he says will cost at least half a million dollars. Since the Minister of Railways has challenged my statement, I am compelled to read an extract of a speech made by him last June at a political meeting held at Murray River during the election contest, as reported in his paper:

Mr. Davies then came forward, and his speech throughout, and it lasted two hours, was punctuated with applause and cheers. After taking up the great issues of the day he directed attention to the branch railways in a forcible manner, pointing out why the people of Belfast and Murray Harbour were entitled to a branch line, and strenuously advocating the building of a bridge over the Hillsborough to connect this branch line with the city of Charlottetown. He resumed his seat amid thunders of applause.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. How much did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that bridge would cost?

Mr. MARTIN.

Mr. MARTIN. According to "Hansard" of 17th June, 1895, page 2778, the then Minister of Railways was laying before the House his estimate of the Prince Edward Island Railway, and Mr. Davies is reported to have asked the Minister of Railways: "Does that include the bridge?" Mr. Haggart answers, and then Mr. Davies says that that bridge will cost at least half a million of money. Now, Sir, I trust that the Government of which the hon. gentleman is a very prominent member, will take up this question at no distant day and do justice to Prince Edward Island. I have a great many other extracts in regard to what the hon. gentleman has said concerning this railway in little Prince Edward Island during the election contest. I do not wish to introduce party politics delivered during the election contest, but I think if these were read they would at least show that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is committed up to the hilt to the building of this railway.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have no fault to find with the remarks of the hon. gentleman on the whole. The arguments he has used are somewhat familiar to me, as I have had occasion, more than once, to present them to the House, and they have been presented by gentlemen from Prince Edward Island at different times. I think the hon. gentleman was a little unfortunate in the opportunity he selected to bring his views before the people of Canada. The evening too is not propitious, the hon. gentleman had not the good fortune to have a very large House. I hope at some future time when he takes the matter up and threshes it out more thoroughly, he will catch the ear of the House at a time when there will be a greater attendance to listen to his arguments, with the main portion of which I concur. I merely rise to tell the hon. gentleman that which he in point of fact assumed during his speech, that there is no intention on the part of the Government to introduce any railway legislation this session, and no exception will be made in regard to Prince Edward Island. The hon. gentleman quoted a resolution which was introduced, but not moved, last session by the then Minister of Railways, having for its object the voting of public money for the construction of some seven branch lines in Prince Edward Island. I understood the hon. gentleman rather to give the House the impression that I had in some way or other advocated in Prince Edward Island the construction of those seven branch lines. If the hon. gentleman intended to do that, he did me a great wrong, because he knows that as regards at least five of the branches I disassociated myself entirely from them.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not wish to be understood as saying that in the Island the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had actually advocated the construction of the seven branch railways. All I wish to say is this, that the Minister came into the riding where it was proposed to construct the Belfast and Murray Harbour extension, 60 miles out of the 105 miles proposed to be built. In that district the Minister held four meetings, and at every one of those meetings he was pledged up to the hilt, as he told them he had been for years, to build those sixty miles of road.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman; but he is making a speech and not an explanation.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman has put himself more nearly correct than he was before; but he is out yet. The hon. gentleman understands that I disassociated myself entirely from five political lines proposed by the Government of this country. They never had any existence except on paper, and they had the effect of discrediting the only railway extension which really was contended for, and therefore did not receive any support or encouragement at my hands. The hon. gentleman is correct in saying that I always expressed myself in favour of the railway extension to Belfast and Murray Harbour—but I hope the length will not be as great as he suggests. I regret exceedingly that the hon. gentleman should have thrown cold water on that which is essential to construct that road, and that is the bridge.

Mr. MARTIN. I never did that.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am sorry he did that, and the people will resent it very much. When I go back to East Queen's and complain that the hon. gentleman in his first speech rather induced the House to show the cold shoulder to a project very near to the hearts of most of the people there, I am afraid the hon. gentleman will not be received back with many cheers. I had hoped that the hon. gentleman would have supported the construction of the bridge, and I had hoped for the cordial co-operation of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MARTIN. You will have it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. So I hope the hon. gentleman will not throw cold water on the project any more.

Mr. MARTIN. I did not.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Let us bring this matter fairly before the House and not introduce party politics into it. I hope at some not very distant day to induce my colleagues to consider the claims of Prince Edward Island for railway extension, and to have the cordial co-operation of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MARTIN. I desire to say—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has not the right to close the debate.

Mr. MARTIN. I wish to make an explanation.

Mr. HACKETT. Before the motion is carried, I desire to offer a few observations. The subject before the House on this occasion is one of very great importance to the people of Prince Edward Island, namely, the question of railway extension. I have the honour to represent a riding where it was contemplated to build a short branch.

Mr. LAURIER. I rise to suggest to the hon. gentleman that if he has any lengthy remarks to address to the House, he might move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. HACKETT. I shall be very glad to do so. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Reports or correspondence and the reasons for the dismissal of Roderick McLeod and Robert McKay, bridge tenders on the Intercolonial Railway bridge, Pictou, Nova Scotia, and the appointment of Thomas Fraser and A. Thomas in their place and stead.—(Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper.)

Copies of all correspondence between the Minister of Inland Revenue, or any officer of his department, and the Supervisor of Cullers at Quebec, or any officer under him, or any merchant or other person relating to the subject of the measuring and culling of timber at the port of Montreal and its vicinity. Also all correspondence between the said department or any of its officers and any other persons bearing upon or suggesting any change in the law now governing the measurement and culling of timber and deals, &c., from the year 1890 to the present time.—(Mr. Quinn.)

Return showing the subject of reports to His Excellency in Council and all Minutes of Council approved after the resignation of Sir John A. Macdonald, in 1873, before the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie took office; also showing the subject of all reports to His Excellency in Council and Minutes of Council approved after the defeat of the Hon. A. Mackenzie, in 1878, and before Sir John A. Macdonald took office; also showing the subject of all reports to His Excellency in Council and Minutes of Council approved after the 23rd day of June, 1896, and before the Hon. Wilfred Laurier took office; also showing the subject of any Minutes of Council approved after the 23rd June, 1896, subsequently rescinded.—(Sir Charles Tupper.)

Copies of all letters, papers, reports, petitions and orders relating to the change of the name Boston Post Office, county of Norfolk, to Shawmut.—(Mr. Charlton.)

Copies of all letters, petitions, reports and orders relating to the change in the postmastership of Waterford, Ont., in October, 1894, by the appointment of Mr. Alexander Roch in the place of Mr. B. H. Rammage, as postmaster, and giving more especially the date of the resignation of Mr. Rammage, and a copy of the same.—(Mr. Charlton.)

Copies of all letters and papers relating to the dismissal of James Currie and Sylvain Wedge, trackmen on the Prince Edward Island Railway.—(Mr. Hackett.)

The PRIME MINISTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 1st September, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S WARRANTS.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). With the consent of the House, I wish to submit the following motion:—

That all returns presented to the House, under the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, relating to Governor General's warrants since 1888, be printed immediately, and that rule 94 be suspended in relation thereto.

I understand that the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) has already obtained an order of the House for the printing of the papers relating to the Governor General's warrants which have been laid on the Table, and I think it is desirable, for the purpose of comparison that a similar statement should be had for a few years past.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am afraid the result of that would be to suspend the printing of papers which have special reference to a special case, and it does not appear to me at all necessary to the discussion of the question before the House to have the papers the hon. gentleman requests.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I do not think this motion can cause any delay in the printing of the other papers, and need not delay at all the discussion of the special warrants, whenever the hon. gentleman chooses to discuss that question.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I understand that the hon. leader of the House undertakes that there shall be no delay caused by this addition to the motion.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). An order of the House has already issued for the other papers, and I presume they are being printed. I do not see how this motion can possibly delay them. It may be that the information I desire may be a little delayed, but the order already issued is now in course of execution.

Mr. HACKETT.

FAST STEAMSHIP LINE.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to call the attention of the hon. the leader of the House to a very important question which is agitating the public mind at this moment, as the hon. gentleman is aware, and that is the fast line service. It appears to me that in a question of such importance and on which there has been some difference of opinion expressed in the press as to the actual facts, it is very desirable that all the papers connected with it should be laid upon the Table. It would take some time to give notice of a formal resolution, and I, therefore, ask if my hon. friend will undertake that all the papers on that question shall, so far as it is gone, be submitted to the House.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I am very glad my hon. friend has drawn my attention to that. My hon. friend is aware that negotiations are going on with the Imperial authorities. I shall be in a position, in a day or two, to tell my hon. friend whether we can lay on the Table those papers. I am anxious myself that they should be brought down.

SUPPLY—DISMISSALS OF PUBLIC OFFICIALS.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding): That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, for the House to go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). Mr. Speaker, the question that was raised by my hon. colleague from the county of Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) is one which naturally interests a great number of people throughout the Dominion. In every contest there is a great division of feeling among the political parties as to what should or should not be the course of conduct of those gentlemen who hold office in the service of their country. Very often, a man who is deeply attached to his party and who feels that he holds office as a reward for party services, does not know how to conduct himself in the great contests that periodically recur and determine which party will dominate the country. To my mind, the great motive that should guide us in considering this question is the desire to promote the public interest; and I learned with considerable regret from the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) that the line laid down for his guidance was that he would dismiss any official whom he found taking an active part upon the platform or abusing himself, his leader, his party or the principles of that party. The proposition that officials should be dismissed who are not satisfactory to the public, who either have neglected their duties in order to serve their party, or who did not give good service to the country, is one which cannot be con-troverted. If it were proposed to punish officials who were found guilty of offences against the public, I would feel that a good precedent was being established by the Government, for we must all admit that punishment is deserved by those officials who have been guilty of neglecting their duty or of a want of courtesy in their conduct towards the great mass of the people. But, so nearly as I can recollect the remarks of the hon. Minister of Marine, the proposition laid down by him was that an official should be punished if he actively engaged in opposition to the party which might be successful in that particular contest—because I have no doubt at all that the hon. Minister of Marine would be perfectly prepared to condone, or to pardon even, great activity on the part of an official in support of the party to which the hon. Minister himself belongs. But if they were opponents of that party and that party came into power, then, as I understand it, the hon. Minister of Marine thinks that the Government of Canada as represented by him would be justified in summarily and without trial punishing that official for his participation in the contest. Now I am satisfied that that is not a position that the hon. Minister should have taken; I am satisfied that it is not a position in which he will be supported by a majority of his colleagues; and I am sure it is not one in which he will be supported by the sound sense of the people of Canada.—I do not think I would be very much astray if I said that not even a majority of the party to which the hon. Minister of Marine belongs would support him in the contention he made on the floor of this House. My experience of politics leads me to believe that the better element of the people are disposed to look with the utmost tolerance upon the activity of officials in politics, seeing that they are actuated by one of the noblest sentiments, that of attachment to the party to which they belong. I believe it is not the better element of any party but the worst element of any party that would demand the decapitation of officials because they had taken part in an election contest. To my mind it seems clear that, so long as officials are not disfranchised, so long as they are permitted to vote, so long should they be permitted also to take an active and intelligent part in the contests waged to decide what party shall govern the country for the time being. It is a narrow and wrong interpretation of the position to say that an official should be prevented from expressing his opinion, seeking to influence his fellow-electors and endeavouring to secure the success of the party to which he belongs. Now, with reference to the county of Pictou—because it was with reference to particular cases in that county that my hon. colleague (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) raised the question in this House—I may say that it is not the better element even of the Liberal party in the county that has incited the Minister of Marine to decapitate so suddenly the gentlemen who acted as sub-agents of the department in the county. It will be with the utmost surprise that the people of the county and the people of the town of Pictou will learn that the Minister has facts at his command which justify him in saying that the gentlemen referred to, Messrs. Noonan and Davies, are active or offensive partisans. No statement would cause greater surprise in the county of Pictou than that. But by implication the hon. Minister makes such a charge against them, because in the general proposition he laid down, he said that if he met opponents on the platform and found them abusing himself or his leader or the party to which he belonged or its principles, he would find himself justified, and in a measure driven to proceed at once to take off the official head of these gentlemen. It seemed to be implied in this statement that was a case in point. These gentlemen were appointed something like twenty years ago and carried on their duties for a time under the Ministry led by the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, and yet they are dismissed without notice or ceremony or any consideration, although they occupied the positions of sub-agents of marine for the last twenty years or more without giving offence to any one, without failing in respect of their duties, and without, so far as I know, having had any charge laid against them in respect of their official conduct. In such a case he has acted without much courtesy, without notice, summarily dismissing these gentlemen, and he would thus seem to imply that in this case he has met individuals who have taken an active part in the contest, who have appeared on the platform, or who have been abusive of himself, his leader, his party or the principles of his party. Now I am sure I am within the truth when I say that more inoffensive or carefully-guarded actions than those of Messrs. Noonan and Davies could not be found on the part of any who took an interest in the success of their party. But the most extraordinary commentary upon the Minister's utterance is the appointment he has made to fill the place of the officials discharged. The gentleman appointed has the distinction of being one of the most active, one of the most vigorous, one of the most lively, energetic and active politicians we have in the county of Pictou. I am sure I am not far astray when I say that out of two or three Liberals of the county of Pictou who have commended themselves to their party by their great activity, zeal, and, I may say, success, in carrying on party warfare in that county, Mr. Oliver would stand very near the first. This is the gentleman selected to succeed Messrs. Noonan and Davies, who are dismissed for no other purpose, apparently, than to make a place for Mr. Oliver. If it be the purpose of the Government of Canada to use the power entrusted-ed to them to reward political support, then in this case the Minister of Marine has acted very well and wisely; he has rewarded a man who, so far as party service is concerned, certainly deserves it. But much larger interests are involved than those of party. While we recognize the fact that in this country we must govern ourselves through the instrumentality of party, yet the sense of the House, I am sure, would be that no party reward should be granted in a manner to impair the efficiency of the public service or to cause the official to lose sight of the fact that the great purpose of officialdom is to serve the people of the country. To my mind, Sir, it is most important that we should avoid going one step in the direction the hon. Minister has taken. I am sure that if we begin such a course, we shall find in a very short time that officials will be prevented from taking any interest whatever in public affairs, or compelled to cultivate the foresight that will enable them always to be upon the winning side. Now, it is to my mind one of the most creditable features in our nature that we have a spirit of loyalty. I think if there is anything particularly to be admired, it is a man who, although an official, is not afraid by reason of his official position, to be known and accepted in the community in which he lives as a Liberal or a Conservative. I believe it is not a good thing that the Government of Canada should so shape its course as to discourage the development of true manhood in the officials of the country; and if it is to be understood that without reasonable cause assigned, and fair trial given, officials are to be dismissed from the public service, not for any wrong they have done, but simply because they have shown themselves clearly and unmistakably adherents of one party or the other, then we are entering upon a course which cannot fail to lead us into dangerous waters. In the neighbouring republic it was for a long time understood that the maxim, "to the victors belong the spoils," should be accepted and held as a proposition not to be disputed; and the consequence was for many years that immediately after an election took place, immediately after one government had passed out of power and another had come in, there was a general clearing out of all the officials, and every man was dismissed as a matter of course, and in his place was put a man who had been attached to the other side of politics, not selected because he had a greater knowledge of the duties of the position, or was more fit for it, but chiefly because he belonged to the winning party. Now, Sir, that is a proposition that I am sure you could not get a majority of the people of Canada at any time to endorse; because, while it is necessary that parties should be formed and should wage political warfare upon one another, the great interests of the public require that officials should not be appointed only as a reward for political services, but mainly in view of their competency to discharge efficiently the duties of their position. There is one objectionable feature in any proposal to take such a course as that which was recommended by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and that is that it will inevitably lead, if entered upon by any one party in this country and followed out with anything like consistency or regularity—it will inevitably lead to reprisals; and if it does, these reprisals will proceed step by step, modified or retarded, as the case may be, by the worse or better sentiment of the several communities; and it will reach inevitably, if nothing occurs to arrest its progress, the exact position formerly held by the United States, and we will have accepted in Canada the maxim that to the victors belong the spoils. That, I maintain, would be a most unfortunate thing. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries represents a neighbouring province to the one from which I come, and I should regret to think that one of the reasons for which he was to be remembered by the people of Canada was that he had introduced such a policy into the administration of the civil service. Now, I do not think the Minister did himself justice in being so outspoken in his determination of dealing with officials in the manner he avowed; nor in assuming full responsibility for the dismissal that occurred in the county of Pictou. I am satisfied that in this matter he did not act on his own motion; that the natural kindness of his disposition would have prompted him to a different course of action. I think I may fairly ascribe to him such a disposition, and I may say that he has shown a spirit of fair-play and even of generosity so long as he is treated in the same manner by opponents. I am the more induced to believe that his action in relation to this dismissal was prompted by others, because, in the same county of Pictou, in the eastern part of the county where I live, no dismissals have taken place; and therefore I am sure I am doing no more than justice to the Minister when I assume that he did not act of his own motion, but that he has acted under pressure from local politicians in that county, and I am sure I can lay my finger upon the identical gentleman who has in this case induced the Minister to make this improper dismissal, for I think I am safe in saying that it is an improper dismissal. I was sorry to hear him the other day, lay down the policy that he did, when speaking of the dismissal of certain officials. I am satisfied that he was speaking under pressure from local politicians, and those not representing the better elements, the better part of the Liberal party in the western part of our county. But there is in the Minister's proposition, as laid down the other day, rather a dangerous element, namely, that in dismissing public officials for the reasons assigned, he would constitute himself both judge and jury; that he would give them no chance to be heard, but of his own motion, relying on his own knowledge, accuse them, try them and convict them. Now, Sir, I am sure that such a principle is not in accord with justice. It appears to be an unfair thing that a gentleman holding a position in the public service, and who has taken only a reasonable interest and pursued a usual course in an election, should be liable to be dismissed without any opportunity of defending himself. In the case of the dismissals that have already taken place, I am sure that the gentlemen so dismissed, even if they were accused of any misconduct or of any neglect of duty had no opportunity to defend themselves or to justify their course. Now, Sir, if this practice is likely to become more general, then it is important that the people of Canada should express themselves as opposed to it. Of course I acknowledge that for the time being the present Government officially represent the people of Canada; but at the same time the Opposition may be said to represent the second thought of the people of Canada; they are here to represent the Conservative sentiments of the people, and it is their duty, and they are bound to prevent, if they can, the Government of Canada from entering upon a course which cannot fail to be injurious to the public service. It is impossible, of course, for us to do more than remonstrate, we cannot prevent the Government from pursuing this policy if they chose; but I think we are bound to raise our voices in warning, and to show that the sentiment of the country is not in favour of such a course. I was very glad to see to-day that an important organ of public opinion in this country, the Montreal "Witness," which is an independent paper with strong party leanings, so strong that at times you might not be far astray if you described it as a paper supporting the Liberal Administration and the Liberal party—I say I was very much pleased to-day to note that that paper had nothing but condemnation for the statement of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and that in its opinion the course marked out by him, if followed generally, would lead to a condition of brigandage in this country which could not fail to be most injurious. Now, the question we have to consider is this: If it be to the public interest that officials should be dismissed for the reason assigned by the Minister, then, of course, let them be dismissed; but if it be not for the public interest, but to the detriment of the public interest, then by all means let every official be retained in his place, and not interfered with merely because he has taken a usual part in political warfare. Why, Sir, it is the best officials, generally, who lapse in this direction; the more generous spirit, the better men, are those who have a desire to take an active part in politics. After they have been appointed to the service of the country, if they desire still to take part in politics, and even actively to support their party, why should they not be allowed to do so? After you give a man a vote, surely you are not going to disfranchise him, you cannot reasonably limit his action politically to a mere expression of opinion, and to the mere act of voting. For my own part I should be very glad to know that in no case would an official be dismissed or interfered with against whom no charge of fraud or inefficiency has been brought. In fact, no doubt it is familiar to every one who takes an interest in public affairs that there are a large number of applicants for public positions. Does not every public man and public representative receive many applications for office? How is he to grant these requests? He is able to grant them by the slow process of filling up vacancies in offices with his friends, or by the more rapid process of wholesale dismissal and replacing of officers. I am sure I am perfectly safe in saying that all those who are exceedingly anxious to serve the country are not the best fitted to fill the positions. They are not the best men in the Liberal party who are the most anxious for office; they are not men of that class, but as a rule those men who seek office are not such men as the office would seek, and as a rule to encourage a general dismissal of officials would have the effect of introducing into the public service a class of men inferior to that now holding those positions. It is true that under the British system the appointment of public officials is one way by which a party fully and properly may reward its adherents and friends. With that course no fault has been found, but if we are going to accept as a proposition that the appointment of officials by a political party is not wrong, I do not know how you are going to take a different position in the event of a change of Government. And how we are going to pretend to justify the dismissal of men in the public service because they continue to hold strong feelings in regard to the party which gave them their official position. There is great danger, however, that there will be reprisals. The adoption by one party of such a course may compel another party to follow the same course. No doubt the fact of a change of party is pressed on the attention of the Ministers as an argument to lead them to make dismissals and appoint their own friends. This circumstance has undoubtedly great weight, more particularly in small localities and communities, because there men cherish small interests and wait for the turn of events; but such matter is one of such small consideration that it should not engage the attention of Ministers of the Crown, and they should not be called upon to listen to such propositions as that certain officials should be dismissed and the friends of the party in power be appointed. It would be unfortunate for the Government of Canada to find itself resorting to the position occupied by the lord high executioner of punishing officials appointed by the opposite party. It would be an improper and a low position for the Government to occupy. The course followed by the late Government should be adopted as the line of action to be pursued by the present Administration, namely, that officials once appointed should be considered permanent, and should remain in office until charges are brought against them and trial had, and the parties be proved guilty of neglect of duty or of action injurious not to the party to which perhaps at that time they may be opposed, but towards the public whose servants they are, as indeed are Ministers of the Crown, and whose interests are to be promoted by those officials as well as by the Ministers. No other course would be safe or creditable either to the members of the present Government or to any other Administration. I should be sorry if, looking back at the history of Canada, and to the fact that we have in a large measure accepted and adopted the position of the mother country, which has given us our institutions, and set us the highest examples of how to use them, we should now find the very opposite maxim applied—to the victors belong the spoils—and indeed that this element should come into consideration at all. I was very sorry in the course of the debate—although I had not the pleasure of hearing the First Minister—to hear the expressions made use of by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, for I believe he regrets them at this moment, because, no doubt, that hon. gentleman did not act in this matter from any inward impulse, but perhaps from weakness, if the hon. gentleman will excuse the expression. It is impossible to say that the hon. gentleman's views were endorsed when the remarks of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries did not derive much support from his hon. friends on the same side of the House, and especially when the Controller of Inland Revenue, speaking rather firmly and forcibly gave the House to understand that so far as he was concerned, the officials of his department would not be treated in this fashion, but would be treated fairly. It is of course perfectly within the power of this Government to dismiss all the officials of the country, from one end of it to the other, if they feel so disposed, but it cannot be supposed for a moment that this policy is one which would prove satisfactory for Canada to adopt, and in looking back at successive Governments of this Dominion it would be found that it has not been the general practice to dismiss officials secure in the positions to which they have been appointed. It was important that a change for the worse should not now be commenced. There had not been a great many changes of Government in the past, but no doubt there will be more in the future. It can scarcely be expected that one party will remain in power so long as the Liberal-Conservative Government has done, which has been practically from the days of confederation. We must expect more rapid political changes in the future, and that changes of party will take place more frequently than in the past; and in that view it would be a great and aggravated misfortune if some officials should be punished for supporting the political party to which they belong, or even if they chose to take a fairly active part in the contest. I am sure there is not an hon. member who will be prepared to take the position that he should use the authority given him to punish officials who may have opposed him in his contest. If such was the general principle, if it was laid down by the Government as a principle that officials should not interfere at elections, then I suppose an officer who accepted office under those conditions and used the position in which he stood, if he departed from the position and violated one of the conditions on which his tenure of office depended, he should be dismissed. But that has not been the practice. It is very natural, in the course of this debate that hon. members, especially from Ontario, should recall the fact that officials connected with the Ontario Administration have engaged in election contests, and have not been punished for taking part in politics.

I have heard, Sir, statements made here which I listened to with a very great deal of pain. It has been stated by hon. gentlemen on the floor of this House—and there has been no attempt to deny it—that officials of the Ontario Government, officials appointed by the Government of which the present Minister of Justice of Canada was the Premier, have taken an active part in politics. Nay, Sir, more than that, and much worse than that, it has been represented here that these officials have taken advantage of the positions which they hold as officers of the courts and as license commissioners, not only to take an active interest in party politics, but that they have set up a system of tyranny by which they have compelled certain persons to abandon their own political views and to give support to the party which those officials represent. That, Sir, is an extraordinary statement, and it shows a most dangerous state of affairs existing in that province. We are also told, Sir,—and there has been no attempt to deny the statement—that this state of affairs has gone on for years, and that it has not been condemned by any member to-day speaking on the Government side of the House. It is a system which was inaugurated and continued under the control and guidance of that very man who is to-day Minister of Justice, no less, in the Government of this Dominion. And, if these hon. gentlemen supporting the Government were really sincere in their contention that Government officials should not take an active part in politics, and that they should be punished for so doing, how is it possible that they can sit quietly by while those charges are made against their own friends in office, without a word of condemnation from them? Why do not they condemn the action of their friends, the Ontario officials, and why do they not say that they would be glad to see those officials dismissed from office, because of their improper conduct? Sir, it appears to me quite plain that the whole object of hon. gentlemen opposite is to dismiss from office those who are opposed to them, not because they have acted improperly, not because they have acted in a manner injurious to the public service, but because it gives them an excuse to vacate these offices and to bestow them as a reward upon their own partisans. I shall deplore very much if the Government of the day sanctions any such course. As I have already said, I feel that my hon. friend the Minister of Marine has spoken much more strongly than he intended to, and has made statements on the floor of this House which his sober second thought will warrant him in refusing to be bound by. I would remind the Government that, while they have the power to decide in this manner, yet it is a power which will enable them to do not much good to the country, but a great deal of harm. The Government at present in office ought to have the same interest in view that we upon this side of the House have, namely, the prosperity and the welfare of Canada and the purity and dignity of our official service. I feel assured that when they come to reconsider the matter, that view will obtain amongst the Ministers. Now, when this question is raised, and now when they come into power after eighteen years, and have the first opportunity of stating their position on this question, I trust that they will lay down a sound position in the matter, one which they and their party can look back to in years to come with pride, and that they will decide that no man shall be punished because he has gone either for the Liberal or the Conservative party, but that his merits or demerits shall be judged by the manner in which he has served the people of Canada, who are his masters. That would be the proper position for the Government of the day to take. It might be held that we upon this side of the House have a personal interest in pleading the case of the officials, but in that opinion I do not agree. If anything could be done by the present Administration to hasten that downfall to which they are tending, as all successive governments do tend, it would be that they should make a general dismissal of all the officials of Canada in order to refill these offices by their own supporters. There are many officials who now feel, that the present Government having got into power, their interest requires them to be very quiet and to take no part in politics, and if such officials were dismissed, every man of them would be aggrieved and would be working night and day against the party in power, working for revenge, and working for an opportunity to punish those who had injured him. On the other hand, these hon. gentlemen in power would have the greatest misfortune that could possibly befall them: that of having enormous and practically unlimited patronage thrown on their hands at once. Although hon. gentlemen opposite have not had the control of much patronage during their career, I think the experience of those who have had the patronage proves my statement to be the rule, and I can assure them that it would be a most unfortunate thing for their own interests. It is a matter of common experience—it is certainly a matter of common opinion, at least—that when patronage falls to the lot of a party, while it may make one contented supporter, in the gentleman who fills the office, it leaves twenty half-hearted supporters or half enemies, in the gentlemen who have been disappointed in the distribution of the spoils.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it is not in the interests of our party that we are speaking here. I feel, for instance, that in my own county of Picou the Government could do me no greater service, so far as the question of my success is concerned, than by dismissing gentlemen who have been appointed to the various offices in the country by the Liberal-Conservative party, and by filling up these offices by their own friends and supporters. However, Sir, I do not wish to enjoy that advantage to such an extent. In protesting against the introduction of the spoils system in this country, I am merely stating individually what the Liberal-Conservative party have laid down as their policy in the years past. We do not wish, nor did we ever wish, to see the spoils system introduced into this Dominion. I do not wish to see any man dismissed from office who has faithfully and fairly well filled the duties of that office, and here from my place in Parliament I protest against any act of the Government in the contrary direction. I shall not detain the House further than to express the hope that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, during his career in office, will leave to us in the lower provinces a better record than that we have had a Minister of this Government who led the van of the spoilers.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I have avoided speaking until as late a period in the debate as possible, under the hope that the First Minister would feel it necessary to have something to say as to the policy of his Government with reference to this question, which is not by any means an unimportant question. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) appears to keep well within the old lines. He has said nothing. He evidently intends to say little, and I think it does not comport with the dignity nor the place of a First Minister leading a Government, on an occasion of this kind, face to face with a principle of so much importance, face to face with a principle which has so many practical results hanging upon it—I say it does not quite comport with his duty to this House and to the country, to keep utter silence on this matter. My hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) must recollect that we are now about to consider the Estimates, and that he wishes these Estimates placed in a position where his Government may administer them. It is of the essence of parliamentary control over public moneys that, before the House grants Estimates, the House should have satisfactory explanations, not only as to the mere items of the Estimates, but as to the policy which the Government proposes to carry out with reference to important questions, of which, I contend, this is one. Therefore, Sir, I have been waiting for some time to hear the hon. First Minister take us into his confidence, and give to the House and to the country his views upon this very important matter. It is important because of the interest which exists in the country with reference to it. After a Government and a political party have been in power for eighteen years, and a new Government enters upon the scene, there is naturally a great deal of curiosity and interest as to what lines of policy the new Government will pursue. Throughout the country there is none at the present time of what you might call the minor issues in which the curiosity and interest of a great body of people is more thoroughly aroused than it is with reference to this question, not because there are a number of public officials who may be decapitated, and a number of aspirants who may be put in their places; but because the action that the Government may take with reference to this matter is founded upon a principle which lies very deeply at the root of all governments, in this or in any other country. I may say that this is emphasized to a certain extent by indications which the hon. gentleman himself may have read in the House, and which all hon. gentlemen have certainly read in their constituencies.

Amongst gentlemen who support my hon. friend and his Government, and who have supported them in the different constituencies, there is at this time and has been since the 23rd of June a very lively interest taken in this question. In many of the constituencies working committees have already parcelled out the offices which are now occupied, but which they hope to see vacant before many days. They have arranged the whole roster. I know that such is the fact in several counties in New Brunswick, which I have visited, and in which I have an intimate knowledge of what is taking place. By open statement or covert insinuation, every office holder at the present time is made uneasy with the idea that people are seeking to have him ousted, in order that, if successful, they may get his place. That is not a healthy state of things. I have lately gone through a contest in the county of Queen's and Sunbury.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friends seem to have heard something of that election. Well, I was in it.

Mr. LANDERKIN. And you were out of it.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not ashamed that I was in it.

Mr. LISTER. You are not in it.

Mr. FOSTER. After my hon. friends have had their little outburst, I will go on. I know this, that that contest has brought no glory and no honour and no extension of respect to the Liberal party. I am speaking from what I know when I say that if that contest is to signalize and indicate the course of pure politics that these gentlemen have for eighteen years been laying down as their policy in the country, and as their crowning glory when they come to administer public affairs—if they hope to find evidences of it in that contest, they will seek in vain.

Mr. LISTER. Tell us about York.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not believe there was an office holder in those two counties who was not approached by adherents and canvassers for the candidate of the Government and actually threatened that if he did not vote for the candidate he would lose his office, or told that if he did vote for the candidate, he would not lose his office. That is an indication of what is going on the country through; and, to allay that feeling, for the satisfaction of the country and the quiet of the country, and for the betterment of the public service of the country it is high time that the hon. gentleman should take the House and the country into his confidence and state the principle upon which he proposes to act. From the statements that have come from the back benches, one cannot say what the policy is to be. One gentleman rises and declares for a summary dismissal of every man who took the least part in politics. Another gets up, and just as strongly urges that the Government should go slowly in this matter, and that no person shall be dismissed from his office for having taken an honourable and manly part in the contest just held. Looking at these two positions, I cannot tell what course the Government will take. I remember the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) getting up, and in a tone of glee saying: "There is not a Tory to be found to-day in the civil service of Ottawa."

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. "Hear, hear," says my hon. friend; and what underlies a statement and the approval of a statement like that? The meanest principle that could be introduced into the public service. Does my hon. friend not feel that the principles and the policy of his party are sufficient to keep him afloat in this country, or does he want to hold the whip of scorpions of a possible dismissal over the whole civil service at Ottawa and in the country? My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) is a sinner of just as deep a dye as the hon. member for Wright, if he is correctly reported; for I understand that in his own province, shortly after the election, that hon. gentleman gleefully boasted that you could not find a Tory in Prince Edward Island now if you were to search the province over with a fine-toothed comb. I did not know that you had to seek for a Tory with that particular instrument; but what my hon. friend meant to say was this—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). Are you challenging the fact or the statement? Which are you objecting to?

Mr. FOSTER. What my hon. friend meant to say, I suppose, was this, that those who had been Tories before, now that there was a change in the Government, were not Tories, to the eye at least; and why? Because their principles had undergone a change? No; but because there was a whip held over them of possible ejection from office, and consequently no office holder dared any longer to say that he was a Tory.

Mr. LANDERKIN. That is the only way to turn a Tory—with the whip.

Mr. FOSTER. I must appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, for silence.

Mr. SPEAKER. An occasional interruption, I suppose, an experienced speaker like the hon. member who has the floor would not object to; but I think it has gone too far.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not object to a pertinent question.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I do not deal with impertinent ones.

Mr. FOSTER. Then the hon. gentleman had better take himself out. I was going on to analyse the principle which underlies statements of that kind. What my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries meant to convey was that now that there was a change of Government, and the offices were at the disposal of the Liberal party, those who before were Tories and supporters of the Liberal-Conservative Government, did not now choose to make themselves at all plain as such. Well, I say that is an unworthy principle to invoke. I say that the principles and policies of a party ought to be sufficiently strong, sufficiently full of merit, and sufficiently approved by the people, to keep it in office and at the front, and that it ought not to rely upon terrorizing such as this. When we come to the front benches, my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, is diameters apart from the Controller of Inland Revenue (Sir H. Joly de Lotbinière, although they are both members of the same Government. Let us analyse the action and the statement of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. His action in one case, if the statement of my hon. friend at my back was true, was to dismiss a fishery officer, because, forsooth, there had been a change of Administration—to dismiss that officer without investigation, and without asking for his side of the case. Another action of his was to dismiss another man from the position of master of a lifeboat service, simply on indications which were given to him by an opponent of my hon. friend the Solicitor General in the late Government. In another case he actually dismissed a gentleman at Pictou, and dismissed him without investigation, without hearing his case, although the gentleman had received his appointment by an Order of the Governor in Council. The hon. gentleman dismissed him on his own responsibility, without appealing to Council, or without putting the matter before the Governor General. My hon. friend did that, I believe, and in doing it, he did a thing which he had no right to do. The mere dismissing from office of an officer, even in an arbitrary way, is in itself not so much; but if that is to mark the principle on which my hon. friend is to found his practice, then it amounts to a great deal, for it amounts to this, that the appointments by Order in Council, signed by the Governor General himself, and which can only be revoked on giving a sufficient reason, first to Council and then to the Governor General, may be revoked by any Minister of his own will, and the official dismissed without that Minister asking his colleagues or the Governor General in Council for the authority to dismiss. That indicates the principle which is going to be acted on by my hon. friend, if we are to believe his words. He outlined this as the principle upon which he is going to act until he is overruled by his colleagues. Are they going to overrule him in this, or are we going to hear from the First Minister that the policy of the Government will be that each Minister may dismiss officials on his own personal knowledge, without giving a hearing to the party accused or even sending him the accusation, without asking him for his side of the case, without investigation, without an Order in Council, and without giving any reason to the Governor General for the dismissal? Is that the principle my hon. friends are going to act upon? If we are to believe the hon. Controller of Inland Revenue (Sir H. Joly de Lotbinière) it is not the principle he intends acting on, for he took exactly the opposite view. When the member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) declared yesterday that in the Inland Revenue Department there are 200 officials who have nothing to do, and who are there simply as political heelers at the beck of their party and Ministers; when that statement was made, the hon. Controller of Inland Revenue (Sir H. Joly de Lotbinière) rose and said that such a statement demanded action on his part. What action did he say he would take? He required some higher authority than was sufficient for the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies), who, because of what somebody told him or of some knowledge which he thought he had himself about Messrs. Noonan and Davies, incontinently dismissed them without Order in Council. The hon. gentleman who represents Lambton (Mr. Lister) made his statement on the floor of this House, on his responsibility as a member, and that is an authority which is certainly as high as the information which the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries had. But the hon. Controller of Inland Revenue did not take the ground that the word of a member of this House even was sufficient to warrant him in cutting off the heads of these 200 men. He said: If a statement of that kind, if any charges of that kind, are put before me, I will have an investigation, I will give these men the opportunity of clearing themselves from the charges made; and if they do so, they will not be disturbed, but if they do not clear themselves from the charges of offensive partisanship in the elections, then I shall take action. There are the two statements from the two Ministers, members of the one Government, and they know quite well that in a Government there must be solidarity. What is my hon. friend the First Minister going to do about it? Is he going to endorse the one Minister or the other or allow his whole team to go just each as he pleases? There is no other way, and my hon. friend knows it, than for the Government to adopt a policy on this matter, the lines of which each member of the Government must follow out in the administration of his department. You cannot have one Minister administering in one fashion and another administering in an altogether different fashion, in questions of principle and policy, and I invite my hon. friend to clear up the difficulty which exists between two members of his own Cabinet and to state what he proposes, as First Minister, shall be the policy to be carried out.

Now, I want to touch one other matter. We have been talking about those who are the servants of this Government; but there was another matter imported into this discussion—brought into it with the dissent of hon. gentlemen opposite—and that was that the local governments, such of them as are of the same political stripe as hon. gentlemen opposite, encouraged their officers to leave their duties and go out into the political field and become the strongest and most active political partisans in favour of hon. gentlemen opposite and against the Government of the day. When we drew attention to that, we were met with the cry: Oh, those are local governments with which we have nothing to do. What, Mr. Speaker, nothing to do with local governments. Why, my hon. friend sits here to-day because he has swallowed the principles which he enunciated from time to time, and which his party leaders before him enunciated, on the floor of this House. He has swallowed the great principle that the Hon. Edward Blake stood for over and over again, namely, that there should be no combination between the Dominion Government and any provincial government. I have the statement made by my hon. friend in the province of Quebec, not more than three years ago, where he reiterated his own predilection for that view. But my hon. friend is here to-day because he has abjured that principle, and because he made a league with the provincial Liberal governments, by virtue of which these governments placed their whole weight upon his canvass, and from the premiers down, with all their officials, went into the late contest in favour of my hon. friend. In 1893 my hon. friend knows that his party had a convention in this city at which all his leading men came together. They laid down their platform and looked over their men; and from that day forth it was known amongst the leaders of the party that when a new government was formed by my hon. friend,—it it ever should be formed—certain provincial premiers were to be called into it. Did those premiers know of it at that time? They were dull, if they did not see the signs. Were they conferred with after that? Were they told, in so many words, that the government of my hon. friend would include them if he were successful in the fight of the 23rd of June? Were they? My hon. friend knows and these gentlemen know, but we know this. We know that these premiers went from their offices, with the whole force of provincial patronage at their back, and in the contest which ended on the 23rd June, those provincial premiers canvassed and exercised all the political patronage and power in their provinces in favour of my hon. friend. My hon. friend is here to-day because these provincial premiers and their governments leagued their fortunes with him and joined their forces with his during the fight for political and party power. And yet my hon. friend says, you have no right to allude to the provincial governments. Why, the Minister of Justice was Premier of Ontario until after the fight of the 23rd of June. He was promised a senatorship if the party was victorious, and he held on to his premiership until he saw whether the party was victorious. And while he was still premier, his officials, from the highest to the lowest, were fighting for the victory that came on the 23rd of June, and when it came, the premier of Ontario stepped into this Ministry. He it was who allowed, he it was who directed, he it was who condoned the efforts of his officials, men paid by Conservatives as well as Liberals, men paid by the country and not by any party—he it was who directed them, he it was who put them into candidature and who, when they were defeated gave them back the offices they had held; he it is to-day who is the Minister of Justice in the new Government. So, I say, we have sufficient reason for bringing up the question as to how the party patronage is used in these provincial governments which are of the same stripe and have the same interest as my hon. friend and his party who hold the reins in this House. Now something has been said, as to holding provincial offices and still having seats in this House. I do not wish to do any injustice to any man, but I would like to ask my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Britton) whom I see in his seat—I will not press the question: I have no right to a reply unless he wishes to answer—as to whether or not he was, before the election, in receipt of a salary as an employee of the Ontario Government?

Mr. BRITTON. I have no objection to answer the question. I was in receipt of a salary. I gave up that salary to become a member of this House. I sacrificed $3,500 a year for the sake of obliging my friends in Kingston who wished to nominate me as a candidate. I am not aware of any member of the Opposition having done so much.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend leaves me to infer just what I wished to seek information about—that he has resigned that office and does not hold it to-day. That, therefore, ends my argument in reference to that.

Mr. LISTER. If he had been a Tory he would have stuck to the office.

Mr. FOSTER. No; but I will tell my hon. friend (Mr. Lister) what would have happened if the hon. gentleman had been unsuccessful. He would have been put back into the office he resigned.

Mr. BRITTON. I am afraid there is a misunderstanding as to my answer. If my hon. friend asked me whether I resigned office before the election, and if he understood me to answer that question by saying that I did, that is a mistake. I did not resign the office, because the statute itself made my acceptance of the position of a member of this House—if I may use that expression—a disqualification for the other, and I no longer hold that office; and I knew at the time I accepted a nomination as a candidate for this House that I was jeopardizing the office I then held.

Mr. FOSTER. That is perfectly plain and perfectly frank. My hon. friend did not resign. His election to, and acceptance of, a seat in this House vacated the office. But the House will remark this—that if he had not been elected he would have retained the office. And we have again the not very edifying spectacle of an official of the Ontario government with a salary of $3,500 a year running as a candidate in the interests of gentlemen opposite without the disability of losing that office if he were unsuccessful, but being perfectly free to go back to it if the people did not elect him. Now I want to ask the attention of my hon. friend and the House while I canvass for a moment the propositions which, as I regard it, underlie this matter. Evidently there are different views among members of the House on this question, and these views have been, so far as this debate has gone, in the main very temperately and very moderately set forth. I do not think that among the members of this House there is any very great diversity of opinion as to the principles and practice that should prevail. In the first place no one denies that a civil servant or government employee should have the right to vote. For my own part I do not think it is a proper thing—proper for the official himself or best for the health of the body politic—that we should disfranchise per se every man who takes office or employment under the Government. Here you have your postmasters with salaries ranging from $10 upwards. These postmasters are among the most intelligent of our people. They are, as a rule, a reading people. They are, as a whole, a superior class of people. The mere $10, or $20, or $30 which these gentlemen get from the Government is not worth the trouble they take in carrying out the duties of their office, and it is unfair and unreasonable that they should be deprived of their franchise, that they should be held by the Government of the day to be unfit to cast a ballot. It would be a great loss to the public life of the country if these gentlemen were debarred from the right to vote. On that point, I take it, there is practical unanimity. Well, there is an advance on that position which is held by some—that not only should the office holder have a perfect right to his vote, but he should also have a perfect right to his opinion. It seems to me that we ought not to take away the right of a man to his opinion as to the affairs of his country, simply because he is for the time being a servant of the country. He is in the employ of the Government, which is in the hands of a party. But the Government for the time being in power represents the Crown, represents the country, and pays a salary or wage that Parliament votes as a sufficient remuneration for the employee. He is not the employee or servant of a party; he is the servant of the Government; he is the servant of the Government as representing the whole country and not a part of the country. Now why should we take from the country the benefit of the opinion of the most intelligent classes of men in their different grades that we have in the country, simply because a part of their time is taken up in attending to the public business? My own belief is, and I give it as my strong personal belief, that we have no right to take a man's ballot from him, that we have no right to take from him his opinions on the affairs of the country. Now, we go a step further to the position indicated by the hon. Controller of Inland Revenue (Sir H. Joly de Lotbinière.) He said he would investigate a charge such as was made, and if he found a gentleman was guilty of offensive partisanship then he would feel that punishment ought to be inflicted with the loss of his place. I think the whole matter is found there and in one other fact and that is—the duty which a man has to perform. It does seem to me that if a public servant performs the duties assigned to him by the Government of the day, if he is not guilty of offensive or unbecoming conduct in his canvass or in the expression of his opinion, he has a perfect right not only to his ballot but also to his expression of his opinion, whether it be by voice or by pen. The only limit that ought to be placed upon him in the interest of the service and in the interest of the country is that his duties shall not be in the least interfered with, and in the second place he shall not lose sight of the fact that, as an employee of the Government as represented by the party in power for the time being, he is to keep that courteous line of conduct which is becoming in every employee toward the person who employs him, towards the party which employs him, towards the party which employs him as the representative of the Government of the country. Now, Sir, it does seem to me that we ought not to go beyond that, we ought not to suppress an expression of opinion by men belonging to the most intelligent classes of the people, those who are its office-holders; we ought not to keep them from depositing their votes, we ought not to keep them from a fair, and courteous, and becoming expression of their opinion; and if civil servants perform their duties faithfully and live up to those rules, I think they have a perfect right, not only to vote, but to express their opinions and to let them be felt upon the country for the good of the country, as they, as intelligent, reasoning beings, according to their light, think to be in the interest of their country. Now, that is the view I take. What I want to impress upon my hon. friend is this: The last thing I would like to see would be the introduction of the spoils system, such as that which did exist in the United States, but which has been largely rooted out from their system, and is every year being still further rooted out by the operation of civil service laws applied from time to time by the President, through the powers given him by Congress. I would not like to see office-holders who do their duty well, who are respectful, when parties change and another government comes in to power, feel the least uneasiness as to their status, or their position. Least of all would I like to see a change by arbitrary dismissal, by the mere whim of the Minister, upon information which must at best be second-hand, coming to him from a partisan source—I would not like to see action taken simply upon such charges. But if there is a charge against any official for neglect of duty, for offensive partisan conduct, or unbecoming and ungentlemanly action, that charge should be laid before him as an accusation, he should be allowed to answer, and an investigation should be carried out, and it should be dependent upon that investigation whether punishment is meted out to him or not. I do not think that we, as a Parliament, should ask for anything less. I do not think we should limit our civil servants to any greater extent than that. I believe that if this line of policy were carried out, it would prevent the unrest and disquiet which is now abroad in the country, and will continue unless a very clear and satisfactory line of policy is taken at this time. I would like to see the civil service of the country put in the most independent position; and I would like to have an expression from my hon. friend the leader of the Government as to the policy of the Government with reference to this most important matter.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Mr. Speaker, you are aware that I did not rush into this debate, because I did not want in any way to countenance the tactics, which are becoming very evident, of hon. gentlemen opposite to protract this session and to prevent public business from going on. The hon. gentleman has so far travelled from the subject as to mention that which is altogether foreign to the discussion which has taken place; he has referred to the election which has recently taken place in Queen's and Sunbury, and has stated that the election had reflected no glory and no honour upon the Liberal party. He was there and I was not, therefore I cannot answer him; but he would have shown better taste if he had waited to make his charge until the gentleman who was elected there had been here to answer him. Then the hon. gentleman took up the virtuous role of a critic. He took to task my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Britton), evidently expecting a different answer from the one he received. He supposed that my hon. friend was still a servant of the Ontario government, but finding that he was debarred from serving the Ontario government, he took refuge in the statement that if he had been defeated he would to-day be an officer of the Ontario government. I do not know what would have taken place. I do not know whether the Ontario government would have reappointed my hon. friend to the office which he vacated when he ran for the constituency of Kingston; but I know one thing, and my hon. friend knows it as well as I do, that there was an officer of this Government, an officer appointed by my hon. friend himself, and I will give him his name, Mr. Vanasse, harbour master for the port of Montreal. Mr. Vanasse resigned his seat to contest the electoral district of Yamaska in the province of Quebec, and was defeated. Then what took place? Sir, this is not a hypothetical case, the record is before you; the man who had vacated his office in the civil service in order to become a candidate, was re-appointed to the same office, after his defeat, by the hon. gentleman himself and his colleagues in the late Government. Now, Sir, my hon. friend wanted to know what was my opinion. I tell him again that I did not rush into this debate. My opinions upon this question are well known, because I have had occasion to express them more than once upon the floor of this House. I expressed them in the session of 1888, and I repeated them in the session of 1891, when a servant of this Government, the highest in the service, the late High Commissioner himself, left his post in London and came back to Canada to take an active part in an election, to the scandal of the whole population and to the harm of the Liberal party; and after having done what service he could to his party, he returned to England, and charged his expenses to the country besides. Now, Sir, with regard to the question of the hon. gentleman, I have no objection at all to repeat what I have had occasion to state upon more than one occasion—I say here, as I have said before, that I am strongly opposed to the American system that to the victor belongs the spoils. I am opposed to any dismissals taking place from the service except for cause; but I have no hesitation in saying at this time that if an officer in the service chooses to be a politician, he shall be given every opportunity by this Government of being a politician. What is the cause of the abominable practice which has been stigmatized in the States, that to the victor belong the spoils? Why was it that after every Presidential election attended by a change of parties in power, the whole civil service was cleared off, the whole body of servants of the government were forced to resign or be dismissed? The reason is obvious, the reason is that every officer under the American system was an active politician, and being an active politician it was quite natural that when the opposite party came to power the man who had been an active politician could not be a trusted servant of the Government whom he had opposed. Now, when we find an officer in the civil service, however good a servant he may have been, however faithfully he may have discharged his duties, but who has been an active politician, who has taken part in the election, offensively and actively, and before the eyes of the whole community, that official has become a scandal in the eyes of the community, and I have no hesitation in saying that he cannot be trusted to render faithful service to this Government.

Where there is a Government officer, he may hold his opinions, I do not care what they are; they may be Liberal or Conservative, I do not care; he may go and vote, and I will not inquire how he voted—but when he is seen on a public platform, when he takes part in party processions and is actively and offensively prominent as regards party candidates, that man has taken his life in his hands, and no one can have a word to say if he is dismissed from the service. But he should not be dismissed summarily. There is a difference in cases, I admit. Take the case stated a few days ago by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. My hon. friend was addressing a public meeting, and at that meeting he saw a man who is an official of the service, an active partisan. My hon. friend says to himself: That official is before me. Does the Minister need any more evidence than the evidence of his own eyes? Under such circumstances, I say that my hon. friend is perfectly justified in acting as he did. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) on the other side of the House asked me, a moment ago, how I could reconcile the doctrine enunciated by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the doctrine stated by the Controller of Inland Revenue. I see no difference between those two doctrines. They were expressed differently, but they amounted to the same thing, namely, that no official should be dismissed except for cause, but any man who was an active partisan gave cause for removal; and that is the position in which we stand to-day.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The one Minister considered it necessary to make inquiry, and to have a full investigation; and the other Minister was prepared to act on his own motion.

The PRIME MINISTER. No Minister would pretend to dismiss any official unless he had an opportunity to defend himself; but when the case is within the personal knowledge of the Minister himself, under such circumstances there is no case for inquiry. When the Minister is not cognizant of the facts himself, whenever the case is brought to him by extraneous evidence, those statements must be substantiated, and every man must be given an opportunity to defend himself. I do not want, for my part, and I am sure the Government does not desire—and I can speak for the Government on this matter—to act arbitrarily on this or any other subject; every one must be given a fair opportunity to be heard before he is dealt with; but when the facts are substantiated against him, and are of the character I have indicated, he must be given every opportunity to become a politician in the full sense of the term.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not intend, after the very full statement made by my hon. friend (Mr. Foster), to take any part in this discussion; but I am afraid, after the remarks which have just fallen from the leader of the Government, I shall be obliged to make, at all events, a personal explanation. The hon. gentleman charged that I was guilty of an act of great impropriety in leaving my duties as High Commissioner for Canada in London and coming out for the election of 1891 and taking part in the general elections. But the hon. gentleman omitted to say that the circumstances which arose at that time were of a very exceptional character.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think I shall be able, Mr. Speaker, to satisfy those hon. gentleman that I was quite right in making the statement I did to the House. On the occasion of the elections for 1887, when Sir John A. Macdonald, who was leader of the Government, desired that I should leave my position as High Commissioner for Canada in London, and come out to take part in the elections, I did so; but, before doing so, as the hon. gentleman knows, I resigned the position of High Commissioner and accepted the office of Finance Minister in Sir John A. Macdonald's Administration, and, therefore, I took a natural and legitimate part in those elections. I do not hesitate to say that, under ordinary circumstances, I do not think the gentleman, whoever he may be, who holds the position of representative of Canada in London, should take part in partisan politics. I may say to the hon. leader of the House that when I held that position, and during the period I held that position, I was pressed in the strongest manner to deliver an address when visiting Canada at a time that an election was going on in the city of St. John, N.B. I refused, and I did so on the ground that the position of High Commissioner of Canada in London was one of a non-partisan character, that it was to some extent like the position held by an ambassador who represents a foreign country at a court. The duties being to a large extent of a similar character, I felt I was precluded from taking any part in what could be regarded as partisan politics, not depriving me from delivering addresses in relation to Canada, or in maintaining, so far as I was able, the policy of the Administration of the country in regard to fiscal questions and matters of that kind, in which it was important to Canada that a correct view as to the action of the Government of the day should be entertained. I hold, therefore, and I say, that the position of High Commissioner for Canada was one that debarred the person who held it from taking an active part in political questions. But my hon. friend the leader of the Government will remember that the occasion of 1891 was of a very extraordinary and exceptional character. He will remember that when Sir John A. Macdonald appealed to me to come out and take part in the general elections, it was on the ground that he believed British institutions were at stake.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It will require more than noise and clamour on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite to controvert the position I take. I say that Sir John A. Macdonald appealed to me on that occasion to come out and take part in those elections on the ground that, in his judgment, the most important crisis in the history of Canada had arisen, that a policy had been propounded openly, and above-board by the Opposition of that day which he regarded as fatal to the continuance of British institutions in this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What was that policy? I will give hon. gentlemen opposite proof, and they will not be able to controvert or question its authority. Hon. gentlemen know that on that occasion the Liberal party of this country propounded a policy of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States of America.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). The hon. gentleman having previously made the proposition himself.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman makes a statement which does little credit to his intelligence, if he believes it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My ears may have deceived me, but I remember, in this House, in 1888, hearing the hon. gentleman asked, when I sat in the seat he now occupies, whether he had made an unrestricted offer of reciprocity to Mr. Bayard, when he went to Washington, and the hon. gentleman was obliged to state that he had made an unrestricted offer.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman does little credit to his intelligence, if he confounds a policy of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States with an unrestricted offer of reciprocity with the United States. If the hon. gentleman is unable to discriminate between those two questions, I feel he is doing great injustice to the intelligence he possesses.

Sir, the Liberal party having been defeated again and again, and the electorate of Canada having declared that in their judgment under the circumstances in which Canada was situated—five millions of people living alongside sixty millions in the great republic to the south, who had a policy of high protection—the policy of protection which the Liberal-Conservative party maintained was the proper policy. The policy of our party was met by hon. gentlemen opposite with a policy of free trade, and these hon. gentlemen declared indeed that they were the apostles of free trade. But, after suffering defeat after defeat at the hands of the people, they suddenly changed front, and the present leader of the Government himself declared that unrestricted reciprocity was the only policy that was consistent with the true interests of Canada. And, Sir, what did unrestricted reciprocity mean? It meant that this party which had declared that a revenue tariff was the highest form of protection they would endorse, suddenly asked the people of Canada to accept the highest protective tariff in the world—the tariff of the United States of America. Unrestricted reciprocity meant that the Parliament of Canada should accept a tariff made at Washington, that the Parliament of Canada, for the purpose of obtaining continental free trade with the United States, should not only adopt a tariff which was made at Washington, but that Canada should place herself in the position before the world of not only adopting the high protective tariff of the United States, but that she should turn her back upon the mother country altogether.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Sir, can any person question what the result of such a policy as that would be. Can any person suppose for a single moment that under such circumstances England should continue to give that support and countenance and protection to Canada that she always has given? Can any person doubt that if such a policy were adopted it would be possible to maintain British institutions in this country? These were the circumstances under which the Rt. Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald appealed to me to come from England, declaring as he did, that British institutions in Canada were at stake.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Can any person doubt for a single moment the soundness of that opinion?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then, if they do, I can quote in support of that opinion the words of the greatest authority that ever existed in the ranks of the Liberal party in this country. Sir, we fought that battle and the result was that the Liberals were again defeated. Their policy of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States failed, as their previous free trade policy had failed, to bring them into power. These were the circumstances under which I came to take part in that contest at the invitation of the leader of the Government of Canada. I do not hesitate to say, Sir, that I did it feeling that I took my official life in my hands. I felt that if the Liberal party triumphed, then I could not continue to serve in the position of High Commissioner for a single hour.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I guess not.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I felt that ordinarily the position of High Commissioner for Canada was of an unpartisan character. No person can doubt for a moment that when I entered into the contest against the Liberal party, holding the position of High Commissioner, I took my official life in my hand, and was in a position to retire instantly if the Liberals obtained power. These hon. gentlemen opposite express incredulity at my statement that in the great struggle the question was not an ordinary one between the two great parties in this country, but that it was an occasion when the institutions of which Canada feels so proud were at stake. I shall not give the evidence of the Rt. Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, nor of myself, nor of any other gentleman connected with the Conservative party, to prove this, but I shall remind the House of the striking circumstance that took place on that occasion. The man whom I do not hesitate to say is the greatest who ever adorned the ranks of the Liberal party since confederation, the man who was the leader of that party for many years in this House, the man who has been looked up to by every Liberal in this country as a leader of whom they had reason to be proud; the Hon. Edward Blake, on that occasion, on the eve of the battle, refused to go to his constituency, and refused to take part in the struggle, and what was his reason? The very next day after the election he published over his own signature a letter in the London "Times," in which he declared that the reason he deserted hon. gentlemen opposite was because he was not willing to fight under false colours. What was the meaning of that? Why, Sir, it was because they endeavoured to convince the people of this country that British institutions were not in danger in that struggle. But Mr. Blake went further and he said: that in his judgment the policy of the Liberal party then was calculated not only to lead to commercial union and commercial consolidation with the United States of America, but that it must end ultimately in the annexation of Canada to the United States.

I tell hon. gentlemen opposite that I did no discredit to the high office I held, and I did no violence to any principle that should govern a person holding that office, when on such an occasion I felt that I could not refuse the call of the great leader of the Conservative party to fight side by side with him the battle of British institutions. I felt that the result of the struggle was to be either the triumph of Liberal-Conservative principles again, and that Canada and Canadians were in future to maintain that close union with the mother country which it has always been our pride and our glory to maintain; or, on the other hand, that the triumph of the Liberal party meant that the British institutions of which we are so justly proud, should be swept away and that we should be come allied with the United States.

Such was the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, and I have no hesitation in saying that on that occasion I did discharge what I believed to be not only a duty to myself, but a duty to my country, of the highest and most important character. I may say, however, to hon. gentlemen opposite, what they may be entirely unaware of, that holding as I did a quasi ambassadorial position in London, I could have found some considerable justification for my course in the practices that appertain to the position of ambassadors, if I had even taken part in an election. It may be news to hon. gentlemen opposite, but I am able to state for their information that a peer of the realm, who accepts the position of an ambassador to France or to Russia or to any other foreign country, incurs an obligation to leave his embassy and come and vote in the House of Lords whenever the Government of the day require his support, thus taking part, in the strongest possible manner, in the political contests of the day. I only refer to that incidentally, not as any justification for my course on that occasion, for I have already placed my justification on higher grounds. But I think the hon. gentleman rather failed in good taste when he referred to my expenses having been paid by the country on the occasion of that visit to Canada. I think the hon. gentleman's memory will enable him to recollect that my visit to this country on that occasion was not confined to taking part in a general election. He will remember that I was sent by His Excellency the Governor General on an important visit to Washington, immediately after the general election, and that I was detained in this country in connection with important public duties of the very highest character, apart altogether from the question of the general election. Now, Sir, I do not intend to detain the House much longer, because this subject has been pretty well discussed. But I may say that I am glad that the hon. leader of the Government has made a frank statement of his position on this question of official tenure in connection with political action. It was very desirable indeed that before this debate closed the hon. gentleman should state, in a free and frank manner, the policy he holds in regard to that question. The hon. gentleman's declaration, while being a very important one, falls far short of the extreme doctrine that to the victors belong the spoils; because I am happy to say that the practice of Canada in the past in regard to the civil service has been much more akin to that of England than to that of the United States. I believe it will be conceded that the finest civil service in the world is that of England; and I believe that the steady and continuous efforts that have been made in Canada to approximate our system as nearly as we well could to the English system, have tended to elevate the civil service of Canada in a very great degree. After many long years of official life and opportunities of judging,

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

I have no hesitation in saying that I believe the civil service of Canada to-day is one of which any country might be proud. From the highest officials, the deputy ministers, down to the lowest grade, I believe the civil service of Canada will compare very favourably with that of any other country, perhaps except England itself; and I regret any step that is in the least degree calculated to lower the tone of that service. Now, although the hon. leader of the Government has not gone anything like the length of some of his supporters on this question, I am very much afraid that the position he has taken here to-day, that no civil servant, however high and influential his position may be, can in future take any part in political contests beyond simply depositing his ballot, without exposing himself to the risk of being driven out of the service—for I understand that to be the position the hon. gentleman takes—is calculated to lower and deteriorate the civil service. We want to get the best men the country can produce to enter the civil service of Canada; and if gentlemen feel that in order to become civil servants they are obliged to avoid the free and independent expression of their opinions on questions of great public and national concern—in fact, to submit to being muzzled—I think the result will be that many gentlemen will hesitate to enter the service. I would have been glad if the hon. gentleman had gone further than he did, and had taken the very proper ground taken by one of his supporters. I had not the pleasure of being present when this debate commenced the other day; I was absent in Toronto; but I ran my eye over the discussion which then took place; and of the views expressed, those which commended themselves most to my judgment were those of the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland). I believe that on the lines indicated by that hon. gentleman would be found a perfectly safe policy—one that would protect both a Government and an Opposition from offensive partisanship on the part of public officials, and would at the same time leave to them the opportunity for a free and courteous and clear expression of their political opinions, without let or hindrance. If that policy were adopted, and gentlemen of either one party or the other felt that as long as they confined their political action to a respectful statement of the opinions they held, their official tenure was secure, I believe it would tend to the maintenance of the civil service in the high position it now occupies, and would at the same time sufficiently guard either an Opposition or a Government from any undue or offensive partisanship on the part of any civil servant. If my memory serves me, that was the attitude taken by the late lamented Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, and, if I am not mistaken—it was a long time ago—the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) endorsed to a large extent that view of the question. He was only prepared to limit the political action of civil servants to the respectful expression of their opinions, requiring them to avoid anything that could be regarded as in the slightest degree offensive to gentlemen engaged in a political struggle. If I am not mistaken, he went a little further, and drew the line at conduct which was courteous and respectful in support of the Government of the day, holding that the Government had the right to expect perhaps more support from the civil service than had the Opposition. The line, however, which the hon. First Minister has taken, I am afraid, will have the effect of lowering the tone of the civil service. And it will have another and worse effect. One of the greatest advantages of a permanent civil service, such as they have in England, and such as we have been, at a respectful distance, endeavouring to copy, is that its permanency assures its efficiency. Every one knows that a man who believes that he holds office "aut vitam aut culpam," who knows that so long as he conducts himself properly and discharges efficiently the duties of his office and gives no just cause of complaint to the Administration of the day, his position is a safe one, will make a better servant of the public than if he feels that his tenure of office is going to terminate with the life of the Administration which appointed him. That lack of permanency has been the greatest defect of the system, not perhaps latterly, but formerly pursued in the United States, under which civil servants depended for their tenure of office entirely on the Administration of the day being sustained at the polls. I do not intend to prolong these remarks further than to say that I am afraid the result of the declaration of the hon. the First Minister will be that our civil servants will not feel that they have the same security in the tenure of their office as they have enjoyed in the past.

Mr. LISTER. Let them keep out of politics.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not think it desirable that anybody should keep out of politics, whatever position he may occupy, provided he conducts himself in a reasonable and proper manner. There is nothing that will tend so much to the elevation of public life as the desire and the ambition of the best educated men in the community to take a part in the politics of their country. I know of no greater misfortune that can happen to any country than for men of high character, intelligence and position to dis sever themselves from the political life of their country. I do not, therefore, share the views of the hon. gentleman who interrupted me. I do not feel that it is at all desirable that gentlemen of education, character and standing should be obliged to suppress any expression of their opinion on political matters because they happen to hold office in the civil service of their country. I trust that the result of this discussion will not be to promote in the slightest degree the policy of dismissing officials. It is a policy from which the Government have nothing to gain, but a great deal to lose. I do not look at this question from a party point of view. From that point of view I should not object, in the slightest degree, to the hon. gentleman making the most sweeping changes and dismissing large numbers of civil servants in order to replace them with their own friends. A more disastrous course, from a partisan point of view, the Government could not adopt. Of course if any person holding office in the civil service has taken a violent and offensive course against the party which has been elected, he must be prepared to take the consequences. I do not hesitate to draw the line at that, but beyond that I think it is most desirable, in the interests of the Government and country, that no party should go.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). With a good deal of what the hon. gentleman has said, I am disposed to agree. I would like, however, as he has spent a considerable portion of his later years in England, to ask of him if he can recall to mind any instance of an English official, of more or less prominence, taking part in the elections to the extent of being a member of a committee of a candidate on either side. So far as my information and recollection goes, no such case is alleged to have taken place for a period of many years back; but if the hon. gentleman has later information on that subject, if he knows of cases in which any civil servant had committed the acts which are charged to have been committed by the men whom my hon. colleague dismissed, let the hon. leader of the Opposition give the House the benefit of those facts, and I will willingly make way for him.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will give the hon. gentleman a very striking instance of the extent to which, under the British system, persons holding official positions in England are allowed to go. The hon. gentleman is perfectly well aware that officers of the highest rank in the Army and Navy of England are allowed, not only to take part in politics, but to become members of the House and oppose strenuously the Government of the day.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I have never heard that officers of the Army and Navy were held to be members of the civil service. That is a new light, and I think a light entirely confined to the hon. gentleman opposite.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. They hold official positions under the government.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. They are specially exempted by statute, if my memory serves me, and it has long been understood by both parties in England that officers of the Army and Navy stand in that regard on a totally different footing from the officers in the civil service. The hon. gentleman can produce no instance of officers in the civil service in England—and it is with these that we are concerned—committing the acts charged against those whom my hon. colleague dismissed. We do not pretend to dismiss my hon. and gallant friend from South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale), who is colonel of a militia regiment, from the position he so worthily fills, because he has taken an active part against the Government. I may say that my hon. colleague, the Minister of Militia, has not the slightest intention of parting with his valuable services because he was our opponent in the elections. And I see other gallant officers and majors in the House—I do not know that there are any captains in the ranks—but colonels and majors there are by the score, who opposed us bitterly, and I believe they are safe in their positions.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Did the hon. gentleman not hear a gentleman on that side of the House complain of the action taken by a military force in the recent election, under the orders of a gentleman connected with the force?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I do not remember the circumstances, but if the hon. gentleman refers to a case where the troops, under the command of a particular officer, were marched down to a particular poll, there might be some reason for resenting this proceeding as an attack on the liberty of the subject. But I always like, whenever the opportunity offers, to give the House the benefit of statements made by the hon. gentleman himself. Now, I find on the 31st May, 1887.—I do not think he had then resigned his office of High Commissioner, but we will speak of that hereafter—about the time that he returned to Canada, at any rate, this question was put by the Hon. Alfred Jones to the hon. leader of the Opposition:

Was there any reason for Mr. Wade's dismissal?

The hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) replied:

I am sorry to say that he (Mr. Wade of Digby) so far forgot the position he occupied as to go out and take a prominent part in holding public meetings and in denouncing the Government of the day.

I think there is no gentleman in this House on either side who will say that any public officer holding any office under the Government or Parliament should adopt such a course, or that if he does adopt it, that he should be retained in the public service, if we are to carry on public affairs in a way in which I am sure hon. gentlemen on both sides would like to see them carried on. There is no doubt that public officers, especially under the ballot, have a perfect right to go to the polls and record their votes for or against any person, as they may please, or as they may consider it their duty, but I do not believe any gentleman in the House will sustain any public officer in going out and taking an offensive course in reference to the Government of the day, whoever may be in power. There is undoubted evidence that Mr. Wade took that course, and that he went to the furthest extreme to which any person could go, and under the circumstances the Speaker was asked to supersede him.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. There is not much difference, there may be a difference as to the definition of "offensiveness." I should be disposed to consider, and I think I said so at the time in accordance with the principle which the hon. gentleman lays down here, that a public servant went outside of his duty and was "offensive," using the word in a legal sense which might properly enough apply to him, if he became a member of the committee of a candidate, or if he were canvassing actively against a candidate. I think that would be stepping outside the limit which has been laid down by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House. It is a question which deserves great consideration whether it would not be in the public interest that civil servants should be put—and it would be no disgrace to them—on the same footing as the judges of this country. We do not consider a judge of this country is injured or insulted or if he is not allowed to exercise the franchise or to take part in political affairs. I think that the same arguments that apply to the judges apply also to the members of the civil service of the country. I give that merely as an expression of an individual opinion which I have mentioned on more than one occasion in this House before. But we come to three cases in which the hon. gentleman, being High Commissioner, thought it within the bounds of his duty as head of the civil service—as I think he called himself—to come and interfere actively in politics. I do not remember that in 1887-88 the hon. gentleman resigned his position as High Commissioner. If I am not mistaken, we were called upon to pass a special statute to enable him to be at one and the same time a Minister and High Commissioner. The hon. gentleman retained his place in this House for a considerable space of time without venturing to vote, for fear of bringing himself under certain pains and penalties. I am not going to pry into the secrets of 1887-88—the statute of limitations may apply to that also—and yet I think I have heard long ago that the hon. gentleman came out here under the express stipulation that if he helped in the election of 1887 he would be allowed afterwards to enjoy the fruits of his labour and would become the recognized leader of the Conservative party. I will not call upon the hon. gentleman either to affirm or deny that. I believe it was found impossible to deliver the goods and the hon. gentleman had to return to his High Commissionership.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to state—although it is hardly requisite that I should reply to so very vague a statement—that there is not the slightest foundation in the world for it, and never was.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. That only shows what extraordinary rumours get about even among very well informed people, because, I do not break any bond of secrecy when I say that the impression I speak of was given to me from the utterances of men who had been colleagues of the hon. gentleman. Of course, I accept the hon. gentleman's statement unreservedly. The next time the hon. gentleman came—and I would call attention to the fact—he did not resign his High Commissionership, did not even put in a warming pan. He acted, so to speak, as my hon. friend beside him would say, as his own warming pan. But, Sir, in 1891, a grave duty, he tells us, called upon him to interfere in the elections here. British institutions in Canada were at stake. Well, Sir, it does show the extraordinary extent to which self-deception can go when we find the party which, in 1878, in opposition to the protests and arguments of my lamented friend, Mr. Mackenzie, and myself, turned their backs on the well established policy of the British Empire, which was a revenue tariff, and as near an approach to free trade as could be, and deliberately adopted the American policy of protection and foisted it upon this country, posing as champions of British institutions. When some of their organists were twitted with the inevitable results and consequences, and were told that it was likely to be bad for British connection, who does not remember that we were told that if the National Policy was bad for British connection, so much the worse for British connection. Sir, there are loyalists and loyalists, as I have explained to the hon. gentleman and his namesake behind him on more than one occasion. But of all the loyalists I have ever come across the 35 per cent loyalists are those for whom I have the least esteem. There was a third occasion on which the hon. gentleman came over here. Was it to preserve British institutions in Canada or to protect the British constitution, or to enforce a regard and respect for British precedents that the hon. gentleman appeared here in 1896, on or about the 2nd of January? And will he rise in his place and say that all that then occurred was a surprise of the greatest kind to him, and that the last idea that entered his mind as he crossed the sea in the stormy month of December was that, peradventure, he might be called upon to supplant Sir Mackenzie Bowell? Sir, the hon. gentleman says he came over in 1891 because the free trade party had adopted protection. If so, they had only imitated himself and his friends. And he declares that we were disposed to adopt the highest possible form of protection, that practiced by the United States. Now I have one thing to say to the hon. gentleman with respect to that, and I think it would do him and some of his friends good to ponder on it. They do not appear to be able to apprehend that in the case of the United States, you have, as I have repeatedly pointed out, one of the most remarkable examples of the effect of free trade on a large scale. From ocean to ocean, from the tropics to the arctic zone, the United States have a most remarkable system of free trade amongst the several states that compose it. Now while it may be true, and is true, that nominally, the protective tariff of the United States is somewhat higher than ours, yet really and truly ours is a great deal higher in its practical effects upon the people than that of the United States. The hon. gentleman was not always so extremely averse to freer commercial relations with the United States. I gave a statement of the hon. gentleman a little while ago showing how he regarded dismissal from the civil service. I find here, and I think about the same date, a letter to "My dear Mr. Bayard" in which the hon. gentleman declares :

I had pleasure in receiving your letter of May 31st, evincing as it does the importance which you attach to an amicable adjustment of the fisheries question and the maintenance of the cordial commercial relations between the United States and Canada, under which such vast and mutually beneficial results have grown up.

I entirely concur in your statement that we both seek to attain a just and permanent settlement—and that there is but one way to procure it—and that is by a straightforward treatment on a liberal and statesmanlike plan of the entire commercial relations of the two countries.

"In the entire commercial relations of the two countries." Now, Sir, that may not have been unrestricted reciprocity; that may have been—what was it he called it? That may have been an unrestricted offer of reciprocity; it was an unrestricted offer of reciprocity that the hon. gentleman made. The distinction, to my mind, is a distinction between tweedledum and tweedledee. But I have considerable reason for believing that the hon. gentleman came into a wiser frame of mind, if we could have got at his inner thought, after he had paid a visit to Washington, which I remember drew from him a declaration that we had come within an ace of a commercial war with the United States, which, as he truly said, was but a step from absolute and positive war. (Sir, in 1888 I brought forward a resolution in favour of a liberal reciprocity treaty with the United States, as full and large as we could make it, as full and large as we could obtain, embracing manufactured articles as well as natural products. I may mention that his own leader had admitted time and again that it was utterly impossible to obtain an exchange of natural products without offering likewise an exchange of manufactured goods; and it was very remarkable, and I call the attention of this House to that fact, that whereas, in 1888, the leader of the Opposition was Minister of Finance, and was the man whose duty it was, officially and otherwise, more especially to reply to the propositions I then made; although that debate lasted, if I remember right, for fully six weeks, during those six weeks the then Minister of Finance would not put in an appearance in the House; he had an advantage over most of us, he could put himself on the sick list and report himself well when it pleased him. Be that as it may—and I regard it as a proof of great good sense and sagacity on the part of the hon. gentleman—be that as it may, cart ropes, apparently, could not drag him forward to argue against a proposition of the very fullest reciprocity arrangements with the United States, and I well believe that the reason was that his own better judgment approved, to a large extent, of the propositions which I then submitted to this House. The hon. gentleman asked what was the policy of the Conservatives in 1878. Let him look at the resolution of 1876, let him look at his own declarations in his own province of Nova Scotia, where he told the people of Nova Scotia, in order to induce him to adopt the National Policy: Let us have the National Policy and within two years I will give you reciprocity. Sir, it is perfectly well known to the hon. gentleman, as it is perfectly well known to us all, that over and over again, if they had not been meshed, if they had not been entangled, if they had not been, not so much free agents, as the paid agents of certain other parties—it is well known they would have been very glad indeed, in the proper interests of this country, to support a very large measure of reciprocity.

Now, Sir, we will not quarrel over some words that the hon. gentleman may have used, but I noticed that he interspersed a very warm eulogium on the Hon. Mr. Blake for the statement he had made. I remarked to my hon. friend behind me, and will repeat it now, that as soon as ever a Reform leader dies, or as soon as ever a Reform leader leaves the country, he is straightway promoted by these hon. gentlemen to a very high position in the political calendar. I am not sure, Sir, that if either of those fates should befall myself, I might have a chance of canonisation too. But one thing I may point out to him, if he reads that letter, or if any of his friends chose to read that letter, I would request them to read it all, and I think they will find, when they go through the pages, some very pungent remarks as to the position in which Canada was in 1891, and as to the extent to which the policy and practice of these hon. gentlemen had discredited Canada, had debased her public life, and demoralized her people. Sir, there is a practice in the courts, I believe, of swearing witnesses when they come to give evidence, that they shall speak the truth and the whole truth. I think the hon. gentleman, when he quotes Mr. Blake's letter, if he wishes to put his case fairly before the people, would do well, indeed, to give that letter in its entirety.

Now, Sir, I venture to say to the hon. gentleman that he knows, and no man knows better, how idle, how silly, how childish and how culpable, are these reflections from one side to the other on the loyalty of the people of Canada, whether they call themselves Conservatives or Liberals.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman must allow me to interrupt him a moment, just to say that no statement I ever uttered in my life will bear the construction of a charge of disloyalty to any portion of the people of Canada. I have, on the contrary, borne testimony on the floor of this House, as I do now, and as I have invariably done in England and everywhere, to the unswerving loyalty of the overwhelming masses of the people of Canada of all parties and of all classes.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I will accept the statement of the hon. gentleman, regretting much that his language should have been so exceedingly open to misconstruction on many occasions, and trusting that in future he will be very particular when he brings charges, and when his friends, and when his press, and when his adherents, bring charges against the loyalty of the Liberal party of Canada, to be careful to discriminate as he has now discriminated. I am not going to retaliate upon him, although I might well do so, by saying that the policy his party have pursued, I am willing to hope in utter ignorance of its effects, has done more, and is likely to do more, to cause the loss to Her Majesty of not hundreds of thousands, but millions of her Canadian subjects, than any other policy that was ever introduced into Canada. Sir, it is a melancholy fact to-day that in all human probability very nearly a third, or a fourth of the youth of Canada have been driven out of Canada largely by the mismanagement of hon. gentlemen on the other side, youths who are now citizens of the United States. There, Sir, if the hon. gentleman wants to know—although I am perfectly willing to suppose that he and his friends did not intend it—there is one of the results of their policy which has tended very largely to weaken Canada, and which has tended very largely to increase the resources and population of the United States.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. May we hope to get them back again?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I will not venture to say whether we may hope to get back those whom the hon. gentleman has driven away, but I do say that we hope, and it is one of the chief aims and objects of this Government to put a stop to the tremendous drain of the best blood of Canada which was going on under the hon. gentleman's Administration for so many years. That, Sir, is one of the objects which Her Majesty's present advisers have set before them, as one which they desire most exceedingly to carry out; and I think, if we are permitted a sufficiently long time to develop our policy, that is one of the results which will assuredly follow from it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. How long must we wait?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. If the hon. gentlemen will possess their souls in patience, say until the 2nd of February—I will not say the 2nd of January, because that might bring up painful memories. I think that then they will find that our policy is sufficiently distinct and clear cut even to satisfy the greed of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster).

Sir, we have strayed perhaps a little from the subject which we originally had in hand, but that diversion was not entirely due to my fault, because when the hon. gentleman was good enough to give us this exposition of the reason of his three-fold flight from England, in 1887, in 1891 and in 1896, why, Sir, we were obliged to go back into ancient history, and I apologize to the House for it.

But on the other question I agree with my hon. friend that it is a matter of very great importance, indeed, to the people of the country, and of very great importance to good government in this country, that civil servants should understand exactly where they stand and what they may expect. So far as regards the statements made by hon. gentlemen near me, no man of common sense will pretend that if a Minister of the Crown is aware from personal knowledge that a certain civil servant has been transgressing the laws laid down, he is bound to issue a commission or institute a court of inquiry to satisfy himself as to what his own eyes and ears can bear witness to. Outside of this House such a proposition would not be entertained for one moment, nor would it be possible to consider it. But to come to the position of a civil servant; it is perfectly well known, because hon. gentlemen opposite are aware that the proposition now laid down has been stated over and over by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, that where a civil servant chooses, besides exercising his undoubted right to cast his vote as he pleases, to interfere actively in elections, he must of necessity take the consequences of his own act. We have nothing whatever to do with what has been done by the various local legislatures. All I can say to hon. gentlemen opposite is this: they may turn out the legislatures in other provinces, and then they may do what they please with respect to any civil servant who has transgressed the rules laid down, and if I know anything of the Conservative party, they will not hesitate to carry into most rigorous effect the canons to which I have just given utterance. But it so happens there were other provinces over and above Ontario and New Brunswick in which the officers of a local government took part in elections. There was the local government of Quebec. How much aid and sustenance did the late Government receive from that local government in the elections? We did not hear any complaints. We know moreover what part the Government took on former occasions.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Judging by the result, they must have been very differently on the last occasion.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. That is very likely. They did what they could, and no man could be expected to do more. No doubt the hon. gentleman is aware of that fact. In that way, as in other ways, the hon. gentleman opposite (Sir Charles Tupper) found the province of Quebec to be a great disappointment; but that result was not to be laid at the door of the government of Quebec. I remember some very curious cases quite closely analogous to those mentioned in the hon. gentleman's statement. I remember the case of Mr. Cowan, who was appointed postmaster of Galt. He resigned his office to become a candidate in the hon. gentleman's interest. He was defeated, and he was reinstated in his office forthwith. An hon. gentleman alluded to the case of Mr. Vanasse. But over and above the case of Mr. Vanasse—because he was not a very prominent official—there was the case of a distinguished senator in the province now represented by the hon. member for Queen's (Minister of Marine and Fisheries), who resigned his seat in the Senate and became a candidate. He was defeated, and was almost immediately reappointed. It was not the fault of the hon. gentleman opposite that other distinguished senators who resigned their seats for the purpose of taking part in the last general elections were not reappointed. Hon. gentlemen opposite have referred to these matters before, but I think they should not refer to them in the concrete, they should rather have confined themselves to abstract propositions, which the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) can handle so well. I would not advise my friends to adopt the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite; but one thing is certain, that after 1878 they awarded positions to those who had been faithful to them, and most undoubtedly, unless my memory is wholly at fault, wherever they had an opportunity, they were not slow in punishing their opponents. Did the hon. gentleman ever hear of the case of Mr. Buckingham, and the declaration of an hon. gentleman, "Off with his head." It was used not by Shakespeare, but by an hon. gentleman who quoted Shakespeare, Sir John A. Macdonald. When he left office several appointments had been made, and although I do not mean to say that it was entirely done for this purpose, one of the first acts of the succeeding Conservative Government was to pass an Act by which several hundreds of those appointed by the outgoing Government were at once excluded from office, and within a year and a day another Act was passed and several hundreds of others of those who had faithfully supported hon. gentlemen opposite were replaced in office. These are historical facts which the hon. gentleman knows as well as I do, and I am perfectly certain that were the situations reversed and were hon. gentlemen opposite on this side of the House called upon to decide on the fate of civil servants who had interfered in elections, and for which action alone we propose, on proof being furnished, to discipline them, those hon. gentlemen would mete out to them quite as strict justice as we are likely to mete out. I do not desire that any man should be condemned without a hearing. On that point we are all in accord. Unless the case is one absolutely and perfectly evident to a Minister's own senses, as in the cases referred by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, it is our duty to see that men have an opportunity to repel the charge or confess the charge as the case may be. But given that, and granting that at an election certain men who are public servants have interfered actively, I say it is in the interest of the rest of the civil servants for the purpose, as the hon. gentleman well said, of preserving the special system which has entered into our politics and become a part of them,—it is imperatively necessary for the good of the remainder of the service that an example should be made of those men. One word more, and I have done. It was my duty to take part in the first Administration of Mr. Mackenzie, and I have this to say, and I say it with considerable regret, we had most overwhelming proof that all through the civil service we were carrying on our daily work in the midst of a nest of traitors. I had daily and hourly proofs for months and months that not a paper went to our Privy Council which was not communicated by some member or other of the civil service to hon. gentlemen opposite. We had superabundant evidence of that, and it speaks much for the extreme leniency on the part of Mr. Mackenzie, that he took so very few steps to purge the service of these members. I speak of what I know. I do not for a moment pretend to say that a majority of the civil service were guilty of such practices: but in 1873-74 and even after that, the honourable confidence which should exist between members of the civil service and heads of departments had been time and again violated. With those examples before us, yea, with members of the civil service eating the bread of both parties, and deliberately interfering in elections for the purpose of aiding one political party, if they so act they must be considered as taking their political lives in their hands, and they must accept the consequences of their own acts, and the good sense of the people of the country and their natural sense of equal justice will not merely justify, but demand at the hands of the Government that they should make an example of them.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. MACDONALD (Winnipeg). Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to occupy the time of the House for many minutes this evening, as in comparison with many of my hon. friends who sit to your left, I have comparatively little to complain of in so far as official dismissals are concerned, few heads having as yet dropped into the basket at Winnipeg. This may be accounted for in one of two ways; either from the fact that Mr. Martin who was the Reform candidate at the last election was not successful, and consequently is not able to bring the same pressure to bear upon the Government as those members of the party who secured seats in the House, and who being present here in the body are able to interview Ministers and impress their views strongly upon them, or, it may be, because Mr. Martin is more mercifully disposed than some of his fellows, and is not so anxious to obtain revenge against those members of the civil service who worked against him, if there be any such. There is, however, one case which I intended to bring before my hon. friend the First Minister if he were present in the House, but as he is not here, I will bring it to the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies). Had the Government seen fit to give the western portion of Canada a representative in the Cabinet, it would not have been necessary for me to have brought this case before a Minister who has really nothing whatever to do with it, as the case does not belong to the department of any Minister who sits at present in this House. Unfortunately, for some reason unknown to me but doubtless well known to the head of the Government, there is at present no Minister of the Interior, and no representative of Manitoba, North-west and British Columbia in the Cabinet; and I have therefore to fall back upon some member of the Government who sits in this House, especially so, as the gentleman who is acting Minister of the Interior while the portfolio is vacant holds his seat in another Chamber. The case to which I refer is that of Mr. Baldwinson, the Icelandic immigration agent at Winnipeg. For the last thirteen years this gentleman has held the position of Icelandic immigration agent in the western country. He has been the means of inducing thither far the greater number of the Icelanders who have settled in Manitoba; and they are now numbered not by the hundred but by the thousand in that country. There has been no fault found with him by the department. His work has always been up to the mark. I can speak from personal knowledge of this, because while I lived in Winnipeg as a private individual, I took an interest in immigration, and paid a great deal of attention as to how matters were conducted at the immigration sheds, and to how the work affecting that department was carried on in the city to which I belong. I have no hesitation in saying, Sir, that the Government has no more active, no more energetic, and no more successful man in their service, than Mr. Baldwinson. He has induced, as I have said, thousands of his countrymen to emigrate from Iceland to Manitoba, and I can say without fear of successful contradiction, that there is no class of people who come to that western country who make better settlers; barring of course our own people, by which I mean those from the older provinces of Canada and those who come from the motherland across the sea. The Icelanders are accustomed to a cold climate and consequently our long winters have no terrors for them. They are frugal, industrious and sober, and year after year they are getting better off. We only hope that as time goes on more of them may be induced to cross the ocean and to settle there. It therefore certainly cannot be said that there was no work for Mr. Baldwinson to do, for there are thousands of people yet left in Iceland whose lot could be very much improved by immigrating, and if Mr. Baldwinson is not employed to induce them to do so, somebody must be employed in his place. As you are aware, Mr. Speaker—because I know that you take an interest in immigration—this is not a case where a new broom sweeps clean. In fact, in matters relating to immigration there is nothing like experience to make a man successful, and no man even if he were as able as Mr. Baldwinson, and knew as much of the Icelandic people, and had gained their confidence to as great an extent, could do so well as Mr. Baldwinson, without having the experience that gentleman possesses. He has done well in the past and, as I am sure, he would do well in the future had his services been retained. Although Mr. Baldwinson has been thirteen years in the department, and has brought up a family of ten in this country—not a small family for a man to support—yet, without any complaint from the department, and without any pretense that his work has not been up to the mark, he has been notified that his services will not be required after a fortnight has expired. Now, Sir, I do not believe that there is an hon. gentleman in this House who would consider that that is fair treatment. The only possible objection that can be raised against Mr. Baldwinson is on the ground of interference in politics. I wish to say that so far as I know he has never interfered in Dominion politics. I do not speak very positively, because he may, with my knowledge and without my having heard of it, have taken part in some outside constituency. However, although he lives in Winnipeg he has certainly never taken a hand in the Dominion elections since I was there, and he never did anything to help me in either of the two elections that I fought. I have no doubt that if I had asked Mr. Baldwinson and pressed him, he might have done so, but I did not ask him, and as far as Winnipeg is concerned the place where he lives, he did nothing, and I believe he did nothing in Dominion politics in any other part of the province. It is perfectly true that in provincial politics he has taken an active part. He has been a candidate for the local House, but I do not see how my hon. friends who sit on the Treasury benches could find that that affords any reason for his dismissal, for whatever their practice may have been, the principle which they have always professed is, that Dominion and local politics are totally distinct and that one has nothing whatever to do with the other. If that is what they really believe there is no earthly reason why an employee of the Dominion Government should not take a hand in provincial politics. Besides, judging them by their practice, I know this: That in my own province of Manitoba the employees of the local government were the busiest electioneering agents, not only during the last campaign, but also during the campaigns of 1891 and 1887. I know that in my last campaign in Winnipeg as well as in that of 1891, the employees of the Dominion Government were sent, or sallied forth from the departmental buildings, to act as the most active political agents on the Reform side. For my own part, I do not find fault with that. I do not complain of it for a moment, and I have no hesitation in saying now, that were a change of government to take place in Manitoba, and were the party to which I belong to come into power, I would use any influence I had with that party to prevent any of these gentlemen who worked against me from being disturbed in his position on account of his so doing. But the principle of the provincial governments in so far as the interference of their officials in Dominion matters goes, does not stop here; for if I am correctly informed, the same thing occurred in my native province of Ontario as occurred in my adopted province of Manitoba. In this province in which we now sit, the employees of the provincial government were amongst the most active workers against the Conservative candidates. Indeed, I believe this was carried so far, that Mr. Conmee who was member for West Algoma in the provincial legislature, and who presented himself as a Reform candidate before the electors of Nipissing in the last Dominion election, never resigned his seat in the provincial House, and claims that he is still a member of that House, although he ran as a Reform candidate for the Dominion Parliament and was defeated. Further than that, Sir, I am aware of this fact, that an hon. friend of mine who sits in this House representing the electoral district of Selkirk (Mr. Macdonell), was an employee of the local government when he became a candidate; and, if my information is not incorrect, while he sits here to-day as a member of the Commons of Canada, he is still an employee of the local government. I speak subject to correction. My sight is not good enough to enable me to see whether he is at this moment in the House or not; but if he is, I should be glad if he would correct me, if I am wrong.

Mr. MACDONELL (Selkirk). I am not at present an employee of the local government.

Mr. MACDONALD (Winnipeg). I am very glad to hear that my hon. friend is not an employee of the local government; but I know this, that the firm of which I happen to be a member, had something to do with the preparation of a petition against the hon. gentleman's return, and, after the petition was prepared and filed, there was great difficulty in serving it. The hon. gentleman was not to be found; he had vanished like a will-o'-the-wisp; and when an application was made for extended time, the evidence that was put in in opposition to our application, was that he was in the country looking after the drains, his official work. However, that is neither here nor there; and although I said a few moments ago that I was glad that my hon. friend was no longer an employee of the provincial government, I wish to withdraw that, because it does not correctly express my opinion. If that state of things is going to be allowed, I would be very sorry if he were not an employee of the local government, because he would not then be in receipt of a double salary. We want all the money we can get in that country; and when it is given to good fellows like my hon. friend, we are not sorry that it is in circulation. However, is this not a case which, even after the speech we have heard from the First Minister this afternoon, ought to be inquired into? My hon. friend the First Minister, in speaking on this question, expressed himself a little differently from what I expected him to do: that is to say, he spoke of active interference in politics being enough to justify a man's dismissal. Now, the word "active" is a little indefinite, and I was in hopes that he would have explained it more fully than he did, because a man may take a very active part in politics without being in the least degree offensive. I quite acknowledge that an employee in the civil service may so conduct himself in the course of an election as to warrant the party he opposes, if successful in that election, in dismissing him the moment Parliament meets. On the hustings, or in the course of private canvass, he may personally abuse the leaders of the party to which he is opposed. He may go to meetings and interrupt in such a rude and offensive manner, bringing with him, possibly, a gang of roughs to back up his interruptions, as to fully justify the successful party in dispensing with his services without delay. I, for my part, do not believe for one moment that we are justified in withdrawing the right of the suffrage from the members of the civil service, unless we at the same time exempt them from taxation; because I believe that it is just as tyrannical, just as wrong, to tax an individual without giving him the right to a vote, as it is to tax a country without giving it the right to representation. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) to-day tried to draw a parallel between the members of the civil service and the judges of our country, saying that no judge felt that it was any derogation to his dignity that he was cut off from taking part in elections, that is to say, that he had not the suffrage, as an ordinary individual has. But the position of the two, Mr. Speaker, is altogether different. The judges occupy a position of the greatest eminence in the country. They are men in whom the people of the country place the utmost and most absolute faith; and I am happy to say, thank heaven, that in this country, as in England, politics have never interfered with the judgment of a judge of our superior courts, no matter to what party he may have belonged before he went on the bench. And so well is that understood by the public that even in the case of election trials I do not believe it ever occurs to the mind of either the petitioner or the defendant, or to the minds of the lawyers employed on either side, to consider if the judges before whom the petition is tried, belong either to the Conservative party or to the Reform party—or rather did belong before going on the bench. I speak positively on this point, so far as my own province of Manitoba and my old province of Ontario are concerned, and I have no doubt that the same rule applies to the other provinces of Canada. The civil servants are in altogether a different position. There is no chance of any application to upset an election, or anything of that kind, coming before them. They are citizens like ourselves, and they have the same right as we have, so long as they pay their taxes, to go to the polls and record their votes for such candidates as they favour; and I was glad to hear the First Minister to-day state that, so far as that went, he was quite ready to grant them that privilege. But, Sir, I go further: I say that they have the right to use their tongues and such influence as they have, as free men, to support the cause of the party to which they belong, so long as they do not do so offensively: but if they do that, they at once take their official lives in their hands, and they cannot complain, if they are decapitated. Now, Sir, I am perfectly aware that the system which is in vogue, and has been in vogue as long as I can remember, has a good deal to do with the present unfortunate state in which the members of the civil service find themselves. My opinion has always been—I do not mention it now for the first time, when we are in the cold shades of Opposition, for, although I have never before had an opportunity to express my opinion on this subject in the House, I have often given utterance to it when speaking before public audiences—my opinion is that the sooner the present system is done away with and one adopted which will remove the patronage from the hands of the Government and members, the better it will be for Canada as a whole. The other evening my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden), in speaking in this House, pointed out how much of the time of the members supporting the Government was taken up with applications for office, increases of salary, and other matters arising out of the exercise of this patronage. For my part, I can say that, during the three years that I was in this House before, when I was at home fully three-fourths of my time was occupied with applications for positions or something of that kind; and I have no doubt that my hon. friends on the other side, now that they are basking in the sunshine of power, will find that their constituents will be quite as pressing as mine were, and that they will no longer enjoy the ease and comfort which those who sit on the Opposition benches do. The members are but human, and when they are pressed in this way they at once try to shift the weight from their own shoulders to those of the Ministers. In that way, the Ministers, who have much more important things to think of than who is to be appointed door-keeper here or given a post office there, have their time taken up by applications of this kind, and I fear that before his term of office is over, we will find our hon. friend the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) looking anything but the youthful personage he does to-day.

Of course, I perfectly understand that when a party has come into power, particularly after having been out for some time, as has been the case with our hon. friends opposite, it would be perfectly impossible for them to introduce a change, such as I suggest, immediately. As a matter of course, we are all human, and Reformers are quite as human as those who vote on the Conservative ticket, and after having been out so long, there will be numbers of men who think that they deserve, as they certainly very strongly desire, to have positions under the Government. These men will bring the strongest possible pressure to bear on the Government, and for a time it will undoubtedly be impossible for them, without risking their political lives—which I would not expect them to do—to attempt making any alterations in the present system; but I trust that as time goes on, they will take it into their consideration, and if they do, I assure them that they will have very strong support from this side of the House.

I am quite aware that my hon. friends do not desire or require any advice from me on this subject or any other, but on this occasion I am quite willing to play the part of the candid friend and give them advice without fee or reward or hope of reward. But without making a change of that sort, without making a radical change, but keeping the law as it is, it is in their power to so administer that law as to do away with the feeling of uneasiness which necessarily runs through the civil service at present, and I believe that a practical, a frank and fair avowal of what they will really do and what they consider active interference in politics, would have a most salutary effect on the minds of that service and enable many men, who are not only willing but anxious to do their work, to give their attention to it without having their minds disturbed by fears that their heads may drop into the basket before another sun rises. As I have said already, I acknowledge at once that there are certain actions on the part of members of the civil service which would justify their dismissal; and I quite agree in what was said by the hon. leader of the Government as to the fact of a Minister seeing a member of the civil service taking an offensive and improper part in an election being quite sufficient evidence to justify him in acting, without waiting for further evidence. As for myself, I know of no evidence that would convince me sooner than that of my own eyes. But in the case, which I ventured to mention a moment ago, and to which I called the attention of my hon. friend who sits opposite—the case of Mr. Baldwinson—I venture to point out that this is not a case where any member of the Government could know, by the use of his own eyes, that Mr. Baldwinson interfered in politics at all, and it is certainly a case where the fullest and fairest investigation ought to be applied, where the accused ought to know what is the charge made against him, and be given a chance to justify himself, if he can. If the reason of his dismissal is not on account of his political attitude, if it is because the Government have come to the conclusion that they desire no more immigration from Iceland to the western portion of our country, I think it is only right that the people of the west should know that at once, because that is a matter which affects our interests most materially. And although personally I have no doubt that the real reason for his removal is on account of his political views, I should like to have some explanation or some declaration from the Government or some member of the Government on that point.

I may say, in speaking of the civil service, that in the position which I take as to their right to exercise the franchise and take a certain moderate part in the elections, I do not at all agree in the views expressed by my hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall), the other evening, when he stated that it was perfectly right for a member of the civil service to vote and work hard for the Government of the day, though it would be highly improper for him to do the same thing in favour of the Opposition. I believe there is a principle in this matter, and that principle must apply equally to both sides. If it is right and proper for a member of the civil service to work for the Government of the day, if he belongs to that party, it is equally right and proper for him to work for the Opposition, if his political opinions lean to their side. It is perfectly true that the risk he runs may not be equally great, because a Government, I take it, will not remove a man for working strongly in their favour; but if a turn of the tide takes place, if the parties change sides as they have done in the recent election, and those who were in power find themselves in Opposition, and those who sat on your left, Sir, find themselves suddenly removed to your right, the man who has interfered objectionally against the Opposition cannot complain if his head is taken off. But I think that, apart from anything like offensive opposition, our civil servants ought to be left as free as possible, more particularly as, if a different system be applied, more particularly indeed if such a system as my hon. friend from Cape Breton mentions becomes the rule, it will be found that the civil servants will have to go to the polls, trembling with the idea that, vote how they will, their positions will be in the balance and depend altogether on the success of one party or the other. It will turn them into veritable Vicars of Bray, ready to turn their coats as quickly as any party can change. That I do not consider will be in the interests of the country, particularly as at present, as was pointed out by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, our civil service stands, I think, as high as any civil service in the world, that of the mother country alone excepted; and it is acknowledged that the English civil service is the best that has yet been seen on the face of the globe. I do not for a moment deny that there are black sheep in the civil service. I do not deny that as they number many hundreds and run up into the thousands, counting the outside service, and it would be unreasonable to imagine that you could get so many men together without having some that are not everything that they ought to be. But I believe that, taking them all round, they will compare favourably with the members of any other profession or calling in the land; and it would be most regrettable, in the interests of the country, that any step should be taken which would lower their standard of honour and lessen the pride they feel in their offices, for if you once do that, you will obtain a different class of men, you will get men who go there simply for what they can make, with the idea of remaining for a time and then leaving. In fact, it would amount to very much the same thing as introducing the spoil system which prevails to the south of the line.

I trust that what I have said will have some weight with the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies). I know that he is a man inclined to give fair-play to all, and although a strong partisan, I have got great faith in his love of justice, and I feel sure that if he will throw aside for the time or allow to pass off the heat of the recent contest, which was certainly enough to stir most men out of their ordinary level, we can trust in his hands the fate of the civil service of this country. I would simply ask him to remember that in the west we have a number of men employed in the immigration service and in the Indian service, men who, for the most part have, so far as I know, no political leanings. Many of them, undoubtedly, are strong political partisans—I mean were strongly attached to their party before they took office: how far they have worked since they took office, I do not know; they have not worked in my constituency, and I cannot speak beyond that. But I ask the hon. gentleman to remember that these men cannot be removed to any very great extent without utterly upsetting the service. I am sure if he once looks into the question and considers how widespread would be the effects of removing them simply on account of political action when that action was not offensive, he will see to it that nothing shall be done which will trouble the mind of any man in the civil service who has attended to his duty and has only gone to the poll and voted as a citizen, and, possibly, worked quietly—and strongly, if you will—in favour of the candidate who supported the principles in which he believes.

When I rose I did not intend to say anything except in relation to the question of removals from the civil service. But the hon. gentleman who preceded me, my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) turned his attention for some time to the question of reciprocity. And it struck me very keenly that his references in that connection were not fair to the party to which I belong. The Conservative party, Sir, have never declared themselves against a fair reciprocity treaty. The reciprocity treaty which was in force between the United States and Canada from 1854 was carried by a Conservative Government. That treaty, we all know, was of inestimable benefit to this country, partly, in fact principally, because the circumstances were peculiar. While the treaty was in force the American war raged, which took men by hundreds of thousands from the fields of agriculture to the field of battle, and suddenly caused a demand for our grain, our cattle, our pork—in fact, for everything the farmer in Canada could produce. That treaty was terminated, not by the Conservative party, not by the Canadian Parliament, but by the United States, because, rightly or wrongly, they gained the impression that the people of this country unduly sympathized with the people of the south during the great civil war, and they thought that by taking away the privileges conferred by this treaty they would bring us to our knees and would make us ask them humbly to admit us as one or two states of the American union. But, Sir, when they did so, they altogether mistook the stuff of which Canadians are made. Instead of humbling us, it was a spur to us; it acted like the spur to a jaded horse. And so we found the Canadian people proceeding not to join the United States, but to unite the provinces which before had formed British North America, and so creating the Dominion of Canada. From that time forward several attempts were made by the Conservative party while in power to obtain a fair reciprocity treaty with the United States, but we found they would grant nothing except such a treaty as would give them all the profit and make our people simply hewers of wood and drawers of water for the Americans and for the employees who work in their factories. The consequence was that, in 1878, when the National Policy was introduced, the cry on the part of the Conservatives and their friends throughout Canada was not a cry against reciprocity, but: Reciprocity of trade or reciprocity of tariffs. In the meantime, I may mention that before the Conservatives came into power in 1878, and during those halcyon days, as they would be considered by my hon. friends on the other side, when the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie was Prime Minister of Canada, an attempt was made to obtain a reciprocity treaty, and the Hon. George Brown, the most prominent Liberal of that time in Canada, I take it, was sent as one of the commissioners to Washington to negotiate a treaty. To a certain extent he met with success, but there was one barrier which he could not pass, one boundary which he would not cross, and that was that they would not agree to any treaty in the shape of reciprocity unless it contained a clause discriminating against the mother country. That Mr. Brown, being a good, loyal British subject, as, I am thankful to say, the Reformers in general are, just as Conservatives are, refused to sanction, and the consequence was that the treaty fell through. After that, it was well known that the Government was willing to meet any fair attempt to make a treaty of reciprocity, but that is a very different thing from what was offered. And an unrestricted offer of reciprocity is a very different thing from an offer of unrestricted reciprocity. So far as the leader of the Opposition's remarks about unrestricted reciprocity are concerned, which my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce rather laughed at to-day, we know this—that whatever may have been the intention, whatever may have been said by the supporters of that policy on the Canadian side of the line, it was not in the power of Canada to form such a treaty herself. The treaty had to be made between Canada and the United States, and it mattered little what was proposed by Canadians unless their offer would be accepted when presented to the other party to the bargain. Now, Sir, the American speakers and the American writers, both in the papers and magazines of that country, not having the fear of the Canadian elector before their eyes, stated clearly what they understood by unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union, call it which you will. They made no secret of it that the only thing they would listen to, the only terms they would grant, were based upon the idea of one tariff for Canada and the United States. What did that mean? They are a people of 65,000,000, we are a people of 5,000,000. When the question comes of framing a tariff between these two, would it not be framed by the 65,000,000 instead of the 5,000,000—would not that tariff be formed in Washington instead of Ottawa? And by it should we not have reduced ourselves exactly to the position the thirteen states were in at the time they rebelled against Great Britain—that of having taxation without representation. Besides that, it would have involved discrimination against the mother country. On that point many hon. gentlemen opposite tried to hedge while the fight was on; but my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce having the courage of his convictions, as I must say he always has, stated, not once or twice, but several times, that he did not conceal for a moment that if that treaty went through we would have to discriminate against the world, Great Britain included. That, Sir, was a position which the Conservative party never has taken, and I am thankful to say, never will take. We will never desert the mother country, one to which we are bound not only by bonds of interest but by ties of sentiment, the country which has done so much for us, the country to which we look for our precedents, and the country to which we look for support in case we get into trouble with our neighbours.

My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, referring to the Hon. Edward Blake's speech to which the leader of the Opposition had drawn attention, said that when quoting that speech we ought to read the whole of it in order to see the terms in which he spoke of the position into which the conduct of the Tory party had reduced the country. But I submit, Sir, that Mr. Blake, when expressing his views as against the Tory party, and when giving those which conflict with those held by the Liberal party, occupied a totally different position. In the one case he is a friendly, in the other he is an adverse witness. It is no wonder that in that letter he told the people that the Tory party had been guilty of corruption, that they were ruining the country, and were fast bringing it down to a state of almost beggary. We had heard that from the hon. gentleman in this House and on public platforms for years before. But, Sir, it was something new to hear that hon. gentleman come out and declare openly over his own signature that the conduct of the party with which he had been allied so long, was such that he found it necessary to withdraw from active political life, because he believed that it would necessarily and naturally lead to annexation to the United States. In fact he felt this so strongly that he found it necessary to go on and explain that if the people of this country decided on joining their fortunes with the republic to the south of us, it would be better for them to enter into negotiations while their hands were free and unfettered by any treaty of this kind, and when they could make fair terms with that country, instead of waiting until we were tied hand and foot, and had to enter the union upon such terms as the Americans chose to offer. I think that my hon. friend is unfair in trying to show that Mr. Blake's statement as against the Conservative party ought to have as much weight as those portions of his letter in which he deals with unrestricted reciprocity. I am not going to detain the House longer, but before sitting down I would like to impress on you, Sir, and on the hon. gentlemen occupying the Treasury benches, the necessity that exists for giving some clear and definite statement as to what their position is to be with regard to public officials, how far these can go without fear of risking their necks, and when they may expect to be called to order, or to lose their positions, if they take a stand in favour of one or other of the political parties.

Mr. MACDONELL. I desire to make a few remarks in regard to the position of Mr. Baldwinson who was employed by the Mr. MACDONALD (Winnipeg).

late Government as Icelandic Immigration Agent at Winnipeg. Primarily, and secondarily too, he was an active Conservative organizer among the Icelandic population of the province of Manitoba. In his work of organization he did not act simply in opposition to the local government of Manitoba, but he acted as an agent organizing against the Liberal party of the Dominion of Canada. I am not aware that Mr. Baldwinson interfered actively in the constituency which I have the honour to represent, but I am reliably informed that he did interfere in another outside constituency of the province of Manitoba. He ran as a Conservative candidate in two local elections; and I may say he had succeeded, as Conservative organizer, in changing a large proportion of the Icelandic vote of the province of Manitoba from the Liberal to the Conservative party. Now, Mr. Speaker, with reference to myself, I have been referred to by an hon. gentleman as an active partisan, and at the same time as a Liberal in the civil service of the province of Manitoba. I may say, Sir, that I have been a member of the civil service of the province of Manitoba, an employee of the Liberal government of that province, and while being such employee, I have taken an active part in the elections in that province, and I have also taken when opportunity offered, an active part in elections for the Dominion Parliament. Now, Sir, in doing that I understood perfectly well what the consequences to myself would be should there be a change of government, and I was prepared without any complaint, whatever, to accept such consequences. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the Government of this Dominion, represented by the hon. Premier, will deal with this question firmly and fearlessly. I hope there will be no hesitation in dismissing from the civil service every individual member of that service who has taken an active part in elections. I hope that no commission will be appointed to inquire into the matter, as I think the friends and supporters of this Government are quite competent to give evidence touching offenders in this respect. I hope, Sir, that the hon. gentleman at the head of this Government will act firmly and fearlessly, and without regard to any opinions that may have been expressed from the opposite side of the House.

Mr. McNEILL. I have no intention of taking up the time of the House at any considerable length, nor was it my purpose to say a word in connection with this matter. But some of the remarks which have been made during the course of the debate have lead me to think that perhaps it would not be right for one to sit silent without expressing his views in reference to this matter. I have heard with extreme regret, I must confess, and with very great surprise, some of the remarks that have fallen from hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, for whom I have the greatest possible respect. I have heard my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries make some remarks which, if he really meant what he said, were a source of surprise, I am sure, not only to myself but to many other members of this House, when my hon. friend spoke of the time having come round when he would be able to wreak his revenge—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). No.

Mr. McNEILL. Well, my hon. friend did make use of that expression; I am glad to see he shakes his head, and that he did not really mean, as I gather from his demeanour now, what his words did seem to import. If my hon. friend did not mean what his words would seem to imply, I am only too glad to accept the suggestion he makes that such was not his meaning. I am afraid, however, that the spirit which those words would express, seems to pervade the breasts of a good many of those who sit behind him. I have been very sorry indeed to observe the rapturous applause with which every strong statement has been received by hon. gentlemen opposite, every statement from the Government benches which seemed to indicate that the intention was to lay a heavy hand upon civil servants who had supported the view which they thought was the right view, who had supported that party which they thought was best in the interests of this country. I agree with those who think that civil servants should be allowed to vote, and I agree with those who think that a civil servant being allowed to vote, he should also be allowed modestly and quietly to express his opinion in regard to the questions of the day. I agree also with the view that the civil servant who is an offensive partisan should not expect any mercy at the hands of those to whom he has been offensively opposed; but I do not believe that merely because a civil servant exercises the right of every free man to express his views on the public questions of the day, he should therefore be regarded as an offensive partisan. I do not think that even if a civil servant canvasses quietly against either of the political parties, he should thereby forfeit his position. I remember very well one of the first communications I ever had with Sir John Macdonald was in respect to this very matter. A gentleman in the constituency in which I resided at that time, had taken a leading part against the Conservative party: I would not be prepared to say that he had not been somewhat offensive in the part he had taken. There was a demand by some of our friends, who were a little impetuous, to secure his execution and dismissal. I wrote to Sir John Macdonald, and stated that I hoped he would not lend himself to anything of the kind, that I thought this gentleman had a right to his opinions, and I trusted he would not be dismissed from office because he supported the cause which he thought to be the right one in the best interests of the country. Sir John wrote back that I might be satisfied that his Government would not take any such course; and the gentleman was not interfered with. I remember, also, on the first occasion I contested my constituency, that I found a gentleman there who, occupying a position in the civil service, had opposed me in the election. I spoke to him on the subject, and, after a little fencing with the question, he said this to me, and I have never forgotten it: "Mr. McNeill, how can I forget what John Gillies has done for me?" Mr. Gillies was my opponent; and some hon. members will remember that gentleman as an hon. member in this House. Mr. Gillies had recommended this civil servant for the position he then held. When there was a chance and probability that his friend would lose the seat he held, this member of the civil service, in his gratitude, was prepared to do his best for the man who had been his benefactor. I did not think, when he said that to me, that the fact that he entertained such a feeling of gratitude in his breast was any reason why he would be a less valuable public servant. I did not think it any reason why I should endeavour to strike him down. On the contrary, I felt I could respect the man more than I did before, and I have done so; I ever after held that man in higher respect than I did before. I think it would be a lamentable misfortune if those members of the civil service who quietly and inoffensively have supported the cause which they believed to be the right cause, and supported the men they regarded as their benefactors, should now be knifed and guillotined. There are a great many men in this country, independent men, men who are not very strong partisans on one side or the other, men who are prepared to give hon. gentlemen opposite a fair trial, who are prepared to watch their course carefully and support them, if they do their duty honestly and faithfully in the interests of this country, who will be the first to condemn the course which has been shadowed forth in this House to-day, a course of wholesale decapitation of every civil servant who can be construed as having been an offensive partisan. Now, what is meant by an offensive partisan? If hon. gentlemen mean to say that offensive partisan means simply a man who is quietly exercising his franchise, not only by voting, but by expressing his opinions as to what is the best course to take in the interests of this country—if such men are to be sacrificed and to be beheaded, I venture to say that hon. gentlemen will find, without any doubt whatever, that they have done a great deal to lose the support of every independent man in this Dominion. I am quite sure that the people in this country are the last people in the world to approve a course of that kind. I sincerely hope that hon. gentlemen do not intend to go so far as that, but on the contrary, they will take care that no man shall be interfered with, unless he has been in the strictest sense of the word an offensive partisan. If a civil servant uses his office for the purpose of improperly influencing voters, then I think, as a matter of course, he should be punished and discharged from his office; but if he simply discharges what is regarded to be the duty of every thinking man in the country, it would be most improper that he should be treated in the manner to which reference has been made here to-day. Furthermore, I want to call the attention of hon. gentlemen to this point, which I think one of very great importance, that it would be a very great injustice to dismiss men from the civil service for a course of conduct which the rules of the service do not say they should not pursue. Before such a drastic measure as that is adopted, there should be some rule framed, and the civil servant should be warned by a rule which he would violate at his peril. There is, however, no rule of any department of the service which prevents a civil servant exercising the same rights in this regard that any other citizen may exercise.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Even being an offensive partisan.

Mr. McNEILL. I am speaking about common rules of fair-play. I say that there are exceptions to every general rule, and the exception is the case where the man has been offensive.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I understood that the hon. gentleman was putting it upon the absence of rules.

Mr. McNEILL. I say in the absence of rules, but I say there are exceptions to every rule, and it is perfectly fair to say that that may be the exception. But then, what the hon. gentlemen want to do is to make it a universal rule, that a civil servant who without being offensive, simply and quietly supports the side he believes to be the right side shall be dismissed from office. I say that to do that, without there being any rule, would be a very great hardship and a very great injustice, and I sincerely hope that the Ministers of the Crown will consider carefully before they give effect to any such desire on the part of their supporters. I am quite sure that the two hon. gentlemen who sit immediately opposite me (Mr. Laurier and Mr. Davies), if they are left to the dictates of their own hearts and their own inclinations, would be of the last in this country—I may be wrong but I believe so—to be guilty of a harsh, or an unkind, or an ungenerous action. I must say, that I think such an action as that which has been shadowed forth here, would be harsh, unkind, ungenerous and unjust.

Mr. McNEILL.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, before the motion is put I want to ask a question of the hon. Minister of Marine, and I have no doubt he will do me the courtesy of answering it, as I think the debate arose largely out of the subject of the dismissal of Messrs. Noonan and Davies. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) in replying to me took the position that in their case there was certain information within his own knowledge and therefore no reason for an inquiry. All I desire now to ask him is, whether he will inform the House what the facts were which led him to the opinion which he expressed, namely, that these men were known to have been active, violent, political partisans. When I questioned that, he stated: Many of these facts are known to myself. Now, as these men who have been dismissed have had no investigation, I trust the hon. gentleman will give me the particular facts upon which he formed the conclusion that their conduct was active and violent as political partisans.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have nothing to add to what I have already said on the subject, more especially as my hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has a motion on the Order paper for all the papers in connection with that matter. Having put that motion there, I have no doubt he intends to discuss it more fully at a future date. The matter has gone beyond the reach of argument so far as I am concerned—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not wish to argue. I merely wish to know if the hon. gentleman will give me the information.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES—the matter has gone beyond the reach of argument for the reason that the hon. gentleman himself stated that which was within my own knowledge, that these people were his own committee men.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I said I did not know that, but I believed it.

Mr. OLIVER. The hon. member for Bruce (Mr. McNeill) alluded to the opinion of independent politicians in regard to this question of the civil servants. I was elected to this House as an Independent Liberal, and I may claim in some manner to express the views of persons who are not strict partisans. It seems to me that both sides of this House are agreed up to a certain point. They are agreed that every man who has a vote should have the right to cast that vote for whatever political party he thinks best. The Liberals are agreed to that and the Conservatives are agreed to it also. But the Conservatives go further, and say: that these men not only have the right to vote, but that they have a right to work for the cause they believe in. That is where the difference comes in. Let me point out to these hon. gentlemen opposite who have argued in that way, that when they speak of the action of the officials of the Manitoba government, and of other provincial governments, they speak in terms of the strongest reprobation of just exactly such conduct on the part of the officials of these governments, as some Dominion officials have been guilty of, and whose action they condone. It seems to me that what would be right in the case of an official of the Dominion Government should certainly be right in the case of an official of the local government, and particularly so, when the action of an official of the local government is not in any way or in any sense under the control of this Government or of this Parliament. Let me go further and point out, that when these gentlemen opposite argue that officials of the civil service have a perfect right to canvass and work in the interests of a political party, they are arguing against themselves. For the moment they are in opposition, and the Liberal party is in office, and in the natural course of events from time to time the civil service as it exists to-day will become more and more Liberal in tendency. Therefore these gentlemen opposite are simply arguing, that when the next general election rolls around five years hence, the civil servants of the country shall be used as a weapon against them in that election. The gentlemen who have spoken on the Liberal side of the House have argued strongly on the other hand, that the civil servant shall have the right of a citizen to vote but not to take an active part in the elections, and that proposition I say, is in favour of the present opposition and not against it. It seems to me that for the sake of making a political point and a cry before the country, these gentlemen opposite are arguing against what is their own best political interests. Let me say further, from the standpoint of an Independent, that there is something more connected with the civil service than the mere question of whether a man votes Conservative or Liberal. There is the question of the necessity for the office; there is the question as to the efficiency with which the office is filled, and there is the question as to the trust that can be reposed by the Government or by the department in that official. These are questions that are to be discussed and considered and acted upon, just as much, and in fact ten times more so, than the question of the political opinions of an official. These gentlemen who are now raising a cry against what they are pleased to call the spoils system, are, it appears to me, trying to make a point with the country at large so as to protect unnecessary, inefficient and untrustworthy civil servants. That is apparently the object at which they aim, and that is what all this long debate is about. When the Liberal Government is attempting to reform the civil service, and to see to it that the country shall get value for the money paid to officials, this cry is raised by hon. gentlemen opposite to protect their friends who are not needed in the public service, and so the Reform Government who are doing the best they can in the interests of the country are held up as reprobates by those gentlemen and by their supporters. Speaking as an Independent, and as one who has nothing to say against the conduct of the civil servants in my constituency during the last election, I say that the people of Canada, so far as I know, voted in support of the new Government quite as much for the purpose of getting a reform in the civil service as on any other ground. They want the number of tax eaters in this country reduced, they want the burden of their taxation cut down, and they want the service rendered by these gentlemen to be better in the future than it has been in the past.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to tax the House with many words, but really I cannot allow to go unchallenged the remarks of the hon. gentleman who I think represents York (Mr. Foster). He has been travelling through so many constituencies of late that I had almost forgotten what constituency he belongs to. While he was in King's county we were able to keep track of him, and I also managed to follow him up in Queen's county the other day, which he has been talking about to-night. Now, for a gentleman such as he to come before a large assembly like this, and to tell them with hardly a smile on his face that no such thing existed in his party as he now denounces to be wrong in the Liberal party, is something which I cannot well understand. I took down some of his words. He said civil servants should be free to vote. I can imagine him now, as I saw him at The Narrows, in Queen's county, the other day, telling the people that they would be ruined if they elected the Hon. A. G. Blair, trying to make out that nothing good could come out of the Liberal party, that they were all corrupt. Was there freedom of speech then, when he declined to allow me the liberty of a British subject, to get up and defend Mr. Blair, whom he had attacked in his absence, as he has done here to-day? When the hon. gentleman said that the civil service should have every chance to vote, did he know that in King's county the railway men on the Intercolonial Railway were not allowed the freedom to vote, but that orders were sent there calling them away from their homes, so that they could not vote at their respective polls? When he said that postmasters were a superior class of men who gave their time and their ability to the service of the country and should have a right to vote, did he not remember that under the late Government certain postmasters had travelled night and day and paid money out on his behalf—nay, that they were called to account by him as to what they had done with the money? I can name them, if necessary. I can take him to Belle Isle, and show that he dismissed the postmaster there, and put another man in his place. I can take him to Greenwich, where the lighthouse keeper was dismissed without any cause. I can take him to Millstream or to English Settlement, where Mr. Gamblin, the fishery warden, was put out to make room for a friend of his. I can give other examples from King's county—

Mr. FOSTER. That is only three.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Only three? Do you want any more? I can give you the case of Mrs. Waters, then, if you like. She paid the hon. gentleman the greatest compliment in the world. She said she knew George; they had been boy and girl at school together; they had sat on the same bench together, and afterwards they had taught school together, and she vouched for his being a fine man. I have no doubt she was right, and she was rewarded for it. But it is not necessary to go into these matters, because we all know them down there. We know in our county how we have been handled. My hon. friend spoke of officials of the local government of Ontario taking part in the elections. Let him think of his own county. I can fancy now that I see the great big hand-bills on the walls, announcing that the Hon. George E. Foster, then Minister of Finance, and the Hon. Mr. Pugsley would address the convention called to select a Liberal-Conservative candidate. Who was Mr. Pugsley? I do not say anything derogatory to him; but he was the law clerk of the local House, drawing a salary of $1,000 a year; and yet he was there with Mr. Foster trying to use what influence he could upon the electorate of King's in the hon. gentleman's favour. Mr. Pugsley spoke for him at Hampton, and ran as a candidate of his party; but it was not long until he came to repudiate the hon. gentleman and ran as an independent, because he found that he could get nothing under the umbra or shade of Mr. Foster of King's county. We know that shade down there. The hon. gentleman spoke of my hon. friend as holding a position under the local government of Ontario; and yet he brought out as a candidate, Mr. Morton, Judge of Probate, and asked the people to accept him, though he, was at that very time Judge of Probate, he never resigned that position, and he is Judge of Probate to-day. All these things, I think, go to show that Mr. Foster is not consistent in the position he takes. We know him down there, and we make due allowance. I myself have sometimes, like himself, moments of weakness, and sometimes my health is bad; and when I am in that state, perhaps I do not make as correct statements as I should if I were in a good state of health and strength. I might give other instances. I know in the Queen's and Sunbury election that my hon. friend trotted off one morning to see a large lumber dealer in the county of York in order to get his support. There was a joyous feeling among his friends in St. John at the prospect. If that gentleman would come out for him, they had the county sure. But it is doubtful if they got the gentleman, and I think I may fairly say that they will not when the constituency of York is opened up again, as it will be very shortly; because I can undertake to say for myself, at any rate, that there will be no sawing-off, no swapping. We must get to the bottom of this thing. We must see whether New Brunswick is under the control of the Hon. A. G. Blair or under the control of Mr. Foster.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I apologize, Sir. It is so long since the hon. member drove me out of King's that I have perhaps forgotten some parliamentary expressions. This thing has got to be fought out, and my hon. friend will perhaps find out then that the same power that was wielded for him in York county before will be turned against him then. But be that as it may, we cannot and will not in our province allow public servants to go about again and insult the best friends of the Liberal party in New Brunswick. A postal clerk was actually sent into my county to work openly against me and for the Conservative party—nay, in the election before he used money and bribed the people in broad daylight, and challenged them afterwards, so that they could not vote either legitimately or illegitimately. The hon. member for York must remember that the people of New Brunswick are a discriminating people. They have discriminated in his case, and they will discriminate in the case of the civil servants. There is no doubt that it would be improper to do anything that is wrong or hard towards a civil servant who has merely voted without doing more. I trust that the Government will see that those who have done some of the most outrageous acts in our province—and doubtless the same has been the case elsewhere—shall be replaced by some other gentlemen, notwithstanding the attempt that has been made to assist in keeping them in office. I have not the least doubt that we shall see hon. members of the House coming down there and saying: We have assisted you, and now it is your turn in these by-elections to rally all your friends to help to put us in power. We stood by you when you were out of power, by our endeavours we compelled the Government of the day to keep you there, and now that you have had all the benefit of the time they have been in office, and we have an election coming along, we want you to use all your influence to get us back, who put you there. I do not believe that any hon. gentleman on either side desires to do any injustice, but surely the hon. First Minister and members of the Government must be allowed to use their own judgment without being criticised so severely, when really they have done nothing to merit such criticism, because the fact that the Minister of Public Works has been able to reduce his staff and do the work of his department at a great saving to the people, will gain for him credit all through the country.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the House goes into Committee of Supply, taking it for granted that the debate on the general policy and practice of the Government with reference to the civil service has closed, I wish to make a few remarks on another subject.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has already spoken.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not going to speak on the same question, but wish to make a few remarks on the Estimates.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. It is the same question that is before the Chair.

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend would rather I should do so after we go into Committee of Supply, I have no objection.

Motion agreed to, and the House resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. FOSTER. Before we go into the items, I desire to make a few remarks with reference to the general character of the Estimates, and to ask my hon. friend the Minister of Finance a few questions with regard to them. In the first place, the statement was made that the Estimates brought down are those which were prepared by myself and presented to the House by the late Government, with some few trifling exceptions. The reason why that statement was made was not very clear; but what I wish to say is this, that, in the first place, it will be found, on looking at the column of Estimates for 1895-96, that they differ in a very material way from the column as presented by myself a few months ago. They are greater than the items in the column presented in the Estimates that I laid upon the Table. What I want to call the attention of the House to is, that the amount of the Estimates brought down by my hon. friend, as compared with those that were brought down by me, does not show any great disparity, are in fact about equal. The column of comparison of the preceding year simply includes the main Estimates and what we may call the main Supplementary Estimates; but in the Estimates my hon. friend has brought down this year, coming six months later or so, he is enabled to place in the column for 1895-96 not only the main Estimates and the Supplementary Estimates, but the Supplementary Estimates which are generally brought down for the current year, and in no preceding Estimates brought down can such a comparison as that be made. The comparison therefore, between the Estimates for 1895-96 and the hon. gentleman's, is more favourable to my hon. friend for that reason, and I just want to make that point clear to the House. While my hon. friend was perfectly right in including all the Estimates in the column for 1895-96, yet the circumstances of the case give him the appearance of advantage as regards the sum he has brought down, compared with the sum I brought down, as compared, in their turn, with previous years. That, however, is not a fault I am finding with my hon. friend, but I simply wish to mention the fact, so that the House may have that matter within its purview. I wish also to call the attention of my hon. friend to the fact that the Estimates he has brought down, and which do not include the Supplementary Estimates which he has promised the House, and do not include the Supplementary Estimates which will be brought down next year for the cost of this session, are yet very high. They are, in round numbers, on consolidated account, $38,222,537. I wish to call the attention of the House to this fact, that when my hon. friend brings down these Estimates, which are not the full Estimates, he has brought down an Estimate greater than any preceding year, with the exception of the Estimate that I brought down last March, and but a very little less than that—some few thousands of dollars—and this Estimate, as it stands to-day, being simply the main Estimate, is thirty-eight and a quarter million dollars.

Now, the hon. gentleman has promised that there will be Supplementary Estimates for this year. When these are added, that sum will be increased. There is also not a shadow of doubt that next session there will necessarily be some Supplementary Estimates for the current year, and these will have to be added; so that the total Estimate of my hon. friend, be he as careful as he can, after he has brought down the full Estimates for the year, cannot be less than forty-one million dollars on consolidated fund account—the highest Estimate that ever has been placed before this House. That is emphasized by the remark which was made by the independent member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver). He votes for the Liberals, and a great many of his supporters voted for the Liberal Government because they want the expenditure reduced, and the number of employees reduced. Well, I call my hon. friend's attention to the fact that he will look in vain in the Estimates brought down by my hon. friend to see any reduction in the public expenditure and in the estimated expenditure for the employees and officers of the Government. Under the one Estimate that was brought down, with the two to follow, there is but the slightest reduction on the Estimate made in March last. When these are brought down, there is not the shadow of a doubt that they will be millions of dollars more than ever before brought down. Now, if my hon. friend supported the Liberal party with the idea that the Estimates were to be reduced and that the service of the country was not to cost so much, that civil servants were to be cut down my hon. friend has made his first mistake. If it be his first, in that respect. When we come to the items, what do we find? What charge has been made against the late Government more frequently or urged more strongly or more persistently than this—that we had on this Hill at Ottawa and scattered throughout the towns and counties of the Dominion a vast horde of useless public officials, who were stumbling over each other, who had not work enough to do and whose salaries and expenses the hard-working people of the country were taxed to pay. Well, Sir, this new Government has gone back upon its pretensions of eighteen years. Where is my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). It is a pity he is not in the House just now. The keenest critic the hon. Minister of Finance must expect during the passage of these Estimates is surely the hon. member for North Wellington. Which of us has forgotten how this side of the House resounded with his denunciation of the waste of money upon these useless employees. Would you believe it, Sir, the amount brought down by this Government for civil government is $1,200,000, that is out of consolidated fund and not taking into consideration the statutory amount, and this taking the main Estimates only, and without the supplementaries for the year and a second supplementary which are both still to follow. But I wish to call my hon. friend's attention to another fact. The practice has been uniform since I entered this House that these main Estimates must include the main ordinary expenses of the country, which are foreseen and known, while the supplementaries take in what you may call extraordinary services, a large proportion of which are public works, new expenditures and so on. Now, did not the hon. Minister of Finance know that in the financial year 1896-97 he had to estimate for two sessions of Parliament? There is the session now in progress and the session that the leader of the Government has promised shall take place early in 1897. Both of these are foreseen, but only one of them is provided for. Why is it? Is it in order to make this first appearance of the Estimates a little less awful and terrifying to the hon. member for North Wellington and the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver), who came in with such high anticipations of levelling down. The amount which should have been added for the other session of Parliament is about $600,000. And if that were added to the Estimates already brought down, the amount to be voted from consolidated fund would be $38,825,787, which is much more than the Estimate brought down by myself last year. And yet we must remember that neither of the Supplementary Estimates has yet been brought down. How often have we heard the changes rung on the declaration that this amount of money—aye, that $36,000,000—was altogether too much to spend?

How often has the elector been reminded of the halcyon days of Mr. Mackenzie when $22,000,000 was enough for the current expenses of the country, with the argument plainly implied: Bring us back to power and we will bring you back those good old times. No one ever believed them; no one ever thought they would carry out that implied promise; but a large proportion of the people thought that the expenditures of the country would be reduced below those of the Conservative Administration for the last six or seven years. But they are not. Are we face to face with broken pledges again? Have hon. gentlemen again run up against the difficulty of carrying out when in power the pledges made in Opposition? Are they taking the insidious and immoral advice of an evening paper, which is now supporting the Government, which intimates that it makes all the difference whether the people are in power or out of power with reference to the promises they have made? The present leader of the Government pledged himself to certain things with reference to the expenditures. What were they. I will read one. In the "Globe" of August 20th, 1894, is a report of his speech delivered at Brantford. After going into the enormous expenditure and after speaking of the great amount spent for the civil service, and the low expenditure under Mr. Mackenzie, the hon. gentleman said:

Do you imagine that there is any justification for this? The Conservatives tell us that there is a justification. The population has increased, they say. Oh, yes, it has increased nine per cent; but the expenditure has increased 100 per cent. There can be no justification for such an expenditure when, as has been stated, the great bulk is corrupt expenditure. Moreover, they tell us that if we were in power we could not retrench and economize. But I don't believe that it would be a very difficult task. (Hear, hear). It would not be a very difficult task to retrench to the extent of one, two, three, and Mr. Mills told his constituents a few days ago that it was possible to retrench to the extent of four millions a year.

The leader of his party, asking to be returned to power and criticising his opponents on the ground of their expenditure, pledges himself that one, two, three millions at least can be taken off the public expenditure, and, if we are to believe Mr. Mills, four millions could be taken off. Now that is not an isolated statement of the hon. gentleman. In the city of Toronto he made about the same statement, according to the report of the "Globe," which is as follows:—

Has the expenditure gone down? No, it has gone up. It was two, three five, ten millions and more, until it is now $38,000,000. And the Conservatives do not shrink from it, but swallow it all. If we come into power we will follow the example of Mr. Mackenzie, and I say that although we may not be able to bring the expenditures back to what they were under him, we can reduce the amount two, yes, three million dollars a year.

If ever there was a case in which a persistent canvass was made against a party on the ground of large expenditure, if ever there was a case where the responsible leader of a party, now the equally responsible leader of a Government, declared in plain terms that reductions should be made, the present is that case. And yet he sits in this House to-day, and sits in Council before he comes to the House and deliberately authorizes his Minister of Finance to come with an expenditure estimated at $38,828,000—if the extra session of Parliament had been put in—of thirty-eight and a quarter millions without considering that, and the Supplementary Estimates yet to come. What are we to think of these hon. gentlemen? Must we not think that they have lost respect for pledges and promises? Why, Sir, the very essence of parliamentary government is that the party out of power shall be distinct and positive with reference to its great lines of policy and of administration. How else can the electorate judge between the two parties? The electorate took the statements of the hon. gentleman who leads the Government, that the expenditure would be reduced $3,000,000 and perhaps $5,000,000. They saw it was $38,000,000 under our Administration, and the electorate said, On those two statements of the case we will put the Liberals in and save three millions at least per year in expenditure. Now, the very first year they come down with a larger amount than $38,000,000, with the enormous sum in their first estimate of $38,250,000, or with an extra session of Parliament, with $38,800,000. Now, I think it is well that that statement should be made to the House and to the country. I want to ask my hon. friend one thing else. Will it be made an excuse of hon. gentlemen opposite that they are simply laying before the House the Estimates that were laid down by the preceding Government? Imitation is said to be the sincerest form of flattery, but hon. gentlemen cannot hide behind that flimsy excuse. They detailed their position, and their antagonism to our increase of expenditures and our scale of expenditures. They made that pledge I have read. They cannot justify themselves now by saying: Oh, you expended so much, because the whole force of their argument was: You expended so much, and we are going to expend three millions less. My hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) is here, I am sorry he was not here before. Does not my hon. friend from North Wellington know how, on this side of the House, right up in that seat, he thundered against this expenditure of $38,000,000 a year? Does my hon. friend know that this Finance Minister has put down in his first estimate $38,250,000? The hon. gentleman did not hear me read this statement of his leader.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Read it again.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, I will read it again for the benefit of my hon. friend. This is what Mr. Laurier said at Brantford:

Do you imagine that there is any justification for this? The Conservatives tell us that there is a justification. The population has increased, they say. Oh, yes, it has increased nine per cent; but the expenditure has increased 100 per cent. There can be no justification for such an expenditure when, as has been stated, the great bulk is a corrupt expenditure. Moreover, they tell us that if we were in power we could not retrench and economize. But I don't believe that it would be a very difficult task. (Hear, hear). It would not be a very difficult task to retrench to the extent of one, two, three, and Mr. Mills told his constituents a few days ago that it was possible to retrench to the extent of four millions a year.

And in Toronto I must inform the hon. member for North Wellington, that he made the same explicit and positive statement. Now, what will my hon. friend from North Wellington do about this? What will the party who has thundered in the very same tones, if not so persistently as my hon. friend, on this same line—what will they say? Before I leave that point I want to ask the Minister of Finance another question. He asks this House first for $38,200,000. Then he must make his estimate for the next session of Parliament, and with the Supplementary Estimates still promised—I want to ask my hon. friend what is the state of the finances to-day, and how is he going to meet the expenditure which is contemplated in that estimate of $38,000,000 and more. The very first essence of any kind of good finance is that when estimates are being prepared and expenditures are being based, there must be considered at the same time ways and means for raising sufficient funds to pay those expenditures. But my hon. friend tells us that we are not to go into ways and means this year. My estimate last year was based on a probable income from receipts of $37,000,000. Up to 20th August, 1896, I find by the return my hon. friend has put in my hands, that they were $36,500,000. It cannot be possible that they will exceed the estimate I made, that is, the income for the year just past cannot exceed $37,000,000. Has my hon. friend any point of view to give us which would strengthen the opinion that in the current year, with no added taxes, and under the condition of things as they are, we will be able to raise more than $37,000,000? If not, is he going to ask the House to empower him and his Government to spend some $41,000,000 on consolidated fund, when he cannot reasonably expect more than $37,000,000 from the receipts of the year? Surely he is not going to proceed upon that system of finance; surely he must satisfy this House, before he asks us to place that sum of money in his hands, that by some means to be considered he can fairly meet that expenditure. The expenditure actually made hardly ever comes up to the expenditure that is estimated; it may exceed it, but the general rule under careful administration is that it will not exceed it. But my hon. friend must recollect that he is going to expend over forty million dollars on consolidated fund, and that he cannot show, unless the vision has broadened and the condition of affairs has so ameliorated as to make his prospects of income greater—he cannot show by the ways and means at present at the disposal of the Government, that that expenditure can be met. Now, those are points upon which it seems to me my hon. friend ought to satisfy this House before we proceed in detail with the Estimates.

Mr. McMULLEN. I want to say a word in reply to the late Finance Minister. He is evidently going to develop into a very minute and pointed critic in the matter of examining the Estimates. No doubt the hon. gentleman, from the experience he has had, is admirably fitted to discharge that particular duty. He has mentioned my name as one who took an active part in advocating reductions in past years. I did so, and I am prepared to do so now, and I intend to do so. But my hon. friend must remember that the Government of the day cannot possibly make the reductions all at once that we earnestly hope they will be able to make, that we predicted we would make if the Reform Government was asked to occupy the Treasury benches. We believe considerable reduction can be made in the salaries of civil servants. But no sooner does the Minister of Public Works make a move in that direction than he is pounced upon by the whole Conservative press, and it is declared that he had adopted the use of the guillotine in order to behead political civil servants and turn them out of office. When we make a move in the direction of cutting down the public expenditure, immediately the Government is assailed by the Conservatives for having done so. Hon. gentlemen opposite are well aware that members of the civil service are employees appointed by themselves. They have incurred the expense to the country. Those officers have to be paid, and until the present Government can make a thorough and exhaustive investigation and effect reductions, which I honestly hope and believe they will be able to carry out, the salaries of those officials have to be paid. Do hon. gentlemen opposite expect the Government to be able without any investigation to dismiss a number of men? Why, we spent the whole afternoon listening to imploring appeals from hon. gentlemen opposite to deal very tenderly and carefully with the civil servants. I think such is the intention. I believe, however, that, after careful and thorough investigation has been made, very considerable reductions can and will be made. The Government is committed to that principle, and I believe it will be carried out; but the Government cannot carry it out themselves until they make investigation into the whole condition. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) is finding fault with his own Estimates. He declared the necessity that those Estimates should be voted, that those Estimates were necessary, and he sought, last session, to have the House consent to vote them. While the present Government is asking the House to vote these Estimates, it is in the expectation and belief that at the end of the year they will have found it unnecessary to expend all the money granted by Parliament. What has been the experience of the country as regards hon. gentlemen opposite? Every year, not only was the amount voted expended, but more money was required. We hope, under the present regime that a different condition of things will obtain, that economy will be practised, and hon. gentlemen opposite will have to sit comfortably and quietly in the seats they now occupy, and give the Government an opportunity to put in practice those principles which we declared we were prepared to carry out, and which we are going to make an honest effort to carry into effect.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The observations addressed to the House by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) render it almost unnecessary that I should say anything in reply to the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster); but I can offer him, at least, very sincere sympathy for the very unhappy position in which he is now placed, in being obliged to attack his own Estimates submitted to Parliament. We thought we were going to meet the position of the hon. gentleman and put him in an amiable mood by bringing down Estimates which he himself had prepared. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman, that if we had brought down those Estimates, accompanied by an announcement that we expected to expend that money and effect no saving, then, undoubtedly, the hon. gentleman might have had good cause for complaint; but the hon. gentleman will remember that, in bringing down the Estimates, I made the statement—he may call it a confession, if he will—that we had not been long enough in office to make ourselves familiar with all the details of the departments, and we paid him the compliment that, within reasonable limits, the Estimates submitted by him would be accepted as indicating the needs of the public service; but we accepted them with the distinct understanding that so soon as the session closed there would be an investigation made of the public departments. We do hope to effect some savings, even within the present fiscal year. The hon. gentleman is very much alarmed because the Estimates are for the sum of $38,225,000. But his own Estimates amounted to $38,308,000, and in order to indicate our desire for economy, we have at the beginning asked for a less sum than the hon. gentleman asked from Parliament. But the hon. gentleman appears to think that these are large Estimates. He prophesies, as readily as he did on the day of the election in Queen's and Sunbury, that we are to submit Estimates to the amount of $41,000,000; and then he wants to know where all this money is to come from. I am not prepared to admit that any hon. gentleman has a right to treat the Estimates for the coming year as amounting to $41,000,000; it will be quite time to do so when we submit Estimates for that sum, and then it will be time to hold us responsible for them. Let me venture to say this, that even if the Government have to bring down Supplementary Estimates for a considerable amount, we shall be able, with some confidence, to enter into comparisons, and if hon. gentlemen opposite have been able to pay us the compliment that, in the first step as regards our Estimates there is an apparent advantage in our favour, I hope this credit will be much larger when our Supplementary Estimates are compared with those which would necessarily have been submitted by hon. gentlemen opposite to carry out the promises made by them on the hustings throughout the Dominion. I venture to say that if the hon. member for York had been so fortunate as to return to this House as Finance Minister, and had brought down the Estimates, in order to fulfil the obligations which his friends undertook to assume throughout the Dominion, he would not have had Estimates amounting to $41,000,000, but the amount would have been nearer $50,000,000. The hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) wishes to know where we will get the money. I will take him into my confidence, and I will tell him that we will get $38,225,000 from the same sources he would have obtained $38,308,000. Our financial resources are just the same; the tariff remains unchanged, the whole fiscal policy remains for the present the same. Hon. gentlemen had the right to assume that, if out of the various measures directed to the raising of revenue, the hon. gentleman would be able to raise $38,308,000, we would be able to obtain $38,225,000. I fail to see where there is any cause for alarm. Perhaps the hon. gentleman thinks we should turn out members of the civil service at once; but if we were to attempt to economize immediately in that direction, what would become of all the agitation today on the question of dismissals? Hon. members are asking for economy in the civil service, and at the same time they are arraigning the conduct of the Government for dismissing two or three members of the service. My firm belief, from what I have heard, and to some extent from what I have seen here, is that the civil service of Canada is overmanned, and, while I am not prepared at the present time to promise large reductions, I hope that when the current year is closed, and when I am able to bring the result before Parliament, it will appear that we have not needed all the money which Parliament has appropriated, but that we have been able to effect economy. The hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) has complained that we did not introduce estimates of expenditure for two sessions of Parliament. I do not see any good reason for that criticism. We have not had an opportunity of understanding or estimating properly what this session of Parliament is likely to cost. We had cherished the hope that this would be a very brief session; there seems no good reason or necessity why it should be a long session. I can quite understand that if we were adopting a new policy, if we were proposing new measures and introducing subjects open to debate, hon. gentlemen could argue that there was reason for a long session; but as the Government announced at the beginning of the session that they would not propose any legislation beyond granting of supplies, and have not propounded any policy which could be challenged in the House, I fail to see what need there is of a protracted session. We had hoped and believed that a very short and inexpensive session would have been secured and simply the Estimates passed. If, by the action of hon. gentlemen opposite, this is made a protracted and expensive session, we shall have to provide the expenses of a full session of Parliament. But, if we are to realize the expectations of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) and are going to spend $41,000,000, and only going to raise $37,000,000, at least I shall have a very illustrious precedent for the deficit, for I believe my hon. friend in one year had a deficit of almost exactly the sum which is represented by the difference between those two amounts. I do not desire to enlarge upon the question. The hon. gentleman was informed at the beginning that the Government were not to go into the details of these estimates as fully as the hon. gentleman and his colleagues would have been able to do; but that so far as we have an opportunity of investigating them, we were in favour of making reductions. So, we ask the House to accept these Estimates with the distinct understanding that every effort will be made by us to bring about a reduction, and I have strong hope that our effort will not be a failure.

Mr. FOSTER. One word or two in answer to my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding), and I will take his last remark first. He says, that if he receives $41,000,000 from the House and only gets $37,000,000 from Ways and Means, it will leave a deficit of $4,000,000, which will be about equal to the deficit which I myself had the year before last. The difference between the hon. gentleman and myself is this: that the deficit of $4,000,000 the year before last was off-set to the country by $4,000,000 of reduced taxation on sugar alone. If my hon. friend will come down with a measure which will take three or four millions taxation off the people, we will forgive him for his deficit. The hon. gentleman also tried to get out of underestimating for the full legislative expenses, by saying that he hoped this would be a brief session. How brief did the hon. gentleman hope it would be? The hon. gentleman did not suppose that the country after a general election, was to send up its representatives here to simply vote its Estimates en bloc, and allow the Government what time they pleased for maturing their measures of policy which they had promised to hand, without giving them any hint as to the principle on which they would proceed. If the hon. gentleman did not expect a session of less than one month, let me tell him that the larger part of the expenses of the session is mainly that which is fixed by law, namely, the indemnity for members, "Hansard," the publication of papers, and the salaries of the temporary officers of the House. Therefore, his excuse with reference to that matter is not very strong. My hon. friend has given the very best reason why we should not vote him these Estimates, and I will tell the House what it is. Did you ever hear a Minister of Finance come down to a House of Commons, which holds its hands closely on the purse strings, and say to it: give me $38,200,000. I do not think I will be able to spend it all but then give it to me. No, it is too much of a temptation to put in the way of my hon. friend. But, I will make a suggestion. The Finance Minister and the member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) are going to join heads together, and see where they can reduce the expenditure. Very well, we will be called early next year. You need not ask for $38,200,000 and take all the temptation. You can just ask for a smaller sum and you can look into it in the meantime, and if you are not successful in making your reduction, then next January or February you can bring down your Supplementary Estimates and the House will see what it will do with you. My hon. friend has given the best reason in the world why we should not vote that inordinate sum of money. My hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) says that we are inconsistent in growling for two days about dismissals, and then in growling to-night again because the civil service reductions are not made. No member on this side of the House has growled, and never will growl, because of the dismissal of useless and unnecessary officials. What we were arguing about is this: That it was proposed to dismiss present officials and put others in their place, and the whole point of our criticism was on the principle which should guide in dismissing and filling up these vacancies. Now, my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) took refuge in what I told the House he certainly would. He tries to shelter himself behind the Estimates of the late Government. He cannot do that because the whole gist of the argument and the canvas of hon. gentlemen opposite, and the pledged statement of their leader was: Not that they would expend as much as we did and find their excuse in our expenditure, but that they would expend three or four millions less. The hon. gentleman must not plead what we proposed to do, as justification for their doing the same, while their whole political propaganda has been directed against our extra expenditure, and has been aided by their promise that their expenditure would be some millions less. I commend to my hon. friend the suggestions, that as he does not think he will use all this money and hopes to economize, that the House will meet again early in the coming winter and he need not ask all the money which he now does. It is a terrible temptation to give it to him, especially when my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. McInnes) is behind him with that cloud of witnesses who are making their way here, asking for what they have not had for the last 18 years.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I propose to take the Militia Estimates first, and I will state the reason why. The delay in the passing of the supplies is embarrassing to more than one service, but there is special reason why we should take Militia Estimates now, and I have no doubt hon. gentlemen will agree with me. The camps are to be held. I believe they are to commence next week and it is highly important that the Militia Department should provide for the payment of their men. I propose that we should take that first.

Mr. FOSTER. I would have no objection to my hon. friend taking that portion of the militia estimate which is necessary for the field drill, but as he knows these Estimates are generally taken up in their order, and we have some little consideration to give to them. If that is what my hon. friend wishes I have no objection at all.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I will accept the suggestion and take that particular item.

Militia Field Drill..... $446,500

Mr. FOSTER. Will my hon. friend give us a full explanation as to what he proposes to do with this amount.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). The House is aware that there was no drill in camp for the rural battalions last year at all, and that previous to that time the custom was to drill each alternate year. At the present moment a number of battalions have not been turned out to drill for two years, and this will be the third year if they are not sent into camp now. It was the understood policy of the department under the late Government, that there should be a full drill this year. The battalions throughout the Dominion were expecting this, and I felt that it would be a serious blow to the militia service if that idea were not carried out. A general order has been issued for camps to be held at London, Niagara, Kingston, Laprairie, St. John's, P.Q., Point Lévis, Sussex, N.B., and Aldershot, N.S. Two of the camps are to be held, beginning on the 8th of September; the most of them on the 15th of September, and one of them as late as the 22nd of September. For the camp which is to be held on the 8th of September the money will be required within a very short time, and I have been urging upon the Finance Minister the importance of ascertaining the view of the House, as to whether these Estimates are to be allowed to go through in time for the camp, otherwise the camps will have to be cancelled or further postponed. Everybody knows that it would be impossible to hold the camps at a later date than that which we have fixed. After the postponement of the date of the meeting of Parliament, the date at which the camps were to be held was postponed, and the dates have now been put at the very latest periods possible. Consequently, I hope that the House will grant this particular vote.

Mr. TISDALE. Is this amount supposed to cover next year's drill as well as this year's?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. It covers the estimate for the current year. Some of the battalions elected not to go into camp until next June. This whole amount will not be used this autumn, it is true; but it will be used before the 1st July next, in all probability. It is the exact amount estimated by the hon. gentleman himself, or by whomsoever was in office at the time these Estimates were made up.

Mr. TISDALE. Is it intended to drill the whole force—artillery, infantry and cavalry? This Estimate was not made up while I had the honour of presiding over the department. Whatever estimates were made had been made previously, so that I had not the opportunity of examining them; and I am asking these questions more particularly for the information of the force. Do I understand that this amount will be sufficient to drill all the organized force in all the different arms, or only a certain number? As I understand, it will be sufficient to drill all those in June who are not drilled this year.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. My understanding is that as there was no drill at all last year, it is intended to drill the whole force this year; and this estimate is expected to be sufficient to cover the drill of the whole force within the present year.

Mr. TISDALE. If that is the case, has the hon. gentleman arrived at any policy for next year, or as to whether he proposes for the future to drill the whole force every year or not?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. That is a question of policy, to be decided later on. It has not been considered, but it is the intention and expectation that the sum of money now asked for will be sufficient to drill the whole force either this autumn or next June.

Mr. TISDALE. Is the hon. gentleman able to state the number of men?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The whole force is to be drilled, but I am not really able to give the hon. gentleman the number of men. The militia list, I presume, contains that information. The statement which has been prepared for me does not give the number.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The statement must be very incomplete. We are asked to spend half a million, and the very first question that occurs to one is the number of men who are to be drilled. As I understand, it has only lately been proposed to drill the whole militia force; and now that the hon. gentleman has very properly asked for the money necessary for that purpose, it seems to me that information should have been given to him, so that he could have explained to the committee exactly the number of men to be drilled.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The increase is $346,500. Speaking merely from recollection, I believe that when I occupied the position which the hon. gentleman now does, the number of men in the annual drill was between 21,000 and 23,000 men. The hon. gentleman should be able to tell the committee how many men are going to be drilled for that increase. I do not think that even with that increased amount of money he contemplates drilling the whole force. I do not think that amount would cover it. But if the hon. gentleman will let me make a suggestion, I think he could very easily ascertain from the department the number of men who are going to be drilled for that amount of money, and that would give a very fair means of ascertaining exactly what his policy is.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken, who presided over this department so long and so well, must remember that only about half the force was in the habit of drilling. That has been the rule. I was at camp myself for many years, and I remember that the regiment to which I belonged went into camp in alternate years. Consequently, the provision made was only for about half the force. This year I understood the provision to be made for the whole force.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I do not think that amount will cover it.

Mr. TISDALE. No one desires to delay the passing of this particular item, but we ought to have some more definite information, not only to avoid the appearance of looseness in voting large sums, but that the militia force may be assured that the provision is sufficient for the number to be called out. I understand that the previous Government intended that a sufficient amount of money should be voted to drill the whole force. If the hon. gentleman will give us the information as to the numbers to be drilled, there will be no delay in passing the item.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). In the Estimates which were presented in March last, it is especially stated that all the garrison artillery, city infantry battalions, and independent companies were to be drilled at the cost of $85,000.

Mr. FOSTER. There were the city forces.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The whole of the particular forces I have mentioned, amounting to six or seven thousand men. In the next item it is expressly declared that all the cavalry corps, field batteries, engineers, and all the rural infantry corps were to be drilled. It is quite evident the hon. gentleman desired to include the whole force, and the sum asked for amounts to about $322,000. I think the hon. gentleman will find that that will drill very close on 30,000 men.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The force is 38,000.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Nominally, but nobody knows better than the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) that it is impossible to muster more than 75 per cent. The provision which the late Government made evidently contemplated drilling all which could be brought forward, which would amount to about 30,000 men.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman knows that the force has been increased. The battalions have been increased and so have the number of men composing them. I think that the drilling force to-day is much larger than it was in my time.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. That is true of the city forces, but is it true of the rural?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I think so. The cavalry especially has been increased. The new drill book requires squadron drill instead of ordinary troop drill.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. All I wanted to point out is that that is the calculation made by the late Government. It is quite clear that they contemplated drilling all the forces, and they concluded that $322,000, plus of course the charges for rations and transport, will be sufficient. My hon. friend was a member of the Cabinet that brought down the Estimates which I have in my hands.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

Mr. FOSTER. Will my hon. friend give us some information of the system upon which the rations, forage and supplies are secured?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The system of calling for tenders will be followed, when possible, in every instance.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no desire to embarrass my hon. friend, but he will recollect that he is asking us to vote nearly half a million dollars and does not appear to have much information at his command. It is important to know whether this is really going to drill the whole rural force, and if not, it is for the House to consider whether an amount shall be added to drill the whole force.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. These are precisely the Estimates which the hon. gentleman asked us to vote last winter, and which were, no doubt prepared upon the advice of the officers of the department. I am informed by the officer of the department that it is the intention—and it is so stated here in the published Estimates which the hon. gentleman himself gave to the House—to drill the whole force, for the reason that there was no drill in camp last year, and that before that time it was the custom to drill half the force in alternate years. The hon. gentleman wants to know exactly how many men there are. The former Minister says he thinks the force has been considerably increased. I think he is correct in the matter of the cavalry in saying there has been an increase. In the permanent force there has been a reduction, as compared with two years ago, of about two hundred men. In the total of the rural battalions I think there is little or no change. In some of the battalions there has been a reduction, in others there has been an increase. I shall be very happy to supply the committee with further details as to the exact number of men on a subsequent occasion. I was not sure that this vote was coming up to-night, and I had not the advantage which Ministers usually have—which Ministers of Militia have always had—of having an officer of the department present to furnish information. However, with regard to some of the points that have been raised, I may say that the vote is the original one, the vote which the hon. gentlemen themselves proposed to pass. I will ask to be allowed to do, what many Ministers have been permitted to do in the House—to give the information that is desired on these points when some other items of the militia Estimates is being discussed. The hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), I think, asked us that privilege on many occasions.

Mr. FOSTER. And was refused often.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. On many occasions the Minister of Militia has been given a vote on promise to give the information later on.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Does the hon. Minister remember a request made on behalf of the Cape Breton battalion to go into camp at Sydney?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. That is the 94th battalion?

Mr. McDOUGALL. Yes; I think it was last May the request was made, and it was based on the ground that it would be most inconvenient to these people to go to Aldershot, and on the ground that there would be a considerable saving of expense by allowing them to go into camp at Sydney. I asked about the matter some time ago, and at that time the answer I got was that the department thought they could grant the request.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. My information is that the battalion is not expected to go into camp this fall at Aldershot. There will be no camp at Aldershot in the spring. It is decided that the battalion shall go into camp at regimental headquarters in June.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am not at all informed on these questions. Suppose this money had been voted last session, in the ordinary course when would the drill have begun? When would the rural battalions have gone into camp?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. In July. But in Nova Scotia the camps have almost always been held in September.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. As the necessity was urgent, and the money was not provided for by the last Parliament, did it occur to the hon. gentleman to get a Governor General's warrant?

Mr. MONTAGUE. What we understand is that the hon. Minister's understanding is that all the militia are to be drilled for this amount, those that are called out this fall in September, and those that are not drilled in September next June. I think the hon. gentleman is clear upon that point. I may say there is no desire on this side of the House to obstruct the vote. It is a very important matter that the volunteers should be drilled in September. Under ordinary circumstances we ought to have more information with regard to so large a vote than the hon. gentleman has given us.

Mr. INGRAM. Do I understand that this provides for city battalions that are not called out to camp, so that they may have their drill at head quarters.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. There will be camps held in June.

I do not mean to say that the battalions that do not turn out this fall will drill at regimental headquarters in the spring. But there will be camps held in the spring of those battalions that do not turn out this autumn. I think the commanding officers of the battalions and the deputy-adjutant general of the district were consulted with reference to holding the camps this autumn. Some preferred to go out now, and others preferred to wait until spring. And it was left to some extent—as far as it could be—to the officers of the battalions themselves, and it is understood that those that do not go out now can go out in the spring.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The city battalions do not go out now?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. No, the rural battalions.

Mr. INGRAM. I am not sure the question I asked was quite understood by the hon. Minister. We have a number of city battalions that are not called out for drill, but drill in the cities in which they have their headquarters. What I wish to know is, does this sum provide for the city battalions' drill or does it not?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. It does.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to say to my hon. friend—I am not going to make any further objection to the passing of the estimate to-night—at the next stage, which I hope we may get as soon as possible, I trust he may be able to give the information asked for to-night. But I desire to say that hon. Ministers must not expect to silence our requests for information by saying: These are the estimates that you prepared yourselves. We must ask for full and fair and reasonable explanations, and Ministers, no doubt, will be in a position to give it. With regard to this particular vote, I hope the hon. Minister will take steps to put the matter through as soon as possible and put it into the shape of a Bill and have it passed.

Mr. GIBSON. I would like to say in answer to the hon. gentleman's remarks that during the last six sessions of Parliament, a number of changes took place in the composition of the Ministry, and on many occasions the Ministers asked the indulgence of the House on the ground that they had not been long in office. It is a rather remarkable thing for the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) to be questioning the hon. Minister and saying that he must not shield himself behind the estimates prepared by themselves and declaring that he ought to be able to give more information to the House. Every member who sat in the last Parliament knows that when a new Minister rose and asked the indulgence of the House, that request was readily granted.

Mr. INGRAM. Perhaps our friends opposite forgot that we, as Government supporters would have expected those who prepared those estimates to make an explanation to this House. It is due to us and we expect it. Now that we are in Opposition and have not the opportunity of going to the department and making inquiries as to what these estimates mean, we desire an explanation from gentlemen opposite. That is our right, and the public expect it. What would be thought of us, as representatives of the people going to our homes and being asked by our constituents what such an item meant and what it was intended to cover. Fancy us saying that we did not know what it was intended to cover, and being unable to explain to those who asked us. I for one protest against that. If the hon. gentlemen are not prepared to give an explanation of the different items in these estimates, then I say let the item for militia—it only covers one or two pages—stand till they have studied it. The hon. gentleman has sat in this House since the opening of the session while the debate on the Address has been going on, and I do not think it would require a man of great intelligence to post himself in two weeks on the meaning of the different items in these estimates. I for one will insist on an explanation.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman a question with reference to the details of the public debt. There is a reduction in the redemption of the debt, a reduction of interest of 4 per cent stock. What does that amount to?

THE MINISTER OF FINANCE. There is half a million dollars of bonds redeemable on the 1st of December, issued for the Ontario Government in 1891. I may say here that I have no doubt we shall frequently have occasion to ask the hon. gentlemen to take the view that they have prepared these estimates themselves, and I hope they will not press too strongly the contention that we ought to know all about them within so short a time.

Mr. MONTAGUE. May I ask whether the Government has come to a decision as to their policy in connection with the rate of interest they are going to allow on savings banks deposits? That question was discussed fiercely in the House some time ago.

THE MINISTER OF FINANCE. The matter has been under consideration, but no determination has been reached.

Charges of Management—

Office of the Assistant Receiver General,
Toronto ..... $7,100

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask my hon. friend whether he contemplates any changes at present in the officials in that department?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There is no disposition to make any immediate change in this respect, but we shall take the matters into consideration as they arise. Nothing is under consideration at this moment; but if sufficient cause be shown for making a change, we may be obliged to act.

Office of the Assistant Receiver General
at Halifax ..... $8,000

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. How is this reduction of $300 at Halifax effected?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The appropriation, I believe, has not always been used in its entirety.

Office of the Assistant Receiver General
at Winnipeg ..... $6,600

Mr. MACDONALD (Winnipeg). May I ask the hon. gentleman whether he contemplates making any changes in the staff at Winnipeg?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I shall have to give the same answer to my hon. friend as I gave to the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster). No changes are under consideration at present, but we shall consider any case that may arise.

Mr. FOSTER. I would ask my hon. friend whether he proposes to carry out the same policy which was carried out by the late Administration during my incumbency in the office, regarding the transfer of these small savings banks deposits kept in rural districts, and in fact in all the towns, with the exception of those in large cities in which there are assistant Receivers General, that is to say, that when a vacancy takes place by death, or removal, the amounts should be transferred to the Post Office Department, where they can be managed much more economically. That practice has been followed in every case for the last eight years, and whenever an office became vacant by death, or removal, or resignation, the amount was transferred to the Post Office savings banks.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I have seen no reason to depart from the view taken by the hon. gentleman on that subject.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman's answer to the member for Winnipeg in regard to dismissals apply to country savings banks as well?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I have been informed of one case in which an official is alleged to have brought himself within the rules, I may say laid down by all sections in this House to-day; but no action has been taken on the subject.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In any case of that kind will the officer be given a hearing?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. He will be given an opportunity to know what is alleged against him.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will he be heard ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. He will have an opportunity to reply.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What does he propose to do in case a complaint is lodged against an officer in the savings bank, charging malfeasance in office, or respecting his conduct during elections ? Does the hon. gentleman propose to decide such a matter without giving the official in question an opportunity to be heard, and to lay his case before the Government ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Each one will have to be treated on its merits. In the particular case to which I refer, and in fact the only case which has been brought to my notice, I have no hesitation in assuring the hon. gentleman that before taking action I would see that the party accused was informed of the nature of the complaint, and that would imply that he would have a right to reply.

Printing notes ..... $50,000

Mr. FOSTER. If I remember rightly, the work of printing the notes is under contract with Mr. Burland. Can the hon. gentleman inform me whether the contract has run out or not.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The contract will expire on 1st April next.

Mr. FOSTER. Is there not a provision for six months' notice ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes. The contract may be discontinued on 1st April if six months' notice has been given, which would mean notice given on 1st October.

Governor General's Secretary's Office. $11,112 50

Mr. FOSTER. We want an explanation on this item.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There is an increase of $100.

Mr. FOSTER. No other changes ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Not that I am aware of.

Privy Council Office..... $31,885

Mr. FOSTER. There have been some changes here.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There have been eighteen statutory increases of $50 each. Then, there is a decrease, owing to the difference between the salary of the late assistant clerk and his successor, $600, a first-class clerk at $1,400, another clerk at $400, and another at $500, making a total of $2,900, against an increase of $930.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Were not those changes made by the late Administration ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Some of them were.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What part of the reductions belong to the late Government and what to the present Government ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Hon. gentlemen opposite have not much reputation for making reductions, but in this case they were rightly claimed by the hon. member for York, and I think he will have to answer that question.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. member for York will not answer it. It is the place of the hon. Finance Minister to do so.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) made no reduction at all.

Mr. MONTAGUE. There seems to be some difference of opinion. The Minister of Finance says we made the reductions, and a former Minister of Finance (Sir Richard Cartwright) says we made no reduction. We must ask the hon. gentlemen to get together and reconcile their differences.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The Finance Minister did not say that the late Government had made any reduction.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce is not quite correct, although not intentionally so. I do not ask this question to cause trouble, but I wish to know which of the parties should be credited with the reduction on this item in the Estimates. It is a fair question, and, I think, deserving of attention.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The Estimates brought down by the late Government amounted to $33,885, being an increase of $30 exactly over the demand for the previous year.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then, we may well ask by whom the reduction was made.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. My hon. friend has stated that already.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the hon. Minister of Finance give an explanation as to how the decrease was made ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I understand the hon. gentleman superannuated a messenger, and to that extent the reduction was his ; but, I understand, the difference is between the salary of a late clerk and that proposed for his successor. If we obtain a successor at a lower rate, I suppose the reduction will be ours.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I desire to ask the Finance Minister—for I did not catch what was going on—whether, in the superannuations proposed in order to effect a saving,

It is intended to superannuate the Assistant Receiver General at St. John ?

Mr. LISTER. Who is he

Mr. DOMVILLE. The hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) can answer that question.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think there must be some mistake in the statement made by the Finance Minister. Here we have a decrease of $2,000. That sum cannot be made up by the saving caused by superannuating a messenger and the difference between salaries. What other officer has been retired ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The difference is between a late assistant clerk and his successor, $600, one first-class clerk dropped at $1,400, one dropped at $400, and one messenger dropped or superannuated at $500. These items make $2,900, against an increase of $930. A portion of that sum will have to be credited to hon. gentlemen opposite, and a portion must be credited to ourselves, if we make the salary of an appointee at a reduced sum.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What is the name of the clerk at $1,400 who has been dropped ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I have not the name of the clerk at the present moment.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It is well known that there has been a reorganization of the branch, and the House should be furnished with the particulars. The hon. gentleman will see that it is quite fair we should know what reorganization has taken place in that department.

Mr. FOSTER. Better let the item stand.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In a matter of this kind, in which it is absolutely necessary to furnish information to the House as to the manner in which this department has been reorganized, it is unreasonable to propose that the item should be carried before that information is given. Every hon. gentleman knows that it has been customary to allow an item to stand when information cannot be given in reference to it. In this particular it is specially desirable. It is now half past eleven o'clock, and probably the better way would be to adjourn.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I might agree to let the item stand until the President of the Privy Council is here, but we certainly should proceed until at least 12 o'clock.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We had a late sitting last night, and have made considerable progress. No time would be lost by adjournment.

Mr. LISTER. I think it is very desirable that this House should get through its labours before the thirty days expire. If we are to sit here until only half past eleven every night, it is quite possible that the session may extend to a period of more than sixty days. It is perfectly evident to me—I do not know how it strikes other members of the House—that hon. gentlemen opposite are taking up a good deal of time discussing questions which need not have very much discussion, for the manifest object of extending the session over thirty days. It is remarkable to me that the present Opposition should be so very, very inquisitive. One would think that the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) had never occupied the position of Finance Minister at all. He seems to know absolutely nothing about the office which he has just vacated. He is asking questions that I venture to say the present Finance Minister will know all about when he is in the office for six weeks. Here are Estimates prepared by these gentlemen, who as one hon. gentleman remarked, are now in the cold shades of Opposition. May they long remain there in the interest of the country, and it is altogether likely they will.

Mr. PRIOR. You hope so, any way.

Mr. LISTER. I am sure of it. It seems to me the height of absurdity that one hon. gentleman after another should jump up here, and tackle, and heckle, and criticise, and inquire of the present Finance Minister about items which they themselves put into the Estimates and in which there is no increase at all.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Parliament never got any explanation of them.

Mr. LISTER. While the late Government were in power, I never heard any member of the present Opposition inquire about a single item. They swallowed them holus bolus and acted as though their Government could not do anything wrong. Without wishing to be offensive, I venture to say that when they get up here now in this manner, they are only pretending. If this Government were presenting Estimates of their own, I would not wonder at hon. gentlemen opposite requiring the fullest information, but when they act in this way under the circumstances, one must feel that their object is really not to get information, but that it is either to prolong the session over the thirty days or to embarrass the hon. gentleman who has recently taken charge of the department.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lister) could have listened to the whole debate, or he would not have made the statement which he did. These are not the Estimates, so far as this item is concerned, which were brought down by the late Government. A reorganization has taken place in that department, and I think we ought to know in all fairness what the reorganization was. None of us I am sure, wish to prevent the item passing, but I supposed when I asked the question that the information would be forthcoming. I quite recognize that the Finance Minister has not had that experience in the department nor in his office, that would enable him to be free and ready at once with an explanation, and I quite recognize what was stated by the member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) that when some of us were new in our departments every generosity was extended to us. I do not object to the item passing, if the hon. gentleman will give us the information later on?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I had hopes that as there is a reduction of $2,000 in the item, the House will be willing to accept it without requiring the President of the Privy Council to be present. If it is thought desirable that he should explain the changes made, I do not think I can reasonably object to the item standing over.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We must ask this item to stand over. A matter of reduction may be just as important when connected with the reorganization of a department as any other. When gentlemen on this side of the House were on the Treasury benches, these questions were always asked with great fulness by the Opposition, and it is in the public interest that explanations should be given. We had to-night a most important subject before us in the matter of the militia estimates, in which the most intense interest is felt throughout the country. This is not simply for the information of members of the House, but the information is given to the public throughout the country, and that information the public are entitled to. There is no object on the part of any gentlemen on this side of the House to embarrass the Minister in the slightest degree. Every consideration must be made for gentlemen who have recently taken office and who have not had an opportunity of requiring such thorough acquaintance with these subjects as Ministers who have been long in office. I am quite sure that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) will recognize now, as fully as he did when he sat in Opposition, the propriety of having full and complete explanations given as these various estimates are submitted. The suggestion that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lister) has made, that there is any disposition here to prolong the session, is, I think, unworthy of him, and could only have been thrown across the floor in badinage. I do not think that he is at all serious. There has been no disposition shown on the part of the Opposition, from the opening of the session down to the present moment, to consume unnecessarily a single moment of time in regard to any subject. We have been discussing questions of very great importance, and we would fail altogether in our duty if we did not avail ourselves of the opportunity of having a full and free explanation of matters of great importance to the public as well as to the House. I again suggest that, as we had a late sitting last night, and it will be midnight before we can reach home, and as we have made considerable progress and have got fairly launched in the Estimates, the House might now adjourn.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I quite agree to the suggestion of the hon. gentleman that that item may stand over until the President of the Privy Council can be here to explain the proposed changes. I hope, however, that the hon. gentleman will not press for an adjournment at present. I think we might take the items for the Department of Justice while the Solicitor General is here to explain them.

Mr. TAYLOR. I rose to my feet, a few moments ago, to say a word in reply to the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), who threw out the idea that this side of the House intended proloaging the session for thirty days. I am credibly informed that that question was discussed by the supporters of the Government to-day in another room. I understand that they fully decided that the session should last thirty days, but that the country and the galleries must be led to believe that the members on this side of the House were the obstructionists. The majority to-day, as I am credibly informed—

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). Name your informant.

Mr. TAYLOR. The informant is all right. I just wanted to remove the impression, which was thrown out by the hon. member for West Lambton, that this side of the House was responsible, because it is already settled by that side of the House that the session will last thirty days.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman has made a statement which might possibly go at par in the country, where the hon. gentleman is not very well known; but no hon. member of this House will take what he has said seriously. In the first place, the hon. gentleman had no means of knowing what took place in caucus; and, in the next place, I desire to tell him that no such thing took place in caucus—that his statement is the creature of mere imagination. The hon. gentleman is apparently as correct in his statements in the House as he was in North Grey, and I think they will meet the same fate.

Department of Justice—Penitentiaries
Branch ..... $3,125

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would like to ask the Solicitor General whether the department has considered a proposal that was on foot some time ago to reorganize the system of keeping the accounts of the penitentiaries? In that connection, there were to be, as I understood, some changes in these Estimates. Has the subject been dealt with?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). It has been dealt with. When the item for penitentiaries comes up, I shall be prepared to explain it. That does not affect this item, which only provides for the statutory increases.

Resolutions reported.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Before the motion for adjournment is put, I wish to ask the Government whether there is any foundation for the statement in the press to the effect that it is their intention to ask the House to adjourn from Thursday until Tuesday, as Monday is Labour Day.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I shall be glad to give the hon. gentleman some information to-morrow.

Sir CHARLES H'BBERT TUPPER. Is it the intention of the Government to ask the House to adjourn at six o'clock to-morrow? There is a rumour in the lobbies to that effect.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I think that, all other things being equal, if it pleases hon. gentlemen opposite to consent to an adjournment, we shall possibly ask for it. But we wish to exercise no constraint.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 2nd September, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

NEW MEMBERS.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that the Clerk of the House had received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery a certificate of the election and return:

Of the Hon. William Paterson, for the electoral district of the north riding of the county of Grey; and

Of the Hon. Andrew George Blair, for the electoral district of Sunbury and Queen's, New Brunswick.

MEMBERS INTRODUCED.

Hon. William Paterson, member for the electoral district of North Grey, introduced by the Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Prime Minister (Mr. Laurier) and Mr. Sutherland.

Hon. Andrew George Blair, member for the electoral district of Sunbury and Queen's, introduced by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) and Mr. Domville.

"LA CANADIENNE."

Mr. LEMIEUX asked:

Whether the Government are aware that the cruiser "La Canadienne" was placed at the disposal of the Conservative candidate in the county of Gaspé, at the late general election?

Who gave instructions to Commander Wakeham of "La Canadienne" to convey the Conservative candidate, Dr. Ennis, to the Magdalen Islands?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). I am not in a position to answer that question yet. I have written to the commander of "La Canadienne," and have not yet received his answer.

BUREAU OF MINING INFORMATION.

Mr. SPROULE (for Mr. Maclean) asked:

Is the Minister of Agriculture correctly reported in the statement that he promised that a Bureau of Mining Information would be opened in Montreal?

Is it the intention of the Government to establish a Bureau of Mining Information in Toronto? If not, why not?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). To the first question the answer is, No. As to the second, I would say that the Government has not yet had this matter under consideration.

ELECTION LITERATURE AND THE MAILS.

Mr. POULIOT asked:

Are the Government aware that the election literature of the Conservative party, during the late election, was distributed throughout the country gratuitously?

Are the Government aware that a certain leaflet intitled "A Political Review," (of which three hundred and fifty thousand copies—350,000—were struck off) singing the praises of the Conservative party, and the virtues of the Kootenay Cure, was distributed all over Canada through the channel of the post office of the House of Commons, franked with the initials: S. R., M.P.?

Is it the intention of the Government to enquire into the said charges and punish the guilty parties if they be true?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The Government has been informed that election literature of the Conservative party was distributed free of postage through the mails during the recent election. Also that a certain leaflet intitled: "A Political Review," advocating the Conservative cause and the merits of the Kootenay Cure was distributed through the mails through the channel of the post office of the House of Commons, franked with the initials "S. R., M.P.," and with initials of other members of the late House of Commons. Nothing has been determined as to what action, if any, may be taken.

DUTY ON AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

Was the Hon. Minister of Agriculture correctly reported in the Moose Jaw "Times" as having said at Moose Jaw, on the 28th September, 1894: "In Mr. Foster's reformed tariff the duty on implements was cut down from 35 to 20 per cent and Mr. Foster claimed he had removed a great burden from the farmers. Why did he not remove the whole burden?" Can the Minister of Agriculture say whether the Government will remove the burden now? If not, why not?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). My memory is not sufficiently good to enable me to vouch for the verbal accuracy of any particular speech which I delivered in the North-west Territories, but what the hon. gentleman has read is the substance of many speeches I delivered there. In regard to the second question, I may say that there will be no revision of the tariff this session.

THE DREDGE IN THE OYSTER FISHERY.

Mr. HACKETT asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to prohibit the use of the dredge or drag in the oyster fishery of Prince Edward Island, this season?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). Yes; the Commissioner of Fisheries has advised that, pending fuller investigation as to the effect of the use of the dredge or drag, it should be prohibited in Prince Edward Island on all public oyster beds this year.

MEASURE FOR THE SALE OF OYSTERS.

Mr. HACKETT asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to establish a standard barrel measure for the sale of oysters?

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir H. Joly de Lotbinière). It is not the intention of the Government at present to introduce legislation in that direction.

HARBOURS AND BREAKWATERS IN NOVA SCOTIA.

Mr. BETHUNE asked :

1. Has the Government yet received any report from the engineer, Mr. Millege, on the survey made at North Harbour, Aspy Bay, county of Victoria, N.S., with a view to making it a harbour of refuge? If so, and the report is favourable, does the Government intend to make an appropriation for carrying on the work during the present year?

2. Does the Government intend to complete the breakwater commenced years ago at French River, in the county of Victoria, N.S.? If so, how soon?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to build a wharf at or near Iona Station, Victoria County, N.S.? If so, will provision for the work be made this year?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1st. The department has a report from Mr. Millege for improvements at South Harbour, Aspy Bay, but it has received no report yet from Mr. Millege on survey made at North Harbour. 2nd. The matter is under consideration. 3rd. Same answer as No. 2.

ELECTION IN NORTH ONTARIO.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked :

Has the attention of the Government been called to the following article in the Toronto "World":—

"Whitby, Ont., July 11.—Major McGillivray is confirmed in his seat by Judge Burnham as a result of the recount before him, concluded this morning, but the developments of the case promise startling results to others as well as to the doughty Major, for it was found that the most flagrant example known to the election trials, of tampering with ballots, is the distinguishing feature of this election. Twenty-one ballots, reported by deputy returning officers to have been cast for Warden Duncan Graham, the Patron-Liberal candidate opposing Major McGillivray, have utterly disappeared, and twenty-one ballots for McGillivray, which were found in envelopes with Graham's ballots, had no initials of the deputy returning officer on them, and some had never even been creased."

If so, is it their intention to amend the return and award the seat to Mr. Graham, who received the majority of votes polled, in place of John A. McGillivray, the minority candidate? Also, is it the intention of the Government to take any steps to punish the parties guilty of tampering with the ballots at said election?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The attention of the Government has not before been called to the article in the "World." I understand that a protest has been filed against the return, and when the legal proceedings have been closed, the Government will then decide upon the course to be taken upon that record, and the punishment of the offenders.

RAILWAY SUBSIDIES.

Mr. McINNES asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to grant any railway subsidies this session?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). It is not the intention of the Government to grant any railway subsidies this session.

STEAM SERVICE BETWEEN GREAT BRITAIN AND CANADA.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to change the policy of establishing a twenty-knot steam service between Great Britain and Canada, and substituting therefor a seventeen-knot freight service ?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). The whole question of a steam service between Great Britain and Canada is now engaging the attention of the Government.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S WARRANTS.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

What amount of the sums granted by Governor General's warrants of the 16th July and 18th August, 1896, respectively, have been spent ? What amount remains still to be paid on account of services contemplated by the July warrant ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Of the amount granted, $1,066,627.53, by the Governor General's warrant of the 16th July, there have been spent to the night of the 1st September, $848,394.68. Of the amounts granted, $937,894.87, by the Governor General's warrant of the 18th August, there have been spent to the night of the 1st September, $255,863.40. Of the amount still to be paid on account of services contemplated by the July warrants, credits are outstanding for about $218,000, and it is estimated that nearly the whole of this amount will be spent.

TEMPORARY LOANS.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

What temporary loans are now current ? What is the date of the commencement of these loans ? For what time do they run ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). 1. One temporary loan for £400,000. 2. 1st July, 1896. 3. Six months to 1st January, 1897.

IMPORTS FOR HOME CONSUMPTION.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

What is the amount of imports, for home consumption, dutiable and free respectively, for the year ending 30th June, 1896, and what is the sum collected for duty thereon ? What is the amount of exports of home and foreign products respectively for the year ending 30th June, 1896 ?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). Giving the unrevised figures, the total value of dutiable goods entered for home consumption during the year ending 30th June, 1896, amounted to $67,234,470. The total value of free goods entered for home consumption during the same period, amounted to $43,348,822. The total sum collected for duty on goods entered for consumption during the same period, amounted to $20,182,393.14. The total value of home products exported during the same period, amounted to $106,586,274. Estimated amount short returned at inland ports of home products exported to United States, $3,329,053, making a grand total to home products exported, $109,915,327. The total value of foreign products (including coin and bullion) exported during the same period, amounted to $11,098,285.

COIN AND BULLION.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

What is the amount of coin and bullion imported and exported for the last fiscal year ?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). Giving the unrevised figures, the total value of coin and bullion imported during the last fiscal year, amounted to $5,077,437. The total value of coin and bullion exported during the same period, amounted to $4,699,309.

POSTMASTERSHIP OF MARSH HILL, ONT.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

When was G. G. King, M.P., appointed to the postmastership of Marsh Hill, Ont. ? Has he since been performing the duties of that office ? What salary is due him and has it yet been paid ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). G. G. King, M.P., was appointed to the postmastership of Marsh Hill, Ont., on the 4th day of August, 1896, at an annual salary of $10, payable at the end of each quarter, and no portion thereof being due, no sum has yet been paid to Mr. King on such account. It has not been customary to exact actual personal service of such officers.

COW BAY BREAKWATER.

Mr. McDOUGALL asked :

Is the Government aware that the Cow Bay breakwater at Port Morien, Cape Breton, is in a dangerous condition and requiring urgent repairs ? If so, is it the intention of the Government to make provision in the Supplementary Estimates for such repairs ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The Government is aware that the Cow Bay breakwater at Port Morien, Cape Breton, has required repairs for some years. This matter is now being considered in connection with the preparation of Supplementary Estimates.

BREAKWATER AT GABARUS.

Mr. McDOUGALL asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to provide in the Supplementary Estimates for the proposed pier or breakwater at Gabarus, Cape Breton County ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). No.

DISMISSAL OF JOHN HANNAN.

Mr. QUINN asked :

Is it true that John Hannan, an employee of seven years standing has been dismissed from the Lachine Canal ? If so, why ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Yes, John Hannan, lockman on Lock No. 1 on the Lachine Canal, has been dismissed. He was dismissed on the 20th of July last, for frequently absenting himself from the lock without leave.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY EMPLOYEES AT ELECTIONS.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for :

Copies of all instructions given on the Intercolonial Railway by the authorities to remove the employees shortly before the 23rd June, 1896, the day of election, to prevent them voting in the counties in which they resided, the names of the authorities giving such instructions and their authority therefor.

He said : Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to occupy any considerable portion of the time of the House. I simply desire to bring before this House and the Government a flagrant occurrence during the late election. Unfortunately it took place in the constituency of King's, N.B., which was lately represented and adorned by the late Minister of Finance, the present member for York (Mr. Foster). Why this was done, how they could have the audacity to remove men from certain places so as to prevent them voting—I speak now from personal knowledge and not from hearsay—it is difficult to understand ; and it is unnecessary to quote cases because I am informed that a petition has been submitted to the Railway Department asking for an investigation. I have personal knowledge of one case, that of Mr. Ryan, who was ordered up to Moncton and told to stay there, that he should not return to work at his former place but that the Government would give him work there, and thus keep him away from his home. He had the manliness, for like myself he has a little Irish blood in him, to risk the loss of his position in order to vote for me and for the policy and party in which he had faith and confidence. There were instances of this character all along the line. Hon. gentlemen opposite, through the Railway Department, issued orders to men to come up there, and when the men were before the officials they withdrew the written orders given them, compelled them to surrender the orders, so that no evidence might remain. I will leave this matter now in the hands of the House and the Minister of Railways. I am satisfied no defence can be put up by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), although he has defended a great many bad cases. If he is able to defend this, I will think better of him than I have done in the past, although I admit he will justify almost anything in the interest of his party. I have nothing more to say beyond asking the Minister of Railways to have this matter investigated, and to bring down the papers before the House before the investigation is commenced.

Mr. SPROULE. As this subject is under consideration, it might not be out of place to furnish a little information in regard to an election which took place in North Grey lately, because it appears that this trick is not confined to one political party or to members on one side of the House. I hold in my hand affidavits made by several gentlemen, who say that one Mr. Spiers, on Sunday afternoon and night engaged them to go up the Georgian Bay to work at a lighthouse or look after some timber. I thought it was probably a lighthouse which the Minister of Public Works had ordered to be repaired. At all events on Sunday night eighteen or twenty men were hired for two or three days at $1.50 per day and their board ; they were to be taken up the lake on Monday morning to commence work, presumably the following day, which was election day. This was done to keep them from voting. Fortunately some members of the other political party got wind of the matter and were able to frustrate the whole scheme. I have affidavits sworn to by these parties. This action was done for political purposes, which no one will deny ; it was done by the friends of the Government, and if there is to be an investigation I should like it to extend to these cases as well as to those to which the hon. gentleman has referred.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I should like to ask if those cases occurred on the Government railway ?

Mr. LANDERKIN. Before this motion is passed, I should like to draw the attention of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) to an election held in his constituency on 23rd June last, when he had as his financial agent the collector of customs at Meaford. If it was wrong in the case of the parties to whom the hon. gentleman referred, and if it was wrong for civil servants to engage in elections, I hope my hon. friend will take the trouble to bring before the attention of the Government the case of this collector of customs at the port of Meaford so that his case can be dealt with, and that in future he will not be called upon to handle the exchequer of the hon. member for East Grey at elections.

Mr. SPROULE. He was not engaged in the election at all.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). This motion is worthy of more than passing notice.

Mr. SPEAKER. I allowed the last two hon. gentlemen certainly to go outside the motion, and the only justification for doing so was the very general remarks of the hon. mover. But I think it would be far better, unless the hon. gentleman is going to speak to this motion itself, that any general discussion should be raised in another way.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). The two hon. members referred to may have done wrong, but what I propose to say will be strictly to the motion. So far as this matter is concerned, I too know something about it. In the county of Pictou, for example,—I call the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways to this matter, because it could not have been done with his consent—books of passes were in the hands of boys who gave passes to anybody and everybody. At New Glasgow there were four or five pass books, countersigned by Mr. Pottinger, and any one who wanted a pass could get it over the road. Over 160 voters came into Pictou from outside on Government passes. In the county of Antigonish and in the county of Guysboro' it was the same. Who gave the orders, I do not know, but in the county which I represent, there were two unfortunate employees who wanted to vote for me on that day, and it was arranged they could not. One of them, who is an excellent bicyclist, asked the superintendent for seven minutes, and he would ride to the poll on his bicycle, but he was not allowed to go. He only had to go to Mulgrave, but that day he was taken across the Strait of Canso. He said: "Give me seven minutes, which is less time than is required to take the luggage from the car, and put it on the boat, and it will enable me to give my vote for Mr. Fraser." But he was not allowed that time. The only two men who had any desire to vote for me, among the men employed on that railway, were not allowed to vote at all. A more shameful use of a Government railway was never seen than during the last election in the province of Nova Scotia. I can give to the ex-Minister of Railways the name of the chairman of the Liberal-Conservative Association of the county of Cumberland, who had a free pass for two months during the election. The active Conservative party men in Nova Scotia was supplied with a pass. It was not always a single pass either, for there was one man from Cape Breton who came with a lot of voters to the county of Pictou and he had a pass for twenty. They took them up en bloc. Now, Sir, as a Liberal voter had to come at his own expense, I submit that this was a misuse of the railway. I call the attention of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) to the fact that he should exercise great care as to who should have the right to issue passes on that road at election times or at any other time. Fancy three or four persons in the town of

Mr. LANDERKIN.

New Glasgow with a book of passes. I could understand, on some occasions, for example, how a person in charge of men on a railway should have one of these books in order to allow those working on the road to move from one point to another, but it certainly is highly improper that party workers should have them. The only reason why these men got the passes, and it was so stated on the pass itself—"employed by the Government." And, Mr. Speaker, so they were employed by the Government: employed to come from one county to another to vote. It is a shameful state of affairs. I care not whether the Liberal party or the Conservative party be in power, it is disgraceful that the Government railway should be used for the purpose of carrying, on free passes, voters to the polls. I hope that more supervision will be exercised by the present Minister, to see that no person is permitted to issue these passes, except for good and sufficient reason. Sir, even special trains were run on election day. One special train, I know, was run for 180 miles, to carry one voter, so as to get in his vote. Of course, all this was done without the consent of my genial friend the ex-Minister of Railways, who, I know, would not permit of such a thing, if he knew of it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I draw his attention, and the attention of the present Minister, to these facts, for the purpose of showing that great care ought to be exercised by the Minister of Railways during election time, lest his subordinates should act in this improper manner. It was a crying shame during the last election. Of course, the road was always used for political purposes, but I never knew of it being used so flagrantly in that direction as it was during the recent campaign. I hope that the Minister, in bringing down these papers, will discover the parties who are responsible for that state of things, who disregarded all rule in the matter, and who, to a certain extent, disgraced the genial ex-Minister of Railways, who, of course, would never have permitted it, had he known of it.

Mr. GIBSON. I would like to add to the testimony given in this matter by my hon. friend (Mr. Fraser). I am credibly informed—not by men who take an active part in political warfare, but by men who take an active part in the commercial interests of our country—orders were given to the officials of the Intercolonial Railway that on the 23rd day of June last there should not be a freight train moved on the whole of that railway system. This was done by the orders of somebody, and I call the attention of the present Minister to it. It was done in order to enable the employees of the road to go and vote for the Government candidates. My hon. friend (Mr. Fraser) has spoken so well with reference to the pass question, that I need not refer to it further than to add this: that passes were sent all over the country to bring the voters in, and it happened in some cases that the voters could not afford to lose their time, and so their good wives or their sweethearts availed themselves of the opportunity and travelled upon the passes that were intended for the voters.

Mr. HAGGART. A few words in reply to the hon. gentlemen who have spoken. When the papers come down, they will disclose no such state of facts as hon. gentlemen have spoken of. There were no unusual orders given on the Intercolonial Railway, and I do not think that any course was pursued on that railway different from that pursued on other occasions.

Some hon. MEMBERS. It was always the same.

Mr. HAGGART. I am sure of one thing, and that is, that no orders were given by me, and no orders came from headquarters here, in reference to anything of the kind. The course that was pursued down there would be the course which was usually pursued by the authorities of the railway on such an occasion. These statements made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fraser) are entirely new to me. It is the first time that I ever heard of them, and I am sure, when the papers come down, and an inquiry is made, no such state of facts will be shown as has been represented here.

Mr. McMULLEN. In view of the statement made by the late Minister of Railways, I earnestly hope that a thorough and exhaustive investigation will be held into this matter, so that those men who have assumed the responsibility of carrying voters to the poll at the expense of the country, may have meted out to them the just punishment that they deserve. The conduct of officials of the Government taking a prominent part in the interests of a political party has been exhaustively discussed in this House, and I hope that the question with regard to these railway employees will be carefully noted by the Minister of Railways. Those officials who have so abused a railway that has been constructed at the cost of the people, and has never paid one cent of interest upon the money invested in it, to carry voters to the poll on free passes, shall receive that measure of punishment which they justly deserve. I hope the matter will not drop here. If the papers do not disclose the facts stated to this House, and if there is sufficient evidence to substantiate these statements, I trust that these officials who have been guilty of such misconduct, will be rebuked and punished.

Mr. ELLIS. Notwithstanding the denial of the ex-Minister of Railways—and perhaps the facts are not within his knowledge—it is an undoubted and a notorious fact, known to a great many people in the province of New Brunswick and around Moncton, that the chief train-despatcher of the Intercolonial Railway was directed to send out of Moncton, on the day of the election, certain men who were presumed to be favourable to, and would vote for, the Liberal party in that contest.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I wish to add my testimony, Mr. Speaker, to the statement made by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, as to the shameful use of the Intercolonial Railway in the interests of the Conservative party during the late elections. Let me give you one instance of this. Shortly before the polling day, a joint meeting was to be held in the county of Temiscouata, at which my good friend the present member for that county (Mr. Pouliot) was to appear. Both candidates were to be there, and I was to speak for my hon. friend (Mr. Pouliot). On the morning of the meeting I sent word to Mr. MacDonald, superintendent of the Intercolonial Railway, asking him if a special train was going down in order that I might travel by it, and the answer I received was, that there was no special train. My friends and myself had to take a train at a very early hour in the morning, but about eleven o'clock the Intercolonial Railway shops at Rivière du Loup were closed down, and the men were ordered to go on a special train to St. Eloi to prevent the Liberal speakers being heard. These are facts which have come within my own knowledge, and the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) knows them, too. In the evening, I spoke to Mr. MacDonald, the superintendent, about the matter, and he told me that that was his order. He declared that he and his friends had heard in the morning that the Tory candidate would be prevented from speaking, and he said he had received orders—I do not know, if it was from the Minister of Railways, or from whom—but that he had received orders from headquarters to make up a special train and to ask the men from the shops to leave their work and help the Tory candidate in St. Eloi. This, Sir, is a fact, and it is not the only occurrence of the kind which took place during the last election.

Motion agreed to.

FAST ATLANTIC STEAMSHIP LINE.

Mr. LANGELIER moved for :

Copies of all Orders in Council, tenders, correspondence and papers in relation to the establishment of a line of fast steamers between Canada and the United Kingdom.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). There is no objection, of course, to this motion passing; but I would remark to my hon. friend that there is some correspondence still going on between the Government here and the Imperial authorities, which we may not be able to bring down. But all that we can bring down will be laid on the Table.

Motion agreed to.

CREAMERIES AND CHEESE FACTORIES IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. DAVIN moved :

That in the opinion of this House, it would be expedient to apply $20,000 to aid in establishing creameries and cheese factories in the North-west Territories, and that this sum should be considered as an addition to the immigration grant.

He said : Mr. Speaker, this is the third or fourth time that I have brought this matter before the House ; but as this is a new Parliament, I will speak for a short time upon the motion I make. I am urging upon the attention of the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) and of the Government of which he is a member, a policy that was adopted by the late Government. The acting Minister of Agriculture, at last session, agreed that \$20,000 should be placed in the Supplementary Estimates for the purpose of doing what I explained then and in 1895 and on a previous occasion. What we propose is this. We propose that for four or five years the sum of \$20,000 should be placed in the Estimates for the purpose of loaning to, say, thirty farmers in a district the sum of \$2,000 to aid in the establishment of a creamery, on condition that they themselves raised \$500. The site would be selected and the buildings put up, under the supervision of the Department of Agriculture. The cost of making butter is said to be 4 cents a pound, and that much would be deducted by the officer of the department, and the butter would be marketed by him. We have had experience of this system at Moose Jaw, at Indian Head, and, I think, at Prince Albert. The result has been that at Indian Head there is an output at the present time of 300 pounds a day ; at Moose Jaw the output is, I think, nearly double that ; at Prince Albert I do not know what the output is. But the result is that in these three cases this policy of the Government has been most successful, and therefore we propose that it should be extended. We do not propose that security should not be taken for the repayment of this \$2,000 ; for there is an element in the scheme that one cent a pound should be taken by the Government to go to a sinking fund to pay off the loan. The actual cost of this is estimated at  $\frac{1}{2}$  cent or  $\frac{3}{4}$  cent a pound, and therefore you would have to add that much, say  $\frac{3}{4}$  cent to 1 cent, and so you would have  $1\frac{3}{4}$  cents a pound for paying off the loan. We are asking the Government and the House, I say, only to proceed on a path that has already been taken ; we are asking them to take a course similar to what has been taken on the continent of Europe, in Denmark and in Russia. In Russia, in 1894, when the hon. Minister of Agriculture found that agriculture was depressed, he at once set about helping that industry, especially in dairy matters. Experts were brought in from abroad, courses of lectures were given, just as we have had lectures here from Prof. Robertson and the others, and the result was that such an impetus was given to the dairy industry that great relief came to the agricultural community in Russia. One of the expedients with which we are now familiar was adopted in that great Empire, namely, cold storage by means of which butter could be sent great distances. I have no doubt that the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), will be able in Council to powerfully second the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), should he submit a proposition similar to that made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), when premier of Nova Scotia. I think it was in 1894 that in Nova Scotia, an Act was passed containing this clause :

Any person, firm or association establishing a creamery and cheese factory in Nova Scotia shall be entitled to receive from the Treasury the following sums : $200 in the first year in which such creamery is in operation, $100 in the second year, and $100 in the third year—$400 in all, and not more than three factories to be established in any county.

I believe there are 17 counties in Nova Scotia, so that this would give a little over what I propose to ask the Government to place in its Supplementary Estimates for the North-west Territories. I am only asking the Government to do what the acting Minister of Agriculture in the late Government promised me last session to do. I believe he had arranged everything in Council, and that a sum was to have been put in the Supplementary Estimates. I asked the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) to place $20,000 in the Supplementary Estimates for the purpose of aiding creameries in the North-west Territories, as I have suggested. By voting this sum every year, say for five years, the result would be that under this policy—which is no longer an experimental one because it has been proved successful—by the time the last creamery was established, the first creamery would no doubt have paid back the amount expended. There is a feature about the scheme that I should mention, namely, that the patrons of a factory will get stock in it, in proportion to the cream that they supply it. The scheme, in its details, has been worked out by Prof. Robertson, who is entitled to the whole credit of working out the details, but the main features of the scheme, which we proposed in this House a few years ago, is this, that it should be held to be part of the immigration grant. We ask that these sums of $20,000 shall not bear interest. Of course, to lend $20,000 without interest does not strike one, at first, as a business transaction ; and the only way it can be justified is by considering it as part of the immigration grant and intended for the purpose of putting the North-west in such a position that it will be attractive to immigrants the world over, and so, by the very best possible means, carry out our immigration policy. So far as the money is concerned, there can be no objection to the grant. So recently has it been pointed out in this House that we are entitled to more money than we get, that it is not necessary for me to go over the argument and point out that 91,000 people—which I think is more correct than even 84,000 people—but that 84,000 to 91,000 people in the North-west Territories are entitled to a great deal more money than we are getting, and that something like a million and a quarter dollars is due to us on arrears, if we get our deserts. Therefore, I do not think that the most economical member on either side of the House will have the least objection to the proposal I make. I may say that there will be a good deal of disappointment, at all events in my constituency, if the hon. Finance Minister does not place a sum in the Estimates, as I suggest, and for this reason. We did not anticipate a change of Government. I told my constituents everywhere that it was the intention of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) to place $20,000 for this purpose in the Supplementary Estimates, and that that would have been placed there had the late Government been enabled to proceed with its Estimates, and I of course argued with my constituents, the electorate of Assiniboia, that they should support a Conservative Government which, in so many ways, and this among the rest, had inaugurated policies for the advantage of the North-west Territories. I hope, Sir, that there will be no objection to passing this motion. I may say that I divided the House on it a couple of sessions ago, and on that occasion I had the support of the hon. First Minister (Mr. Laurier), and I think the great bulk of his party, and I think there can be no objection to it now.

Mr. OLIVER. I am very glad to support any proposition made to aid in any way the industries of the North-west Territories. Such a proposition is certainly entitled to the support of every member representing those Territories, but I do not see any reason why any particular sum should have been mentioned in this motion. I fail to see by what calculation the hon. gentleman arrives at the conclusion that $20,000 is the exact amount that should be taken out of the immigration grant for the purpose of aiding creameries.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not propose that this shall be taken out of the immigration fund, but that it be considered as part of the immigration grant and added to whatever the immigration grant is.

Mr. OLIVER. I am perfectly satisfied to consider it as part of the immigration or as an addition to that grant, for it does seem to me that the immigration grant we have received in the past, judging by its results, has not been altogether a very valuable grant. It seems to me, therefore, there is no necessity for limiting the amount to $20,000. It might have been $30,000 or $40,000, and in fact it seems to me entirely unnecessary that a sum should be mentioned at all. It would have been quite sufficient for the hon. gentleman to say that he desired the Government of the day to assist creameries in the Territories. That proposition I would have been glad to support, but the hon. gentleman has seen fit to attach to his motion a certain proposition in which I cannot agree. His motion reads :

For the purpose of establishing creameries and cheese factories in the North-west.

That is to say, that the Government of this country is to go into competition with industries already established in those Territories. Now, I certainly cannot agree with any proposition such as that. In the district which I represent there are in operation now four creameries, which represent a very considerable investment of capital by private individuals. I would certainly object to a proposition that would bring the Government into active competition with private capital in this business. It seems to me that that is not the way in which we can arrive at the best development of the creamery industry of the North-west Territories. Nor can I agree with the details of the scheme as presented by the hon. gentleman, as it seems to me that his proposition is one that is not based upon the facts of the case. The drawback to the creamery industry of the North-west is not the lack of capital to build creameries or to run them. The trouble, as any practical man knows, lies in the scattered nature of the settlement and the lack of cows, or the lack on the part of the settlers of capital that would enable them to purchase cows. This proposition to build up the creamery industry by building creameries begins at the wrong end of the business ; it is not more creamery establishments that we want, but more settlers and more cows. If we had the country more closely settled and the people in possession of an adequate number of cows, the creamery industry would follow as a matter of course. That is what is wanted, and to spend Government money in building creameries would simply be to waste that money and would not benefit and advantage the creamery industry as it should be and as I hope the Government will see its way clear to benefit and advantage it. In one part of the country in which I live there are a large number of poor settlers, brought in through the active immigration policy of the Government. These people have come in, in many cases with empty hands. You may build them all the creameries you like, but unless you can increase the number of cows available to supply the creameries, you had better save your money. Much as I wish to see the creamery industry developed, and much as I wish to see this Government assist that industry in the North-west, I cannot, with my knowledge of the situation of the case, support a motion that will simply ask this Government for money that will not be put to a proper use or to the use for which it is most needed in the Territories.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). Before this motion is put, Sir, I wish to say a few words which I think are justified in view of the importance of the scheme. The hon. member who introduced this motion has alluded to the fact that on former occasions in this House this same motion had been brought forward by him, therefore the older members of the House, no doubt, are familiar with the facts of the case. It is evident that there is a difference of opinion as to the means of developing the dairy interests of the North-west Territories. I am sure that nobody, least of all myself who have been so long earnestly engaged in developing the dairy industry of the country and who have studied very carefully the best means of developing that industry, would wish to minimize or in any way interfere with any proposition which would tend to the development of the dairy industry of the North-west Territories. I can remember on a former occasion, when I was a member of this House, I myself pointed out the necessity of the introduction and encouragement in the North-west Territories and Manitoba of mixed farming in preference to the sole cultivation of the cereals. I do not know any way in which mixed farming can be more profitably carried on than in the dairy industry. It is only by the maintenance of herds of cattle, it is only by the profitable development of stock keeping that the fertility of the plains of the North-west can be maintained. It is true that we have there a virgin fertility, a fertility on which the people of our country are disposed, perhaps, to draw too freely, a bank which, perhaps, may very easily be overdrawn; and I am sure that in the interest of the future of our country and the future of our great North-west it is important that that bank, that store of fertility should be maintained and not exhausted. This can only be done by the maintenance of stock on these North-west plains. This being the case, I am greatly interested in the development and encouragement of the dairying industry there. As I said a few minutes ago, there is an evident difference of opinion in regard to the way in which that industry can be best encouraged and developed. My hon. friend opposite (Mr. Davin) in this motion has given in detail not altogether, but still in some detail, what he wishes to do. I may say to the hon. gentleman that I have already discussed this matter and discussed the proposition which Professor Robertson had made in regard to this same vote in last year's proposed Supplementary Estimate.

Mr. OLIVER.

While desirous of doing everything that can possibly be done to develop the dairy industry of the country, I feel that the time has not yet been reached at which a definite proposition in this form can be accepted by myself as Minister of Agriculture or by the Government. The establishment of creameries in the North-west by this scheme, I think, has been fairly described by the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) and I must thank that hon. gentleman for what he has said and acknowledge the very practical and business-like way in which he has put before the House, the needs of that part of the country which he represents. The difficulties are no doubt those which he has pointed out—that in a country where population is sparse, where herds of cattle, and especially of cows are small in number and scattered, the ordinary creamery industry, as carried on in the eastern part of Canada is made very difficult and is subjected to very great disabilities. What we want there is population and the introduction of herds of cattle. I believe Professor Robertson's proposal was to establish eight creameries with a grant of $20,000. It seems to me that this assistance to the dairy interests of the North-west would be very much localized, and that it would not really encourage the development of the industry by the people themselves. We should so act that the people themselves, with such assistance as we are able to give them will undertake the work, will be interested in the work and so will be better able to carry it on to a successful issue. I believe that by encouragement of that kind we can accomplish more than by the scheme the hon. gentleman has laid before the House. I trust, therefore, that the hon. gentleman will not press this motion to a division. I would ask him to allow the motion to be withdrawn and trust to the Government and myself as the special representative of the Government in regard to the agricultural interests, to take this question into serious consideration and try in the near future to make such provision in the ordinary way as may accomplish the end he has in view. I may say, that while the hon. gentleman puts this in as an addition to the immigration grant, the estimate in the proposed Supplementary Estimates of the late Government was in the estimates of the Agricultural Department, a department which does not now, as hon. gentlemen know, deal with immigration matters. If the hon. gentleman would agree to this proposition, I can assure him that the dairy interests of the North-west Territories will not suffer in the future, and that I, as Minister of Agriculture, will promise him that anything that can be done will be done to develop and to encourage these industries.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I sincerely hope my hon. friend the member for Assinibola

(Mr. Davin), who has made this motion, will accept the proposition of my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture. I am quite sure that, after the statement the hon. gentleman has made, the matter may safely be left in his hands to adopt measures substantially on the line suggested by the resolution, to promote the dairy interests of the North-west. I am quite certain that the House will agree with the statement made by the mover of this resolution to-day, that no more efficient means of promoting immigration into the North-west can be adopted than by carrying out proposals that are calculated to render settlement in the North-west successful. The hon. gentleman is quite right in saying that mixed farming is undoubtedly of the utmost importance in the North-west, and that great as the crops of grain which may be ordinarily looked for in that country, at the same time the experience of some years has proved conclusively, and to the satisfaction of all who have paid special attention to that important section of country, that in mixed farming the agriculturist will find a much safer and more secure means of advancing his interests than by relying simply upon the raising of crops of grain. The agricultural capabilities of that country are enormous. The facilities for raising cattle are of the very best character, and the dairy interests, therefore, may be looked upon as one of the great means of bringing success to the settlers who go out to that country. These creameries have proved so successful under Professor Robertson's instructions in various parts of Canada, and have resulted in such vast advantage to the country, that I believe, if the same policy is adopted in the North-west and is carried out under the auspices of the Government in the same way, it will be found, not only calculated to enhance the value of property there, but to increase the prosperity of the settlers, and, by increasing their prosperity, it will become one of the most valuable immigration agencies, and will induce large numbers of people to settle in that country who otherwise might not do so. I am quite sure that, after the statement made by the hon. Minister of Agriculture, the question may be safely left in the hands of his department, and that it will receive the attention that so important a question deserves. I trust, therefore, that my hon. friend will accept the proposal which has been made.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. Minister thanked my hon. friend the member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) for the business-like way in which he had dealt with this question; and the chief argument of the speech of the hon. Minister was that there was evidently a difference of opinion in the North-west Territories. The only evidence of difference of opinion was the speech of the hon. member for Alberta; that was the only evidence I noticed, and I noticed that that speech followed on the Minister of Agriculture going up and whispering to the hon. member for Alberta, when he rose to move this motion. The hon. member for Alberta is an independent member of a peculiar type.

Mr. GIBSON. Like you.

Mr. DAVIN. No, not like me. I have taken no independent course; but the member for Alberta is a North-west member who comes down here to be perfectly independent and to support North-west questions, but when a North-west question like this comes up, on which the heart of the people is set, and which is of the greatest importance to the North-west Territories, up he starts and tries to put a spoke in the wheel of the proposal. I hope that the hon. member for Eastern Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) will prove an independent member of a different type. The newspaper in the principal town of Eastern Assiniboia, the Moosomin paper, last session called on the North-west members in the House to support this proposal—the "Leader" called on all the North-west members to support the proposal, and here is the language of the "Standard," edited by a gentleman who is certainly no friend of mine:

This is an infant industry natural to the country, and affecting the interests of those on whom the future of the country almost entirely depends. It is not an industry that will require to be coddled for 18 years. It is merely proposed as a public educator, as a means of helping our agriculturists to help themselves by co-operation, and by the application of practical experience which each individual cannot obtain for himself without great sacrifices. It is to be earnestly hoped—

This is from a gentleman who ran north by north-east as a candidate in support of the First Minister; and when I tried to bind him at future meetings to the fact that he was a supporter of the First Minister, he said that, no doubt, the Government of Sir Charles Tupper would be beaten, but when the Governor General would send for Mr. Laurier, Mr. Laurier would say: Your Excellency, I do not find myself equal to forming a Government; you will please send for Mr. McCarthy. But at one place he did declare that he was a supporter of the First Minister:

It is to be earnestly hoped that the Hon. Sydney Fisher, Minister of Agriculture, will duly appreciate the necessity that exists for the development of dairying in the North-west, and give due attention to the plan which the wide experience of Professor Robertson suggests. Our farmers are desirous of utilizing the pasturage which our soil freely produces year after year, rather than depend entirely upon raising grain, which has not been uniformly successful, and which involves much labour and great expense. In improving their own condition they will add materially to the wealth of the country, and thus conducing to its prosperity, will spread its fame and induce population from other lands.

Now, Sir, one would think, from the speech of my hon. friend from Alberta, that I proposed that dairies should be established in uninhabited portions of the North-west. I am quite sure there are broad acres of vast extent in the North-west Territories where it would be very undesirable to establish creameries; but the proposal I advocate here to-day requires that at least thirty farmers shall go into this stock company for the purpose of establishing a creamery. It requires that they should guarantee there will be 400 cows. I do not propose to establish creameries where there are no cows. The proposition made by the hon. Minister of Agriculture, as I understood him—and I ask his attention to what I say because I may have misunderstood him—is not a generous one. I do not understand that he accepts my proposal. What I understood him to say was this, that he made a cleavage between the policy of the late Government and the policy of the present Government. I understood the Minister to say something like this,—to show in fact that he was falling back on a laissez faire policy from the cardinal and leading principles of Liberalism in every country; that this proposition of mine would in fact be inimical to the North-west Territories because what we wanted in the Territories was a larger number of people, a still greater increase in the number of flocks and herds. We have large herds now. We have, for instance around Lumsden, to speak of that part of the Territories which I know best, plenty of cows and a good population, but no creameries. Around Balgonie there are plenty of cows and considerable population. Both of those sections have asked for, and still ask for, creameries. As regards Maple Creek, the statement is true, and if it is not true in parts of Alberta, I will be very much surprised, as also in Eastern Assiniboia. I know when it was suggested that part of the eastern section should come into my constituency, I received letters from that portion of the Territories asking me to press this policy on Parliament and on the Government which I then supported. I do not propose. I need hardly say, to denude those people of their self-reliance. Our experience in Moose Jaw is not that the granting of such aid has denuded the people who went into the scheme of self-reliance; but our experience is, that it has aided the farmers who needed the help and special instruction, and the result of such aid has been that self-reliance was developed instead of being retarded or injured. What I understood the Minister of Agriculture to say was this: that the Government of which he is a member will inaugurate some policy that will crowd the North-west with people, with, I suppose, extraordinary rapidity; that it will crowd the North-west with herds, with, I suppose, extraordinary rapidity, and as such there will certainly be increased opportunity for the establishment of creameries. But the same argument so used will surely apply against this policy. The hon.

Mr. DAVIN.

gentleman spoke of such a policy as not being conducive to the self-reliance that would be produced by people being left to themselves and allowed to enter into projects on their own resources and entirely without Government aid. Sir, I cannot take that view at all. I shall be glad if the hon. Minister will tell me that I did not understand him correctly, and I shall be glad to learn that I failed to catch some sentence, in which he stated that he would adopt the policy of the late Government. Of course if the hon. gentleman is going to adopt the policy of the late Government and give those sections of the North-west those creameries which they would have had if the late Government had been allowed to bring down their Supplementary Estimates, that is all I want. But if the hon. gentleman is not going to adopt that course, I certainly think it very desirable that we should urge him to carry out that policy as best he could. I would be very glad if the hon. gentleman would tell me whether he said anything that would lead the House to believe that he was going to carry out that policy.

Mr. TALBOT. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I will ask him a question. I understood the hon. gentleman in the first part of his speech to say that he did not anticipate that the late Government would be defeated and that there would be a change of Government; and on the strength of that anticipation he assured his constituents during the late campaign that he would forward their interests by securing a grant of $20,000 from the Government.

Mr. DAVIN. That is not what I said. What I said was: that the Government had agreed with me to place in the Supplementary Estimates the sum of $20,000 for the purpose of carrying out this policy, and if they had been allowed to pass those Estimates we would have had that money, and I used that as an argument why the people should support me as a supporter of that Government.

Mr. TALBOT. I am very much pleased with the answer given by the hon. gentleman. The effect of that answer to my mind is that if the hon. gentleman had not made that promise I do not think he would have had occasion to obtain the casting vote of the returning officer of his constituency. Under the circumstances, the Government are quite justified in refusing to grant the demand of the hon. gentleman, because it would enable him to put into execution a promise made at a time when such a statement could be interpreted as bribing his constituents.

Mr. LISTER. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the Government may fairly be trusted to look after every interest and to do everything that will promote the growth and prosperity of the North-west. I do not think it is altogether necessary that the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) should continue, as he has done for six or seven years, and in fact ever since he has been a member of this House, pretending to advance and promote the interests of the North-west, when as a matter of fact he has been trying to catch votes.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is going too far. He should not use the words "trying to catch votes." Surely the hon. gentleman does not mean to make that statement.

Mr. LISTER. Let us look for a moment at the record of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. DAVIN. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. Will the hon. gentleman withdraw those words?

Mr. LISTER. Certainly; it was not to promote votes. Let us look at the record of the hon. gentleman, who assails a new member from the North-west, an hon. gentleman who from what we may judge of him, will no doubt look after the interests not only of his own constituency but of the whole North-west. He will not be found speaking for a motion and voting against it, or dodging the vote. What do we find prior to the last election? The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) suddenly became a free trader, and if we look at the record we will find that the hon. gentleman spoke eloquently in favour of removing the duties upon certain articles, which he said intimately affected the best interest of the North-west. What the record shows is that while he spoke in favour of the removal of these duties, he voted against the motion.

Mr. DAVIN. No.

Mr. LISTER. Let the hon. gentleman turn to "Hansard" of 1893, and he will find that when my hon. friend the Postmaster General introduced a resolution in this House that it was expedient to admit binding twine free into this country, the hon. member for Assiniboia spoke in favour of the resolution and voted against it. Let the hon. gentleman look at "Hansard" for 1894, and also for 1892, and he will find that when the same resolution was introduced into this House he spoke in favour of it, but his vote was not recorded in favour of it.—to use a common expression, he took to the woods. What are we to infer from such action? That the hon. gentleman was talking to his constituents, that his party fealty was so strong that he could not vote against the party when the motion was put to a vote. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman called the Cabinet which he supported, and which included many hon. gentlemen now leading the Opposition, a Cabinet of antiques, but antique as they were he was found supporting them, and if the interests of the North-west and his party affiliations clashed, he was always with the party. I venture to say that my hon. friend who sits behind me (Mr. Morrison), when questions affecting the North-west are before the House for consideration, will be found supporting them by voice and vote; and we know he will always be able to support the Administration in power, because, as I said at the outset, the Administration is deeply interested in the advancement of that great territory, which has been so sadly neglected during these past years. Millions of dollars of the public money have been wasted, absolutely thrown away without securing any appreciable advance for that country. Under the policy of the present Administration that country will advance and prosper. The people may rely upon that, because there is a live Government in charge of their affairs to-day, and not one such as the concern which was turned out on the 23rd day of June last. The hon. gentleman from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) is now full of zeal for that country. Is it new-found zeal? The hon. gentleman represents his constituency by virtue of the returning officer's vote; after all he has done for that country, and after all the speeches he has made for the people. Session after session he has brought up the grievances of the people, and introduced Bills which were never carried to a conclusion, but which enabled him to say to his electors: "See what I said for the people of this county." But, Mr. Speaker, he could not show what he did for them. The hon. gentleman is now in the peculiar position of representing that constituency by virtue of the returning officer's vote. After all he has done for that county; after all—I won't call it "wind" that he has expended in the House, but I will say, after all the eloquence he has ventilated—after all this eloquence, when he comes to ask the people for an appreciation of what he has done, they say to him: Mr. Davin, we don't want you any more. Sir, there is a protest pending against him, and the chances are that that one vote will not secure Mr. Davin's further sitting in this House. The chances are that his election will be set aside, and somebody else will take his place whose vote will not be inconsistent with his speech.

Mr. DAVIN. I rise to order. The hon. member (Mr. Lister) has reiterated the statement he has made in the early part of his speech, that I was accustomed in this House to speak one way and vote another. That statement is not true to fact. I do not say the hon. gentleman means to say what is not true, but objectively it is an untruth. Therefore, I rise to order. The hon. gentleman had better send for "Hansard" and try to establish what he said.

Mr. SPEAKER. That is not a question of order; that is a question of fact.

Mr. LISTER. I will show you presently. I have looked up the records very carefully.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, then refer to them.

Mr. LISTER. I was going on to say, Mr. Speaker, that this zealous member from the North-west, this gentleman who is always willing to belittle every one else in this House, this gentleman who thinks that no other member from the Territories is competent to speak as to the interests of the community; has an election coming on, and if the signs are not very deceiving indeed, the strong probabilities are that that gentleman has sat in this House for the last time. When a constituency is served as his constituency has been served—matters affecting the North-west being constantly brought before this House by him, and nothing more done by him than to bring them before the House—it is hardly likely that the people of Assiniboia will be satisfied with such representation as the hon. gentleman gives them here.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I submit to you, Sir, whether in a question that is before the courts, it is not in contempt of court, and therefore improper in this House, for any hon. gentleman to make statements that are calculated to prejudice the case. I cannot but think that in the case of an election being protested, and that matter being before the court, that it is entirely contrary to everything in the shape of good taste (not to say anything further) for an hon. member in this House to discuss a question of that kind, and to make statements that are calculated to prejudice the position of parties.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think it would be improper for an hon. member to make statements which would prejudice before the courts the rights of any litigant, but I can hardly think that the fact of a petition being filed against the return of an hon. member would preclude in this House all reference to the facts of the election.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am speaking of statements made with reference to the result of the trial.

Mr. SPEAKER. I understood the hon. member (Mr. Lister) to speak with reference to the election. I hope the hon. member (Mr. Lister) will refrain from referring to the trial and confine his remarks to the election.

Mr. LISTER. I do not think there is very much doubt as to what the result of the election will be, if the past is to be any indication at all as to the future. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) was supporting a Government in power and as he sits here only by the grace of the vote of the returning officer, it seems to me pretty safe to expect that even that vote would not continue him as a member of the House. Let me refer again to the inconsistent position which the hon. member (Mr. Davin) has always taken in the House. Need I refer only to the last session, when on the question of the monopoly in the agricultural implement trade, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) withdrew his motion, so as not to embarrass the Government which he was supporting. If you take up the "Hansard," or the Votes and Proceedings of this House, for the years that the hon. gentleman has been here, I do not think that you will be able to find one session during which the hon. gentleman has not introduced legislation which he supported by his speech, but which he allowed to drop. Motions were brought in here for the purpose of relieving the people of the North-west from the burden of taxation they suffered under, and you will find on almost every occasion, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) has spoken in favour of the reduction or abolition of the taxes, but has voted in some instances against such motions, and in other instances he has not voted at all. Look at his position on the binder twine question. You will find that on Mr. Mulock's motion, the first time he spoke in favour of it and voted against it, and the next time on the very same motion he spoke in favour of it and did not vote at all. That is the consistent position which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) has occupied while supporting the late Government. Of course he has a freer hand now, and it is altogether likely, judging from the Order paper, that he will deluge this House with all sorts of motions. Why, if we are to judge from his motions on the Order paper, the world will believe that he is an advocate of free trade, pure and simple. He can be free now. He can support the Conservative party in the House here, and can go to the North-west Territories and say there: "See what I have done for these people. I have moved this motion. I have moved that motion, I have moved the other motion, all in the interest of the people of this country." The hon. gentleman can be consistent now, because he can vote in the way he moves. That is something he could not do before. Fortunately for him, his hands are now untied, and he can play the role of a reformer to his heart's content, and can at the same time appear in the country to be consistent. Now, I suppose it is hardly parliamentary for me to say that the hon. gentleman is not always sincere in the motions he brings before the House. Because it is not parliamentary, I will not make that statement; but it is evident that the electors of his constituency think he is not sincere, or they would have returned him by a much larger majority. However, one thing is clear, and that is, as I said before, that this Government has pledged itself to promote in every way possible the interests of that country; and there is in this House a gentleman from that country who occupies an independent position, but who, I venture to say, will always be found, by speech and by action, supporting, consistently and conscientiously supporting, the interests of that great country. Sir, we all recognize as fully as it is possible for people in this country to recognize, that the greatness of Canada is bound up in the development of the North-west. We feel that Canada can never become great, can never become anything more than provincial, unless that vast tract of territory is settled. People that territory with a hardy population, and you do more than all other things to develop the great resources of this Dominion and to make it rich in everything that contributes to the wealth of a nation. The policy of the old Government has been to cripple, to shackle that country, to make it shrink up; and, strange as it may appear, the addition to the population of that country is hardly appreciable for all the years these hon. gentlemen have been in power. How little has been done for that country. Why, the hon. leader of the Opposition told us, years and years ago—so many years ago that it is almost forgotten—that if this House would advance the millions upon millions of money which it did, in a certain number of years, fixed by that hon. gentleman to a day, there would be an enormous population in that country, and there would be 640,000,000 bushels of wheat a year produced there.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I beg to say that the statement which the hon. gentleman has made was shown during the last session to be entirely unfounded in truth.

Mr. CASEY. No.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And I think it is an abuse of parliamentary privilege for a gentleman in this House to endeavour to repeat constantly a statement of that kind.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. leader of the Opposition should be satisfied with correcting a statement of fact, and to let the hon. member proceed. I think it is hardly right to criticise his language or his habit of speech.

Mr. LISTER. Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman says that he never made such a statement—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do.

Mr. LISTER. Then, "Hansard" is all wrong.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, "Hansard" proves it, in the clearest manner, a fiction from beginning to end.

Mr. LISTER. A fiction prepared by the Deputy Minister of the Interior and read in this House, and now in "Hansard." If the hon. gentleman denies that he made such a statement—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do.

Mr. LISTER. Then I am bound, for the present, at all events, to accept his denial.

But I desire to say that we shall turn up again, as we have turned up many times before, the "Hansard" containing the statement, signed by the present leader of the Opposition—

Mr. CASEY. And endorsed.

Mr. LISTER. And endorsed, that that country would produce, in a certain number of years—which he fixed, and about which he desired to be so accurate that he mentioned the very day; I think it was the 31st of December, inclusive—640,000,000 bushels of wheat per year. If that statement was ever made—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It never was made.

Mr. LISTER. Well, I am bound to accept for the present the denial of the hon. gentleman. But I say if that statement ever was made, the hon. gentleman forgot that the total quantity of wheat produced in the world does not amount to 640,000,000 bushels, and if we produced that quantity in the North-west country, it would not be worth 5 cents a bushel. Sir, referring to the hon. gentleman who is so ready to get up and deny the statement I made, I find that, on the 6th of July, 1891, Mr. Mulock moved that binding-twine be placed on the free list. Mr. Davin, the member for Assiniboia, is recorded in the Votes and Proceedings as having voted "nay." He was against having binding-twine put on the free list. Then, Sir, if you will look at "Hansard" of the same year, volume 1, page 1822. On the 1st of March, 1893, Mr. Mulock moved to put binding-twine on the free list. Mr. Davin, of Assiniboia, made a strong speech in favour of the removal. Ah, there were eloquent passages in that speech. No man in Canada but the member for Assiniboia could have made them—eloquent, feeling. To read that speech now, Sir, after all the excitement has passed away—to sit down in your chamber and coldly go over it—it excites you with enthusiasm. It makes you feel that the poor settlers of the North-west have been down-trodden and oppressed. And what must the speech have been, delivered on that day, when even now, four years afterwards, it moves any man with feeling in his breast at all to read it? But after making that speech, eloquent, powerful and convincing, appealing to and touching human feelings to a degree that I can scarcely express, and when the vote was called for, a few minutes afterwards, the Votes and Proceedings do not record the name of Mr. Davin in favour of the motion. So that we had the hon. gentleman speaking in favour of the resolution and then dodging the vote. But my hon. friend, talking to the electors of that grand constituency which he represents, could read to them his very eloquent oration and say to them; See what I have done for the poor settlers of the country. Unacquainted with the forms of parliamentary procedure, of course nobody ever thought of asking Mr. Davin: Well, how did you vote? That speech was sent, no doubt, at the expense of the country to every elector in the constituency, that speech was in the hand of friend and foe alike, and even his foes would say: What a noble soul must beat in the breast of Mr. Davin. They all had it, they had read it, they knew all about it, convincing as it was. When the elections came on, the friends of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) could point to that speech as one indication, at all events, of the overpowering interest he took in the affairs of that North-west country. But the hon. gentleman had been there for several years, and there must be some reason why that speech did not convince the electors of that territory.

Mr. DAVIN. It convinced the Government of Canada.

Mr. LISTER. You never convinced them of anything.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, they brought down the duty 50 per cent.

Mr. LISTER. Year after year the hon. gentleman made himself the special and particular champion of the people of the North-west. There was no grievance, real or imaginary, that he did not ventilate here, and most of them were imaginary. He assailed the Government in the House. One would have thought he would be found working with the Opposition, but whenever he found that he would embarrass the Government, my hon. friend was silent and did not press his motion. He never demanded a vote, and I cannot, at this moment, recall one instance when the hon. gentleman was ever found voting against the Government except on one occasion, and then the Government's majority was so large that the hon. gentleman knew he ran no risk of imperilling its life. You will always find that the hon. gentleman supported the Government and sacrificed the interests of the Territories. The hon. gentleman takes a great interest in butter-making. There is hardly anything that he does not understand. He is an adept at cheese-making. Now, he is going to tell the Minister of Agriculture all about butter-making and creameries and all that sort of thing. No doubt the hon. gentleman knows a great many things, but I venture to say that he knows very little about the making of butter. He has suddenly become very zealous. He is now pressing on his demands to such an extent that the treasury of the country can scarcely satisfy them. No doubt his desire is to make himself solid with the electors, but with such representatives from the Territories as we have behind us, who look well after the interests of that country, who know what they are talking about, the North-west country may be certain that the Government in power to-day will watch the North-west carefully and do everything possible to develop that country, and I believe that when that country has an opportunity of speaking again it will show its appreciation of what this new Government has done and is doing and intends to do for that great country which is the hope of Canada.

Mr. DOUGLAS. As representing a constituency largely interested in this dairy industry, I desire to say a few words on this motion. I may say, in the first place, that I am opposed to any definite sum being passed by this House for this purpose. It cannot be said that this motion is really necessary in view of the expressed policy of the new Government toward the North-west. I have applications from two or three quarters for creameries, but we would much prefer that the whole matter should be left to the good judgment of the present Government. There are already three creameries in operation, and the people are satisfied that the scheme of Professor Robertson is feasible and likely to succeed. I do not want to be put on record as being opposed to any aid to the North-west Territories, but would like to say that I have implicit confidence in the good intention of the Government with reference to this whole question. I can readily understand why the hon. member from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) is exceedingly anxious to have a definite sum voted. I can readily understand that in view of the coming election this motion would tend to strengthen his hands, and secure to some extent the lost confidence of the people. We desire to leave the matter solely with the Government to decide according to its declared policy. I think that I am presenting the sentiments of a people who are largely engaged in mixed farming, and who are just getting their business into shape and to take advantage of the scheme which has already been initiated. When I say that they are perfectly satisfied to allow Professor Robertson to carry out his plan and are ready to fall into line with him. There is no need for anything further at the hands of the Government of the day than to leave the matter with the commissioner and we have confidence in the policy expressed by the Government from time to time. I shall not occupy the time of the House any longer, but shall conclude by expressing my hope that the interests of the North-west shall have all due attention.

Mr. SPROULE. As this question is very important, especially to the people of Manitoba and the North-west Territories, and as I have collected some data which I intended to use when it came under consideration but which I have not at my hand at present, I beg to move that the debate be now adjourned.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

REMOVALS FROM OFFICE.

Mr. HAGGART moved for :

Return showing the names of all persons who have been dismissed or removed from office or who have been superannuated, and the causes of such dismissal, removal or superannuation, or who have resigned or been requested to resign since the 11th day of July, 1896, showing the office or position such person occupied and whether on the permanent staff or in the temporary employ of the Government or otherwise in the public service, and when such dismissal, removal, superannuation or resignation took place. Also, the names of all persons appointed to positions in the public service, temporarily or permanently, and the office to which they were so appointed.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I desire to move in amendment :

That the following words be added to the motion : Also copies of every letter, report and document relating to each of the dismissals in question.

Amendment agreed to.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I have no objection to the resolution except that I would move as an amendment that the papers be brought down not from 11th July only, but from 23rd June.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. HAGGART. I hope the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) will hasten the bringing down of this return as much as possible. It will tend a great deal to the speedy discussion and passing of the Estimates if we have the return down in time.

The PRIME MINISTER. It will be brought down at the earliest possible moment after that intimation from the hon. gentleman.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

ORGANIZATION OF THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

On the order being called :

That the time has arrived when the North-west Territories should be treated on the same footing as the organized provinces, that an annual subsidy should be voted for carrying on the government of the Territories, which subsidy should be calculated on the same grounds as those on which the subsidy voted to the province of Manitoba is based.

Mr. DAVIN. The ground of this motion has already been occupied by a motion of my hon. friend from Alberta. If my hon. friend had informed me that he had given notice of the motion, I would not have given notice of this. I shall not move this motion.

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER FLOODS.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL (translation) moved for,

Copies of all memorials, reports of engineers, documents and letters, in relation to the great inundation on the St. Lawrence, between Quebec and Montreal, in the months of April and May last (1896), its causes and the best means of preventing the recurrence or mitigating the disastrous results thereof.

He said : Mr. Speaker, in moving this motion, I wish, to call the attention of the Government to the urgent necessity of preventing, if possible, the recurrence of the disasters almost yearly resulting from the inundation on both shores of the St. Lawrence, between Montreal and Quebec. Nearly every year, Sir, when the snow thaws and the ice-bridge breaks on the St. Lawrence, ice-dams are formed, which obstruct the passage of the water and cause the lands on both shores of the river to be flooded. In 1865, an inundation caused considerable damage. On that occasion not only did it result in an enormous loss of property but it was accompanied by a deplorable loss of life. Since that time, the water has not reached so high a level ; but this year, it rose by two feet and a half above the level reached in 1865. The losses suffered from the flooding of the lands are more considerable than in 1865, notwithstanding that, no loss of life had to be deplored this year. In the town of Berthier, chief town of the riding which it is my privilege to represent in this House, all the houses with one single exception were flooded and the water reached up to four feet and even seven feet. The hon. gentlemen may easily infer from that the extent of the losses inflicted on that locality. The town of Berthier was not the only one to suffer from the inundation, but the list of the sufferers was swelled by the parishes of St. Cuthbert, St. Barthélemy, Sorel, Ste. Anne, and the Islands. In those localities, the losses are still more considerable than at Berthier. A great many houses and a still larger number of barns have been carried away by the water, and the hay and grain are a total loss. In the parish of St. Barthélemy, the losses are estimated at $40,000. In the county of Richelieu, for which sits my hon. friend who is unavoidably absent to-day, forming part of a delegation for waiting upon the Postmaster General, and who entrusted me with the task of inviting the attention of the House to the damages caused by the floods at Ste. Anne of Sorel, it is estimated that the losses suffered there reach no less a sum than $60,000. The total losses suffered by all the localities of the two counties situate on the two shores of the St. Lawrence, between Montreal and Quebec, are estimated at the outside at $500,000. After the great inundation of 1865, some reports were made by engineers sent to the spot with a view to inquiring into the position and taking some action if possible, in order to protect the town of Berthier from the ravages of the flood. With this end in view they had an ice-breaker built, but so low that, in the spring of the year, it is several feet under water, so that it serves no useful purpose.

Flooding, as all the hon. gentlemen know is produced by ice-dams which form at certain points on the St. Lawrence, the effect of which is to cause the river to overflow its banks. The banks of ice break and are strewn about the shores, carrying away with them houses, barns and cattle, and leaving, after the river has resumed its normal course, numberless germs of disease. The hon. members thus see to what extent public health is imperilled. In order to protect the town of Berthier from the floods, it would be necessary for the Government to build three ice-breakers, at different points, and to raise up that which was built after the flood of 1865, and which now serves no useful purpose. From the opinion of engineers whose advice I asked, I should be led to think it necessary for the Government to take such action as would prevent those dams from forming or would shatter them as soon as formed. I am told that such a precaution would prove efficient and could be resorted to without the Government having to incur any considerable expenditure, or at any rate quite below the damages caused by a single flood. I move for copies of documents, letters and reports of engineers which may have been drawn up under directions given either by the Government of the day or by the late Government, with a view to ascertaining what expenditure need be incurred in order to reach the desired end. I trust that the Government, if they have not yet taken any action in the matter, will take all necessary and efficient means to prevent the recurrence of such damages in the future, and that they will not fail to put in the Supplementary Estimates a sufficient sum to afford adequate protection to that immense tract of country from the disastrous flood whose periodical, and I might say yearly, recurrence results in such losses.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). (Translation.) The Government are well acquainted with all the facts submitted to this House by my hon. friend and are fully alive to their high importance. The Government are not aware whether the late Government concerned themselves with that question. No preliminary work, so far as I know, was made with a view to ascertaining what would be the best method of protecting in the future those localities from such ravages. Should there be found in the records of the department any reports or documents such as mentioned in the motion they will as soon as possible be brought down and laid on the Table of the House. But should there be no such reports on record, that is to say, if the late Government did not take this question into their consideration, the duty will be incumbent upon us immediately to deal with it.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL.

LIGHTHOUSE KEEPER AT POINT CLARK.

Mr. SEMPLE (for Mr. Tolmie) moved for :

Return of all complaints made against Mr. Rae, lighthouse keeper at Point Clark, in the county of Bruce, Ontario, and of all correspondence relating to such complaints and of any action of the Government thereon.

Mr. CAMERON. I trust the Government will deal with this matter promptly. I put a question on the Paper some days ago and obtained an answer from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries—by the way I do not see him in his seat—that this man was complained against over and over again. He was complained against on the ground that he allowed the lights to go out; he was complained against on the ground that on more than one occasion during business hours, he was beastly drunk. I do not know the man, I do not know what his politics are; I only know that several of my constituents who live in the neighbourhood of this lighthouse, have complained to me and asked me to bring the matter to the attention of the Government. I submit that if the answer given by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is a correct answer, this man's services ought to be dispensed with promptly, in the public interest, and in the interest of navigation on the upper lakes.

Motion agreed to.

APPOINTMENTS IN THE SERVICE.

Mr. GIBSON moved for :

Copies of all Orders in Council appointing persons to the several departments of Government service from 1st May, 1896, to 10th July, 1896, giving their names, the nature of their appointments and the salary attached or recommended thereto. Also the names of all persons in the Government service recommended for promotion, the positions held, the salaries paid, the promotion and position recommended, as well as the increased salary and the dates of such recommendations.

He said: Shortly after this Government came into office the Conservative press from one end of the Dominion to the other, took the trouble to count the number of men who were coming down to Ottawa, as they stated, to ask the new Government for positions of place and trust. I think, Sir, that when this order is brought down, it will be clearly shown to the House and to the country how very few appointments were left to be made by the new Government by the greedy Tories who were after the positions, and who came down in hordes, I may say, and applied for positions from the late Government after they had no business to make appointments of that kind. Sir, I am not a lawyer myself, but I may mention that when the papers announced the number of lawyers that had been recommended for appointment as Q. C's. by the late Government, I questioned a friend of mine whom I met, and asked him if there were any more lawyers left in the country, as all the rest of them had been made Q. C's. We find also that veterinary surgeons were appointed in every part of the country, and positions of every kind were sought to be filled by a Government who had lost the confidence of the people. And yet, Sir, the supporters of that party to-day accuse members on this side of the House of trying to make provision for their friends. Why, Sir, there was not a nook or loop hole left in the whole civil service from the Atlantic to the Pacific, that was not sought after by the friends of the late Government, and if the members of that Government did not succeed in making provision for them, it was not their fault. For instance, they placed a man in the Department of Railways and Canals; I believe, he was an appointee of the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), who, I may say, took the trouble to find places for his constituents, not only in the county which he represented, but also in the counties of Lincoln and Welland, because the hon. member for Welland in the late Parliament and myself, were in the cold shades of opposition. This man was, as I understand, in the employ of the Government, he was in the canal office, but his name did not appear on the pay-roll. He was paid, perhaps, out of the secret service fund that the late Government has had at their disposal, or paid perhaps in some other way. I notice the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart) laughing; but it is well known to all the members of this House that many men in the Government service who were supposed to be clerks, were put down as doing something in the North-west, while they were in reality working for the Government in the city of Ottawa, or some other place. This kind of thing has been going on. The Government, not having had enough offices for their friends, have created offices by making these men appear on the various pay-rolls of the Government as doing some other kind of work, and have paid them for some other kind of work than that which they were supposed to be doing. I think when this order comes down we will then see with what care the late Administration made provision for their supporters. I think it would have been just as well for themselves and for their friends to have refrained from any criticism as to the number of applications that were being made by the friends of the present Government. There is an old saying that it is not well to holloa until you are out of the woods. The late Government is not exactly out of the woods yet. There are a great many things, I fancy, that will be shown in this return; and I am safe in saying that this return will be given in full, and the members on both sides of the House will have the satisfaction of knowing that when a return is asked from this Government, it will be brought down in toto, and not garbled as has been the custom in the past. I think when we are furnished with the documents asked for in this return, we will see what care the members of the late Government and their supporters had for their friends in securing for them positions and promotions.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC WORKS IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. MARTIN moved for :

Copies of all letters and other papers in the possession of the Government relating to the repairs and extension of the Belle River breakwater and the Red Point pier in the province of Prince Edward Island.

He said: This is a subject in which a large number of the people of Prince Edward Island are interested. I had the honour, a few days ago, of asking a question in regard to this matter, and the answer which I obtained from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was that those public works had not been taken over by the Dominion Government. That may be the fact, but it does not detract from the importance of those two public works. One of them, Belle River breakwater, on the southern side of the Island, serves as a shipping port for a large number of residents in the surrounding sections, and extension of that pier or breakwater is of the utmost importance. The province is a very small one, and its harbours are likewise small. It is a very thickly settled province, and its exports are very large; indeed, I suppose, comparing exports and area there is not another part of Canada which can, acre for acre—or rather that the same area as Prince Edward Island cannot be found in any part of Canada which can ship as much produce as Prince Edward Island. It is, therefore, necessary in the interests of our people, especially in view of the large public works constructed in other parts of the Dominion, that they should have good shipping accommodation. This is all the more necessary because the prices received for produce are very low; it has to be carried long distances, and the prices received by the growers are not very high. Much of it is perishable—as the root crop—and every convenience is required in order to have it shipped expeditiously. The first of these public works to which I refer is not a new one; it is one to which attention has been given by the local government, and I can justly claim a grant for its extension by the Dominion Government. The late Government, by Order in Council, had agreed last session to place $2,000 in the Estimates for its repair and extension; and the Government were also prepared to place a sum, not quite so large, in the Supplementary Estimates for the Red Point pier. I hope the present Government will, in that respect at least, follow the footsteps of their predecessors. Such grants would confer great benefit on the people of this part of the Island, who were justified in making those claims on the Government of the day. It must be remembered that the people of the Island have no direct or indirect interest in the money expended on the canal system of the Dominion, and other public works. They are cut off from communication with the rest of the Dominion for many months of the year, and, therefore, it is necessary that the few small public works on the Island should be kept in good repair. I may say, Sir, that the harbours of that province do not cost this Dominion a very large sum of money. Although they are numerous, they are very small, and the money expended on them is a mere bagatelle. I trust that the House and the Government will take this question into their serious consideration, and insert in the Supplementary Estimates a sum of $2,000 for the Belle River breakwater and $1,000 for the Red Point pier. I do not wish to detain the House, as it is nearly six o'clock, but this much at least is due to the little province from which I come. The fact that these works have not been taken over by the Dominion Government should not stand as a barrier in the way of these grants, because, if you look over the records of Parliament, you will find that moneys have been expended at different times on similar works, not only in the province of Prince Edward Island, but in many other parts of the Dominion. I again ask the attention of the Government to the matter, and I trust that they will attend to it in the interest of the people of that province, who are handicapped in many ways as compared with their fellow Canadians in other provinces.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). All the papers connected with the case will be gladly brought down.

Mr. HACKETT. I wish to make a remark or two on the subject before the motion is declared carried, and to supplement briefly what has been so ably said by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Martin). I am well acquainted with that locality, and I know that the hon. gentleman, in putting forward his case, is not only doing his duty to his constituents, but that he is asking what is due to this part of the province. With regard to the hon. gentleman's remarks that these works, which are of Dominion importance, have not been taken hold of by the Government, I desire to say that there is in my county one pier and one breakwater which have been taken by the Dominion Government, and which are now badly in need of repairs. I was very glad the other day when I asked a question of the Minister of Public Works to find that he had provided for the repairing of two very important works in my province, namely, the breakwater at Tignish and the breakwater of Miminegash. There is, however, a small work taken over a few years ago by the Dominion Government and which has been allowed to fall into disrepair. I refer to the pier at West Point. This pier is of great importance to the people of that section of the country. Most of the inhabitants there are about twelve miles from the line of railway, and while they have every facility by means of water to transport their products, they are deprived of that facility, because of the want of proper accommodation which a pier would afford. They have to take their produce by land, a distance of ten or twelve miles in the most inclement season of the year when the roads are in poor condition, and the expense incurred in this way lessens, of course, the value of their products and the profits from their sale in the market. I trust that the Minister of Public Works will seriously consider this matter. The expenditure of $2,000 at West Point would place that pier in such a state that it would be of great advantage to these people. It would afford them many facilities which they are now deprived of, and they would be able to transport their products from that pier to railway communication with the rest of the Dominion at Point du Chene, N.B. Those people instead of being obliged to haul their produce a distance of ten or twelve miles over land, could then ship it from West Point to Point du Chene, a distance of thirty miles, by water, and they would be enabled to take advantage of the markets of the Dominion, on an equal footing with their fellow-citizens who reside near railway communication. I know that my hon. friend from East Prince (Mr. Yoe) will corroborate me, when I say that the people residing around the shores of the Island of Prince Edward, are a hardy, active and intelligent race. However, they have for a number of years been placed at a great disadvantage. I will advocate as strongly as I possibly can the building of a railway to West Point, because I believe that the building of that branch railway would be a great advantage to the people of that district. I do not ask now for the building of a pier there, because part of the pier has already been built. I simply ask that it be repaired in such a way that the people should be able to take advantage of it. There is also another breakwater which has been undertaken by the people of the locality themselves. I refer to the breakwater at Brae. After waiting for a number of years the people there subscribed a sum of money for the building of this breakwater. After the money was subscribed and the work commenced, a certain amount was voted by this Parliament to complete it. It is, however, yet uncompleted, and a small grant of $1,000 or so would tend towards its completion and would render it of some advantage to the people in that section. As it is nearly six o'clock, and as I wish to hear from my hon. friend from East Prince (Mr. Yeo) I will now take my seat.

Mr. YEO. Mr. Speaker, as it is six o'clock and the House is about to adjourn, I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Copies of all memorials, reports, correspondence, plans and papers in relation to the construction of a bridge in front of Quebec, or in the vicinity, to connect the Intercolonial Railway with the Canadian Pacific Railway.—(Mr. Lange-lier.)

Return giving the names of all fishermen holding fishing licenses in the county of Lincoln and Niagara from the Dominion Government, and the amounts paid by each during the year 1895, and the names of license holders for the same district for the year 1896.—(Mr. Gibson.)

ADJOURNMENT—CORRESPONDENCE WITH HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR GENERAL.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Mr. Speaker, as we have very nearly exhausted the Order paper, and under the circumstances with which the House is familiar, I will now move the adjournment of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to ask the hon. leader of the Government if he would be able to lay upon the Table of the House the papers referred to in my letter to His Excellency the Governor General; the list of precedents and the list of appointments made by Mr. Mackenzie's Government?

The PRIME MINISTER. The list of precedents to which my hon. friend alludes will be laid upon the Table of the House to-morrow. The papers which he moved for the other day respecting the appointments made by the several Governments after their defeat, the Mackenzie Government and so on, will be laid, I hope, upon the Table of the House on Friday.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman of course, knows to what papers I refer. In my letter to His Excellency the Governor General, I referred to papers which I had placed in His Excellency's hands, containing the precedents to which I wished to draw His Excellency's attention; also, the list of appointments made by Mr. Mackenzie's Administration after its defeat and previous to its resignation. I presume that these papers, being referred to in the letter, form part of that correspondence, and I would be glad to have them both laid on the Table.

The PRIME MINISTER. Certainly, they will both be laid on the Table of the House to-morrow. My hon. friend also made a motion the other day on the subject of the appointments of the Mackenzie Government after its defeat. All these papers, I hope, will be laid on the Table on Friday.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would ask the leader of the House whether he proposes to adjourn the House from Thursday night till Tuesday.

The PRIME MINISTER. The House will sit to-morrow and on Friday as well. As to whether it will sit on Monday or not, I shall be able to make a definite statement to the House to-morrow.

Mr. TAYLOR. Before this motion is put, I would like to draw the attention of the hon. leader of the Government to the fact that when it was proposed a few days ago to make Wednesday a Government day, it was decided that we should have Wednesday after six o'clock for public Bills and Orders. I have on the Order paper a most important Bill referring to alien labour, and I am receiving letters and petitions by every mail, urging that it shall be pushed through this session.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Why did you not push it through last session?

Mr. TAYLOR. Simply because hon. gentlemen opposite would not allow us to reach it. There is a demand made by both sides of the House that this Bill be pressed to a conclusion this year, and I hope that, if the time allotted to private members on Wednesday be taken away, the hon. leader of the Government will place this among the Government Orders.

The PRIME MINISTER. I may say to my hon. friend that the Government do not intend to place that Bill on the Government Orders, but we will give my hon. friend every opportunity to bring it before the House and have it discussed. The hon. gentleman understands the reason why the House is not sitting this evening. We have among us a most distinguished stranger, who is to be entertained this evening, and I am sure that every member of the House wishes him to be entertained in a suitable manner.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to give the hon. gentleman notice that before the House goes into Supply to-morrow, there will be something said in reference to Governor General's warrants, followed by a motion.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 6 o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 3rd September, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THE BAR IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have to announce for the information of the House that a petition signed by a number of members has just been handed to me, requesting that I should cause the bar in the House for the sale of liquors, to be closed. This morning a meeting of the Committee of Internal Economy of the House was held, at which all its members were present, namely, Sir Richard Cartwright, Mr. Davies, Mr. Fielding, Mr. Tarte, and myself as Chairman, which committee unanimously passed a resolution that the bar in the basement of the House of Commons be absolutely abolished, and directions have been given to that effect.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier), from the Special Committee appointed to prepare and report lists of members to compose the Select Standing Committees ordered by the House on Thursday, the 20th August last, presented the following report:—

That the said Report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

THE PRINTING COMMITTEE.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved :

That a Message be sent to the Senate informing their Honours that this House will unite with them in the formation of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the subject of the Printing of Parliament, and that the members of the Select Standing Committee on Printing, viz. :—Messrs. Bergeron, Bergin, Bourassa, Charlton, Costigan, Dupont, Ellis, Gibson, Landerkin, LaRivière, Macdonald (Huron), Maclean, McMullen, Montague, Oliver, Parmalee, Préfontaine, Richardson, Somerville, Sutherland, Taylor and Tisdale, will act as members on the part of this House on said Joint Committee on the Printing of Parliament.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to suggest to the hon. leader of the Government that in view of the absence of Mr. Costigan the name of Mr. Foster be substituted for Mr. Costigan's name on that committee, at all events during the latter's absence.

The PRIME MINISTER. I consent to the change.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 9) to amend the Criminal Code of 1892, for the purpose of making more effectual provision for the punishment of seduction and abduction.—(Mr. Charlton.)

RESIGNATION OF THE LATE GOVERNMENT.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government if he is ready to lay upon the Table of the House the remaining correspondence with regard to the resignation of the late Government?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I have the correspondence here, that is to say, the memorial which was laid by Sir Charles Tupper before His Excellency at the time the correspondence took place between His Excellency and himself; and I now lay this correspondence on the Table. I move that rule 94 of the House be suspended, and that the papers just brought down be immediately printed.

Motion agreed to.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I should like also to ask the leader of the Government when he expects to be able to lay on the Table of the House further correspondence covered by the motion?

The PRIME MINISTER. I hope to bring it down to-morrow.

FIRE AT TIGNISH, P.E.I.

Mr. HACKETT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, to bring to the notice of the House a very serious disaster which occurred in Prince Edward Island a few days ago,—I refer to the fire at Tignish. The fire occurred on Sunday, and within three hours the greater part of the town was swept away, nothing being left but smoking ruins instead of the happy homes which formerly existed. I will read for the information of the House a brief description of the fire as printed in the Charlottetown "Guardian," as follows:—

Tignish has suffered a severe loss. Probably never has such a fire occurred on this island as that which happened on Sunday. It broke out at about 2.30 p.m. in the carriage factory of Mr. Peter Kinch, caused by the owner's daughter igniting some shavings. A strong south-west wind was blowing at the time, which bore the flames around the business part of the village. The large Chaisson block was soon a mass of flames, and almost simultaneously, the residence of Dr. Murphy. It swept through the principal part of the village, burning furiously as though no power on earth could stop it, and many buildings were soon consumed. The railway round house, one engine and a number of cars were burned. The flames spread so rapidly that only one engine could possibly be saved. This was pushed out by hand, there not being time to get up steam. The sight was a pitiful one, and the excitement was intense. Tignish has no fire protection, and the citizens were obliged to work together to their utmost, using buckets of water and other similar methods, but the flames were too powerful, and in the short time of three hours from the time it began, the village was a mass of ruins. There are about seventy buildings in all burned to the ground, and fourteen families left homeless. A relief committee is organized for the purpose of coming to the aid of the poor people who suffered by the late fire. Any contributions will be thankfully received by the parish.

(Signed)

FATHER DUGALD.

I think, Mr. Speaker, this is an occasion on which an appeal may fairly be made to the generosity of both parties in this House. I remember fourteen or fifteen years ago being a spectator of a fire across the river in Hull, when many people lost their homes. On that occasion, Parliament being in session, an appeal was made to it, and immediate aid was asked and afforded by this Parliament. A resolution was at once brought down to the House, and passed to afford relief to the sufferers. I ask the leader of the Government, who is a very humane man and one who would desire to relieve the sufferings of distress, if on this occasion he will not be prepared to bring down a resolution as was done on that occasion, and have a grant passed by Parliament so as to afford some assistance to the sufferers at Tignish. A sum of $2,000 granted now would relieve the sufferings of those people more than three times that amount obtained at a later period. I ask the consideration of the leader of the Government, the Finance Minister and their colleagues to this matter, and I trust they will be able to grant some assistance.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I heard only indistinctly the remarks that fell from my hon. friend (Mr. Hackett), but I understood him to refer to a disaster which had befallen the town of Tignish, which forms part of one of the ridings represented in this House. I understood the hon. gentleman to desire not only the sympathy of the Government but expression of their sympathy in a way more substantial than mere sentiment. The hon. gentleman will recognize at once that it is impossible for the Government on the spur of the moment to give an answer to this demand. It will be taken into due consideration, but the particulars given in the newspaper report being scanty,

I shall feel obliged if the hon. gentleman will call on me and present more definitely and exhaustively the details.

SUPPLY—CONCURRENCE.

House proceeded to consider resolutions adopted in Committee of Supply 1st inst.

Annual Drill of the Militia..... $446,500

Mr. FOSTER. Perhaps the hon. gentleman has the information which he promised to supply ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). When this item was considered in Committee of Supply, I was asked to give some details as to the number of men who would be drilled this year. The question arose as to whether the whole force or only a portion of it was to be drilled in camp. I have now the figures and details to give to the House, which I will read as follows :—

The FINANCE MINISTER moved that consideration of the remaining resolutions in the report of the committee be postponed.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY—GOVERNOR GENERAL'S WARRANTS.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the House goes into Committee of Supply, I am obliged to ask the attention of hon. gentlemen on both sides to a short statement in reference to what all will agree to be a very important matter, namely, the principle and the practice, as illustrated by the issue of Governor General's warrants in the months of July and August. In doing so, I may be at some disadvantage in the discussion of this point as far as the legal aspects are concerned, Officers and Men.	Horses.	To provide for Twelve Days' Drill.	Pay and Allowances.

10,624	93	City and Independent Companies at their local headquarters, viz. : City Infantry Battalions and Independent Companies.....		$85,000
24,411	2,697	Drill in Camps of Instruction—All the Cavalry Corps, Field Batteries, Engineers and all the Rural Infantry Corps, including Brigade Staff at Camps.....	$226,000
		Camp kettle allowances.....	3,000
		Marching and baggage allowances.....	8,000	237,000
		Rations, forage and fuel.....	66,000
		Incidental expenses of camp.....	3,500	69,500
		Artillery competition—Field and Garrison Artillery.....		5,000
		Transport.....	70,000
		Less for eleven battalions to drill at local headquarters.....	20,000	50,000
35,035	2,790		$100,000	$446,500

It is proposed to drill the following men this autumn :—Officers and men, 10,300, horses, 1,000 ; total number of camps, 11, with 12 days' drill at each. The camps will be held on 8th, 15th, 22nd and 29th September, as authorized by General Order No. 70, of 24th August, 1896. There will be 8 brigade camps and 3 local headquarters' camps.

Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.) Did I understand the hon. Minister the other day to state that there will be no militia drill in Prince Edward Island ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I did not say so.

Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.) You mentioned all the other provinces, and you evidently omitted Prince Edward Island.

Resolution concurred in.

Mr. LAURIER.

as I am not a lawyer, but I shall endeavour to place the view of the Opposition, and, I hope, the view of the whole House, in a calm and temperate way. I ask the attention of members to it—not as we may be divided as sitting on your right and your left, Mr. Speaker—but the attention of the House to it, as representatives of the constituencies of Canada, and viewing it from that standpoint alone. What I mean is this : that I think it would be a pity if we undertook the discussion of an important matter like this from a purely party standpoint, and so far as I am concerned, whilst I propose to put my own opinions as strongly as possible, I do not wish to give the matter that tinge in the slightest degree. Probably this question is of more importance at the present time, under the view that we are a new House of Commons, coming together, many of us, for the first time in our representative capacity, and that is added to somewhat by the fact that it is also the advent of a new party to the Government of the country, commencing its record and basing its acts upon certain principles and framing its practice on its view of those principles. In the first place, I will not insult the intelligence of this House by dwelling to any extent at all on the principle that the House of Commons holds within its peculiar power the supply for the administration of the services of the country. I will not ask hon. gentlemen on either side of the House to review that long course of historic struggle which commenced centuries ago, and which, after continuing for years, at last culminated in the gaining by the representatives of the people in the Commons of the country of the undoubted and absolute control of public money. What through centuries of struggle has been gained by the Commons, it is equally important that those who represent the people in the Commons, should keep intact. For, if it is worth centuries of struggle and labour to gain an important and vital principle, it is worth the best and most serious attention of those who succeed to the legacy of representation, to keep these privileges intact. When the House of Commons in Great Britain had gained this vital principle, the importance of that principle was typified still by the struggle, but it was typified, and remains typified until this day, by the guards that have been thrown around the appropriations of moneys before they can go into the hands of the Executive for distribution and for administration. There are three ways in which the House of Commons may grant to the Executive power the financial aids that they are willing to give. They may do it by the regular course, of Estimates proposed to the House, on the initiation always of the Crown. The peculiar care which is thrown about the appropriations after the initial step has been taken by the Crown, is of great interest, and marks the strength and importance of the vital principle of control. These Estimates are submitted to the House, and each item becomes a resolution which has to be passed in committee. These resolutions have to be reported at another stage to the House, and finally concurred in. Even after that, formal resolutions have to be submitted and passed as a basis for a Bill of Supply, and then that Bill of Supply has to take its three formal stages, and go to the Senate, and be assented to by the Crown. All these guards, with the appropriate legislative pause between each step, is an attestation of the vitality of the principle of parliamentary control, and show us who come in after the struggle has been made, how strongly the responsibility rests upon us of maintaining intact that vital principle. Now, Sir, the Government may be given money for expenditure in another and more expeditious way. A credit may, on short notice and with few formalities, be granted to the Government for the expenditure of a certain sum, or an Address to the Crown may be passed, by which the Crown is authorized or asked to undertake a certain expenditure, with the assurance and guarantee that the Commons will stand at the back of the Executive so far as that appropriation is concerned. These three methods are the only parliamentary methods by which supply can be given to the Executive. Whilst Parliament is in session, there is no other possible way by which the Government of the country can get hold of one single cent of the consolidated funds for expenditure. But common sense also has its reign, and it is acknowledged that certain circumstances might arise which would render the application of the rule of parliamentary appropriation rather against the public interest than for it, on certain occasions and in certain emergencies. By statute a method is arranged and made legal whereby under certain circumstances and conditions, moneys other than those which have been appropriated by Parliament may be taken by the Executive and may be applied for certain expenditures. This cannot be done while Parliament is in session, and that it is important for us to remember in this discussion. There are certain conditions upon which, in accordance with the Act to which I have alluded, Governor General's warrants may issue; for that is the machinery, and the only machinery by which the Government can put its hand into the public treasury. At the beginning of the discussion I will read the clause in the Audit Act which gives that authority. It is this :

If, when Parliament is not in session, any accident happens to any public work or building which requires an immediate outlay for the repair thereof, or any other occasion arises when any expenditure not foreseen or provided for by Parliament is urgently and immediately required for the public good,—

These are the conditions precedent.

—then, upon the report of the Minister of Finance and Receiver General that there is no parliamentary provision, and of the Minister having charge of the service in question that the necessity is urgent,—

These are the conditions sequent, which never can have force and operate unless the conditions precedent have place.

—the Governor in Council may order a special warrant to be prepared, to be signed by the Governor General for the issue of the amount estimated to be required, which shall be placed by the Minister of Finance and Receiver General to a special account, against which cheques may issue from time to time, in the usual form, as they are required.

Now, as I have stated, there are in that Act two sets of conditions. The two which I have called the conditions precedent to any action whatever, are the two first quoted—that there shall be some accident to a public work or public building, the necessity for the urgent repair or replacement of which is, in the opinion of the Government, undoubted. For instance, suppose there is no parliamentary appropriation made by Parliament for any repair or extra work upon this parliamentary Chamber in which we are convened; and suppose that in the interim of the sessions a fire takes place, and this Chamber is partially or totally destroyed, and it is necessary that it shall be repaired or rebuilt for the approaching session of Parliament: then, in that case, the condition precedent is complied with, and a Governor General's warrant may issue, under the Act which I have quoted, for a sufficient sum of money to repair or replace this Chamber. If there is a public wharf, at which a large and important amount of business is transacted, and by a storm or other accident it is destroyed, and the conditions of trade and commerce make it, in the public interest, urgent that it shall be at once repaired or replaced; and, if there is no parliamentary appropriation, and the accident has not been foreseen: then, in that case, a Governor General's warrant may issue, and the work may be replaced or repaired. There is also a second condition precedent, and it is this: when any other occasion arises for an expenditure which is not foreseen or provided for by Parliament, and for which there is an urgent and immediate necessity. That forms the second condition precedent, and if that has place, then a Governor General's warrant may issue, under the terms of the Act which I have quoted. These are the two precedent conditions, and until these two conditions, or one of these conditions, is complied with, neither the Minister of a department or the Finance Minister has any right to take action with reference to the procurement of a Governor General's warrant. If one or other of these conditions precedent is complied with and has force, then the conditions sequent come in—that the Minister of the department shall, by report to Council, set forth the urgency of an appropriation—because he is to be the judge of that—and that the Finance Minister shall perform the formal duty of certifying that there is no appropriation provided. In that case, the report may be adopted by Council, and the Governor General may sign it, and the warrant will have executive force, and the expenditure may take place under it. I take it that there is not a single member in this House who disputes the accuracy, in the main, of the position I have taken so far with reference to this matter. Now I come to a most important matter, where a difference of opinion may occur, on the second condition precedent, as to what the Act really means. I leave that more especially for the legal gentlemen on both sides of the House to determine; but I still am obliged to take a common-sense view of the meaning of that second condition precedent. It has been argued that it means, not that the expenditure should be both unforeseen and unprovided for, but that it may be either unforeseen, in which case the second condition holds, or it may be simply unprovided for, in which case also the second condition holds. Two observations, I think, may be made upon that argument, if it be advanced. If that argument is a true and valid argument, we are face to face with two things: first, an evident surplusage in the Act itself; for, if the contention is true that all that is necessary to fulfil that condition is that the expenditure shall not have been provided for by Parliament, there was no necessity for putting in the words "not foreseen," because the words "not provided for" fulfil both conditions, whether it was not foreseen, or whether it was foreseen but still not provided for. It is a matter for discussion as to what the legal view may be; but certainly the argument may be taken. I think, and pressed to its full, that the surplusage exists, if we admit the contention that is sometimes made. But a graver consideration is this: that if that contention is true, estimation by the Government and appropriation by Parliament comes to be a complete farce and nullity, or may be made so at the will, or the wish, or the whim of the Government of the day. If, for instance, it is sufficient to say that an appropriation or an expenditure is simply unprovided for in the Estimates, then you get upon the range of a possibility which bears within it the germ of total extinction of appropriation by Parliament and Estimates submitted to Parliament for the sake of appropriations. I do not imagine that any gentleman on either side of the House, taking in the spirit of the Act, taking in the long struggle which resulted in the vital principle of parliamentary control being gained, and taking in the fact that this Act is given, not to nullify parliamentary control, but under certain grave and emergent conditions to allow the public service a little latitude for its fulfilment—I do not imagine. I say, that any person can look at these things and at the Act itself, and the purpose for which it was enacted, and argue seriously that any item that was simply unprovided for in the Estimates, may be expended by the mere will or whim of a Government, or the honest and well-reasoned opinion of a Government that it is necessary or that this fulfils the conditions precedent which are necessary to the issue of a Governor General's warrant. What I mean to say is this, and I call the attention of my hon. friend, the Solicitor General, to it. I read over to-day carefully his defence. There have been two defences given—that of my hon. friend and that of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). I read over the defence of my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), who is a lawyer, and who it would be supposed, would take the legal view and argue it closely; and I beg leave to say that I think the error he has fallen into is that he has taken the necessity for the appropriation to be a warrant for it. My own view is that the necessity is not the warrant for it. The warrant for it is the unforeseen nature of the expenditure; and if the expenditure has not been unforeseen, there is no necessity which can be shown that will suffice to fulfil the interpretation and intent of the law. The necessity is the secondary consideration, the unforeseen circumstance is the main and essential condition. Now, I need not go far from my hon. friend's side to bring that view of the case most strongly before this Parliament. I need not go farther than to read the opinion of one of the ablest lawyers that Canada has ever produced, who was the leader of the hon. gentlemen opposite as well, and who has given as his opinion, almost in the very words which I have put before the House to-day, that the necessity of the case cannot be called an argument for the issue of a Governor General's warrant, if the unforeseen circumstances be not an attendant and precedent condition. I want to give a little more emphasis, and I do it at the risk of repeating myself—to this view. I want to ask every representative of the people here, whose right it is to make and to control parliamentary appropriations, and whose bounden duty it is to guard that sacred right and keep it intact? I want to ask what may happen if we take the interpretation that simply because an expenditure is not provided for in the Estimates and appropriations, therefore, if it be necessary, it can be got by the use of Governor General's warrants. If so, what might happen? What might happen is that, that in any political emergency the Government of the day might not be disposed, at the time Parliament was in session, to ask for a certain appropriation, and consequently not have it approved, but, after Parliament had adjourned, take advantage of a Governor General's warrant, and on the ground that the expenditure had simply not been provided for by Parliament and was necessary, proceed by this way to make an appropriation which Parliament alone could make. And if in one case they could do that, they could do it in all cases, and they could go to the extent of nullifying entirely parliamentary control, the vital principle which has been gained after such long struggle and which should be sacredly kept intact by the representatives of the people in the interests of the people. Now, having laid down that, which I consider the correct view of the position, and which is, I hope, the view of all members of this House, I ask the House to consider what the position of hon. gentlemen opposite has been, both as to the principle and the practice which condition the use of the Governor General's warrants. I want to put the position of hon. gentlemen opposite, their reasoned opinions, their well-arrived at convictions, uttered again and again on the floor of this Parliament, and ask the House to consider whether or not these opinions tally with the sentiments and opinions which I have expressed so far with reference to this matter. First, let me go back to the year 1872, and quote the opinion of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, who was the strong man at that time of the Liberal party, and became its leader when he formed his government in 1874. He is reported—and it was quoted by my colleague the senior member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) in the debate the other day—in the "Globe" of July 6th, 1872, as having said:

The policy of the Liberal party is to make parliamentary government supreme, to place the Government directly under the control of Parliament, to take from them all power to use any portion of the people's money without a direct vote for such service.

That is the strong expression of the view of a former leader of the Liberal party upon the principle of parliamentary control. Now I come to the year 1887, when a debate arose in this House on Governor General's warrants, which debate was participated in by several gentlemen on the opposite side of the House at that time, most of whom are now either on the front benches opposite or supporting my hon. friends who sit on the Treasury benches. In the course of that debate, Sir Richard Cartwright said:

Now, I do not suppose that there is any member, young or old, in this House, who is not aware that it is a very cardinal principle, on which all parliamentary institutions hinge, that Ministers of the Crown and the Crown itself should not, under any pretext whatever, expend public money until that money has been voted by Parliament and until the reasons why the Crown asks for the money have been fully explained and discussed. To that rule there is but one exception, and that is very well defined under the statute under which these same Governor General's warrants are issued. In cases of public emergency, in cases of unforeseen expenditure, in cases where things arise which could not reasonably be foreseen or arranged for the several departments, then and in such cases, if Parliament be not in session, as the Act states, the Governor General's warrant may issue with certain formalities and under certain precautions and safeguards.

That statement derives additional force from the fact that the hon. gentleman was talking, as I am to-day, to a new House, and he prefaced his remarks by saying that it was important that, at the beginning of a new Parliament, these principles should be clearly defined and set forth. I find that Mr. Mills also took part in that discussion, and that he ended a fairly long and well-reasoned speech with these weighty words:

Not a dollar had they the right to take from the public treasury under the law, and every dollar which has been taken in that way has been a flagrant violation of the law.

Then I find that Mr. Davies, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, is reported as saying, in answer to the Minister of Finance:

He has said this was necessary and that was necessary. The point is not whether it might have been prudent for the House to vote the money. The point is that the Government, not recognizing the powers and limitations prescribed by the statute, have chosen to vote moneys by Order in Council which should only have been voted after having received the sanction of Parliament. Two things that must concur are—first, that the expenditure is unforeseen, and next, that it is urgently and immediately required. Has the Minister of Finance attempted to say that half one of these expenditures were urgently and immediately required?

And so he goes on with his argument. He says also, later on in his address :

I am glad that this new Parliament at its first meeting should take the opportunity of putting on record clearly and distinctly its views of this matter.

I next quote from Mr. Blake, who was then in the House. There came up a discussion on these warrants as to one Order in Council having been passed the day before Parliament met. It is odd, but it is still striking that the second Governor General's warrant issued by this Government is on an Order in Council of the day immediately preceding the day that Parliament met ; so that Mr. Blake's statement comes in apropos of the present discussion. He says :

It is a technical point to pass Orders in Council the day before Parliament meets in order to escape from the jurisdiction and control of Parliament as to the votes of money required.

He says further :

It is only in cases of urgent necessity, in which the public interest does really require an expenditure to be made, that, owing to certain circumstances beyond the control of Government, and which could not be foreseen in time to obtain parliamentary approval that this power of issuing special warrants ought to be used.

He says further :

But on what grounds does the Finance Minister justify it? In almost every case he confines himself to the statement that the money ought to be voted by us because the expenditure was a good and proper one. This would be a good reason, if true, for hon. gentlemen, when bringing down an estimate, to ask Parliament to pass it, but it is no reason for asking us to vote him this money which he has expended in this unauthorized way.

That bears upon the statement I made a little while ago that the mere fact of an expenditure being necessary does not justify its being made by Governor General's warrant. Later on Mr. Blake said :

If the public good required the immediate expenditure of such moneys, the duty of the hon. gentleman was at the earliest possible moment to have brought down a vote of credit to us, to have brought down a proposal to us to ask us to assent to the expenditure of money on the ground of the public urgency, and not to have waited for estimates, but to have said : We cannot wait for the estimates, but the public good requires that we should ask for this expenditure, and we ask you now and at once to grant this money for the public good ; but it does appear, and I repeat it, that this power is prostituted when, just on the eve of the meeting of Parliament, warrants for this large amount are issued, warrants for moneys which are not paid until long after the time of our meeting, warrants which were not issued at all until the date of our meeting.

Now, Sir, that applies with peculiar force to the warrant for $935,000 odd which was issued one day before this Parliament actually met. One day more and the Government would have been face to face with Parliament, and could have asked for a vote of credit, and would have got the vote of credit from this Parliament, and consequently had the least of all reasons for proceeding to the extreme of a Governor General's warrant, even if the conditions precedent had been in favour of its issue. I have one other authority to read from, and I read from this authority mainly because the hon. gentleman is now in the House. I refer to the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), who rose in his place and said, in that peculiar style to which we are so well accustomed, the style of the mentor of Parliament and the guardian of its sacred rights :

It is time that a stop was put to this expenditure of money without the consent of Parliament. We ought not to allow this system to go on, and it is no reason, when hon. gentlemen say their predecessors possibly violated the law in this matter, that we should go on and perpetrate the same wrong for years to come. We, as a new House and as new members, coming fresh from the country, should express our views and should let hon. gentlemen opposite, as well as hon. gentlemen on this side, understand that this is to be put a stop to.

That sentiment is good and wholesome. I hope it as good and wholesome to-day as it was in 1887, when my hon. friend so felicitously expressed his views to this House. Well, Sir, the subject of Governor General's warrants came up in 1891 on a motion made by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). And that motion was put to the vote. Certain expressions were made use of at that time which I propose to read. The first is by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce. After first affirming the correctness of the principle of parliamentary control, he proceeds to say that there are certain cases in which the executive can expend money by getting it through Governor General's warrants, and then he goes on to give his view of the circumstances under which alone this can be done. He says :

The exception to which I refer is defined in our Audit Act. Whenever any extraordinary accident occurs to a public work, or whenever some extraordinary event happens, which could not be reasonably foreseen and which required an outlay of public money under penalty of great injury to the public service, then under certain protections and provisions, which I will presently enumerate, the Governor General is allowed to issue his warrant, provided Parliament is not in session.

This is as plainly and as clearly expressed by a master of expression in English as it possibly can be, and it coincides exactly with the view I have been trying to express to the House. Later on he reads the section of the Act, and then goes on to illustrate its meaning. He says :

It is scarcely necessary for me to point out that the obvious meaning of this clause is, that when any occasion arises when any expenditure which cannot fairly be foreseen by the department or provided for by Parliament is urgently and immediately required, then and then only, is it intended that such a warrant should issue.

And the hon. gentleman goes on to appeal to the House. He says :

Both sides of the House ought to be at one upon this question, both sides of the House ought to feel, that whether they have confidence in the Ministry of the day or not, it is their duty as members of Parliament, it is their duty above all as members of the House of Commons, to insist that the Government do not put their hands into the treasury or use large sums of money without the previous sanction of Parliament. Unless that principle is laid down, unless that principle is enforced, it is obvious that it is utterly hopeless to have any proper control over the acts of Government.

I reiterate those words to-day, I reiterate them in the face of a new House of Commons, and I ask that members on both sides of the House entirely outside of their party predilections, take the view of this question which my hon. friend so strongly enforced at that time. He goes on later to say :

As I have said, this is a matter which does not concern one side of the House more than the other. This is a matter which goes to the root of all parliamentary control over Government expenditure. If you are going to allow our constitution, founded as it is on British practice and precedent, to be torn up in this fashion, if you are going to allow the Government to expend millions of public money without the slightest reference to Parliament in the fashion that I have now indicated, I say there is an end to all proper parliamentary control over Government expenditure.

Then the hon. gentleman ended with his resolution. Now, I want to call the attention of the House very clearly to what that resolution was. That resolution was a different resolution, and founded on a different set of circumstances, to the resolution which I propose to put before the House. The argument in 1891 was as to whether the Government had really foreseen the expenditure, and having foreseen it had neglected to provide for it ; but there was no question, so far as the contention of the Government went, that it was an expenditure which, either through not being foreseen by the department, or through neglect of officers of the department, had not been brought to the Minister's attention and to the Government's attention, and so it had not been submitted in the Estimates. The hon. gentleman's motion is directed to that side of the case, for his resolution ends in this way :

That no accident had occurred upon the said railroads, nor was there any reason whatever why said expenditure should not have been foreseen and provided for by Parliament. That under such circumstances the issue of a Governor General's warrant for the said sums was a gross abuse of the power vested in the Governor in Council under the said Act, and that the conduct of the Government in neglecting to apply to Parliament in due time for said sums, indicates great laxity of administration and deserves the censure of the House.

This motion was directed against the Government for laxity of administration, for neglect in foreseeing something which they ought to have foreseen, and the circumstances in that way are entirely different from the circumstances of to-day, where as we contend, there is no question as to whether these expenditures were foreseen or not; they were foreseen, and the House refused to grant them. Now, Sir, there was another gentleman who spoke on that occasion, that was my hon. friend who is now the Postmaster General, and who, when upon this side of the House, on sundry and several occasions, took it upon himself to speak very strongly on behalf of the people's rights, and against the action and practices of the Government. This is what he said in 1891 :

Sir, I think that the Government could not in any other way better manifest their indifference to the supreme power of the people than by taking their money without authority. There is no higher crime than an Administration can commit in a country such as Canada, where the people are supposed to control their own funds.

So much on the principle. The hon. gentleman also gave his interpretation of the Act, and I wish to call the attention of the House to it :

These warrants can only issue under certain circumstances, namely, where there has been an accident to a public work and that repair is necessary. That is not the case here—also where some unforeseen circumstance arises which is not before provided for, and which the public good demands shall be provided for.

The principle that he takes in expounding that Act is the very principle I have contended for—making "unforeseen circumstances" the basis for the issue of a Governor General's warrant, and not the necessity or reasonableness of the expenditure. He says :

The Act must mean that where a demand for some expenditure exists, and that with reasonable diligence the Government have not been able to anticipate that need, then the power of this Act may be invoked, but not until then.

This ends the quotations I am going to make from hon. gentleman's opinions with reference to the Governor General's warrants, with the exception of one which was expressed by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce. During the last Parliament, incidently the matter came up, and as reported on page 7162 of the "Hansard," of 1896, he says :

If the expenditure occurs for something unforeseen, you may ask a Governor General's warrant, but a Governor General's warrant ought not to be asked for under other circumstances. No expenditure should be incurred without the authority of Parliament.

Now, Sir, I have taken up that much time in laying before the House the opinions of hon. gentlemen opposite with reference to the issue of Governor General's warrants. I contend that the statements I have read from them, and the statements I have made myself, are exactly coterminous and of exactly equal import. They both lay down the vital necessity of keeping the principle of parliamentary control, and keeping it intact; they both agree that the nature of the circumstances should be as I have detailed, something that was unforeseen and not provided for, and that the mere necessity of an expenditure is not ground upon which a Governor General's warrant can be issued; and they agree in all their remarks in condemnation of a practice which contravenes and goes contrary to those well-understood and forcibly expressed principles which govern this matter.

I now come to inquire what was actually done by the present Government with the Governor General's warrants. Well, these are the facts of the case. On July 16, $1,067,567 were authorized by Governor General's warrants on the very day—and I ask the attention of Parliament to that—on the very day that Parliament had been called to meet for the prosecution of business. Again, on the 18th day of August, exactly one day previous to the time when Parliament actually did meet, a Governor General's warrant for $935,561 was issued, and certain other smaller warrants, bringing up to the whole the sum of $2,006,022. The next point that is to be noted is the purpose for which these warrants were issued. I have detailed the two conditions precedent. The first of these conditions does not hold at all in reference to the issue of these warrants. No accident to a public work or to any public building that required to be urgently repaired or renewed called for the use of these Governor General's warrants. We are all at one upon that point. The Governor General's warrants were issued to pay departmental salaries and contingencies, a class of expenditures that are always foreseen and are always provided by the Parliament of one year for the service of the year which is to succeed that session of Parliament. So that every one of those expenditures which were authorized under those Governor General's warrants were not only foreseen by the Government, but they were actually brought down in the Estimates to Parliament, they were recommended by the Governor General, they were asked for at the hands of Parliament and every member of Parliament knew exactly seven or eight months ago, what they were, knew they were necessary, that they were asked for and were not granted by Parliament. They therefore did not come under the category of expenditures which were unforeseen and unprovided. They were foreseen; we tried to provide for them. Parliament in the exercise of its good pleasure, mainly through the power of the Opposition, said they would not grant them; but that does not take away in the least from that fact that they were foreseen that an effort was made to provide for them, and that Parliament said it would not provide for them. That gives no warrant to an incoming Government to get those moneys in any other way than at the vote and at the will of Parliament; and I think hon. gentlemen are all the more bound to come to Parliament—if they could be more bound—because Parliament had already had these estimates before it, had been asked to grant them and had not passed the appropriations. What more Sir? I wish to call attention to the fact that there was ample time in which those appropriations could have been granted, and granted for the services for which those Governor General's warrants were finally issued. I wish to say that over and over again the House was asked to go into Supply, that it sometimes did go into Supply and succeeded in passing some items; that when the whole year's expenditures were refused the proposition was submitted to the then leader of the Opposition and the hon. gentleman who is now Minister of Trade and Commerce, that the then Government should at least take six months' supplies, or if the hon. gentleman did not agree to that we should obtain three months or even two months' supplies, so as to avoid the necessity and expense of holding an extra session of Parliament, and to preclude all necessity of the trouble that civil servants and employees would be put to from the non-payment of their salaries at the end of the month. There is more than that. If we were to grant for a single moment, which we cannot do, that the first Governor General's warrant might have been properly issued, what have we to say with respect to the second Governor General's warrant, which was issued with haste one day before this House of Commons came together, when it was to be asked by the Government to vote the necessary expenditures for the year. Those salaries are paid, few of them before the middle of the month, some of them not until the end of the month, and if we take this list as scheduled, I think we will find that the larger proportion of that money was not payable until the end of the month; that on 18th August, Parliament met, and although hon. gentlemen opposite were not called on to expend a large proportion of this money until the last of August, with haste, which I will not characterize as indecent, but I will characterize as imprudent, hon. gentlemen opposite to forestall the House of Commons and Parliament, placed

$1,000,000 in the hands of the Executive, every dollar of which would be expended after Parliament was in session. But there is something stronger than that, which shows the utter disregard which hon. gentlemen opposite have displayed in this matter with respect to Governor General's warrants. Who signed the application for the Governor General's warrants, and whose word as a Minister of the Crown was it stated that all this money was urgently and immediately required, when the Act states that even when these conditions precedent are fulfilled, there must also be this, that the money is urgently and immediately required? I ask who signed the application for the Governor General's warrant for the sum of $7,000, and who passed it through, when it stated that it was for salaries for the Printing Bureau for the month of September, 1896, after Parliament had been in session, during which there could not be any expenditure of money for cause either urgent or immediate, when in fact supply had to be passed by Parliament before a single dollar could be expended? And yet we have a Governor General's warrant for what was not urgently needed, but for which provision was made, although Parliament was in session for a whole month or thereabouts in advance. That I suppose must have been done by the Secretary of State: but I cannot exactly make it out from the details. Certainly the Secretary of State and the whole Cabinet are responsible for it. I think it is a grave matter, not so much from the amount of money involved, which is only $7,000, but if in a matter of $7,000 the Government is prepared one month before the money is required to declare that such money is immediately and urgently required and pass a Governor General's warrant therefor, with Parliament called and coming into session immediately, it is an indication of the principle on which they have acted and the principle and practice which they may carry out in larger and greater matters. I desire to call the attention of the House to one more point. Those expenditures, as I have stated, were expenditures which were foreseen in February of last year and even in January, the appropriations for which were brought down before the House last January, and which the House was repeatedly asked to pass and refused to pass. What was the reason why those votes were not passed during the last session of Parliament? I want to call the attention of the House to the principle on which this action with respect to Governor General's warrants must, if we are logical, be based. The principle on which hon. gentlemen appear to have based their action in respect to this matter is that party tactics and party convenience afford a sufficient reason for violating the law and having recourse to Governor General's warrants. Why did the hon. gentlemen last year refuse to grant the ordinary supplies for six months, three months or two months? They, upon their own declaration in debate last year and even this year, did not take that course, because they believed it would not be their party advantage, and so they took on themselves the responsibility of refusing to grant those appropriations which might easily have been passed. Then again if Parliament had met on 16th July, the period for which it was called, a credit would have been obtained for all the expenditures contemplated under the Governor General's warrant, because Parliament was called to meet on the 16th, it might have met on that date, I think it would have met on that day, and a vote would have been obtained for all those salaries, and recourse would not have been necessary to Governor General's warrants. Why did not the House meet on the 16th day of July? There is no reason, except the reason that it was not for the advantage or convenience of a political party. But, the convenience or advantage of a party can hardly be a valid excuse for postponing Parliament and putting hon. gentlemen of the Government in the position of having to take hold of Governor General's warrants for expenditures which might have been voted by Parliament if it had met at the proper time. Then in the second place, when Parliament actually did meet on the 19th of August, and where a warrant was issued on the 18th, I have already elucidated that. There was no necessity for a Governor General's warrant then even if the precedent conditions had justified it. The deduction that we must take from this, is simply, that the party opposite, looking to its own interest and in pursuit of its own tactics, thought it best to refuse supplies last session, and I submit again that although party tactics are perfectly legitimate, they ought not to be made an excuse for action which is illegal and against the great principle of parliamentary control with reference to expenditure.

Now, I want for a few moments to notice the defences which have been made by the only two gentlemen who have yet attempted to defend the course of the Government in this matter. An attempted defence was made by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) and his reasons for justifying the action of the Government divided themselves into two categories. One reason was, the alleged faults of the late Government as appearing to the party with which he is identified, and which must be taken with a grain of salt as being faults, because they were only faults in the opinion of a party which was opposed to the Government and its policy at that time. The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) does not pretend to defend the issue of Governor General's warrants on the merits of the case. He says, that we had no right to hold a sixth session of Parliament, that usage was violated by doing so, and that the holding of a sixth session was an indecent clinging on to office and power. In the opinion of my hon. friend that may be his conviction, but I submit again, that that is no ground upon which to base the refusal of supplies, or even if it be a good ground, it is no ground for the incoming Government to issue Governor General's warrants in lieu of the appropriation of supplies by a Parliament which has been called and which could be asked for these supplies. But had we not a right to hold the sixth session? It is within the legal terms and limits of the law. The only compact that is made by a government or by the people's representatives when they are given the mandate of representation, is, that they shall continue to perform the duties which devolve upon representatives in Parliament, during the legal time which Parliament has to live. If Parliament does not transgress that legal limit, it is a mere question of opinion as to whether it shall dissolve one year, or two years, before the legal limit expires, or whether it shall be continued on to the end of that limit. That is certainly not a valid argument. The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) told us again, that the late Parliament did not represent the people and had no right to ask for supplies. That is a mere supposition of the hon. gentleman. He had no certain or absolute ground at that time for stating that the Government did not represent the people. At the best it was a mere calculation of what he considered to be the chances; but it is absolutely no reason why supplies should not be granted. Sir, if his contention, that we did not represent the people in 1896, was a good reason for not granting supplies, was it not equally as good a reason in 1895? The hon. gentleman might have urged it then and refused supplies, but he did not do so. And last year, if it were thought proper by hon. gentlemen then in opposition not to grant supplies, it was certainly not a reason why they should have had recourse to Governor General's warrants. The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright), also gave as a reason, that we might have sat in power longer. My hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) went further, and he said, that the reason why supplies were not granted was because he feared, and his party feared, that if supplies were granted we would use them for corrupt purposes. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) has a logical mind, and he must know very well that that was no ground at all for refusing supplies, and it was the least possible ground for refusing the kind of supplies that were asked for. My hon. friend knows well enough that the kind of supplies which are provided by these Governor General's warrants—and which I asked for at last session, and was willing to take for two or three or six months—are supplies which are under the absolute control of the law and the Auditor General. It is not within the power of the Government of the day to use them for corrupt purposes, even though they had the wish or the desire to do so. Therefore that argument falls to the ground.

Then my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) gave the last and worst reason, as to why we were not granted supplies last year. That was, as he told us: because we bungled in matters of legislation, because in his opinion, our policy upon the Manitoba school question was not what it ought to have been. The Government of the day is in the judgment of the country as to whether these measures are proper or not. It is responsible to the country for them, and although an Opposition may have the most decided views as to whether these measures are wise or not; this is the first time that I have heard it put forward seriously, as ground for the refusal of supplies by Parliament, and for the extraordinary course of obtaining them by Governor General's warrants. Now, Sir, the second set of reasons put forth by the hon. gentleman are on the ground of necessity. He says: "We did not expend anything that was not actually necessary." He says: "We did not expend anything that you did not estimate for." He says: "We did not expend anything corruptly or wrongly." Grant all these things, and I simply place before my hon. friend the irresistible reply of his former leader, Mr. Edward Blake, that the necessity or the prudence of an expenditure has nothing at all to do with the issue of a Governor General's warrant, unless the precedent conditions which we have discussed are met and fully satisfied; and thus falls the only defence which has been offered by hon. gentlemen opposite for their peculiar course in dealing with the Governor General's warrant.

Now, Sir, I stated to this House when I commenced, that I did not propose to do more than open the subject to the House, in as fair and argumentative way as I could, and I appeal to hon. members on both sides of the House to look at the practice which has been introduced, and to say whether they think it is right and wise or not. As I said at first, it is the duty of every representative sitting in this House, no matter what his party views may be, to guard jealously the principle of parliamentary control, which is the outcome of centuries of struggle, which is essential to good and responsible government, and which we cannot allow to be violated and go back to our constituents and tell them that we have performed our duty. The question is not introduced with any other wish than to prevent the growth of a method of getting appropriations by what I must call a usurpation of power by the Executive, such as has commenced within a few weeks of the accession to power of a new Liberal Government; because if that usurpation is condoned in this case, you give the Government a warrant in the future to nullify the power of this Parliament over appropriations, and you strike a blow at the principle of parliamentary government. This is a case in which we ought to take into view the consequences of our decision. I am sorry these Governor General's warrants have been used. Applying the argument ad hominem, supposing that last session, when supplies were refused to me as Finance Minister by my hon. friends opposite, I had turned round and said to the Opposition: Well, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentlemen refuse us these supplies; let them refuse them; on the 1st day of July, if we are in power, we will take Governor General's warrants for these, and we will call the House together when we please. I ask my hon. friend what would have been his attitude if I had made that statement to him? What else has he done? He has taken that very position and in these Governor General's warrants, which he has issued, he has carried out the exact line which I would have enunciated if I had made that statement to the Opposition at that time. No, Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary control is the vital point. The unforeseen character of the expenditures is the condition precedent to the Governor General's warrants being issued. If hon. gentlemen are excused in the case of these warrants, they could, Sir, have prorogued Parliament from the 19th day of August to the 19th day of September, and taken another Governor General's warrant if it had suited the party convenience; they could have prorogued Parliament until the 19th day of October, and taken another Governor General's warrant; they could have gone on until January; they could have gone on until they were brought up by the statute which makes it necessary that Parliament shall meet at least once every year. You must look at the consequences which follow on the line which has been adopted; and if one step is allowed—and by parity of reasoning, the second step may be taken on the same principle—it is time that this House, without taking into account party predilection, should make its voice known with regard to a principle so important and so vital, a principle in which the people of this country are most interested at this present moment. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to move:

That all the words after the word "That" be left out, and the following added instead thereof:—"the sixth session of the Seventh Parliament met on January 2nd, 1896, and on the 27th day of the same month the Government submitted His Excellency's Message transmitting the Estimates for the year 1896-7, which were forthwith referred to the Committee of Supply.

That these Estimates provided appropriations for the foreseen and necessary salaries and contingencies of the several departments of Government and for the maintenance and construction of public works and for other services.

That on the 28th of January the House was asked to go into Committee of the Whole for granting supply, and to consider first the appropriations for departmental salaries and contingencies.

That neither then nor on the several occasions thereafter when the House was asked to grant supply did the Opposition agree thereto.

That appeals were made by the Government setting forth the urgent necessity for making provision for the ordinary and regular expenditures for the approaching fiscal year, or in view of the impending dissolution and of the fact that the new Parliament could not possibly assemble before July 1st and would probably meet shortly thereafter, for a part thereof.

That despite these representations and although the circumstances were well known and there was ample time at the disposal of the House, supplies for the year 1896-7 were refused and Parliament rose on the 23rd day of April without these supplies being granted.

That Parliament was dissolved and a new Parliament was summoned to meet for the despatch of business upon the 16th day of July, 1896.

That the Government resigned office on the 10th day of July, 1896, and the Hon. Wilfred Laurier was called upon by His Excellency to form an Administration which he undertook to do.

That thereafter, Parliament was on the 13th day of July, 1896, prorogued to meet for the despatch of business on the 19th day of August, 1896.

That by chapter 29, 49 Victoria, R. S. C., the Governor General in Council is empowered to issue special warrants authorizing the payment of money not previously voted by Parliament under the following circumstances only, to wit:—

'If when Parliament is not in session, any accident happens to any public work or building which requires an immediate outlay for the repairs thereof, or any other occasion arises when any expenditure not foreseen or provided for by Parliament is urgently and immediately required for the public good, then upon the report of the Minister of Finance and Receiver General that there is no parliamentary provision, and of the Minister having charge of the service in question, that the necessity is urgent, the Governor in Council may order a special warrant to be prepared, to be signed by the Governor General for the issue of the amount estimated to be required.'

That on the 16th day of July, 1896—the date when Parliament had been summoned to meet for the despatch of business—His Excellency was advised to issue his warrant for the expenditure of $1,067,576 for departmental salaries and contingencies, and on August 18th—one day before the actual meeting of Parliament—was again advised to issue his warrant for $935,561 for similar expenditures, and that these warrants did issue and the sums named were accordingly placed at the disposal of the department.

That these amounts were not called for by any accident to any public work or building, nor were they required for any expenditures which had not been foreseen, and which could not have been provided for, but were used to pay ordinary salaries and contingencies, for which Parliament had been asked to provide, and which had been refused by the House of Commons.

That, under these circumstances, this House is of the opinion that the issue of the said warrants was in contravention of the well understood principles of parliamentary control, an abuse of the powers vested in the Governor General in Council by the said Act, and a usurpation fraught with danger to public liberty and constitutional government."

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Mr. Speaker, I do not at all regret that the hon. gentleman from York (Mr. Foster) has brought this question under the notice of the House. I am quite in accord with him on one point, that this is a matter of extremely great importance. And I admit frankly that the present Government assumed a grave responsibility, for which they may be rightly called to account before this House, in issuing the Governor General's warrants which they did on the two dates the hon. gentleman has referred to. I do not at all desire, for my part, to minimize the responsibility we undertook; but I shall be prepared, I think, to show to the House that there were very good reasons indeed why we should incur that responsibility, and that we would have been in a high degree recreant to our duty as guardians of the public weal if we had failed to incur it. Now, it is not my intention on the present occasion to indulge in any mere recriminations with the hon. gentleman. Were I disposed to do so, I could show that he and his colleagues and his predecessors had, over and over again, violated all the provisions of the Act under which Governor General's warrants have been issued, in every possible respect, and that they had on several occasions issued a number of Governor General's warrants on the day before Parliament met. If the hon. gentleman challenges that statement I can give him the proof; if he does not challenge it, I simply call it to his attention and the attention of the House. Not that I intend to allege that it would be a justification for us if we could show that our predecessors and opponents had done the same as we have done or done worse, but simply to point out to the House that these gentlemen who are now, at long last, learning from us certain constitutional maxims, during the eighteen years that they held office most assuredly paid little attention to the doctrines the hon. gentleman has laid down. And, by the way, it is noteworthy that he did not quote one single declaration in support of his argument from any hon. gentleman on that side of the House; all his arguments—good arguments, so far forth, they were—were derived from statements and speeches of myself, Mr. Edward Blake, Mr. David Mills, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies), my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), and others, at whose feet I am glad to see the hon. gentleman is content to sit for the purpose of acquiring a knowledge of true and sound constitutional principles. Now, Sir, this is pre-eminently a case in which one ounce of common sense, which the hon. gentleman often refers to, is worth a whole ton of precedents. I am not in the slightest degree disposed to disparage or deny the value or importance of precedents, particularly in matters of constitutional usage. The only trouble is this, Sir: that precedents are good—and I call the attention of the hon. member for York to this—only when they are on all fours with the case under consideration. The trouble is that they are very seldom on all fours, as every lawyer knows and as everybody who has had to pay legal fees knows also. I fancy. There have been two totally different questions raised in connection with this matter, and to these I shall refer. But first I will call attention to one or two remarks of the hon. gentleman. The House will note that the hon. gentleman made one admission of some importance, as I shall show in the future discussion of this question. He admitted that the Governor General's warrants were the only machinery at our disposal by which money can be raised, except through grants obtained in the regular way by Estimates or votes of credit. He admits, therefore, that, under the circumstances, we used the only means at our disposal; and, as I proceed, the House will see that this is a material point in the discussion of the case. Although I shall imitate the hon. gentleman, and will not dwell very much on the legal aspect of the case, I will just call his attention and the attention of the House to a statement which lay at the foundation of a great deal of the hon. gentleman's argument.

The hon. gentleman says that here are two cases only in which, according to him, Governor General's warrants can issue, and as to one of these there is no dispute. But in point of fact there are three cases. One case is that of accidents occurring to public works from any cause whereby an expenditure is required in the public good. The second case is the case in which any expenditure, not foreseen by Parliament, is urgently and immediately required for the public good. But, Sir, I think, as the English language goes, I am warranted in pointing out to him that there is a third case, and that is the case we are now considering: "when any expenditure not provided for by Parliament is urgently and immediately required for the public good." The hon. gentleman talks of the words "or provided for" being an utter surplusage; he talks as if they had no meaning and no place in that Act, and undoubtedly, if his construction of the Act is correct, the words "or provided" are mere surplusage and have no business in this Act at all. Now, Sir, I am speaking here simply of the extreme legal and technical construction which may fairly be put upon this clause, and I believe if the construction that I now point out to be correct, then this clause, read in this way, will make good sense, and I think it is a maxim of law that if you can make an Act of Parliament read sensibly all through, you are bound to do it. Judges, I believe, have occasionally found that very difficult, but I think it is a maxim of law, and my hon. friend will agree with me, that any words that occur in an Act of Parliament must be so read as to give them force, and not as being mere surplusage. I think that is a legal maxim which most of my legal friends have often asserted, and won't deny, and I think it is also a matter of common sense. Now, Sir, there are these three cases. You take out the words "foreseen or," and you get a perfectly sensible declaration; you take out the words "or provided for," and you get a perfectly sensible declaration. When you have got the words "not foreseen or provided for"—and I contend that is a matter of legal construction—there are not the two cases, as declared by the hon. gentleman, but three cases, one, I repeat, the case of an accident, as to which we are all agreed; and another, the case of things which are not foreseen; and the third, the case of things which are not provided for, but which, in the words of this Act must be provided for in order to prevent great injury to the public weal. That is the condition to be added to it, undoubtedly. More than that, whenever a Government on its responsibility undertakes to put that construction upon it, that Government is bound by law, in a very short time, three days, I think, after Parliament meets, to submit to the House what it has done, to stand and demand just such a scrutiny and investigation as the hon. gentleman has properly enough subjected us to and of which I do not in the slightest degree complain. Sir, the hon. gentleman remarked truly enough that these Governor General's warrants had not been necessitated by any accident to any public buildings. That is quite true, the accident was an accident to the late Government.

Mr. FOSTER. You admit, then, that we would not abuse that power.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Not in the slightest degree do I admit what you would not have done. I admit in the frankest possible fashion that the hon. gentleman would not have had a scintilla of right to do it, having reference to the antecedent circumstances which have brought us into the position in which we now stand, which were owing to his conduct from the second day, or the fourth day, of January outwards. Now, I want to call the attention of my hon. friends to these facts. There are two totally different questions raised by the hon. gentleman in this discussion. The first is the question: Who are to blame, after all said and done, for the position in which we found ourselves, and the country found itself, on or about the middle of July last? That is a matter on which I have no doubt there will be considerable difference of opinion; but I think the opinion of the majority of this House, and I know the opinion of the majority of the people of this country, will be that the hon. gentleman and his colleagues were pre-eminently and emphatically the people to blame for deliberately and with knowledge bringing about a state of things which rendered it necessary to have recourse to what I describe and what he described properly enough, as very extraordinary expedients to avoid a grave public injury. Now, Sir, that is one side of the case, as to which I will say a little more by and by. In regard to the other side of the case, I will depart from its legal aspect, I will simply deal with it as plain, common sense business men in this country will deal with it. Without reference to the constitutional pedantries and cobwebs with which it is exceedingly easy to envelop a question of this sort, Sir, I want to ask the hon. gentleman for a moment this question: Waiving for a moment, and granting that we were to blame, for argument's sake, if he likes, granting, as we allege, that he was to blame, what was to be done under these circumstances? What was, in the interest of the people of Canada, best to do—because that, after all, is the controlling and determining factor in this matter. Now, what did the Government do? The hon. gentleman knows that we have met this Parliament at the earliest possible moment that we could; we met it before all our colleagues had been re-elected, we met it with our ranks partly filled; we certainly lost no time whatever in calling Parliament together, and the hon. gentleman cannot pretend that we did. Nevertheless, with all our exertions, after all our efforts, two whole months, speaking in a fiscal sense, had practically gone by, and in all human probability it would have been three whole months before it would be possible for us, under the ordinary machinery of Government, to obtain supplies, whether we got them by vote of credit or whether we got them by estimates; and I think we know enough for the hon. gentlemen to know this, that if we had come down with a proposition for a vote of credit, long, long indeed would have been the discussions with which they would have honoured us before they would have seen their way to put a vote of credit in our hands. Now, Sir, let us consider this matter as business men would consider it. Remember that the Government of Canada are at this present moment common carriers on a very large scale. The Government of Canada own, and control, and administer, I think, about a thousand miles of railway; they own, and control, and administer the entire canal system of this country. They are responsible for the management of the entire postal service. We have got a small permanent military force which has to be provided for. Now, I want to know what the hon. gentleman would have advised us to do. Would he have advised us to shut up our canals? Would he have advised us to shut up our railways? Would he have advised us to disband our permanent force? Would he have advised us to dispense with the postal service, so far, I say, as the employees who earned their bread by their daily labour are concerned?

Mr. FOSTER. No; I would have advised you to call Parliament together, not to shut up anything.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I call the attention of the House to that remark, Mr. Speaker, from those hon. gentlemen who stayed in office until the guns were fired from Nepean Point; from those hon. gentlemen who, after that, with the full knowledge that just such exigencies would occur, waited two whole months before they held the election, and who did not call a meeting of Parliament until the middle of the month of July, with the full knowledge that if they were defeated, several weeks must elapse before a new Government could be formed. The hon. gentleman has said just what I wanted him to say, what I thought he would say; and having said it, I think he has shown as clearly as mortal man can show, how utterly impossible it was for us to take any other course than that we did take, Sir, I want to ask any business man in this House: Do you suppose that you could have kept the Intercolonial Railway running for three months, or even for two, without paying the brakemen, the conductors, and all the other employees on it? Could you have kept your canals going, and not have paid your lockmen? Could you have kept the Post Office Department in proper operation without paying your messengers? It might be true, and I make the hon. gentleman a present of that suggestion, that the civil servants in Ottawa might have contrived to borrow at very usurious rates, enough to keep them going from day to day, and from month to month; but most assuredly the classes of men that I refer to have no alternative: if we did not pay them, the work must have stopped. Was the hon. gentleman prepared to advise that we should do that? and if he is not so prepared, then his whole case is ended, because he has admitted that he cannot show any other way of dealing with the difficulty, one of an extraordinary character, where ordinary rules failed. This is not a question of precedent; it is one commonly called "casus improvisus." Let me ask this question: Had we not asked for a Governor General's warrant, what course would the hon. gentleman have recommended to be pursued? It would have been practicable, as the hon. gentleman is well aware, to have obtained from our monetary institutions the necessary advances as regards supplies. Would the hon. gentleman, when he learned that we had borrowed for the purposes of the public service in this hidden way one or two millions for the purpose of averting disaster, have commended our action, instead of having recourse to Governor General's warrants?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

The hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) is evidently not disposed to answer this question. Of those two alternatives I leave it to the House, the country and to the common sense of every reasonable man to say which is the better, the more straightforward and the more honourable course. Had we done so—and we might have done it without my hon. friend in Parliament getting at it by making motions—we would have been tampering with the true essence and principle of the constitution, rather than by availing ourselves of what the hon. gentleman himself declared, a little while ago, was the only machinery for obtaining money for those purposes. Passing over, for the moment, the question of the strictly literal construction of the Act, let us consider what is perhaps more important, the spirit of the Act, that extraordinary power granted to His Excellency, under certain restrictions, for the purpose of meeting grave emergencies, that extraordinary power provided. I contend, for cases which could not have been foreseen; and I am bound to say, in one important respect, this case could not have been foreseen, because I do not believe it ever entered into the mind of any man professing to be a constitutional authority, to expect that a Parliament of Canada would sit up to the very day of its dissolution and expire by efflux of time, the Ministers knowing perfectly well that by doing so they would be likely to incur great embarrassment and cause a very difficult state of things to arise unless Parliament should be called together by 1st July. The hon. gentleman, with the exception of one trifling matter of $7,000 granted to the Queen's Printer's Office, did not state—and that is a matter of some importance—we had used this power wantonly for anything not really required. I admit that if the hon. gentleman has stated the facts correctly, an error appears to have been made in that particular case; but I believe that case was discovered almost immediately it was done, and that no payments had been made out of the warrant, and could not be made.

Mr. FOSTER. They could not be made.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I do not, in the slightest degree, desire in any shape or way to defend the use of those warrants for any purpose that necessity does not require, and if, in looking over the matter, the hon. gentleman was able to show any other case of a similar kind, no doubt the Finance Minister would be perfectly ready and perfectly willing to see to it that none of those moneys should be expended under such conditions. I should like to call the attention of the House to a certain statement which was laid on the Table of the House by my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Fielding). I find that, up to 31st August, 1896, we had expended a total sum of $3,268,000. I find—what is also a little significant—that up to 31st August, 1895, the late Government expended $3,900,- 000 ; that is to say, they found it necessary to spend about $640,000 more than we did. I am not attaching any blame to hon. gentlemen opposite for that expenditure. But the House will see in those two facts to which I call attention, there is proof that we did not unnecessarily have recourse to this extraordinary means for avoiding a great public disaster, and that we were exceedingly careful not to go an inch beyond what the necessities of the case required. Sir, of the $3,900,000 spent by hon. gentlemen opposite, and of the $3,268,000 spent by us, more than $2,250,000 were statutory expenditures, for which the authority of Parliament was not required. Of the rest, $1,700,000 expended by them, as against $1,000,000 spent by us. I find, on looking into the details, that $710,000 were required for railways and canals and post offices ; $90,000 for customs and excise, which also could not be dispensed with, if we were to collect any revenue ; and $170,000 or $150,000 for civil government. It is perfectly clear to any man who can understand what these figures mean, that absolutely nothing outside of railways, canals and civil post offices and civil government, has been spent by us beyond the statutory requirements—of course. I do not mean that a few hundred dollars might not be spent for other purposes—and that is very good and clear evidence that, up to the present date, nothing has been expended beyond what those imperative necessities of which I have spoken, required.

Mr. FOSTER. Did the hon. gentleman mean to institute a comparison between the expenditure of last year and this year, up to a certain date ? My hon. friend knows quite well that it is an unfair comparison, because last year the Government were in possession of all the supplies, and this year hon. gentlemen opposite are not.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The hon. gentleman has entirely mistaken the point. I am not complaining that he and his colleagues spent $3,900,000—I dare say they were perfectly right in doing so—but, when we have only spent $3,268,000, and of that sum $2,250,000 were statutory expenditures, it affords tolerably clear proof that we were exceedingly careful in all our expenditures.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think the hon. gentleman's comparison holds. If the hon. gentleman had been in full possession of the Estimates for 1st July, this year, as we were last year, does he pretend to contend that those expenditures would have been as small ?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. What must I do to explain this matter to the hon. gentleman, for he is not usually obtuse ? I was pointing to the fact that we have spent very much less than the ordinary sum which hon. gentlemen opposite spent last year, and that is tolerably clear evidence that we have not been improperly using Governor General's warrants. Does the hon. gentleman wish any further explanations—for I do not want to be obliged to go over it in French, Gaelic and English.

An hon. MEMBER. State it in French.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. And now, Sir, a word or two remains to be said as to who, after all said and done, are the parties who are really responsible for this position of things. Mind, Sir, I admit we take the full responsibility of having availed ourselves of the strict legal construction of the law in order to enable us to meet the overwhelming public necessity I described. We accept the full responsibility. If our friends here, after they have heard our explanation, think we have done wrong, think that we ought to have stopped the canal service, stopped the post office, stopped the railway service of the country, in place of using a Governor General's warrant, we know our duty and we will bow to the opinion of the House in that matter.

Mr. LISTER. You were dead right.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. When we consider the question, who are the parties primarily and directly and absolutely responsible for this state of things, we must go back to that unfortunate epoch of the 2nd of January. I have got to point out to hon. gentlemen opposite, that this position of things is a direct and plain result of their own exceeding misconduct. The House met on the 2nd January last, but when was the Budget brought down ? The Estimates were brought down on the 27th of January, and I think the Budget Speech was made somewhere about the 1st of February, more or less. Why under the circumstances was that month thrown away ? Knowing as they did that time was of the essence of the contract ; knowing that do all they could it would tax their utmost ingenuity to get their estimates under the Remedial Bill through, why was it they wasted the whole of the time from the 2nd of January to the 1st of February ? Sir, I will not pursue this displeasing theme other than to say, that men who so conducted themselves, men who were solely responsible for that profligate waste of public time and money, ought be very cautious indeed when they cast stones at the men who have been called upon to rectify the effects of their folly and culpability. I will not gainsay the position of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), that he had strict technical legal right to hold this House in session up to the 23rd of April. But, Sir, all students of English history, all students of constitutional law, know that there are an enormous number of powers, vested in Her Majesty for example, which powers are extraordinary powers, and which powers practically are never exercised and ought never be exercised. Among these, I contend, is the pretension of the Government of the country to hold Parliament in session under such circumstances as existed in the early part of 1896. Sir, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) says, that he had a right to assume that the late Government represented the people then. Well, as a mere mathematical fact, he and his friends were elected on lists eight years old, and they knew they could not and did not represent the people at that particular time. This is one among many reasons why it is extremely inexpedient that the House of Commons should be kept sitting for five years and three months, when the well understood custom of our people is that no Parliament sit for more than five years. More than that; these gentlemen were responsible for the good government of the country while they occupied seats on the Treasury benches. They knew perfectly well long before the first of April, that there was not the ghost of a chance of their getting their Remedial Bill through under any conceivable conditions of things. They knew perfectly well that there was not a ghost of a chance of their getting their Estimates through. They knew perfectly well when the fiscal year expired on the 1st of July, that they could not get supplies as they had lost control of the Parliament. What would honourable men have done in such a case? What would men imbued with the spirit of British usage and precedent have done? Why, Sir, they would have dissolved the Parliament they could not control, and found out whether or not they did enjoy the confidence of the people of Canada. More than that, they would have taken care to have dissolved in such time that they might have had their election early in May, and met early in June at the very latest in order that Parliament might deal with the questions which it was clearly impossible for Parliament to have dealt with at the time I have referred to. That is not a question of opinion. That is a matter of fact recorded over and over again in our "Hansard." The motion of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) shows the truth of one part of my assertion, although he does not tell in it—perhaps he has good reasons—what they were about from the 2nd of January until the 27th of January. Sir, the hon. gentleman puts in another plea, and if I am not mistaken, he repeats in this document. He declares: So lost were the Opposition to all sense of duty and shame, that the Opposition, under the circumstances I have detailed, would not give the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) and his friends three months' or six months' further leave to employ themselves as to them might seem best, after they had lost the confidence of the people of the country. Does the hon. gentleman think that the members of the then Opposition were fools? Does he think that we had been blind to the little devices and tactics by which these hon. gentlemen had maintained themselves in power? Does he think that we did not know what kind of pranks and tricks might and in all human probability would have been practised, if these gentlemen had had six months' Estimates and had not required to meet Parliament until the year 1897? Sir, we knew our duty, and we did it. It was our duty not to allow these gentlemen, under such circumstances, to get the Estimates. They had no right, according to English constitutional usage, to ask for any considerable grant of money. If our experience of these gentlemen had been such as to have entitled us, as public men, to have trusted them entirely, we might have granted supplies for four weeks, or six weeks even; but I am bound to tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) that the circumstances which occurred in the last Parliament, beginning with the notable events of the session of 1891, and going on to the still more notable events of 1896, when that band of brothers made the remarkable exhibition they did on the floor of this House—these events, I say, were not of a kind calculated to inspire us to have confidence in their virtue, or their patriotism, or their loyalty, to each other, at least, or any other of these virtues which it is desirable that members of a Cabinet should possess.

Now, Sir, for all these reasons—not basing myself alone on the strict legal aspect of the case, although I think, if hon. gentlemen will look carefully into the statute, they will see that my contention is the only one that will make sense of it, and that, if you object to it, then these words "or provided" ought to have been struck out—but not basing myself on that, and basing myself on the plain fact that there was an emergency under which public interests were exposed to great danger, that this emergency had been brought about by no fault of this Government, that this Government were ready and willing to meet Parliament at the earliest possible moment they could, but that this emergency had been brought about by the deliberate failure to do their duty by these hon. gentlemen opposite, when they conducted the affairs of Canada. Sir, under these circumstances, I would not be afraid to appeal to the members of this House; I would not be afraid to appeal to the honest men, and particularly to the business men, of any single constituency in Canada. I believe, Sir, that they will declare, as some of them who have been consulted have already declared, that under the circumstances—not in the least degree to establish this as a precedent, but acknowledging that it is a thing which ought not to have occurred, which we trust will never occur again, but which was forced upon us by these hon. gentlemen opposite—that the action of the Government in the premises was perfectly justifiable.

After Recess.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, it is because this question, which has been brought forward by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) is to some extent a legal question, that I venture to ask the indulgence of the House for a few minutes this evening. It is with a great deal of deference that I speak in the presence of so many eminent gentlemen of my own profession on both sides of the House, and it is also with a good deal of diffidence that I venture to follow a gentleman of the great ability and experience of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). However, I have formed some conclusions with regard to the question submitted to the House, and I consider it only my duty to the constituents who have sent me here, that I should express to the House, as well as I can, the conclusions which I have so formed. Now, Sir, before dealing with the points which have been made by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, I may venture to say that it seemed to me that that hon. gentleman found that the defence of the Government on this question required even all the great ability and power in debate which he undoubtedly possesses, and that in dealing with the subject he was hardly so happy as I have observed him on previous occasions when he has addressed the House, during the brief period that I have had the honour to be a member of it. It seemed to me that he was hardly as much pleased with himself and his own efforts as he went along, as he was on some former occasions when he addressed the House; and I think the reason for that is to be found, not in the fact that the hon. gentleman was not making the very best possible defence that could be made from his standpoint, but in the fact that he found that a defence of the action of the Government in this matter required powers which even that hon. gentleman can hardly claim to possess.

Now, before dealing, one by one, with the points which the hon. gentleman has made, I would endeavour to answer one or two queries which he has seen fit to address to the House, particularly to the gentlemen on this side. In the first place, he has asked what it is that we would have had the Government to do under the circumstances of the case. I may tell the hon. gentleman that that is a matter which he should have thought of when he and his friends were obstructing the business of the House during the last session. He has asked us what the Government were to do. I will tell him what I think they should not have done; they should not have taken any step which involved a violation of the constitution of this country. What the hon. gentlemen should have done after bringing about a state of affairs which never before existed in this country, it is not for me to say. It is for hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House to answer that question; it is sufficient for us to point out that they have done something that they should not have done, namely, they have violated the provision of the statute which limits the power of the Executive with regard to appropriations not sanctioned by Parliament.

Now, I might in reply ask the hon. gentleman a question which perhaps could not be so easily answered by him as the question which he propounded could be answered by us. I would like to ask him, if he were in his place, what he would suggest that the Administration of the present leader of the Opposition could properly have done if they had been returned to power by the electorate of this country at the last election. I am speaking in the hearing of eminent members of my own profession when I say that that Administration would have had exactly the same right to issue these Governor General's warrants as the Administration which now controls the affairs of this country; and I would be willing, I think, to challenge hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House to point out to me any words in the statute which has been invoked in this case, or any reasonable construction of it, which would not have enabled the Government of Sir Charles Tupper to have done the very same thing if they had been returned to power. And if, having been returned to power, and the Estimates which they had brought down not having been voted by Parliament, they had ventured to issue these Governor General's warrants, would the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce have taken the practical, common-sense, business-like view which he has endeavoured to impress upon this House this afternoon, and which he has endeavoured to commend to his followers for the purpose of inducing them to vote through this plain violation of the statute? I venture to assert that the hon. gentleman would have taken a very different view of the statute. He would have taken the technical view, as he expresses it, which for eighteen years past he has been taking in this House. During those eighteen years, strange to say, it has never once occurred to that hon. gentleman to take that plain, business-like, common-sense view of this statute which he now thinks it so desirable that this House should take. I do not see how any hon. gentleman, understanding the construction of this statute, can stand in his place in this House and venture to say that the fact that one Government or the other is administering the affairs of this country could for a moment control the construction which should be put upon that statute. If I am right in that, what follows? Then the argument which the hon. gentleman has addressed to this House amounts to this, that the Government of the present leader of the Opposition, if they had been returned to power, could have dealt with the whole affairs of this country for a period of twelve months by means of Governor General's warrants. That is the logical result of the argument of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I think it is not an argument which can commend itself to the members of the legal profession in this House; because if the Government, after coming down to Parliament with Estimates, and having had those Estimates refused by Parliament, can proceed, by means of Governor General's warrants, to deal with the expenditures for the ordinary services of this country, then, as has been well said by the hon. member for York, parliamentary government in this country has indeed degenerated into a farce.

The hon. gentleman has further said that he admits that some $7,000 covered by one of these warrants was improperly included in that warrant. A more ample justification for the resolution of the hon. member for York could not well be found; and the fact which the hon. Minister mentions, that these moneys have not been expended and will not be expended, is only an argument in favour of the resolution which the hon. member for York has put before the House—an argument showing the necessity for such a resolution, an argument showing that this House should, for that reason, if for no other reason, place upon record its views with regard to the use which should be made of these warrants. Now, Sir, it is well known—it has been said by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce himself when he was in Opposition in this House—that it is of the very a, b, c of parliamentary government that no moneys should be expended by the Government of the country unless with the previous sanction of Parliament. And we know that Parliament has provided a means by which, under certain circumstances, the Executive of the country are empowered to depart from that rule. In departing from that rule, they are not violating the constitution when they act in accordance with the statute; but when once they go beyond the statute, it is clear that they are violating the constitution of the country. It seems to me that a statute of that kind should receive a fairly strict construction. A very eminent authority has taken that view. The Hon. Edward Blake, as far back as 1887, used language which, I venture to think, bears that meaning. It is right that such a statute should receive a strict construction, having regard to our system of government, which is by party. Estimates might be brought down to Parliament, which members supporting the party in power might not feel themselves justified in voting, but if the Executive were to pass beyond the limits of the statute and meet expenditures which they had purposely avoided including in the Estimates, by means of Governor General's warrants after Parliament had risen, their followers would be more likely to support them in such a course than they would have been to vote for the Estimates if brought down in the first instance. For this reason and others, the statute ought to be construed strictly. For the last eighteen years we have heard and have read in the reports of the debates the views of hon. members opposite, including the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), on that point. This is not a matter of light import. Hon. gentlemen on both sides have for many years admitted that it is fraught with the greatest possible danger. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) himself has admitted as much to-night when he confessed that the Government had taken upon itself a serious responsibility in undertaking to issue those warrants. Of that there can be no doubt, and the only question is whether the Government, in taking the step they did, acted in accord with the statute and the constitution. The defence which the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce put forward might be divided into sections. In the first place, he retorted with the argument of tu quoque, but he did so very faintly. He seemed to realize that such an argument does not sound very well in the mouth of a Reformer, he seemed to feel that it did not come with very good grace from gentlemen who have been telling us for the past eighteen years that these Governor General's warrants have been abused, and he did not press that argument very much. I need not, therefore, deal further with it, but content myself with saying that it cannot be seriously considered as an argument at all. Standing in my place, I do not want to be told, as an excuse for a violation of the constitution by this Government, that some one else did the same thing in days gone by. In the next place, the hon. gentleman undertook to argue against the view taken by himself during the past eighteen years, when in Opposition, and by the most eminent men of his own party. He undertook to argue that these words "not foreseen" did not limit the words which follow. He said that there were three classes of cases provided for. In the first place, there was the case of an accident happening to a public works—an extraordinary accident, as he has phrased it in one of his speeches before this House. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not know that any extraordinary accident has happened, unless the hon. gentleman would say that the fact of a Liberal Administration having been returned to power is such an extraordinary accident as to permit him to make use of the statute authorizing the issue of Governor General's warrants. That is the only extraordinary accident, at all events, which has been suggested by hon. gentlemen opposite. Then we come to the second part of the statute, which deals with any expenditure not foreseen or provided for by Parliament, but which is urgently and immediately required for the public good ; and the hon. gentleman by some specious logic which, I must confess, I was not able to follow, undertook to ignore the words "not foreseen or provided for," and to dwell almost, if not altogether, upon the words "urgently and immediately required." It does not require a lawyer to know that those words "urgently and immediately required" are qualified by the words contained in the same phrase and coming immediately before them. The expenditure must not only be urgently and immediately required, but must be not foreseen or provided for. It seems to me that no hon. gentleman, be he lawyer or layman, would undertake to controvert that interpretation with any show of reason ; and the only other suggestion, if I understood rightly the language of the hon. gentleman, was the suggestion that the words "not foreseen or provided for," covered two cases—the case not provided for and the case not foreseen. I do not think that any lawyer would so interpret those words. I understand that phrase to mean exactly the same as if it read "unforeseen and unprovided for" ; and if you give the Act any other meaning you will have it result in a construction which could not possibly have been contemplated by Parliament. The result would be, as has been well expressed by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), that whether foreseen or not, the mere fact that an expenditure was not provided for would give the Governor in Council power to deal with it by warrant. Why, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has been protesting against such a construction for the past eighteen years, and so have hon. gentlemen on that side of the House, well qualified to speak with authority on a matter of that kind. Speaking on this subject, the hon. gentleman said in 1887 :

There is but one exception, and that is very well defined in the statute under which these same Governor General's warrants are issued. In cases of public emergency, in cases where unforeseen accidents occur, in cases where things arise which could not easily be foreseen or arranged for by the several departments, then and in such cases, if Parliament be not in session, as the Act states, a Governor General's warrant may issue.

I would like to know if that is consistent with the view which the hon. gentleman has put forward to-night. I would like to know if that corresponds with the view that this word "unforeseen" provides for one case, and that the words "not provided for" govern another case ? So all through that speech of the hon. gentleman from which I have quoted the same idea occurs, that it must be foreseen, and the hon. gentleman went much further in that speech, because he took the ground that although the expenditure was unforeseen, nevertheless if by reasonable prudence it might have been foreseen, then the case did not come within the meaning of the statute. Having taken that high ground in 1887, one may well venture to inquire when it was that he acquired this new view which he has put forward to-night. The hon. gentleman was not alone in the view he took in 1887, because the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries—a lawyer of great eminence in his profession—took exactly the same view, and used even more forcible language. He said :

Two things that must concur are, first, that the expenditure is unforeseen, and that it is urgently and immediately required.

Nothing could be plainer than this language of the hon. gentleman. And then the hon. gentleman dealt with his own personal knowledge of the facts, and goes on to say :

I know the facts connected with one or two of those items myself, and I know they cannot be justified. Here is a small item of $3,800 for filling in a station yard at Charlottetown. That was not a matter which was not foreseen, because it is many years since it was reported upon by the engineer in chief as a work that ought to be undertaken by the Government. Nor was there any particular urgency about it.

And yet that hon. gentleman has seen fit to concur in an Order in Council which provides for the expenditure by Governor General's warrants of moneys for purposes that were absolutely foreseen and were attempted to be provided in the last session of Parliament. Now, Sir, Hon. Edward Blake, who spoke in the same debate, took exactly the same view ; and I commend to the attention of the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House and to all hon. gentlemen on the other side some remarks Mr. Blake made on that occasion. He said :

Why, we all understand that there is nothing more popular than the agreements in declaration of a high standard of morality or a high code of public virtue, and there is nothing more unpopular than the application to particular instances of that high standard of public morality and virtue.

The hon. gentleman seems to have had in view the proceedings of his friends on this occasion when he used that language. Mr. Blake on that occasion also said :

The law does not entrust the Administration with the power of making expenditures during recess simply because the expenditures may be good in themselves.

That was the argument the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce put forward—that because the expenditures were in the public interest it was right that they should be made without previous sanction of Parliament, even though they did not come within the letter or the spirit of the statute. I venture to quote the remarks of Hon. Edward Blake with regard to that, and I venture to say that the standard set up by Mr. Blake is more worthy of attention and consideration at the hands of gentlemen on both sides of the House than the doctrines the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce saw fit to advocate. Mr. Blake, in concluding his remarks said :

It is a power to be used for the good of the state in order that, in case some unavoidable, some unforeseen, some extraordinary accident or other emergency occurs, the commonwealth may not suffer damage by the fact of the Government not having the power to spend necessary moneys at the moment.

And the gentleman who then represented Bothwell, the Hon. David Mills, also used language, which is of considerable importance. In the same debate and dealing with the same question, he said :

Why, Sir, hon. gentlemen need only look at these appropriations to see that they are not such as were contemplated by the law—not such as the law was intended to meet. They are not of the class that the Act put upon the Statute-book was intended to enable the Government to deal with. These are ordinary appropriations for ordinary purposes.

“ Ordinary appropriations for ordinary purposes,” according to the judgment of Mr. Mills, a gentleman who was well qualified to speak on the subject, are not within the meaning or letter of the statute. It is stated in the public press that it is the intention of the present Administration to elevate the hon. gentleman who used that language, to a very high judicial position in this country ; and it would be a remarkable thing if that hon. gentleman, acting judicially, should have occasion to pronounce in the spirit of his speech on that occasion upon the view with which the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has seen fit to put forward to-night. “ Ordinary appropriations ” he says, are not within the letter or meaning of this statute, and “ ordinary appropriations ” are the appropriations for which the Government of this country has seen fit to issue these Governor General’s warrants. Now, so much for what has been said by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, and if I thought fit to weary the House with it, I could quote language of the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) to the same effect—namely, that no expenditure comes within the letter or spirit of this statute unless it is an expenditure that was not foreseen at the time the Estimates were brought down. Now what are the defences, when you come to analyse them, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has seen fit to put forward to-night. First, there was the tu quoque argument, upon which, as I have said, he did not much depend. Then there was the argument that three cases are provided by the statute instead of two, and I have answered him in regard to that out of his own mouth and out of the mouths of very eminent gentlemen on the same side of the House. I do not say that the statements of these hon. gentlemen are conclusive, but I do say that their arguments commend themselves to the reason and intelligence of any man who desires to approach the question before the House to-day in a judicial spirit ; I say they are right arguments and proper arguments, and I say that the construction put upon this statute by these hon. gentlemen, being the right construction, cannot and does not support the issue of these Governor General’s warrants under the circumstances which have been detailed to the House to-day. Now the next point that the hon. gentleman made was that these moneys had been expended properly in the public interest and for public purposes. It seems to me that that is not an argument at all. If the moneys had not been expended for public purposes ; if they had not been properly expended—I use the expression “ properly expended ” in the sense of being expended for the services of the country—why, the hon. gentleman would be guilty of malfeasance in office. These hon. gentlemen are trustees for the public ; they have no right, even when the moneys have been voted by Parliament, to use them for other than public purposes. The question is not whether the moneys have been applied to public purposes, but whether under the statute, they are improperly taken for public purposes. That is the question before the House, and the hon. gentleman did not meet a single point advanced by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) when he undertook to tell the House that the Government were justified because the moneys were not used corruptly. If they had been used corruptly, the hon. gentleman would be in the dock. Surely it has nothing to do with it, when we are construing the statute, whether these moneys have been properly expended ; but it has everything to do with it whether they have been expended with parliamentary sanction. Now, the hon. gentleman, when he used that argument, forgot, I think, to consider the conclusion to which such an argument would drive him. If such an argument is advanced in favour of the position advanced by the hon. gentleman to-day, then the expenditure for every month during the year ending July 1st, 1897, could be dealt with in the same way. The expenditure for every month during that year would be for public purposes ; the expenditure for every month during that year, we must assume, would be appropriated honestly and honourably. The argument the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce makes with regard to that would apply to every month up to the first day of July, 1897, or until Parliament should be called again ; and, for my part, I do not see that it would be any greater violation of the constitution to defer calling Parliament together before the expiration of the period fixed by the statute, than to pursue the course which the hon. gentlemen, in the administration of this country, have seen fit to pursue with regard to Governor General’s warrants. In either case there would be gross, and unwarrantable, and unjustifiable violation of a statutory provision regulating the Government of the country.

Now, the next point the hon. gentleman made, when you come to put aside the splendid declamation of which that hon. gentleman is so perfect a master, is that he had consulted business men with regard to this matter; and it would appear from the hon. gentleman's language that, in dealing with this matter, His Excellency has not been acting upon the advice of his Ministers, but has been acting, rather, upon the advice of certain business men whose names are not confided to the House, and who have advised the advisers of His Excellency that this was a proper course to pursue. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that perhaps the best course would be to get one of these business men to fill the position of Minister of Justice in this country, in order that we may have the benefit of his advice and guidance on all occasions, and that we may be able to have those business men with us in Parliament, instead of having thrust upon us the advice of those with whose capacity to give advice this House is not familiar. The hon. gentleman says that he acted upon the advice of business men and dealt with the matter in a business-like way. I venture to think that a more extraordinary argument in favour of a more extraordinary procedure was never put forward in this or any other Parliament, in this or any other country. Now, I cannot at this moment recall any other argument which the hon. gentleman has put forward for the purpose of sustaining the position of the Government with regard to this matter. I say argument, because the hon. gentleman, master as he is of parliamentary debate, master as he is of declamation, did make a very plausible speech in this House; but I submit that when you come to analyse it, you cannot find anything in it in the way of argument beyond what I have stated to this House, and if there is anything further in the hon. gentleman's remarks in the way of argument, I would be glad to have it pointed out by some other hon. gentleman on the Government side.

Now, the hon. gentleman did not make any further argument, but he did address himself to his followers with an ill-disguised appeal to them to vote this matter through, whether it is according to the constitution or not. I think, Sir, that is a dangerous thing for a gentleman in the position of Minister of Trade and Commerce to do. I think it does not augur well for the parliamentary institutions of this country, or for parliamentary government in this country, for an hon. gentleman in that position to turn to his supporters and say to them, in thinly-disguised language: We have evaded this statute, we have gone beyond this statute, but we look to you to vote it through. That is not the spirit in which parliamentary government ought to be conducted in this country, and I hope that is not the spirit in which parliamentary government will, in future, be conducted in this country; but certainly it is not the spirit in which a Government which calls itself a Reform Government, ought to seek to carry on the Government of this country. Now, Sir, I have ventured to put before the House, in as few words as I could, what my views are with regard to this matter. I can only say, in conclusion, that I do not think the hon. gentlemen have begun well. They have begun, however, exactly where they left off in 1878. Almost the very last official act of the Mackenzie Government, in 1878, was to do exactly the same thing; and almost the very last words the Minister of Trade and Commerce uttered in Parliament, were words in which he admitted, compelled so to admit by the late Sir John A. Macdonald, that he had gone beyond the limits of this very same statute; and I can refer hon. gentlemen, if they desire, to the page and to the line of "Hansard" where he made that admission.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Give it to us.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The late Sir John A. Macdonald dealt with this matter exactly in the same way, in 1878, as the hon. member for York has dealt with it to-day; and after he had arraigned the Government on the same lines and for the same reasons as they have been arraigned to-day, Mr. Cartwright arose and said:

While admitting generally the correctness of the principle contended for by the hon. gentleman, he pointed out that there were cases of emergency in which all governments must depart from the rule laid down in the statutes.

"Must depart from the rule laid down in the statutes." For the next eighteen years the hon. gentleman, on all occasions and with all the eloquence at his command, urged that the Government should not depart from the rule laid down by the statutes, but, when he resumes power, in 1896, he resumes it exactly in the same line and exactly upon the same principle as he laid it down in 1878. It is a bad omen for this country that such should be the case, because a precedent of this kind is apt to be extended under circumstances which render it even more dangerous than it is at present. It may be, as hon. gentlemen have said, that this money has been applied properly for public purposes; it may be that, although they have gone beyond both the letter and the spirit of the statute, there is no actual misfeasance. It may be that they have not violated their duty as trustees, but if a precedent like this is to be put before Parliament, although the hon. gentlemen disclaim that it should be used as a precedent, how do we know what may be the circumstances under which it shall be used hereafter? It has been pointed out by hon. gentlemen now on the other side of the House, that this is one of the great dangers of the misuse of such a power—and I venture to think there is a great deal in that argument, and that hon. gentlemen urging that position urged it properly, and I can only commend to my hon. friends opposite the arguments which were used on that point by their now leaders, when in Opposition. I feel sure that if they approach this subject in a judicial spirit, if they give the force to these arguments to which they are entitled, and if they look at this statute in the way in which it should be regarded, they cannot fail, voting according to their conscience, to vote for the resolution which the member for York has offered.

Mr. LISTER. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the speech which my hon. friend has just addressed to the House, and with a little feeling of amusement, too. The hon. gentleman was bold enough to say that this Government commences its career where the Government of 1878 left off. If my information is correct, that hon. gentleman was a supporter of the Government of 1878; if my information is correct, that hon. gentleman, who so violently assailed the conduct of the present Administration, was a supporter of the Liberal party in the year 1882, and he continued to be a supporter of that same party until a few years ago. There is nothing like a pervert for bitterness. He seems to think that it is his particular duty to abuse and vilify his old companions in politics in order, forsooth, that he may prove to his new friends, who doubt his allegiance, that he is true. I always look with some suspicion on gentlemen who thus assail their old party.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Look around.

Mr. LISTER. I see several of such opposite. I see the ex-Minister of Finance, who came into this House as an independent Liberal; he was a Liberal before he was elected, an independent Liberal when he was elected, and a Tory when there was an opportunity to go on the Treasury benches. Sir, the argument of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Borden) was a long, laboured, technical argument, such an argument as he would address to the judges of the Supreme Court of the province of Nova Scotia.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And they would give judgment after he had sat down.

Mr. LISTER. It proves to me how insignificant the question before the House really is. When I remember all those long years that hon. gentlemen opposite were on the Treasury benches and how every day they were swallowing political camels and to-day are squirming at a political gnat, it makes one believe that those hon. gentlemen are hardly sincere in their opposition to or in their attack on the Government for obtaining those warrants. The hon. member for Halifax soberly told the House that the present Government should have settled the question last session. It was not the duty of the present Government to consider the question last session, it was the duty of the Government then in power to have considered it; but although Parliament was called together early in the year, those hon. gentlemen who are so particular to-day about the constitution being observed allowed the session almost to pass before they proceeded with the Estimates, and before they attempted to make provision to meet the necessary public expenditures. They went on with that work, which they knew it was impossible for them to get through, and if there is any responsibility resting upon the shoulders of any party, that responsibility must be borne by the present Opposition. The hon. member said that the Government which I have the honour to support has violated the constitution, has violated the statute law of this country. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that one of the most distinguished jurists of Canada, if not the most distinguished, has declared and admitted that what has been done was within the power of the Government under the statute law.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name.

Mr. LISTER. Oliver Mowat's opinion, I venture to say, without wishing to depreciate any opinion expressed by the leader of the Opposition, is of the highest value, and hon. gentlemen who now constitute the Opposition have good reason to know that the opinion of Oliver Mowat on questions such as this is not to be disregarded. He has told the people of the country as a lawyer and a jurist that the power which the Government has exercised is within their rights.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. LISTER. Yes. If the ex-Minister of Finance had only been as anxious about the observance of the constitution in all the years he occupied the position of Minister of Finance as he is to-day, the speeches delivered by him and his colleagues would not have been necessary. As to the Governor General's warrants, those hon. gentlemen issued them not once or twice, but by the half a dozen, by wholesale every year. Parliamentary government in this country had become almost a farce when the people in their might turned out of power and discredited the Government and the party so that it will not get back into power until it has purged itself. The hon. member for Halifax has declared that the position taken by the ex-Minister of Finance is one that cannot be controverted. I venture to place against it the opinion of Oliver Mowat, who holds that the position hon. gentlemen opposite have taken is not a correct one. The hon. gentleman says that the money could not have been expended without the sanction of Parliament. We are all reasonably familiar with that proposition, and it was scarcely necessary to inform the House of that fact; but it was to get over that difficulty in the cases mentioned in the statute that the statute was passed, and the question comes up now whether the case now under consideration is one coming within the meaning of section 32, subsection D. We have had a speech from the ex-Minister of Finance, one which I suppose he will call the speech of his life: it was a speech delivered from a long brief which went back into English history for a period of 200 years to prove something with which the House is fully familiar. He addressed arguments to the House with all the eloquence and power he possesses, to prove that the Government in issuing Governor General's warrants acted illegally. And when we come to consider that there is no principle involved—for we all agree upon the principle—and that there is not one Canadian cent of the current coin involved—because it is not suggested by any hon. gentleman but that every dollar of the money raised by these warrants has been properly applied in liquidation of the liabilities of this Dominion, we see that it is an infinitesimal question. There is no dishonesty charged. There is no loss of money. There is nothing charged, except that these warrants were issued, as hon. gentlemen opposite say, without the authority of law, but as we say, with the full authority of law. They ask hon. gentlemen on this side of the House to vote against the Government because of the statements they make that these payments were without authority of law, when the Minister of Justice of this Dominion has given his deliberate opinion that the Government of the day was justified and legally authorized to ask that these warrants should be issued for the purpose of carrying on the affairs of the country. What were the circumstances of the case, and in what an absurd position do these circumstances not place hon. gentlemen opposite. They called Parliament together on the 2nd of January last. They knew that Parliament would die a natural death on the 25th of April, and they knew that the public service of the country had to be provided for. They knew, moreover, that if that provision was not made by the 25th of April there was no power here to make provision for it. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) was delicate in his language concerning these hon. gentlemen opposite. They called Parliament together for the purpose, among other things, of voting supplies, but instead of going on with the work of Parliament they were engaged in the most disgraceful intrigue that ever disgraced this country or any other British colony, or Britain itself. Instead of proceeding with the work they called Parliament for, they were engaged in an attempt to supplant the old leader of the Government by another man from across the ocean. For two long weeks there was no Government in this country, and yet these are the men who talk about the violation of the constitution. They called us together when that conspiracy was ripe. They thought the public would know nothing about it, but fortunately for Canada, the old man who was at the head of the Government had not such a weak back as they thought he had. For two weeks these men were out of office; for two weeks the leader of the then Government was trying to form a new Administration, and thus, to the discredit of the Government and to the disgrace of Canada the valuable time of Parliament was lost. These are the men who have temerity enough, shall I say indecency enough, to come before Parliament and assail the Government of the country for trying to provide for the public services, which they neglected to provide for themselves. Our party while in Opposition were generous enough to give them supplies for the 1st of July, 1896. They say to us to-day: This is all your fault; you should have given us a year's supply. Sir, it would be an unfortunate day for Canada if we had done that. We know them well, and knowing them we do not trust them. What, give them a year's supplies! Sir, if we had done that the verdict of the country would have been ignored and set aside. Defeated at the polls, these men upon the Treasury benches, and the treasury of Canada under their hands, would have appealed to the courts and by hook or by crook they would have set aside sufficient elections, and then as in 1891, they would have bought up the constituencies of Canada. Trust them: no Sir. We know better than to trust them. We knew that we dare not trust them with more money than would carry them on to the 1st of July. We believed then that the country was sick and tired of the crew who had been governing it for eighteen years. We believed then, as afterwards turned out, that we would defeat them when we got before a free people, and when their acts of maladministration were known to the country. What we believed was verified by the verdict of the country, and they were ignominiously defeated. They have been placed on the Opposition benches, and let us all earnestly pray that long may they remain there. The people of Canada were tired of the Tory party. Their policy of buying the people up by trotting out the old bundle of straw labelled the National Policy and asking them to vote for that, had played its last game. The appeal to race and prejudice in Manitoba and Quebec had also played its last game. Was the treasury of this country to be looted by the leader of the Opposition going to Manitoba and the Territories and promising them untold wealth if they would return supporters of his; and then going to Prince Edward Island and trying to buy one hundred thousand honest people by promising seven branch railways? No, Sir, the country was astounded; the country feared them, and the people of Canada have turned them out of power to remain there for many years to come. The elections of the 23rd of June declared that the Liberal Government was to govern Canada for five years at least. When the Liberals came into power, and when they found no provision for carrying on the public service, what was to be done? Parliament had been called for the 16th of July by hon. gentlemen opposite. In the meantime the leader of the Liberal party was called upon to form a new Administration. These men opposite now say that Parliament should have been convened before the members of the Government had gone to their constituencies and got their approval. How was it possible to ask Parliament for supplies until almost the present time? As was said by my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright), the public service of Canada had to be carried on, and in order to carry it on, it was necessary that funds should be provided for the purpose. I ask them, how could funds be provided? Were the people around the buildings here to go unpaid; were the officials throughout the country to go unpaid; was the public service of Canada to stand still, until the Government came to Parliament and asked Parliament to give them a vote, when they had the authority of the statute itself? My hon. friend may put as technical a construction on that statute as he thinks proper. While the statute may bear the construction which my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden) has put upon it, it is equally clear that a warrant may issue when any expenditure not foreseen or provided for by Parliament is urgently and immediately required for the public good. That section of the Act is capable of that broader interpretation, and that is the interpretation which the Minister of Justice has declared is in his opinion the law.

But, Sir, what are we arguing about? If there is a doubt as to the meaning of the statute, has any wrong been done? Is anybody injured? Does it make any difference, in view of the fact of a condition of affairs existing unparalleled in this country or in any other, a condition of affairs that will never recur, a condition of affairs that rendered it absolutely necessary that the Government of the country should raise funds for the purpose of carrying on the affairs of the Government? Does it make any difference, when it is not charged that one farthing of that expenditure was corrupt—when it is admitted that it was absolutely necessary in the public interest? Does it make any difference whether you give the statute the narrow or the broad construction? Because the money has been honestly borrowed, it has been honestly expended, and the Government of the country, in calling Parliament together as soon as it was possible for them to do so assumed the full responsibility; and they are here to-day to answer for their action, and to say to their followers that in their judgment they were within the law, that it was a case without parallel, that it was a case wherein it was necessary that the Government of the day should make that provision, and that they did it in the public interest? The argument against it, therefore, is of no particular consequence. Hon. gentlemen opposite are arguing upon a naked principle, with nothing involved. They are arguing upon a question to which there are two sides, and about which much can be said for and against. But I am sure that every hon. gentleman here who wants to look at this thing fairly, and upon its merits, without the spirit of party, and who does not feel impelled to vote for his party right or wrong, will be found to-night voting against the amendment of the ex-Minister of Finance. It is simply absurd, and it shows how anxious hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House are to get up a discussion of some kind or other. If they had consulted their own party interests, I believe they would not be found to-day moving such an amendment—four or five pages long, with nothing in it.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Did they leave any money when they went out?

Mr. LISTER. The box, I believe, was empty. The position I take is this: the necessities of the Government were such that they were obliged to get the money, or let the public service of Canada stand still, they had the authority of the law to borrow the money and to expend it, and it was expended in the public interest. It is not suggested that it was not necessary or that there was any improper expenditure. I repeat that the argument of hon. gentlemen on the other side is simply the argument of lawyers, who clothe themselves with technicalities, and they want to make the members of this House believe that there is something greater and graver in this matter than appears upon the service. All that there is in this little question is that these hon. gentlemen made no provision for carrying on the affairs of this country, and when the Liberal party came into power they were compelled to borrow money, and they borrowed it in the only way they could, under the authority of that statute, fairly interpreted. That being the case, the money being properly expended, the Government assuming the responsibility, the Minister of Justice, one of the most eminent lawyers in this country, advising that the Government had such a power, what is there in this question? What can there be in it? Why waste the time of Parliament, called here for a particular purpose? Hon. gentlemen, by motions such as this, seem determined to waste the time of this Parliament in useless discussions. I feel certain, Mr. Speaker, that every hon. gentleman who has given this question any consideration, be he Conservative or Reformer, unless he is bound by party spirit, will be found voting against the motion of the hon. ex-Minister of Finance in amendment to the motion of the hon. Minister of Finance. Sir, the people of the country, I am satisfied, will give these hon. gentlemen no credit for the factious opposition which they are offering to the new Administration, which has thus far acted in the best interests of Canada. I appeal to my hon. friends, I appeal to every honourable man in this House, to look at this matter fairly and squarely, and to say that in this motion the hon. ex-Minister of Finance has not exercised that shrewdness and sagacity which usually characterizes him, but that the whole thing is a weak piece of business, not deserving of the support of any intelligent member of this House.

Mr. CRAIG. I shall not detain the House very long, but desire to say a few words on this question. I was rather surprised to note the difference of tone between the speech made by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) and that of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Lister). The Minister of Trade and Commerce admitted that this was an important question, worthy the serious consideration of the House, and of the fullest discussion that can be given it. The hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister), however, thinks it is a question of no importance at all. He charges the Opposition with wasting the time of the country and with not knowing what we are doing. He charges us with talking nonsense, but I must say that, listening to the speech of the hon. gentleman, I concluded that he must have imagined he was addressing an audience from the stump. Why, he even found fault with the admirable speech of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden)—a speech which commanded the attention of every other member of this House, a speech which may be rightly characterized as an argument, and that is a description which I am sure could not be applied to the speech of the hon. member for West Lambton. Sir, the hon. member for Halifax did just what the hon. member for West Lambton said should be done in treating this question. He treated it, not as a party, but as a legal question. He discussed the statute, its meaning and its limitation. Did the hon. member for West Lambton so discuss it? Why, he commenced by ridiculing the hon. member for Halifax. He talked about him as a pervert, and he said that perverts were always noted for their zeal. Well, I do not intend to allude to any converts on that side of the House, because I hold that any hon. member has the perfect right to change his opinions on political questions, and it is no reproach to any man in this House that some years ago he held different political opinions from those he holds to-day. So that I think that the remarks with reference to the hon. member for Halifax which the hon. member for West Lambton made were uncalled for. They showed simply that the hon. member for West Lambton felt himself unable to refute the argument, and therefore resorted to ridicule instead of serious discussion. But, I am happy to say, such an attempt at ridicule fell extremely flat, and had not the slightest effect on the House or on the hon. member for Halifax, who is too well known as a lawyer, and who enjoys too high a reputation in his profession, to be at all affected by anything which the hon. gentleman could say against him. I was rather amused with the remark made by the hon. member for West Lambton, that this Government had the advantage of the favourable opinion of the highest authority in this country, when I found out that this authority was a member of the Government which had done this very thing. Well, Mr. Speaker, there is no man in this House respects more highly than I do the hon. Minister of Justice (Sir Oliver Mowat). I had the pleasure of being with him in the Ontario legislature. I learned to respect him there and I respect him still, but I do not hold that his opinion on this question is equal to that of a disinterested outside lawyer, because he is one of the parties interested. While I am satisfied that he thinks he is right, that does not prove he is right, and I do not know that it will justify to the country the issuance of these warrants. I was very sorry to notice that while the hon. member for West Lambton said that this question should be treated apart from all reference to party, as I think it should be, and as I intend to treat it, he discussed it himself solely from that point of view, and went on to talk of the course of the late Government during last session and the course of the party supporting it, and said that the country was both sick and tired of that Government and party. I do not think that such remarks could be described as treating this question without reference to party, but that, on the contrary, the hon. gentleman introduced a party spirit entirely into this debate. Instead of treating this question from a legal point of view, as one would expect a gentleman of his legal attainments to do, he confined his remarks to making appeals to party feeling. The country, he said, was sick and tired of the late Government and its supporters. I would ask the hon. gentleman how he came to that conclusion. I do not think the province of Ontario acted as if it were sick and tired of the Conservative Government and party. While I am not going to discuss all the reasons why we find ourselves on this side of the House, there are reasons which might be given, apart from the actions of the Government generally during last session, and many past sessions. I believe that if it had not been for one unfortunate question which came before the country, and agitated the people, the Conservative party would still be in office. If the country was sick and tired, it was not of the Conservative party, but of a question which had been thrust on the late Government, and which that Government tried to handle, but failed to handle to the satisfaction of the country.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What do you think of the question yourself?

Mr. CRAIG. The hon. gentleman ought to ask a question a little more to the point, because everybody knows what I thought of the question and what I think of it today. Then the hon. member for West Lambton said that the Conservative party had put before the country something labelled "National Policy," which had been able to accomplish great wonders. No doubt it did, but the trouble is the National Policy was lost sight of during the last election in the agitation resulting from that other question, or we might have a different tale to tell today. I would, however, warn the hon. member for West Lambton not to say too much about the National Policy, because he does not know what the policy of his own party may be yet, and he may find that he has made a great mistake if he ridicules that policy and then discovers that his own party has not altered it so very much as he may have led the people to imagine they would. I do not know what he may yet have to say about coal oil. It is true that that has not much to do with the question that we are now discussing, but it is just as relevant and as germane to it as the remarks the hon. gentleman made about the National Policy. I do not propose to answer the legal argument, because I think that was answered before the hon. gentleman spoke. The hon. gentleman certainly failed to answer the arguments adduced by the hon. member for Halifax, which, to my mind, were very strong indeed. One reason given for the issue of these Governor General's warrants is that the late Government acted in such a manner as to prevent Parliament being called in time. Well, a very convincing answer was given to that, when it was pointed out that the late Government asked very reasonably for three months' estimates, so that the public service might not suffer.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Hear, hear.

Mr. CRAIG. The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." I am satisfied of this, that if hon. gentlemen opposite had had any idea that they would have been returned to power, they would have consented. I do not think they had the remotest hope of being elected, or they would not have objected as much as they did to the three months' estimates being passed. The request that three months' supplies should be voted last session was a most reasonable one. We knew that a certain time must elapse before the Government and Parliament could be called together, but the Opposition were unwilling even to grant that moderate request of the late Government, and, owing to their obstructive tactics, the present Government found themselves in the predicament of having no funds, when they came into office.

Mr. CRAIG.

Another reason given for the issue of these warrants is that there was urgency and great need for the money. Now, I would just make this remark—and here I speak not as a lawyer, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce said, but as a business man—he said there was very great and urgent need for the money. I say this: I may admit that there was need for the first warrant, and that the necessity for the money would excuse the issue of it; but what is the excuse for issuing a warrant on the 18th of August, the very day before the meeting of Parliament? I do not think that the necessity for money could have been so urgent that it could not be put off until Parliament had been asked to sanction the expenditure. But though the necessity for the money might excuse the issue of Governor General's warrants, yet it does not justify the issue of those warrants. Why, if there was no necessity for money, there would be no control at all over the Executive. If they did not need money, they would not need to call Parliament at all. And so, if we justify the issue of warrants on the ground that the money is needed, we give an excuse for not calling Parliament together. The need for money, instead of being a reason for issuing Governor General's warrants, is the very strongest argument against it. I noticed that the Minister of Trade and Commerce did not speak in a very combative manner in discussing this question: as the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) said, he did not seem to be at his best. I was struck with one remark he made. He expressed the hope that the necessity for this would not occur again; that is to say, he did not want to make this a precedent. I am not treating this as a party question, and have no wish to do so, but I think it is right, as the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce himself admitted, that the attention of the country should be called to this matter. If the Government can justify themselves to the country, so much the better for them. I have no doubt they will justify their action to their own supporters or most of them. But the question is: Can they justify themselves to the country; are the people satisfied that they should, while in Opposition, strongly object to the issue of Governor General's warrants, and criticise them every time they were used, and then, when they get into power, to do the very thing which previously they had condemned? If the country approves of that, the Government are all right. But it is a most important question, which concerns the people and concerns our parliamentary institutions. It may be said—it was said by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister): What is the danger; the money is spent for the public benefit? We are an honest Government; we are not like the gentlemen recently in power. The country should not trust them with Governor General's warrants, but you may trust us to take all the Governor General's warrants we want; you may be sure the money will be rightly spent, because we are an honest Government. It may be very well for them to say this, and to tell us that there is no danger; but I say there is danger in every violation of the constitution, even though it is a small violation, because bad precedents are always dangerous. But even supposing that the present Government is an honest Government and one in which the people have confidence, it is possible that some day there may be a Government in power that is not quite so honest, and that Government will cite the action of its predecessor in issuing Governor General's warrants as justification for doing the same. It is our duty to protest. The resolution before us says that, under the circumstances which have been recited,

This House is of opinion that the issue of said warrants was in contravention of the well understood principles of parliamentary control.

I maintain that, while there might have been some excuse for the first Governor General's warrant, there was no excuse for the second. So I am prepared to vote for the amendment, which condemns the issue of these Governor General's warrants as an abuse of the powers vested in the Governor General.

Mr. LOUNT. Mr. Speaker, before voting upon this question, I desire to state to you, to the House and to the country the reasons which governs me in coming to the conclusion I have come to with regard to it. It has been very properly stated that this is largely a question for lawyers. I concede that, because it is, to some extent, a constitutional question and one to which great importance should be attached and close attention paid. I have listened, I must confess, with a great deal of pleasure to the remarks which fell from the lips of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster). I always listen with pleasure and attention to his advocacy of a cause. Even though I may not agree with him in the conclusions he arrives at, still, he presents his case in a logical, clear, and sometimes very correct aspect. I cannot say I agree always with his statements of fact, nor do I always follow his conclusions in law. I was led to believe from his line of argument that he might almost be said to be a lawyer, even though he did not have a legal education. His fine-spun sophistries and close technicalities indicated that he followed on the line of legal argument, though legal argument may not always agree with legal conclusions. The hon. gentleman gave us—and I was delighted to hear it, for it reminds us of the history of the past—he gave us what he described in his own eloquent language the safeguards and protections that have been thrown around parliamentary government, and warned this side of the House against the danger of the invasion of these principles. Does the hon. gentleman remember that it is from this side of the House and from this party in the past that responsible government first came, and that with responsible government there has been the effort of the Liberal party to surround it with all these safeguards? History repeats itself again and again in showing the Reform party as the defenders and protectors of parliamentary government; and I will not say, though perhaps I might say it with perfect safety, that history does not say the same thing for the Conservative party. Now, I recognize that, and recognize also that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), in his close reasoning and in his premises which he advanced for the conclusion he arrived at, stated that there was but one conclusion to come to, and that was that the Administration had been wrong in acting as they had done with regard to the matter under discussion.

He may be right, I am not prepared to say he is wrong. It is a debatable question, and it is for this House to say whether, in consideration of its being a debatable question, this Government was not thoroughly justified in the course it took in regard to the warrants. Now in reasoning upon that line I was somewhat amazed at finding those hon. gentlemen so active and energetic in looking back to the past utterances of the leaders of the Reform party. They cited to us with unction, they cited to us with infinite pleasure, they cited to us as if it should close the debate, that we should accept as being conclusive, that the Hon. Edward Blake and the Hon. Mr. Mills had in the past given their opinions in this House on the same line as the hon. gentlemen are proceeding to take to-night. I think it is a safe conclusion to draw that, although the hon. gentlemen opposite now accept and approve of the opinions of those distinguished gentlemen, when they were uttered those same hon. gentlemen opposite dissented from them. At that time hon. gentlemen on the other side took a position with regard to the grant of warrants of this character somewhat similar to the position taken by this Government to-day. The opinions of those eminent gentlemen I have mentioned have been produced, and read in extenso, and cheered by every hon. gentleman opposite as if the doctrines were incapable of dispute, and I say it redounds to the credit of the Reform party that those principles which were enunciated then, are principles which, if you examine them closely, are being enunciated by the Reform party on this side of the House to-night. Hon. gentlemen may endeavour to make a distinction, but they forget that there were differences of fact and differences of condition which entirely change the bearing of the opinions that were offered by the hon. gentlemen whom they cite. Now, Sir, I am a new member in this House, wholly inexperienced in the manner of debate. I have endeavoured to listen with care to the discussion as conducted by the other side, believing that I could get wisdom, that I could get assistance, that I could learn something from those hon. gentlemen. I have learned something, but I have learned this more particularly, that one is not safe to trust his judgment at least to the statements of fact enunciated from the other side. I have examined this Act with some desire to come, as I hope, to an honest conclusion as to what the law is, and I admit frankly that the effort to come to that conclusion is not entirely satisfactory. The law is not as clear as one would like. We are told by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) that necessity does not justify the action, and to fortify himself in that statement, he harks back again, as other hon. gentlemen on that side have harked back, to opinions which, on other occasions, when it suited their purpose, they have seen fit to minimize and discount. They are willing to-night to accept the opinions of the Hon. Edward Blake, they are willing to-night to accept the opinion of the Hon. Mr. Mills, but I have read in parliamentary debates how often hon. gentlemen opposite have derided, and laughed at, and endeavoured to minimize the opinions of those two gentlemen. When the occasion suits them they can accept their opinions, and when the occasion suits them otherwise, they are quite competent to dissent from those opinions. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, what conclusion can be drawn from hon. gentlemen who play fast and loose; who take when it suits them, and discard when it suits them, the same opinions and the same reasons. Surely, as a new member of this House, I cannot look with much confidence upon their arguments and upon their conclusions. Now, as I have already remarked, I admit that this Act is surrounded with some difficulty. The hon. member for York says that necessity does not justify the action of the Government. Has that hon. gentleman never heard the old saying that necessity knows no law?

Mr. FOSTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. LOUNT. The hon. gentleman says, "hear, hear." I believe that the hon. gentleman is necessity itself—not that I mean to say he absolutely knows no law, but that he is capable of expounding some extraordinary doctrines with regard to law, which would rather indicate to me at least that necessity has had a great share in the wisdom which is given to him with regard to the knowledge of law. Just to glance for a few moments at the legal position, this Act, strictly and literally read, says that Governor General's warrants may issue when occasions arise for the expenditure of public money, not foreseen or provided for by Parliament. Hon. gentlemen opposite desire to import into the language, not the word "or" but the word "and," and doing so they are able to raise an argument in support of the amendment to the resolution. When the Act is thus read, the action of the Government is clearly and obviously within their province. If hon. gentlemen opposite say this was an expenditure which was foreseen—and perhaps they may be right in that, on which point I shall have a few words to say later on—it is not denied these moneys were not provided for. If not provided for, then under the terms of the Act the Government were justified in presenting the warrants. So that according to the conclusion I am able to arrive at with respect to the literal construction of the Act, the Government were perfectly justified in their action, and I think hon. gentlemen opposite concede it, for I have not heard them dissent from that proposition, I have not heard any hon. gentleman express an opinion which goes the length of saying that if this money was really unprovided for, then the Government is in any sense to blame. This being the literal reading of the Act, what has to be done before the Government can be condemned? You must change the language of the statute and put one word for another. I admit, as a lawyer, that judges when interpreting Acts of Parliament endeavour to find the meaning and if an Act is not capable of construction, it is the duty as well as the privilege of the bench to interpret it and to give a reasonable and sensible meaning. This being so, on what ground do hon. gentlemen opposite pretend to say that it should be read "and" instead of "of." I understand hon. gentlemen to say that the Act is not capable of proper construction if it is read as it is worded at present. But I take this position, and it is a position so far as my influence can affect hon. members behind the Government, that where there is any doubt, and I submit there is strong doubt whether "and" should be imported into the Act, and the word "or" removed, hon. gentlemen are perfectly safe in supporting the Government, they having taken their course not hastily or ill-advisedly, but with the greatest precaution and prudence. What greater precaution could have been taken, what better course could have been pursued than has been followed? To whom should this Government apply for an opinion in regard to these warrants? Should they take the opinion of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), with his legal mind; should they fall back on the hon. member for Picton (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), who has displayed, I admit, marvellous ingenuity in the course of the debates which have taken place in this House in making white appear black and black white; should they have taken the opinion of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden)? I have heard an old saying, which I will not repeat, about going to Halifax.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh, oh.

Mr. LOUNT. What is troubling the hon. member? Is he in agony, is he in any serious physical condition? If so, I will wait until he gets rid of the difficulty, and then proceed. I was saying, however, that it was necessary to take an opinion. That opinion was taken, and I venture to say it was the highest opinion in this land, and hon. gentlemen opposite know it. For eighteen years hon. gentlemen have been learning the extent and magnitude of the profundity of such opinions. The Privy Council in England has admitted the wisdom of such opinions, and in all the battles which have been fought between this House, led by the late Premier and by those who preceded him, and by Sir John A. Macdonald, who was, I admit, an eminent authority, a man of high dignity, of great judgment and influence, a man who led his party with honour and credit to the men who sat behind him, where it was an honour to sit—that hon. gentleman, perhaps the best statesman those hon. gentlemen had to follow—I say this in humble deference to the hon. gentlemen before me—gave his opinion on many constitutional questions. Those opinions were given on occasions when differences arose between the Dominion and the province of Ontario. I need not repeat to the hon. gentlemen the several cases which must be fresh in their memory, because a wounded man or a wounded intelligence long suffers under the wound. Those wounds are fresh and almost green in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite, and there never was an occasion when a difference arose between the opinion of the late Attorney General of Ontario and the Minister of Justice of the Dominion that the opinion of the late Attorney General of Ontario, now Minister of Justice of this Dominion, was not always sustained. He was sustained not alone by the judges of this Dominion, but by the highest Parliament in the world, he was sustained by the Privy Council of England, to which all men bow and recognize as the highest authority to which to appeal. Now we have an opinion coming from the Minister of Justice, an opinion which it was proper for the Government to seek in its hour of trial and difficulty, and therefore the opinion of the Minister of Justice of the land, whose opinions upon constitutional law were always safe to follow is the opinion upon which we stand, it is the opinion which I trust and believe, and if ever it should be tested, it would be found like his other opinions, constitutionally right, and the opinion of the other side would be found constitutionally wrong. The Minister of Justice has given his opinion, and I refer to it for this reason. Where the Act is strictly read he holds that it justifies the action of the Government.

Where the Act is in some state of doubt, as it possibly might be, then we have an opinion that we can rely upon, and an opinion which until it is disturbed will be accepted authoritatively, I believe, by every hon. member on this side of the House, and by a number of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House as well. When the vote comes to be taken I believe this House will show that it has faith and confidence in that opinion. As I have said, Sir, that opinion was taken almost at a moment's notice; practically at a moment's notice, and why? It was I think the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) who declaimed against the Government because when they came into power, they did not proceed at once to call Parliament, and then get an appropriation for this money. Sir, any one who has watched the tactics of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), here for nearly three weeks past, any one who knows his ingenuity of debate and the skill he possesses—and the skill too of that old Nestor beside him (Sir Charles Tupper)—must know, that no such vote would have been allowed to pass, and that there would have been in this Chamber, day after day, and almost week after week, an effort to prevent the passage of that vote under parliamentary practice, and which money was urgently required for works of necessity. Knowing that, is it to be wondered at that under the circumstances; the Government coming into office after the 11th of July, Parliament being called by hon. gentlemen opposite for the 16th, and these hon. gentlemen clinging to office from the 23rd of June to the 11th of July and almost up to the hour that the clock struck for them to get down and out; is it to be wondered that the Government were put in such a position that they were of necessity bound to obtain these warrants. Why did not the late Government make provision for this necessary appropriation?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. You would not allow us.

Mr. LOUNT. I accept the hon. gentleman's statement as a supposed state of facts, but I venture to predict, that my idea of it is the more correct one. It is this: there lingered in the breasts of hon. gentlemen opposite a delusive hope that a chapter of accidents might keep them in power, that some possible chain of events, recounts or some other devices of that kind, might keep these gentlemen in office. And so, with this small unction to their souls they did not proceed to do what they ought to have done. In what position did these hon. gentlemen opposite leave the country at that time? Was it a position that statesmen ought to be proud of? Was it a position which they could justify before the country? Was it a position which was other than a disgrace to them? Our railway and canal system had to be kept in operation; men who were entitled day by day to get their hard-earned wage, men who under various forms of contract were entitled to receive their money, were demanding their money, but no provision had been made to pay them. So, Sir, the Government when they came into office had to provide for this necessity. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to think that there should have been an inborn wisdom in the Government, that they should have had a common knowledge of all the sums of money which had to be paid, and the various channels and sources into which it had to be paid. Well, Sir, these hon. gentlemen are perhaps giving larger credit to this Government than they are entitled to. I admit that our Government, as will be seen by their conduct in the future, is entitled to a very large credit for judgment, and for discretion, and for honour, which perhaps has not been displayed to the same degree by hon. members on the other side of the House. Now, what was the condition of things? As soon as this Government could become possessed of the facts they proceeded to complete the act, which is now charged against them to be wrong. They obtained the Governor General's warrant. It is alleged that they should not have obtained that warrant, the very day before Parliament met. I may be somewhat misguided in my judgment, wanting parliamentary experience as I do, but I believe that any one who tries to look upon the matter in a spirit of fairness as I do, must come to the conclusion that the Government delayed as long as they reasonably could to obtain information as to the various sources to which this money ought to go, and then they immediately asked for a warrant which was absolutely necessary to pay an indebtedness that was past due, an indebtedness the payment of which ought to have been provided for by the late Government, and an indebtedness which this Government were bound in honour to pay as speedily as possible. It is charged that they should not have done so before the meeting of Parliament. I need not remark, Sir, that such a decision might have baffled all the efforts of the Government to pay these debts, because the Opposition would probably have taken to themselves great credit—as they are apparently taking to themselves now for their three weeks of almost factious opposition—they would no doubt have taken to themselves great credit for having prevented the Government from doing what they were bound to do in honour, and which the late Government now out of power, hesitated and delayed and neglected to do. I venture, Sir, to interpret the Act literally and the conclusion which I arrive at is that literally the Government is justified. I have endeavoured to show the reasons why I shall support the Government on this question. If I had no better reason, if I could offer no better excuse to the country, if I desired to perfectly fortify myself before my constituents for the vote I intend to give, I need only tell them that the opinion of the present Minister of Justice was the opinion which was offered as a justification for the action of the Government, and I have heard many a good Conservative say—for there are good Conservatives here and there—that the opinion of the Minister of Justice is upon constitutional questions the best opinion there is in the land. Therefore, with that best opinion and with the confidence that the country will support it, I to-night feel it my duty, and a pleasure as well, to support the Government on this question, and to oppose the amendment of the hon. member for York.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, just a word before the debate closes. It seems to me that there is not much of good or bad in the action of the Government in obtaining warrants from the Governor General for the purpose of paying the current stated expenses of the country pending the meeting of Parliament. It has to be borne in mind, I think, that the moneys for which these warrants were obtained were for services on which, not only salaries for officials, but wages for workmen were due, and moneys were payable, and I think it would have been to the discredit of this country if these bills had not been paid. Further, there is no pretense that the sums that were raised by these Governor General's warrants were applied on accounts other than those which everybody admits had to be paid. I, for my part, do not consider that this Government has in this instance given us an example of the abuse of that power. Some hon. gentlemen might say that the Government might not have called Parliament together, but might have gone on for any length of time paying its way by Governor General's warrants. Well, if the Government wanted to put its head into the halter, it might have so acted. But I think it acted just as the late Government would have acted if it had been placed in the same situation. It strikes me as a business man—and I come from a city where there are large mercantile interests, and I know the feelings of the constituency I represent—that the circumstances justified the action of the Government, and I do not think that outside of extreme politicians, the people at large will find fault with either the Government for advising the issue of these warrants, or with the Governor General for following the advice of his Ministers.

Mr. McINERNEY. Mr. Speaker, I just want to add one word or two to what has been said in this debate in regard to the opinion of the hon. Minister of Justice (Sir Oliver Mowat), which has been so highly lauded by the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Lount). In the return of correspondence which has been brought down, we find the following letter:—

Privy Council Office,
Ottawa, 14th July, 1896.

Sir Oliver Mowat,
Department of Justice,
Ottawa.

My dear Sir Oliver,—It is suggested to me that unless the civil employees are paid their regular salaries, the public service will be subjected to very serious inconveniences. The inconveniences would more particularly arise in the case of that class of employees who are wage earners on railways, canals and other public works.

I would ask you to look into the question and give me your opinion as to whether a special warrant can be issued to provide for the payment of those servants of the Government.

Believe me, &c.,

WILFRED LAURIER.

To that letter the hon. Minister of Justice makes the following reply:—

Office of the Minister of Justice,
Ottawa, 14th July, 1896.

The Honourable
Wilfred Laurier, M.P., P.C.,
Premier and President of the Council,
Ottawa.

My dear Premier,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this date informing me that it is suggested to you that unless the civil employees are paid their regular salaries the public service will be subject to very serious inconveniences, and that these inconveniences would more particularly arise in the case of that class of employees who are wage earners on railways, canals and other public works. You ask my opinion as to whether a special warrant can be issued to provide for the payment of these employees.

By R.S.C., chapter 29, section 32 (b), it is provided that if when Parliament is not in session any accident happens to any public work or building which requires an immediate outlay for the repair thereof, or any other occasion arises when any expenditure not foreseen or provided for by Parliament is urgently and immediately required for the public good, then, upon the report of the Minister of Finance and Receiver General that there is no Parliamentary provision and of the Minister having charge of the service in question that the necessity is urgent, the Governor in Council may order a special warrant to be prepared, to be signed by the Governor General for the issue of the amount estimated to be required, which shall be placed by the Minister of Finance and Receiver General to a special account, against which cheques may be issued from time to time, in the usual form, as they are required.

I think that the payment of the employees mentioned in your letter is "urgently and immediately required" for the public good, within the meaning of the said enactment, and that, under the circumstances which have occurred, and the consequent present condition of public affairs, the Governor in Council may properly, on the reports mentioned order a special warrant to be prepared, to be signed by the Governor General, for the issue of the amount estimated to be required.

Yours sincerely,

O. MOWAT.

What I wanted to call the attention of the House to is this, which I believe to be the gist and kernel of this whole matter, that in the opinion which the Minister of Justice offered to the Prime Minister, the only reason assigned by him in justification of the issue of a warrant was that it was for the payment of employees and civil servants. Now, with all due deference to the eminent jurist, Sir Oliver Mowat, and with all deference to the admiration in which he is held by the hon. member for Centre Toronto, I beg humbly to submit to this House that the reasons assigned by the Minister of Justice are not sound. I have risen, Sir, for the very purpose of attempting to make that proposition good, and the best authority I can find upon the subject is one that is on all fours with the case now in hand. I find in Todd's "Government in the British Colonies," at page 437, a case which strikes me to be exactly the same as the one now under consideration, and to meet entirely the reasons assigned by the Minister of Justice as a justification for the issuing of those warrants:

A few months afterwards, Governor Belmore again addressed the colonial secretary on this subject, alleging that the legislative council of the colony had taken umbrage at certain unauthorized expenditure which had been avowedly incurred by government, without an Act of appropriation; and that the council had protested against the proceedings as being "derogatory to the privileges of parliament, and subversive of the constitution."

The governor explained that, in this instance, the payment had been merely of certain official salaries, in anticipation of the Appropriation Act, the passing of which had been inadvertently delayed by a parliamentary adjournment; and that there had been no intentional infringement of the privileges of the legislative council.

The colonial secretary (Earl Granville) in a despatch, dated June 16th, 1896, pointed out that any such proceeding was at variance with the instructions contained in the foregoing despatch from the Duke of Buckingham, and observed that a temporary inconvenience to certain civil servants could not be regarded as "an unforeseen emergency" or as a case of expediency that would justify violation of law. He added that, "except in case of absolute and immediate necessity (such, for example, as the preservation of life), no expenditure of public money should be incurred without sanction of law"

Mr. LOUNT. Will the hon. gentleman say whether there is an Act in that country similar to the one here?

Mr. McINERNEY. I do not think that the interruption of the hon. member for Centre Toronto is at all pertinent. Here is a case in which certain reasons are assigned by the Ministers to the Colonial Secretary as their justification for these warrants. And Earl Granville—than whom there could be no higher authority—replied that such reasons were no justification for the issue of the warrants. The words used by the hon. Minister of Justice (Sir Oliver Mowat) are not found in the statute. It is an inference from the words of the statute that he founds his opinion upon, and he gives as his reason particularly why this warrant should issue, that great inconvenience would arise to the civil service employees of the Government, which is the very reason assigned by Lord Granville as not being sufficient for a violation of the law. I merely rose for the purpose of pointing this out. I believe, and sincerely believe, or otherwise I should not have taken my feet on this question, that no greater misfortune can happen this country than to have such precedents as this established, and particularly by gentlemen who, for eighteen years, have been professing a doctrine exactly opposed to the one they now preach. The Liberal-Reform party make the boast—and perhaps there is some justification for it—that the Liberal party is the father of responsible government, that it has fought for the liberties of the people, that it adopted and engrafted into the spirit of the constitution and the laws of our country the right of Parliament, and Parliament alone, to vote moneys. I understand that that doctrine is one which was fought out through many long years; I understand that, like every other branch of British liberty, it is one that has slowly broadened down from precedent to precedent; and I am astonished that hon. gentlemen opposite—the Reform party, the Liberal party—who have been taking the very opposite ground during all these years on this question, should now, as their very first act on coming into power, attempt to demolish the doctrine which they have preached for so many years past.

Mr. FLINT. When I find a party which has for eighteen years ruled this Dominion and interpreted all doubtful questions of law in favour of the views which suited them best, a party which very recently went to the country with great boasts as to the results that would follow their appeal, when I find that party, with its great historical record and boasts of what it has done and is capable of doing, depending to-night for its victory or defeat upon a little word in a statute—because it must be conceded by all who have followed the course of this debate, that if the word “or” cannot be changed by a legal interpretation into “and,” the whole fabric of the case which they have built up, and on which they have founded so much fervid oratory, has fallen completely to the ground. I cannot help regretting that any political party in this country should depend on an argument of this kind for sustaining their case. As my hon. friend behind me has said, it certainly is open to argument, as to the strict manner in which a court of law would interpret this statute. If, for instance, it could be brought before the Supreme Court of Canada, on a motion to quash the Governor General’s warrant, there might be ground for an elaborate argument as to the strict legality of the warrant under which the Government drew this money for the payment of the civil service of the country. I contend that this is a very small ground upon which hon. gentlemen opposite can appeal to the support of the electorate. In the face of the doubt, in the face of the legal opinion given by the Minister of Justice, in the face of the necessity and grave urgency of the circumstances, in the face of the evident intention of the Act under discussion, I contend that, even if this ground were held tenable by a court of law, it would not be supported by the great electorate, when considering it in the light of business and common sense. This subject has been approached from the legal and constitutional standpoint. In my view, it would be better, as public men, dealing with vast financial interests, as men bound, in their legislative capacity, to look to the interests of the civil service and public works of the country, that we should consider this question from the point of view of the actual circumstances of the case. What were the circumstances? Those hard-worked employees of the Government in the civil service, on our Government railways, along our public canals, were in urgent need of the wages they had honestly earned. The previous Government had been displaced by the electorate, and a new Government had but recently been formed, and found these thousands of employees in immediate necessity of the payment of the wages due them. I ask the hon. gentleman if a liberal and generous interpretation of any doubtful clause or sentence of the statute should not, under the circumstances, be given, in order to meet the exigencies of the case? Suppose a strict legal interpretation of the clause would show that the Government was possibly in error, I contend that this high court of Parliament, that the representatives of the people here, would be morally and equitably bound to overrule a strict legal interpretation in favour of a generous interpretation and in favour of meeting the obligations of the country to its employees. And upon that ground alone, apart from any legal quibble that might be raised, either sincerely or otherwise, I would vote with gladness against the amendment of the member for York and in support of the Administration of the day. I will not read the clause of the statute, because it is very familiar to this House and to the country. It was either the second or the third act placed upon the statute-book of Canada. It has no precise parallel in the statute-book of any colonial possession of Great Britain, so far as I have been able to discover; it has no precise parallel in the statute-book of any of the provinces of the Dominion. In those provinces where this Act or any counterpart of it is not found, we find no disastrous consequences arising though the administration of the day is required to advance from the public treasury sufficient money for the public requirements before the meeting of the legislature. But the Act was a wise one. The question is how it should be interpreted and complied with by the high court of Parliament so as to defend the rights of the people and also to meet the requirements of the public service. Among the cardinal principles upon which all acts of legislation should be interpreted, that is foremost which looks at the intention. And I demand from any hon. gentleman who reads this Act if the evident intention of the Act was not to provide for cases of this kind. Precedents cannot be quoted because there never was a precise precedent for the situation in which the Government found itself shortly after the 11th day of July last. As no precedent could be quoted, for none existed, a precedent had to be made; and if ever it should occur in the history of this country that such a combination of circumstances arose as that which existed when a new administration was formed public obligations to the extent of many hundreds of thousands being due to the servants of the country that were not provided for by Parliament, though they might have been foreseen, I believe the Liberal party in this House, whether in opposition or on this side, would support any administration, which would take the interpretation of the Act and follow the course of the present Administration. Another principle by which all acts should be construed by us, as practical statesmen, is the general policy of the Act—the intention and general policy. Can it be conceived that the Parliament which passed this enactment would for one instant have refused or declined to provide for such a case as occurred, when, through the dissolution of a Parliament by lapse of time no appropriations whatever were made for the ensuing year and no Parliament could possibly meet and no time was allowed for the appropriation to be passed for payment for services of this kind—could it be conceived that it would be the policy of any legislators or statesmen that there should be no machinery provided by which the daily obligation of the Government to the civil servants and employees on public works should be raised by some means. The policy as well as the intention of the Act, apart from the strict legal interpretation of its verbiage would lead ninety-nine men out of a hundred of the electorate of this country to sustain the action of the Government in this regard. But how has the Act been interpreted in the past by the Administration that has preceded this? If hon. gentlemen opposite complain that a new departure has been taken by the Liberal party in this House, I think we have the right to retort that the interpretation, the usage and custom which hon. gentlemen opposite, when in power, pursued, and by the light of which we have a right to interpret this Act so far as the practical administration of it is concerned is precisely that of the present Administration. Unfortunately, I have not been able to procure all the returns of sums expended under Governor General's warrants during the last fifteen years, because large numbers of them have not been published in the sessional papers. But on glancing over a return moved for some years ago by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, one is surprised to notice the vast sums of money that the Conservative Administration of those years raised by Governor General's warrants to meet the obligations of the country. And though, in many cases, the propriety of these warrants was questioned, and although it was manifest that Parliament, owing to the appropriation and character of the service to which they were applied, did not act strictly within the meaning of the Act, yet none of those who criticised this method of obtaining the warrants has quarrelled with the large votes of gentlemen supporting hon. gentlemen opposite when in power. I find that the previous Administration, when in power appropriated very insignificant sums by this method, whether it was that they were very careful to obtain from Parliament all that was necessary for the services of each year, or whether a disinclination to use this method of obtaining money for the public service, they appropriated very insignificant sums in this way. Consequently the observation made by my hon. friend from Halifax that the Liberal party from 1873 to 1878 had also used Governor General's warrants freely was entirely without point. Because, I would call attention to the fact that of all the sums raised from 1873 to 1878, the whole amount was somewhere in the neighbourhood of $200,000. In 1873-74 no appropriation was made. In 1874-75, the appropriations by Governor General's warrants amounted to less than $8,000. In the following year the largest appropriation made in this way was, $144,000. In the following year the amount was about $8,000, and in the last year that Administration held power the appropriations through Governor General's warrants—no doubt for proper purposes and under strict interpretation of the Act—was something under $64,000. So we find that during that administration, insignificant sums were appropriated in this way, so that the remark of my hon. friend from Halifax was entirely without point, as he had not looked into the facts. But when the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite came in in 1879, then began the use of Governor General's warrants entirely without precedent in this country and entirely against the spirit of the Act. In 1879, the amount appropriated in this way was $597,396.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. To what item does the hon. gentleman take exception to in 1879. Has he examined them?

Mr. FLINT. I will call attention to them later on.

In 1880-81 hon. gentlemen opposite raised and expended by means of Governor General's warrants, $532,656; in 1881-82 they raised $746,413; in 1882-83 they raised $463,010; in 1883-84-85 they raised $698,049, and in 1885-86 they raised $3,190,243. I have not the returns from 1886 to 1891, but it is within the recollection of hon. gentlemen present who have glanced over these returns, and who have heard the discussions in this House with regard to Governor General's warrants, that these sums were very large, aggregating probably, for the same number of years, as large an amount as those I have quoted. I do not contend that in every one of these instances the law was violated, nor even that the law was violated in a majority of these instances; but I do contend that a strict interpretation of the law would leave these hon. gentlemen without excuse in many instances which are quoted here. A notorious instance, running through the whole term of office of those hon. gentlemen, are the cases in which appropriations for public services have expired before the meeting of Parliament. Of course I am not alluding to cases of accident or emergency, which no one questions in this debate. Large majorities of these instances were those in which the appropriations were lapsed; but they were defended upon the ground that the appropriation had been made by Parliament for a certain public work, but the appropriation had lapsed, and therefore, morally and equitably speaking, if not in the strictly legal sense, the Government was chargeable with the fund, and they were authorized by the spirit of the Act to raise the amount by Governor General's warrants. Now, I would ask my hon. friend: What is the distinction between a lapsed appropriation, the power to use which has completely expired, and in connection with which the public service has been performed, and the appropriation under consideration to-day? I contend that it is only by torturing the words, it is only by torturing the line of argument, that any distinction can be made between an obligation of the country for a public work, the appropriation for which has lapsed, and the obligation of the country for the payment of the civil servants and the employees upon our public works. In one case Government has provided funds after the appropriation has lapsed, in the other case Parliament has not provided that particular fund, but the facts as far as the Audit Office is concerned, and so far as the legal methods of raising money to meet the obligations of the Government are concerned, are precisely the same. Although millions may be lying in the banks collected from the revenue sources of the country, although the obligation of the Government to the people has accrued, yet no cheque can be passed through the Audit Office in order to meet the obligation. The present case, as regards the moral and equitable obligations of the Government, is on all fours with those where the service has been performed, the money collected from the people is lying in the banks; but between the obligation and the liability of the state, and those who are to receive pay for work done, lies the Audit Office, through which no cheque can pass. The only method of meeting these obligations to carry on the public works of the country, and to prevent a wide area of distress by the stoppage of many public works, and consequent widespread disaster—the only method of preventing this is through a Governor General's warrant. Hon. gentlemen opposite have successfully defended Governor General's warrants on the ground that the appropriation had lapsed, and I believe that the same ground can be taken under the present circumstances where the obligation has accrued, where the money is lying in the treasury, but where Parliament has not met, and the appropriation cannot be made for many weeks; the Government is then perfectly justified in calling this machinery into action in order to avoid these great public disasters. A great deal has been said about the responsibility of the present Administration for the state of affairs which brought about the necessity for the issue of the Governor General's warrants, but I think the argument used by the hon. gentlemen opposite has completely collapsed. The responsibility does not rest upon this side of the House for the emergency which arose. The Government of the day is always responsible for carrying on the public affairs of the country, for making due provision for meeting the liability of the treasury towards the servants of the state. Had the Government of the day pursued a wise and statesmanlike course, had they met Parliament when they promised, had they not dallied with a political question, had they not endeavoured to create political capital out of another political question, had they promptly brought down the Estimates before Parliament in the beginning of 1893, there can be no doubt that these Estimates would have been passed, or at any rate, sufficient Estimates would have been given the Government to carry on the affairs of the country up to the end of June, 1896. But instead of that what spectacle did we witness? Scarcely had the Speech from the Throne been delivered when a riot broke out in the ranks of the Government, when one set of Ministers flew at the throat of another set of Ministers, when a conspiracy was brought to a head against the Prime Minister of the country, and the time of Parliament was wasted in settling these domestic quarrels between the hon. gentlemen who had charge of the Treasury benches, and Parliament was waiting for something to do. Then we found the time of Parliament taken up with a political Bill, brought in to give hon. gentlemen opposite some issue upon which they might go before the people with the hope of carrying the electorate in their favour. They knew that the National Policy had tumbled to pieces, that its unmitigated failure was patent to all the people, and that unless some new issue was raised, unless some new agitation was started which would distract the minds of the people from the commercial condition of the country, from the disastrous condition in which the National Policy had left it, they dared not go to the country at all. But time was the essence of the contract, Parliament was about to expire, and so a desperate effort was made to press forward the Remedial Bill with the design of arousing certain prejudices throughout the country by favour of which they hoped to be returned to power. The hon. gentlemen opposite failed in the attempt. The people had not forgotten the disastrous results of the National Policy, and although these efforts to distract their attention may have succeeded in some directions, yet, taking the country as a whole, the people remembered the failure of the financial and fiscal policy of the Administration, and hon. gentlemen opposite were defeated.

It was entirely owing to the efforts of hon. gentlemen opposite to postpone the hour of going before the electors, and raising issues which had not been raised before, that they delayed to forward the Estimates for 1896, that they placed Parliament in the position that the Estimates could not be put through, and they are responsible and must be held to blame for the position in which the country was placed at the close of the elections of 1896. My hon. friends came into office with this extraordinary position confronting them; the employees of the Government, the labouring men on the public works of the country, the officers of state were without their pay. I ask hon. gentlemen, what would have been the denunciations from the Opposition benches if the leader of the Government had met the House without having made provision for the payment of public servants and for the carrying on of public works? Every Conservative paper would have rung with denunciations of the Government for their weakness in not taking advantage of the Act; they would have depicted the distress on the line of the Intercolonial Railway, along the lines of the canals, and among the civil servants, who require all their pay promptly; every newspaper and orator supporting the Opposition would have hurled base denunciations at the head of the Government and his colleagues for not having applied the Act for the purpose for which it was manifestly intended. I can imagine the manner in which the House would have been entertained by hon. gentlemen if those wages were still in arrear, the indignation with which the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) would have denounced the First Minister for his weakness and lack of business sagacity, for lack of sympathy for the workingmen and civil servants, if the Government had not met their obligations; and although the obligations could not have been paid immediately, yet day after day would have been occupied in denouncing the course of the Administration for not having met those claims in a proper spirit. I will quote a few remarks made by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), when holding the position of Finance Minister. He was at the time defending the use of the Governor General's warrants under certain circumstances, and I think he took a very reasonable ground, a ground which can be applied to the act of the Administration now under consideration. Certain expenditures had been made upon the Intercolonial Railway, which had not been provided for by Parliament. This expenditure must have been foreseen, but through some error in calculation or mistake in details the amount was omitted from the Estimates submitted to the House, and was subsequently met by a Governor General's warrant for the sum of $150,000. This was in 1891, and the Finance Minister defended the action of the Government in securing the money by means of a Governor General's warrant, in the following terms:—

I have no doubt that when the power was given, although the wording of the statute is badly drawn, the spirit and intention of the Act was to provide only for those expenditures which came to be considered as absolutely necessary and urgent, so far urgent as to make it a matter of public service and utility that the expenditure should be made.

It is true, as my hon. friend has said, that with reference to the item he has specially mentioned, it ought to have been foreseen and ought to have been provided for by Parliament.

Whether from error or any other reason an insufficient appropriation has been made by Parliament, whenever the Government comes face to face with the lack of money sufficient to carry on the service, and the alternative is between the service stopping or going on, the Government has no other course to pursue than to keep up the traffic and keep up the business, in this great branch of the public service for the benefit of the people of this country.

I return these words to hon. gentlemen opposite, and I ask them if ever there was an occasion in the history of this country when the alternative was so clearly presented between stopping the service and continuing the service and when action was more urgent to provide money than in the case now under consideration. Hon. members looking at the matter from a business standpoint, or from a broad statesmanlike standpoint, considering the interests of the people engaged in the public service, considering the interest of the public credit and considering that good faith should subsist between the Government and those it employs, would stultify themselves if they did not support the Government in negating the motion moved by the hon. member for York.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would appeal to the leader of the Government that, as we sat to a pretty late hour last night and it is now one-quarter past eleven, and I shall have to trouble the House for some time, he should agree to an adjournment of the debate. I should like it very much myself, and I think it would not be against the interest of the hon. gentleman that the debate should be adjourned.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I am sorry that I cannot see my way to oblige the hon. gentleman. I regret he will have to speak for a considerable time, but let the hon. gentleman proceed and we will all be happy to hear him, even if it is until the early hours of the morning.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The members of the Government have had rather an easy time in this debate, which deals with a subject that seems rather serious, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce has admitted, but which has been dealt with by hon. gentlemen opposite in a very light manner. It seems we are not to have the benefit of the views of the Ministers, and the back benches have been given permission on this occasion to speak from their various standpoints, and the result is a conglomeration of very diverse opinions, all tending in the direction of a justification of the action of the Government, none of them, however, following very closely either the lines of the opinion of the Minister of Justice or the position taken by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. But before entering into reasons that appear to me pertinent to the question I will refer to some of the positions that have been taken by some hon. gentlemen who have spoken on the other side of the House. In the first place the Minister of Trade and Commerce took practically a very wide ground for his justification, namely, the circumstances of the case. Therefore, there could be no definite rule laid down by Parliament to guide the Government or to hold the Government in connection with so important a matter as this, but that in each case the particular circumstances were the guide. He avoided as far as he could any rule, except one, which for the first time in this Parliament he has ventured to put before the House. It is not to be found in the statute, but he called it his third ground as a justification for the issue of the special warrants by His Excellency. As nearly as I could take his words down, his ground was that special warrants might issue for expenses not provided for but urgently required for the public weal. However, the hon. gentleman from Toronto (Mr. Lount) dealt rather severely with that argument, and I shall have very little to say about it, except to call his attention to the fact that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) was good enough to make in advance the admission "that necessity knows no law." He treated with certain contempt the members of the legal profession, and any legal interpretation which might be put upon this check and safeguard that Parliament in its wisdom has seen fit to place upon the statute-book. The hon. gentleman as well as some of his friends, have asked: would we starve the services, would we stop the post office and the Intercolonial Railway, and would we bring about such untoward circumstances as such a stoppage would involve. Well, Mr. Speaker, that is begging the question.

Mr. LAURIER.

All circumstances of that kind must have been, and of course were in the mind of Parliament, when Parliament in its wisdom decided that the hands of the Exchequer should be tied and their resources limited according to the law of the land. No matter what the difficulties may be, these difficulties must have been foreseen by Parliament, and the only way to avoid those untoward circumstances is to call the representatives of the people as quickly as possible, lay the case before them, and urgent action would be taken if the circumstances justified it. That responsibility is a responsibility of Parliament. It is not a responsibility of Government, and the strongest circumstances will not warrant in my judgment, and according to the precedents that I have carefully examined—any action the Government have seen fit to take in this case. These precedents go to show that where in good faith the Government have stepped outside the law—as some of the legal gentlemen supporting the Government admit may have been the case in the present instance—the first thing the Government should do is to come before Parliament and confess their action, and in that spirit ask at the hands of Parliament for a Bill of indemnity. That has been the course followed in so many cases in the House in England, that it has been abandoned for a very long time, and extraordinary safeguards and provisions have been framed, to prevent the Exchequer for any purpose whatever, obtaining public money without the direct sanction of Parliament for the expenditure of money. I wish to call attention to another argument of the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) which I think no gentleman of the legal profession on either side of the House will support. He pleaded that they have followed the open, and manly, and honest course, and that even if they have violated the law, and even if they have flown in the teeth of the statute, they were good enough to put all the facts before us and they were good enough not to steal or pilfer any of the money they obtained by virtue of these warrants. That is an argument that has not been seriously pressed by gentlemen on the other side, and I mention it only to show how weak it is. The hon. gentleman from Toronto (Mr. Lount), a distinguished member of the legal profession was perhaps wise—seeing the doubts that disturbed him on the general point—in passing over the most extraordinary admission made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and made after the justification of the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick); for mark you, the Solicitor General has said that the action of the Government was right according to law. Hon. gentlemen opposite also say that the Minister of Justice has taken the same position. But, the Minister of Trade and Commerce admitted to-day that part of the moneys included in these warrants should not have been included, and that so far as these warrants relate to the expenditure for September they have no justification. The hon. gentleman asked us to accept his frank admission as an extenuation for that offence. The hon. gentleman must go further. If the expenditure for September is not warranted, what justification is there for one dollar of the expenditure that is to be made under those warrants from the 19th of this month, the day the Parliament opened, until the first day of September. The case is not only made out against the Government, but already at this stage of the debate, the only member of the Government who has favoured us with his views has supported in large part the position we have taken. The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) went into the political phase of the question, and he asked whether the late Opposition, the present Government, would not have been fools to let us have six months' estimates at the last session of Parliament. That reminds me that it does seem the very height of audacity for these hon. gentlemen to ask us: would we have starved the civil service, would we have stopped the public works. Why did not these arguments occur to them, when, by obstruction unparalleled last session, they absolutely refused to provide the ways and means for keeping the services going, and even for paying the civil servants. They tell us again, that we had no right in that last session of a moribund Parliament; just preceding a dissolution, to ask for a three or a six months' vote of credit. Sir, I take issue with the hon. gentleman. I say that no member of this House, by any reference to constitutional procedure, or the practice of the English House of Commons, can support that most extraordinary position. The actual fact is, that the reverse is the rule, and that from the time of Pitt there never has been a Parliament in England that would think of refusing a vote of credit, or the necessary vote to carry the Government over the period of dissolution, until the new government had been organized and were able to meet Parliament again. I shall refer to that at a later stage; but I mention it as the last point that could be considered in any sense a point in the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Now, the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) is a very handy member for the Ministerialists, and I make that admission frankly. If a case is bad, whether he is on the Opposition or on the Ministerial side of this House, I am in the judgment of his fellow-members whether he has not always shown an aptness and a readiness to rush in and say what is necessary to be said; and when the case is particularly bad, the hon. gentleman is particularly personal. So, on this question, which has disturbed and worried other members of his own profession in this House, but which he treats so lightly, he opened up with a personal attack. I thought it was rather unkind on his part to refer to the bitterness of converts, and the temper of those who leave one party to join another.

Mr. LISTER. Unless there is a good cause for it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. And I did not think it particularly courageous considering that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) was not in his seat, that the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobbell) had left the Chamber, and that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) himself was absent. I think if he would repeat that language in their presence, he would hear from each one of them and all of them.

Mr. LISTER. They had good cause for leaving.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman did not seem ready to take into consideration causes or reasons. It was the fact of the change of opinion that struck him as an excuse for making a personal attack which I am almost ashamed to refer to, for it had not the effect the hon. gentleman intended it to have.

The hon. gentleman spoke of the duty of the Government in power last session; he said it was their duty to have had this question considered. I call his attention again to what I have already observed in connection with the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that that Government did all that a Government possibly could do to discharge its duty. All these awkward and inconvenient circumstances were wholly out of the contemplation of the statute, as I shall show, and are not only due to the action of hon. gentlemen opposite during that session, but to their unprecedented action in extending the meeting of Parliament, which had been properly and regularly called for an early day after the last general election.

The hon. gentleman and the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Lount), who followed, placed great store on the opinion of the Minister of Justice; and they will forgive me for saying that I was surprised to hear, coming from members of a learned profession, an argument that, forsooth, because a Minister of Justice such as the present Minister of Justice undoubtedly is, an able man and an ornament to his profession, gave an opinion on a question of law, the Parliament of his country were to accept it and not question it in any particular. That position was taken, but I shall show later on that hon. gentlemen cannot obtain from the opinion of the Minister of Justice, all that comfort which they have thought themselves warranted in taking to themselves. I shall show that the Minister of Justice has taken good care to avoid putting his name to any opinion in justification of a course which the Minister of Trade and Commerce himself admitted to be illegal in part.

The hon. gentleman alleged that the whole difficulty arose from the late Government clinging on to office when an appeal to the courts in connection with the elections would have destroyed the Reform victory. That is an admission which I accept, as probably correct, that if the elections on the 23rd of June had been carefully sifted in the election courts, hon. gentlemen opposite might not be sitting where they are.

The hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) spoke of necessity, doubt, and the opinion of the Minister of Justice; and, in the midst of all these conflicting ideas, he rushes at once to the argument that, after all, as the result of the Government's action was good, he is not going to question it, and that the evident intention of the Act was to provide for cases of this kind.

Now, I will put a question to you, Mr. Speaker, and through you to hon. gentlemen who disagree with the view that I hold. I will put a question to them which I think will illustrate the fallacious position which they take with regard to this whole question. I have summed up the views of three hon. gentlemen who have spoken. Now, I put it to them: If the present Opposition prevented, as the late Opposition did, the supplies now before this House being granted, and they, finding that we would not give them one dollar of money necessary for public works, for the operation of railways and canals and for the civil list, advised His Excellency to prorogue Parliament, and Parliament was prorogued, do these hon. gentlemen contend that the Government would be warranted, under the section of the Audit Act under consideration, in issuing a special warrant for those services for which the Opposition refused to vote the supplies?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). Is the hon. gentleman arguing on the legality of the warrant or on the propriety of its exercise?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. On the legality.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If he is arguing as to the propriety, I can understand his argument; if he is arguing as to the legality, I cannot see the connection.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not object to the interjection, but I ask the hon. gentleman now to do me the courtesy to answer my question. Would he think it legal under those circumstances for a special warrant to issue for the items of the Supply Bill, or any of them, which this Opposition had prevented passing?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not think the facts the hon. gentleman suggests affect the legality one way or the other. They affect the propriety.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have no right to press the hon. gentleman to answer my question. I put a question which is clear and distinct, and he may answer it or not as he likes. The question is amosite, and it illustrates the present position admirably. Suppose you ask us to vote money for these various public services, and we obstruct; month after month passes, as many as you like, and His Excellency is advised to prorogue Parliament, and Parliament is prorogued; after that occurs, is the hon. gentleman of opinion that it is within the meaning of this section 32 of the Audit Act, and legal, for the Governor General to issue a special warrant for any of the items in those Estimates, which had not been passed by this House? The hon. gentleman declines to answer that, as is his right.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not decline. I confess I have not followed the hon. gentleman.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am sorry my hon. friends do not understand me. If the hon. gentleman is arguing as to the legal power under the statute to issue the warrant, then I say the question of obstruction or non-obstruction does not enter into the argument at all. If he is arguing as to the prudence or imprudence of the issue of the warrant, I can understand his argument.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman has no objection, I will take his answer on another ground. Would it be justifiable under those circumstances to obtain the issue of a warrant for all those services?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I will not give the hon. gentleman a speech now, but may afterwards.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Again, we have the Government in that happy condition that they do not know their own mind. But if the hon. gentleman hesitates to give an off-hand and direct answer to that, how can he pretend that these hon. gentlemen have the slightest confidence in the strength or correctness of their present position? For, after all, is not that the precise position in which they stood in July? There were Estimates and supplies that Parliament had refused to vote, and those hon. gentlemen came into office and found these services not provided for, because Parliament had refused to sanction the expenditure of one dollar to meet them, and they pretend that they were warranted, whether on equitable or legal grounds or on grounds of necessity, in advising that a special warrant of His Excellency the Governor General do issue. I ask the hon. gentleman if the Government have sufficient confidence in their judgment to instruct the House that they are prepared to do it again, and that they have thus found a happy solution for any obstruction that may be practised in Parliament, and the hon. gentleman is dumb. He is going to take his own time to deal with that in his own way, and a direct answer I cannot have the pleasure of receiving at present.

The hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) spoke first of necessity and doubt and then of the difficult position being settled by this opinion of the Minister of Justice (Sir Oliver Mowat). That was enough for him, and after that he went on to speak in the most confident manner, wholly free from doubt and difficulty, of the evident intention of the Act. The hon. gentleman wanted to know what the distinction was in the case of lapsed balances. I can give him one or two. In the first place there is the practice supported and endorsed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, on the one side, and the Government on the other. In the one case, the balance of money appropriated and sanctioned by Parliament, and in the case under consideration the use of money which Parliament absolutely refused to grant. That seems to me a distinction that cannot fail to strike one.

I heard the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) in his exceedingly able speech, which the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Lount) declared was a powerful presentation of the case, say that he would avoid going fully into certain matters connected with procedure in these cases of constitutional practice, because these things were familiar to most hon. gentlemen in this House. I must ask to be excused for not giving that credit to hon. gentlemen's intelligence that the hon. member for York did, for this reason. The hon. gentleman who followed the hon. member for York showed clearly that all have not looked in to the practice of Parliament, nor into the various methods that have been adopted by Parliament, both in the old country and in this, to prevent being perpetrated the very thing that has been done in connection with these special warrants. In the first place, take that question raised by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. He, forsooth, glories in the fact that his party were able to prevent the late Government from obtaining any vote, even for the limited period of six months, or the regular Estimates for the following year. I say that the authorities show that the responsibility of the Opposition for their course last session was a very serious and heavy one, and that the terminating of Parliament under such circumstances is a constitutional irregularity. The duty upon the House of Commons, under our system, undoubtedly is never to leave the Administration of the day without the necessary supplies for the carrying on of Government. After looking into the precedents, I find that the invariable practice in England, for nearly a hundred years, is that when the Opposition is not prepared to give the outgoing Government that has run its term, full charge of the year's supply, it gives them enough to tide over the period of the general election and the period during which any new Government may be going through the process of formation, and a departure from that is called by the text writers a "constitutional irregularity." Further, I want to call your particular attention to this important fact that since 1783 there has never been a dissolution of an English Parliament without supplies, either annual or quarterly, for the purposes I have named.

The hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) referred to the history of the efforts of Parliament to take completely within its hands control of public expenditure, and to see to it that the Executive of the country simply made payments out of public money for specific and named purposes by an Appropriation Bill. The hon. gentleman went very briefly into that, but the invariable practice since the time of William III. in England has been not to spend a dollar except under the express provisions of the Appropriation Act. The clause that has given rise to this discussion, the clause of this statute that has been brought to your attention, Sir, to-day, has been frequently called a most peculiar provision. It was not intended to give great scope to the Executive. It is not to be found in the English system. There is not in England a case where the Executive can spend money that has not been appropriated by Parliament. You may have in your mind the case of the army and navy and the government of a great Empire and the contingencies unforeseen and unprovided for nearly every session, but Parliament has considered all that in the Government of the mother country and Parliament there has declared that notwithstanding all that, there shall not be taken one farthing for any of these expenditures if the Appropriation Act—not a general statute or Audit Act such as we have here—does not make provision for these very purposes. And they take civil contingencies and the army and navy contingencies, and after having put in a list of the principal items that they can foresee, they put in a liberal amount for unforeseen or unprovided expenditure in connection with those important services, and the money is taken from no other sources and no other way. And hon. gentlemen who have used arguments as to necessity, will, I am sure, if they do me the honour to follow me in the examination of one or two authorities find that no such argument obtains in England or under the system which is the system of England and the system of Canada in connection with the parliamentary control of public money. And they will find that even in the most extraordinary case, the case I shall mention later on, the Crown could not act, the Crown of England could not act, without summoning Parliament.

and dared not take such a step as the Governor General was advised to take in this case. What led to this provision being placed in our statutes? Up to 1864, in Old Canada, there had been abuses, there had been expenditure without parliamentary sanction, and the public mind was stirred in regard to these growing irregularities in connection with the expenditure of public money. Let me give the section that was introduced for the first time, and was afterwards repeated in the statutes of Canada in 1867, because I think hon gentlemen who follow the debate carefully will see the advantage of having that part of the history before them. The section upon which our present Act is based, appears in the statutes of Canada, 1864, chapter 6, section 8:

It shall be the duty of the auditor to see that no warrant issues for the payment of public money without the direct authority of Parliament; and also to report to the Governor in Council through the Minister of Finance, any case in which any sub-accountant has expended money out of the proceeds of any Accountable Warrant, for any purpose for which there is no legislative authority, or beyond the amount for which there is such authority; provided always that in the event of any unforeseen accident happening to any public work or building which requires any immediate outlay for the repairs thereof, if there shall be no amount appropriated by Parliament which is available for such repairs, it shall be lawful for the Governor in Council, upon the report of the commissioner of public works to that effect, to order such expenditure to be made and to be thereafter submitted to Parliament, and such Order in Council shall be authority sufficient to the auditor to permit the issue of a warrant or warrants to the amount so ordered to be expended; but it shall be the duty of the auditor to cause copies of all such Orders in Council, and of such warrants issued upon the authority thereof, to be laid before Parliament on the first day of the then next session.

Sir Alexander Galt, then Mr. Galt, introduced the Audit Act, of which this that I have read is a section. The provisions were intended to prevent, as far as they could, any officer daring to be the authority—and in England the penalties attached to such an act are tremendous—for the withdrawal of a dollar from the public treasury without the sanction of Parliament. And it is interesting to know how important this question had become even then, for Mr. Holton asked to have it made a penitentiary offence for any officer under whose signature a warrant issued, unless he had the sanction of Parliament for the signature, in order to provide against the possibility of abuse. Now, hon. gentlemen who have followed the debate will remember, without my repeating it, the language of the statute, as it stands at present, but, on reflection, I will trouble the House, as I have read the Act of 1864, with reading the Act as it now stands, practically first introduced in the Act relating to the collection of revenue in 1864. This will give us, as far as I can find it, the history of this piece of legislation:

Sir CHARLES HIBBEHT TUPPER.

If, when Parliament is not in session, any accident happens to any public work or building which requires an immediate outlay for the repair thereof, or any other occasion arises when an expenditure not foreseen or provided for by Parliament, is urgently and immediately required for the public good, then, upon the report of the Minister of Finance that there is no parliamentary provision, and of the Minister having charge of the service in question, that the necessity is urgent, the Governor in Council may order a special warrant to be prepared and be signed by the Governor General for the issue of the amount, estimated.

Now, I ask the House to indulge me, for I think it is of considerable importance, while I refer to a very interesting memorandum, or part of a memorandum, prepared by Lord Monteagle, in 1854, when he was, I think, Controller in England, upon this question as to the basis for that provision and as to the necessary provisions by the legislature to preserve to Parliament its full and absolute control and direction in the expenditure of public money. I do this because our own legislation largely follows the English legislation in this regard. And I think those gentlemen who follow the reading of this interesting and instructive report, will agree with me that the subject is of far greater importance than some of the hon. gentlemen who have taken part in the discussion, seemed to believe. For I am within the judgment of the House, when I say that they have mainly attempted to justify the expenditure on the ground of necessity. In this memorandum of the Select Committee on Public Moneys of 1854, the English Controller goes on to say:

It is thus provided by law how the votes of Parliament, the pleasure of the Crown, the authority of the Treasury, and the final order of the Exchequer, should be invariably carried into effect.

And here I want to call particular attention to one of the differences between the two Audit Acts. In England there is one warrant that lets loose the money appropriated by Parliament. This is a most important fact, and its importance will be seen later more clearly—that where the Crown is concerned in connection with the expenditure of money voted by Parliament, without the direct approval of the Crown not a dollar of money appropriated by Act of Parliament can be expended. In England there is only one warrant, while we have two—the Governor General's warrant letting loose, so to speak, the money voted by Parliament, and that placing it at the disposal of the various departments of the Government. Here we have that special warrant that does not find its justification in the general Appropriation Act. In England there is one Appropriation Act applying to these matters.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. And no provision for a special warrant ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No. I have endeavoured to show that in England, so jealous is Parliament of its authority that it would not for one moment think of allowing the Executive of that country to have an unlimited right of expenditure. It is to show that if they contemplate an emergency, they contemplate a contingency of any kind, they limit the amount that the Executive may spend with regard to it. We have gone further. I see the force of the hon. gentleman's interruption. I will meet that ; I do not wish to deal with this question in a narrow way. The force of the hon. gentleman's interruption is, no doubt, to call attention to the fact that we have, wisely or unwisely, gone further, and vested in the Government a greater discretion here than they have vested in the Government in England. That may be, but it does not strengthen the position taken in the resolution now upon the Table, as I shall show before I go into its history, in order to point out, if possible, all the care taken by Parliament, not only in England, but in recent years in our own country, to keep within its own hands the control of the expenditure of every dollar of public money :

It is thus provided by law how the votes of Parliament, the pleasure of the Crown, the authority of the Treasury, and the final order of the Exchequer, should be invariably carried into effect ; and that no sum should be issued or applied to any purpose not warranted by law or exceeding the amounts specifically voted.

No question of necessity, no question of state interest, but the question of law.

It was to enforce these great principles and to guard against any possible and undue appropriation that the office of the Exchequer would establish.

And so on. Now, later down he refers to the report of two Royal Commissions issued in England under the Governments of the Duke of Wellington and Earl Grey, and from these reports there are certain extracts given. The commissioners say :

We are decidedly of opinion that the most efficient restraint on the Crown and on its Ministers should be provided and maintained. It becomes our duty to suggest means for obtaining full security that no appropriation of the funds received should take place under any circumstances, however urgent, without such sanction as shall be a real guarantee to the public for the legality of the appropriation.

I call particular attention to that sentence from the report of a distinguished Royal Commission in England, which went into these questions. You see how they plead that the law shall be adhered to in the expenditure of public money, and no opinion of a cabinet, no opinion of any executive, no matter what the circumstances might be, should have any force or effect, if behind that opinion and supporting it in every particular, there was not the principle of law. Then again, he says :

This principle was strictly carried out, and special penalties were imposed on any officers of the Exchequer who should make issues at variance with the statutable appropriation. The same penal clauses were inserted in the 6 and 7 Will. III., c. 7. The impeachment of Sir E. Seymour comprehended a charge, for that he, being treasurer of the navy, did, contrary to law and to the duty of his office, lend £90,000 raised and appropriated for building ships, to the support of the army, contrary to the Act.

The gravity of the departure from these provisions is apparent where a member of the Government in England was actually impeached for taking money appropriated for the purposes of the navy and applying part of it for the purposes of the army. Again, in this interesting memorandum, he goes on to say :

The assertion and legislative adoption of the great constitutional doctrine of enforcing a strict Parliamentary appropriation, originated with Lord Somers, who is said to have been directed by the House of Commons to prepare the proper clause, which became, and has since continued to be, the constitutional law of England. Now, was this principle less carefully enforced in subsequent times. In 1711, a resolution was passed by the House of Commons to the following effect :—“ The applying of any sum of unappropriated money or surpluses, of grants, to uses not voted or addressed for in Parliament, hath been a misapplication of the public money.” In the year 1754, by resolution, and in the 7 Geo. II., c. 12. s. 12, in the Appropriation Act, a more relaxed system was temporarily introduced. But this was done in a time of exigency, and so justified only. Against a similar course, which had been taken in 1727, much opposition had been given in the House of Lords ; and a protest appears in the Journals, signed by many Peers, including the name of the then Earl of Aberdeen. These exceptional cases confirm the general rule, and had a parliamentary justification ; and therefore there is no reason to question the authority of the author, who states distinctly that “ the uniform practice, begun at the revolution and continued for near a century, is that the money granted by the House of Commons for the current service of the year, should, by a special appropriation, either in the Act for levying the aids, or in some other Act of the same session, be applied only to the services for which they were voted.”

Again, in 1784, when it was anticipated that public moneys might, after the dissolution, be applied to purposes not sanctioned by Parliamentary appropriation, the highest constitutional authorities then existing induced the House of Commons, on the 12th January, to pass the following resolution :—“ For any person at the Treasury Exchequer, or Bank of England, or employed in the payment of public moneys, to pay any moneys for services voted in the present session of Parliament, after Parliament hath been prorogued or dissolved, before the passing of an Act of Parliament appropriating the services, will be a high crime and misdemeanour, a daring breach of public trust, derogatory to the fundamental principles of Parliament, and subversive of the constitution of the country.”

There is the opinion never receded from in England, that even after a vote of Parliament, to expend one farthing, if no Appropriation Act has been passed, would be, as they put it, "a high crime and misdemeanour—a daring breach of public trust, derogatory to the fundamental principles of Parliament, and subversive of the constitution of the country." He then goes on :

Though such was the admitted constitution of England, abuses were not wholly checked, even in later times when abuses were, it might be thought, less likely to prevail. But in order at once to adhere to the principles of Parliamentary appropriation, and yet to meet unforeseen exigencies in the public service, two very considerable votes had for many years been customarily taken, which were freed from the restraints of any very special application, and left much more at the discretion of the Treasury subject to the responsibility of a subsequent Parliamentary account of the expenditure. The one was the vote for Army Extraordinaries; the other, the vote for Civil Contingencies.

Just the question. A later passage—and it is the last reference to this report I shall make—is as follows :—

The stringency of the system thus enforced by law, more especially after the cessation of the vote for Army Extraordinaries, was felt to be so great that by the 9 and 10 Vict., c. 116, the following clause was introduced into the Appropriation Act to give somewhat more of discretionary power to the Treasury. This clause has since been re-enacted annually. The words and import of the enactment are remarkable, and deserve the utmost attention from the Government. They are as follows :—"After the appropriation of Ways and Means to the several services voted, the Act proceeds—"

They are given a latitude only within the amount of the Act. The Act provides a check upon the treasury, so that not a dollar of that vote can be used unless it appears indispensably necessary, and that the sum granted be not exceeded. The section is rather long, but I have given the point of it, and will not read the whole of it. I do not think that the House will find those references unimportant in connection with a serious consideration of this subject, admitted by the Minister of Trade and Commerce to be so important. I, therefore, do not apologize for taking up so much time in calling attention to it. Some gentlemen have referred to the canons of construction. I am sorry I did not hear the whole of the speech of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) upon this subject, and I do not know whether he went into that subject exhaustively. But there are several canons that I have not heard referred to by hon. gentlemen opposite, and I think they are directly in point. In the first place, in regard to the rule of interpretation laid down by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, we have coupled with the admission that he has a poor opinion of the legal view of this case and of the opinions of commercial men; therefore, I shall not deal with it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

But in connection with the rule that the language of the statute, whatever it may be, may be modified by the courts to meet the intention of the legislature, when it is manifestly a contradiction of the purpose designed, there are cases of reading "or" for "and" and "and" for "or," and this ruling has been given again and again by the courts. One case is in connection with an Act providing that property should be taken for the purpose of maintaining sick or maimed soldiers. The court ruled that "sick and maimed" meant "sick or maimed," and that any other intention would destroy the obvious intention of the Act.

Mr. BRITTON. How many cases are the converse of that?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The only case I have down is one in which "and" is construed "or." But I need not labour the point to which I have referred to show that by the same rule that is followed in order to give the obvious meaning of the Act, can change "or" into "and" you can also change "and" into "or." The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) has kindly placed in my hands "Maxwell on the Statutes," in which there is a reference to the case to which I desire to advert. It is as follows :—

The 1 Jac. 1, c. 15, which made it an act of bankruptcy for a trader to leave his dwelling-house "to the intent, or whereby his creditors might be defeated or delayed," if construed literally, would have exposed to bankruptcy every trader who left his home even for an hour, if a creditor called during his absence for payment. This absurd consequence was avoided, and the real intention of the legislature beyond reasonable doubt effected, by reading "or" as "and"; so that an absence from home was an act of bankruptcy only when coupled with the design of delaying or defeating creditors.

But there is another rule in interpreting statutes. Suppose a certain interpretation has been given to a statute by the courts, whether of final resort or not, and the matter is still subject to appeal, every member of the legal profession is aware that if the legislature, with an outstanding interpretation of a statute, re-enacts the clause as before, that decision of the court becomes law, and that interpretation is the final interpretation given to the meaning of the statute. We have by parity of reasoning the fact that men like Sir John Macdonald and Mr. Blake gave the construction that the resolution moved by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) gives to this section to-day, that after that time there was a revision of our statute, and until this particular case occurred no hon. member on either side of the House controverted the position we are agreed on taking upon the present occasion. Abuses might follow an interpretation that would leave out a portion of the statute, and by simply finding that circumstances were pressing, that they were circumstances of a necessity if you like, and that no ap-appropriation had been made by Parliament, a special warrant might be used. There is no limit to the expense and abuse that might follow, and all the struggles in connection with parliamentary reform at home and in this country, whether by Liberals or Conservatives, would go for naught. I have a strong case to show that the arguments indulged in to-day will not weigh with the country. I appeal to the practice in England. When George III. was incapacitated and was for a time unable to govern, this extraordinary state of affairs arose. There had been a parliamentary session held; there had been an Appropriation Act passed; but that Act had received the royal sanction. Every item for the expense of government was in the Supply Bill and to let that loose, if I may use the term which I think is a somewhat apt one, and to enable the various departments to spend the money on the appropriations, the royal sign manual was required, as the signature of the Governor General is required to warrant in Canada. The Lords of the Treasury took this view—and if there ever was a case of necessity this was one—that they would take the responsibility and go down to Parliament and pass a Bill of indemnity, and tell those officers that under the circumstances, the conditions of the King, it was absolutely necessary money should be had and expended and the services of the country maintained, and they ordered the proper officials to prepare papers that would be complete without the signature of the King, and thus secure money to be placed to the credits of the departments. But those officers took advice. They were liable to severe pains and penalties for issuing warrants without the sanction of law, and it was held that the case was not such as would warrant them in running the risk, even by authority of the government. Parliament was convened. An appropriation Act had been passed; yet Parliament was convened in that year to sanction by solemn resolution the substitution of some signature for that of the King under the circumstances. This was an extraordinary case which goes to show how carefully the Parliament of England guards against abuse. There was a long debate, and it was especially over a resolution asking that this special course should be adopted in connection with the Army and Navy service when no royal sign manual could be obtained. This case which is the strongest case, came before Parliament in 1811. There was a long debate in regard to any departure being made from the very important rules that were adopted to prevent the possibility of abuse. The Chancellor of the Exchequer explained that it was his intention to move that authority be given to make certain applications of money, under circumstances which he detailed, the distressing circumstances in which the nation was placed. He said: "He considered a committee of the whole House competent to meet such an emergency;" and he proceeded to move:

That it is the opinion of this committee, that it is necessary, in the exigencies of the present conjuncture; that until due provision shall be made for supplying the defect in the royal authority, such sums as have been appropriated for the services of the Navy and Army, by the Act of last session of Parliament, and other Acts for enabling His Majesty to raise three millions, should be issued, in conformity with said Acts accordingly; and that it is expedient that the Lords Commissioner of His Majesty's Treasury should be required to issue their warrants to the Auditor of the Exchequer, for the payment of such sums as the exigency may render necessary; and that the said auditors and officers of the Exchequer are authorized and commanded to pay obedience to the warrant in this behalf, and to pay such sums as appear necessary, according to the warrants of any three or more of the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, which they may issue from time to time.

I think that will dispose of the argument based on the ground of necessity, because I have referred to this which is the most extraordinary case in Parliament of this nature, and the proceedings show the great care taken in England to prevent any abuse. Notwithstanding the convening Parliament for that special purpose, I find in May's Constitutional History, that:

A protest was entered by in the Lord's journal, signed by twenty-one Peers, including six Royal Dukes, which affirmed that the principle of the resolution would justify the assumption of all the executive powers of the Crown during any suspension of the personal exercise of the royal authority; and that this unconstitutional measure might have been avoided without injury to the public service, by an address to the Prince of Wales.

The hon. gentleman from Kent (Mr. McIerney) put a very strong and a very pertinent case before the House, and I will venture to add a few observations in connection with that case, because there is much to learn from it. It is a case in which we have the opinion of the British Government, by their instructions to the Governor of a colony, in which we find them saying, that it is against constitutional practice to pay official salaries that have not been appropriated by Parliament, and because the Governor joined with the Government of the day in perpetrating that illegal act, and being a party to that abuse of the constitution, he was recalled and summoned to England as being unfit for his duty. That was done even though the Governor had in his support the advice of some of what were called the law advisers of the Crown in that colony. Notwithstanding all that, Mr. Cardwell in his despatch at that time instructs the Governor that a heavy responsibility lay upon him, and that he could not under any circumstances sanction an illegal act that had been submitted to him by his advisers. I propose to make a further reference to that case. As the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney) said, that case had to do with the very phase that has been urged before us, namely, the question of the payment of official salaries. In this case there had been an Appropriation Bill, mark you, Mr. Speaker, and the Estimates had been passed by the Lower House, but it had not received the sanction of the Upper House.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). Parliament was sitting.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Quite so. In that respect there was no similarity, but as the member for Kent (Mr. McInerney) answered the member for Toronto (Mr. Lount), the point to which this case relates is not as to the construction of the section of the Act before us, but as to the value of the argument that these amounts were due and a great wrong would be done if they were not paid. There is no question that these amounts would be paid at some time. There was no attempt to be dishonest, but nevertheless the Governor lost his position because in the face of the law he was a party to this illegal act. Sir C. Darling sets forth these facts in his justification, but I will give you later on what Mr. Cardwell had to say about it. The Governor says :

But apart from these considerations I would state that there is no process of law by which the civil servants of the lower ranks and minor creditors in the rural districts whose claims constituted on every account the most distressing and therefore most pressing demands upon the Government, could possibly recover, without great delay, the wages and payments which they had always been in the habit of receiving monthly and upon which they depended for the daily subsistence of themselves and their families. In this most important respect, therefore, there was no law practically available, and the emergency was, I thought at the time, and, with all deference and respect for your opinion, cannot do otherwise than still think, one which if its nature were rightly understood and its probable consequences fully appreciated, did according to the view expressed in your despatch constitute an "excuse" and "justification" for the proceeding of "borrowing from a private bank large sums of money on behalf of the public."

In a despatch of the Right Hon. Edward Cardwell, at that time Secretary of State for the Colonies, this is what he says :

No such emergency did exist. If payments were legally due from the Crown to public officers for salaries or to any other person on any account, it was open to such persons to recover what was so due to them in the ordinary course of law. It was for one or other branch of the legislature to yield or for both to compromise their differences. It was not for you to give a victory to one or the other party by a proceeding unwarranted either by your commission or by the laws of the colony.

There were several other points involved in connection with the conduct of the Governor, and Mr. Cardwell continued :

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

In paying salaries without sanction of law, you have departed from the principle of conduct announced by yourself and approved by me—the principle of rigid adherence to the law. I deeply regret this. The Queen's representative is justified in deferring very largely to his constitutional advisers in matters of authority on all or any of those manifestly unlawful proceedings by which one political party or one member of the body politic, is occasionally tempted to endeavour to establish its preponderance over another. I am quite sure that all honest and intelligent colonists will concur with me in thinking that the powers of the Crown ought never to be used to authorize or facilitate any act which is required for an immediate political purpose, but is forbidden by law.

And again in another despatch Mr. Cardwell says in reply to the argument of Sir C. Darling :

It is for you to inquire, not whether the result of any step which you may be invited to take, will operate in favour of this body or of that, of one political party or another, but whether it is in itself legitimate. If it be clearly contrary to law, you will refuse compliance ; and will inform your Ministers that while in all lawful matters you are desirous of being guided by their advice, you have a higher and paramount duty, which is to observe the existing law of the colony.

When we find that the Governor is taken in hand in that sharp manner, that he is recalled for sanctioning the payment of salaries that had been voted, mark you, Mr. Speaker, by the Lower House, but did not receive the sanction of law by the concurrence of the Upper House ; I think we have made out a very strong case indeed in order to support the resolution that is in your hands, and to prevent the recurrence of such an abuse by any Executive, whether the present or their successors, at any time in the future. The very fact of voting down this resolution will be dangerous in itself. The very defeat of this resolution would give the Government a warrant they have not now, for perpetrating an expenditure wholly illegal.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The whole point is the illegality. The hon. gentleman has not touched that yet.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman found me touching it so closely that he did not answer the question I put to him across the House. I admit that when the hon. gentleman would not give me that satisfaction, it seemed for a time unnecessary to deal with anything but the constitutional part of the question. Now, as to the law. The hon. gentleman could not have been listening to me, or he could not have made the statement he has made. I think the hon. gentleman will remember that I gave some authorities, and I think they touched the case.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. To that extent.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. And that extent was sufficient for me, because I think the authorities showed that under certain circumstances the language of the Act should be read as we construe it; and I submit that the opinion of such men as Mr. Blake and Sir John Macdonald is in line with the opinion of the leading legal minds in this Parliament.

But we are told by hon. gentlemen opposite that they have the opinion of Sir Oliver Mowat in endorsement of their conduct. I deny it. If they have such an opinion, it is not laid on the Table of the House. If they have such an opinion, why is it not produced? If they refer to this document, I will show you that it contains no such opinion. I remember when the Minister of Marine and Fisheries occupied a long time in this House in descanting on the impropriety of any Minister of Justice giving an unreasoned opinion. Let us see what opinion we have from the Minister of Justice in this case. We have a private and unofficial statement from the Minister of Justice to the Prime Minister. That is all we have, and it refers to only one of a host of cases covered by these several warrants. The Prime Minister, in his letter, says:

My dear Sir Oliver,—It is suggested to me that unless the civil employees are paid their regular salaries, the public service will be subjected to very serious inconveniences. These inconveniences would more particularly arise in the case of that class of employees who are wage-earners on railways, canals and other public works.

And Sir Oliver Mowat, in reply, recites this note of the Prime Minister, and says:

You ask my opinion as to whether a special warrant can be issued for the payment of these employees.

Now, the warrants were issued. Is there any member on the Treasury benches who will tell me that the warrants were confined to the cases of civil employees or wage-earners on railways, canals or other public works? If any one ventured to say that, I shall show that the Prime Minister having received this informal statement from the Minister of Justice, the Ministers of the various departments began to put in motion machinery by which they got in advance a large portion of their general Estimates—Estimates wholly apart and outside of these particular and urgent cases referred to by the Minister of Justice. Let us see what they were. By a special warrant of His Excellency, the Department of Agriculture got $27,446 to pay the salaries of the various employees, permanent and temporary, of the inside and outside service for the month of July. That is the nearest that comes within the meaning of Sir Oliver Mowat's letter. The next is for the payment of temporary officers, clerks and messengers. Then there is a schedule, in which we find provided for in the same way the Civil Government salaries, Civil Government contingencies, arts, agriculture and statistics, quarantine, Manitoba census in the Department of Agriculture; permanent and extra employees' salaries for the month of July in the Auditor General's office. In the Finance Department we have Civil Government salaries, superintendent of insurance, charges of management, Civil Government contingencies. Contingencies is a term certainly not referred to in Sir Oliver Mowat's letter, and certainly I do not believe that either he or the Solicitor General could be got to give an opinion to any of their colleagues that departmental contingencies could be considered as an item which on either of these occasions would have justified the issue of a special warrant. In the Geological Survey, we have the salaries of the temporary staff. Then, we have travelling expenses and contingencies of the Indian Department, medical attendance, industrial schools, farmers and labourers, instructors for Sioux, agents, clerks and interpreters, millers and helpers. In the Interior Department we have the same thing—contingencies and salaries and all the various heads of the great votes, restricting them in nothing. In the Justice Department we have police, penitentiary pay-lists, administration of justice—a very broad term, and not included in the letter of either the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice; also the contingencies of that department. We have some large items for the Department of Marine and Fisheries, such as ocean and river service, lighthouse and coast service, scientific institutions, steamboat inspection, and fisheries—items running from $10,000 to $14,000; as well as contingencies and salaries. And so through the different departments. But then we come to another case, on which there is no opinion of the Minister of Justice:

That a special warrant of His Excellency the Governor General do issue for the sum of $1,500, being the amount estimated as necessary to repair the Government's snag boat "Samson," in order that she may be put into commission.

And in this case it does not appear from this minute that this was after the Minister of Public Works had reported that the case was urgent. It is simply:

The Minister of Finance certifying that there is no Parliamentary provision for the said expenditure.

That was the ground on which the Ministers went when they sent in these Estimates, but not the ground of the statement of the Minister of Justice. So, we have the warrant authorizing the payment of "pensions, superannuation allowances, contingencies and other expenditures required to be made by the several departments during the said month of August, 1896." Parliament met on the 19th, but these expenditures were provided for the whole of that month, and these purposes are not the purposes contemplated in the opinion of the Minister of Justice. So that hon. gentlemen have not even that comfort in this debate; they have not the opinion of the Minister of Justice in their support, but they have the admission of the Minister of Trade and Commerce as to the illegality of part of the issue, and they have the expression of his profound regret that such a mistake occurred.

Now, I want to call attention to another provision of the statute, which has been treated as a dead letter; and I want to know if either the Minister of Justice or the Solicitor General will say that this section is blotted out by section 32, subsection "b" of the Audit Act. I call attention to section 13 of the same Act, where Parliament in its wisdom has enacted that no officer engaged in the collection of revenue shall be paid his salary until it is voted by Parliament. The language of that section is important:

The Governor in Council may, from time to time, determine what officers or persons it is necessary to employ, in collecting, managing or accounting for the revenue, and in carrying into effect the laws thereunto relating, or for preventing any violation of such laws; and may assign their names, officer and such salaries, or pay for their labour or responsibility in the execution of the duties of their respective offices and employment, as to the Governor in Council seems reasonable and necessary, and may appoint the times and manner in which the same shall be paid; but no such officer so appointed shall receive a higher annual salary than is allowed in his case by any Act of the Parliament of Canada respecting the civil service generally then in force, nor shall any such salary be paid until voted by Parliament.

You have therefore a flagrant violation of this Act, and it is the same Act which contains this other section. The two sections are in no sense inconsistent. No one could contend reasonably that section 32 in any respect does away with this section, whereby it is provided that not a man engaged in the collection of the revenue of this country shall be paid one farthing of his salary until it is voted by Parliament. The reason for this extraordinary protection is that there shall be ample opportunity for discussion by Parliament before these officers are allowed to engage in these responsible duties. The law says that not a dollar shall be paid until Parliament votes it, but this Executive comes into power, violates all constitutional practice and precedent by further proroguing Parliament summoned to meet after dissolution and general election, and having thus further prorogued Parliament, which had been called for the despatch of business, they say, forsooth, that as there is no Parliament sitting and we cannot obtain provision from it, and as the previous Parliament refused to give us a dollar for these services, we will obtain from the Minister of Justice a casual and off-hand opinion as to civil employees and wage-earners on railways and canals, and having obtained that, we will submit our regular Estimates, taking periodical amounts for each department, and advise His Excellency to issue this special warrant, and we will govern this country at our own will and pleasure, wholly regardless of the principle of parliamentary control.

The hon. gentleman, a little while ago, stated that I had not dealt with the legal aspect of this case. I am sorry the hon. gentleman considers that I have avoided that aspect, because I have endeavoured to make it clear to the House that I not only had that aspect in view, but that side by side with it I would consider the constitutional procedure in the mother country with reference to similar subjects; and I have endeavoured to point out, by the references I have given at some length as fairly as I could, the manner in which Canada has attempted to follow the mother country in seeing that the peoples' representatives have complete control over the expenditure of public money. And I have endeavoured to show that in all cases in which the Executive of this country was permitted—there being no similar case in England—to spend money not included in the Appropriation Act, such authority was to be found in the Audit Act, section 32, subsection "b." The language of that section has been given the House on several occasions and the invariable interpretation of it has been in line with the views that have been expressed on this side time and time again. Hon. gentlemen opposite are committed to those views. The construction for which I have contended needs no laboured argument and no further reference to the authorities I have given; but it is significant that while some of these hon. gentlemen opposite endeavour to shelter themselves behind the opinions expressed by members of Parliament on some other occasion, they take good care to avoid the statement that in their opinion as lawyers, you can read this Act so that, to quote the language of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), "whenever expenses are not provided for, but urgently required in the public weal, a special warrant may issue." No other member of the Home Government has given that interpretation. It would be, I think, a startling proposition to intelligent men in this country, for it involves a great deal more than the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce dealt with to-day, and gives rise to considerations that he did not touch in any particular, because whenever the advisers of His Excellency think that the public weal urgently requires an expenditure which is not to be found in the Appropriation Act or which Parliament had refused to provide, then a body of fifteen or seventeen gentlemen could obtain a warrant from the Governor General, spend the money and come down to Parliament and claim that they acted on the construction of the Act as expressed by a Minister of the Crown and endorsed by Parliament. It is a grave position for the Government to take ; and whether we have argued the case forcibly or otherwise, it is a significant commentary on the course of the Government that in this most important topic affecting Parliament, members of the Government remain silent on the legal and constitutional view of the case. The debate has proceeded for some hours, and I have had to follow gentlemen who agreed with me. I have not had the advantage of hearing the opinion of the Solicitor General. I have read his opinion given, not exhaustively, but in a debate on other subjects. He has not taken part in this discussion ; and the Minister of Trade and Commerce has admitted that he did not approach the question from the standpoint of a lawyer ; but the Solicitor General and the Minister of Justice will agree with me and every other member of the profession that this question can be considered only from the standpoint of law. If the construction they have put upon the statute is sound in law, there is no ground for a resolution such as the one we have put. If theirs be the construction, it is wholly useless to ask Parliament to meet, and no necessity to vote the supplies. All that the Government need do is to advise His Excellency to prorogue the House, and after prorogation issue further warrants to carry on the business of the country. If hon. gentlemen were unable to obtain the supplies they now ask and Parliament were prorogued, they would be face to face with the very circumstances that existed in July last, and all the arguments they have used to-day, if there is anything in them, would carry them along another year without any vote from the independent representatives of the people. That is an extraordinary position for the Canadian Government and the Canadian Parliament to find itself in, in the year 1896. One hon. gentleman at the back of the Treasury benches dared to refer to the glories of Liberal leaders who had fought for responsible government. But he did not dare, though he had doubts about propriety in regard to one of the most important features in connection with party rule, although he had doubts as to the legality of the position of the Government, to give the slightest symptom that he had inherited anything of the spirit of those great reformers and those parliamentary guides. So there are gentlemen giving their allegiance to the Government, giving their reasons in a halting fashion and not basing them upon the exact language of the statute. And on the other hand, we have these opinions not only of eminent lawyers on our side of the House, but on the Opposition side of the House. It is easy to see that a leading member of the Bar, as the member for one of the Torontos is, who spoke in this debate, has hesitated to say as a member of his profession, that the Government's construction was right, and all he was willing to do was to express doubt and to give the Government the benefit of that doubt. Well, I say if that hon. gentleman be not a political partisan, or not politically blinded, but is here to represent and protect the interests of the public and to guard the privileges of Parliament, he should give the benefit of the doubt to the resolution which is before you. What is the resolution ? I will read it. I propose to read it because the hon. gentlemen who listened to it, gentlemen who follow the facts, will, I think, have the arguments that have been delivered on the right of the Speaker to-day will have great difficulty in voting against the resolution or against the proposition which it sets forth. I fancy that I could with no great difficulty find in resolutions of hon. gentlemen opposite almost the very words of the conclusion of this resolution. And are we to be told that there is to be one rule and one construction of our constitution and of the Audit Act when hon. gentlemen opposite are in opposition and another rule and another construction when they are members of the Government, and that as soon as they change their opinion so also will their supporters change theirs. This resolution says :

The Sixth Session of the Seventh Parliament met on January 2nd, 1896, and on the 27th day of the same month the Government submitted His Excellency's Message transmitting the Estimates for the year 1896-7, which were forthwith referred to the Committee of Supply.

That these Estimates provided appropriations for the foreseen and necessary salaries and contingencies of the several departments of Government and for the maintenance and construction of public works and for other services.

That on the 28th of January the House was asked to go into Committee of the Whole for granting supply, and to consider first the appropriations for departmental salaries and contingencies.

That neither then, nor on the several occasions thereafter when the House was asked to grant supply did the Opposition agree thereto.

That appeals were made by the Government setting forth the urgent necessity for making provision for the ordinary and regular expenditures for the approaching fiscal year, or in view of the impending dissolution and of the fact that the new Parliament could not possibly assemble before July 1st and would probably meet shortly thereafter, for a part thereof.

That despite these representations and although the circumstances were well known and there was ample time at the disposal of the House, supplies for the year 1896-7 were refused and Parliament rose on the 23rd day of April without these supplies being granted.

That Parliament was dissolved and a new Parliament was summoned to meet for the despatch of business upon the 16th day of July, 1896.

That the Government resigned office on the 10th day of July, 1896, and the Honourable Wilfred Laurier was called upon by His Excellency to form an Administration, which he undertook to do.

That thereafter, Parliament was on the 13th day of July, 1896, prorogued to meet for the despatch of business on the 19th day of August, 1896.

That by chapter 29, 49 Victoria, R.S.C., the Governor General in Council is empowered to issue special warrants authorizing the payment of money not previously voted by Parliament under the following circumstances only, to wit :—

'If, when Parliament is not in session, any accident happens to any public work or building which requires an immediate outlay for the repairs thereof, or any other occasion arises when any expenditure not foreseen or provided for by Parliament is urgently and immediately required for the public good, then upon the report of the Minister of Finance and Receiver General that there is no parliamentary provision, and of the Minister having charge of the service in question, that the necessity is urgent, the Governor in Council may order a special warrant to be prepared, to be signed by the Governor General for the issue of the amount estimated to be required.'

That on the 16th day of June, 1896—the date when Parliament had been summoned to meet for the despatch of business—His Excellency was advised to issue his warrant for the expenditure of $1,067,576 for departmental salaries and contingencies, and on August 18th—one day before the actual meeting of Parliament—was again advised to issue his warrant for $935,561 for similar expenditures, and that these warrants did issue and the sums named were accordingly placed at the disposal of the department.

That these amounts were not called for by any accident to any public work or building, nor were they required for any expenditures which had not been foreseen, and which could not have been provided for, but were used to pay ordinary salaries and contingencies, for which Parliament had been asked to provide, and which had been refused by the House of Commons.

That, under these circumstances, this House is of the opinion that the issue of the said warrants was in contravention of the well understood principles of parliamentary control, an abuse of the powers vested in the Governor General in Council by the said Act, and a usurpation fraught with danger to public liberty and constitutional government.

I have read that resolution for a purpose. I humbly submit that it was useful not so much to give my own opinion, which is a very strong one as to the construction of that statute, but I did think it necessary, when hon. gentlemen indulge so much and particularly a leading member of this House, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, indulge so much in these arguments as to necessity, common-sense, and what business men of the community might think, that it was well to bring the House back to a feature of the most important struggle that has gone on in the old Parliament and in the Parliaments of this country and the various legislatures of the Dominion of Canada. And to give at length, as I venture to do, the opinions of experts, the opinions of high parliamentary authorities in England, showing not only the practice that obtains there, but the reasons for tying the hands of the executive and preventing them exercising the discretion that the Minister of Trade and Commerce thinks the executive ought to possess and ought to be able to exercise. No man can follow those precedents, no man can follow those authorities, no man can have done me the honour to have followed me closely in my speech, and fairly contend that every sentence before the conclusion of the resolution that has been placed in your hands, is not entitled to the support of both sides of this House. Before I sit down, I would like to ask the Government what purpose they have that prevents them accepting this resolution? It would not be the first time that a proposition clearly in line with parliamentary practice and parliamentary precedents, and in line with the safeguards in regard to parliamentary control, was accepted by the Government, when moved from this side of the House; and if they will not accept it, surely some hon. member on the Treasury benches will give us the reasons, the high reasons of state, why they cannot subscribe to this doctrine, so as to prevent, not only themselves, but future Governments from committing the same error again. For they do not propose to remain in power a very great length of time: the only gentleman in this House who seems to be confident on that score, is the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), who has not been able, personally, to get into power at all; but he has predicted a long lease. But hon. gentlemen know that some day the fates will agree against them, be their luck ever so good for a while. They must consider the position in which, not only the present Executive stands, but in which the Executive for many years to come, will be placed, by voting down such an amendment as has been placed in your hands, Mr. Speaker. So I hope that hon. gentlemen will do one of two things: either accept this amendment, and then go into Supply, on another occasion, or favour us with reasons not yet given to his House for their course in objecting to the principles contained in that resolution.

Mr. RUSSELL moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT—LABOUR DAY.

The PRIME MINISTER. Before I move the adjournment of the House, I beg to call its attention for a moment to the fact that Monday is a legal holiday, and I have heard expressions from all quarters, both from the right and from the left, that the House should not sit on that day. Of course, we have sat on some occasions on legal holidays; for instance, we have sat on one or two occasions on Dominion Day, though that is not a precedent which I would like to justify, but it was done under pressure of business and when we were nearing the close of the session. We have not yet approached to that desired stage, though on our side we are desirous of reaching a close as speedily as possible. But as Monday is Labour Day, and a legal holiday instituted in honour of labour, I suppose I will meet the wishes of all members in the House, if I move, as I do now, that when we adjourn on Friday, which is to-day, the House stand adjourned until Tuesday next.

Motion agreed to.

The PRIME MINISTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 1 o'clock a.m. (Friday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 4th September, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 10) to confirm an agreement made between the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada and the Canadian Pacific Railway.—(Mr. Gibson.)

WAYS AND MEANS.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of Ways and Means to consider the following resolution:—

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted by Her Majesty for the service of the year ending 30th June, 1897, the sum of $446,500, be granted out of the Consolidated Fund of Canada.

I suggest that this resolution, which covers an item in regard to militia already voted, may be passed through its stages without any delay.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no objection to pass the resolution through one of its stages, and that will not delay it any inconvenient time.

Resolution considered in Committee and agreed to.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to ask the Minister of Finance when we may expect the Supplementary Estimates. The main object of the session appears to be to pass Supply, and as it is manifestly going it blind to have only part of the Estimates down—for the Finance Minister has told us that Supplementary Estimates are still to be brought down—I think it very necessary that they should be on hand as soon as possible.

The FINANCE MINISTER (Mr. Fielding). We have been making such slow progress with the main Estimates that I hardly thought it necessary to deal with the Supplementaries. They will, however, receive very early consideration, but I am unable to give the hon. gentleman a definite answer to-day as to when they will be brought down.

Mr. FOSTER. The object which we both desire of shortening the session, will be helped forward if the Supplementaries are brought down at an early day.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Are you not boasting?

SUPPLY—GOVERNOR GENERAL'S WARRANTS.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding: That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply; and the motion of Mr. Foster in amendment thereto.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I could offer no excuse for presuming upon the indulgence of this House had it not been for the tender and somewhat affectionate invitation extended to the young members—that is young in their parliamentary years—and to the independent members, to weigh calmly and fairly and dispassionately, the arguments that have been addressed from the other side of the Chamber. I can say with absolute sincerity that I had no intention until yesterday of taking part in this debate, for in my opinion the matter does not very profoundly agitate the public mind, and in so far as any vindication of the course of the Government is concerned, it demands very little argument at our hands with respect to any impression which is likely to be created upon the mind of the public at large. If I had had any intention from the first of taking part in this debate, I would have made it my duty to pay very much more attention to the speech of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Herbert Tupper) than, I am sorry to say, I did, owing to the late hour of the evening at which it was delivered. I would possibly have been able to deal with his argument, as I shall not do now—the House perhaps has occasion to rejoice at that—and I might also have been able to follow his highly interesting disquisition in which he developed the record of the great parliamentary struggle which is perhaps the central feature in the history of parliamentary institutions in the motherland, a struggle as the result of which the Commons of England obtained control over the public money and prevented the Crown from assuming the control which it had on too many occasions usurped. However, any serious discussion on that branch of constitutional law has become somewhat obsolete in these days. It has become of somewhat secondary importance, because the usurpations which rendered it necessary that the House of Commons should assert its right, assert its powers, and vindicate its position, have since then entirely ceased. Those usurpations which were the cause of the great struggle between the Crown and the Commons no longer take place, and it would be only a person of almost insane imagination who could suppose that there was any danger of that description threatening us in these days, to render such a discussion of any real practical value. My hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) is very fond of propounding conundrums, and he did propound some to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I was anxious to know whether he was as eager to answer questions as he was to ask them, and when my hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), who made a very clear and a very lucid presentation of the legal merits of the case, asked him some very pertinent questions. I did not think the member for Pictou candidly or clearly answered them. My hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) presented the possibility of the supposititious case, of Parliament sitting all through up to the end of its term, and up to the end of the fiscal year, having been prevented by some unforeseen occurrence from taking an appropriation for the current year. Assuming that Parliament was unable to do so, and assuming a sudden and unexpected dissolution and reconstruction of Government, and possibly an entire change of the complexion of Parliament, and further assuming that there was a necessary expenditure for two or three months which was absolutely unprovided for; my hon. friend (Mr. Flint) asked whether in a condition of things like that the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) would say that it was absolutely impossible to make any provision for the ordinary expenditures of Government, simply because they were foreseen, at the time Parliament was sitting, although they had not been provided for. I do not think that the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) gave a very clear or a very lucid answer to that question. Hon. gentlemen opposite have quoted for us a great many precedents, but let me remind them that the value of a precedent altogether depends upon the similarity of the case to which it is applied. We were on the 14th of July last living under a condition of things in Canada which was absolutely without precedent. We were then passing through a crisis, the conditions precedent to which were altogether unique in their character. It is hardly worth while, when you
